ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Civil procedure — Summary judgment — Investor bringing action in civil fraud and subsequently bringing a motion for summary judgment — Motion judge granting summary judgment but being overruled by Court of Appeal — Elements of civil fraud — Whether motion judge erred in granting summary judgment — Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, Rule 20.

Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. is an American corporation. Its principal met with the principal of Frontline Investments, Inc. and as a result of these meetings, executed a number of investment documents in favour of Frontline. Bruno Appliance subsequently wired US$1 million to Cassels Brock, who assigned the funds to an account associated with Tropos Capital Inc., a company of which H was the principal. Bruno Appliance's funds were then bundled with other funds and paid to Tropos in a bank draft. Bruno Appliance's money was not invested and disappeared.

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DE L'ONTARIO

Procédure civile — Jugement sommaire — Investisseur intentant une action pour fraude civile et présentant ensuite une requête en jugement sommaire — Jugement accueillant la requête en jugement sommaire infirmé par la Cour d'appel — Éléments de la fraude civile — Le juge saisi de la requête a-t-il commis une erreur en accueillant la requête en jugement sommaire? — Règles de procédure civile, R.R.O. 1990, Règl. 194, règle 20.

Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. est une société américaine. Son dirigeant a rencontré le dirigeant de Frontline Investments, Inc. et comme suite à ces rencontres, il a signé un certain nombre de documents de placement en faveur de Frontline. Bruno Appliance a par la suite transféré un million de dollars américains à Cassels Brock, qui a placé l'argent dans un compte associé à Tropos Capital Inc., une entreprise dont H était le dirigeant. Les fonds de Bruno Appliance ont ensuite été regroupés avec d'autres fonds et versés à Tropos par traite bancaire. L'argent de Bruno Appliance n'a pas été investi et est disparu.

2014 SCC 8 (CanLII)

Bruno Appliance launched a civil fraud action against H and others, and brought a motion for summary judgment. The motion judge found that Bruno Appliance had established its claim and that there was no issue requiring a trial. The Court of Appeal disagreed and ordered that the Bruno Appliance action proceed to trial.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The scope and interpretation of the amended Rule 20 summary judgment motion are addressed in the companion appeal, Hryniak v. Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 87. Summary judgment may not be granted under Rule 20 where there is a genuine issue requiring a trial. The motion judge should ask whether the matter can be resolved in a fair and just manner on a summary judgment motion. This will be the case when the process (1) allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact, (2) allows the judge to apply the law to the facts, and (3) is a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result. If there appears to be a genuine issue requiring a trial, based only on the record before her, the judge should then ask if the need for a trial can be avoided by using the new powers provided under Rules 20.04(2.1) and (2.2). She may, at her discretion, use those powers, provided that their use is not against the interest of justice.

The Court of Appeal did not err in its determination that Bruno Appliance should not receive summary judgment against H. The following four elements constitute the tort of civil fraud: (1) a false representation made by the defendant; (2) some level of knowledge of the falsehood of the representation on the part of the defendant (whether through knowledge or recklessness); (3) the false representation caused the plaintiff to act; and (4) the plaintiff's actions resulted in a loss.

Civil fraud requires a finding that H made a misrepresentation which induced Bruno Appliance to invest. The motion judge neither identified the need for a misrepresentation, nor found that H made one. H was not present at the meeting that led to Bruno's investment and the motion judge's findings are insufficient to establish that any false statements made at the meeting can be attributed to him.

Bruno Appliance a intenté contre H et d'autres personnes une action pour fraude civile et a présenté une requête en jugement sommaire. Le juge saisi de la requête a conclu que Bruno Appliance avait établi le bien-fondé de sa poursuite et qu'aucune question ne nécessitait la tenue d'un procès. La Cour d'appel s'est dite d'avis contraire et a ordonné l'instruction de l'action intentée par Bruno Appliance.

Arrêt : Le pourvoi est rejeté.

La portée et l'interprétation de la règle 20 relative à la requête en jugement sommaire sont examinées dans le pourvoi connexe Hryniak c. Mauldin, 2014 CSC 7, [2014] 1 R.C.S. 87. Un jugement sommaire ne peut pas être rendu en vertu de la règle 20 en présence d'une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès. Le juge saisi de la requête doit se demander si l'affaire peut être réglée de manière juste et équitable par voie de requête en jugement sommaire. Ce sera le cas lorsque la procédure (1) lui permet de tirer les conclusions de fait qui s'imposent, (2) lui permet d'appliquer le droit aux faits et (3) constitue un moyen proportionné, plus expéditif et moins coûteux d'atteindre un résultat juste. Si, compte tenu uniquement du dossier dont dispose le juge, il semble y avoir une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès, ce dernier doit alors se demander si l'exercice des nouveaux pouvoirs que confèrent les par. 20.04(2.1) et (2.2) des Règles permet d'écarter le besoin d'un procès. Il peut, à son gré, exercer ces pouvoirs pourvu que leur exercice ne soit pas contraire à l'intérêt de la justice.

La Cour d'appel n'a pas commis d'erreur en décidant que Bruno Appliance ne doit pas obtenir un jugement sommaire contre H. Les quatre éléments suivants constituent le délit de fraude civile : (1) le défendeur a fait une fausse déclaration; (2) le défendeur savait, jusqu'à un certain point, que sa déclaration était fausse (sciemment ou par insouciance); (3) la fausse déclaration a incité le demandeur à agir; (4) les actes du demandeur ont entraîné une perte.

La fraude civile exige que H ait fait une fausse déclaration ayant incité Bruno Appliance à investir. Le juge saisi de la requête n'a ni souligné la nécessité qu'il y ait eu fausse déclaration, ni conclu que H avait fait une telle déclaration. H n'était pas présent à la rencontre qui a amené Bruno à investir et les conclusions du juge saisi de la requête ne suffisent pas à prouver que des déclarations fausses faites lors de la rencontre peuvent être attribuées à H.

While the evidence clearly demonstrates that H was aware of the fraud, and may in fact have benefited from the fraud, whether H perpetrated the fraud by inducing Bruno Appliance to contribute US$1 million to a non-existent investment scheme is a genuine issue requiring a trial.

Bien que la preuve démontre clairement que H était au courant de la fraude, et qu'il en a peut-être effectivement bénéficié, la question de savoir si H a commis la fraude en incitant Bruno Appliance à verser un million de dollars américains à un projet d'investissement inexistant constitue une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès.

[1] KARAKATSANIS J. — Like its companion, Hryniak v. Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 87 (Mauldin), this appeal concerns the interpretation and application of Ontario's new summary judgment rules. In this action, the Ontario Court of Appeal overturned the motion judge's decision to grant summary judgment in favour of the plaintiff and made various trial management orders under Rule 20.05 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194.

[2] In light of the principles articulated in the Mauldin appeal and for the reasons that follow, I would dismiss the appeal.

I. Facts

[3] Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. is an American corporation, whose principal is Albert Bruno. In late 2001, Bruno met with Robert Cranston, the principal of a Panamanian company, Frontline Investments, Inc. As a result of these meetings, Bruno executed a number of investment documents in favour of Frontline.

[4] In February 2002, Bruno met with Cranston and Gregory Peebles, a corporate-commercial lawyer at the Toronto offices of Cassels Brock and Blackwell. No notes were kept of this meeting, and the recollection of the participants varies. While Robert Hryniak did not attend this meeting, Tropos Capital Inc. (Tropos), a company of which Hryniak was the principal, received and paid a bill for Peebles' attendance.

Version française du jugement de la Cour rendu par

[1] LA JUGE KARAKATSANIS — Le présent pourvoi, comme le pourvoi connexe Hryniak c. Mauldin, 2014 CSC 7, [2014] 1 R.C.S. 87 (Mauldin), porte sur l'interprétation et l'application des nouvelles règles régissant les jugements sommaires en Ontario. Dans la présente affaire, la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a infirmé la décision du juge saisi de la requête de rendre un jugement sommaire favorable à la demanderesse. Elle a aussi rendu plusieurs ordonnances relatives à la gestion du procès en vertu de la règle 20.05 des Règles de procédure civile, R.R.O. 1990, Règl. 194.

[2] À la lumière des principes énoncés dans le pourvoi Mauldin et pour les motifs qui suivent, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

I. Faits

[3] Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. est une société américaine dirigée par Albert Bruno. Vers la fin de 2001, M. Bruno a rencontré Robert Cranston, le dirigeant d'une entreprise panaméenne, Frontline Investments, Inc. Comme suite à ces rencontres, M. Bruno a signé un certain nombre de documents de placement en faveur de Frontline.

[4] En février 2002, M. Bruno a rencontré M. Cranston et Gregory Peebles, un avocat spécialisé en droit des sociétés et en droit commercial du cabinet Cassels Brock and Blackwell à Toronto. Aucune note sur cette rencontre n'a été conservée et les participants en ont gardé un souvenir différent. Robert Hryniak n'a pas assisté à cette rencontre, mais Tropos Capital Inc. (Tropos), une entreprise dont M. Hryniak était le dirigeant, a reçu et payé une facture pour la présence de M. Peebles.

[5] In early March 2002, Bruno Appliance wired US$1 million to Cassels Brock, who assigned the funds to an account associated with Tropos. Bruno Appliance's funds were then bundled with other funds (totalling US$3.5 million) and paid to Tropos in a bank draft. At the end of April 2002, Tropos paid US$2.5 million to a company called Southern Equity Investors Inc., and in late June 2002 transferred approximately US$550,000 to an individual named Reinhard. By the end of September 2003, Tropos' balance with Cassels Brock had declined to US$19,000.

[6] In short, Bruno Appliance's money was not invested and it never received a return on its investment.

II. Judicial History

A. Ontario Superior Court of Justice, 2010 ONSC 5490 (CanLII)

[7] Bruno Appliance joined with the plaintiffs from the companion Mauldin appeal in a civil fraud action against Hryniak, Peebles and Cassels Brock. Both sets of plaintiffs brought motions for summary judgment, which were heard together.

[8] The motion judge found that Bruno Appliance had established its claim against Hryniak and that there was no issue requiring a trial. He was satisfied that, in spite of Hryniak's absence from an early meeting between Peebles, Cranston and Bruno, Hryniak knew that the meeting was occurring and his company, Tropos, paid for Peebles' attendance. The motion judge further found that Hryniak was aware that US$1 million was placed in Tropos' account on Bruno Appliance's behalf, and that Hryniak gave instructions regarding those funds.

[9] The motion judge found that none of Bruno Appliance's funds were invested. In part, they were

[5] Au début de mars 2002, Bruno Appliance a transféré un million de dollars américains à Cassels Brock, qui a placé l'argent dans un compte associé à Tropos. Les fonds de Bruno Appliance ont ensuite été regroupés avec d'autres fonds (totalisant 3,5 millions de dollars américains) et versés à Tropos par traite bancaire. À la fin d'avril 2002, Tropos a versé 2,5 millions de dollars américains à une entreprise appelée Southern Equity Investors Inc. et, à la fin de juin 2002, a transféré environ 550 000 $US à une personne du nom de Reinhard. À la fin de septembre 2003, le solde de Tropos détenu par Cassels Brock avait chuté à 19 000 $US.

[6] En résumé, l'argent de Bruno Appliance n'a pas été investi et la société n'a jamais touché quelque revenu de son placement.

II. Historique judiciaire

A. Cour supérieure de justice de l'Ontario, 2010 ONSC 5490 (CanLII)

[7] Bruno Appliance s'est jointe aux demandeurs du pourvoi connexe Mauldin dans une action pour fraude civile intentée contre M. Hryniak, M. Peebles et Cassels Brock. Dans les deux dossiers, les demandeurs ont présenté des requêtes en jugement sommaire qui ont été instruites ensemble.

[8] Le juge saisi de la requête a conclu que Bruno Appliance avait établi le bien-fondé de sa poursuite contre M. Hryniak et qu'aucune question ne nécessitait la tenue d'un procès. Il était convaincu que, même si M. Hryniak n'avait pas assisté à une rencontre antérieure entre MM. Peebles, Cranston et Bruno, il savait que cette rencontre avait eu lieu et que son entreprise, Tropos, avait payé pour la présence de M. Peebles. Le juge saisi de la requête a aussi conclu que M. Hryniak savait qu'un million de dollars américains avaient été déposés dans le compte de Tropos au nom de Bruno Appliance et que M. Hryniak avait donné des directives à propos de ces fonds.

[9] Le juge saisi de la requête a déclaré qu'aucune partie des fonds de Bruno Appliance n'avait été used to fund disbursements to another individual, Reinhard, and the remainder was slowly drained.

[10] The motion judge held that the tort of civil fraud was made out and there was no genuine issue requiring a trial.

[11] As in the companion Mauldin appeal, the motion judge dismissed the motion for summary judgment against Peebles, as he found that the claim involved factual issues that could not be resolved on the record. Consequently, the motion for summary judgment against Cassels Brock was dismissed, as it was premised on the theory that the firm was vicariously liable for Peebles' acts and omissions.

B. Court of Appeal for Ontario, 2011 ONCA 764, 108 O.R. (3d) 1

[12] Hryniak's appeal of this motion was heard together with the companion Mauldin appeal, as well as three other matters, which are not before this Court. The Court of Appeal found that Bruno Appliance's action should not be addressed through summary judgment due to its voluminous record, conflicting testimony, credibility issues, conflicting theories of liability advanced against multiple defendants, and the absence of reliable documentary evidence.

[13] Despite this conclusion, as in Mauldin, the Court of Appeal was prepared to review whether the motion judge was nonetheless entitled to grant judgment but, in this case, it concluded that the evidence against Hryniak was not nearly as overwhelming. Two genuine issues required a trial: first, whether Hryniak induced Bruno Appliance to invest, and second, whether some of the funds were misappropriated by Cranston, instead of Hryniak.

investie. Ces fonds ont notamment été utilisés pour financer des versements à une personne du nom de Reinhard. Le reste a lentement été épuisé.

[10] Le juge saisi de la requête a conclu que le délit de fraude civile avait été établi et qu'aucune véritable question ne nécessitait la tenue d'un procès.

[11] Comme dans le pourvoi connexe Mauldin, le juge a rejeté la requête visant à obtenir un jugement sommaire contre M. Peebles puisqu'il a conclu que la poursuite mettait en jeu des questions de fait qui ne pouvaient pas être résolues au vu du dossier. La requête en jugement sommaire contre Cassels Brock a donc été rejetée puisqu'elle était fondée sur la thèse selon laquelle le cabinet était responsable du fait d'autrui pour les actes et omissions de M. Peebles.

B. Cour d'appel de l'Ontario, 2011 ONCA 764, 108 O.R. (3d) 1

[12] L'appel interjeté par M. Hryniak à l'encontre de cette décision a été entendu avec l'appel connexe Mauldin, ainsi qu'avec trois autres affaires dont notre Cour n'est pas saisie. La Cour d'appel a conclu que l'action intentée par Bruno Appliance ne devrait pas être tranchée par jugement sommaire compte tenu de son volumineux dossier, des témoignages contradictoires, des questions de crédibilité, des thèses opposées en matière de responsabilité qui ont été avancées contre plusieurs défendeurs et de l'absence d'une preuve documentaire fiable.

[13] Malgré cette conclusion, la Cour d'appel était disposée, tout comme dans Mauldin, à réexaminer la question de savoir si le juge saisi de la requête était néanmoins habilité à rendre un jugement, mais en l'espèce, elle a conclu que la preuve présentée contre M. Hryniak n'était pas aussi accablante. Deux véritables questions nécessitaient la tenue d'un procès : premièrement, celle de savoir si M. Hryniak avait incité Bruno Appliance à investir, et deuxièmement, celle de savoir si une partie des fonds avait été détournée par M. Cranston plutôt que M. Hryniak.

[14] The Court of Appeal found that the motion judge failed to address the issue of whether Hryniak knowingly made any misrepresentation that induced Bruno Appliance to invest, a necessary element of fraud. The Court of Appeal concluded that there was no compelling evidence that Peebles acted as Hryniak's agent when the relevant representations were made. With respect to the second issue, the Court of Appeal found that it could not decide, based on the record, whether Bruno Appliance's investment was misappropriated entirely by Hryniak or by both Hryniak and Cranston in some proportion.

[15] As a result, the Court of Appeal ordered that the Bruno Appliance action proceed to trial, subject to certain trial management orders under Rule 20.05(2).

III. Analysis

[16] The scope and interpretation of the amended Rule 20 are addressed in the companion Mauldin appeal. Therefore, the issue that remains to be determined in this appeal is whether the Court of Appeal erred in its determination that Bruno Appliance should not receive summary judgment against Hryniak.

A. The Tort of Civil Fraud

[17] The parties disagree as to the elements of the tort of civil fraud, in particular whether proof is required that Hryniak induced Bruno Appliance to part with its funds.

[18] The classic statement of the elements of civil fraud stems from an 1889 decision of the House of Lords, Derry v. Peek (1889), 14 App. Cas. 337, where Lord Herschell conducted a thorough review of the history of the tort of deceit and put forward the following three propositions, at p. 374:

[14] La Cour d'appel a conclu que le juge saisi de la requête n'avait pas traité de la question de savoir si M. Hryniak avait sciemment fait une fausse déclaration ayant incité Bruno Appliance à investir, un élément nécessaire de la fraude. La Cour d'appel est arrivée à la conclusion qu'il n'existait aucune preuve convaincante selon laquelle M. Peebles avait agi à titre de mandataire de M. Hryniak au moment où les déclarations pertinentes ont été faites. Au sujet de la deuxième question, la Cour d'appel a conclu qu'elle ne pouvait pas décider, au vu du dossier, si le placement de Bruno Appliance avait été détourné entièrement par M. Hryniak ou par MM. Hryniak et Cranston selon certaines proportions.

[15] Par conséquent, la Cour d'appel a ordonné l'instruction de l'action intentée par Bruno Appliance, sous réserve de certaines ordonnances relatives à la gestion de l'instance rendues conformément au par. 20.05(2) des Règles.

III. Analyse

[16] Le pourvoi connexe Mauldin traite de la portée et de l'interprétation de la règle 20 modifiée. Par conséquent, il reste à décider en l'espèce si la Cour d'appel a commis une erreur en décidant que Bruno Appliance ne doit pas obtenir un jugement sommaire contre M. Hryniak.

A. Le délit de fraude civile

[18] L'énoncé classique des éléments de la fraude civile tire son origine dans un arrêt rendu en 1889 par la Chambre des lords, Derry c. Peek (1889), 14 App. Cas. 337, dans lequel lord Herschell a procédé à un examen approfondi de l'historique du délit de tromperie et a énoncé les trois propositions suivantes, à la p. 374 :

First, in order to sustain an action of deceit, there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Secondly, fraud is proved when it is shewn that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. . . . Thirdly, if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made.

[19] This Court adopted Lord Herschell's formulation in Parna v. G. & S. Properties Ltd., [1971] S.C.R. 306, adding that the false statement must "actually [induce the plaintiff] to act upon it" (p. 316, quoting Anson on Contract). Requiring the plaintiff to prove inducement is consistent with this Court's later recognition in Snell v. Farrell, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 311, at pp. 319-20, that tort law requires proof that "but for the tortious conduct of the defendant, the plaintiff would not have sustained the injury complained of".

[20] Finally, this Court has recognized that proof of loss is also required. As Taschereau C.J. held in Angers v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. (1904), 35 S.C.R. 330, "fraud without damage gives . . . no cause of action" (p. 340).

[21] From this jurisprudential history, I summarize the following four elements of the tort of civil fraud: (1) a false representation made by the defendant; (2) some level of knowledge of the falsehood of the representation on the part of the defendant (whether through knowledge or recklessness); (3) the false representation caused the plaintiff to act; and (4) the plaintiff's actions resulted in a loss.

B. Did the Motion Judge Err in Granting Summary Judgment?

[22] Summary judgment may not be granted under Rule 20 where there is a genuine issue requiring a trial. As outlined in the companion Mauldin appeal, [TRADUCTION] Premièrement, afin de fonder une action pour tromperie, il faut prouver qu'il y a eu fraude, et rien de moins que cela ne saurait suffire. Deuxièmement, la fraude est établie par la preuve qu'une fausse déclaration a été faite (1) sciemment, ou (2) sans la croire vraie, ou encore (3) avec insouciance, sans se soucier qu'elle soit vraie ou fausse. [. . .] Troisièmement, si la fraude est établie, le mobile de l'auteur de la fraude n'a aucune importance. Il importe peu que l'auteur de la déclaration n'eût pas l'intention de tromper son interlocuteur ou de lui faire du tort.

[20] Enfin, la Cour a reconnu qu'il faut aussi faire la preuve d'une perte. Comme l'a dit le juge en chef Taschereau dans Angers c. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. (1904), 35 R.C.S. 330, [TRADUCTION] « une fraude ne causant aucun préjudice ne [. . .] donne aucune cause d'action » (p. 340).

[21] Sur la base de cet historique jurisprudentiel, je résume ainsi les quatre éléments du délit de fraude civile : (1) le défendeur a fait une fausse déclaration; (2) le défendeur savait, jusqu'à un certain point, que sa déclaration était fausse (sciemment ou par insouciance); (3) la fausse déclaration a incité le demandeur à agir; (4) les actes du demandeur ont entraîné une perte.

B. Le juge saisi de la requête a-t-il commis une erreur en rendant un jugement sommaire?

[22] Un jugement sommaire ne peut pas être rendu en vertu de la règle 20 en présence d'une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès. Comme

the motion judge should ask whether the matter can be resolved in a fair and just manner on a summary judgment motion. This will be the case when the process (1) allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact, (2) allows the judge to apply the law to the facts, and (3) is a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result. If there appears to be a genuine issue requiring a trial, based only on the record before her, the judge should then ask if the need for a trial can be avoided by using the new powers provided under Rules 20.04(2.1) and (2.2). She may, at her discretion, use those powers, provided that their use is not against the interest of justice.

il est souligné dans le pourvoi connexe Mauldin, le juge saisi de la requête doit se demander si l'affaire peut être réglée de manière juste et équitable par voie de requête en jugement sommaire. Ce sera le cas lorsque la procédure (1) lui permet de tirer les conclusions de fait qui s'imposent, (2) lui permet d'appliquer le droit aux faits et (3) constitue un moyen proportionné, plus expéditif et moins coûteux d'atteindre un résultat juste. Si, compte tenu uniquement du dossier dont dispose le juge, il semble y avoir une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès, ce dernier doit alors se demander si l'exercice des nouveaux pouvoirs que confèrent les par. 20.04(2.1) et (2.2) des Règles permet d'écarter le besoin d'un procès. Il peut, à son gré, exercer ces pouvoirs pourvu que leur exercice ne soit pas contraire à l'intérêt de la justice.

[23] Pour les motifs qui suivent, je suis d'avis qu'il existe une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès.

[24] As noted by the Court of Appeal, and following the analysis above, civil fraud requires a finding that Hryniak made a misrepresentation which induced Bruno Appliance to invest. The motion judge neither identified the need for a misrepresentation, nor found that Hryniak made one.

[25] The motion judge found that Tropos did not invest Bruno Appliance's funds and that a misrepresentation had therefore been made to the investors. The point at which a misrepresentation occurred was a meeting between Peebles, Cranston and Bruno Appliance's principal in February 2002. He found: that Hryniak was supposed to be in attendance at this meeting, that Hryniak knew of the purpose of the meeting and that Hryniak's company paid for Peebles' attendance.

[25] Le juge saisi de la requête a conclu que Tropos n'avait pas investi les fonds de Bruno Appliance et qu'une fausse déclaration avait donc été faite aux investisseurs. C'est à l'occasion d'une rencontre entre M. Peebles, M. Cranston et le dirigeant de Bruno Appliance en février 2002 que cette fausse représentation a été faite. Il a conclu que M. Hryniak était censé assister à cette rencontre, que ce dernier connaissait l'objet de la rencontre et que l'entreprise de ce dernier avait payé pour la présence de M. Peebles.

[26] However, Hryniak was not present, and he can only be liable for any misrepresentation made by Peebles or Cranston if their statements can be attributed to him. For example, the Court of Appeal considered, and ultimately rejected, the possibility

[26] Cependant, M. Hryniak n'était pas présent à cette rencontre et il ne peut être tenu responsable de fausses déclarations faites par M. Peebles ou M. Cranston que si les déclarations de ces derniers peuvent lui être attribuées. Par exemple, la Cour that Peebles or Cranston was acting as Hryniak's agent.

[27] In my view, the motion judge's findings are insufficient to establish that any false statements made at the meeting can be attributed to Hryniak. There was no evidence that Peebles or Cranston were acting on instructions from Hryniak when they met with Bruno. While a principal will generally be vicariously liable "for the torts of her agent committed within the scope of her actual or apparent authority" (P. H. Osborne, The Law of Torts (4th ed. 2011), at p. 369), the motion judge did not find Peebles or Cranston to be Hryniak's agent, and there is no indication that the evidence established that Peebles or Cranston was authorized to make representations on behalf of Hryniak and did not do so on their own account. Similarly, there was insufficient evidence to establish that either Peebles or Cranston was acting as Hryniak's unwitting dupe and, as the motion judge concluded, that issue required a trial.

[28] While the motion judge found that Hryniak was aware of the falseness of the representations[1] and exercised "full dominion and control" over Bruno Appliance's funds (para. 169), as noted by the Court of Appeal, this finding would support liability in conversion, but is not sufficient to establish fraud.

[29] While I agree with the motion judge that the evidence clearly demonstrates that Hryniak was aware of the fraud, and may in fact have benefited from the fraud, whether Hryniak perpetrated the fraud by inducing Bruno Appliance to contribute US$1 million to a non-existent investment scheme is a genuine issue requiring a trial.

1 This follows from his finding in a footnote to para. 178 of his reasons that he accepted Peebles' evidence that he regularly reviewed trust activity with Hryniak (A.R., vol. V, at pp. 154-59).

d'appel a envisagé, puis a rejeté en fin de compte, la possibilité que M. Peebles ou M. Cranston ait agi comme mandataire de M. Hryniak.

[27] À mon avis, les conclusions du juge saisi de la requête ne suffisent pas à prouver que des déclarations fausses faites lors de la rencontre peuvent être attribuées à M. Hryniak. Rien ne prouve que M. Peebles ou M. Cranston suivaient des directives de M. Hryniak quand ils ont rencontré M. Bruno. Un dirigeant est généralement responsable du fait d'autrui [TRADUCTION] « pour les délits commis par son mandataire dans le cadre de son pouvoir réel ou apparent » (P. H. Osborne, The Law of Torts (4e éd. 2011), p. 369), mais le juge saisi de la requête n'a pas conclu que M. Peebles ou M. Cranston étaient les mandataires de M. Hryniak et rien n'indique que, selon la preuve, ils étaient autorisés à faire des déclarations au nom de M. Hryniak et qu'ils n'ont rien fait de tel de leur propre initiative. De même, la preuve était insuffisante pour établir que M. Peebles ou M. Cranston était la dupe de M. Hryniak et, comme l'a conclu le juge saisi de la requête, cette question nécessitait la tenue d'un procès.

[28] Bien que le juge saisi de la requête ait conclu que M. Hryniak était au courant de la fausseté des déclarations[1] et qu'il exerçait [TRADUCTION] « un plein contrôle » sur les fonds de Bruno Appliance (par. 169), comme l'a indiqué la Cour d'appel, cette conclusion justifierait l'imputation de responsabilité pour détournement, mais elle ne suffit pas pour établir la fraude.

[29] Je conviens avec le juge saisi de la requête que la preuve démontre clairement que M. Hryniak était au courant de la fraude, et qu'il en a peut-être effectivement bénéficié, mais la question de savoir si M. Hryniak a commis la fraude en incitant Bruno Appliance à verser un million de dollars américains à un projet d'investissement inexistant constitue une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès.

1 C'est ce qui ressort de sa conclusion dans une note en bas de page rattachée au par. 178 de ses motifs selon laquelle il acceptait le témoignage de M. Peebles, qui a dit avoir examiné régulièrement les activités de la fiducie avec M. Hryniak (d.a., vol. V, p. 154-159).

[30] The Court of Appeal also found the extent of Hryniak's misappropriation of Bruno Appliance's funds to be a second issue requiring a trial. The Court of Appeal found that Hryniak had appropriated US$450,000, but that the fate of the remaining US$550,000 required a trial. Given the principles of joint and several liability, I am satisfied that this issue would not normally preclude a finding that there is no genuine issue requiring a trial against Hryniak.

[31] The motion judge failed to find a necessary element of civil fraud, an error of law, and did not draw sufficient factual conclusions for either him, or an appellate court, to make such a finding. Since the action was proceeding to trial against the other defendants in any event, the order of the Court of Appeal that all the remaining actions be heard together is the most proportionate, timely and cost effective approach. In light of this conclusion, it is unnecessary for me to determine whether it was against the interest of justice for the motion judge to make use of his expanded fact-finding powers.

IV. Conclusion

[32] Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal, with costs to the respondent. I would not interfere with the case management orders made by the Court of Appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[30] La Cour d'appel a aussi conclu que le montant du détournement des fonds de Bruno Appliance par M. Hryniak constituait une deuxième question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès. Elle est parvenue à la conclusion que M. Hryniak avait détourné 450 000 $US, mais que le sort des 550 000 $US qui restaient nécessitait la tenue d'un procès. Compte tenu des principes de responsabilité solidaire, je suis convaincue que cette question n'empêcherait pas normalement de conclure à l'absence d'une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès contre M. Hryniak.

[31] Le juge saisi de la requête n'a pu conclure à l'existence d'un élément nécessaire de la fraude civile, ce qui constitue une erreur de droit, et n'a pas tiré de conclusions factuelles suffisantes pour lui permettre ou permettre à une cour d'appel de conclure à l'existence d'un tel élément. Puisque l'action donnait lieu à un procès contre les autres défendeurs en tout état de cause, l'ordonnance de la Cour d'appel portant que toutes les autres actions soient instruites ensemble constitue la marche à suivre la plus proportionnée, opportune et économique. À la lumière de cette conclusion, je n'ai pas à déterminer s'il était contraire à l'intérêt de la justice que le juge saisi de la requête exerce ses pouvoirs élargis en matière d'appréciation des faits.

IV. Conclusion

[32] Par conséquent, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi avec dépens en faveur de l'intimé. Je ne modifierais pas les ordonnances relatives à la gestion de l'instance rendues par la Cour d'appel.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Fraud—Deceit—Purchase of apartment house—Vendors' representations as to income and expenses—Alleged misrepresentations as to certain disbursements—Failure to prove necessary ingredients in action for deceit.

The personal respondents, who owned and controlled the respondent company, offered to sell to the appellants (AP and his wife) an apartment house, which the company had built in 1965. The asking price was $255,000. The respondents furnished to AP a document which purported to be a statement as to receipts and disbursements for the year 1966. Subsequently, the appellants made an offer in writing to purchase the building for $251,000. Attached to the offer and forming part thereof was a Schedule "A" setting out the details of income and expenses as shown in the statement given to AP. The offer contained a provision that it was subject to satisfactory evidence being provided as to the accuracy of the representations as regards income and expenses.

AP's solicitor requisitioned an auditor's report supporting the amounts set forth in Schedule "A". He received a reply that such a report was not available but that he could satisfy himself as to the income and expenses. On the day set for closing the personal respondents made a statutory declaration that Schedule "A" was a financial statement setting out to the best of their knowledge and ability an accurate and fair estimate of the yearly revenue and yearly expenditure of the corporate respondent. The appellants accepted the statutory declaration "as a substitute" and closed the transaction.

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL D'ONTARIO

Fraude—Tromperie—Achat d'un immeuble résidentiel—Présentation par vendeur des faits relatifs aux recettes et dépenses—Allégation de fausse représentation à l'égard de certaines dépenses—On n'a pas prouvé les éléments essentiels d'une action pour tromperie.

Les intimés personnels, qui sont propriétaires et maîtres de la compagnie intimée, offrirent de vendre aux appelants (AP et son épouse) un immeuble résidentiel, qui avait été construit par la compagnie en 1965. Les intimés en demandaient $255,000 et remirent à AP un document qui était présenté comme étant un état des recettes et dépenses pour l'année 1966. Subséquemment, les appelants ont offert $251,000. Une annexe «A», reproduisant les chiffres figurant dans l'état des recettes et des dépenses remis à AP, a été jointe à l'offre pour en faire partie intégrante. L'offre était en outre subordonnée à la production d'une preuve satisfaisante de l'exactitude des mentions relatives aux recettes et dépenses.

L'avocat de AP a demandé un rapport du vérificateur à l'appui des chiffres indiqués dans l'annexe «A». On lui a répondu qu'on n'avait pas de rapport de vérificateur mais qu'il pouvait s'assurer lui-même ce qu'étaient le revenu et les dépenses. Le jour fixé pour la conclusion du contrat, les intimés personnels ont fait une déclaration statutaire à l'effet que l'annexe «A» était un état financier qui indiquait autant qu'ils le savaient et du mieux qu'ils le pouvaient faire, une estimation précise et équitable du revenu annuel et des dépenses annuelles de la société intimée. Les appelants ont accepté la déclaration statutaire «en remplacement» et ont conclu le marché.

Two weeks later AP attended his solicitor to illustrate that the representations made in the first statement, repeated in Schedule "A", and confirmed in the statutory declaration were false. Shortly thereafter the appellants brought an action claiming damages in the amount of $35,000 because of false and fraudulent representations as to three disbursements, i.e., the cost of fuel, light and water.

The trial judge found in favour of the appellants and awarded damages in the amount of $24,790. On appeal, the Court of Appal varied the trial judgment by reducing the damages to $4,000. The appellants then appealed and the respondents cross-appealed to this Court.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed and the cross-appeal allowed dismissing the action.

In order to sustain an action of deceit, there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Fraud is "a false representation of fact, made with a knowledge of its falsehood, or recklessly, without belief in its truth, with the intention that it should be acted upon by the complaining party, and actually inducing him to act upon it." Here the appellants failed to prove false representation of fact made with a knowledge of its falsehood or recklessly, without belief in its truth, and that they actually were induced by any such representation.

AP failed to prove, and the burden of proof was upon him, that the statement was not to the best of the knowledge and ability of the personal respondents an accurate and fair estimate. AP was not misled in any way by the representations even if they had been false to the knowledge of the respondents. As a shrewd and intelligent apartment house operator, he figured he could pay $251,000 for the property in question and obtain a satisfactory percentage of net profit.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario[1], allowing in part an appeal by the defendants (respondents) from the judg-

[1] [1969] 2 O.R. 346, 5 D.L.R. (3d) 315.

Deux semaines plus tard, AP se présentait chez son avocat pour lui montrer que ce qui était exposé dans le premier état, et qui était repris à l'annexe «A» et confirmé dans la déclaration statutaire, était faux. Les appelants ont alors introduit une action réclamant $35,000 en dommages-intérêts pour cause de présentation fausse et frauduleuse des faits à l'égard de trois postes de dépenses, à savoir le coût du combustible, de l'éclairage et de l'eau.

Le juge de première instance a statué en faveur des appelants et leur a adjugé un montant de $24,790 en dommages-intérêts. La Cour d'appel a modifié le jugement de première instance en réduisant à $4,000 le montant des dommages-intérêts. Les demandeurs en appelèrent à cette Cour et les défendeurs ont interjeté un appel incident.

Arrêt: L'appel doit être rejeté et l'appel incident accueilli, rejetant l'action.

Afin de fonder une action pour tromperie, il faut prouver qu'il y a eu fraude, et rien de moins que cela ne saurait suffire. La fraude est «une fausse présentation de faits, que l'on sait être fausse ou qui est commise avec insouciance, sans la croire vraie, et avec l'intention que la partie qui se dit lésée y donne suite et qui la porte effectivement à y donner suite». Les demandeurs n'ont pas prouvé qu'il y a eu fausse présentation de faits, que l'on savait être fausse, ou commise avec insouciance, sans la croire vraie, et que pareille présentation ait effectivement incité les demandeurs à y donner suite.

AP n'a pas prouvé,—comme il lui appartenait de le faire—que l'état financier ne constituait pas une estimation équitable et précise autant que les intimés l'aient su ou aient pu le savoir. AP n'a été d'aucune façon induit en erreur par la présentation des faits, même si elle avait été fausse à la connaissance des intimés. Comme exploitant entendu et intelligent d'immeubles résidentiels, il a estimé qu'il pouvait payer $251,000 pour la propriété en question et obtenir de la sorte un pourcentage satisfaisant de bénéfice net.

1970 CanLII 25 (SCC)

ment of Ferguson J. in favour of the plaintiffs (appellants) in an action for deceit. Appeal dismissed; cross-appeal allowed dismissing the action.

August Parna and Reta Parna, in person, plaintiffs, appellants.

D. F. O'Leary, Q.C., for the defendants, respondents.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

SPENCE J.—This appeal concerns an action for damages for fraud instituted under the following circumstances.

The plaintiff August Parna was an Estonian by birth who came to Canada in 1948. The plaintiff Reta Parna is the wife of the plaintiff August Parna but took no active part in any of the negotiations in reference to this transaction. I shall use the word "plaintiff" hereafter to refer to August Parna.

August Parna was by no means an uneducated man. He had a university education in Estonia; in addition, he had attended a law course in Heidelberg, Germany, but because of the intervention of the war he had not a university degree nor was he a graduate lawyer. However, only four years after he arrived in Canada he purchased his first apartment house and up to the date of the offer to purchase the apartment house with which this action is concerned he had purchased four other apartment houses and later sold some of them and he had been for the year previous operating a 29-suite apartment house.

It would appear from these facts as well as from the manner in which Mr. Parna carried on his appeal in this Court, appearing in person, that he was a shrewd and intelligent business man.

The apartment house in question consisted of 24 suites and was built by the defendant G. & S. Properties Limited in the year 1965. G. & S. Properties Limited, a respondent, is a company owned and controlled by the other respondents, Frank Albert and William Harvie, who were, respectively, its president and secretary. Before the apartment house was completed, the plaintiff

D. F. O'Leary, c.r., pour les défendeurs, intimés.

Le jugement de la Cour a été rendu par

LE JUGE SPENCE—Le pourvoi se rattache à une action en dommages-intérêts pour fraude instituée dans les circonstances suivantes.

Le demandeur, August Parna, Estonien de naissance, est arrivé au Canada en 1948. La demanderesse, Reta Parna, est l'épouse du demandeur August Parna mais n'a participé activement à aucune des négociations relatives à cette affaire. J'emploierai ci-après le mot «demandeur» pour désigner August Parna.

August Parna n'était nullement un homme sans instruction. Il avait reçu en Estonie une formation universitaire; de plus, il avait suivi un cours de droit à Heidelberg (Allemagne) mais, à cause de la guerre, n'avait pu obtenir un grade universitaire ni un diplôme d'avocat. Toutefois, quatre ans seulement après son arrivée au Canada, il achetait son premier immeuble résidentiel. Jusqu'à la date de l'offre d'achat de l'immeuble résidentiel dont il est question dans la présente action, il avait acheté quatre autres immeubles résidentiels et, plus tard, il en vendit quelques-uns; durant l'année précédente, il avait exploité un immeuble résidentiel de 29 appartements.

Il ressort de ces faits, aussi bien que de la manière dont M. Parna a présenté son pourvoi en cette Cour, où il a comparu personnellement, qu'il est un homme d'affaires intelligent et très entendu.

L'immeuble résidentiel en question comprenait 24 appartements et avait été construit par la défenderesse, G. & S. Properties Limited, en 1965. G. & S. Properties Limited, intimée, est une compagnie dont les autres intimés, Frank Albert et William Harvie sont propriétaires et maîtres, et respectivement président et secrétaire. Avant que soit achevée la construction de l'immeuble résí-approached the latter respondents and attempted to buy the property but these respondents informed the plaintiff that it was their intention to retain ownership and operate the apartment as a business, although they had not previously owned or operated apartment buildings. The two respondents, Frank Albert and William Harvie, who conducted a plumbing business, during the course of the next year determined that too much of their capital was tied up in the apartment building and therefore they decided to sell it.

The respondents first offered the apartment through a realtor for the sum of $262,500. The only offer which materialized was one for the sum of $262,000 which, however, provided for a small amount of cash to be paid on closing. The respondents desired to have the whole balance between the two mortgages of $180,000 and $19,000 respectively, and the purchase price paid in cash upon closing and they, therefore, approached the appellant Parna and offered to sell the property to him. The respondents then were asking the price of $255,000. The respondents at this time furnished to the appellant Parna a document produced at trial as ex. 6 which purported to be a statement as to receipts and disbursements for the year 1966. The appellant examined the figures set out in this statement and took the position that some of the disbursements were at an amount too low to reflect the true operating costs. The respondents Albert and Harvie offered to produce for the appellant Parna's inspection any of the vouchers he desired to see but Parna asked only for the voucher for the cost of fuel for the month of January 1967, and he was shown an invoice for the amount of $345.53. The appellant Parna still insisted that the operating costs as set out in the statement (ex. 6) were too low, and he took the position that the property could not justify a price of more than $241,000.

Very shortly after the appellant Parna was given ex. 6, he was given also another statement (ex. 7) purporting to be applicable to the year dentiel, le demandeur a pressenti ces derniers et a tenté d'acheter l'immeuble mais ces intimés ont informé le demandeur qu'ils voulaient en conserver la propriété et comptaient l'exploiter comme immeuble de rapport, même si jamais jusque-là ils n'avaient été propriétaires ou administrateurs d'immeubles résidentiels. Les deux intimés, Frank Albert et William Harvie, qui exploitaient une entreprise de plomberie, constatèrent au cours de l'année suivante qu'une trop forte proportion de leurs capitaux était engagée dans l'immeuble résidentiel et, par conséquent, décidèrent de le vendre.

Les intimés ont d'abord mis l'immeuble en vente par l'entremise d'un agent immobilier pour la somme de $262,500. La seule offre qui se soit présentée était pour la somme de $262,000, mais ne prévoyait le versement que d'un faible montant en espèces à la conclusion du contrat. Les intimés désiraient que le solde entier entre les deux hypothèques de $180,000 et $19,000, respectivement, et le prix d'achat fût payé comptant à la conclusion du contrat; c'est pourquoi ils firent une démarche auprès de l'appelant Parna, offrant de lui vendre l'immeuble. A ce moment-là les intimés en demandaient $255,000 et remirent à l'appelant Parna un document (produit au procès comme Pièce nº 6) qui était présenté comme étant un état de recettes et de dépenses pour l'année 1966. L'appelant examina les chiffres qui figuraient dans cet état et exprima l'avis que le montant de quelques-unes des dépenses était trop bas pour refléter les véritables frais d'exploitation. Sur quoi les intimés Albert et Harvie offrirent à l'appelant Parna de lui mettre entre les mains toute pièce comptable justificative qu'il lui plairait d'examiner, mais Parna se contenta de réclamer la pièce justificative indiquant ce qu'avait coûté le combustible pour le mois de janvier 1967. On lui fit voir une facture de $345.53. L'appelant Parna persista à déclarer que les frais d'exploitation indiqués dans l'état (Pièce nº 6) étaient trop bas et exprima l'avis que l'immeuble ne pouvait justifier un prix supérieur à $241,000.

1967. This statement, although it did not vary the amounts as to the expenses for fuel, light and water, did have significant changes from its predecessor. The rental revenue was increased from $36,564 to $39,444, an increase of $2,880, representing $10 per apartment per month. The respondents Albert and Harvie informed the appellant Parna that notice of an intention to increase the rental of each apartment by $10 per month had already been sent to tenants and that these increases would take effect as soon as the lease dates permitted. The taxes shown in ex. 6 at $8,250 were shown in ex. 7 at $8,450.

The appellant Parna attended his solicitor, Mr. John S. Miller, and gave to him ex. 6. Mr. Miller, who testified on behalf of the appellant Parna at the trial, did not remember having seen ex. 7 prior to the closing of the transaction although the appellant Parna testified that he had received it very shortly after he received ex. 6.

The appellant Parna testified that although the respondents were asking a price of $255,000 and although it was his opinion that the property, in order to obtain a net income prior to mortgage payments of 10 per cent, could only be worth $241,000, he surmised that the vendors would sell for $252,000 and he therefore instructed his solicitor to draw an offer for an amount slightly less, i.e., $251,000.

Throughout his testimony, the appellant Parna insisted that his sole gauge as to the price he would pay for an apartment building was that the property had to return about 10 per cent, prior to payment of mortgages, upon the purchase price. The testimony which I have outlined above would seem to indicate that the appellant Parna did not engage in any such accurate calculations at all but simply entered into the usual buyer and seller bargaining. The proposed vendors asked $255,000. The proposed purchaser thought he should offer up to $241,000 but that the proposed vendors would sell for $252,000 and so he instructed his solicitor to offer $251,000. The procedure is one which occurs on practically every occasion when real property is sold.

l'année 1967. Dans cet état, les dépenses pour le combustible, l'éclairage et l'eau étaient les mêmes que dans l'état précédent, mais à d'autres égards l'état comportait d'appréciables différences. De $36,564 qu'il avait été, le revenu provenant des loyers était passé à $39,444, ce qui représentait une augmentation de $2,880, ou de $10 par mois et par appartement. Les intimés Albert et Harvie ont alors informé l'appelant Parna qu'ils avaient déjà averti les locataires que le loyer de chaque appartement allait être augmenté de $10 par mois dès que les dates des baux le permettraient. Là où la Pièce nº 6 indiquait un montant de $8,250 pour les taxes, la Pièce nº 7 indiquait un montant de $8,450.

L'appelant Parna s'aboucha avec son avocat, M. John S. Miller, et lui remit la Pièce nº 6. M. Miller, qui a témoigné au procès au nom de l'appelant Parna ne se rappelait pas avoir vu la Pièce nº 7 avant la conclusion du contrat bien que, selon le témoignage de l'appelant Parna, il l'avait reçue très peu de temps après qu'il eut reçu la Pièce nº 6.

L'appelant Parna a témoigné que, même si les intimés demandaient $255,000, et bien qu'à son propre avis l'immeuble ne pouvait valoir plus de $241,000 afin de rapporter un revenu net de 10 pour cent avant le paiement des hypothèques, il présuma que les vendeurs céderaient la propriété pour $252,000 et c'est pourquoi il chargea son avocat de dresser une offre pour un montant un peu moindre, soit $251,000.

Tout le long de son témoignage, l'appelant Parna a maintenu que son seul critère du prix qu'il paierait pour un immeuble résidentiel c'était que la propriété rapporte environ 10 pour cent du prix d'achat, avant de satisfaire aux hypothèques. Les témoignages que je viens de relater paraîtraient indiquer que l'appelant Parna n'a pas du tout fait de tels calculs précis mais s'est tout simplement livré au marchandage habituel entre acheteur et vendeur. Les vendeurs éventuels demandaient $255,000. L'acheteur éventuel a cru devoir offrir jusqu'à $241,000 mais estimait que les vendeurs éventuels accepteraient $252,000, et c'est pourquoi il chargea son avocat d'offrir $251,000. C'est un procédé qui se renouvelle dans presque toutes ventes de propriétés immobilières.

It is to be noted that that schedule used the figures set out in the statement of receipts and disbursements as to 1966 (ex. 6) and did not make or use any reference to the altered situation as shown in ex. 7, although the appellant Parna had ex. 7 in his possession shortly after he received ex. 6 and some time before he instructed his solicitor to prepare and present the offer to purchase (ex. 1). The offer to purchase was presented to the respondents and was accepted by the respondents; the date of acceptance is not completed on ex. 1 but it would appear to have been on February 17, 1967, at which time the offer, by its terms, expired. The date for closing as set out in the offer was April 1, 1967.

The appellant Parna's solicitor, Mr. Miller, testified that about March 15, 1967, he wrote to the vendor's solicitor with the usual requirements on title including a requisition reading as follows:

> 6. REQUIRED auditor's report for the period of ownership of your clients supporting the rental income and operating expenses as set forth in Schedule "A" of the Agreement of Purchase and Sale.

and that he received in reply a letter from the vendor's solicitor dated March 28, 1967, which read in reference to that requisition:

> 6. We do not have an auditor's report but you can satisfy yourself as to income and expenses.

The learned trial judge characterized that answer as "one of those brush-off answers".

In his testimony, Mr. Miller testified that upon receipt of the latter letter he immediately telephoned to his client, the appellant Parna, and told the appellant that he was not prepared to close the transaction on that basis requesting that the appellant attend him. Mr. Miller testified that he then telephoned the vendors' solicitor informing him that many of the answers to the requisitions were unsatisfactory and that he would not be closing the transaction unless very much more material was forthcoming, "particularly as regards the support for Schedule 'A' attached to the offer,

A noter que cette Annexe reproduit les chiffres figurant dans l'état des recettes et des dépenses pour 1966 (Pièce nº 6) sans faire usage ni mention des points de différence ressortant de la Pièce nº 7, quoique l'appelant Parna ait eu la Pièce nº 7 en sa possession peu après avoir reçu la Pièce nº 6 et quelque temps avant d'avoir chargé son avocat de dresser et de présenter l'offre d'achat (Pièce nº 1). L'offre d'achat fut présentée aux intimés et acceptée par eux. La date de l'acceptation ne figure pas dans la Pièce nº 1, mais il semble que ce fût le 17 février 1967, date même où, d'après ses dispositions, l'offre allait expirer. Il était dit dans l'offre que la date de la conclusion du contrat était fixée au 1er avril 1967.

M. Miller, avocat de l'appelant Parna, a témoigné que vers le 15 mars 1967 il avait écrit à l'avocat des vendeurs pour obtenir les renseignements d'usage quant à l'état du titre et pour faire la demande suivante:

et qu'il avait reçu de l'avocat des vendeurs une lettre datée du 28 mars 1967 disant, à propos de la demande susdite:

> [TRADUCTION] 6. Nous n'avons pas de rapport de vérificateur mais vous pouvez vous assurer vous-même ce que sont le revenu et les dépenses.

Le savant juge de première instance a dit de cette réponse que c'est «une de ces réponses de refus sec servant d'échappatoire».

Dans son témoignage, M. Miller a déposé qu'au reçu de cette lettre il avait immédiatement téléphoné à son client, l'appelant Parna, pour l'informer qu'il n'était pas disposé à conclure le marché sur cette base et lui demander de venir le voir. M. Miller a déclaré qu'il avait ensuite téléphoné à l'avocat des vendeurs afin de lui faire observer que plusieurs des réponses données aux demandes qui lui avaient été communiquées n'étaient pas satisfaisantes et qu'il n'allait pas conclure le marché à moins d'obtenir beaucoup plus de précisions, «particulièrement à l'appui de that I would not be closing unless some satisfactory evidence were produced to support the schedule".

On the morning of March 31st, which date the solicitors had fixed for closing as April 1st was a Saturday, the vendors' solicitor attended Mr. Miller and presented to him a statutory declaration produced at trial as ex. 4. The declaration is brief and I quote it in full:

I, Frank Albert
of the Town of Dundas in the County of Wentworth

DO SOLEMNLY DECLARE THAT:

1. I am the President of G. & S. Properties Limited and have knowledge of the facts hereinafter declared.
2. Schedule "A" to the Offer to Purchase is a Financial Statement setting out to the best of my knowledge and ability an accurate and fair estimate of the yearly revenue and yearly expenditures of G. & S. 3. Dans le calcul de ces estimations, aucunes sources réelles de revenu et aucuns déboursés réels n'ont été omis.
4. De nouveaux baux d'une durée d'un an ont été consentis à quelques-uns des locataires, avec l'approbation des acheteurs.

Within an hour after receipt of that document, Mr. Miller testified, the appellants August and Reta Parna attended him. He showed them this statutory declaration and they discussed the matter. It must be noted that under the exact terms of the offer for sale if the vendor did not produce > satisfactory evidence . . . as to the accuracy of the representations as regards income and expenses as contained in Schedule "A" attached hereto the offer should be considered null and void and the deposit returned.

Yet Mr. Miller testified that the appellants August and Reta Parna having inspected the statutory declaration elected to accept it "as a substitute" and closed the transaction. It would appear, in fact, from Mr. Miller's testimony that he stressed the additional values of having a statutory declaration. Mr. Miller was not asked to explain what additional values he found in that form of evidence but it would certainly occur to one that what the appellants were then concerned with was to obtain evidence to support just such an action as they subsequently instituted. The transaction was closed on that same day, March 31, 1967, and within two weeks the appellant Parna attended Mr. Miller to illustrate to Mr. Miller that the representations made in the first statement (ex. 6), repeated in Schedule "A" to the offer to purchase, and confirmed in the statutory declaration given on closing were false.

On May 18, 1967, the appellants issued a writ in this action claiming damages in the amount of $35,000 because of false and fraudulent representations as to three disbursements, i.e., the cost of fuel, light and water. The action proceeded to trial before Ferguson J. The appellant sought to add other alleged misrepresentations both at trial and before this Court but the consideration of this action has always been confined to the representation as to these three items. The learned trial judge found in favour of the plaintiffs (appellants in this Court) and awarded to them damages in the amount of $24,790. He calculated these damages in this fashion: he accepted the evidence of the appellant August

Selon le témoignage de M. Miller, les appelants August et Reta Parna sont venus le voir moins d'une heure après avoir reçu ce document. Il leur a montré cette déclaration statutaire et ils ont discuté l'affaire. Il faut remarquer qu'au sens strict des conditions de l'offre de vente, si le vendeur ne produisait pas > une preuve satisfaisante . . . de l'exactitude des mentions relatives aux recettes et aux dépenses figurant à l'Annexe «A» ci-jointe, l'offre serait considérée comme étant nulle et l'acompte serait remboursé.

Cependant, M. Miller a déposé que les appelants August et Reta Parna, après avoir examiné la déclaration statutaire, ont décidé de l'accepter «en remplacement» et ont conclu le marché. En fait, selon le témoignage de M. Miller, il a fait ressortir les avantages supplémentaires que conférait le fait d'avoir une déclaration statutaire. Il n'a pas été demandé à M. Miller d'expliquer quels avantages supplémentaires il trouvait dans cette forme de preuve, mais il vient certainement à l'idée que ce qui préoccupait alors les appelants c'était de se munir d'un document qui fût de nature à appuyer une action précisément comme celle qu'ils ont intentée par la suite. Le marché fut conclu le même jour, soit le 31 mars 1967; or, moins de deux semaines plus tard, l'appelant Parna se présentait chez M. Miller pour lui montrer que ce qui était exposé dans le premier état (Pièce n° 6), et qui était repris à l'Annexe "A" de l'offre d'achat et confirmé dans la déclaration statutaire présentée lors de la conclusion du contrat, était faux.

Le 18 mai 1967, les appelants ont introduit cette action réclamant $35,000 en dommages-intérêts pour cause de présentation fausse et frauduleuse des faits à l'égard de trois postes de dépenses, à savoir le coût du combustible, de l'éclairage et de l'eau. En première instance, le juge Ferguson a entendu l'action. Au procès et en cette Cour l'appelant a tenté d'ajouter d'autres prétendues déformations des faits mais la présente action s'est toujours limitée à l'examen de la présentation des faits relative à ces trois postes. Le savant juge de première instance a statué en faveur des demandeurs (les appelants en cette Cour) et leur a adjugé un montant de $24,790 en dommages-intérêts. Il a calculé ces dommages

Parna that he only made the offer to purchase on the basis that the net annual profits from the property before payment of interest or principal on the mortgages would yield 9.64 per cent on the purchase price. He found that such net profits instead of amounting to $24,193 per annum amounted only to $21,807 and since that amount would represent 9.64 per cent of only $226,910, the learned trial judge found the difference between that sum and the actual purchase price of $251,000, i.e., $24,790, to be the damages suffered by the plaintiffs in the action, the present appellants.

The defendants, here respondents, appealed to the Court of Appeal and the judgment of that Court was given by Evans J.A.[1] at the conclusion of the argument. One paragraph of that judgment reads as follows:

> The learned trial judge found that the defendants knowlingly made a false representation as to the operating expenses with the intention that the plaintiffs should act upon such false representation; he further found that the plaintiffs did in fact act upon the false representation to their detriment. There is ample evidence to support such findings, and the appeal in so far as it affects them must be dismissed.

That paragraph contained the whole of the reasons given in the Court of Appeal on the issue of liability. The Court of Appeal differed from the assessment of damages made by the learned trial judge. That assessment, as would appear from the above, was upon the basis of damages for loss of a bargain. The Court of Appeal was of the opinion that by the award of damages the plaintiffs, here appellants, were entitled to be put in the same position they would have been if the representations had not been made but not in the same position they would have been if the representations had been true. Evans J.A. continued:

> The evidence as to actual value led at trial is rather fragile; proceeding as he did, the learned trial judge made no finding as to the actual value of the property as at 1st April 1967. In my opinion de la façon suivante: il a accepté la preuve de l'appelant August Parna qu'il n'avait fait l'offre d'achat qu'à condition que l'immeuble rapporte un bénéfice net annuel de 9.64 pour cent du prix d'achat avant le paiement de l'intérêt ou du principal sur les hypothèques. Or le juge de première instance a constaté qu'au lieu de $24,193 par année, le bénéfice net n'était que de $21,807, et vu que cette somme représente 9.64 pour cent de seulement $226,910, le savant juge a statué que les dommages subis par les demandeurs, les appelants en cette Cour, correspondaient à la différence entre cette dernière somme et le prix d'achat effectif de $251,000, c'est-à-dire, $24,790.

Les défendeurs, intimés en cette Cour, ont interjeté appel à la Cour d'appel et le juge d'appel Evans[1] y a rendu l'arrêt à la fin des débats. Dans un paragraphe de l'arrêt, il est dit:

Ce paragraphe renfermait tous les motifs énoncés par la Cour d'appel sur la question de la responsabilité. La Cour d'appel n'a pas été de l'avis du savant juge de première instance quant à l'évaluation des dommages. Il ressort de ce qui précède que l'évaluation a été faite en fonction de dommages subis par suite de la perte d'une bonne affaire. La Cour d'appel a été d'avis qu'en se faisant accorder des dommages, les demandeurs (ici les appelants) avaient le droit de se retrouver dans la même situation où ils auraient été si la présentation des faits en cause n'avait pas été faite mais non dans la situation où ils se seraient trouvés si la présentation avait été faite. Le juge d'appel Evans a ajouté ceci:

> [TRADUCTION] La preuve faite au procès concernant la valeur réelle est plutôt fragile. De la façon dont il a procédé, le savant juge de première instance n'a aucunement déterminé quelle était la valeur réelle the evidence does support an assessment of damages, on the proper basis I have outlined above, at $4,000.

The Court of Appeal, therefore, varied the judgment given at trial by reducing the damages awarded to the plaintiffs to $4,000.

The appellants appealed to this Court and in their factum asked that damages be awarded in the amount of $48,163 and other damages designated as "continuous damages" and interest at the rate of 15 per cent and large amounts for costs. As I have stated, the statement of claim asked only for $35,000 damages.

The respondents cross-appealed asking that the judgment as given by the learned trial judge be vacated and that the action should be dismissed with costs throughout.

Although it would appear that a great deal of the argument in the Court of Appeal, and certainly in this Court, was devoted to the interesting question as to the proper measure for damages, I am of the opinion that the appeal must be disposed of upon the question of liability. The learned trial judge cited two brief passages; the first, from the judgment of Lord Herschell in Derry v. Peek[2], at p. 374, reads as follows:

I think the authorities establish the following propositions: First, in order to sustain an action of deceit, there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. . .

The second, from Anson on Contract, where "fraud" has been defined, reads:

Fraud is a false representation of fact, made with a knowledge of its falsehood, or recklessly, without belief in its truth, with the intention that it should be acted upon by the complaining party, and actually inducing him to act upon it.

I am content to adopt these two short passages as being sufficient to dispose of this appeal. I am of the opinion that, firstly, the plaintiffs failed to prove false representation of fact made with a de l'immeuble le 1er avril 1967. A mon avis, sur la base convenable que j'ai expliquée ci-dessus, il y a preuve à l'appui d'une évaluation des dommages au montant de $4,000.

La Cour d'appel a donc modifié le jugement de première instance en réduisant à $4,000 le montant des dommages-intérêts adjugés aux demandeurs.

Les appelants ont introduit un pourvoi en cette Cour et, dans leur factum, ont demandé que leur soient adjugés des dommages-intérêts de $48,163 de même qu'une indemnité pour ce qu'ils ont appelé des «dommages continus» ainsi que des intérêts au taux de 15 pour cent et une somme importante pour les dépens. Comme je l'ai mentionné, la déclaration des demandeurs ne réclamait que $35,000 en dommages-intérêts.

Les intimés ont interjeté un pourvoi incident demandant infirmation du jugement de première instance et rejet de l'action avec dépens dans toutes les Cours.

Même s'il semble bien qu'une grande partie des débats à la Cour d'appel, et assurément en cette Cour-ci, ait porté sur l'intéressante question de la mesure convenable des dommages subis, je suis d'avis que le pourvoi doit être décidé sur la question de la responsabilité. Le savant juge de première instance a cité deux courts passages; le premier est tiré du jugement de Lord Herchell dans Derry c. Peek[2], à la p. 374, et se lit ainsi:

Le second est tiré de l'ouvrage Anson on Contract où la «fraude» a été définie comme suit:

[TRADUCTION] La fraude est une fausse présentation de faits, que l'on sait être fausse ou qui est commise avec insouciance, sans la croire vraie, et avec l'intention que la partie qui se dit lésée y donne suite et qui la porte effectivement à y donner suite.

Je crois que ces deux courts passages suffisent pour décider ce pourvoi. Je suis d'avis que, premièrement, les demandeurs n'ont pas prouvé qu'il y eût fausse présentation de faits, que l'on knowledge of its falsehood or recklessly, without belief in its truth and, secondly, that the plaintiffs actually were induced by any such representation. It must be remembered that the appellant Parna was, as I have said, a shrewd and experienced apartment house operator, having engaged in the business continuously from 1952 until 1967, and at the time he made the offer to purchase he had been for a full year operating a very similar apartment house in the same Metropolitan Hamilton area. It must also be remembered that the personal respondents Albert and Harvie were not apartment house operators but were plumbers, the property in question here having been the only apartment house which they had built or owned. In my view, the appellant Parna knew much more about the apartment house operating business than did the personal respondents. The appellant Parna, as I have pointed out, had sought to buy the building even before it was completed and knew the exact state of the progress of construction and the progress of the renting. The appellant knew that on February 16, 1967, when he submitted the offer to purchase, the building had not been fully rented for a year and, in fact, that the first tenants had moved in only about eight months before. The appellant, therefore, knew that the amounts set out in ex. 6, and taken from that document into the schedule to the offer to purchase, were mere estimates and that they were not accurate statements as to either receipts or disbursements. As to the disbursements, the appellant had pointed out that those estimates, and he admitted at the trial that he knew they were estimates, had to be low and the appellant very shrewdly picked the month in which the highest amount for heat costs would be incurred, i.e., January 1967, to illustrate that the estimated disbursements were low. Upon inspecting the invoice for $345.50 for that month, the appellant must have known that the annual heating costs would be in excess of the $1,500 set out in ex. 6. If one only allowed for heating during the months of February, March, April and October, November and December, in addition to that month of January, in order to keep within an estimate of $1,500 the average amounts expended in those other months would be $192.50—a graphic illustration that the appellant Parna could not savait être fausse, ou commise avec insouciance, sans la croire vraie et, deuxièmement, que pareille présentation ait effectivement incité les demandeurs à y donner suite. Il ne faut pas perdre de vue que l'appelant Parna était, comme je l'ai dit, un exploitant entendu et expérimenté d'immeuble résidentiel, ayant exercé ce genre d'affaires continûment de 1952 à 1967, et qu'à l'époque où il fit l'offre d'achat, il exploitait depuis toute une année un immeuble résidentiel à peu près identique dans la même région du Hamilton métropolitain. Il faut aussi se rappeler que les intimés personnels Albert et Harvie n'étaient pas exploitants d'immeubles résidentiels mais plombiers, et que la propriété en question était le seul immeuble de cette nature qu'ils avaient bâti et qui leur avait appartenu. A mon avis, l'appelant Parna en savait beaucoup plus long que les intimés personnels sur la façon d'exploiter un immeuble d'habitation. Comme je l'ai fait observer, l'appelant Parna avait tâché d'acheter l'immeuble même avant qu'il fût achevé et il savait exactement où en étaient les travaux de construction et à quelle allure on trouvait des locataires. L'appelant savait que, le 16 février 1967, lorsqu'il présenta son offre d'achat, l'immeuble n'avait pas été complètement loué pour un an et qu'en fait les premiers locataires avaient emménagé pas plus d'environ huit mois auparavant. En conséquence, l'appelant savait que les montants figurant sur la Pièce nº 6 et reportés de là à l'annexe de l'offre d'achat n'étaient que des estimations et n'étaient pas des relevés précis soit des recettes soit des dépenses. A propos des dépenses, l'appelant avait signalé qu'il fallait bien que ces estimations—il savait, comme il l'a admis au procès, qu'il s'agissait d'estimations,—soient basses, et c'est pourquoi, afin de démontrer que l'estimation des dépenses était basse, l'appelant a très adroitement choisi le mois où le coût du chauffage serait le plus élevé, à savoir, janvier 1967. En examinant la facture de $345.50 pour ce mois-là, l'appelant devait savoir que la note du chauffage pour l'année excéderait la somme de $1,500 figurant à la Pièce nº 6. En ne tenant compte du chauffage que pour février, mars, avril, octobre, novembre et décembre, en plus du mois de janvier, de façon à ce que l'évaluation ne dépasse pas $1,500 la moyenne des dépenses have been deceived by the estimate of $1,500. As to revenue, ex. 6 was incorrect, to the knowledge of the appellant Parna, because he knew that notice had already been given of an increase in rentals amounting to $10 per month per apartment and that the revenue had therefore been increased by $2,880.

During the argument of the appeal, counsel for the respondents illustrated that the true excess of the disbursements over the estimates as to the three items only of which the appellant Parna complained in his action, i.e., heat, light and water, was not the $2,386 per year taken by the trial judge but only $1,868.94 per year. It was the appellant Parna's argument that basing his calculations on the estimates given in ex. 6 and repeated in the schedule to the offer to purchase he found that he would get a net return on his investment before payment of interest or principal on mortgage of 9.64 per cent. Taking the disbursements at $1,868.94 in excess of those estimated and making allowance for the increased revenue of $2,880 due to the proposed rental increase, of which the appellant Parna had knowledge, his net return would amount to almost 10 per cent. The appellant, as I have said, admitted in his testimony that he knew the figures as to light, heat and water given in ex. 6 and in the schedule to the offer to purchase were mere estimates.

Under these circumstances, the exact terms of the statutory declaration which the appellant Parna accepted as being a substitute for the proof he was entitled to in the offer to purchase become important. The personal respondents declared that Schedule "A" to the offer to purchase was a financial statement setting out to the best of their knowledge and ability an accurate and fair estimate of the yearly revenue and yearly expenditure of the corporate respondent "bearing in mind the increase in rentals from time to time and the increase in expenses such as taxes from time to time" and further that no actual sources of revenue and no actual disbursements had been omitted in arriving at the estimate.

pour les autres mois serait de $192.50—ce qui démontre bien que l'estimation de $1,500 ne pouvait guère induire en erreur l'appelant Parna. Quant aux recettes, la Pièce nº 6 était inexacte, et cela l'appelant Parna ne l'ignorait pas car il savait que les locataires avaient déjà été avertis que leur loyer allait être augmenté de $10 par mois et que, de ce côté-là, les recettes de l'immeuble allaient donc être augmentées de $2,880.

En cette Cour, relativement aux trois seuls postes dont l'appelant Parna s'est plaint dans son action, à savoir, le chauffage, l'éclairage et l'eau, l'avocat des intimés a démontré que le véritable excédent des dépenses sur les estimations n'était pas le montant de $2,386 par année considéré par le juge de première instance mais le montant de $1,868.94 seulement par année. L'appelant Parna a exposé qu'en se fondant sur les évaluations figurant à la Pièce nº 6 et reprises à l'annexe de l'offre d'achat, il a constaté qu'il allait retirer un produit net de 9.64 pour cent de son placement avant le paiement du principal et des intérêts sur l'hypothèque. Si d'une part les dépenses étaient de $1,868.94 supérieures aux estimations et que d'autre part l'augmentation des loyers projetée dont l'appelant Parna était au courant, augmentait les recettes de $2,880, son bénéfice net s'élèverait à presque 10 pour cent. Comme je l'ai dit, l'appelant dans son témoignage a admis qu'il savait que les chiffres se rapportant à l'éclairage, au chauffage et à l'eau et figurant à la Pièce nº 6 ainsi qu'à l'annexe de l'offre d'achat, étaient purement estimatifs.

Dans ces conditions, les termes précis employés dans la déclaration statutaire que l'appelant Parna a acceptée en remplacement de la preuve à laquelle il avait droit dans l'offre d'achat, deviennent importants. Les intimés personnels ont déclaré que l'Annexe «A» de l'offre d'achat constituait un état financier relatant autant qu'ils le sachent et du mieux qu'ils le puissent faire une estimation précise et équitable du revenu annuel et des dépenses annuelles de la société intimée «compte tenu de l'augmentation périodique des loyers et de l'augmentation périodique des dépenses telles que les taxes», et aussi, qu'aucunes sources réelles de revenu et aucuns déboursés réels n'avaient été omis dans le calcul de l'estimation.

I am of the opinion, from the circumstances which I have outlined above, that the appellant failed to prove, and the burden of proof was upon him, that the statement was not to the best of the knowledge and ability of the personal respondents an accurate and fair estimate, and I am further of the opinion that the appellant Parna has failed to prove that any actual disbursements had been omitted. It is true that in ex. 5, the statement produced at trial by the respondents as to the operation of the property, there are disbursements which do not appear in those estimates but those disbursements would appear to have been largely disbursements which were not properly part of the operation of an apartment house, for instance, the purchases which were part of the construction costs, although the purchases were made from the same companies which sold the fuel, and the difference between net and gross bills. It is difficult to understand how the representations could be considered false to the knowledge of the personal respondents when both parties knew that the figures set out were merely estimates and could be nothing else since they purported to be for the operation of an apartment house for a full year when not even one tenant had been in the apartment for more than eight months.

I have come to the conclusion that the evidence given by the appellant Parna himself and by the solicitor who acted for him in the purchase proves that the appellant Parna was not misled in any way by the representations even if they had been false to the knowledge of the respondents, but that a shrewd and intelligent apartment house operator figured that he could pay $251,000 for the property in question and obtain a satisfactory percentage of net profit. A rather graphic confirmation of this conclusion is that even at the trial, which took place in November 1967, the appellant Parna refused to reconvey the property thus confirming the decision which he had made on March 31, 1967, when he had elected to close the transaction without obtaining the proof of the statement to which he was entitled by the very terms of the offer to purchase.

En raison des circonstances que je viens d'évoquer, je suis d'avis que l'appelant n'a pas prouvé, —comme il lui appartenait de le faire—que l'état financier ne constituait pas une estimation équitable et précise autant que les intimés l'aient su ou aient pu le savoir, et j'estime en outre que l'appelant Parna n'a pas prouvé que l'état eût omis de mentionner quelques dépenses effectivement engagées. Il est vrai qu'à la Pièce nº 5, l'état que les intimés ont produit au procès relativement à l'exploitation de l'immeuble, figurent des dépenses que l'on ne retrouve pas dans ces estimations; mais il s'agit surtout de dépenses qui ne font pas normalement partie des frais d'exploitation d'un imeuble résidentiel, par exemple les achats qui entraient dans le coût de la construction, bien que ces achats eussent été faits chez les mêmes compagnies qui fournissaient le combustible, et la différence entre le montant net et le montant brut des factures. Il est difficile de s'expliquer comment la présentation des faits ait pu être considérée comme fausse à la connaissance des intimés personnels alors que les deux parties savaient que les chiffres n'étaient que des estimations et ne pouvaient être autre chose puisqu'ils étaient censés représenter le coût de l'exploitation d'un immeuble résidentiel durant toute une année alors que pas même un seul locataire n'y avait été occupant durant plus de huit mois.

J'en suis venu à la conclusion que les témoignages de l'appelant Parna lui-même et de l'avocat qui l'a représenté aux fins de l'achat prouvent que l'appelant Parna n'a été d'aucune façon induit en erreur par la présentation des faits, même si elle avait été fausse à la connaissance des intimés, mais qu'un exploitant entendu et intelligent d'immeubles résidentiels, a estimé qu'il pouvait payer $251,000 pour la propriété en question et obtenir de la sorte un pourcentage satisfaisant de bénéfice net. Ce qui paraît confirmer bien nettement pareille conclusion, c'est que même au procès, en novembre 1967, l'appelant Parna a refusé de rétrocéder la propriété, ce qui confirmait la décision qu'il avait prise le 31 mars 1967, alors qu'il avait choisi de conclure le marché sans obtenir la preuve de l'état financier, à laquelle il avait droit d'après les termes mêmes de l'offre d'achat.

I, therefore, have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff has failed to prove the necessary ingredients in an action for deceit and that is the basis upon which the appellant has framed his action.

I would dismiss the appeal and allow the cross-appeal dismissing the action. The respondents are entitled to their costs throughout.

Appeal dismissed and cross-appeal allowed with costs.

August Parna and Reta Parna, plaintiffs, appellants.

Solicitors for the defendants, respondents: O'Leary & Zimmerman, Hamilton.

J'en suis donc venu à la conclusion que le demandeur n'a pas prouvé les éléments essentiels d'une action pour tromperie (action for deceit) et c'est sur cette base que l'appelant a fondé son action.

Je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi et d'accueillir le pourvoi incident rejetant l'action. Les intimés ont droit à leur dépens dans toutes les Cours.

Appel rejeté et appel incident accueilli avec dépens.

2021 BCSC 1446 (CanLII)

Overview

[1] The defendant Mr. Young applies, pursuant to R. 9-7 of the Supreme Court Civil Rules, for summary judgment dismissing the plaintiffs' claims against him.

[2] The plaintiffs, Dr. Pollock and his numbered company, 1006085 BC Ltd. (the "Numbered Company"), seek general damages for civil fraud or conversion, or alternatively, restitution for unjust enrichment. The plaintiffs also seek punitive damages.

[3] Default judgment has been granted against the other two defendants in this action, Mr. Tonca and Graham Theodor & Co. Ltd. ("GTC"). Mr. Tonca and Mr. Young were directors of GTC during the material time.

[4] Dr. Pollock is the sole director, officer, and shareholder of the Numbered Company.

[5] In July and October 2014, the Numbered Company invested a total of $170,000 in GTC in exchange for shares of the company. The entire investment was lost. Dr. Pollock alleges that numerous fraudulent misrepresentations were made to induce him to invest. He argues that the operative question at this point is whether liability flows to Mr. Young as a result of those misrepresentations.

[6] For the reasons that follow, I find that this matter is not suitable for summary disposition because I cannot find the necessary facts on the evidence adduced. Accordingly, Mr. Young's application is dismissed.

The Parties' Positions

[7] This is a case of extremes. Mr. Young argues there is no fraud and the claim ought to be dismissed with special costs payable to him, while the plaintiffs allege fraudulent misrepresentation and conspiracy, and also seek punitive damages.

[8] Mr. Young argues this matter is suitable for summary disposition and the court should dismiss the action.

[9] He argues that there was no fraud at all, and if there was, it was Mr. Tonca who made the fraudulent misrepresentations.

[10] While Mr. Young argues that there is no fraud, it appears that he does so mostly on the basis that he was not aware of any fraud that might have occurred. Mr. Young argues that although he was a director of GTC, his own role was akin to that of a part-time junior employee who was simply learning from Mr. Tonca.

[11] Mr. Young argues that conspiracy is a difficult legal test to meet and the evidence does not support such a finding.

[12] The plaintiffs agree that this matter is suitable for summary trial. They argue that the documents speak for themselves and that they overwhelmingly point to fraud and conspiracy on the part of Mr. Young, making it unnecessary to assess his credibility. However, the plaintiffs say that if an assessment of credibility is required, then the matter must proceed to a traditional trial.

[13] The plaintiffs argue that Mr. Young is liable for fraudulent misrepresentation and conspiracy for any of the following reasons:

(1) he was fully engaged in the fraudulent misrepresentations himself;

(2) he was aware of the misrepresentations made by Mr. Tonca and did nothing to correct those; and

(3) he was willfully blind to Mr. Tonca's misrepresentations.

[14] The plaintiffs' argument states:

> Even if [Mr. Young] is successful in establishing that he did not subjectively know of a fraud (a finding that requires a credibility assessment and cannot be made on a summary trial), it is sufficient for a finding of civil conspiracy that [Mr. Young] ought to have known of the fraud.

[15] Their argument further states that even if the court believes:

> … that [Mr. Young] did not subjectively know of the unlawful acts perpetrated by [Mr. Tonca] and [GTC], the court must assess whether he ought to have > known. [Mr. Young's] wilful blindness is no defence. The plaintiffs submit that the facts overwhelmingly establish that [Mr. Young] ought to have known that misrepresentations were being made to the plaintiffs and others with the object of extracting investment based on those misrepresentations.

[16] The only case that Dr. Pollock was able to refer me, to in support of his argument that I can make the necessary findings on a summary trial application despite conflicting evidence, is Inspiration Management Ltd. v. McDermid St. Lawrence Ltd. (1989), 36 B.C.L.R. (2d) 202 at 215-16 (C.A.), which provides:

> [56] Lastly, I do not agree, as suggested in Royal Bank v. Stonehocker, that a chambers judge is obliged to remit a case to the trial list just because there are conflicting affidavits. In this connection I prefer the view expressed by Taggart J.A. in Placer, quoted at p. 15 [pp. 212-13] of these reasons. Subject to what I am about to say, a judge should not decide an issue of fact or law solely on the basis of conflicting affidavits even if he prefers one version to the other. It may be, however, notwithstanding sworn affidavit evidence to the contrary, that other admissible evidence will make it possible to find the facts necessary for judgment to be given. For example, in an action on a cheque, the alleged maker might by affidavit deny his signature while other believable evidence may satisfy the court that he did indeed sign it. Again, the variety of different kinds of cases which will arise is unlimited. In such cases, absent other circumstances or defences, judgment should be given.

[17] However, I note that no cases were referred to where this Court has made a finding of conspiracy or fraudulent misrepresentation on a summary trial application. While claims of conspiracy and fraudulent misrepresentation may be suitable for summary trial, I assume there are few, if any, cases where these allegations were actually found in a summary trial, as none were provided.

[18] As mentioned, for the reasons I will explain below, I find that this matter is not suitable for summary trial.

Background Facts

[19] The basic uncontested background facts are as follows:

a) Dr. Pollock met Mr. Tonca at an investment seminar organized by Mr. Tonca in 2013.

b) GTC was in the business of acquiring interests in other private companies.

c) Mr. Young was a director of GTC from its inception, under a previous name until April 2016. From 2011 until April 2016, Mr. Young and Mr. Tonca were the two sole directors. Mr. Young resigned as a director in April 2016.

d) In 2013, Dr. Pollock decided not to invest in GTC. Dr. Pollock and Mr. Tonca stayed in touch in the intervening months. On July 25, 2014, the plaintiffs invested $150,000 in GTC and a further $20,000 on November 3, 2014, receiving shares in GTC in return for their investment.

e) The plaintiffs communicated with Mr. Tonca respecting the share purchase agreement. Dr. Pollock did not communicate with Mr. Young.

f) The plaintiffs lost their entire investment.

g) GTC was dissolved in August 2017 for failure to file annual reports.

[20] The plaintiffs filed their notice of civil claim on December 20, 2018, alleging fraudulent misrepresentation and conversion, among other things. They filed amendments to those pleadings on December 22, 2020, adding the claim for conspiracy. As the notice of trial had already been filed when the amendments were filed, leave was required. On the first day of the summary trial, the plaintiffs sought, and were granted, leave for their amended notice of civil claim.

[21] Aside from the above uncontested facts, the parties' evidence greatly differs in many key areas. The plaintiffs argue that the defendants represented that GTC was operating a successful business of acquiring private companies when, in fact, that was not true. The plaintiffs say they were provided fabricated documentation including annual reports, cash flow statements, balance sheets, and a securities portfolio to induce them to invest.

[22] Mr. Young denies making any misrepresentations to the plaintiffs and denies that Mr. Tonca made any misrepresentations. He says this is a case where the plaintiffs took the calculated risk of investing, and while it was unfortunate the investment was lost, that is not due to any actionable wrong by Mr. Young.

Suitability

[23] Mr. Young relies on Cotter v. Point Grey Golf and Country Club, 2016 BCCA 260 at para. 56, aff'g 2016 BCSC 10, for the proposition that summary disposition is appropriate if the fraud allegations are not supported by the evidence.

[24] In Cotter, the defendant brought a summary trial application to dismiss an employee's wrongful dismissal claim. The employee's claim included allegations of fraud. Justice Maisonville dismissed the employee's claim, finding the matter suitable for summary trial for a number of reasons, including the fact it was not of "extreme complexity", there was sufficient documentary evidence to resolve any conflicts in the affidavit evidence, and a summary trial was the "proportionate" way to resolve the dispute (see paras. 99–105).

[25] On appeal, Justice Fitch affirmed that the evidence was not conflicting on key points. He noted there were just two issues in which the parties gave conflicting evidence and neither had "any material bearing on the disposition of [the] action" (at para. 49). Justice Fitch also rejected the employee's argument that Maisonville J. erred in finding the matter was suitable for summary trial because of the fraud allegations. As Fitch J.A. explained at para. 56:

> [56] Mr. Cotter also argues that the trial judge erred in determining that the matter was suitable for determination by summary trial because of the fraud allegations he made. I do not agree. While allegations of fraud may make an action unsuitable for disposition by way of summary trial, the question must be assessed on a case-by-case basis. The fact that allegations of fraud are made by a party will not preclude the determination of an action under Rule 9-7. The fraud allegations advanced by Mr. Cotter are not supported by the evidence. In these circumstances, the judge made no reviewable error in determining that the action was suitable for disposition by summary trial. [Emphasis added.]

[26] Accordingly, claims of fraud may be suitable for summary trial; however, suitability should be determined on a case-by-case basis.

[27] In the case at bar, the plaintiffs' conspiracy and fraud claims are core to their action. The plaintiffs have provided significant documentary evidence in support of their claims. How that documentary evidence is to be interpreted will be key. Unlike in Cotter, I cannot simply make the finding that the claims for fraud have no merit. However, on the evidence before me, I similarly cannot find the facts to decide that Mr. Young is liable either.

[28] I am not satisfied the issues, in particular credibility, can be resolved justly on the evidence adduced. This is a case where findings of fact on the fraud and conspiracy allegations can only be made after the witnesses have given viva voce testimony.

[29] The issues in this case are not straightforward. The summary trial took up five days. The trial is set for five days in a couple of months. Given the length of the summary trial and the expected evidence, more trial time will be required. Many volumes of affidavits, exhibits, transcripts from discovery, and written arguments were filed. Each party made a number of evidentiary objections.

[30] Much of the evidence is in dispute, as well as the interpretation of that evidence. I am mindful that the trial judge will have a more expansive view of the facts after viva voce evidence is given. This evidence may also differ from the affidavit evidence. Therefore, I will not make findings and will limit these reasons to highlighting why this case must proceed to a traditional trial. The following admissibility ruling from July 2 (day five of the application) illustrates the need for viva voce evidence.

Admissibility Ruling

[31] Mr. Young objected to the admissibility of a document referred to as "the Release" on the basis that it was inadmissible hearsay and was being used for the truth of its contents.

[32] The Release is a key document for the plaintiffs' claims. One of the contested facts between the parties is whether GTC acquired the company Trent Realty, Inc.

2021 BCSC 1446 (CanLII)

("Trent Realty"). The plaintiffs say GTC never acquired Trent Realty and that Mr. Tonca lied to Dr. Pollock when he said it did, inducing him to invest. Mr. Young says that the deal between GTC and Trent Realty did, in fact, close and, therefore, no misrepresentation was made to Dr. Pollock.

[33] The Release is a document titled "Business Brokers of Florida, Release of Escrow Deposit(s) with Instructions" dated May 7, 2013. If true, the Release indicates that the acquisition of Trent Realty by GTC was terminated, and the parties released each other from the agreement on May 7, 2013.

[34] The Release is purportedly signed by Roy Trent (of Trent Realty), Theodor Tonca, and Andrew Cagnetta Jr. (for Transworld Business Brokers, LLC.). The Release further states that:

a) Mr. Trent and Mr. Tonca released each other on May 7, 2013, from a purchase and sale contract and GTC's $117,667 deposit was returned; and

b) Mr. Tonca personally received $71,467 and Transworld Business Brokers received $46,200 when the deposit was returned.

[35] As mentioned, the plaintiffs rely on the Release to argue that Trent Realty was never acquired by GTC and that Mr. Tonca misrepresented to Dr. Pollock that it had.

[36] This representation was important to Dr. Pollock who deposed that:

> I never would have invested in [GTC] if I had known that it had never actually acquired Trent Realty. I relied on the representations made by [Mr. Tonca] and the financial records I had received regarding Trent Realty to conclude that [GTC] had a stable source of cash flow from Trent Realty, which motivated me to invest in [GTC].

[37] In a September 2013 email, Mr. Tonca told Dr. Pollock that GTC purchased its first subsidiary back in May and that that business' "average free cash flow operations has been approx. 200-250k per annum". In another September 2013

email, Mr. Tonca told Dr. Pollock that the acquisition of Trent Realty by GTC closed shortly after May 1, 2013.

[38] The plaintiffs argue that these statements are a lie since the deal between GTC and Trent Realty never actually closed, relying on the Release for this submission.

[39] The plaintiffs further argue that it is a "badge of fraud" that GTC paid the deposit of $117, 667, but that the money was personally returned to Mr. Tonca, and not the company itself.

[40] The plaintiffs brought the Release to the court's attention in response to Mr. Young's argument that Trent Realty had actually been purchased by GTC, pointing to a certain purchase document as proof that the acquisition took place. That document is titled "Agreement for Sale of Business" and is dated April 6, 2013, about a month before the Release was signed. The agreement is three pages long and, in brief, provides for the sale of a majority equity interest of 75% in Trent Realty to GTC for $385,000US. The agreement provides that the closing date for the sale shall be July 1, 2013.

> [GTC] operated as a business making reasonable and prudent business decisions to acquire majority interests in other private companies, including:
> On or about 01 July 2013, successfully acquiring a 75 percent interest in Trent Realty Inc, a company with operating income of approximately $425, 425 in the six months ending 31 December 2013; …

[42] This pleading captures the evidence adduced by Mr. Young, being that GTC did acquire Trent Realty.

[43] I admitted the Release on the basis that excluding it would result in a miscarriage of justice. The Release was needed to get at the truth of the matter. I agreed with Dr. Pollock that because Mr. Young relied on the purchase agreement between GTC and Trent Realty to show that the purchase took place, which is hearsay, it would be "inequitable in the extreme" to forbid the plaintiffs from also relying on hearsay evidence in response. I note that no objection was made to the purchase document.

[44] The plaintiffs objected to an affidavit filed by Mr. Young between days four and five of the hearing which deposed that he had no knowledge of the Release and only included it on his list of documents because he received it from Mr. Tonca. I admitted that affidavit, on the same basis that I admitted the Release, which is that it was in the overarching interests of justice in "getting at the truth".

[45] The affidavit states:

> 2. I came into possession of a copy of the document sworn as Exhibit "L" of Affidavit no. 1 of the plaintiff, [Mr. Pollock], [the Release], when I requested from [Mr. Tonca] all documents in his possession regarding this action.
>
> 3. I received the Release from Mr. Tonca, among several other documents, in or about mid 2019. Before receiving the Release from Mr. Tonca, I had never seen the Release or knew if its existence. I also do not know or understand what the Release relates to.
> 4. I provided the Release to my lawyer as part of my production obligations under Rule 7-1 of the Supreme Court Rules.

[46] I cannot find the facts as to whether GTC acquired Trent Realty, as urged by Mr. Young, or whether the parties to that transaction released each other from the agreement, as argued by the plaintiffs.

[47] Both documents are hearsay, and neither Mr. Tonca nor Mr. Roy Trent Jr. gave evidence at the summary trial. Accordingly, limited weight can be attached to these documents.

[48] There are many direct conflicts in the evidence and in the examination for discovery transcripts on key facts which could potentially affect the outcome of this matter. All this is challenging because the only affidavits are from Dr. Pollock, Mr. Young, and an employee at counsel's firm. There is no evidence from Mr. Tonca, for example. He was the one who communicated with Dr. Pollock. I am also mindful that affidavits are drafted by lawyers or paralegals and do not necessarily represent the words a witness would choose. A witness may give a very different impression at trial, when using their own language to describe things. A court must be cautious when deconstructing an affidavit and preferring one over another, particularly with these types of serious allegations.

[49] Dr. Pollock argues there are numerous documents and emails between Mr. Young and Mr. Tonca that show the extent of Mr. Young's involvement in the alleged fraud to support a finding of conspiracy. In reviewing the evidence, much would need to be inferred from these documents, which is difficult to do without assessing the credibility and reliability of witnesses' testimonies.

Conclusion

[50] For the reasons discussed, and in consideration of the well-known factors set out in Inspiration Management Ltd. at 214, this matter is not suitable for summary trial. Mr. Young's application is dismissed.

Costs

[51] The plaintiffs indicated that they wished to speak to costs after this decision was released. If either of the parties wishes to make submissions on costs, they may do so provided they contact Trial Scheduling within 30 days of receiving this decision to schedule a costs hearing. If neither party does so, the costs of this application will be payable in the cause.

civil fraud against H and others and subsequently brought a motion for summary judgment. The motion judge used his powers under Rule 20.04(2.1) of the Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure (amended in 2010) to weigh the evidence, evaluate credibility, and draw inferences. He concluded that a trial was not required against H. Despite concluding that this case was not an appropriate candidate for summary judgment, the Court of Appeal was satisfied that the record supported the finding that H had committed the tort of civil fraud against the investors, and therefore dismissed H's appeal.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Our civil justice system is premised upon the value that the process of adjudication must be fair and just. This cannot be compromised. However, undue process and protracted trials, with unnecessary expense and delay, can prevent the fair and just resolution of disputes. If the process is disproportionate to the nature of the dispute and the interests involved, then it will not achieve a fair and just result.

A shift in culture is required. The proportionality principle is now reflected in many of the provinces' rules and can act as a touchstone for access to civil justice. The proportionality principle means that the best forum for resolving a dispute is not always that with the most painstaking procedure. Summary judgment motions provide an opportunity to simplify pre-trial procedures and move the emphasis away from the conventional trial in favour of proportional procedures tailored to the needs of the particular case. Summary judgment rules must be interpreted broadly, favouring proportionality and fair access to the affordable, timely and just adjudication of claims.

Rule 20 was amended in 2010 to improve access to justice. These reforms embody the evolution of summary judgment rules from highly restricted tools used to weed out clearly unmeritorious claims or defences to their current status as a legitimate alternative means for adjudicating and resolving legal disputes. They offer significant new tools to judges, which allow them to adjudicate more cases through summary judgment motions and attenuate the risks when such motions do not resolve the 10 millions de dollars américains à une banque étrangère et l'argent a disparu. Les investisseurs ont intenté contre H et d'autres personnes une action pour fraude civile et ont ensuite présenté une requête en jugement sommaire. Le juge saisi de la requête a exercé les pouvoirs que lui confère le par. 20.04(2.1) des Règles de procédure civile de l'Ontario (modifiées en 2010) pour apprécier la preuve, évaluer la crédibilité et tirer des conclusions. Il a conclu que la tenue d'un procès n'était pas nécessaire dans l'instance intentée contre H. Bien qu'elle ait conclu que cette affaire ne se prêtait pas à un jugement sommaire, la Cour d'appel était convaincue que le dossier étayait la conclusion selon laquelle H avait commis le délit de fraude civile à l'endroit des investisseurs et elle a par conséquent rejeté l'appel de H.

Arrêt : Le pourvoi est rejeté.

Notre système de justice civile repose sur le principe que le processus décisionnel doit être juste et équitable. Ce principe ne souffre aucun compromis. Or, les formalités excessives et les procès interminables occasionnant des dépenses et des délais inutiles peuvent faire obstacle au règlement juste et équitable des litiges. Si la procédure est disproportionnée par rapport à la nature du litige et aux intérêts en jeu, elle n'aboutira pas à un résultat juste et équitable.

Un virage culturel s'impose. Le principe de la proportionnalité trouve aujourd'hui son expression dans les règles de procédure de nombreuses provinces et peut constituer la pierre d'assise de l'accès au système de justice civile. Le principe de la proportionnalité veut que le meilleur forum pour régler un litige ne soit pas toujours celui dont la procédure est la plus laborieuse. La requête en jugement sommaire offre une possibilité de simplifier les procédures préalables au procès et d'insister moins sur la tenue d'un procès conventionnel et plus sur des procédures proportionnées et adaptées aux besoins de chaque affaire. Les règles régissant les jugements sommaires doivent recevoir une interprétation large et propice à la proportionnalité et à l'accès équitable à un règlement abordable, expéditif et juste des demandes.

La règle 20 a été modifiée en 2010 afin d'améliorer l'accès à la justice. Ces réformes incarnent l'évolution des règles régissant les jugements sommaires, lesquelles passent du statut d'outil à usage très restreint visant à écarter les demandes ou défenses manifestement dénuées de fondement à celui de solution de rechange légitime pour trancher et régler les litiges d'ordre juridique. Les juges disposent ainsi de nouveaux outils importants qui leur permettent de trancher plus de litiges sur requête entire case. The new powers in Rules 20.04(2.1) and (2.2) expand the number of cases in which there will be no genuine issue requiring a trial by permitting motion judges to weigh evidence, evaluate credibility and draw reasonable inferences.

Summary judgment motions must be granted whenever there is no genuine issue requiring a trial. There will be no genuine issue requiring a trial when the judge is able to reach a fair and just determination on the merits on a motion for summary judgment. This will be the case when the process (1) allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact, (2) allows the judge to apply the law to the facts, and (3) is a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result.

The new fact-finding powers granted to motion judges in Rule 20.04 may be employed on a motion for summary judgment unless it is in the interest of justice for them to be exercised only at trial. When the use of the new powers would enable a judge to fairly and justly adjudicate a claim, it will generally not be against the interest of justice to do so. The power to hear oral evidence should be employed when it allows the judge to reach a fair and just adjudication on the merits and it is the proportionate course of action. While this is more likely to be the case when the oral evidence required is limited, there will be cases where extensive oral evidence can be heard. Where a party seeks to lead oral evidence, it should be prepared to demonstrate why such evidence would assist the motion judge and to provide a description of the proposed evidence so that the judge will have a basis for setting the scope of the oral evidence.

On a motion for summary judgment under Rule 20.04, the judge should first determine if there is a genuine issue requiring trial based only on the evidence before her, without using the new fact-finding powers. There will be no genuine issue requiring a trial if the summary judgment process provides her with the evidence required to fairly and justly adjudicate the dispute and is a timely, affordable and proportionate procedure, under Rule 20.04(2)(a). If there appears to be a genuine issue requiring a trial, she should then determine if the need for a trial can be avoided by using the new powers under Rules 20.04(2.1) and (2.2). Their use will not be against en jugement sommaire et qui atténuent les risques lorsque pareille requête ne permet pas de trancher l'affaire dans son ensemble. Les nouveaux pouvoirs prévus aux par. 20.04(2.1) et (2.2) des Règles augmentent le nombre d'affaires qui ne soulèvent pas de véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'un procès en permettant au juge saisi d'une requête d'apprécier la preuve, d'évaluer la crédibilité et de tirer des conclusions raisonnables.

La requête en jugement sommaire doit être accueillie dans tous les cas où il n'existe pas de véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'un procès. Il n'existe pas de véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'un procès lorsque le juge est en mesure de statuer justement et équitablement au fond sur une requête en jugement sommaire. Ce sera le cas lorsque la procédure (1) permet au juge de tirer les conclusions de fait nécessaires, (2) lui permet d'appliquer les règles de droit aux faits et (3) constitue un moyen proportionné, plus expéditif et moins coûteux d'arriver à un résultat juste.

Le juge saisi d'une requête en jugement sommaire peut exercer les nouveaux pouvoirs en matière de recherche des faits que lui confère la règle 20.04 à moins qu'il ne soit dans l'intérêt de la justice de ne les exercer que lors d'un procès. Lorsqu'il permettrait au juge de trancher une demande de manière juste et équitable, l'exercice des nouveaux pouvoirs serait généralement dans l'intérêt de la justice. Le pouvoir d'entendre des témoignages oraux devrait être exercé lorsqu'il permet au juge de rendre une décision juste et équitable sur le fond et que son exercice constitue la marche à suivre proportionnée. Ce sera plus probablement le cas lorsque le témoignage oral requis est succinct, mais dans certains cas, la requête en jugement sommaire comportera l'audition de longs témoignages oraux. La partie qui cherche à présenter des témoignages oraux doit être prête à démontrer en quoi ils aideraient le juge saisi de la requête et à fournir un exposé de la preuve proposée afin de permettre au juge d'établir la portée de ces témoignages oraux.

Lors de l'audition d'une requête en jugement sommaire aux termes de la règle 20.04, le juge devrait en premier lieu décider, compte tenu uniquement de la preuve dont il dispose et sans recourir aux nouveaux pouvoirs en matière de recherche des faits, s'il existe une véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'un procès. Il n'y aura pas de question de ce genre si la procédure de jugement sommaire fournit au juge la preuve nécessaire pour trancher justement et équitablement le litige et constitue une procédure expéditive, abordable et proportionnée selon l'al. 20.04(2)a) des Règles. S'il semble y avoir une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès, the interest of justice if they will lead to a fair and just result and will serve the goals of timeliness, affordability and proportionality in light of the litigation as a whole.

Failed, or even partially successful, summary judgment motions add to costs and delay. This risk can be attenuated by a judge who makes use of the trial management powers provided in Rule 20.05 and the court's inherent jurisdiction. These powers allow the judge to use the insight she gained from hearing the summary judgment motion to craft a trial procedure that will resolve the dispute in a way that is sensitive to the complexity and importance of the issue, the amount involved in the case, and the effort expended on the failed motion. Where a motion judge dismisses a motion for summary judgment, in the absence of compelling reasons to the contrary, she should also seize herself of the matter as the trial judge.

Absent an error of law, the exercise of powers under the new summary judgment rule attracts deference. When the motion judge exercises her new fact-finding powers under Rule 20.04(2.1) and determines whether there is a genuine issue requiring a trial, this is a question of mixed fact and law which should not be overturned, absent palpable and overriding error. Similarly, the determination of whether it is in the interest of justice for the motion judge to exercise the new fact-finding powers provided by Rule 20.04(2.1) is also a question of mixed fact and law which attracts deference.

The motion judge did not err in granting summary judgment in the present case. The tort of civil fraud has four elements, which must be proven on a balance of probabilities: (1) a false representation by the defendant; (2) some level of knowledge of the falsehood of the representation on the part of the defendant (whether knowledge or recklessness); (3) the false representation caused the plaintiff to act; (4) the plaintiff's actions resulted in a loss. In granting summary judgment to the group against H, the motion judge did not explicitly address the correct test for civil fraud but his findings are sufficient to make out the cause of action. The motion le juge devrait alors déterminer si l'exercice des nouveaux pouvoirs prévus aux par. 20.04(2.1) et (2.2) des Règles permettra d'écarter la nécessité d'un procès. L'exercice de ces pouvoirs ne sera pas contraire à l'intérêt de la justice s'il aboutit à un résultat juste et équitable et permettra d'atteindre les objectifs de célérité, d'accessibilité économique et de proportionnalité, compte tenu du litige dans son ensemble.

Qu'elle soit rejetée ou même accueillie en partie, la requête en jugement sommaire occasionne des frais et des délais additionnels. Le juge peut toutefois atténuer ce risque en exerçant la compétence inhérente du tribunal et les pouvoirs de gestion de l'instance prévus à la règle 20.05. Ces pouvoirs permettent au juge de mettre à profit les connaissances acquises lors de l'audition de la requête en jugement sommaire pour élaborer une procédure d'instruction de nature à régler le litige en tenant compte de la complexité et de l'importance de la question soulevée, de la somme en jeu et des efforts déployés lors de l'instruction de la requête rejetée. Le juge qui rejette une requête en jugement sommaire devrait également se saisir de l'instance à titre de juge du procès à moins que des raisons impérieuses l'en empêchent.

En l'absence d'une erreur de droit, l'exercice des pouvoirs que confère la nouvelle règle relative au jugement sommaire commande la retenue. Lorsque le juge saisi d'une requête exerce les nouveaux pouvoirs en matière de recherche des faits que lui confère le par. 20.04(2.1) des Règles et détermine s'il existe une véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'un procès, il s'agit d'une question mixte de fait et de droit et sa décision ne doit pas être infirmée en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante. De même, la décision quant à savoir s'il est dans l'intérêt de la justice que le juge saisi d'une requête exerce les nouveaux pouvoirs en matière de recherche des faits prévus au par. 20.04(2.1) des Règles constitue également une question mixte de fait et de droit qui commande la retenue.

Le juge saisi de la requête n'a pas eu tort de rendre un jugement sommaire en l'espèce. Le délit de fraude civile comporte quatre éléments dont il faut prouver l'existence selon la prépondérance des probabilités : (1) une fausse déclaration du défendeur; (2) une certaine connaissance de la fausseté de la déclaration de la part du défendeur (connaissance ou insouciance); (3) le fait que la fausse déclaration a amené le demandeur à agir; (4) le fait que les actes du demandeur ont entraîné une perte. Lorsqu'il a prononcé contre H un jugement sommaire en faveur du groupe, le juge saisi de la requête n'a pas traité explicitement du critère qu'il convient d'appliquer à la fraude judge found no credible evidence to support H's claim that he was a legitimate trader, and the outcome was therefore clear, so the motion judge concluded there was no issue requiring a trial. It was neither against the interest of justice for the motion judge to use his fact-finding powers nor was his discretionary decision to do so tainted with error.

civile mais ses conclusions suffisent pour établir la cause d'action. Le juge saisi de la requête a conclu qu'il n'existait pas d'élément de preuve crédible à l'appui de la prétention de H selon laquelle ce dernier était un courtier légitime et l'issue était donc claire; ainsi le juge a conclu qu'il n'y avait pas de question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'un procès. L'exercice, par le juge, de ses pouvoirs en matière de recherche des faits n'allait pas à l'encontre de l'intérêt de la justice, et sa décision discrétionnaire d'exercer ces pouvoirs n'était pas non plus entachée d'erreur.

[1] Karakatsanis J. — Ensuring access to justice is the greatest challenge to the rule of law in Canada today. Trials have become increasingly expensive and protracted. Most Canadians cannot afford to sue when they are wronged or defend themselves when they are sued, and cannot afford to go to trial. Without an effective and accessible means of enforcing rights, the rule of law is threatened. Without public adjudication of civil cases, the development of the common law is stunted.

[2] Increasingly, there is recognition that a culture shift is required in order to create an environment promoting timely and affordable access to the civil justice system. This shift entails simplifying pretrial

Version française du jugement de la Cour rendu par

[1] La juge Karakatsanis — De nos jours, garantir l'accès à la justice constitue le plus grand défi à relever pour assurer la primauté du droit au Canada. Les procès sont de plus en plus coûteux et longs. La plupart des Canadiens n'ont pas les moyens d'intenter une action en justice lorsqu'ils subissent un préjudice ou de se défendre lorsqu'ils sont poursuivis; ils n'ont pas les moyens d'aller en procès. À défaut de moyens efficaces et accessibles de faire respecter les droits, la primauté du droit est compromise. L'évolution de la common law ne peut se poursuivre si les affaires civiles ne sont pas tranchées en public.

[2] On reconnaît de plus en plus qu'un virage culturel s'impose afin de créer un environnement favorable à l'accès expéditif et abordable au système de justice civile. Ce virage implique que procedures and moving the emphasis away from the conventional trial in favour of proportional procedures tailored to the needs of the particular case. The balance between procedure and access struck by our justice system must come to reflect modern reality and recognize that new models of adjudication can be fair and just.

[3] Summary judgment motions provide one such opportunity. Following the Civil Justice Reform Project: Summary of Findings and Recommendations (2007) (the Osborne Report), Ontario amended the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194 (Ontario Rules or Rules) to increase access to justice. This appeal, and its companion, Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. v. Hryniak, 2014 SCC 8, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 126, address the proper interpretation of the amended Rule 20 (summary judgment motion).

[4] In interpreting these provisions, the Ontario Court of Appeal placed too high a premium on the "full appreciation" of evidence that can be gained at a conventional trial, given that such a trial is not a realistic alternative for most litigants. In my view, a trial is not required if a summary judgment motion can achieve a fair and just adjudication, if it provides a process that allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact, apply the law to those facts, and is a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result than going to trial.

[5] To that end, I conclude that summary judgment rules must be interpreted broadly, favouring proportionality and fair access to the affordable, timely and just adjudication of claims.

[6] As the Court of Appeal observed, the inappropriate use of summary judgment motions creates l'on simplifie les procédures préalables au procès et que l'on insiste moins sur la tenue d'un procès conventionnel et plus sur des procédures proportionnées et adaptées aux besoins de chaque affaire. L'équilibre entre la procédure et l'accès à la justice qu'établit notre système de justice doit en venir à refléter la réalité contemporaine et à reconnaître que de nouveaux modèles de règlement des litiges peuvent être justes et équitables.

[6] Comme l'a indiqué la Cour d'appel, le recours inapproprié à la requête en jugement sommaire its own costs and delays. However, judges can mitigate such risks by making use of their powers to manage and focus the process and, where possible, remain seized of the proceedings.

[7] While I differ in part on the interpretation of Rule 20, I agree with the Court of Appeal's disposition of the matter and would dismiss the appeal.

I. Facts

[8] More than a decade ago, a group of American investors, led by Fred Mauldin (the Mauldin Group), placed their money in the hands of Canadian "traders". Robert Hryniak was the principal of the company Tropos Capital Inc., which traded in bonds and debt instruments; Gregory Peebles, is a corporate-commercial lawyer (formerly of Cassels Brock & Blackwell) who acted for Hryniak, Tropos and Robert Cranston, formerly a principal of a Panamanian company, Frontline Investments Inc.

[9] In June 2001, two members of the Mauldin Group met with Cranston, Peebles, and Hryniak, to discuss an investment opportunity.

[10] At the end of June 2001, the Mauldin Group wired US$1.2 million to Cassels Brock, which was pooled with other funds and transferred to Tropos. A few months later, Tropos forwarded more than US$10 million to an offshore bank, and the money disappeared. Hryniak claims that at this point, Tropos' funds, including the funds contributed by the Mauldin Group, were stolen.

[11] Beyond a small payment of US$9,600 in February 2002, the Mauldin Group lost its investment.

occasionne lui-même des frais et des délais. Or, le juge peut atténuer ces risques en exerçant ses pouvoirs de gérer et de circonscrire la procédure et, si possible, en demeurant saisi de l'instance.

[7] Bien que mon interprétation de la règle 20 diffère en partie de celle de la Cour d'appel, je souscris à sa décision en l'espèce et je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

I. Les faits

[8] Il y a plus de 10 ans, un groupe d'investisseurs américains, dirigé par Fred Mauldin (le Groupe Mauldin), ont confié leur argent à des « courtiers » canadiens. Robert Hryniak était le dirigeant de la société Tropos Capital Inc., qui faisait le commerce des obligations et des titres de créance; Gregory Peebles, un avocat spécialisé en droit des sociétés et en droit commercial (ancien avocat du cabinet Cassels Brock & Blackwell), représentait M. Hryniak, Tropos et Robert Cranston, l'ancien dirigeant d'une société panaméenne, Frontline Investments Inc.

[9] Au mois de juin 2001, deux membres du Groupe Mauldin ont rencontré MM. Cranston, Peebles et Hryniak pour discuter d'une possibilité d'investissement.

[10] À la fin juin 2001, le Groupe Mauldin a viré 1,2 million de dollars américains à Cassels Brock; cette somme a été mise en commun avec d'autres fonds et transférée à Tropos. Quelques mois plus tard, Tropos a transféré plus de 10 millions de dollars américains à une banque étrangère et l'argent a disparu. M. Hryniak soutient qu'à ce stade, les fonds appartenant à Tropos, y compris ceux versés par le Groupe Mauldin, ont été dérobés.

[11] À part un paiement modique de 9 600 dollars américains versé en février 2002, le Groupe Mauldin a perdu son placement.

2014 SCC 7 (CanLII)

II. Judicial History

A. Ontario Superior Court of Justice, 2010 ONSC 5490 (CanLII)

[12] The Mauldin Group joined with Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. (the appellants in the companion appeal) in an action for civil fraud against Hryniak, Peebles and Cassels Brock. They brought motions for summary judgment, which were heard together.

[13] In hearing the motions, the judge used his powers under the new Rule 20.04(2.1) to weigh the evidence, evaluate credibility, and draw inferences. He found that the Mauldin Group's money was disbursed by Cassels Brock to Hryniak's company, Tropos, but that there was no evidence to suggest that Tropos had ever set up a trading program. Contrary to the investment strategy that Hryniak had described to the investors, the Mauldin Group's money was placed in an account with the offshore New Savings Bank, and then disappeared. He rejected Hryniak's claim that members of the New Savings Bank had stolen the Mauldin Group's money.

[14] The motion judge concluded that a trial was not required against Hryniak. However, he dismissed the Mauldin Group's motion for summary judgment against Peebles, because that claim involved factual issues, particularly with respect to Peebles' credibility and involvement in a key meeting, which required a trial. Consequently, he also dismissed the motion for summary judgment against Cassels Brock, as those claims were based on the theory that the firm was vicariously liable for Peebles' conduct.

II. Historique judiciaire

A. Cour supérieure de justice de l'Ontario, 2010 ONSC 5490 (CanLII)

[12] Le Groupe Mauldin s'est joint à Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. (l'appelante dans le pourvoi connexe) en vue d'intenter une action pour fraude civile contre M. Hryniak, M. Peebles et Cassels Brock. Ils ont présenté des requêtes en jugement sommaire qui ont été instruites ensemble.

[13] Lors de l'audition des requêtes, le juge a exercé les pouvoirs que lui confère le nouveau par. 20.04(2.1) des Règles pour apprécier la preuve, évaluer la crédibilité des témoins et tirer des conclusions de la preuve. Il a conclu que les fonds du Groupe Mauldin avaient été versés par Cassels Brock à la société de M. Hryniak, Tropos, mais qu'aucune preuve ne tendait à démontrer que Tropos ait jamais établi un programme de transaction de titres. Contrairement à la stratégie de placement que M. Hryniak avait présentée aux investisseurs, les fonds du Groupe Mauldin ont été placés dans un compte ouvert à une banque étrangère, la New Savings Bank, pour ensuite disparaître. Le juge a rejeté la prétention de M. Hryniak que des employés de la New Savings Bank avaient dérobé les fonds du Groupe Mauldin.

[14] Le juge saisi de la requête a conclu que la tenue d'un procès n'était pas nécessaire dans l'instance à l'égard de M. Hryniak. Toutefois, il a rejeté la requête du Groupe Mauldin visant à obtenir un jugement sommaire contre M. Peebles parce que cette demande soulevait des questions de fait, particulièrement en ce qui concerne la crédibilité de M. Peebles et sa participation à une réunion importante, questions qui nécessitaient la tenue d'un procès. Par conséquent, il a rejeté également la requête visant à obtenir un jugement sommaire contre Cassels Brock, puisque les demandes en cause reposaient sur la thèse selon laquelle ce cabinet était responsable du fait d'autrui pour la conduite de M. Peebles.

B. Court of Appeal for Ontario, 2011 ONCA 764, 108 O.R. (3d) 1

[15] The Court of Appeal simultaneously heard Hryniak's appeal of this matter, the companion Bruno Appliance appeal, and three other matters which are not before this Court. This was the first occasion on which the Court of Appeal considered the new Rule 20.

[16] The Court of Appeal set out a threshold test for when a motion judge could employ the new evidentiary powers available under Rule 20.04(2.1) to grant summary judgment under Rule 20.04(2)(a). Under this test, the "interest of justice" requires that the new powers be exercised only at trial, unless a motion judge can achieve the "full appreciation" of the evidence and issues required to make dispositive findings on a motion for summary judgment. The motion judge should assess whether the benefits of the trial process, including the opportunity to hear and observe witnesses, to have the evidence presented by way of a trial narrative, and to experience the fact-finding process first-hand, are necessary to fully appreciate the evidence in the case.

[17] The Court of Appeal suggested that cases requiring multiple factual findings, based on conflicting evidence from a number of witnesses, and involving an extensive record, are generally not fit for determination in this manner. Conversely, cases driven by documents, with few witnesses, and limited contentious factual issues are appropriate candidates for summary judgment.

[18] The Court of Appeal advised motion judges to make use of the power to hear oral evidence, under Rule 20.04(2.2), to hear only from a limited number of witnesses on discrete issues that are determinative of the case.

B. Cour d'appel de l'Ontario, 2011 ONCA 764, 108 O.R. (3d) 1

[15] La Cour d'appel a entendu en même temps l'appel interjeté par M. Hryniak, l'appel connexe contre Bruno Appliance et trois autres affaires dont notre Cour n'est pas saisie. C'était la première occasion pour la Cour d'appel d'examiner la nouvelle règle 20.

[16] La Cour d'appel a énoncé un critère préliminaire applicable pour déterminer dans quelles circonstances un juge saisi d'une requête peut exercer les nouveaux pouvoirs en matière de preuve prévus au par. 20.04(2.1) des Règles pour rendre un jugement sommaire en vertu de l'al. 20.04(2)a). Selon ce critère, « l'intérêt de la justice » exige que les nouveaux pouvoirs ne soient exercés que lors d'un procès, sauf si un juge saisi d'une requête peut procéder à la « pleine appréciation » de la preuve et des questions en litige qui s'impose pour tirer des conclusions décisives sur une requête en jugement sommaire. Le juge saisi de la requête doit déterminer si les avantages qu'offre la tenue d'un procès, notamment la possibilité d'entendre et d'observer les témoins, de faire présenter les éléments de preuve sous forme de récit et de participer soi-même à la recherche des faits, sont nécessaires pour apprécier pleinement la preuve au dossier.

[18] La Cour d'appel a conseillé aux juges saisis d'une requête d'exercer le pouvoir d'entendre des témoignages oraux, aux termes du par. 20.04(2.2) des Règles, et de n'entendre qu'un nombre restreint de témoins sur des questions distinctes qui sont déterminantes pour l'issue de l'affaire.

[19] The Court of Appeal concluded that, given its factual complexity and voluminous record, the Mauldin Group's action was the type of action for which a trial is generally required. There were numerous witnesses, various theories of liability against multiple defendants, serious credibility issues, and an absence of reliable documentary evidence. Moreover, since Hryniak and Peebles had cross-claimed against each other and a trial would nonetheless be required against the other defendants, summary judgment would not serve the values of better access to justice, proportionality, and cost savings.

[20] Despite concluding that this case was not an appropriate candidate for summary judgment, the Court of Appeal was satisfied that the record supported the finding that Hryniak had committed the tort of civil fraud against the Mauldin Group, and therefore dismissed Hryniak's appeal.

III. Outline

[21] In determining the general principles to be followed with respect to summary judgment, I will begin with the values underlying timely, affordable and fair access to justice. Next, I will turn to the role of summary judgment motions generally and the interpretation of Rule 20 in particular. I will then address specific judicial tools for managing the risks of summary judgment motions.

[22] Finally, I will consider the appropriate standard of review and whether summary judgment should have been granted to the respondents.

IV. Analysis

A. Access to Civil Justice: A Necessary Culture Shift

[23] This appeal concerns the values and choices underlying our civil justice system, and the ability

[19] La Cour d'appel a conclu que l'action intentée par le Groupe Mauldin était du type de celles qui nécessitent généralement la tenue d'un procès, compte tenu de la complexité des faits en cause et de son dossier volumineux. L'action exigeait l'audition de nombreux témoins, l'examen de plusieurs thèses relatives à la responsabilité de multiples défendeurs, l'examen de questions importantes de crédibilité et il n'y avait pas d'éléments de preuve documentaire fiables. De plus, puisque MM. Hryniak et Peebles avaient présenté des demandes entre défendeurs et qu'un procès serait néanmoins nécessaire contre les autres défendeurs, le jugement sommaire ne favoriserait pas le principe d'un meilleur accès à la justice, la proportionnalité et les économies.

[20] Bien qu'elle ait conclu que la présente affaire ne se prêtait pas à un jugement sommaire, la Cour d'appel était convaincue que le dossier étayait la conclusion selon laquelle M. Hryniak avait commis le délit de fraude civile à l'endroit du Groupe Mauldin et elle a par conséquent rejeté l'appel de M. Hryniak.

III. Aperçu

[22] Enfin, j'examinerai la norme de contrôle applicable et la question de savoir s'il y avait lieu de rendre un jugement sommaire en faveur des intimés.

IV. Analyse

A. Accès au système de justice civile : un virage culturel nécessaire

[23] Le présent pourvoi traite des valeurs et des choix à la base de notre système de justice of ordinary Canadians to access that justice. Our civil justice system is premised upon the value that the process of adjudication must be fair and just. This cannot be compromised.

[24] However, undue process and protracted trials, with unnecessary expense and delay, can prevent the fair and just resolution of disputes. The full trial has become largely illusory because, except where government funding is available,[1] ordinary Canadians cannot afford to access the adjudication of civil disputes.[2] The cost and delay associated with the traditional process means that, as counsel for the intervener the Advocates' Society (in Bruno Appliance) stated at the hearing of this appeal, the trial process denies ordinary people the opportunity to have adjudication. And while going to trial has long been seen as a last resort, other dispute resolution mechanisms such as mediation and settlement are more likely to produce fair and just results when adjudication remains a realistic alternative.

[25] Prompt judicial resolution of legal disputes allows individuals to get on with their lives. But, when court costs and delays become too great,

1 For instance, state funding is available in the child welfare context under G. (J.) orders even where legal aid is not available (see New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46), or for cases involving certain minority rights (see the Language Rights Support Program).

2 In M. D. Agrast, J. C. Botero and A. Ponce, the 2011 Rule of Law Index, published by the World Justice Project, Canada ranked 9th among 12 European and North American countries in access to justice. Although Canada scored among the top 10 countries in the world in four rule of law categories (limited government powers, order and security, open government, and effective criminal justice), its lowest scores were in access to civil justice. This ranking is "partially explained by shortcomings in the affordability of legal advice and representation, and the lengthy duration of civil cases" (p. 23).

civile, ainsi que de la faculté, pour les Canadiens ordinaires, d'avoir accès à ce système. Notre système de justice civile repose sur le principe que le processus décisionnel doit être juste et équitable. Ce principe ne souffre aucun compromis.

1 Par exemple, l'État peut accorder des fonds dans des cas de protection de l'enfance à la suite d'ordonnances fondées sur l'arrêt G. (J.) même lorsque l'aide juridique n'est pas offerte (voir Nouveau-Brunswick (Ministre de la Santé et des Services communautaires) c. G. (J.), [1999] 3 R.C.S. 46), ou encore dans des cas où certains droits des minorités sont en jeu (voir le Programme d'appui aux droits linguistiques).

2 Dans l'édition de 2011 du Rule of Law Index de M. D. Agrast, J. C. Botero et A. Ponce, publié par le World Justice Project, le Canada se classait au 9e rang parmi 12 pays de l'Europe et de l'Amérique du Nord au chapitre de l'accès à la justice. Bien que le Canada se soit classé parmi les 10 premiers pays au monde dans quatre catégories liées à la primauté du droit (pouvoirs limités du gouvernement, maintien de l'ordre et de la sécurité, transparence du gouvernement et système de justice pénale efficace), il a enregistré ses résultats les plus faibles dans la catégorie de l'accès au système de justice civile. Ce classement [TRADUCTION] « s'explique en partie par les failles relevées dans l'accessibilité économique des conseils juridiques et des services de représentation ainsi que par la longue durée des instances civiles » (p. 23).

people look for alternatives or simply give up on justice. Sometimes, they choose to represent themselves, often creating further problems due to their lack of familiarity with the law.

[26] In some circles, private arbitration is increasingly seen as an alternative to a slow judicial process. But private arbitration is not the solution since, without an accessible public forum for the adjudication of disputes, the rule of law is threatened and the development of the common law undermined.

[27] There is growing support for alternative adjudication of disputes and a developing consensus that the traditional balance struck by extensive pre-trial processes and the conventional trial no longer reflects the modern reality and needs to be re-adjusted. A proper balance requires simplified and proportionate procedures for adjudication, and impacts the role of counsel and judges. This balance must recognize that a process can be fair and just, without the expense and delay of a trial, and that alternative models of adjudication are no less legitimate than the conventional trial.

[28] This requires a shift in culture. The principal goal remains the same: a fair process that results in a just adjudication of disputes. A fair and just process must permit a judge to find the facts necessary to resolve the dispute and to apply the relevant legal principles to the facts as found. However, that process is illusory unless it is also accessible — proportionate, timely and affordable. The proportionality principle means that the best forum for resolving a dispute is not always that with the most painstaking procedure.

[29] There is, of course, always some tension between accessibility and the truth-seeking function but, much as one would not expect a jury trial over a contested parking ticket, the procedures used to adjudicate civil disputes must fit the nature of the claim. If the process is disproportionate to the judiciaires deviennent excessifs, les gens cherchent d'autres solutions ou renoncent tout simplement à obtenir justice. Ils décident parfois de se représenter eux-mêmes, ce qui entraîne souvent d'autres difficultés en raison de leur méconnaissance du droit.

[26] Dans certains milieux, l'arbitrage privé est de plus en plus considéré comme une solution de rechange à un processus judiciaire lent. Or, ce n'est pas la solution : en l'absence d'un forum public accessible pour faire trancher les litiges, la primauté du droit est compromise et l'évolution de la common law, freinée.

[28] Un virage culturel s'impose. L'objectif principal demeure le même : une procédure équitable qui aboutit au règlement juste des litiges. Une procédure juste et équitable doit permettre au juge de dégager les faits nécessaires au règlement du litige et d'appliquer les principes juridiques pertinents aux faits établis. Or, cette procédure reste illusoire si elle n'est pas également accessible — soit proportionnée, expéditive et abordable. Le principe de la proportionnalité veut que le meilleur forum pour régler un litige ne soit pas toujours celui dont la procédure est la plus laborieuse.

[29] De toute évidence, il existe toujours un certain tiraillement entre l'accessibilité et la fonction de recherche de la vérité, mais, tout comme l'on ne s'attend pas à la tenue d'un procès avec jury dans le cas d'une contravention de stationnement contestée, les procédures en place pour trancher des nature of the dispute and the interests involved, then it will not achieve a fair and just result.

[30] The proportionality principle is now reflected in many of the provinces' rules and can act as a touchstone for access to civil justice.[3] For example, Ontario Rules 1.04(1) and (1.1) provide:

1.04 (1) These rules shall be liberally construed to secure the just, most expeditious and least expensive determination of every civil proceeding on its merits.

(1.1) In applying these rules, the court shall make orders and give directions that are proportionate to the importance and complexity of the issues, and to the amount involved, in the proceeding.

[31] Even where proportionality is not specifically codified, applying rules of court that involve discretion "includes . . . an underlying principle of proportionality which means taking account of the appropriateness of the procedure, its cost and impact on the litigation, and its timeliness, given the nature and complexity of the litigation": Szeto v. Dwyer, 2010 NLCA 36, 297 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 311, at para. 53.

[32] This culture shift requires judges to actively manage the legal process in line with the principle of proportionality. While summary judgment motions can save time and resources, like most pre-trial procedures, they can also slow down the proceedings if used inappropriately. While judges can and should play a role in controlling such risks,

3 This principle has been expressly codified in British Columbia, Ontario, and Quebec: Supreme Court Civil Rules, B.C. Reg. 168/2009, Rule 1-3(2); Ontario Rules, Rule 1.04(1.1); and Code of Civil Procedure, R.S.Q., c. C-25, art. 4.2. Aspects of Alberta's and Nova Scotia's rules of court have also been interpreted as reflecting proportionality: Medicine Shoppe Canada Inc. v. Devchand, 2012 ABQB 375, 541 A.R. 312, at para. 11; Saturley v. CIBC World Markets Inc., 2011 NSSC 4, 297 N.S.R. (2d) 371, at para. 12.

litiges civils doivent être adaptées à la nature de la demande. Si la procédure est disproportionnée par rapport à la nature du litige et aux intérêts en jeu, elle n'aboutira pas à un résultat juste et équitable.

1.04 (1) Les présentes règles doivent recevoir une interprétation large afin d'assurer la résolution équitable sur le fond de chaque instance civile, de la façon la plus expéditive et la moins onéreuse.

[32] Ce virage culturel oblige les juges à gérer activement le processus judiciaire dans le respect du principe de la proportionnalité. La requête en jugement sommaire peut permettre d'économiser temps et ressources, mais, à l'instar de la plupart des procédures préalables au procès, elle peut ralentir l'instance si elle est utilisée de manière counsel must, in accordance with the traditions of their profession, act in a way that facilitates rather than frustrates access to justice. Lawyers should consider their client's limited means and the nature of their case and fashion proportionate means to achieve a fair and just result.

3 Ce principe a été expressément codifié en Colombie-Britannique, en Ontario et au Québec : Supreme Court Civil Rules, B.C. Reg. 168/2009, par. 1-3(2); Règles de l'Ontario, par. 1.04(1.1); et Code de procédure civile, L.R.Q., ch. C-25, art. 4.2. Certaines dispositions des règles de procédure de l'Alberta et de la Nouvelle-Écosse ont également été considérées comme illustrant la proportionnalité : Medicine Shoppe Canada Inc. c. Devchand, 2012 ABQB 375, 541 A.R. 312, par. 11; Saturley c. CIBC World Markets Inc., 2011 NSSC 4, 297 N.S.R. (2d) 371, par. 12.

[33] A complex claim may involve an extensive record and a significant commitment of time and expense. However, proportionality is inevitably comparative; even slow and expensive procedures can be proportionate when they are the fastest and most efficient alternative. The question is whether the added expense and delay of fact finding at trial is necessary to a fair process and just adjudication.

B. Summary Judgment Motions

[34] The summary judgment motion is an important tool for enhancing access to justice because it can provide a cheaper, faster alternative to a full trial. With the exception of Quebec, all provinces feature a summary judgment mechanism in their respective rules of civil procedure.[4] Generally, summary judgment is available where there is no genuine issue for trial.

[35] Rule 20 is Ontario's summary judgment procedure, under which a party may move for summary judgment to grant or dismiss all or part of a claim. While Ontario's Rule 20 in some ways goes further than other rules throughout the country, the values

4 Quebec has a procedural device for disposing of abusive claims summarily: see arts. 54.1 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. While this procedural device is narrower on its face, it has been likened to summary judgment: see Bal Global Finance Canada Corp. v. Aliments Breton (Canada) inc., 2010 QCCS 325 (CanLII). Moreover, s. 165(4) of the Code provides that the defendant may ask for an action to be dismissed if the suit is "unfounded in law".

inappropriée. Bien que les juges puissent contribuer à la réduction de ce risque, et devraient le faire, les avocats doivent, conformément aux traditions de leur profession, agir de manière à faciliter plutôt qu'à empêcher l'accès à la justice. Ils devraient ainsi tenir compte des moyens limités de leurs clients et de la nature de leur dossier et élaborer des moyens proportionnés d'arriver à un résultat juste et équitable.

[33] Une demande complexe peut comporter un dossier volumineux et exiger un investissement important en temps et en argent. Toutefois, la proportionnalité est forcément de nature comparative; même les procédures lentes et coûteuses peuvent s'avérer proportionnées lorsqu'elles constituent la solution la plus rapide et la plus efficace. La question est de savoir si les frais et les délais additionnels occasionnés par la recherche des faits lors du procès sont essentiels à un processus décisionnel juste et équitable.

B. Requêtes en jugement sommaire

[34] La requête en jugement sommaire constitue un outil important pour faciliter l'accès à la justice parce qu'elle peut offrir une solution de rechange au procès complet plus abordable et plus rapide que celui-ci. À l'exception du Québec, toutes les provinces prévoient dans leurs règles de procédure civile respectives des dispositions relatives au jugement sommaire[4]. En règle générale, le tribunal peut rendre un jugement sommaire si aucune véritable question litigieuse ne requiert un procès.

[35] La règle 20 énonce la procédure de jugement sommaire à suivre en Ontario; une partie peut demander, par voie de requête, un jugement sommaire accueillant ou rejetant en totalité ou en partie la demande. Bien que la règle 20 de l'Ontario and principles underlying its interpretation are of general application.

4 Le Québec dispose d'un mécanisme procédural pour écarter sommairement les demandes abusives : voir les art. 54.1 et suiv. du Code de procédure civile. Bien qu'il ait une portée plus circonscrite à première vue, ce mécanisme a été assimilé au jugement sommaire : voir Bal Global Finance Canada Corp. c. Aliments Breton (Canada) inc., 2010 QCCS 325 (CanLII). De plus, selon le par. 165(4) du Code, le défendeur peut solliciter le rejet de l'action si la demande « n'est pas fondée en droit ».

[36] Rule 20 was amended in 2010, following the recommendations of the Osborne Report, to improve access to justice. These reforms embody the evolution of summary judgment rules from highly restricted tools used to weed out clearly unmeritorious claims or defences to their current status as a legitimate alternative means for adjudicating and resolving legal disputes.

[37] Early summary judgment rules were quite limited in scope and were available only to plaintiffs with claims based on debt or liquidated damages, where no real defence existed.[5] Summary judgment existed to avoid the waste of a full trial in a clear case.

[38] In 1985, the then new Rule 20 extended the availability of summary judgement to both plaintiffs and defendants and broadened the scope of cases that could be disposed of on such a motion. The rules were initially interpreted expansively, in line with the purposes of the rule changes.[6] However, appellate jurisprudence limited the powers of judges and effectively narrowed the purpose of motions for summary judgment to merely ensuring that: "claims that have no chance of success [are] weeded out at an early stage".[7] aille en quelque sorte plus loin que d'autres règles applicables ailleurs au pays, les valeurs et les principes sur lesquels repose son interprétation sont d'application générale.

[38] En 1985, ce qui était alors la nouvelle règle 20 a permis tant au demandeur qu'au défendeur de solliciter un jugement sommaire et a élargi l'éventail des affaires pouvant être tranchées sur requête en ce sens. Au départ, les dispositions de cette règle étaient interprétées libéralement, en conformité avec l'objet des modifications apportées à la règle[6]. Toutefois, les cours d'appel ont limité les pouvoirs des juges et circonscrit en fait l'objet des requêtes en jugement sommaire pour simplement faire en sorte que « les demandes qui n'ont aucune chance de succès soient écartées tôt dans le processus »[7].

[39] The Ontario Government commissioned former Ontario Associate Chief Justice Coulter Osborne, Q.C., to consider reforms to make the Ontario civil justice system more accessible and affordable, leading to the report of the Civil Justice Reform Project. The Osborne Report concluded that few summary judgment motions were being brought and, if the summary judgment rule was to work as intended, the appellate jurisprudence that had narrowed the scope and utility of the rule had to be reversed (p. 35). Among other things, it recommended that summary judgment be made more widely available, that judges be given the power to weigh evidence on summary judgment motions, and that judges be given discretion to direct that oral evidence be presented (pp. 35-36).

[40] The report also recommended the adoption of a summary trial procedure similar to that employed in British Columbia (p. 37). This particular recommendation was not adopted, and the legislature made the choice to maintain summary judgment as the accessible procedure.

[41] Many of the Osborne Report's recommendations were taken up and implemented in 2010. As noted above, the amendments codify the proportionality principle and provide for efficient adjudication when a conventional trial is not required. They offer significant new tools to judges, which allow them to adjudicate more cases through summary judgment motions and attenuate the risks when such motions do not resolve the entire case.

20.04 . . .

(2) [General] The court shall grant summary judgment if,

8 The full text of Rule 20 is attached as an Appendix.

20.04 . . .

(2) [Dispositions générales] Le tribunal rend un jugement sommaire si, selon le cas :

8 Le texte intégral de la règle 20 figure en annexe.

2014 SCC 7 (CanLII)

(a) the court is satisfied that there is no genuine issue requiring a trial with respect to a claim or defence; or

(b) the parties agree to have all or part of the claim determined by a summary judgment and the court is satisfied that it is appropriate to grant summary judgment.

(2.1) [Powers] In determining under clause (2)(a) whether there is a genuine issue requiring a trial, the court shall consider the evidence submitted by the parties and, if the determination is being made by a judge, the judge may exercise any of the following powers for the purpose, unless it is in the interest of justice for such powers to be exercised only at a trial:

1. Weighing the evidence.

2. Evaluating the credibility of a deponent.

3. Drawing any reasonable inference from the evidence.

(2.2) [Oral Evidence (Mini-Trial)] A judge may, for the purposes of exercising any of the powers set out in subrule (2.1), order that oral evidence be presented by one or more parties, with or without time limits on its presentation.

[43] The Ontario amendments changed the test for summary judgment from asking whether the case presents "a genuine issue for trial" to asking whether there is a "genuine issue requiring a trial". The new rule, with its enhanced fact-finding powers, demonstrates that a trial is not the default procedure. Further, it eliminated the presumption of substantial indemnity costs against a party that brought an unsuccessful motion for summary judgment, in order to avoid deterring the use of the procedure.

a) il est convaincu qu'une demande ou une défense ne soulève pas de véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'une instruction;

b) il est convaincu qu'il est approprié de rendre un jugement sommaire et les parties sont d'accord pour que tout ou partie de la demande soit décidé par jugement sommaire.

(2.1) [Pouvoirs] Lorsqu'il décide, aux termes de l'alinéa (2)a), s'il existe une véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'une instruction, le tribunal tient compte des éléments de preuve présentés par les parties et, si la décision doit être rendue par un juge, ce dernier peut, à cette fin, exercer l'un ou l'autre des pouvoirs suivants, à moins qu'il ne soit dans l'intérêt de la justice de ne les exercer que lors d'un procès :

1. Apprécier la preuve.

2. Évaluer la crédibilité d'un déposant.

3. Tirer une conclusion raisonnable de la preuve.

[43] Les modifications apportées en Ontario ont eu pour effet de modifier le critère applicable aux jugements sommaires en remplaçant la question de savoir si la cause ne « soulève pas de question litigieuse » par celle de savoir si la cause soulève une « véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'une instruction ». Il appert de la nouvelle règle, qui prévoit des pouvoirs accrus en matière de recherche des faits, que la tenue d'un procès ne constitue pas la procédure par défaut. En outre, afin de ne pas dissuader les parties de recourir à cette procédure, la nouvelle règle a eu pour effet de supprimer la présomption suivant laquelle l'auteur de la requête débouté devait être condamné aux dépens d'indemnisation substantielle.

[44] The new powers in Rules 20.04(2.1) and (2.2) expand the number of cases in which there will be no genuine issue requiring a trial by permitting motion judges to weigh evidence, evaluate credibility and draw reasonable inferences.[9]

[45] These new fact-finding powers are discretionary and are presumptively available; they may be exercised unless it is in the interest of justice for them to be exercised only at a trial; Rule 20.04(2.1). Thus, the amendments are designed to transform Rule 20 from a means to weed out unmeritorious claims to a significant alternative model of adjudication.

[46] I will first consider when summary judgment can be granted on the basis that there is "no genuine issue requiring a trial" (Rule 20.04(2)(a)). Second, I will discuss when it is against the "interest of justice" for the new fact-finding powers in Rule 20.04(2.1) to be used on a summary judgment motion. Third, I will consider the power to call oral evidence and, finally, I will lay out the process to be followed on a motion for summary judgment.

(1) When Is There No Genuine Issue Requiring a Trial?

[47] Summary judgment motions must be granted whenever there is no genuine issue requiring a trial (Rule 20.04(2)(a)). In outlining how to determine

9 As fully canvassed by the Court of Appeal, the powers in Rule 20.04(2.1) were designed specifically to overrule a number of long-standing appellate decisions that had dramatically restricted the use of the rule; Aguonie v. Galion Solid Waste Material Inc. (1998), 38 O.R. (3d) 161 (C.A.); Dawson v. Rexcraft Storage and Warehouse Inc. (1998), 164 D.L.R. (4th) 257 (Ont. C.A.).

[45] Ces nouveaux pouvoirs en matière de recherche des faits ont un caractère discrétionnaire et sont présumés pouvoir être exercés; ils peuvent l'être à moins qu'il ne soit dans l'intérêt de la justice de ne les exercer que lors d'un procès; par. 20.04(2.1) des Règles. Par conséquent, les modifications font en sorte que la règle 20 ne soit plus seulement un moyen d'écarter des demandes sans fondement mais qu'elle devienne un important modèle de rechange pour les décisions.

(1) Dans quels cas n'y a-t-il aucune véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'un procès?

9 Comme l'a expliqué en détail la Cour d'appel, les pouvoirs prévus au par. 20.04(2.1) des Règles visaient explicitement à infirmer plusieurs arrêts de longue date des cours d'appel qui avaient restreint considérablement le recours à la règle; Aguonie c. Galion Solid Waste Material Inc. (1998), 38 O.R. (3d) 161 (C.A.); Dawson c. Rexcraft Storage and Warehouse Inc. (1998), 164 D.L.R. (4th) 257 (C.A. Ont.).

whether there is such an issue, I focus on the goals and principles that underlie whether to grant motions for summary judgment. Such an approach allows the application of the rule to evolve organically, lest categories of cases be taken as rules or preconditions which may hinder the system's transformation by discouraging the use of summary judgment.

[48] The Court of Appeal did not explicitly focus upon when there is a genuine issue requiring a trial. However, in considering whether it is against the interest of justice to use the new fact-finding powers, the court suggested that summary judgment would most often be appropriate when cases were document driven, with few witnesses and limited contentious factual issues, or when the record could be supplemented by oral evidence on discrete points. These are helpful observations but, as the court itself recognized, should not be taken as delineating firm categories of cases where summary judgment is and is not appropriate. For example, while this case is complex, with a voluminous record, the Court of Appeal ultimately agreed that there was no genuine issue requiring a trial.

[49] There will be no genuine issue requiring a trial when the judge is able to reach a fair and just determination on the merits on a motion for summary judgment. This will be the case when the process (1) allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact, (2) allows the judge to apply the law to the facts, and (3) is a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result.

[50] These principles are interconnected and all speak to whether summary judgment will provide d'un procès (al. 20.04(2)a) des Règles). Pour exposer la façon de déterminer l'existence d'une telle question, je m'attache aux objectifs et aux principes sous-jacents à la décision d'accueillir ou non une requête en jugement sommaire. Une telle façon de faire permet l'évolution naturelle de l'application de la règle, sinon les catégories de cas seront considérées comme des règles ou des conditions préalables qui risquent de nuire à la métamorphose du système en décourageant le recours au jugement sommaire.

[48] La Cour d'appel n'a pas explicitement déterminé les circonstances dans lesquelles il existe une véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'un procès. Or, en se demandant si l'exercice des nouveaux pouvoirs en matière de recherche des faits est contraire à l'intérêt de la justice, elle a laissé entendre qu'il est le plus souvent indiqué de rendre un jugement sommaire dans des affaires où les documents occupent une place prépondérante, où il y a peu de témoins et de questions de fait litigieuses, ou encore des affaires dans lesquelles il est possible de compléter le dossier en présentant des témoignages oraux sur des points distincts. Voilà autant d'observations utiles qui, comme la Cour d'appel l'a elle-même reconnu, ne devraient cependant pas être considérées comme circonscrivant des catégories étanches de cas où il convient ou non de rendre un jugement sommaire. Par exemple, malgré la complexité de la présente affaire et son dossier volumineux, la Cour d'appel a finalement reconnu l'absence de question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'un procès.

[50] Ces principes sont interreliés et reviennent tous à se demander si le jugement sommaire

a fair and just adjudication. When a summary judgment motion allows the judge to find the necessary facts and resolve the dispute, proceeding to trial would generally not be proportionate, timely or cost effective. Similarly, a process that does not give a judge confidence in her conclusions can never be the proportionate way to resolve a dispute. It bears reiterating that the standard for fairness is not whether the procedure is as exhaustive as a trial, but whether it gives the judge confidence that she can find the necessary facts and apply the relevant legal principles so as to resolve the dispute.

[51] Often, concerns about credibility or clarification of the evidence can be addressed by calling oral evidence on the motion itself. However, there may be cases where, given the nature of the issues and the evidence required, the judge cannot make the necessary findings of fact, or apply the legal principles to reach a just and fair determination.

(2) The Interest of Justice

[52] The enhanced fact-finding powers granted to motion judges in Rule 20.04(2.1) may be employed on a motion for summary judgment unless it is in the "interest of justice" for them to be exercised only at trial. The "interest of justice" is not defined in the Rules.

[53] To determine whether the interest of justice allowed the motion judge to use her new powers, the Court of Appeal required a motion judge to ask herself "can the full appreciation of the evidence and issues that is required to make dispositive findings be achieved by way of summary judgment, or can this full appreciation only be achieved by way of a trial?" (para. 50).

[54] The Court of Appeal identified the benefits of a trial that contribute to this full appreciation of constituera une décision juste et équitable. Lorsqu'une requête en jugement sommaire permet au juge d'établir les faits nécessaires et de régler le litige, la tenue d'un procès ne serait généralement ni proportionnée, ni expéditive, ni économique. Dans le même ordre d'idées, un processus qui ne permet pas au juge de tirer ses conclusions avec confiance ne saurait jamais constituer un moyen proportionné de régler un litige. Il importe de répéter que la norme d'équité consiste à déterminer non pas si la procédure visée est aussi exhaustive que la tenue d'un procès, mais si elle permet au juge de pouvoir, avec confiance, établir les faits nécessaires et appliquer les principes juridiques pertinents pour régler le litige.

(2) L'intérêt de la justice

[52] Lors de l'audition d'une requête en jugement sommaire, le juge peut exercer les pouvoirs accrus en matière de recherche des faits que lui confère le par. 20.04(2.1) des Règles, à moins qu'il ne soit dans « l'intérêt de la justice » de ne les exercer que lors d'un procès. L'expression « intérêt de la justice » n'est pas définie dans les Règles.

[53] Pour déterminer s'il était dans l'intérêt de la justice que le juge saisi d'une requête exerce ses nouveaux pouvoirs, la Cour d'appel a obligé ce dernier à se poser la question suivante : [TRADUCTION] « . . . la pleine appréciation de la preuve et des questions litigieuses qui s'impose pour tirer des conclusions décisives peut-elle se faire par voie de jugement sommaire ou uniquement au moyen d'un procès? » (par. 50).

the evidence: the narrative that counsel can build through trial, the ability of witnesses to speak in their own words, and the assistance of counsel in sifting through the evidence (para. 54).

[55] The respondents, as well as the interveners, the Canadian Bar Association, the Attorney General of Ontario and the Advocates' Society, submit that the Court of Appeal's emphasis on the virtues of the traditional trial is misplaced and unduly restrictive. Further, some of these interveners submit that this approach may result in the creation of categories of cases inappropriate for summary judgment, and this will limit the development of the summary judgment vehicle.

[56] While I agree that a motion judge must have an appreciation of the evidence necessary to make dispositive findings, such an appreciation is not only available at trial. Focussing on how much and what kind of evidence could be adduced at a trial, as opposed to whether a trial is "requir[ed]" as the Rule directs, is likely to lead to the bar being set too high. The interest of justice cannot be limited to the advantageous features of a conventional trial, and must account for proportionality, timeliness and affordability. Otherwise, the adjudication permitted with the new powers — and the purpose of the amendments — would be frustrated.

[57] On a summary judgment motion, the evidence need not be equivalent to that at trial, but must be such that the judge is confident that she can fairly resolve the dispute. A documentary record, particularly when supplemented by the new fact-finding tools, including ordering oral testimony, is often sufficient to resolve material issues fairly and justly. The powers provided in Rules 20.04(2.1) and (2.2) can provide an equally valid, if less extensive, manner of fact finding.

appréciation de la preuve, à savoir l'exposé que l'avocat peut présenter lors d'un procès, la possibilité pour les témoins de s'exprimer dans leurs propres mots et l'aide des avocats pour passer en revue les éléments de preuve (par. 54).

[55] Les intimés ainsi que les intervenants, soit l'Association du Barreau canadien, le procureur général de l'Ontario et l'Advocates' Society, plaident que l'importance accordée par la Cour d'appel aux vertus du procès traditionnel est injustifiée et indûment restrictive. De plus, selon certains intervenants, cette approche peut donner lieu à la création de catégories de cas qui ne se prêtent pas à un jugement sommaire, ce qui aura pour effet de freiner l'évolution de la procédure de jugement sommaire.

[57] Dans le cadre de la procédure par jugement sommaire, il n'est pas nécessaire que la preuve soit la même que celle présentée lors d'un procès, mais elle doit être telle que le juge soit confiant de pouvoir résoudre équitablement le litige. La preuve documentaire, surtout si elle est complétée au moyen des nouveaux outils de recherche des faits, y compris des témoignages oraux, est souvent suffisante pour trancher des questions importantes de manière juste et équitable. L'exercice des pouvoirs prévus aux par. 20.04(2.1) et (2.2) des Règles peut déboucher sur une recherche des faits tout aussi valable, voire plus brève.

[58] This inquiry into the interest of justice is, by its nature, comparative. Proportionality is assessed in relation to the full trial. It may require the motion judge to assess the relative efficiencies of proceeding by way of summary judgment, as opposed to trial. This would involve a comparison of, among other things, the cost and speed of both procedures. (Although summary judgment may be expensive and time consuming, as in this case, a trial may be even more expensive and slower.) It may also involve a comparison of the evidence that will be available at trial and on the motion as well as the opportunity to fairly evaluate it. (Even if the evidence available on the motion is limited, there may be no reason to think better evidence would be available at trial.)

[59] In practice, whether it is against the "interest of justice" to use the new fact-finding powers will often coincide with whether there is a "genuine issue requiring a trial". It is logical that, when the use of the new powers would enable a judge to fairly and justly adjudicate a claim, it will generally not be against the interest of justice to do so. What is fair and just turns on the nature of the issues, the nature and strength of the evidence and what is the proportional procedure.

[60] The "interest of justice" inquiry goes further, and also considers the consequences of the motion in the context of the litigation as a whole. For example, if some of the claims against some of the parties will proceed to trial in any event, it may not be in the interest of justice to use the new fact-finding powers to grant summary judgment against a single defendant. Such partial summary judgment may run the risk of duplicative proceedings or inconsistent findings of fact and therefore the use of the powers may not be in the interest of justice. On the other hand, the resolution of an important claim against a key party could significantly advance access to justice, and be the most proportionate, timely and cost effective approach.

[60] L'analyse de « l'intérêt de la justice » va plus loin et tient également compte des répercussions de la requête dans le contexte du litige dans son ensemble. Par exemple, si certaines des demandes contre certaines des parties seront de toute façon tranchées à l'issue d'un procès, il peut ne pas être dans l'intérêt de la justice d'exercer les nouveaux pouvoirs en matière de recherche des faits pour rendre un jugement sommaire contre un seul défendeur. Un tel jugement sommaire partiel risque d'entraîner des procédures répétitives ou de mener à des conclusions de fait contradictoires; par conséquent, l'exercice de ces pouvoirs n'est peut-être pas dans

(3) The Power to Hear Oral Evidence

[61] Under Rule 20.04(2.2), the motion judge is given the power to hear oral evidence to assist her in making findings under Rule 20.04(2.1). The decision to allow oral evidence rests with the motion judge since, as the Court of Appeal noted, "it is the motion judge, not counsel, who maintains control over the extent of the evidence to be led and the issues to which the evidence is to be directed" (para. 60).

[62] The Court of Appeal suggested the motion judge should only exercise this power when

> (1) oral evidence can be obtained from a small number of witnesses and gathered in a manageable period of time;
> (2) any issue to be dealt with by presenting oral evidence is likely to have a significant impact on whether the summary judgment motion is granted; and
> (3) any such issue is narrow and discrete — i.e., the issue can be separately decided and is not enmeshed with other issues on the motion. [para. 103]

This is useful guidance to ensure that the hearing of oral evidence does not become unmanageable; however, as the Court of Appeal recognized, these are not absolute rules.

[63] This power should be employed when it allows the judge to reach a fair and just adjudication on the merits and it is the proportionate course of action. While this is more likely to be the case when the oral evidence required is limited, there will be cases where extensive oral evidence can be heard l'intérêt de la justice. Par contre, le règlement d'une demande importante visant une partie clé pourrait favoriser nettement l'accès à la justice et constituer la mesure la plus proportionnée, expéditive et économique.

(3) Le pouvoir d'entendre des témoignages oraux

[61] Le paragraphe 20.04(2.2) des Règles confère au juge saisi d'une requête le pouvoir d'entendre des témoignages oraux pour tirer plus facilement des conclusions aux termes du par. 20.04(2.1). La décision d'autoriser la présentation d'un témoignage oral appartient au juge puisque, comme l'a souligné la Cour d'appel, [TRADUCTION] « c'est le juge saisi de la requête, et non les avocats, qui peut exercer un contrôle sur l'étendue de la preuve à présenter et sur les questions auxquelles se rapporte celle-ci » (par. 60).

[62] Selon la Cour d'appel, le juge saisi d'une requête ne devrait exercer ce pouvoir que lorsque

> (1) il est possible d'entendre, dans un délai raisonnable, les témoignages oraux d'un nombre restreint de témoins;
> (2) toute question à traiter par la présentation d'un témoignage oral aura vraisemblablement une incidence importante sur l'accueil ou le rejet de la requête en jugement sommaire; et
> (3) une telle question est précise et distincte — c'est-à-dire que la question peut être tranchée séparément et n'est pas liée aux autres questions sur lesquelles porte la requête. [par. 103]

Ces indications sont utiles pour assurer que l'audition des témoignages oraux ne devient pas ingérable; toutefois, comme l'a reconnu la Cour d'appel, ces règles ne sont pas absolues.

[63] Ce pouvoir devrait être exercé lorsqu'il permet au juge de rendre une décision juste et équitable sur le fond et que son exercice constitue la marche à suivre proportionnée. Ce sera plus probablement le cas lorsque le témoignage oral requis est succinct, mais dans certains cas, la requête en jugement on the motion for summary judgment, avoiding the need for a longer, more complex trial and without compromising the fairness of the procedure.

[64] Where a party seeks to lead oral evidence, it should be prepared to demonstrate why such evidence would assist the motion judge in weighing the evidence, assessing credibility, or drawing inferences and to provide a "will say" statement or other description of the proposed evidence so that the judge will have a basis for setting the scope of the oral evidence.

[65] Thus, the power to call oral evidence should be used to promote the fair and just resolution of the dispute in light of principles of proportionality, timeliness and affordability. In tailoring the nature and extent of oral evidence that will be heard, the motion judge should be guided by these principles, and remember that the process is not a full trial on the merits but is designed to determine if there is a genuine issue requiring a trial.

(4) The Roadmap/Approach to a Motion for Summary Judgment

[66] On a motion for summary judgment under Rule 20.04, the judge should first determine if there is a genuine issue requiring trial based only on the evidence before her, without using the new fact-finding powers. There will be no genuine issue requiring a trial if the summary judgment process provides her with the evidence required to fairly and justly adjudicate the dispute and is a timely, affordable and proportionate procedure, under Rule 20.04(2)(a). If there appears to be a genuine issue requiring a trial, she should then determine if the need for a trial can be avoided by using the new powers under Rules 20.04(2.1) and (2.2). She may, at her discretion, use those powers, provided that their use is not against the interest of justice. Their use will not be against the interest of justice if they will lead to a fair and just result and will sommaire comportera l'audition de longs témoignages oraux, ce qui permettra d'éviter des procès plus longs et plus complexes sans compromettre l'équité de la procédure.

[65] Ainsi, le pouvoir d'ordonner la présentation de témoignages oraux devrait servir à favoriser le règlement juste et équitable du litige compte tenu des principes de proportionnalité, de célérité et d'accessibilité économique. Lorsqu'il établit la nature et l'étendue des témoignages oraux qui seront entendus, le juge saisi de la requête devrait s'inspirer de ces principes et se rappeler que ce processus ne constitue pas un procès complet sur le fond mais qu'il vise plutôt à déterminer s'il existe une véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'un procès.

(4) Marche à suivre pour trancher une requête en jugement sommaire

serve the goals of timeliness, affordability and proportionality in light of the litigation as a whole.

[67] Inquiring first as to whether the use of the powers under Rule 20.04(2.1) will allow the dispute to be resolved by way of summary judgment, before asking whether the interest of justice requires that those powers be exercised only at trial, emphasizes that these powers are presumptively available, rather than exceptional, in line with the goal of proportionate, cost-effective and timely dispute resolution. As well, by first determining the consequences of using the new powers, the benefit of their use is clearer. This will assist in determining whether it is in the interest of justice that they be exercised only at trial.

[68] While summary judgment must be granted if there is no genuine issue requiring a trial,[10] the decision to use either the expanded fact-finding powers or to call oral evidence is discretionary.[11] The discretionary nature of this power gives the judge some flexibility in deciding the appropriate course of action. This discretion can act as a safety valve in cases where the use of such powers would clearly be inappropriate. There is always the risk that clearly unmeritorious motions for summary judgment could be abused and used tactically to add time and expense. In such cases, the motion judge may choose to decline to exercise her discretion

10 Rule 20.04(2): "The court shall grant summary judgment if, (a) the court is satisfied that there is no genuine issue requiring a trial . . . ."

11 Rule 20.04(2.1): "In determining . . . whether there is a genuine issue requiring a trial . . . if the determination is being made by a judge, the judge may exercise any of the following powers . . . 1. Weighing the evidence. 2. Evaluating the credibility of a deponent. 3. Drawing any reasonable inference from the evidence." Rule 20.04(2.2): "A judge may . . . order that oral evidence be presented . . . ."

pouvoirs à son gré, pourvu que leur exercice ne soit pas contraire à l'intérêt de la justice. Leur exercice ne sera pas contraire à l'intérêt de la justice s'il aboutit à un résultat juste et équitable et permettra d'atteindre les objectifs de célérité, d'accessibilité économique et de proportionnalité, compte tenu du litige dans son ensemble.

[67] En cherchant d'abord à déterminer si l'exercice des pouvoirs prévus au par. 20.04(2.1) des Règles permettra de régler le litige par voie de jugement sommaire, avant de se demander s'il est dans l'intérêt de la justice que ces pouvoirs ne soient exercés que lors d'un procès, on souligne le fait que ces pouvoirs peuvent être exercés en règle générale, plutôt qu'à titre exceptionnel, conformément à l'objectif d'un règlement des litiges proportionné, économique et expéditif. De même, lorsqu'on détermine en premier lieu les conséquences du recours à ces nouveaux pouvoirs, les avantages qu'offre leur exercice apparaissent plus clairement. Cette façon de procéder aidera à déterminer s'il est dans l'intérêt de la justice que ces pouvoirs ne soient exercés que lors d'un procès.

10 Paragraphe 20.04(2) des Règles : « Le tribunal rend un jugement sommaire si, selon le cas : a) il est convaincu qu'une demande ou une défense ne soulève pas de véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'une instruction . . . » to use those powers and dismiss the motion for summary judgment, without engaging in the full inquiry delineated above.

C. Tools to Maximize the Efficiency of a Summary Judgment Motion

(1) Controlling the Scope of a Summary Judgment Motion

[69] The Ontario Rules and a superior court's inherent jurisdiction permit a motion judge to be involved early in the life of a motion, in order to control the size of the record, and to remain active in the event the motion does not resolve the entire action.

[70] The Rules provide for early judicial involvement, through Rule 1.05, which allows for a motion for directions, to manage the time and cost of the summary judgment motion. This allows a judge to provide directions with regard to the timelines for filing affidavits, the length of cross-examination, and the nature and amount of evidence that will be filed. However, motion judges must also be cautious not to impose administrative measures that add an unnecessary layer of cost.

[71] Not all motions for summary judgment will require a motion for directions. However, failure to bring such a motion where it was evident that the record would be complex or voluminous may be considered when dealing with costs consequences under Rule 20.06(a). In line with the principle of proportionality, the judge hearing the motion for directions should generally be seized of the summary judgment motion itself, ensuring the knowledge she has developed about the case does not go to waste.

[72] I agree with the Court of Appeal (at paras. 58 and 258) that a motion for directions also provides the responding party with the opportunity de fondement comme tactique pour entraîner des frais et des retards est toujours présent. Dans ces cas, le juge peut refuser d'exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire et rejeter la requête en jugement sommaire sans procéder à l'analyse complète exposée ci-dessus.

C. Outils permettant d'optimiser l'efficacité de la requête en jugement sommaire

(1) Circonscrire la portée de la requête en jugement sommaire

[70] Les Règles prévoient l'intervention hâtive du tribunal par l'application de la règle 1.05, qui permet de lui demander par requête des directives pour gérer les délais et les dépens afférents à une requête en jugement sommaire. Le juge peut ainsi donner des directives relatives aux délais de dépôt des affidavits, à la durée des contre-interrogatoires et à la nature et la quantité des éléments de preuve à déposer. Toutefois, le juge doit également prendre garde d'imposer des mesures administratives qui entraînent des frais supplémentaires non nécessaires.

[72] Je suis d'accord avec la Cour d'appel (par. 58 et 258) pour dire que la requête en vue d'obtenir des directives donne également à l'intimé l'occasion de to seek an order to stay or dismiss a premature or improper motion for summary judgment. This may be appropriate to challenge lengthy, complex motions, particularly on the basis that they would not sufficiently advance the litigation, or serve the principles of proportionality, timeliness and affordability.

[73] A motion for summary judgment will not always be the most proportionate way to dispose of an action. For example, an early date may be available for a short trial, or the parties may be prepared to proceed with a summary trial. Counsel should always be mindful of the most proportionate procedure for their client and the case.

(2) Salvaging a Failed Summary Judgment Motion

[74] Failed, or even partially successful, summary judgment motions add — sometimes astronomically — to costs and delay. However, this risk can be attenuated by a judge who makes use of the trial management powers provided in Rule 20.05 and the court's inherent jurisdiction.

[75] Rules 20.05(1) and (2) provide in part:

20.05 (1) Where summary judgment is refused or is granted only in part, the court may make an order specifying what material facts are not in dispute and defining the issues to be tried, and order that the action proceed to trial expeditiously.

(2) If an action is ordered to proceed to trial under subrule (1), the court may give such directions or impose such terms as are just . . . .

[76] Rules 20.05(2)(a) through (p) outline a number of specific trial management orders that may be appropriate. The court may: set a schedule; provide a restricted discovery plan; set a trial date; require payment into court of the claim; or order security for costs. The court may order that: the parties deliver a concise summary of their opening statement; the demander la suspension ou le rejet d'une requête en jugement sommaire prématurée ou irrégulière. Une telle demande peut permettre de contester des requêtes longues et complexes, surtout lorsque celles-ci ne feraient pas progresser suffisamment l'instance ou ne favoriseraient pas les objectifs de proportionnalité, de célérité et d'accessibilité économique.

[73] La requête en jugement sommaire ne constituera pas toujours le moyen le plus proportionné de trancher une action en justice. Par exemple, il arrive qu'un court procès puisse avoir lieu tôt ou que les parties soient disposées à procéder par procès sommaire. Les avocats devraient toujours tenir compte de la procédure la plus proportionnée pour leur client et le dossier.

(2) Mettre à profit les éléments d'une requête en jugement sommaire rejetée

[75] Les paragraphes 20.05(1) et (2) des Règles prévoient notamment ce qui suit :

20.05 (1) Si le jugement sommaire est refusé ou n'est accordé qu'en partie, le tribunal peut rendre une ordonnance dans laquelle il précise les faits pertinents qui ne sont pas en litige et les questions qui doivent être instruites. Il peut également ordonner que l'action soit instruite de façon expéditive.

(2) Le tribunal qui ordonne l'instruction d'une action en vertu du paragraphe (1) peut donner les directives ou imposer les conditions qu'il estime justes . . .

[76] Les alinéas 20.05(2)a) à p) des Règles énumèrent plusieurs ordonnances précises de gestion de l'instance qui peuvent convenir. Le tribunal peut dresser un calendrier, établir un plan d'enquête préalable assorti de limites, fixer la date du procès, ordonner la consignation de la somme demandée ou le versement d'un cautionnement pour dépens. Le parties deliver a written summary of the anticipated evidence of a witness; any oral examination of a witness at trial will be subject to a time limit or; the evidence of a witness be given in whole or in part by affidavit.

[77] These powers allow the judge to use the insight she gained from hearing the summary judgment motion to craft a trial procedure that will resolve the dispute in a way that is sensitive to the complexity and importance of the issue, the amount involved in the case, and the effort expended on the failed motion. The motion judge should look to the summary trial as a model, particularly where affidavits filed could serve as the evidence of a witness, subject to time-limited examinations and cross-examinations. Although the Rules did not adopt the Osborne Report's recommendation of a summary trial model, this model already exists under the simplified rules or on consent. In my view, the summary trial model would also be available further to the broad powers granted to a judge under Rule 20.05(2).

[78] Where a motion judge dismisses a motion for summary judgment, in the absence of compelling reasons to the contrary, she should also seize herself of the matter as the trial judge. I agree with the Osborne Report that the involvement of a single judicial officer throughout > saves judicial time since parties will not have to get a different judge up to speed each time an issue arises in the case. It may also have a calming effect on the conduct of litigious parties and counsel, as they will come to predict how the judicial official assigned to the case might rule on a given issue. [p. 88]

[79] While such an approach may complicate scheduling, to the extent that current scheduling practices prevent summary judgment motions being used in an efficient and cost effective manner, the tribunal peut aussi ordonner la remise par les parties d'un résumé concis de leur déclaration préliminaire, la remise par les parties d'un résumé écrit de la déposition prévue d'un témoin, la limitation de la durée de tout interrogatoire oral d'un témoin au procès, ou la présentation par affidavit de tout ou partie de la déposition d'un témoin.

[77] Ces pouvoirs permettent au juge de mettre à profit les connaissances acquises lors de l'audition de la requête en jugement sommaire pour élaborer une procédure d'instruction de nature à régler le litige en tenant compte de la complexité et de l'importance de la question soulevée, de la somme en jeu et des efforts déployés lors de l'instruction de la requête rejetée. Le juge saisi de la requête devrait s'inspirer de la procédure d'instruction sommaire, en particulier lorsque les affidavits déposés serviraient de dépositions, sous réserve d'interrogatoires et de contre-interrogatoires d'une durée limitée. Bien que les Règles n'aient pas adopté le modèle de l'instruction sommaire recommandé dans le rapport Osborne, ce modèle est déjà prévu par les règles simplifiées ou peut être utilisé du consentement des parties. À mon avis, le modèle de l'instruction sommaire pourrait également s'appliquer si le juge exerce les vastes pouvoirs que lui confère le par. 20.05(2) des Règles.

[78] Le juge qui rejette une requête en jugement sommaire devrait également se saisir de l'instance à titre de juge du procès à moins que des raisons impérieuses l'en empêchent. Je suis d'accord avec le rapport Osborne pour dire que la gestion du litige par un seul fonctionnaire judiciaire > permet à la cour d'économiser du temps étant donné que les parties n'ont pas à mettre un juge différent au fait chaque fois qu'un problème survient relativement à la cause. Elle peut également avoir un effet de modération sur le comportement des parties litigantes et des avocats, qui en viendront à prévoir la façon dont le fonctionnaire judiciaire affecté à la cause pourrait statuer sur une question donnée. [p. 105]

[79] Une telle approche risque de compliquer l'établissement du calendrier, dans la mesure où les pratiques actuelles en la matière empêchent de recourir de façon efficace et économique à la courts should be prepared to change their practices in order to facilitate access to justice.

D. Standard of Review

[80] The Court of Appeal concluded that determining the appropriate test for summary judgment — whether there is a genuine issue requiring a trial — is a legal question, reviewable on a correctness standard, while any factual determinations made by the motion judge will attract deference.

[81] In my view, absent an error of law, the exercise of powers under the new summary judgment rule attracts deference. When the motion judge exercises her new fact-finding powers under Rule 20.04(2.1) and determines whether there is a genuine issue requiring a trial, this is a question of mixed fact and law. Where there is no extricable error in principle, findings of mixed fact and law should not be overturned absent palpable and overriding error: Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, at para. 36.

[82] Similarly, the question of whether it is in the "interest of justice" for the motion judge to exercise the new fact-finding powers provided by Rule 20.04(2.1) depends on the relative evidence available at the summary judgment motion and at trial, the nature, size, complexity and cost of the dispute and other contextual factors. Such a decision is also a question of mixed fact and law which attracts deference.

[83] Provided that it is not against the "interest of justice", a motion judge's decision to exercise the new powers is discretionary. Thus, unless the motion judge misdirected herself, or came to a decision that is so clearly wrong that it resulted in an injustice, her decision should not be disturbed.

requête en jugement sommaire, mais les tribunaux devraient être disposés à modifier leurs habitudes afin de faciliter l'accès à la justice.

D. Norme de contrôle

[80] La Cour d'appel a conclu que le choix du critère à appliquer en matière de jugement sommaire — déterminer s'il existe une véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'un procès — est une question de droit, susceptible de révision selon la norme de la décision correcte, alors que les conclusions de fait tirées par le juge saisi de la requête commandent la retenue.

[81] À mon avis, en l'absence d'une erreur de droit, l'exercice des pouvoirs que confère la nouvelle règle relative au jugement sommaire commande la retenue. Lorsque le juge saisi d'une requête exerce ses nouveaux pouvoirs en matière de recherche des faits, que lui confère le par. 20.04(2.1) des Règles, et détermine s'il existe une véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'un procès, il s'agit d'une question mixte de fait et de droit. Lorsqu'il n'y a aucune erreur de principe isolable, les conclusions mixtes de fait et de droit ne doivent pas être infirmées en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante : Housen c. Nikolaisen, 2002 CSC 33, [2002] 2 R.C.S. 235, par. 36.

[83] Pourvu qu'elle ne soit pas contraire à « l'intérêt de la justice », la décision du juge saisi d'une requête d'exercer les nouveaux pouvoirs est de nature discrétionnaire. Par conséquent, à moins que le juge ne se soit fondé sur des considérations erronées ou que sa décision soit erronée au point de créer une injustice, il n'y a pas lieu de modifier sa décision.

[84] Of course, where the motion judge applies an incorrect principle of law, or errs with regard to a purely legal question, such as the elements that must be proved for the plaintiff to make out her cause of action, the decision will be reviewed on a correctness standard: Housen, at para. 8.

E. Did the Motion Judge Err by Granting Summary Judgment?

[85] The motion judge granted summary judgment in favour of the Mauldin Group. While the Court of Appeal found that the action should not have been decided by summary judgment, it nevertheless dismissed the appeal. Hryniak argues this constituted "prospective overruling" but, in light of my conclusion that the motion judge was entitled to proceed by summary judgment, I need not consider these submissions further. For the reasons that follow, I am satisfied that the motion judge did not err in granting summary judgment.

(1) The Tort of Civil Fraud

[86] The action underlying this motion for summary judgment was one for civil fraud brought against Hryniak, Peebles, and Cassels Brock.

[87] As discussed in the companion Bruno Appliance appeal, the tort of civil fraud has four elements, which must be proven on a balance of probabilities: (1) a false representation by the defendant; (2) some level of knowledge of the falsehood of the representation on the part of the defendant (whether knowledge or recklessness); (3) the false representation caused the plaintiff to act; (4) the plaintiff's actions resulted in a loss.

(2) Was There a Genuine Issue Requiring a Trial?

[88] In granting summary judgment to the Mauldin Group against Hryniak, the motion judge did not explicitly address the correct test for civil

E. Le juge saisi de la requête a-t-il eu tort de rendre un jugement sommaire?

[85] Le juge saisi de la requête a rendu un jugement sommaire en faveur du Groupe Mauldin. Bien qu'elle ait conclu que l'action n'aurait pas dû être tranchée par jugement sommaire, la Cour d'appel a quand même rejeté l'appel. Selon M. Hryniak, la Cour d'appel a fait un [TRADUCTION] « revirement pour l'avenir » mais, vu ma conclusion selon laquelle le juge pouvait à bon droit trancher l'action par jugement sommaire, je n'ai pas à examiner plus à fond ces arguments. Pour les motifs qui suivent, je suis convaincue que le juge n'a pas eu tort de rendre un jugement sommaire.

(1) Le délit de fraude civile

[86] C'est une action pour fraude civile intentée contre M. Hryniak, M. Peebles et le cabinet Cassels Brock qui est à l'origine de la requête en jugement sommaire.

[87] Comme il est expliqué dans le pourvoi connexe Bruno Appliance, le délit de fraude civile comporte quatre éléments dont il faut prouver l'existence selon la prépondérance des probabilités : (1) une fausse déclaration du défendeur; (2) une certaine connaissance de la fausseté de la déclaration de la part du défendeur (connaissance ou insouciance); (3) le fait que la fausse déclaration a amené le demandeur à agir; (4) le fait que les actes du demandeur ont entraîné une perte.

(2) Existait-il une véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'un procès?

[88] Le juge saisi de la requête n'a pas traité explicitement du critère qu'il convient d'appliquer à la fraude civile lorsqu'il a prononcé un jugement fraud but, like the Court of Appeal, I am satisfied that his findings support that result.

[89] The first element of civil fraud is a false representation by the defendant. The Court of Appeal agreed with the motion judge that "[u]nquestionably, the Mauldin group was induced to invest with Hryniak because of what Hryniak said to Fred Mauldin" at the meeting of June 19, 2001 (at para. 158), and this was not disputed in the appellant's factum.

[90] The motion judge found the requisite knowledge or recklessness as to the falsehood of the representation, the second element of civil fraud, based on Hryniak's lack of effort to ensure that the funds would be properly invested and failure to verify that the eventual end-point of the funds, New Savings Bank, was secure. The motion judge also rejected the defence that the funds were stolen, noting Hryniak's feeble efforts to recover the funds, waiting some 15 months to report the apparent theft of US$10.2 million.

[91] The motion judge also found an intention on the part of Hryniak that the Mauldin Group would act on his false representations, the third requirement of civil fraud. Hryniak secured a US$76,000 loan for Fred Mauldin and conducted a "test trade", actions which, in the motion judge's view, were "undertaken . . . for the purpose of dissuading the Mauldin group from demanding the return of its investment" (para. 113). Moreover, the motion judge detailed Hryniak's central role in the web of deception that caused the Mauldin Group to invest its funds and that dissuaded them from seeking their return for some time after they had been stolen.

[92] The final requirement of civil fraud, loss, is clearly present. The Mauldin Group invested sommaire en faveur du Groupe Mauldin contre M. Hryniak. Toutefois, à l'instar de la Cour d'appel, je suis convaincue que les conclusions du juge étayent ce résultat.

[89] Une fausse déclaration du défendeur constitue le premier élément de la fraude civile. La Cour d'appel partageait l'avis du juge que [TRADUCTION] « [s]ans aucun doute, le Groupe Mauldin a été amené à investir avec Hryniak en raison des propos adressés par M. Hryniak à Fred Mauldin » lors de la réunion du 19 juin 2001 (par. 158), ce que l'appelant ne conteste pas dans son mémoire.

[90] Le juge saisi de la requête a conclu à l'existence de la connaissance ou de l'insouciance requise quant à la fausseté de la déclaration, en l'occurrence le deuxième élément de la fraude civile, en raison de l'absence de démarches de la part de M. Hryniak pour s'assurer que les fonds seraient adéquatement investis et de son omission de vérifier que le destinataire éventuel des fonds, la New Savings Bank, était un établissement sûr. Le juge a également rejeté la thèse invoquée en défense selon laquelle les fonds avaient été dérobés, soulignant les démarches limitées prises par M. Hryniak pour recouvrer les fonds, celui-ci ayant attendu quelque 15 mois avant de signaler le vol apparent de 10,2 millions de dollars américains.

[91] Le juge saisi de la requête a conclu également à l'intention de M. Hryniak que ses fausses déclarations incitent le Groupe Mauldin à agir, ce qui constitue le troisième élément de la fraude civile. M. Hryniak a contracté un prêt de 76 000 dollars américains pour le compte de Fred Mauldin et a [TRADUCTION] « simulé une transaction », des gestes qui, selon le juge, ont été « posés [. . .] dans le but de dissuader le Groupe Mauldin d'exiger le remboursement de son placement » (par. 113). De plus, le juge a exposé en détail le rôle capital joué par M. Hryniak dans la multitude de tromperies qui ont amené le Groupe Mauldin à investir ses fonds et qui l'ont dissuadé de demander leur remboursement pendant quelque temps après que les fonds eurent été dérobés.

US$1.2 million and, but for a small return of US$9,600 in February 2002, lost its investment.

[93] The motion judge found no credible evidence to support Hryniak's claim that he was a legitimate trader, and the outcome was therefore clear, so the motion judge concluded there was no issue requiring a trial. He made no palpable and overriding error in granting summary judgment.

(3) Did the Interest of Justice Preclude the Motion Judge From Using His Powers Under Rule 20.04?

[94] The motion judge did not err in exercising his fact-finding powers under Rule 20.04(2.1). He was prepared to sift through the detailed record, and was of the view that sufficient evidence had been presented on all relevant points to allow him to draw the inferences necessary to make dispositive findings under Rule 20. Further, while the amount involved is significant, the issues raised by Hryniak's defence were fairly straightforward. As the Court of Appeal noted, at root, the question turned on whether Hryniak had a legitimate trading program that went awry when the funds were stolen, or whether his program was a sham from the outset (para. 159). The plaintiffs are a group of elderly American investors and, at the return date of the motion, had been deprived of their funds for nearly a decade. The record was sufficient to make a fair and just determination and a timely resolution of the matter was called for. While the motion was complex and expensive, going to trial would have cost even more and taken even longer.

[95] Despite the fact that the Mauldin Group's claims against Peebles and Cassels Brock had to Mauldin a investi 1,2 million de dollars américains et, à part un rendement pour la modique somme de 9 600 dollars américains reçue en février 2002, il a perdu son placement.

(3) L'intérêt de la justice empêchait-il le juge saisi de la requête d'exercer les pouvoirs que lui confère la règle 20.04?

[94] Le juge saisi de la requête n'a pas commis d'erreur en exerçant les pouvoirs en matière de recherche des faits que lui confère le par. 20.04(2.1) des Règles. Il était disposé à examiner minutieusement le dossier détaillé et était d'avis que les éléments de preuve présentés sur tous les points pertinents suffisaient pour lui permettre de tirer les inférences nécessaires à la formulation de conclusions décisives en vertu de la règle 20. En outre, malgré l'importance de la somme en cause, les moyens invoqués par M. Hryniak dans sa défense étaient relativement simples. Comme l'a indiqué la Cour d'appel, il s'agissait fondamentalement de savoir si M. Hryniak avait mis en place un programme légitime de transaction de titres qui a mal tourné lorsque les fonds ont été dérobés, ou si son programme était factice depuis le début (par. 159). Les demandeurs forment un groupe d'investisseurs américains âgés qui, à la date de l'audition de la requête, avaient été privés de leurs fonds depuis près de 10 ans. Le dossier était suffisant pour permettre de rendre une décision juste et équitable et il fallait trancher l'affaire de façon expéditive. Bien que la requête se soit révélée complexe et onéreuse, la tenue d'un procès aurait été encore plus coûteuse et aurait duré encore plus longtemps.

[95] Même si les actions intentées par le Groupe Mauldin contre M. Peebles et le cabinet Cassels proceed to trial, there is little reason to believe that granting summary judgment against Hryniak would have a prejudicial impact on the trial of the remaining issues. While the extent of the other defendants' involvement in the fraud requires a trial, that matter is not predetermined by the conclusion that Hryniak clearly was a perpetrator of the fraud. The motion judge's findings speak specifically to Hryniak's involvement and neither rely upon, nor are inconsistent with, the liability of others. His findings were clearly supported by the evidence. It was neither against the interest of justice for the motion judge to use his fact-finding powers nor was his discretionary decision to do so tainted with error.

Brock devaient être instruites, il n'y a pas vraiment lieu de croire qu'un jugement sommaire rendu contre M. Hryniak aurait nui à l'instruction des autres questions litigieuses. Bien que l'étendue de la participation des autres défendeurs à la fraude nécessite la tenue d'un procès, la conclusion selon laquelle M. Hryniak était manifestement l'un des auteurs de la fraude ne résout pas d'avance cette question. Les conclusions du juge saisi de la requête traitent spécifiquement de la participation de M. Hryniak et ne reposent pas sur la responsabilité d'autres personnes, ni ne sont incompatibles avec leur responsabilité. Ses conclusions étaient clairement étayées par la preuve. L'exercice, par le juge, de ses pouvoirs en matière de recherche des faits n'allait pas à l'encontre de l'intérêt de la justice, et sa décision discrétionnaire d'exercer ces pouvoirs n'était pas non plus entachée d'erreur.

V. Conclusion

V. Conclusion

[96] Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal, with costs to the respondents.

[96] Par conséquent, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi avec dépens en faveur des intimés.

RULE 20 SUMMARY JUDGMENT

RÈGLE 20 JUGEMENT SOMMAIRE

20.01 [Where Available] (1) [To Plaintiff] A plaintiff may, after the defendant has delivered a statement of defence or served a notice of motion, move with supporting affidavit material or other evidence for summary judgment on all or part of the claim in the statement of claim.

20.01 [Applicabilité] (1) [Au demandeur] Le demandeur peut, après que le défendeur a remis une défense ou signifié un avis de motion, demander, par voie de motion, appuyée d'un affidavit ou d'autres éléments de preuve, un jugement sommaire sur la totalité ou une partie de la demande formulée dans la déclaration.

(2) The plaintiff may move, without notice, for leave to serve a notice of motion for summary judgment together with the statement of claim, and leave may be given where special urgency is shown, subject to such directions as are just.

(2) Le demandeur peut demander, par voie de motion présentée sans préavis, l'autorisation de signifier avec la déclaration un avis de motion en vue d'obtenir un jugement sommaire. L'autorisation peut être accordée en cas d'urgence extraordinaire, sous réserve de directives justes.

(3) [To Defendant] A defendant may, after deliering a statement of defence, move with supporting affidavit material or other evidence for summary judgment dismissing all or part of the claim in the statement of claim.

(3) [Au défendeur] Le défendeur peut, après avoir remis une défense, demander, par voie de motion appuyée d'un affidavit ou d'autres éléments de preuve, un jugement sommaire rejetant en totalité ou en partie la demande formulée dans la déclaration.

20.02 [Evidence on Motion] (1) An affidavit for use on a motion for summary judgment may be made on information and belief as provided in subrule 39.01(4), but, on the hearing of the motion, the court may, if appropriate, draw an adverse inference from the failure of a party to provide the evidence of any person having personal knowledge of contested facts.

(2) In response to affidavit material or other evidence supporting a motion for summary judgment, a responding party may not rest solely on the allegations or denials in the party's pleadings, but must set out, in affidavit material or other evidence, specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue requiring a trial.

20.03 [Factums Required] (1) On a motion for summary judgment, each party shall serve on every other party to the motion a factum consisting of a concise argument stating the facts and law relied on by the party.

(2) The moving party's factum shall be served and filed with proof of service in the court office where the motion is to be heard at least seven days before the hearing.

(3) The responding party's factum shall be served and filed with proof of service in the court office where the motion is to be heard at least four days before the hearing.

(4) Revoked.

20.04 [Disposition of Motion] (1) [General] Revoked.

(2) The court shall grant summary judgment if,

(a) the court is satisfied that there is no genuine issue requiring a trial with respect to a claim or defence; or

(b) the parties agree to have all or part of the claim determined by a summary judgment and the court is satisfied that it is appropriate to grant summary judgment.

(2.1) [Powers] In determining under clause (2)(a) whether there is a genuine issue requiring a trial, the 20.02 [Preuves à l'appui d'une motion] (1) Dans un affidavit à l'appui d'une motion visant à obtenir un jugement sommaire, une partie peut faire état des éléments qu'elle tient pour véridiques sur la foi de renseignements, comme le prévoit le paragraphe 39.01(4). Toutefois, dans le cas où la partie ne fournit pas le témoignage de toute personne ayant une connaissance directe des faits contestés, le tribunal peut en tirer des conclusions défavorables, s'il y a lieu, lors de l'audition de la motion.

(2) Lorsqu'une motion en vue d'obtenir un jugement sommaire est appuyée d'un affidavit ou d'autres éléments de preuve, la partie intimée ne peut pas se contenter uniquement des allégations ou dénégations contenues dans ses actes de procédure. Elle doit préciser, au moyen d'un affidavit ou d'autres éléments de preuve, des faits spécifiques indiquant qu'il y a une véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'une instruction.

20.03 [Mémoires requis] (1) Dans le cas d'une motion en vue d'obtenir un jugement sommaire, chaque partie signifie aux autres parties à la motion un mémoire comprenant une argumentation concise exposant les faits et les règles de droit qu'elle invoque.

(2) Le mémoire de l'auteur de la motion est signifié et déposé, avec la preuve de la signification, au greffe du tribunal où la motion doit être entendue, au moins sept jours avant l'audience.

(3) Le mémoire de la partie intimée est signifié et déposé, avec la preuve de la signification, au greffe du tribunal où la motion doit être entendue, au moins quatre jours avant l'audience.

(4) Abrogé.

20.04 [Décision sur la motion] (1) [Dispositions générales] Abrogé.

(2) Le tribunal rend un jugement sommaire si, selon le cas :

a) il est convaincu qu'une demande ou une défense ne soulève pas de véritable question litigieuse nécessitant la tenue d'une instruction;

b) il est convaincu qu'il est approprié de rendre un jugement sommaire et les parties sont d'accord pour que tout ou partie de la demande soit décidé par jugement sommaire.

(2.1) [Pouvoirs] Lorsqu'il décide, aux termes de l'alinéa (2)a), s'il existe une véritable question litigieuse court shall consider the evidence submitted by the parties and, if the determination is being made by a judge, the judge may exercise any of the following powers for the purpose, unless it is in the interest of justice for such powers to be exercised only at a trial:

1. Weighing the evidence.

2. Evaluating the credibility of a deponent.

3. Drawing any reasonable inference from the evidence.

(2.2) [Oral Evidence (Mini-Trial)] A judge may, for the purposes of exercising any of the powers set out in subrule (2.1), order that oral evidence be presented by one or more parties, with or without time limits on its presentation.

(3) [Only Genuine Issue Is Amount] Where the court is satisfied that the only genuine issue is the amount to which the moving party is entitled, the court may order a trial of that issue or grant judgment with a reference to determine the amount.

(4) [Only Genuine Issue Is Question Of Law] Where the court is satisfied that the only genuine issue is a question of law, the court may determine the question and grant judgment accordingly, but where the motion is made to a master, it shall be adjourned to be heard by a judge.

(5) [Only Claim Is For An Accounting] Where the plaintiff is the moving party and claims an accounting and the defendant fails to satisfy the court that there is a preliminary issue to be tried, the court may grant judgment on the claim with a reference to take the accounts.

20.05 [Where Trial Is Necessary] (1) [Powers of Court] Where summary judgment is refused or is granted only in part, the court may make an order specifying what material facts are not in dispute and defining the issues to be tried, and order that the action proceed to trial expeditiously.

(2) [Directions And Terms] If an action is ordered to proceed to trial under subrule (1), the court may give such directions or impose such terms as are just, including an order, nécessitant la tenue d'une instruction, le tribunal tient compte des éléments de preuve présentés par les parties et, si la décision doit être rendue par un juge, ce dernier peut, à cette fin, exercer l'un ou l'autre des pouvoirs suivants, à moins qu'il ne soit dans l'intérêt de la justice de ne les exercer que lors d'un procès :

1. Apprécier la preuve.

2. Évaluer la crédibilité d'un déposant.

3. Tirer une conclusion raisonnable de la preuve.

(2.2) [Témoignage oral (mini-procès)] Un juge peut, dans le but d'exercer les pouvoirs prévus au paragraphe (2.1), ordonner que des témoignages oraux soient présentés par une ou plusieurs parties, avec ou sans limite de temps pour leur présentation.

(3) [Si la seule question litigieuse est le montant de la demande] Le tribunal, s'il est convaincu que la seule véritable question litigieuse porte sur le montant auquel l'auteur de la motion a droit, peut ordonner l'instruction de la question ou rendre un jugement et ordonner un renvoi afin de fixer le montant.

(4) [Si la seule question litigieuse est une question de droit] Le tribunal, s'il est convaincu que la seule véritable question litigieuse porte sur une question de droit, peut trancher cette question et rendre un jugement en conséquence. Toutefois, si la motion est présentée à un protonotaire, elle est déférée à un juge pour audition.

(5) [Demande de reddition de comptes seulement] Si le demandeur est l'auteur de la motion et qu'il demande une reddition de comptes, le tribunal peut rendre jugement sur la demande et ordonner un renvoi pour la reddition des comptes, à moins que le défendeur ne convainque le tribunal qu'une question préliminaire doit être instruite.

20.05 [Nécessité d'une instruction] (1) [Pouvoirs du tribunal] Si le jugement sommaire est refusé ou n'est accordé qu'en partie, le tribunal peut rendre une ordonnance dans laquelle il précise les faits pertinents qui ne sont pas en litige et les questions qui doivent être instruites. Il peut également ordonner que l'action soit instruite de façon expéditive.

(2) [Directives et conditions] Le tribunal qui ordonne l'instruction d'une action en vertu du paragraphe (1) peut donner les directives ou imposer les conditions qu'il estime justes, et ordonner notamment :

2014 SCC 7 (CanLII)

(a) that each party deliver, within a specified time, an affidavit of documents in accordance with the court's directions;

(b) that any motions be brought within a specified time;

(c) that a statement setting out what material facts are not in dispute be filed within a specified time;

(d) that examinations for discovery be conducted in accordance with a discovery plan established by the court, which may set a schedule for examinations and impose such limits on the right of discovery as are just, including a limit on the scope of discovery to matters not covered by the affidavits or any other evidence filed on the motion and any cross-examinations on them;

(e) that a discovery plan agreed to by the parties under Rule 29.1 (discovery plan) be amended;

(f) that the affidavits or any other evidence filed on the motion and any cross-examinations on them may be used at trial in the same manner as an examination for discovery;

(g) that any examination of a person under Rule 36 (taking evidence before trial) be subject to a time limit;

(h) that a party deliver, within a specified time, a written summary of the anticipated evidence of a witness;

(i) that any oral examination of a witness at trial be subject to a time limit;

(j) that the evidence of a witness be given in whole or in part by affidavit;

(k) that any experts engaged by or on behalf of the parties in relation to the action meet on a without prejudice basis in order to identify the issues on which the experts agree and the issues on which they do not agree, to attempt to clarify and resolve any issues that are the subject of disagreement and to prepare a joint statement setting out the areas of agreement and any areas of disagreement and the reasons for it if, in the opinion of the court, the cost or time savings or other benefits that may be achieved from the

(p) for security for costs.

(3) [Specified Facts] At the trial, any facts specified under subrule (1) or clause (2)(c) shall be deemed to be established unless the trial judge orders otherwise to prevent injustice.

(4) [Order re Affidavit Evidence] In deciding whether to make an order under clause (2)(j), the fact that an adverse party may reasonably require the attendance of the deponent at trial for cross-examination is a relevant consideration.

(5) [Order re Experts, Costs] If an order is made under clause (2)(k), each party shall bear his or her own costs.

(6) [Failure To Comply With Order] Where a party fails to comply with an order under clause (2)(o) for payment into court or under clause (2)(p) for security for costs, the court on motion of the opposite party may dismiss the action, strike out the statement of defence or make such other order as is just.

n) l'inscription de l'action pour instruction à une date donnée ou son inscription à un rôle donné, sous réserve des directives du juge principal régional;

o) la consignation de la totalité ou d'une partie de la somme demandée;

p) le versement d'un cautionnement pour dépens.

(3) [Faits précisés] Lors de l'instruction, les faits précisés conformément au paragraphe (1) ou à l'alinéa (2)c) sont réputés établis, à moins que le juge du procès n'ordonne autrement afin d'éviter une injustice.

(4) [Ordonnance : déposition par affidavit] Lorsqu'il est décidé si une ordonnance doit être rendue en vertu de l'alinéa (2)j), le fait qu'une partie opposée peut être fondée à exiger la présence du déposant à l'instruction pour le contre-interroger constitue un facteur pertinent.

(5) [Ordonnance : experts, dépens] Si une ordonnance est rendue en vertu de l'alinéa (2)k), chaque partie paie ses propres dépens.

(6) [Défaut de se conformer à l'ordonnance] Si une partie ne se conforme pas à une ordonnance de consignation prévue à l'alinéa (2)o) ou à une ordonnance de cautionnement pour dépens prévue à l'alinéa (2)p), le tribunal peut, sur motion de la partie adverse, rejeter l'action, radier la défense ou rendre une autre ordonnance juste.

(7) Si la défense est radiée sur motion présentée en application du paragraphe (6), le défendeur est réputé constaté en défaut.

20.06 [Costs Sanctions For Improper Use Of Rule] The court may fix and order payment of the costs of a motion for summary judgment by a party on a substantial indemnity basis if,

(a) the party acted unreasonably by making or responding to the motion; or

(b) he party acted in bad faith for the purpose of delay.

20.07 [Effect of Summary Judgment] A plaintiff who obtains summary judgment may proceed against the same defendant for any other relief.

20.08 [Stay of Execution] Where it appears that the enforcement of a summary judgment ought to be stayed pending the determination of any other issue in the action or a counterclaim, crossclaim or third party claim, the court may so order on such terms as are just.

20.09 [Application to Counterclaims, Crossclaims And Third Party Claims] Rules 20.01 to 20.08 apply, with necessary modifications, to counterclaims, crossclaims and third party claims.

20.06 [Condamnation aux dépens pour usage abusif de la règle] Le tribunal peut fixer les dépens d'une motion visant à obtenir un jugement sommaire sur une base d'indemnisation substantielle et en ordonner le paiement par une partie si, selon le cas :

a) la partie a agi déraisonnablement en présentant la motion ou en y répondant;

b) la partie a agi de mauvaise foi dans l'intention de causer des retards.

20.07 [Effet du jugement sommaire] Le demandeur qui obtient un jugement sommaire peut poursuivre le même défendeur pour d'autres mesures de redressement.

Counsel:

Omer Brideau, on his own behalf;
Richard Duke, for the defendants.

This action was heard on November 24, 1994 before Deschênes, J., of the New Brunswick Court of Queen's Bench, Trial Division, Judicial District of Bathurst.

Avocats:

Omer Brideau, pour lui-même;
Richard Duke, pour les défendeurs.

Cette action fut entendue le 24 novembre 1994 par le juge Deschênes de la Cour du Banc de la Reine du Nouveau-Brunswick, Division de première instance, circonscription judiciaire de Bathurst.

Deschênes, J., delivered the following decision on November 25, 1994.

Le juge Deschênes rendit la décision qui suit le 25 novembre 1994.

[1] Deschênes, J. [Translation]: The plaintiff was fired by the New Brunswick Housing Corporation in February 1985.

[2] A few days earlier, the six defendants had signed a letter indicating their dissatisfaction with the plaintiff who was in charge of the warehouse where the defendants worked from time to time.

[3] The plaintiff contends that the defendants conspired or agreed to write a letter that would cause the plaintiff's dismissal, which letter resulted in the plaintiff's dismissal, his loss of salary and inconvenience that followed.

[4] The plaintiff's claim is based on the tort of conspiracy. In Hunt v. T & N plc et al., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959; 117 N.R. 321; 74 D.L.R.(4th) 321, at p. 981 S.C.R., the Supreme Court stated that the tort of conspiracy may apply in at least two situations:

(i) where the defendants agree to use lawful means to harm the plaintiff and

(ii) where the defendants use unlawful means to harm the plaintiff.

[5] The most important principle laid down in Hunt is that "where a plaintiff alleges that the defendants entered into an agreement whose predominant purpose was to injure the plaintiff and where the plaintiff alleges that he or she has in fact suffered damage as a result of the agreement, then regardless of the lawfulness of the means that the defen-

[2] Quelques jours auparavant, les six défendeurs avaient signé une lettre indiquant leur mécontentement envers le demandeur en tant que personne en charge d'un entrepôt où les défendeurs travaillaient de temps à autre.

[3] Le demandeur prétend que les défendeurs ont comploté ou encore se sont entendus pour rédiger une lettre dans le but de causer le congédiement du demandeur, ce qui a eu comme résultat son congédiement et les partes de salaire et inconvénients qui s'en suivirent.

[4] Le demandeur fonde sa réclamation sur le délit civil de complot. Dans l'arrêt Hunt c. T & N plc et al., [1990] 2 R.C.S. 959; 117 N.R. 321; 74 D.L.R.(4th) 321, à la p. 981 R.C.S., la Cour suprême a statué que le délit civil de complot peut s'appliquer à tout le moins dans deux situations:

(i) lorsque les défendeurs conviennent de recourir à des moyens légaux pour causer un préjudice au demandeur et

(ii) lorsque les défendeurs recourent à des moyens illégaux pour causer un préjudice au demandeur.

dants are alleged to have used to implement the agreement the plaintiff will have made out a cognizable claim in the tort of conspiracy". (see Hunt, p. 984 S.C.R.).

[6] In this case, I have examined the evidence as a whole and I am not satisfied, on a balance of probabilities, that the plaintiff has established all of the elements constituting the tort of conspiracy. Quite to the contrary, I believe that the evidence shows without a doubt, that relations between the plaintiff and his employer had been difficult for a long time and that the New Brunswick Housing Corporation had decided to fire the plaintiff before receiving the defendants' letter and was to act on this decision regardless of the six defendants' feelings of dissatisfaction. In other words, I am not at all convinced that the plaintiff's dismissal resulted from the agreement; on the contrary, I think that the plaintiff's dismissal had nothing to do with the letter that the defendants wrote about him and that he would have been dismissed even if the defendants had not intervened.

[7] Also, I am not at all convinced that the defendants entered into an agreement with the predominant purpose of injuring the plaintiff.

[8] On the contrary, the evidence has shown that:

(a) the defendants had no knowledge, at the time, of the plaintiff's difficulties with the employer, and

(b) the defendants did not want nor did they ask for the plaintiff to be fired.

[9] For these reasons, the plaintiff's claim is avaient utilisé pour exécuter l'entente, le demandeur aura fait la preuve qu'il a un recours recevable pour délit civil de complot". (Voir Hunt, p. 981 R.C.S.)

[6] En l'espèce, j'ai examiné la preuve dans son ensemble et je ne suis pas convaincu, par une prépondérance de la preuve, que le demandeur a prouvé les éléments constitutifs d'un délit civil de complot. Au contraire, j'estime que la preuve démontre sans l'ombre d'un doute, que des relations difficiles entre le demandeur et son employeur existaient depuis fort longtemps et qu'avant même la réception de la lettre écrite par les défendeurs, la décision touchant le congédiement du demandeur avait été prise par la Société d'habitation du Nouveau-Brunswick et devait se concrétiser indépendamment des sentiments de mécontentement des six défendeurs en cause. En d'autres mots, je suis loin d'être convaincu que le congédiement du demandeur a été par suite de l'entente; au contraire, j'estime que le congédiement du demandeur n'avait rien à voir avec la lettre que les défendeurs ont écrite à son sujet et que ce congédiement allait se concrétiser même sans l'intervention des défendeurs.

[8] Au contraire, la preuve a plutôt démontré:

(a) que les défendeurs ne savaient pas que le demandeur, à cette époque, vivait de sérieuses difficultés avec son employeur, et

(b) que les défendeurs ne désiraient pas et n'ont jamais demandé le congédiement du demandeur.

[10] In order to clarify this court file, it should be noted that six actions in the tort of conspiracy (B/SC/679/85, B/SC/680/85, B/SC/681/85, B/SC/682/85, B/SC/683/85 and B/SC/684/85) were consolidated and heard in one and the same trial and that this decision applies to the six actions.

Reasons for Judgment Reserved
of the Honourable Mr. Justice Slatter

2019 ABCA 49 (CanLII)

[1] The appellant appeals the summary dismissal of its claim because it was not brought within the limitation period: Weir-Jones Technical Services Inc. v Purolator Courier Ltd., 2017 ABQB 491.

Facts

[2] The appellant and the respondents had a contractual relationship under which the appellant would transport packages on behalf of the respondents. The contractual arrangement was comprised of a Collective Agreement, an Owner/Operator Contract, and a Standards of Performance Contract. The appellant argues that these written contracts were supplemented by a verbal contract including other matters such as the provision of a trailer that would be used to transport packages. The contractual arrangement was terminated by the appellant in August, 2009.

[3] In November 2008 and January 2009 the Union filed grievances on behalf of the principals of the appellant relating to claims for compensation, unpaid invoices, and other matters. Those grievances went to arbitration in September 2015, following proceedings before the Canada Industrial Relations Board. The grievances were settled on October 2, 2015.

[4] The corporate appellant takes the position that some of its allegations of breach of contract were not covered by the collective agreement or the arbitration. It commenced this action on July 22, 2011 claiming damages. The respondents brought an application to dismiss the claim based on the expiration of the limitation period. The appellant responds that the limitation period had not expired, and in any event there was a standstill agreement in place.

[5] The chambers judge concluded at para. 37 that the appellant was aware of the alleged breaches of contract more than two years before July 22, 2011. The appellant had alleged those breaches in communications with the respondents, and had sought legal advice. Even though there was some uncertainty as to which claims fell outside the arbitration process, the appellant had knowledge that some of the claims warranted a proceeding for a remedial order. Ultimately, the action was actually commenced even before the conclusion of the arbitration proceedings in which the scope of the claims encompassed by that proceeding was established.

[6] The chambers judge found that there was no standstill agreement in place. The sincere belief of the principal of the appellant that the limitation period only started on the date of termination of the contract, and was extended by settlement discussions, was an unfortunate error of law. The parties were engaged in the normal efforts to resolve the dispute, and nothing that was done amounted to an express or implied representation that the limitation period would not be relied upon. Further, s. 7 and s. 9 of the Limitations Act, RSA 2000, c. L-12 required that any extension be in writing.

[7] As a result, the chambers judge concluded that there was no merit to the claim, and it was summarily dismissed.

Issues and Standards of Review

[8] The appellant raises seven grounds of appeal, but they can be grouped as follows:

a) the chambers judge erred in concluding that the limitation period commenced prior to the termination of the contract on August 21, 2009;

b) the limitation period was effectively extended by the uncertainty over whether the arbitration proceedings afforded a venue for resolution of the dispute; and

c) the limitation period was suspended or waived during the period of negotiations.

The first and second issues raise questions of law as to the proper interpretation of the limitations legislation, and mixed questions of fact and law as to the application of that law to the facts. The third issue challenges the fact findings of the chambers judge.

[9] The standards of review are summarized in Housen v Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 SCR 235:

a) conclusions on issues of law are reviewed for correctness: Housen at para. 8,

b) findings of fact, including inferences drawn from the facts, are reviewed for palpable and overriding error: Housen at paras. 10, 23; H.L. v Canada (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 25 at para. 74, [2005] 1 SCR 401, and

c) findings on questions of mixed fact and law call for a "higher standard" of review, because "matters of mixed law and fact fall along a spectrum of particularity": Housen at paras. 28, 36. A deferential standard is appropriate where the decision results more from a consideration of the evidence as a whole, but a correctness standard can be applied when the error arises from the statement of the legal test: Housen at paras. 33, 36.

The standard of review for findings of fact and for inferences drawn from the facts is the same even when the judge heard no oral evidence: Housen at paras. 19, 24-25; Attila Dogan Construction and Installation Co. v AMEC Americas Ltd, 2015 ABCA 406 at para. 9, 609 AR 313.

[10] The statement of the test for summary dismissal, and the interpretation of the applicable limitations statute and the Rules of Court, are questions of law which are reviewed for correctness. The findings of fact underlying the summary dismissal are entitled to deference. The chambers judge's assessment of the facts, the application of the law to those facts, and the ultimate determination on whether summary resolution is appropriate are all entitled to deference: Hryniak v Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7 at paras. 81-4, [2014] 1 SCR 87; Amack v AW Holdings Corp., 2015 ABCA 147 at para. 27, 24 Alta LR (6th) 44, 602 AR 62.

The Test for Summary Dismissal

[11] The Rules of Court provide for the summary disposition of claims:

> 7.3(1) A party may apply to the Court for summary judgment in respect of all or part of a claim on one or more of the following grounds:
>
> (a) there is no defence to a claim or part of it;
>
> (b) there is no merit to a claim or part of it;
> (c) the only real issue is the amount to be awarded.

The key issue is the approach to be taken in determining the absence of a defence to, or "merit" in a claim.

[12] A rift has recently emerged in the case law discussing the test for summary judgment in Alberta, and in particular the standard of proof that is required for summary judgment. The divergence can be illustrated by comparing Can v Calgary Police Service, 2014 ABCA 322, 584 AR 147 with Stefanyk v Sobeys Capital Incorporated, 2018 ABCA 125, 67 Alta LR (6th) 215:

> Can at para. 20: Summary judgment is appropriate if the nonmoving party's position is without merit. Alberta Rules of Court, r. 7.3. "A party's position is without merit if the facts and law make the moving party's position unassailable … A party's position is unassailable if it is so compelling that the likelihood of success is very high". Beier v. Proper Cat Construction Ltd., 564 A.R. 357, 374 (Q.B. 2013). Mr. Can's claims are without merit. Justice Bensler's decision was correct and hence, reasonable.
> Stefanyk at para. 17: Therefore, in this appeal the issue is not whether the appellant's position is "unassailable". The first question is whether the record is sufficient to decide if the appellant is liable for the plaintiff's injuries. There are no material facts in dispute, no overwhelming issues of credibility, and the court is able to apply the law to the facts. It is unlikely that the cost and expense of a > trial is justified because of an expectation of a significantly better record. In this case summary judgment is a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result, and therefore it is an appropriate procedure. The ultimate issue is whether the appellant has proven on a balance of probabilities that it is not liable for the plaintiff's injuries.

This appeal and the companion appeal in Brookfield Residential (Alberta) LP v Imperial Oil Limited, 2019 ABCA 35 were set down to settle the law.

[13] What is the source of this jurisprudential divergence? The short answer is that there has been a paradigm shift in the approach to summary judgment since the decision in Hryniak v Mauldin in 2014. Uncertainty has arisen from the interpretation and application of the new principles governing summary judgment.

[14] Prior to the decision in Hryniak v Mauldin the trial was seen as the default procedure for resolving disputes. There was a resistance to using summary judgment, because it was seen as a procedural "short cut" that might compromise the substantive and procedural rights of the resisting party. As a result, while the basic test for summary judgment was whether there was a "genuine issue requiring a trial", the case law set a very high standard of proof before summary judgment was permitted. The case law was full of phraseology such as "plain and obvious", "bar to summary judgment is high", "clearest of cases", "beyond doubt", "obvious", "unassailable", "incontrovertible", "so compelling that the likelihood of success is high", "clear and unanswerable case", "bound to fail", and the like.

[15] In Hryniak v Mauldin the Supreme Court of Canada called for a "shift in culture" with respect to the resolution of litigation. Reliance on "the conventional trial no longer reflects the modern reality and needs to be re-adjusted" in favour of more proportionate, timely and affordable procedures. Summary judgment procedures should increasingly be used, and the previous presumption of referring all matters to trial should end:

> 23 This appeal concerns the values and choices underlying our civil justice system, and the ability of ordinary Canadians to access that justice. Our civil justice system is premised upon the value that the process of adjudication must be fair and just. This cannot be compromised.
> 24 However, undue process and protracted trials, with unnecessary expense and delay, can prevent the fair and just resolution of disputes. The full trial has become largely illusory because, except where government funding is available, ordinary Canadians cannot afford to access the adjudication of civil disputes. The cost and delay associated with the traditional process means that . . . the trial process denies ordinary people the opportunity to have adjudication. . . . (emphasis in original)

> 28 This requires a shift in culture. The principal goal remains the same: a fair process that results in a just adjudication of disputes. A fair and just process must permit a judge to find the facts necessary to resolve the dispute and to apply the relevant legal principles to the facts as found. However, that process is illusory unless it is also accessible - proportionate, timely and affordable. The proportionality principle means that the best forum for resolving a dispute is not always that with the most painstaking procedure.
> 34 The summary judgment motion is an important tool for enhancing access to justice because it can provide a cheaper, faster alternative to a full trial. With the exception of Quebec, all provinces feature a summary judgment mechanism in their respective rules of civil procedure. Generally, summary judgment is available where there is no genuine issue for trial.

This last passage in Hryniak v Mauldin noted that every province (except Québec) has a summary judgment procedure, with no indication that the new "shift in culture" applied only in Ontario.

[16] The new approach to summary adjudication was based on the principle of "proportionality" in civil procedure, which is a principle underlying the Alberta Rules of Court. The new approach to the disposition of litigation was therefore quickly adopted in Alberta: Windsor v Canadian Pacific Railway Ltd., 2014 ABCA 108 at para. 14, 94 Alta LR (5th) 301, 572 AR 317; B. Billingsley, Hryniak v Mauldin Comes to Alberta: Summary Judgment, Culture Shift, and the Future of Civil Trials (2017), 55 Alta Law Rev 1 at p. 13. Like Ontario's R. 20, Alberta's R. 6.11(1) and 7.3 specifically enable fact finding in chambers applications, including (with permission) by hearing oral testimony.

[17] The Alberta Rules of Court provide for two types of trial: "summary trials", and what might be called standard trials. The primary difference between the two is that standard trials presumptively proceed based on oral evidence (R. 8.17), whereas summary trials streamline the evidentiary process. In summary trials, affidavits are common, expert witnesses are not always called, and business records and other documents are introduced without "proof in solemn form".

[18] Despite the similarity in the names, there is a fundamental difference between "summary judgment" and "summary trial". Summary disposition is a way of resolving disputes without a trial; a summary trial is a trial: Windsor v Canadian Pacific Railway at para. 14. The distinction was noted in Hryniak v Mauldin (a summary judgment case) which contrasted (at paras. 73, 77) summary disposition with summary trials and streamlined trials (Ontario R. 76.02 and 76.12).

[19] Summary judgment is available before or at any time during the pretrial process. The advantage of summary disposition is not only that it avoids a trial, in many cases it also avoids the full expense and delay of those pretrial procedures. A summary trial results in a final adjudication and creates res judicata. A successful summary judgment application has the same effect, but an unsuccessful summary judgment application merely means a trial is needed. There is accordingly no "continuum" between summary judgment and summary trial. They are distinct processes. If summary judgment is not available under the test, the dispute must go to trial (summary or standard), but that is a distinct procedure.

[20] Since Hryniak v Mauldin the presumption that most disputes could or should "go to trial" is seen as being unrealistic. The parties' resources often do not allow a trial on every issue. Indeed, our civil justice system would be deficient if it could not resolve most claims without a trial. Trials are too expensive for many litigants, and disproportionate for many disputes. Seeing a trial as the default procedure is therefore not realistic; the expense of trial may cause some plaintiffs to "simply give up on justice": Hryniak v. Mauldin at para. 25. We have to strive for a "fair and just process" recognizing that "alternative models of adjudication are no less legitimate than the conventional trial": Hryniak v. Mauldin at para. 27.

> 49 There will be no genuine issue requiring a trial when the judge is able to reach a fair and just determination on the merits on a motion for summary judgment. This will be the case when the process (1) allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact, (2) allows the judge to apply the law to the facts, and (3) is a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result.

This outline of the procedural approach to summary judgment encompasses a number of points. To enable a "fair and just summary determination" the record before the court and the issues must:

> (a) Allow the judge to make the necessary findings of fact. An important thing to observe about this part of the test is that it assumes the summary judgment judge (or Master) is able to make findings of fact. The judge is entitled, where possible, to make those findings from the record and draw the necessary inferences. The parameters on fact finding are discussed, infra, para. 38. Summary judgment is not limited to cases where the facts are not in dispute. If the summary judgment judge is not able to make the necessary findings of fact, that is an indication that there is a "genuine issue requiring a trial". This issue is discussed, infra, paras. 27ff.
> (b) Allow the judge to apply the law to the facts. There are cases where the facts are not seriously in dispute, and the real question is how the law applies to those facts. Those cases are ideally suited for summary judgment: Tottrup v Clearwater (Municipal District No. 99), 2006 ABCA 380 at para. 11, 68 Alta LR (4th) 237, 401 AR 88. If the > record allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact (as contemplated by the first part of the test), applying the law to those facts essentially comes down to a question of law. Cases like this one, based on the expiration of the limitation period, often fall into this category, as do those that turn on the interpretation of documents.

> (c) Assuming the first two parts of the test are met, summary disposition must be a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result. This third criterion is a final check, to ensure that the use of a summary judgment procedure (rather than a trial) will not cause any procedural or substantive injustice to either party. Summary judgment will almost always be "more expeditious and less expensive" than a trial. In the end, if the judge finds that summary adjudication might be possible, but might not "achieve a just result" there is a discretion to send the matter to trial. This discretion, however, should not be used as a pretext to avoid resolving the dispute when possible.

These foundational criteria set the procedural framework of the modern law of summary dismissal. They set the procedure for determining whether there is "no merit" or "no defence" to the claim under R. 7.3.

[22] What then is the source of the rift in the case law respecting the test for summary disposition? Part of it may simply be that old habits die hard. Some of the stern vocabulary used before Hryniak v Mauldin continued to be used after it was decided, including by this Court. Sometimes this may have been a failure to fully embrace the "shift in culture" called for. Sometimes it was merely a shorthand for saying that there was a "genuine issue requiring a trial". Sometimes it may have been an unfocused way of saying that on the particular record, given the nature of the issues, summary judgment would not "achieve a just result". Sometimes this conclusory wording was used without regard to whether it is consistent with the modern principles of summary judgment.

[23] The result is that it is now possible to find a quote in the case law to support virtually any view of the test to be used in summary judgment. The issue cannot be resolved by seeing which "school of thought" has the most support in the case law. Historical analyses are not determinative given the call for a "shift in culture". Decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada prevail.

[24] The solution must be to go back to first principles: the principles behind the modern law of summary judgment, the principles behind the modern law of proof, the principles behind the type of record to be used in summary dispositions, and principles of fairness.

I. Principles of Summary Judgment

[25] The procedures underlying summary judgment are established by Hryniak v Mauldin, and have already been set out, supra paras. 14-16, 20-21. It comes down to whether summary disposition is possible, considering the record, the evidence, the facts, and the law that must be applied to them. If the record allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact and apply the law, then the summary procedure should be used unless there is a substantive reason to conclude that summary disposition would not "achieve a just result". Presuming that summary disposition will always be "unjust" unless it meets some high standard of irrefutability defeats the whole concept of the "culture shift" mandated by Hryniak v Mauldin.

2019 ABCA 49 (CanLII)

[26] The Hryniak v Mauldin approach is not in any way anomalous, because it is consistent with the overriding goal of "proportionality" in civil procedure recognized by R. 1.2 of the Alberta Rules of Court: Burns Bog Conservation Society v Canada (A. G.), 2014 FCA 170 at para. 42, 83 CELR (3d) 1. All procedures for resolving civil disputes, including summary dispositions, should be timely, cost-effective, and proportionate to the importance and complexity of the issues.

II. Principles of Proof

[27] The principal difference in the approaches taken by Can and Stefanyk (which are summarized supra, para. 12) relates to the test to be met by the moving party in a summary judgment application. Can suggested the moving party's position must be "unassailable" or so compelling that the likelihood of success was "very high". Stefanyk proposed proof on a balance of probabilities. Neither "test" can simply be read in isolation, detached from the summary judgment context. As noted (supra, paras. 17-9) there are fundamental differences between summary judgment, summary trials, and standard trials. Meeting the test for proof of the underlying facts is not a proxy for summary judgment.

[28] There was a time when there were numerous standards of proof used in civil law. The uncertainty and complications created were eliminated by the decision in F.H. v McDougall, 2008 SCC 53 at para. 40, [2008] 3 SCR 41 which held that there is only one standard of proof in civil law: proof on a balance of probabilities. That standard was confirmed in Canada (A. G.) v Fairmont Hotels Inc., 2016 SCC 56 at paras. 35-7, [2016] 2 SCR 720. Specifically, "obvious", "unassailable" and "very high likelihood" are no longer recognized standards of proof in Alberta civil proceedings.

[29] The standard of proof applies only to findings of fact. It does not apply to whether, at the end of the day, it is possible to achieve a fair and just adjudication on a summary basis. As pointed out in Hryniak v Mauldin at paras. 81-4, whether summary judgment is appropriate and fair involves an element of judicial discretion, but making the underlying findings of fact is an exercise in weighing the evidence.

[30] Addressing the "standard of proof" is not therefore a stand-alone test for whether summary judgment is possible or appropriate. Proving the factual basis of the application on a balance of probabilities is not in itself sufficient for summary adjudication, but merely one of the steps in determining if there is a genuine issue requiring a trial. Even if the factual record is proven on a balance of probabilities, the presiding judge must still be sufficiently satisfied and comfortable with the record to conclude that there is no genuine issue requiring a trial. Hryniak v Mauldin does not contemplate summary adjudication on difficult factual questions, requiring a tough call on contested facts, on the basis that "51% carries the day": see Hryniak v Mauldin at para. 51. Those are cases where the summary disposition judge would usually determine that there is a "genuine issue requiring a trial", even if the moving party had met the threshold burden of proof.

[31] In Alberta, Hryniak v Mauldin must be applied having regard to the specific wording of the Alberta Rules of Court. Rule 7.3 uses the expressions "no merit", "no defence" and "the only real issue is the amount". The word "no" can in some contexts be taken to mean "a complete absence", but if that standard of proof was required for summary judgment, summary judgment would never be possible. That standard would appear to be even higher than "incontrovertible" or "unassailable", and would amount to proof to a certainty, a standard that is rejected even in the criminal law as "unrealistically high": R. v Lifchus, [1997] 3 SCR 320 at para. 31. The search for a shift in culture would become illusory. The word "no" cannot be severed from the phrases "no merit" or "no defence", and should be viewed not in absolute terms but in the context of there being "no real issue".

[32] A notable aspect of summary judgment applications is that there is no symmetry of burdens. The party moving for summary judgment must, at the threshold stage, prove the factual elements of its case on a balance of probabilities, and that there is no genuine issue requiring a trial. If the plaintiff is the moving party, it must prove "no defence". If the defendant is the moving party, it must prove "no merit". The resisting party need not prove the opposite in order to send the matter to trial. The party resisting summary judgment need only demonstrate that the record, the facts, or the law preclude a fair disposition, or, in other words, that the moving party has failed to establish there is no genuine issue requiring a trial: see para. 35, infra.

[33] The threshold burden on the moving party with respect to the factual basis of a summary judgment application is therefore proof on a balance of probabilities. If the moving party cannot meet that standard, summary judgment is simply not available. On the other hand, merely establishing the factual record on a balance of probabilities is not sufficient to obtain summary judgment, because proof of the facts does not determine whether the moving party has also proven that there is no "genuine issue requiring a trial". Imposing standards like "high likelihood of success", "obvious", or "unassailable" is, however, unjustified. A disposition does not have to be "obvious", "beyond doubt" or "highly likely" to be fair.

[34] The suggestion that there is some intermediate standard of proof that applies to summary dispositions is inconsistent with Hryniak v Mauldin, McDougall and Fairmont Hotels. However, as a part of the overall assessment of whether summary disposition is a suitable "means to achieve a just result", the presiding judge can consider whether the quality of the evidence is such that it is fair to conclusively adjudicate the action summarily. Proof of the factual basis of the claim or defence by the moving party at the stage of the Hryniak v Mauldin test during which the "judge makes the necessary findings of fact", does not displace issues of fairness. The chambers judge's ultimate determination on whether summary resolution is appropriate, or whether there is a genuine issue requiring a trial, must still have regard to the summary nature of the proceedings.

[35] Related to the issue of the "standard of proof", is the "burden of proof" in summary dispositions, the test for which was confirmed in Murphy Oil Co. v Predator Corp., 2006 ABCA 69 at para. 25, 55 Alta LR (4th) 1, 384 AR 251. The moving party has the burden of establishing that, considering the facts, the record, and the law, it is entitled to summary judgment on the merits of the case, and that there is no genuine issue for trial. The resisting party then has an evidentiary burden of persuading the court that there is a genuine issue requiring a trial, or in other words that the moving party has not met that aspect of its burden. The ultimate burden remains on the moving party to establish that there is no genuine issue requiring a trial, and that a fair and just adjudication is possible on a summary basis. The resisting party can meet its evidentiary burden by challenging the moving party's entitlement to summary judgment (based on gaps or uncertainties in the facts, the record, or the law, etc.), or by raising a positive defence (such as a limitations defence). A dispute on material facts, or one depending on issues of credibility, can leave genuine issues requiring a trial. As noted, infra para. 37, the resistance to summary judgment must be grounded in the record, not mere speculation. Sometimes the resisting party can succeed by demonstrating that the complexity of the issues makes the case unsuitable for summary disposition, or in other words that there are genuine issues requiring a trial.

III. Principles Relating to the Record in Summary Dispositions

[36] As noted (supra, para. 21(a)), where possible findings of fact can and should be made on a summary disposition application. The law is now clear that the mere presence of some conflicting evidence on the record does not preclude summary disposition. As pointed out in Hryniak v Mauldin at para. 48, summary judgment is not limited to cases based on documentary evidence, or where the facts are essentially admitted. It observed at para. 57: "On a summary judgment motion, the evidence need not be equivalent to that at trial, but must be such that the judge is confident that she can fairly resolve the dispute" (emphasis added). The sufficiency of the record will depend on the issues, the source and continuity of the evidence, and other relevant considerations.

[37] Even before Hryniak v Mauldin it was established that the parties to a summary disposition application must "put their best foot forward": Canada (A.G.) v Lameman, 2008 SCC 14 at para. 11, [2008] 1 SCR 372. One could not resist summary disposition, or create a "genuine issue requiring a trial" by speculation about what might turn up in the future. Lameman stated the principle at para. 19:

> 19 We add this. In the Court of Appeal and here, the case for the plaintiffs was put forward, not only on the basis of evidence actually adduced on the summary judgment motion, but on suggestions of evidence that might be adduced, or amendments that might be made, if the matter were to go to trial. A summary judgment motion cannot be defeated by vague references to what may be adduced in the future, if the matter is allowed to proceed. To accept that proposition would be to undermine the rationale of the rule. A motion for summary judgment must be judged on the basis of the pleadings and materials actually before the judge, not on suppositions about what might be pleaded or proved in the future. This applies to Aboriginal claims as much as to any others. (emphasis added)

From this it is clear that the Hryniak v Mauldin test is to be applied based on the record actually before the summary disposition judge.

[38] Summary dismissal was resisted in Sturgeon Lake Indian Band v Canada (A. G.), 2017 ABCA 365 at paras. 38-45, 60 Alta LR (6th) 226, leave to appeal refused SCC #37899 (July 5, 2018), based on affidavits containing opinions, hearsay, irrelevant facts said to be in dispute, and statements that were clearly contradicted by the rest of the record. That decision noted:

> 39 … Not every conflict in the evidence precludes the chambers judge from drawing inferences from the admitted facts, the undisputed evidence, the conduct of the parties, and the corroborating evidence (such as documents with objective reliability) . . .
> 40 The mere fact that there might be some conflicting evidence on the record does not mean that a "fair and just adjudication" is not possible …

The chambers judge can make findings of fact if, viewed overall, the record permits that to be done: Shefsky v California Gold Mining Inc., 2016 ABCA 103 at para. 113, 31 Alta LR (6th) 1, 616 AR 290; Arndt v Banerji, 2018 ABCA 176 at para. 42. There are some issues of fact (such as issues of credibility, or conflicts in the evidence on material issues) that are not amenable to summary adjudication, and that are markers of genuine issues requiring a trial.There are also cases where summary disposition is possible because even if the facts asserted by the resisting party were true, they would not support that party's claim: Arndt v Banerji at para. 36(b).

[39] Whether it is possible for "the judge to make the necessary findings of fact" is tested based on the actual record, and not on speculation about what type of record might be available at trial. In those cases where there is a "genuine issue requiring a trial", it will be because there is a realistic prospect that a trial will create a better record, but that conclusion must be reached based on the evidence before the summary disposition judge, not speculation. In this respect, the traditional test of whether there is a "genuine issue requiring a trial" still has utility.

[40] Again, having regard to overall considerations of fairness and the ability "to achieve a just result", there can be occasions when the "best foot forward" approach is not strictly applied. That may happen, for example, where one party effectively controls all of the records and evidence with respect to the claim: e.g. Honourable Patrick Burns Memorial Trust (Trustee of) v P. Burns Resources Ltd., 2015 ABCA 390 at para. 11, 26 Alta LR (6th) 1, 612 AR 63. In those circumstances, the application for summary determination can be adjourned to permit some pre-trial discovery.

IV. Principles of Fairness

[41] The final principle is a need to ensure an appropriate level of fairness in the procedures used to resolve disputes. Considerations of "fairness" are built into the Hryniak v Mauldin test, which specifies that summary disposition must be a suitable "means to achieve a just result".

[42] Restrictions on summary disposition are sometimes justified on the basis that summary disposition deprives the plaintiff of "the right to go to trial", or "full access to the civil procedure spectrum". This is essentially a procedural argument about fairness. There is, however, no right to take an unmeritorious claim to trial, a process described in Hryniak v Mauldin at para 28 as "the most painstaking procedure". All claims are subject to screening at various stages. Claims must disclose a cause of action, or they will be struck: R. 3.68. Plaintiffs must be able to demonstrate sufficient "merit" to avoid summary disposition: R. 7.3. There is no "right" to use the most expensive modality of dispute resolution (i.e., the trial) if these hurdles cannot be overcome: Trial Lawyers Ass'n of British Columbia v British Columbia (A. G.), 2017 BCCA 324 at paras. 21, 56, [2018] 2 WWR 480, leave to appeal refused SCC #37843 (July 26, 2018).

[43] In any event, any "right of the plaintiff to have a trial" is equally offset by the "right of the defendant not to have a trial on an unmeritorious claim". Fairness is a two-way street. Litigation is expensive and distracting, and the costs awarded to the successful party seldom amount to full indemnity. Cost, delay and inequality of arms may mean that the right to adjudicative fairness, justice, and reliability can actually be hindered by a full trial. A defendant who can show that a claim has "no merit" on a summary disposition application should not have to suffer a trial. As noted, supra para. 32, the resisting party does not have to prove its own case at this stage, but only demonstrate that the moving party has failed to show there is no genuine issue requiring a trial.

[44] All of the parties and the court must make efficient use of limited resources:

> … the problem of systemic delay is exacerbated by cases like this where a summary judgment motion has been properly brought and a judge refuses to > adjudicate it on its merits. On a summary judgment motion, a judge has the duty to take "a hard look" at the merits of a claim: Knee v Knee, 2018 MBCA 20 at para. 33.

2019 ABCA 49 (CanLII)

As the Court noted in Hryniak v Mauldin at paras. 27-8, a fair and just summary dismissal procedure is " … illusory unless it is also accessible - proportionate, timely and affordable", and that summary procedures are "no less legitimate" than trials.

[45] While the law does not have to be beyond doubt before summary judgment can be granted, there are occasions when the law is so unsettled or complex that it is not possible to apply the law to the facts without the benefit of a full trial record: e.g. Tottrup v Clearwater at para. 11; Cardinal v Alberta Motor Association Insurance Co., 2018 ABCA 69 at para. 10, 66 Alta LR (6th) 15; Condominium Corp. No. 0321365 v Cuthbert, 2016 ABCA 46 at para. 29, 33 Alta LR (6th) 209, 612 AR 284; Axcess Mortgage Fund Ltd. v 1177620 Alberta Ltd., 2018 ABQB 626 at para. 49. Where the case presents complex factual issues, such as those based on highly technical scientific and medical evidence, summary disposition will often be inappropriate. There are other occasions where there will be a genuine issue requiring a trial.

[46] Procedural and substantive fairness must always be a part of the summary disposition process. Considerations of fairness need not be a threshold requirement, nor should they only arise at the conclusion of the application. The chambers judge is entitled to take into consideration the fairness of the process, and its ability to achieve a just result, at all stages. Thus considerations of fairness will always be in the background, including during the fact-finding process, in determining whether the moving party has proven its case on a balance of probabilities, in deciding if there is a genuine issue requiring a trial, and in deciding if, considered overall, summary disposition is a "suitable means to achieve a just result". The ultimate determination of whether summary disposition is appropriate is up to the chambers judge: Hryniak v Mauldin at para. 83. As stated in Hryniak v Mauldin at para. 50 and Nelson v Grande Prairie (City), 2018 ABQB 537 at para. 47, 75 Alta LR (6th) 36, whether a summary disposition will be fair and just will often come down to whether the chambers judge has a sufficient measure of confidence in the factual record before the court. In practical terms, that level of confidence will not often be reached in close cases.

V. Summary of the Application of the Principles

[47] The proper approach to summary dispositions, based on the Hryniak v Mauldin test, should follow the core principles relating to summary dispositions, the standard of proof, the record, and fairness. The test must be predictable, consistent, and fair to both parties. The procedure and the outcome must be just, appropriate, and reasonable. The key considerations are:

a) Having regard to the state of the record and the issues, is it possible to fairly resolve the dispute on a summary basis, or do uncertainties in the facts, the record or the law reveal a genuine issue requiring a trial?

b) Has the moving party met the burden on it to show that there is either "no merit" or "no defence" and that there is no genuine issue requiring a trial? At a threshold level the facts of the case must be proven on a balance of probabilities or the application will fail, but mere establishment of the facts to that standard is not a proxy for summary adjudication.

c) If the moving party has met its burden, the resisting party must put its best foot forward and demonstrate from the record that there is a genuine issue requiring a trial. This can occur by challenging the moving party's case, by identifying a positive defence, by showing that a fair and just summary disposition is not realistic, or by otherwise demonstrating that there is a genuine issue requiring a trial. If there is a genuine issue requiring a trial, summary disposition is not available.

d) In any event, the presiding judge must be left with sufficient confidence in the state of the record such that he or she is prepared to exercise the judicial discretion to summarily resolve the dispute.

To repeat, the analysis does not have to proceed sequentially, or in any particular order. The presiding judge may determine, during any stage of the analysis, that summary adjudication is inappropriate or potentially unfair because the record is unsuitable, the issues are not amenable to summary disposition, a summary disposition may not lead to a "just result", or there is a genuine issue requiring a trial.

[48] There is no policy reason to cling to the old, strict rules for summary judgment. This can only serve to undermine the shift in culture called for by Hryniak v Mauldin. Summary judgment should be used when it is the proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive procedure. It frequently will be. Its usefulness should not be undermined by attaching conclusory and exaggerated criteria like "obvious" or "high likelihood" to it.

[49] In closing, it is helpful to note that the judge who dismisses an application for summary adjudication may still be in a position to advance the litigation. The judge may be able to isolate and identify issues that can be tried separately under R. 7.1. The summary judgment materials may form a suitable platform for a summary trial, as happened in Vallard Construction Ltd. v Bird Construction, 2015 ABQB 141, 41 CLR (4th) 51. While serial applications for summary judgment are not to be encouraged, a second application for summary judgment may be appropriate later in the proceedings when the record is clarified and the issues are perhaps narrowed: Milne v Barnes, 2013 ABCA 379 at para. 6, 561 AR 256.

2019 ABCA 49 (CanLII)

The Limitation Period

[50] The Limitations Act provides:

> 3(1) Subject to subsections (1.1) and (1.2) and sections 3.1 and 11, if a claimant does not seek a remedial order within
> (a) 2 years after the date on which the claimant first knew, or in the circumstances ought to have known,
>
> (i) that the injury for which the claimant seeks a remedial order had occurred,
>
> (ii) that the injury was attributable to conduct of the defendant, and
>
> (iii) that the injury, assuming liability on the part of the defendant, warrants bringing a proceeding,
>
> or
>
> (b) 10 years after the claim arose,
> whichever period expires first, the defendant, on pleading this Act as a defence, is entitled to immunity from liability in respect of the claim.

There is therefore a three part test, based on a reasonable awareness of the injury, attribution of the injury to the defendant, and a claim warranting a proceeding for a remedial order.

[51] The limitation period for breaches of contract is covered by this provision. Under s. 4(g) of the previous Limitation of Actions Act, RSA 1980, c. L-15, the limitation period for breaches of contract started when the "cause of action arose": Fidelity Trust Co. v 98956 Investments Ltd., 1988 ABCA 267 at para. 28, 89 AR 151, 61 Alta LR (2d) 193. That occurred at the time of the breach of the contract, regardless of "discoverability" of the claim or any damage. The specific wording of the statute drove that result.

[52] The chambers judge concluded that the same rule still applies under the new Limitations Act, citing Papaschase Indian Band No. 136 v Canada (Attorney General), 2004 ABQB 655 at para 155, 365 AR 1, aff'd Canada (Attorney General) v Lameman, 2008 SCC 14 at para. 12, [2008] 1 SCR 372. The breach of contract in Papaschase, however, occurred in the 1880s, and that case was decided under the old legislation. The present Limitations Act contains no separate rule for limitation periods for breaches of contract, and they are covered by the same three part test: reasonable awareness of the injury, attribution of the injury to the defendant, and a claim warranting a proceeding. In many cases arising from breach of contract the three part test may in fact be met at the time of the breach of contract, but that is not invariably so.

[53] Since the statute provides the test for the commencement of the limitation period, the alternative starting points proposed by the appellant do not apply. Unless the alternative proposed dates happen to coincide with the test in the Limitations Act, the limitation period does not commence on (a) the date of breach, (b) the date the last services are provided under a service contract, (c) the date that economic loss emerges, (d) the date of acceptance of repudiation, or (e) the termination of the contract.

[54] In order to obtain summary dismissal of the claim based on the expiration of the limitation period, the respondents had to show from the record that the injury alleged by the appellant (arising from the alleged breaches of contract) was reasonably known, attributable to the respondents, and sufficiently serious to warrant a proceeding, no later than July 22, 2009. While the chambers judge proceeded on the erroneous assumption that the limitation period started to run at the time of breach, she made the necessary findings of fact as to when the appellant discovered and could reasonably have commenced the action.

[55] The chambers judge found that the breaches alleged by the appellant, the injury that resulted, and the knowledge that the injuries warranted a proceeding were known more than two years before the action was commenced. This is a finding of fact, to which deference must be extended. There is in substance no doubt that the appellant was aware of the claim before July 22, 2009. It acknowledges in para. 2 of its factum: "The appellant states that it first became aware of a claim against the Respondents in February 19, 2009, after obtaining a legal opinion from his legal counsel." A number of the alleged breaches of contract are mentioned in a memorandum of a telephone conversation of November 1, 2008 (EKE R4-7). The appellant's letter to the Union dated June 13, 2009 (EKE A10-13) also contains particulars of many elements of the claim. There were other communications that amply support the chambers judge's conclusion that the breaches were known months before July 22, 2009. The determinative issue is therefore whether there were any circumstances that would, in law, extend the commencement date of the limitation period.

[56] There was some dispute or uncertainty about whether the corporate appellant and its allegations of breach of contract were covered by the collective agreement, and therefore whether it was bound to pursue any claims through the arbitration process. Uncertainty about which claims were covered by the arbitration process does not delay commencement of the limitation period. Reliance on the possible efficacy of other procedures amounts at most to an error of law, which does not have the effect of delaying commencement of the limitation period. Discovery relates to the facts, not the applicable law or any assurance of success: Templanza v Wolfman, 2016 ABCA 1 at para. 19, 612 AR 67, leave to appeal refused [2016] 2 SCR xi; De Shazo v Nations Energy Co., 2005 ABCA 241 at para. 31, 48 Alta LR (4th) 25, 367 AR 267.

[57] The appellant indicates that it did not commence a court action for close to three years after it discovered its claim "in part because of the potential for a global settlement of the matters alleged in the Statement of Claim, informally or otherwise, along with the labour matters." If the plaintiff fails to seek a "remedial order" within the limitation period because of a mistaken view of the availability of an alternative procedure, the claim will be barred: Babcock and Wilcock Canada Ltd. v Agrium Inc., 2005 ABCA 82 at para. 16, 39 Alta LR (4th) 197, 363 AR 103.

[58] Section 3(1)(a)(iii) requires knowledge of an injury warranting a proceeding "assuming liability on the part of the defendant". Discoverability does not require perfect knowledge or certainty that the claim will succeed: De Shazo at paras. 31-2. The record does not disclose any circumstances that would extend the commencement of the limitation period.

Settlement Negotiations

[59] As noted (supra, para. 55) there were various communications between the parties about the alleged breaches of the contract. Some of those communications expressed a willingness to resolve the outstanding issues, and they expressed a preference for avoiding unnecessary legal fees and court costs. Reminders that court remedies were always available if negotiations were unsuccessful tempered those expressions of intention. The respondents requested documentation to support some of the claims, and expressed a willingness to discuss the issues. In the meantime, the grievance and arbitration procedures were unfolding.

[60] The appellant argues that this correspondence amounted to a standstill agreement, under which the respondents agreed that proceedings need not be commenced. Alternatively, they argue that the respondents made representations that estop them from now pleading the Limitations Act.

[61] The correspondence in question does not use the word "standstill", or any synonym. There is no mention of the Limitations Act. The chambers judge characterized it at para. 40 as "no more than normal dealings between parties attempting to resolve a claim". The clear recognition in the correspondence that legal proceedings would follow if negotiations were unsuccessful is inconsistent with any inference that legal rights were being waived. The appellant correctly characterizes the correspondence in its factum as evidence of "an agreement to negotiate rather than litigate". It does not disclose any agreement to waive legal rights. The chambers judge's conclusion that there was no standstill agreement, nor any representation that the limitation period would not be relied on, discloses no reviewable error.

[62] The allegation of a standstill agreement does not raise any issue requiring a trial, and there is no prospect of a significantly better record emerging from a trial. The correspondence said to create the standstill agreement or estoppel is on the record. The chambers judge had affidavits from the appellant's officer setting out his expectations and understandings of the correspondence and the negotiations. Some of his expectations are inconsistent with the correspondence, and others depend on an erroneous view of the legal consequences of the correspondence. His hope that the dispute could be settled by negotiation did not have the effect of extending the limitation period. The chambers judge was entitled to conclude that the appellant had not proven, on a balance of probabilities, that there was any standstill agreement or estoppel.

Conclusion

[63] In conclusion, the appellant has failed to show any reviewable error in the fact findings of the chambers judge, or the inferences she drew from the record. The incorrect assumption about when the limitation period commences for breach of contract claims did not affect the outcome. The appeal is accordingly dismissed.

Judgment Reserved of the Honourable Mr. Justice Wakeling
Concurring in the Result

I. Introduction

[64] There are two conflicting summary judgment tests that have appealed to panels of this Court in the post Hryniak v. Mauldin[1] era.

[65] One states that summary judgment may be granted only if the disparity between the strength of the moving and nonmoving parties' positions is so marked that the likelihood the moving party's position will ultimately prevail is very high – the outcome is obvious.[2] This is

[1] 2014 SCC 7, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 87. The Supreme Court released this judgment on January 23, 2014.

[2] 898294 Alberta Ltd. v. Riverside Quays Ltd. Partnership, 2018 ABCA 281, ¶ 12 ("Summary judgment is reserved for the resolution of disputes where the outcome of the contest is obvious .... Is the 'moving party's position ... unassailable or so compelling that its likelihood of success is very high and the nonmoving party's likelihood of success very low?'"); Whissell Contracting Ltd. v. City of Calgary, 2018 ABCA 204, ¶ 2, 20 C.P.C. 8th 43, 46-47 ("Summary judgment may be appropriate 'if the moving party's position is unassailable or so compelling that its likelihood of success is very high and the nonmoving party's likelihood of success is very low'. This is an onerous standard and rightly so"); Rotzang v. CIBC World Markets Inc., 2018 ABCA 153, ¶ 15, 17 C.P.C. 8th 252, 255 ("Summary dismissal is appropriate 'if the moving party's position is unassailable or so compelling that its likelihood of success is very high and the nonmoving party's likelihood of success is very low"); Composite Technologies Inc. v. Shawcor Ltd., 2017 ABCA 160, ¶ 2, 100 C.P.C. 7th 52, 61 ("Rule 7.3 of the Alberta Rules of Court allows a court to summarily dismiss an action that is without merit. A nonmoving party's position is without merit if the moving party's position is unassailable or so compelling that its likelihood of success is very high and the nonmoving party's likelihood of success is very low"); Talisman Energy Inc. v. Questerre Energy Corp., 2017 ABCA 218, ¶ 18, 57 Alta. L.R. 6th 19, 29 ("the court must ask 'whether there is any issue of merit that genuinely requires a trial or conversely, whether the claim or defence is so compelling that the likelihood it will succeed is very high such that it should be determined summarily'"); Baim v. North Country Catering Ltd., 2017 ABCA 206, ¶ 12 ("The test for summary judgment is whether the claim or defence is so compelling that the likelihood it will succeed is very high, such that it should be determined summarily"); Ghost Riders Farm Inc. v. Boyd Distributors Inc., 2016 ABCA 331, ¶ 10 ("The case management judge correctly stated the legal test for summary dismissal as found in this Court's recent decisions in Access Mortgage Corp. (2004) Limited v. Arres Capital Inc. ... and 776826 Alberta Ltd. v. Ostrowercha"); Condominium Corp. No. 0321365 v. Cuthbert, 2016 ABCA 46, ¶ 27, 612 A.R. 284, 289 ("the court must ask 'whether there is any issue of merit that genuinely requires a trial or, conversely, whether the claim or defense is so compelling that the likelihood of it will succeed is very high such that it should be determined summarily'"); *Pyrrha Design Inc. v. [66] The only difference between the different standards is the degree of disparate strength necessary. Some courts have insisted that the nonmoving party's position be completely without merit so that the nonmoving party could not possibly succeed.[6] This means that the likelihood the moving party will succeed must approach 100 percent and the likelihood the nonmoving party will prevail must be around zero percent. Using this measure increases the degree of disparity to the maximum point and reduces considerably the utility of the summary judgment process. Others have granted summary judgment even though the nonmoving party's position has some merit. This test reduces the requisite degree of disparity and increases the utility of the summary judgment process. It is enough if the likelihood that the moving party's position will ultimately prevail is very high[7] – the strength of the moving party's case is many times that of the nonmoving party.[8]

[67] I adhere to this school of thought.

[68] So does Justice Brown, now of the Supreme Court of Canada. He has unequivocally endorsed this standard both before[9] and after[10] the Supreme Court's judgment in Hryniak v. Mauldin came out. In Orr v. Fort McKay First Nation,[11] delivered after Hryniak v. Mauldin, he said this:

> In Deguire v Burnett …, I recounted the various formulations found in our jurisprudence of the test for obtaining summary judgment. This included the threshold that it be 'plain and obvious' that the claim or defence will fail; that the claim or defence must be 'bound to fail' or have 'no prospect of success' or have 'no merit' or raise 'no genuine issue for trial'. They are … different ways of stating the same test. The formulation I preferred was (and remains) that stated in Beier v Proper Cat Construction …, and in O'Hanlon Paving Ltd v Serengetti Developments Ltd. … which requires the Court to consider whether the evidence renders a claim or defence so compelling that the likelihood it will succeed is very high. This formulation … not only states the high threshold which an applicant must meet for obtaining summary judgment, but also contains within it the rationale for granting summary judgment and depriving the respondent of full access to all litigation tools. It is also consistent with those aspects of the Supreme Court's statements in Canada v Lameman and Hryniak v Mauldin > which I have identified as generally applicable to summary judgment applications brought beyond Ontario's borders. Just as it serves neither litigants nor the administration of justice to have claims or defences which are highly likely to succeed thwarted or delayed by forcing litigants to undertake the expense and delay of a full trial, neither are they served when summary judgment is used to prematurely extinguish a potentially meritorious claim or defence for the sake of economy. By its terms, the formulation of the test for summary judgment in Beier v Proper Cat Construction keeps the master's or judge's attention focussed upon resolving litigation in a timely and cost-effective manner by imposing a proportionate remedy where it can be said that a claim or defence ought to succeed or fail without further process. In doing so, it promotes robust application of Alberta's summary judgment rule despite its preclusion of factual determinations.

[69] The other test is of very recent origin – post Hryniak v. Mauldin. It insists that summary judgment may be granted if the moving party's position is established on a balance of probabilities and it is fair and just to deny the nonmoving party access to the full trial process.[12]

[71] The chambers judge properly granted the respondent summary judgment.[14] It is incontestable that the respondents, having pleaded the Limitations Act,[15] are entitled to immunity from liability in respect of the appellant's claim.

II. Questions Presented

[72] Does the Supreme Court of Canada's judgment in Hryniak v. Mauldin affect the proper interpretation of the test for summary judgment under r. 7.3(1) of the Alberta Rules of Court?[16]

[73] If so, to what effect?

[74] What is the test for summary judgment in Alberta in the post Hryniak v. Mauldin era?

[75] Must the disparity between the strength of the moving and nonmoving parties' positions be so marked that the likelihood the moving party's position will ultimately prevail is very high? Must the ultimate outcome be obvious? Or is it enough if the court concludes that the moving party has established its case on a balance of probabilities and it is fair and just to make a determination?

[76] If the ultimate outcome must be obvious before summary judgment may be granted, is the respondent's position that the limitation period expired between four and eight months required, or whether the matter can be disposed of summarily"); Bilawchuk v. Bloos, 2014 ABCA 399, ¶ 14 ("Under the new Rule, summary judgment can be granted if a disposition that is fair and just to both parties can be made on the existing record"); Maxwell v. Wal-Mart Canada Corp., 2014 ABCA 383, ¶ 12, 588 A.R. 6, 10 ("Under the new Rule, no genuine issue for trial exists where the judge is able to make a fair and just determination on the merits without a trial, because the summary judgment process allows him or her to make the necessary findings of fact, to apply the law to those facts and is a proportionate, more expeditious and just means to achieve a just result. Under the new Rule, summary judgment may be granted if a disposition that is fair and just to both parties can be made on the existing record") & Windsor v. Canadian Pacific Railway, 2014 ABCA 108, ¶ 13, 371 D.L.R. 4th 339, 349 ("The modern test for summary judgment is therefore to examine the record to see if a disposition that is fair and just to both parties can be made on the existing record").

[13] See 330626 Alberta Ltd. v. Ho & Laviolette Engineering Ltd., 2018 ABQB 478, ¶ 41 (Feehan, J. asked the Court of Appeal to resolve this question).

[14] An appeal court may substitute its assessment of the law if it disagrees with the original court. Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, ¶ 8, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, 247. A more demanding standard applies to the facts. An appeal court may disregard an original court's fact-finding decision only if it concludes that it is the product of a palpable and overriding error and is clearly wrong. Id. at ¶ 10, [2002] 2 S.C.R. at 248. An original court's application of the correct legal standard to facts may only be set aside by an appeal court if it concludes that the original court made a palpable and overriding error or is clearly wrong. Id. at ¶ 36, [2002] 2 S.C.R. at 262. The chambers judge made no reversible error.

before the appellant commenced its action so much stronger than the appellant's position that the likelihood the respondent will prevail is very high?

[77] If the summary judgment test is less demanding and only insists that the moving party establish its position on a balance of probabilities, has the respondent met this standard?

III. Brief Answers

[78] Hryniak v. Mauldin[17] is an important decision.

[79] It makes two transcendent statements.

[80] First, it expressly declares the value of summary judgment and, by implication, other expedited dispute resolution procedures in a civil process environment in which conventional trials play a less prominent role than they once did because of their cost and the amount of time they require.

[81] Second, it confirms the assessment made long ago by the House of Lords,[18] the English Court of Appeal[19] and the United States Supreme Court[20] that summary judgment is not an inferior dispute resolution device that sacrifices procedural fairness in the pursuit of economical and expeditious resolution of disputes.

[82] But Hryniak v. Mauldin's importance in Alberta must not be overstated. The Supreme Court's judgment did not alter the text of r. 7.3 or Part 1 – the foundational principles – of the Alberta Rules of Court[21] or Alberta's Interpretation Act.[22]

[83] There is no valid reason in the post Hryniak v. Mauldin era to interpret r. 7.3 of the Alberta Rules of Court in a manner different from that favoured in the pre-Hryniak v. Mauldin period.

[84] Courts must be faithful to the text of r. 7.3 of the Alberta Rules of Court and give the rule its plain and ordinary meaning, just as they did before January 23, 2014.

[85] A court may grant summary judgment only if it concludes that the disparity between the strength of the moving and nonmoving parties' positions is so marked that the ultimate outcome of the dispute is obvious.

[86] The respondents' argument that the appellant's action is barred by the two-year limitation period in the Limitations Act[23] is so much more compelling than the appellant's argument that its claim is not barred by the Limitations Act that the likelihood the respondent will ultimately prevail is very high. The appellant has no chance of succeeding; the trial outcome is obvious.

[87] Summary judgment is the appropriate remedy under both the onerous and less onerous standards under review.

B. Historical Antecedents

1. January 1, 1969 to October 31, 2010

[89] Rules 159 and 162 of the previous iteration of the Alberta Rules of Court,[25] in force before November 1, 2010, are as follows:

> 159(1) In any action in which a defence has been filed, the plaintiff may, on the ground that there is no defence to a claim or part of a claim or that the only genuine issue is as to amount, apply to the court for judgment on an affidavit made by him or some other person who can swear positively to the facts, verifying the claim or part of the claim and stating that in the deponent's belief

See Laycraft & Stevenson, "The Alberta Rules of Court – 1969", 7 Alta. L. Rev. 190, 192 (1969) ("The one major change in these rules is the replacement of the old Rules 128 and 140 with the single Rule 159. ... This procedure may be ... available in tort actions where it was not previously available").

there is no genuine issue to be tried or that the only genuine issue is as to amount.

(2) A defendant may, after delivering a statement of defence, on the ground that there is no merit to a claim or part of a claim or that the only genuine issue is as to amount, apply to the court for a judgment on an affidavit sworn by him or some other person who can swear positively to the facts, stating that there is no merit to the whole or part of the claim or that the only genuine issue is as to amount and that the deponent knows of no facts that would substantiate the claim or any part of it.[26]

(3) On hearing the motion, if the court is satisfied that there is no genuine issue for trial with respect to any claim, the court may give summary judgment against the plaintiff or a defendant.

162 At any stage of the proceedings the court may, upon application, give any judgment to which the applicant may be entitled when

(a) admissions of fact have been made on the pleadings or otherwise, or

(b) the only evidence consists of documents and such affidavits as are sufficient to prove their execution or identity.

2. July 1, 1944 to December 31, 1968

[90] Order XI of The Consolidated Rules of the Supreme Court,[27] in force as of July 1, 1944, reads, in part, as follows:

128 When a statement of claim includes a claim for a debt or liquidated demand and any defendant has delivered a defence, the plaintiff may on affidavit made by himself, or any other person who can swear positively to the facts, verifying the cause of action in respect of the debt or liquidated demand and the amount claimed and stating that in his belief there is no defence thereto, apply to a judge for leave to enter final judgment for the amount so verified together with interest, if any, and costs.

V. Statement of Facts

A. Purolator's Business Structure

[93] Purolator Inc.[30] conducts an extensive freight-service business in Alberta.

[94] It operates a number of depots throughout Alberta that are serviced by owner-operator contractors.

[95] Purolator enters into owner-operator contracts with individuals or corporations to pick up and deliver freight. These contracts oblige an owner-operator to bear operation and maintenance costs and to secure liability insurance. Owner-operators must deliver to Purolator a daily summary of services provided. Purolator pays for these services "in accordance with the Owner Operator Compensation Plan". There is a base rate for a working day, a kilometer rate, a piece rate and other compensatory mechanisms.

[96] The Canadian Council of Teamsters is the sole bargaining agent under the Canada Labour Code[31] "for all Owner/Operators performing pick-up and delivery work in ... Alberta". This is so whether the owner-operator is an individual or a corporation.

[30] Purolator Courier Ltd. changed its name to Purolator Inc.

2019 ABCA 49 (CanLII)

[97] Purolator and the Teamsters entered into a collective agreement binding Purolator, the Teamsters and the owner-operators.

[98] The collective agreement stipulates that "[a]ll Owners/Operators hired must maintain membership in good standing in the Union for the duration of the present agreement, as a condition of continued service to the Company". It also provides that the "Owner/Operator shall personally and exclusively operate the equipment supplied pursuant to this Owner/Operator Contract with [Purolator] ... [unless the owner-operator] is absent because of vacation, illness, accident or on leave of absence for reasons acceptable to [Purolator] and the Union".

[99] The collective agreement has a grievance procedure for "any disagreement relating to the interpretation, application or alleged violation of the present Collective Agreement." If a grievance cannot be resolved, an arbitrator selected by Purolator and the Teamsters or appointed by the Minster of Labour resolves the dispute.

B. Weir-Jones Technical Provided Pickup and Delivery Services for Purolator

[100] On January 23, 2008 Weir-Jones Technical Services Incorporated signed an owner-operator contact with Purolator.

[101] Under this agreement Weir-Jones Technical provided pickup and delivery services for routes in Bonnyville and Cold Lake from some time shortly after January 23, 2008 until August 21, 2009. Andrew Weir-Jones, Samantha Gordey and Robin Staff discharged Weir-Jones Technical's obligations to Purolator under the owner-operator contract.

C. Weir-Jones Technical Alleged that Purolator Breached Contractual Commitments

[102] Weir-Jones Technical believed that Purolator failed to honor commitments made to Weir-Jones Technical to provide line-haul contracts for all oil field supplies and deliveries in the Cold Lake and Bonnyville areas and to utilize Weir-Jones Technical's fuel-saving technology in its vehicles.

[31] R.S.C. 1985, c. L-2, ss. 3(1) & 27(1). Owner-operators are dependent contractors. Dependent contractors are employees. Trade unions are certified bargaining agents of employees.

[103] Weir-Jones Technical first comprehensively stated its complaints to Purolator in a November 3, 2008 letter.[32] This letter unequivocally states that Purolator has "intentionally and fraudulently misrepresented Purolator's intentions."

[104] The inadequacy of Purolator's response to this letter must account for Weir-Jones Technical's February 24, 2009 letter to Purolator's chief executive officer, part of which is as follows:[33]

> In Q3 2007 staff from Weir-Jones Technical Services commenced a series of discussions with Purolator management from your Edmonton offices. This discussion concerned the implementation of innovative low carbon footprint vehicles on line haul routes initially in Northern Alberta. The vehicles would utilize thermal efficiency enhancement technologies, something which we have been working on for a number of years. The objectives were (a) to demonstrate the efficiency of the technologies (b) to enable Purolator to show, in a very practical manner, that they were committed to reducing their corporate carbon footprint, (c) to implement a technology which would have an immediate impact on Purolator's operating costs, and (d) to provide … [Weir-Jones Technical] with a long term revenue stream.
> The discussions continued and, in Q4 2007, Mike Gieck assumed the role of point man for Purolator. In summary Mr. Gieck made commitments that one or more line-haul routes would be awarded to … [Weir-Jones Technical], however, in order to facilitate this he requested that we enter into contracts for the provision of local delivery services on routes in Bonnyville and Cold Lake. This was done in January 2008 and, subsequent to commencing these contracts discussions continued in great detail about the promised line-haul routes. … [I]n the final analysis Mr. Gieck reneged on this commitment to make one or more line-haul routes available to us. In the words of a Purolator manager "Mike conned you and led you up the garden path – all he really wanted was someone to handle the Bonnyville and Cold Lake routes".
> Our position is that we have incurred significant expenses, both capital and operational, in order to provide the services which were requested of us by Mr. Gieck. Since September 2008 it has become apparent to us that Mr. Gieck's objectives were not as he represented to us.

[32] An October 8, 2008 letter from Weir-Jones Technical to Purolator asserted that Purolator had failed as promised "to award ... [Weir-Jones Technical] a contract for the bulk delivery of freight from Purolator's depot in Edmonton to distribution sites in Bonnyville and Fort McMurray".

[33] Emphasis added.

2019 ABCA 49 (CanLII)

2019 ABCA 49 (CanLII)

[105] Weir-Jones Technical enclosed in its February 24, 2009 letter its counsel's February 18, 2009 letter. Counsel unequivocally stated that Weir-Jones Technical may have an action against Purolator based on the facts recorded in the November 3, 2008 and February 24, 2009 letters from Weir-Jones Technical to Purolator:

> As I indicated at the outset of this correspondence, you have asked me to opine on the availability of remedies that … [Weir-Jones Technical] may have against Purolator. The information you have provided to me suggests that there are several instances where representations were made to … [Weir-Jones Technical] by senior Purolator personnel and that … [Weir-Jones Technical] has relied on those representations to its detriment. On the proof of those circumstances … [Weir-Jones Technical] would likely be entitled to damages, certainly equalling its lost expenditures, and in the ordinary cause, compensating for profits which would have been earned had Purolator's representations been honoured.

[106] Purolator's in-house counsel replied on March 25, 2009. She asked Weir-Jones Technical to produce the documents that contain the promises to which Weir-Jones Technical referred in its February 24, 2009 letter. Responding directly to Weir-Jones Technical's statement in its February 24, 2009 letter that it would like to resolve outstanding issues "without the need to further involve counsel", in-house counsel acknowledged that "Purolator would also like to resolve this matter without costly legal proceedings".

[107] In a May 11, 2009 letter Weir-Jones Technical informed Purolator's in-house counsel that most of its claims "are unrelated to the matters covered by the Collective Agreement" and that it intends to "[c]ommence action(s) in all appropriate jurisdictions in connections with all matters which do not fall under the terms of the Collective Agreement".

D. Weir-Jones Technical Invokes the Teamsters' Assistance

[109] The Teamsters filed eight grievances on behalf of Andrew Weir-Jones and Samantha Gordey in the period commencing November 12, 2008 and ending April 23, 2009.

[110] These grievances were the subject of a memorandum of agreement dated October 2, 2015 between Purolator and Mr. Weir-Jones and Ms. Gordey. Purolator promised to pay the grievors a sum of money within a defined period of time. Another provision in the October 2, 2015 memorandum of agreement stated that "[t]he present memorandum is made without prejudice whatsoever to the Plaintiffs' [sic] and Defendants' respective claims and positions in the civil action instituted before the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta, in Court file No. 1114-00276 ... ."[34]

> 3. On or about February 2008 through August 2009, the parties entered into an agreement for services and supplies which provided, inter alia, that the Plaintiff would perform courier services on behalf of the Defendant [sic] in and around Bonnyville … and supply proprietary fuel saving technology installations for the Defendant's courier truck fleet. In addition, by agreement with the Defendant [sic], the Plaintiff performed repairs on trucks which the Defendant [sic] rented from Ryder's Connection truck rental services. In addition, the Defendant [sic] agreed to reimburse the … [Plaintiff] for travel and accommodation costs incurred for performing its contractual obligations to the Defendant [sic] in and around Bonnyville, Alberta.
> 4. On or about February 2008, through August 2009, the Defendant [sic] represented that it would provide line haul contracts to the Plaintiff for all oil field supplies and deliveries within the Cold Lake/Bonnyville areas. In reliance upon the Defendants' representation(s), the Plaintiff incurred expenses for the placement of equipment and vehicles in the area for the provision of the oil field services.

[112] The plaintiff claimed damages for breach of contract and detrimental reliance "of at least $211,000.00" plus interest.

[113] Almost two months before Purolator settled the outstanding grievances the Teamsters had filed on behalf of Mr. Weir-Jones and Ms. Gordey, Purolator filed a statement of defence, part of which is as follows:

> 12. The Plaintiff knew or ought to have known by October of 2008, of all facts giving rise to any potential claim.
> 13. The Defendants plead and rely upon the Limitations Act, RSA 2000, c L-12.

[34] This is the action Weir-Jones Technical commenced against Purolator Courier Ltd., Purolator Ltd. and Purolator Freight in the Court of Queen's Bench on July 22, 2011.

F. Purolator Applied for Summary Dismissal of Weir-Jones Technical's Action

[114] On October 9, 2015 Purolator applied for summary dismissal of Weir-Jones Technical's action.

[115] It filed a supporting affidavit that exhibited Weir-Jones Technical's correspondence to Purolator claiming a breach by Purolator of its legal obligations to Weir-Jones Technical.[35] The deponent stated that he believed there is no merit to Weir-Jones Technical's claim.[36]

[116] Weir-Jones Technical filed two affidavits by the same deponent opposing summary dismissal of its claim.[37]

[118] The deponent advanced three reasons.

[119] First, the company hoped that the Teamsters might be able to assist with not only the resolution of the issues captured by the grievances that were filed before April 24, 2009 but those that fell outside the scope of the collective agreement. The deponent swore that the Teamsters had "indicated its willingness to resolve our issues collectively, whether strictly inside … [or] outside of the Collective Agreement."[38]

[120] Second, the company believed that it "had an agreement with Purolator in 2009 to hold off on litigation and to attempt to negotiate a settlement".[39] The bases for this belief were statements by both sides that they wished to resolve their differences without resorting to litigation.

[121] Third, the deponent thought that the two-year limitation period expired August 18, 2011:[40]

> 6. At the time I filed the Statement of Claim, July 22, 2011, I did so on the understanding that Weir-Jones Technical … had terminated its relations with

G. The Chambers Judge Granted Purolator Summary Judgment

[122] Justice Shelley accepted all Purolator's major arguments and granted it summary dismissal. [41]

[123] First, she concluded that Weir-Jones Technical was aware of the facts on which it based its action against Purolator and that the injury warranted bringing a proceeding more than two years before it sued Purolator.[42]

[124] Second, there was no standstill argument in effect. The correspondence on which Weir-Jones Technical relied did nothing more than document the disputants' "desire to attempt to settle the matter without recourse to the Courts".[43]

[125] Third, the essential components of promissory estoppel were not in place.[44] Purolator never promised not to invoke the Limitations Act.[45]

[126] Justice Shelley held that summary judgment may be granted if there is no "issue of merit that genuinely requires a trial or, conversely, whether the defence is so compelling that the likelihood it will succeed is very high."[46] While Justice Shelley did not identify the standard she favoured or applied, she held that "[t]he evidence … clearly establishes that … [Weir-Jones Technical] was aware of the alleged breaches … [and that it filed its suit] more than two years after the limitation period or periods commenced and the claims it contained were … barred by s 3(1) of the [Limitations Act]".[47]

[128] There is an inverse relationship between the importance of summary judgment and other expedited dispute resolution procedures and the efficacy of the traditional trial process. As the amount of time that separates the commencement of an action and its resolution by conventional trial[50] escalates[51] – the passage of time diminishes the value of the conventional trial[52] – the need to have a functioning summary judgment model increases in importance.[53]

[48] Whissell Contracting Ltd. v. City of Calgary, 2018 ABCA 204, ¶ 1, 20 C.P.C. 8th 43, 45 ("Modern civil procedure codes have a summary judgment protocol. They are designed to remove from the litigation stream proceedings the outcomes of which are obvious"); Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 327 (1986) per Rehnquist, J. ("Summary judgment procedure is properly regarded not as a disfavored procedural shortcut, but rather as an integral part of the Federal Rules as a whole"); Cavanagh, "Matsushita at Thirty: Has the Pendulum Swung Too Far in Favor of Summary Judgment?", 82 Antitrust L.J. 81, 111-12 (2018) ("Matsushita, together with its companion cases Anderson and Celotex, has ... revived Rule 56 from its dormancy and restored summary judgment to its proper role in the Federal Rule's procedural scheme – to provide a mechanism for disposal of cases not worthy of trial. ... [S]ummary judgment ... is an integral part of the Federal Rules and consistent with their goal 'to secure the just, speedy and inexpensive determination of every action and proceeding'") & Clark & Samenow, "The Summary Judgment," 38 Yale L.J. 423, 423 (1929) ("As an effective remedy for such delay within the limits prescribed by its form and purpose, the summary judgment procedure has become an important feature of the most modern practice systems").

[49] Some American judges do. E.g., Adickes v. S.H. Kress & Co., 398 U.S. 144, 176 (1970) per Black, J. ("The right to confront, cross-examine and impeach adverse witnesses is one of the most fundamental rights sought to be preserved by the Seventh Amendment provision for jury trials in civil cases") & Whitaker v. Coleman, 115 F. 2d 305, 306 (5th Cir. 1940) ("The invoked procedure [Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 56], valuable as it is for striking through sham claims and defences which stand in the way of a direct approach to the truth of a case, was not intended to, it cannot deprive a litigant of, or at all encroach upon, his right to a jury trial").

[50] See American Bar Association Judicial Administration Division, Standards Relating to Trial Courts § 2.52(a) (1992) ("General civil – 90% of all civil cases should be settled, tried or otherwise concluded within 12 months of the date of case filing; 98% within 18 months of such filing; and the remainder within 24 months of such filing except for individual cases in which the court determines exceptional circumstances exist and for which a continuing review should occur").

[51] E.g., Chu v. Chen, 2002 BCSC 906, ¶ 23, 22 C.P.C. 5th 73, 80 ("In the mid to late 1970's there was a time interval of about 6 to 9 months from the date a party applied to the court for a trial date and the first day the court assigned for the trial's commencement. ... By the early 1980's, the time interval from application for a trial date to the conventional trial date itself increased from about 6 to 9 months to around 12 to 18 months").

[52] Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, Economics Department Policy Note No. 18, "What Makes Civil Justice Effective?" ¶ 2 (June 2013) ("Lengthy [periods between the commencement of proceedings and trial disposition] ... undermine certainty of transactions and investment returns, and impose heavy costs on firms. Moreover, the length of trials is related to other crucial measures of performance such as confidence in the justice system: OECD analyses on surveys of individuals in different countries suggest that a 10% increase in the average length of [trial disposition] ... is associated with a decrease of around 2 percentage points in the probability to have confidence in the justice system").

[129] Regrettably, there is no reason to believe that the amount of time it currently takes for conventional trials in the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta to close litigation files will trend downwards in the foreseeable future.[54] Until this happens, expedited dispute resolution processes will continue to be of paramount importance in Alberta.

[130] Needless to say, the test for summary judgment or any other Part 7 protocol is contained in the text and is not a function of how poorly funded the court system or how clogged the conventional trial process is.

[131] Part 7 of the Alberta Rules of Court[55] allows a court to resolve a dispute without utilizing the time-consuming and expensive processes associated with a traditional trial.[56] Our [53] The Supreme Court of Canada has recognized this correlation. Hryniak v. Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, ¶¶ 1-3, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 87, 92-93 (the Court acknowledged that the cost and delay associated with conventional trials diminished their value and correspondingly enhanced the value of other dispute resolution procedures). Americans refuse to accept that excessive delay is inevitable. American Bar Association Judicial Administration Division, Standards Relating to Trial Courts § 2.51(a) (1992) ("[the Standards promote] Court supervision and control of the movement of all cases from the time of filing ... through final disposition") & Kolb, "ABA Fights Court Delay", 72 A.B.A.J. 161 (1986) ("The [ABA] task force is seeking to have the bench and bar in every jurisdiction adopt the Court Delay Reduction Standards"). See also Cavanagh, "Matsushita at Thirty: Has the Pendulum Swung Too Far in Favor of Summary Judgment?", 82 Antitrust L.J. 81, 119 (2018) ("As caseloads expand and litigation costs escalate, judges will continue to use summary judgment to manage their dockets") & Schwarzer, Hirsch & Barrans, "The Analysis and Decision of Summary Judgment Motions" vii (Federal Judicial Centre 1991) ("Growing concern over cost and delay in civil litigation has focused increased attention on Rule 56 as a vehicle to implement the objectives of Fed. R. Civ. P. 1 – the just, speedy, and inexpensive resolution of litigation").

[54] The Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta does not publish statistics recording on an annual basis the number of actions that are concluded by summary judgment, summary trial or a conventional trial or the amount of time that passes after an action is commenced and it is concluded by various file-closing events. This is essential information for those interested in the efficacious administration of justice. See Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, Economics Department Policy Note No. 18, "What Makes Civil Justice Effective?" ¶ 10 (June 2013) ("A court system with a good degree of informatisation is essential to the development of so-called caseflow management techniques that allow for a smoother functioning of courts. Caseflow management broadly indicates the set of actions that a court can take to monitor the progress of cases and to make sure that they are managed efficiently. It includes for example the monitoring and enforcement of deadlines, the screening of cases for the selection of an appropriate dispute resolution track, and the early identification of potentially problematic cases").

rules recognize that a party does not have an absolute right to "access ... all stages of the litigation spectrum".[57]

[132] Part 7 introduces distinct[58] protocols that authorize a court to determine relatively early in the civil procedure process questions of fact or law in order to expedite the resolution of all or part of a claim or to grant judgment under an application for summary judgment or summary trial.[59] "Alberta's summary judgment protocol and the other procedures in the Part 7 suite of Catrett*, 477 U.S. 317, 327 (1986) per Rehnquist, J. ("Summary judgment procedure is properly regarded not as a disfavored procedural shortcut, but rather as an integrated part of the Federal Rules as a whole, which are designed 'to secure the just, speedy and inexpensive determination of every action'") & Anderson v. Liberty Lobby Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 266-67 (1986) per Brennan, J. ("[summary judgment is] an expedited ... procedure"). See also A. Zuckerman, Zuckerman on Civil Procedure: Principles of Practice 378 (3d ed. 2013) ("To insist that such disputes should nevertheless follow the full procedural course would waste valuable resources and, worse still, would enable unscrupulous litigants to harass their opponents by putting them to unnecessary trouble and expense and by keeping them out of their entitlements pending resolution of the case").

[58] Summary judgment and summary trial are fundamentally different processes. One is a trial; one is not. One may hear oral evidence. The other should not. Can v. Calgary Police Service, 2014 ABCA 322, ¶¶ 84-95, 315 C.C.C. 3d 337, 378-84 per Wakeling, J.A. These differences account for the Alberta Law Reform Commissions' recommendation to accord them distinct roles. Summary Disposition of Actions xv (Consultation Memorandum No. 12.12 August 2004).

[59] Summary trials have been available in British Columbia since September 1, 1983. B.C. Reg. 178/83, s. 3. The current provision is r. 9-7. Supreme Court Civil Rules, B.C. Reg. 168/2009. Alberta has had summary trials with oral evidence since September 1, 1998. Alberta Rules of Court Amendment Regulation, Alta. Reg. 152/98. Summary trials are features of Saskatchewan's Queen's Bench Rules, r. 7-5(3) ("For the purposes of exercising any of the powers set out in subrule (2), a judge may order that oral evidence be presented by one or more parties, with or without time limits on its presentation") & Part 8 (abbreviated trial procedure if the trial of an action will be three days or less), Manitoba's Court of Queen's Bench Rules, Man. expedited procedures are built on a foundation that assumes the features a dispute displays may determine the parts of the litigation spectrum which must be accessed to resolve it".[60]

[133] Summary judgment is undoubtedly the Part 7 protocol most frequently utilized by Alberta litigants who seek expedited judicial recognition of the strength of either their claim or their defence to a claim.[61] Alberta judges have promoted its use.[62]

[134] This expedited dispute resolution process is also an important aspect of the civil procedure regimes of all Canadian jurisdictions[63] and those of England and Wales,[64]

B. Summary Judgment May Be Granted if the Ultimate Outcome Is Obvious

1. There Must Be a Marked Disparity Between the Strength of the Moving and Nonmoving Parties' Positions

[136] Summary judgment may be granted if the moving party discharges the legal or persuasive burden[73] and satisfies the court that the likelihood its position will prevail is very high and the likelihood that the nonmoving party will succeed is very low.[74] The disparity between the strength of the positions of the moving and nonmoving parties' must be so marked that the ultimate outcome of the dispute is obvious – the likelihood that a court will ultimately adopt the moving party's position is many times greater than the likelihood it will favor the nonmoving party's position.[75]

[137] I have stated before that[76] "the comparative strengths of the moving and nonmoving parties' positions need not be so disparate that the nonmoving party's prospects of success must be close to zero before summary judgment may be granted. If that was the law, the purpose of summary judgment would be frustrated".

[138] To be clear, the moving party does not have to establish that the likelihood the court will adopt its position at trial is close to 100 percent so that the outcome is beyond doubt.[77] The corollary of this proposition is that the nonmoving party may not survive a summary judgment motion by showing that its prospects of success are marginally better than extremely low.

[139] Most jurisdictions are prepared to deprive the nonmoving party of access to the full civil procedure spectrum only if the disparity between the strengths of the moving and nonmoving parties' positions is so great that the likelihood the moving party's position will prevail is very high – the ultimate trial disposition is obvious. This marked disparity element is produced by the employment of tests that ask if the nonmoving party's position is devoid of merit or if there is a genuine issue to be tried. If the nonmoving party's position is without merit, there is no genuine issues to be tried.[78] determined in a summary way only in the clearest of cases". Another High Court judgment delivers the identical message:[84] "The test to be applied has been expressed in various ways, but all ... are intended to describe a high degree of certainty about the ultimate outcome of the proceedings if it were allowed to go to trial in the ordinary way".

[145] The New Zealand High Court recently declared that summary judgment is appropriate if a court is "left without any real doubt or uncertainty"[85] about the frailities of the nonmoving party's position.

[146] The United States Supreme Court holds a similar view. In Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc.,[86] Justice White, writing for the Court, succinctly stated that summary judgment is appropriate if the case is "so one-sided that one party must prevail at trial as a matter of law". Justice Rehnquist, in Celotex Corp. v. Catrett,[87] noted that summary judgment may be granted to "dispose of factually unsupported claims or defences".

[147] This high summary judgment standard does not now and has never meant that the court has jettisoned the appropriate standard of proof in a civil case – the plaintiff must prove the facts that are essential under the applicable legal test on a balance of probabilities. No court hearing a summary judgment application and imposing a high threshold such as I favor has ever suggested that it is necessary to alter the rules of the game. There is only one standard of proof in Canada for civil proceedings – the claimant must prove the essential facts of its case on a balance of probabilities?[88] A high summary judgment standard simply means that a court should not award final judgment before trial unless it is satisfied, after taking into account incontrovertible facts and law, that the disparity between the strength of the moving and nonmoving parties' cases is so marked that the trial result is obvious. Summary judgment is the product of judicial prognostication of ultimate trial outcome based on incontrovertible facts and law.[89]

[148] It is also important to remember that summary judgment is not a trial.[90]

[149] The fact that courts grant interim or interlocutory injunctions without asking whether the moving party's position is more likely to succeed than the nonmoving party's position does not translate into a new level of persuasion in civil disputes.[91]

[150] Suppose that a sophisticated corporate client asks litigation counsel for an opinion on the likelihood of ultimate success in a proposed complex civil action. Counsel has estimated that legal fees will exceed $5 million. The client needs to know the prospects of success before making a final decision about suing a joint venture partner. Counsel informs the client that the likelihood a trial court will conclude that the client has proved the contested facts on a balance of probabilities is around 66⅔% – the client is twice as likely to succeed as the proposed defendant. The fact that the lawyer proffers an opinion as to the future trial disposition does not mean that the basic trial rules have changed. They obviously do not. The plaintiff cannot succeed unless it presents admissible evidence that allows the court to find that the plaintiff has proved the essential facts of its case on a balance of probabilities.

[151] A summary judgment applicant must satisfy the court that the facts and the law on which the applicant relies make it highly unlikely that the nonmoving party's position will prevail.

[152] An assessment of likely trial outcomes cannot be made unless the material facts are incontrovertible.[92]

[153] I will start with an example presented by Justice Brennan in Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc.[93] that does not warrant summary judgment because the material facts are in dispute:

> Imagine a suit for breach of contract. If ... the defendant moves for summary judgment and produces one purported eye witness who states that he was present at the time the parties discussed the possibility of an agreement, and unequivocally denies that the parties ever agreed to enter into a contact, while the plaintiff produces one purported eye witness who asserts that the parties did in fact come to terms, presumably that case would go to the jury.

Proper Cat Construction Ltd.*, 2013 ABQB 351, ¶ 68, 35 R.P.R. 5th 105, 133 ("if, in the promissory note example, B swore in an affidavit that she repaid A in accordance with the terms of the promissory note and produced a receipt signed by A, the motions court would be required to dismiss A's summary judgment application").

They proved that the defendants are the makers of the O'Hanlon and Waiward instruments and that they have not paid the sums due under them. The plaintiffs did not have to demand payment [of the promissory notes] before commencing these actions. The defendants are jointly and severally liable. ... The affidavit also claims that A signed a promissory note dated January 1, 2017 documenting the terms of the loan and that B has failed to repay A. B files no affidavit and does not cross-examine A.[95]

[156] A requirement of an incontrovertible factual foundation does not mean that the nonmoving party may effectively block a summary judgment order by denying, without any objective basis, the existence of an essential fact.[96] A court must carefully review the affidavit evidence in order to determine whether there exists a core set of indisputable facts. There may be agreements or letters that neither party denies were signed or delivered.[97] By comparing them with allegations not in accord with this core set of indisputable facts, an adjudicator may determine whether the likelihood the factual allegations of the moving party are sustainable is very high.[98] If the likelihood that the facts relied on by the moving party exist is very high, there is an incontrovertible factual foundation.

[157] Suppose that in the promissory note example B filed an affidavit stating that he repaid A the agreed-upon sum on December 31, 2017 and that A provided him with a receipt. B does not attach the receipt to his affidavit. A filed an affidavit of C, A and B's mother, in which she states that B sent her an email on December 30, 2017 stating that B owed A $1 million and had no money to repay A and asked her to pay A $1 million to extinguish B's debt to A, a request she denied. On cross-examination, B admits that he sent his mother the December 30, 2017 email and that she refused his request. B maintains his position that he has repaid the sum due but cannot present the receipt and refuses to say where he found the money to repay A.

[158] A court would not have any trouble concluding that there is an incontrovertible factual basis that supports A's application for summary judgment enforcing B's promissory note. It is undeniable that A lent B $1 million and that B signed a promissory note confirming the debt and his obligation to repay. Also indisputable is the existence of B's conversation with his mother and B's failure to produce a receipt. The likelihood that B repaid the $1 million he owes A is extremely low – somewhere around zero.

[159] 898294 Alberta Ltd. v. Riverside Quays Ltd. Partnership,[99] a very recent decision of this Court, illustrates the degree of scrutiny that is appropriate in assessing the presence of an incontrovertible factual foundation. Pursuant to an oral agreement, 898294 Alberta Ltd. lent Riverside Quays $183,750 with no particular repayment terms. Riverside Quays recorded its debt to 898294 Alberta Ltd. in its financial records and repaid 898294 Alberta Ltd. $10,699.66 in March 2009. 898294 Alberta Ltd. demanded repayment from Riverside Quay in 2015 and commenced an action seeking judgment for the outstanding debt. The plaintiff applied for summary judgment. The defendant argued that the debt the plaintiff sought to recover was payable to the Statesman Group of Companies Ltd. and relied on an affidavit filed by the chief financial officer of Statesman in an earlier proceeding in which he asserted that Riverside Quays' debt to Statesman included the sum 898294 Alberta lent to Riverside Quays. There was no objective support for this assertion. This Court responded as follows:[100]

> Nor is 898 bound by any evidence given by Kevin Ingalls on behalf of Statesman, no matter what his position with 898 was. It appears that in 2013 Mr. Ingalls was merely a shareholder of 898 along with dozens of other employees of Statesman and their spouses. He was also an officer and director of 898 but he did nothing which would bind the shareholders of 898.

[160] Composite Technologies Inc. v. Shawcor Ltd.[101] also warrants review. Shawcor and the other defendants successfully moved for summary judgment dismissing the plaintiffs' claims. One plaintiff, Proflex Pipe, had been struck off the corporate registry and its action was clearly a nullity. The defendants also successfully argued that Composite Technologies Inc. had sold its intellectual property in composite flexible pipe to Proflex Pipe before the purchaser was struck off the registry and had no property interest to protect. Both the chief executive officer and the vice-president finance of the two plaintiffs – the contracting parties to the technology transfer agreement on which the defendants relied – denied that Composite Technologies had given up its interest in the flexible composite pipe technology by signing the technology transfer agreement. This Court clearly rejected these assertions:[102]

> Taking into account… the text of the whole document, the purpose accounting for the technology transfer agreement and the business environment in which it would operate, we unhesitatingly conclude that Composite Technologies transferred to Proflex Pipe any interest it had in the issued and pending patents described in schedule A, any interest it may have in future patents relating to flexible composite pipe technology and any other proprietary information not protected by the issued or pending patents disclosed in schedule A… . This is a comprehensive sale on the part of Composite Technologies.
> There is no other plausible interpretation of the text.
>
> This inescapable interpretation of the technology transfer agreement, by itself, completely undermines the position of Composite Technologies.

b. Irrelevant Facts

[161] A contest regarding a fact that has no impact on the outcome of a summary judgment application is of no consequence.[103]

[162] In Can v. Calgary Police Service[104] this Court upheld the motion court's decision summarily dismissing the plaintiff's action against members of the Calgary Police Service for wrongful arrest, false imprisonment and negligent investigation. The plaintiff challenged the arrestor's claim that he relied on a particular piece of evidence before he made the decision to

3. A Summary Judgment Application May Be Delayed To Allow a Party To Question the Moving Summary Judgment Party if Denying the Right To Question Would Cause Unreasonable Litigation Prejudice

[163] As a general rule any application by the nonmoving summary judgment party to seek access to a part of the civil process that has not yet been utilized and has the effect of forestalling the adjudication of the summary judgment application should be dismissed.[106] Such an application introduces delay and additional costs and undermines the purpose of the summary judgment protocol.[107]

[164] For example, an order allowing the nonmoving summary judgment party to question the moving party may introduce considerable delay. The nonmoving party, once given the opportunity to question the moving party, has no incentive to expedite the discovery process. And if one side is given the right to question, the other may conclude that it should as well.

[165] But the value summary judgment represents in a modern civil procedure system – expeditious resolution of a dispute – does not justify abridgment of the civil process if the nonmoving summary judgment party can demonstrate that denying it access to a portion of the civil process would cause it unreasonable litigation prejudice.[108]

The purchase-and-sale agreement obliges B to work for B Co. doing X as an employee for not less than five years and for a stipulated ten-year period not to assist in any manner or have an interest in any business that competes with B Co.[112] B Co. does business worldwide. Shortly after A Co. has paid B, Texas customers of B Co. notify B Co. that a sales representative for D Co. has offered to do X. A Co. cannot immediately determine who owns D Co. It is convinced that B is the directing mind of D Co. A Co. confronts B. B falsely claims that he has never heard of D Co., that he has no interest in it and that he is not competing with B Co. B has used the money A Co. paid him to purchase property in Alberta, construct a large tool shop and order the special equipment needed to manufacture the tools necessary to do X. A Co. receives more reports from the field about D Co.'s appearance in the market. A Co. sues B and D Co. A Co. alleges that B has an interest in D Co. and is in breach of B's obligations under the purchase-sale agreement. B, convinced that A Co. cannot be aware of the full extent of his subterfuge, immediately applies for summary judgment falsely swearing in his affidavit that he has no interest in D Co. and is not competing with B Co. B Co. serves an appointment on B for questioning and B moves under r. 5.19 of the Alberta Rules of Court for a set-aside order. A Co. files an affidavit stating that B is the only person in the world who can do X; that D Co. is now offering to do X for customers of A Co. and that the deponent believes that B is the directing mind of D Co. This is an appropriate case to order questioning and, in effect, delay adjudication of B's summary judgment application.

[117] For some time the high cost of litigation and the delays associated with it have caused disputants to seek other forms of redress outside the public court system. They may turn to private mediation or arbitration. Or they may pursue expedited litigation alternatives that are components of a modern public civil process. The factors that make the traditional litigation model unattractive may be directly attributable to the increased level of complexity of actions. There is a direct correlation between the complexity of an action and its costs. The more complex a matter is the more time lawyers must devote to identify the issues and develop the best arguments to resolve these issues in the client's favor. Most lawyer's fees are a product of time spent on a client's file. Complex matters frequently require the retention of experts. Experts are usually expensive. In addition, complex actions make increased demands on a client's time. Clients must spend more time in discoveries and in the affidavit-drafting process. All of these factors have a cumulative impact on the time frame an action is a live file. See generally, Report of the Canadian Bar Association Task Force on Systems of Civil Justice 15-16 (1996). These factors no doubt contribute to the declining percentage that conventional trials represent as the ultimate method by which disputes are resolved. Professor Galanter reports that the "portion of [American] federal civil cases resolved by trial fell from 11.5 percent in 1962 to 1.8 percent in 2002, continuing a long historic decline. More startling was the 60 percent decline in the absolute number of trials since the mid 1980s. ... The phenomenon is not confined to the federal courts; there are comparable declines of trials, both civil and criminal, in the state courts, where the great majority of trials occur. ... Although virtually every other indicator of legal activity is rising, trials are declining not only in relation to cases in the courts but to the size of the population and the size of the economy". See also Twohig, Baar, Meyers & Predko, "Empirical Analyses of Civil Cases Commenced and Cases Tried in Toronto 1973-1994" in 1 Ontario Law Reform Commission, Rethinking Civil Justice: Research Studies for the Civil Justice Review 77, 127 (1996) (trials declined both in absolute and percentage terms as the method of resolution from 1973 to 1994). Justice Bouck provides some insights into why in British Columbia delay is a problem. Chu v. Chen, 22 C.P.C. 5th 73 (B.C. Sup. Ct. 2002). Some have argued that the summary judgment device has directly contributed to the declining rate at which trial dispositions resolve disputes in American federal courts. [172] To ensure that the benefits of summary judgment – "access to ... affordable, timely and just adjudication of claims"[122] – were enjoyed, the Supreme Court directed courts to interpret summary judgment rules liberally.[123]

[173] The endorsement of summary judgment by the world's major common law jurisdictions makes sense. There are disputes that can be justly resolved without allocating to them the full array of the civil process. Parties to some disputes do not stand to derive a legitimate legal advantage from the time and expense associated with extensive discovery and trial processes. Delay does not qualify as a legitimate legal advantage. A debtor who has derived the benefits a promissory note represents but has not discharged his or her obligations under it for the simple reason that he or she is impecunious and has no defence to a claim for enforcement of the promissory note is a litigant who would derive no legitimate legal advantage from having access to the full panoply of the civil process.[124] On the other hand a party who has been victimized by an unscrupulous defendant who has destroyed and fraudulently created documents and camouflaged contract-breaking acts would undoubtedly derive a legitimate legal advantage from fully exploiting the benefits associated with discovery and trial cross-examination. Denying such a victim access to these important tools would accord a rogue defendant an unconscionable assist.

("Under r. 24.2, the court now has a very salutary power, both to be exercised in a claimant's favour or, where appropriate, in a defendant's favour. It enables the court to dispose summarily of both claims or defences which have no real prospect of being successful. ... [Summary judgment] saves expense; it achieves expedition; it avoids the court's resources being used up on cases where this serves no purpose").Lord Woolf referred to the new civil procedure era as a "change in culture". *Arbuthnot Latham Bank Ltd. v. [123] 2014 SCC 7, ¶ 5, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 87, 93. This direction is consistent with s. 10 of the Interpretation Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. I-8 ("An enactment shall be construed as being remedial, and shall be given the fair, large and liberal construction and interpretation that best assures the attainment of its objects") and r. 1.2(2)(b) of the Alberta Rules of Court, Alta. Royal Bank of Canada*, 2017 ONCA 956, ¶ 4 (the Court dismissed a debtor's appeal against a summary judgment order granted in the creditor bank's favour noting that "[i]n oral submissions the appellant acknowledged that he owed the principal amounts claimed under the debt instruments").

[174] This linkage between the characteristics of the dispute and the aspects of the civil process allocated to resolve it is a form of proportionality that appears in many walks of life. For example, health-care providers know that a patient who has a cold does not need to see an ear, nose and throat specialist. Someone with less training can tell the patient to rest and drink lots of water. It is poor management to assign a specialist tasks that other members of the health-care team with different skills could also perform and, as a consequence, to deprive other patients who would benefit only from the specialist's attention. And health-care providers know that a patient who presents with life-threatening burns requires a specialist's attention. In short, health-care providers attempt to align the skill sets of the health-care team with a patient's condition to optimize the use of everyone's training and skills without jeopardizing the patient's interests.

[175] The Supreme Court's strong endorsement of the merits of summary judgment squares with the commitment of Alberta courts to resolve disputes in the least amount of time practicable and at the lowest possible cost[125] and the direction that they do so in r. 1.2(2)(b) of the Alberta Rules of Court.[126] Alberta courts are cheerleaders for summary judgment and expedited dispute resolution generally.[127]

[176] As noted above, Justice Brown, now of the Supreme Court of Canada, gave his imprimatur to the summary judgment principles that this opinion champions.[128]

[177] Noteworthy is his and my conclusion[129] that Hryniak v. Mauldin does not have any effect on the summary judgment test in force in Alberta before the Supreme Court released Hryniak v. Mauldin.

[178] Hryniak v. Mauldin has caused some of my colleagues to reject the world view on the summary judgment standard and to embrace a new less onerous standard that encourages judges to resolve disputes if they are satisfied that the moving party has proved its case on a balance of probabilities and that it is fair and just to decide the case summarily.

[179] I will explain in the next section why this Court must be faithful to the text of r. 7.3 of the Alberta Rules of Court and give the rule its plain and ordinary meaning as Alberta courts did before Hryniak v. Mauldin.[130]

D. Hryniak v. Mauldin Has Not Altered the Text of Rule 7.3 of the Alberta Rules of Court, the Foundational Rules or the Interpretation Act

[180] While Hryniak v. Mauldin is indisputably an important decision, it is not a Swiss Army knife capable of almost anything. A Supreme Court of Canada judgment cannot amend the text of a constitutional statute or a rule of court and ignore the obvious meaning of a statute or a rule of court.

[181] This assertion is easy to illustrate.

[182] Suppose that Alberta's court rules bestowed the right to apply for summary judgment only on a plaintiff claiming to enforce a promissory note. Indeed, a defendant could not apply for summary judgment in Alberta until June 19, 1986.[131]

[183] The Supreme Court's enthusiastic support for summary judgment would not allow an Alberta court to grant summary judgment to a defendant even though the defendant had an iron-clad defence – the defendant paid the promissory note and has a receipt from the plaintiff witnessed by a priest and the plaintiff's mother, all of which is captured on video tape. If the court rules preclude granting a defendant summary judgment, a court cannot ignore the plain text. Nor could the plaintiff in a wrongful dismissal action secure from an Alberta court summary judgment. This is so regardless of the strength of the plaintiff's case. The assumed rule gives a court jurisdiction to grant summary judgment only if the plaintiff sues on a promissory note.

[184] Hryniak v. Mauldin has not altered the text of r. 7.3 or r. 1.2(2)(b) of the Alberta Rules of Court[132] or Alberta's Interpretation Act.[133] Nothing in Hryniak v. Mauldin changed in any way the remedial interpretation focus.

[185] There is no valid reason to interpret r. 7.3 in a manner different from that accorded it by many panels of this Court before the publication of Hryniak v. Mauldin.[134]

[186] Rule 20 of Ontario's Rules of Civil Procedure is fundamentally different from Alberta's r. 7.3.[135] A cursory reading of the two rules reveals this. The Supreme Court's interpretation of r. 20 could not affect Alberta's r. 7.3.

[187] The governing statutory principles are straightforward.

[188] First, a court must read the entire statute.[136] It must give the text[137] its ordinary meaning.[138] A court may never give text a meaning it cannot support.[139] "Words must not be given meanings they cannot possibly bear".[140]

[189] This initial reading plays a pivotal role. First, it may disclose the purpose or purposes the enactment pursues. Second, it identifies the potential plausible meanings of the contested provision.

[190] If this process discloses only one plausible or permissible meaning the interpretation inquiry ends.[141] In this scenario, there is no need to factor in the effect of the purpose of the text.

Suppose that an enactment entitled the Railway Workers' Safety Enhancement Act declares that freight and passenger cars must be equipped with automatic couplers that eliminate the need for railway workers to manually connect freight and passenger cars. A court applying generally accepted statutory interpretation principles could not declare that locomotives must be equipped with automatic couplers just because this declaration would make a railway workers' job considerably safer. A locomotive is not a freight or a passenger car. Purpose does not trump text.[142] Courts that are oblivious to this fundamental tenet of our legal system undermine the rule of law.[143] This is a cardinal judicial sin.

[195] Both of the world's leading English language dictionaries – The Oxford English Dictionary[146] and Webster's Third New International Dictionary of the English Language[147] – state that "no" as an adjective means "not any". Webster's gives these illustrations: "< let there be ~ strife between you and me ... > < and ~ birds sing ... > < with ~ dancing in the streets or ritual bonfires ... >". Here are some of the examples Oxford offers: "England had never no thoughts of securing this Right of the Flag by a formal Treaty ... There was no evidence that Nunney had authority to arrest".

[196] Webster's also asserts that "no" as an adjective may mean "hardly any" or "very little".

[197] Given that the adjective "no" may mean "hardly any" or "very little" merit, at what point does the strength of the nonmoving party' case preclude a court from granting the moving party summary judgment?

[198] The answer to this question must take into account the foundational rules of the Alberta Rules of Court, the remedial nature of legislation, as declared by the Interpretation Act,[148] and the governing case law that discusses the foundational rules and the importance of matching the features of a dispute with an appropriate dispute-resolution methodology.

[199] Insisting that summary judgment may be granted only if the nonmoving party's position is devoid of merit – it is hopeless and cannot possibly succeed – would diminish the value of summary judgment as an effective protocol in the Part 7 suite of expeditious dispute resolution mechanisms and would frustrate the goal of matching disputes with a resolution process that offers only the features that are needed to fairly and expeditiously determine the dispute at the least possible public and private cost.

[200] The better view, and the one adopted by panels of this Court on many occasions, is that summary judgment is appropriate if the disparity between the strength of the moving and nonmoving parties' position is so marked that the likelihood the court will adopt the moving party's position is very high – the outcome is obvious. In other words, a court may grant summary judgment even if it cannot be said that the nonmoving party's position is completely devoid of merit – the little merit it has does not deny the inevitability of an outcome adverse to the interests of the nonmoving party.

[201] This standard increases considerably the utility of the summary judgment protocol. It allows an adjudicator to resolve disputes the outcomes of which are obvious and that would not warrant making available to them the full spectrum of the civil trial process. It properly balances the legitimate interests of the litigants and the community's desire to allocate no more

E. Hryniak v. Mauldin Is of Limited Precedential Value in Alberta

[202] Hryniak v. Mauldin interprets r. 20 of Ontario's Rules of Civil Procedure.[149] Rule 20 allows an Ontario court to hear oral evidence and resolve credibility contests in the course of resolving a summary judgment application.

[149] R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194. Rule 20 reads, in part, as follows:

> 20.01 (1) A plaintiff may, after the defendant has delivered a statement of defence or served a notice of motion, move with supporting affidavit material or other evidence for summary judgment on all or part of the claim in the statement of claim.
>
> (3) A defendant may, after delivering a statement of defence, move with supporting affidavit material or other evidence for summary judgment dismissing all or part of the claim in the statement of claim.
>
> . . .
>
> 20.04(2) The court shall grant summary judgment if,
>
> (a) the court is satisfied that there is no genuine issue requiring a trial with respect to a claim or defence; or
> (b) the parties agree to have all or part of the claim determined by a summary judgment and the court is satisfied that it is appropriate to grant summary judgment.
> (2.1) In determining under clause (2)(a) whether there is a genuine issue requiring a trial, the court shall consider the evidence submitted by the parties and, if the determination is being made by a judge, the judge may exercise any of the following powers for the purpose, unless it is in the interest of justice for such powers to be exercised only at a trial:
>
> 1. Weighing the evidence.
>
> 2. Evaluating the credibility of a deponent.
>
> 3. Drawing any reasonable inference from the evidence.
> (2.2) A judge may, for the purposes of exercising any of the powers set out in subrule (2.1), order that oral evidence be presented by one or more parties, with or without time limits on its presentation.

[203] Rule 20 is not a summary judgment provision. It allows a court to hear oral evidence. Rule 20, in essence, is a summary trial rule. Justice Brown said precisely this in Orr v. Fort McKay First Nation:[150] "Ontario's Rule 20.04(2.1) provides for a process that is broadly comparable to an application under Alberta's civil procedure ... for judgment by way of summary trial under Rule 7.5".

[204] I made the same point in my concurring opinion in Can v. Calgary Police Service:[151]

> Presumably Ontario welded these additional fact-finding features onto its summary judgment model because summary trial is not part of Ontario's expedited dispute resolution procedures. ... The conditions which prompted Ontario to marry two distinct concepts do not exist in Alberta. ...
>
> [A] r. 7.3 summary judgment application is not an expedited dispute resolution protocol that has to be distorted to resolve disputes in less time and cost than a trial would necessitate. Part 7 of the Alberta Rules of Court introduces two other discrete models – trial of an issue and summary trial – that were created for that purpose. The trial of an issue and summary trial options may be more suitable than summary judgment in some fact patterns. But the point is this: their existence eliminates the need to convert Alberta's summary judgment vehicle into the hybrid model Ontario's rule makers built.
> The wisdom of converting a protocol designed to remove disputes from the active file list because the nonmoving party's position is without merit into one which resolves legitimate issues – both the moving and nonmoving parties' positions have merit – is not clear. Other components of the Part 7 suite of expedited dispute resolution tools are available to resolve disputes the outcomes of which are not obvious.

[205] For jurisdictions with true summary judgment rules like Alberta's, the precedential value of Hryniak v. Mauldin is limited to its endorsement of public alternative dispute resolution procedures.[152] I strongly stated this view before:[153]

> The fact that the Supreme Court declared in Hryniak v. Mauldin ... that its positive evaluation of expedited dispute resolution mechanisms is of 'general application' does not mean that Alberta's robust Part 7 suite of 'rocket docket' provisions is in any respect deficient. ... Hryniak v. Mauldin does not, in any way, support the notion that the existing principles which govern Alberta's summary judgment rule need to be revised.
> There is no need to revisit either the purpose or the principles used to implement the summary judgment rule. Rule 7.3 and its predecessors have been in place since 1914.

[206] There is a settled understanding of the rule's purpose and principles. And these are entirely in accord with the values endorsed by Hryniak v. Mauldin.

F. Part 7 of the Alberta Rules of Court Presents a Suite of Complementary Expedited Dispute Resolution Protocols

[207] Insisting that summary judgment may be granted only if the ultimate disposition of a dispute is obvious does not diminish in any way the ability of the Court of Queen's Bench to resolve in an expeditious manner disputes the outcomes of which are not obvious[154] but are otherwise ripe for adjudication.

[210] There is no reason to apply the summary judgment protocol when a matter is best adjudged by hearing oral evidence.

[211] Lord Woolf, M.R. made this point in Swain v. Hillman:[158]

> Useful though the [summary judgment] power … is, it is important that it is kept to its proper role. It is not meant to dispense with the need for a trial where there are issues which should be investigated at the trial. … [T]he proper disposal of an issue under [the summary judgment part] does not involve the judge conducting a mini trial, that is not the object of the provisions; it is to enable cases, where there is no real prospect of success either way, to be disposed of summarily.

[212] A summary trial or a determination of an issue may be appropriate if a dispute has features that promote a just resolution without accessing all aspects of the trial protocol – no need for questioning, for example. A dispute may largely turn on the resolution of a credibility issue[159] or simply require the application of a known legal standard to an agreed fact pattern, the outcome of which is not obvious.[160] Sometimes a final disposition is the most important

[213] Valard Construction Ltd. v. Bird Construction Co.[162] illustrates the effective use of r. 7.5. G. Purolator's Position Is So Strong and Weir-Jones Technical's So Weak that the Ultimate Outcome of this Action Is Obvious

[214] Purolator defended, in part, on the ground that Weir-Jones Technical commenced its lawsuit after the two-year limitation period under the Limitations Act[164] expired.

[215] Its position is very strong. In letters dated November 3, 2008 and February 24, 2009 Weir-Jones Technical confirms that it had come to the conclusion that Purolator's conduct contravened its legal obligations to Weir-Jones Technical. In a November 3, 2008 letter to Purolator Weir-Jones Technical asserted that Purolator had "intentionally and fraudulently misrepresented Purolator's intentions." A May 11, 2009 letter from Weir-Jones Technical to Purolator's in-house counsel recorded Weir-Jones Technical's intention to sue Purolator for "all matters that do not fall under the terms of the Collective Agreement".

[216] It is beyond doubt that the two-year period under the Limitations Act commenced sometime between November 3, 2008 and February 29, 2009. Indeed, an overwhelming case can be made for a November 3, 2008 start date. By that date Weir-Jones Technical was not only aware of Purolator's failure to assign a line-haul route to it but had characterized this omission as intentional and a fraudulent misrepresentation.

[217] Justice Shelley correctly concluded that "[t]he evidence … clearly establishes that … [Weir-Jones Technical] was aware of the alleged breaches by … [Purolator] long before it filed its Statement of Claim on July 2011."[165]

[218] Weir-Jones Technical should have filed its claim before November 3, 2010 or at the latest February 29, 2011. It filed its claim on July 22, 2011 – somewhere between four and eight months late.

[219] Weir-Jones Technical's argument that the grievance delayed the start of the two-year Limitations Act period has no merit whatsoever. The grievance related to claims under the Teamsters-Purolator collective agreement and the lawsuit related to claims that were not covered by the collective agreement.[166] Weir-Jones Technical understood this distinction from the outset. Its May 11, 2009 letter to Purolator's in-house counsel expressly stated that Weir-Jones Technical intended to sue Purolator for "all matters which do not fall under the terms of the Collective Agreement."

[220] The fact that the Teamsters expressed a willingness to help resolve differences Weir-Jones Technical had with Purolator outside the collective agreement is entirely irrelevant. Suppose that a mutual friend of the guiding minds of Purolator and Weir-Jones Technical had offered to mediate. This would be of no consequence. Of vital importance is when Weir-Jones Technical became aware of the facts that caused it to conclude that Purolator had breached its contractual obligations to it and that an action against Purolator was warranted.

[222] So were her decisions to reject Weir-Jones Technical's standstill agreement and promissory estoppel arguments.[168] They were completely unfounded. A joint wish to resolve Damages — Quantum — Contracts — Breach — Performance — Non-renewal provision — Duty of good faith — Duty of honest performance — Agreement governing relationship between company and retail dealer providing for automatic contract renewal at end of three-year term unless parties giving six months' written notice to contrary — Company deciding not to renew dealership agreement — Retail dealer lost value of business and majority of sales agents solicited by competitor agency — Retail dealer suing company and competitor agency — What is appropriate measure of damages.

C markets education savings plans to investors through retail dealers, known as enrollment directors, such as B. An enrollment director's agreement that took effect in 1998 governed the relationship between C and B. The term of the contract was three years. The applicable provision provided that the contract would automatically renew at the end of the three-year term unless one of the parties gave six months' written notice to the contrary.

H was another enrollment director and was a competitor of B. H wanted to capture B's lucrative niche market and previously approached B to propose a merger of their agencies on numerous occasions. He also actively encouraged C to force the merger. B had refused to participate in such a merger. C appointed H as the provincial trading officer ("PTO") to review its enrollment directors for compliance with securities laws after the Alberta Securities Commission raised concerns about compliance issues among C's enrollment directors. The role required H to conduct audits of C's enrollment directors. B objected to having H, a competitor, review his confidential business records.

During C's discussions with the Commission about compliance, it was clear that C was considering a restructuring of its agencies in Alberta that involved B. In June 2000, C outlined its plans to the Commission and they included B working for H's agency. None of this was known by B. C repeatedly misled B by telling him that H, as PTO, was under an obligation to treat the information confidentially. It also responded equivocally when B asked in August 2000 whether the merger was a "done deal". When B continued to refuse to allow H to audit his records, C threatened to terminate the 1998 Agreement and in May 2001 gave notice of non-renewal under the Agreement. At the expiry of the contract term, B lost the value in his business in his assembled workforce. The majority of his sales agents were successfully solicited by H's agency.

B sued C and H. The trial judge found C was in breach of the implied term of good faith, H had intentionally induced breach of contract, and both C and H were liable for civil conspiracy. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and dismissed B's lawsuit.

Held: The appeal with respect to C should be allowed and the appeal with respect to H dismissed. The trial judge's assessment of damages should be varied to $87,000 plus interest.

Canadian common law in relation to good faith performance of contracts is piecemeal, unsettled and unclear. Two incremental steps are in order to make the common law more coherent and more just. The first step is to acknowledge that good faith contractual performance is a general organizing principle of the common law of contract which underpins and informs the various rules in which the common law, in various situations and types of relationships, recognizes obligations of good faith contractual performance. The second step is to recognize, as a further manifestation of this organizing principle of good faith, that there is a common law duty which applies to all contracts to act honestly in the performance of contractual obligations. Taking these two steps will put in place a duty that is just, that accords with the reasonable expectations of commercial parties and that is sufficiently precise that it will enhance rather than detract from commercial certainty.

There is an organizing principle of good faith that parties generally must perform their contractual duties honestly and reasonably and not capriciously or arbitrarily. An organizing principle states in general terms a requirement of justice from which more specific legal doctrines may be derived. An organizing principle therefore is not a free-standing rule, but rather a standard that underpins and is manifested in more specific legal doctrines and may be given different weight in different situations. It is a standard that helps to understand and develop the law in a coherent and principled way.

The organizing principle of good faith exemplifies the notion that, in carrying out his or her own performance of the contract, a contracting party should have appropriate regard to the legitimate contractual interests of the contracting partner. While "appropriate regard" for the other party's interests will vary depending on the context of the contractual relationship, it does not require acting to serve those interests in all cases. It merely requires that a party not seek to undermine those interests in bad faith. This general principle has strong conceptual differences from the much higher obligations of a fiduciary. Unlike fiduciary duties, good faith performance does not engage duties of loyalty to the other contracting party or a duty to put the interests of the other contracting party first.

This organizing principle of good faith manifests itself through the existing doctrines about the types of situations and relationships in which the law requires, in certain respects, honest, candid, forthright or reasonable contractual performance. Generally, claims of good faith will not succeed if they do not fall within these existing doctrines. However, this list is not closed. The application of the organizing principle of good faith to particular situations should be developed where the existing law is found to be wanting and where the development may occur incrementally in a way that is consistent with the structure of the common law of contract and gives due weight to the importance of private ordering and certainty in commercial affairs.

The approach of recognizing an overarching organizing principle but accepting the existing law as the primary guide to future development is appropriate in the development of the doctrine of good faith. Good faith may be invoked in widely varying contexts and this calls for a highly context-specific understanding of what honesty and reasonableness in performance require so as to give appropriate consideration to the legitimate interests of both contracting parties.

The principle of good faith must be applied in a manner that is consistent with the fundamental commitments of the common law of contract which generally places great weight on the freedom of contracting parties to pursue their individual self-interest. In commerce, a party may sometimes cause loss to another — even intentionally — in the legitimate pursuit of economic self-interest. Doing so is not necessarily contrary to good faith and in some cases has actually been encouraged by the courts on the basis of economic efficiency. The development of the principle of good faith must be clear not to veer into a form of ad hoc judicial moralism or "palm tree" justice. In particular, the organizing principle of good faith should not be used as a pretext for scrutinizing the motives of contracting parties.

The objection to C's conduct in this case does not fit within any of the existing situations or relationships in which duties of good faith have been found to exist. It is appropriate to recognize a new common law duty that applies to all contracts as a manifestation of the general organizing principle of good faith: a duty of honest performance, which requires the parties to be honest with each other in relation to the performance of their contractual obligations.

Under this new general duty of honesty in contractual performance, parties must not lie or otherwise knowingly mislead each other about matters directly linked to the performance of the contract. This does not impose a duty of loyalty or of disclosure or require a party to forego advantages flowing from the contract; it is a simple requirement not to lie or mislead the other party about one's contractual performance. Recognizing a duty of honest performance flowing directly from the common law organizing principle of good faith is a modest, incremental step.

This new duty of honest performance is a general doctrine of contract law that imposes as a contractual duty a minimum standard of honesty in contractual performance. It operates irrespective of the intentions of the parties, and is to this extent analogous to equitable doctrines which impose limits on the freedom of contract, such as the doctrine of unconscionability. However, the precise content of honest performance will vary with context and the parties should be free in some contexts to relax the requirements of the doctrine so long as they respect its minimum core requirements.

The duty of honest performance should not be confused with a duty of disclosure or of fiduciary loyalty. A party to a contract has no general duty to subordinate his or her interest to that of the other party. However, contracting parties must be able to rely on a minimum standard of honesty from their contracting partner in relation to performing the contract as a reassurance that if the contract does not work out, they will have a fair opportunity to protect their interests.

In this case, the trial judge did not make a reversible error by adjudicating the issue of good faith. C breached the 1998 Agreement when it failed to act honestly with B in exercising the non-renewal clause. The trial judge concluded that C acted dishonestly with B throughout the period leading up to its exercise of the non-renewal clause, both with respect to its own intentions and with respect to H's role as PTO. The trial judge's detailed findings amply support this overall conclusion.

C is liable for damages calculated on the basis of what B's economic position would have been had C fulfilled its duty. While the trial judge did not assess damages on that basis given the different findings in relation to liability, the trial judge made findings that permit this Court to do so. These findings permit damages to be assessed on the basis that if C had performed the contract honestly, B would have been able to retain the value of his business rather than see it, in effect, expropriated and turned over to H. It is clear from the findings of the trial judge and from the record that the value of the business around the time of non-renewal was $87,000. B is entitled to damages in the amount of $87,000. The Court of Appeal was correct in finding that there could be no liability for inducing breach of contract or unlawful means conspiracy. As such, it follows that the claims against H were rightly dismissed.

CROMWELL J. —

I. Introduction

[1] The key issues on this appeal come down to two straightforward questions: Does Canadian common law impose a duty on parties to perform their contractual obligations honestly? And, if so, did either of the respondents breach that duty? I would answer both questions in the affirmative. Finding that there is a duty to perform contracts honestly will make the law more certain, more just and more in tune with reasonable commercial expectations. It will also bring a measure of justice to the appellant, Mr. Bhasin, who was misled and lost the value of his business as a result.

II. Facts and Judicial History

Overview and Issues

[2] The appellant, Mr. Bhasin, through his business Bhasin & Associates, was an enrollment director for Canadian American Financial Corp. ("Can-Am") beginning in 1989. The relationship between Mr. Bhasin and Can-Am soured in 1999 and ultimately Can-Am decided not to renew the dealership agreement with him. The litigation leading to this appeal ensued.

[3] Can-Am markets education savings plans ("ESPs") to investors through retail dealers, known as enrollment directors, such as Mr. Bhasin. It pays the enrollment directors compensation and bonuses for selling ESPs. The enrollment directors are in effect small business owners and the success of their businesses depends on them building a sales force. It took Mr. Bhasin approximately 10 years to build his sales force, but his business thrived and Can-Am gave him numerous awards and prizes recognizing him as one of their top enrollment directors in Canada: 2011 ABQB 637, 526 A.R. 1, at paras. 51, 238 and 474.

[4] An enrollment director's agreement that took effect in 1998 governed the relationship between Can-Am and Mr. Bhasin. (That Agreement replaced a previous agreement of an indefinite term that had governed their relationship since the outset in 1989.) The Agreement was a commercial dealership agreement, not a franchise agreement. There was no franchise fee and it was not covered by the statutory duty of fair dealing such as that provided for in s. 7 of the Franchises Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. F-23.

[5] That said, there were some features of the 1998 Agreement that are similar to provisions typically found in franchise agreements. Mr. Bhasin was obliged to sell Can-Am investment products exclusively and owed it a fiduciary duty. Can-Am owned the client lists, was responsible for branding and implemented central policies that applied to all enrollment directors: see cls. 4.1, 5.2, 5.3 and 4.7. Mr.

Bhasin could not sell, transfer, or merge his operation without Can-Am's consent, which was not to be withheld unreasonably: see cls. 4.5 and 11.4.

[6] The term of the contract was three years. Clauses 8.3 and 8.4 allowed termination on short notice for misconduct or other cause. Clause 3.3 — the provision at the centre of this case — provided that the contract would automatically renew at the end of the three-year term unless one of the parties gave six months' written notice to the contrary.

[7] Mr. Hrynew, one of the respondents and another enrollment director, was a competitor of Mr. Bhasin and there was considerable animosity between them: trial reasons, at para. 461. The trial judge found, in effect, that Mr. Hrynew pressured Can-Am not to renew its Agreement with Mr. Bhasin and that Can-Am dealt dishonestly with Mr. Bhasin and ultimately gave in to that pressure.

[8] When Mr. Hrynew moved his agency to Can-Am from one of its competitors many years before the events in question, Can-Am promised him that he would be given consideration for mergers that would take place and he in fact merged with other agencies in Calgary after joining Can-Am: trial reasons, at para. 238. He was in a strong position with Can-Am because he had the largest agency in Alberta and a good working relationship with the Alberta Securities Commission, which regulated Can-Am's business: para. 284.

[9] Mr. Hrynew wanted to capture Mr. Bhasin's lucrative niche market around which he had built his business: trial reasons, at para. 303. Mr. Hrynew personally approached Mr. Bhasin to propose a merger of their agencies on numerous occasions: para. 238. He also actively encouraged Can-Am to force the merger and made "veiled threats" that he would leave if no merger took place: para. 282; see also paras. 251 and 287. The trial judge found that the proposed "merger" was in effect a hostile takeover of Mr. Bhasin's agency by Mr. Hrynew: para. 240. Mr. Bhasin steadfastly refused to participate in such a merger: para. 247.

[10] The Alberta Securities Commission raised concerns about compliance issues among Can-Am's enrollment directors. In late 1999, the Commission required Can-Am to appoint a single provincial trading officer ("PTO") to review its enrollment directors for compliance with securities laws: trial reasons, at paras. 149, 152 and 160. Can-Am appointed Mr. Hrynew to that position in September of that year. The role required him to conduct audits of Can-Am's enrollment directors. Mr. Bhasin and Mr. Hon, another enrollment director, objected to having Mr. Hrynew, a competitor, review their confidential business records: paras. 189-96.

[11] Can-Am became worried that the Commission might revoke its licence and, in 1999 and 2000, it had many discussions with the Commission about compliance. During those discussions, it was clear that Can-Am was considering a restructuring of its agencies in Alberta that involved Mr. Bhasin. In June 2000, Can-Am outlined its plans to the Commission and they included Mr. Bhasin working for

Mr. Hrynew's agency. The trial judge found that this plan had been formulated before June 2000: para. 256. None of this was known by Mr. Bhasin: paras. 243-46.

[12] In fact, Can-Am repeatedly misled Mr. Bhasin by telling him that Mr. Hrynew, as PTO, was under an obligation to treat the information confidentially and that the Commission had rejected a proposal to have an outside PTO, neither of which was true: trial reasons, at para. 195. It also responded equivocally when Mr. Bhasin asked in August 2000 whether the merger was a "done deal": para. 247. When Mr. Bhasin continued to refuse to allow Mr. Hrynew to audit his records, Can-Am threatened to terminate the 1998 Agreement and in May 2001 gave notice of non-renewal under the Agreement: paras. 207-11.

[13] At the expiry of the contract term, Mr. Bhasin lost the value in his business in his assembled workforce. The majority of his sales agents were successfully solicited by Mr. Hrynew's agency. Mr. Bhasin was obliged to take less remunerative work with one of Can-Am's competitors.

[14] Mr. Bhasin sued Can-Am and Mr. Hrynew. Moen J. in the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench found that it was an implied term of the contract that decisions about whether to renew the contract would be made in good faith. The court held that the corporate respondent was in breach of the implied term of good faith, that Mr. Hrynew had intentionally induced breach of contract, and that the respondents were liable for civil conspiracy.

[15] The trial judge found that Can-Am acted dishonestly with Mr. Bhasin throughout the events leading up to the non-renewal: it misled him about its intentions with respect to the merger and about the fact that it had already proposed the new structure to the Commission; it did not communicate to him that the decision was already made and final, even though he asked; and it did not communicate with him that it was working closely with Mr. Hrynew to bring about a new corporate structure with Hrynew's being the main agency in Alberta. The trial judge also found that, had Can-Am acted honestly, Mr. Bhasin could have "governed himself accordingly so as to retain the value in his agency": para. 258.

[16] The Alberta Court of Appeal allowed the respondents' appeal and dismissed Mr. Bhasin's lawsuit. The court found his pleadings to be insufficient and held that the lower court erred by implying a term of good faith in the context of an unambiguous contract containing an entire agreement clause: 2013 ABCA 98, 84 Alta. L.R. (5th) 68.

[17] The appeal raises four issues:

(a) Did Mr. Bhasin properly plead breach of the duty of good faith?

(b) Did Can-Am owe Mr. Bhasin a duty of good faith? If so, did it breach that duty?

2014 SCC 71 (CanLII)

(c) Are the respondents liable for the torts of inducing breach of contract or civil conspiracy?

(d) If there was a breach, what is the appropriate measure of damages?

III. Analysis

A. Did Mr. Bhasin Properly Plead Breach of the Duty of Good Faith?

[18] The Court of Appeal held that Mr. Bhasin had not properly pleaded the good faith issue and that the trial judge had therefore erred in considering it. Mr. Bhasin contests this conclusion, while the respondents support it. I agree with Mr. Bhasin.

[19] The allegations in the statement of claim clearly put the questions of improper purpose and dishonesty in issue. These facts are sufficient to put Can-Am's good faith in issue. The question of whether this conduct amounted to a breach of the duty of good faith is a legal conclusion that did not need to be pleaded separately. The defendants did not move to strike the pleadings or seek particulars of the allegation of wrongful termination in the statement of claim. Good faith was a live issue that was fully canvassed in a lengthy trial: A.F., at paras. 92-94. Written submissions by both parties at trial referred to the good faith issue and, even in his opening at trial, Mr. Bhasin's counsel raised the issue of good faith.

[20] The trial judge held that any deficiency in the pleadings did not cause prejudice to the respondents: paras. 23 and 48. This is an assessment she was uniquely positioned to make and her conclusion ought to be treated with deference on appeal. The good faith issue was fully argued in and addressed by the Court of Appeal and has been fully argued on the merits in this Court.

[21] In my view, the trial judge did not make a reversible error by adjudicating the issue of good faith and we should address the merits of that issue.

B. Did Can-Am Owe Mr. Bhasin a Duty of Good Faith?

(1) Decisions and Positions of the Parties

(a) Decisions

[22] The trial judge accepted Mr. Bhasin's position that there was a duty of good faith in this case and that it had been breached. In brief, her reasoning was as follows.

[23] First, the trial judge decided that the 1998 Agreement was a type of agreement which as a matter of law requires good faith performance. She recognized that the 1998 Agreement did not fall within any of the existing categories of contract, such as employment, insurance and franchise agreements, which have been held to require good faith performance. She concluded, however, that the Agreement was analogous to a franchise or employment contract, and so by analogy to these cases, she implied a term of good faith performance as a matter of law. The contract was not balanced from its inception and the relationship placed the enrollment director in a position of inherent and predictable vulnerability: paras. 67-86.

[24] Second, and in the alternative, the trial judge held that a term of good faith performance should be implied based on the intentions of the parties in order to give business efficacy to the agreement. She concluded that "[w]hen one considers the whole of the relationship . . . it is clear that the parties had to operate in good faith and there was a requirement of fairness between them. In other words, good faith was necessary to give business efficacy to the whole 1998 Agreement": para. 101.

[25] The 1998 Agreement contained an "entire agreement clause" stating that there were no "agreements, express, implied or statutory, other than expressly set out" in it: cl. 11.2. The trial judge held, however, that this clause did not preclude the implication of a duty of good faith. The parties, she reasoned, cannot rely on exclusion clauses to avoid contractual obligations where there is an imbalance of power, and courts refuse to let parties shelter under entire agreement clauses where it would be unjust or inequitable to do so: paras. 116-18.

[26] Turning to the issue of breach, the trial judge found that Can-Am had breached the agreement, first by requiring Mr. Bhasin to submit to an audit by Mr. Hrynew and to provide the latter with access to his business records, and second by exercising the non-renewal clause in a dishonest and misleading manner and for an improper purpose. The non-renewal clause was not intended to permit Can-Am to force a merger of the Bhasin and Hrynew agencies, but that was the purpose for which Can-Am exercised this power: para. 261. The trial judge also found both respondents liable for unlawful means conspiracy and found Mr. Hrynew liable for inducing Can-Am's breach of its contract with Mr. Bhasin.

[27] The Court of Appeal reversed and held that there had been no breach of contract. The duty of good faith in employment contracts could not be extended by analogy to other types of contract. In any event, the duty of good faith in the employment context is limited to the manner of termination and does not include reasons for non-renewal: C.A. reasons, at paras. 27 and 31. Nor was this a circumstance in which a term could be implied because it was so obvious it was not thought necessary to mention or was necessary to make the contract work: para. 32. Even if there were an implied duty of good faith in this case, the impugned conduct concerned the non-renewal of a contract, which occurs on expiry, unlike a termination clause: para. 31.

[28] Moreover, the Court of Appeal held that a term cannot be implied where it goes against an express term of the contract. Here, the parties did not intend a perpetual contract, since they included a term allowing either party to unilaterally trigger its expiration prior to the end of each three-year term. The trial judge's approach was inconsistent with the non-renewal provision of the contract. The motive for triggering expiration was not restricted under the Agreement. The implication of a term of good faith also violated the entire agreement clause. The court held that the evidence of assurances given by Can-Am as to how the non-renewal power would be exercised fell afoul of the parol evidence rule and should not have been considered. Since the Court of Appeal held there was no breach of contract, the basis for the claims in unlawful means conspiracy and inducing breach of contract also disappeared.

(b) Positions of the Parties

[29] Mr. Bhasin advances two related positions on appeal. His broad submission is that the Court should recognize a general duty of good faith in contract. The duty arises where the agreement gives the defendant the power to unilaterally defeat a legitimate contractual objective of the plaintiff and it does not clearly allow the defendant to exercise its power without regard for that objective: A.F., at para. 51. This duty of good faith prevents conduct which, while consonant with the letter of a contract, exhibits dishonesty, ill will, improper motive or similar departures from reasonable business expectations. Mr. Bhasin contends that common law in Canada is increasingly isolated as other jurisdictions embrace a greater role for good faith in contract law: A.F., at paras. 27-32. The recognition of a general duty of good faith would constitute an incremental advance in the law, given the numerous specific situations that already give rise to a duty of good faith. Mr. Bhasin relies on the findings of the trial judge that the respondents improperly and dishonestly used their non-renewal right to compel Mr. Bhasin to merge with his competitor. Mr. Bhasin contends that the respondents had no legitimate business reason for not renewing the contract. He also says that the entire agreement clause should be construed narrowly, and that express language is needed for such a clause to derogate from a duty of good faith: A.F., at para. 83.

[30] Mr. Bhasin's second position, emphasized in oral argument, is that the Court should at least recognize a duty of honest performance of contractual obligations: transcript, at pp. 8, 10 and 24. Mr. Bhasin relies on the trial judge's findings that Can-Am acted dishonestly towards Mr. Bhasin throughout the period leading up to the non-renewal. It repeatedly lied to him about the nature of the organizational changes required by the Alberta Securities Commission, the nature of the audits that were to be carried out by Mr. Hrynew, and was dishonest about its intention to force him out: trial reasons, at paras. 195, 221, 246-47 and 267.

[31] Unsurprisingly, the respondents see things very differently. While they accept that good faith plays a role in Canadian contract law, they submit that this role is much more modest than Mr. Bhasin suggests. They say that such a duty arises only in certain classes of contract, such as employment contracts, and in contracts involving discretionary powers: R.F., at para. 52. In the employment context, the duty applies only to the manner in which a contract is terminated. The contract in this case was negotiated between commercial parties to whom the policy considerations underlying employment law doctrine do not apply. Mr. Bhasin is alleging a right to a perpetual, or at least indefinite, contract with the respondents. The contract in this case could not be said to be discretionary, because it provided simply that on six months' notice, either party could terminate the Agreement. The respondents submit that there is no ambiguity in the wording of the non-renewal clause of the contract and so there is no basis for implying other terms or for relying on extrinsic evidence of the parties' intentions. The entire agreement clause specifically precluded the implication of any terms other than the express terms of the contract.

2014 SCC 71 (CanLII)

(2) Analysis

(a) Overview

[32] The notion of good faith has deep roots in contract law and permeates many of its rules. Nonetheless, Anglo-Canadian common law has resisted acknowledging any generalized and independent doctrine of good faith performance of contracts. The result is an "unsettled and incoherent body of law" that has developed "piecemeal" and which is "difficult to analyze": Ontario Law Reform Commission ("OLRC"), Report on Amendment of the Law of Contract (1987), at p. 169. This approach is out of step with the civil law of Quebec and most jurisdictions in the United States and produces results that are not consistent with the reasonable expectations of commercial parties.

[33] In my view, it is time to take two incremental steps in order to make the common law less unsettled and piecemeal, more coherent and more just. The first step is to acknowledge that good faith contractual performance is a general organizing principle of the common law of contract which underpins and informs the various rules in which the common law, in various situations and types of relationships, recognizes obligations of good faith contractual performance. The second is to recognize, as a further manifestation of this organizing principle of good faith, that there is a common law duty which applies to all contracts to act honestly in the performance of contractual obligations.

[34] In my view, taking these two steps is perfectly consistent with the Court's responsibility to make incremental changes in the common law when appropriate. Doing so will put in place a duty that is just, that accords with the reasonable expectations of commercial parties and that is sufficiently precise that it will enhance rather than detract from commercial certainty.

(b) Good Faith as a General Organizing Principle

(i) Background

importance that courts of law should compel the observance of honesty and good faith": p. 113-14. In Carter v. Boehm (1766), 3 Burr. 1905, 97 E.R. 1162, at p. 1910, Lord Mansfield stated that good faith is a principle applicable to all contracts; see also Herbert v. Mercantile Fire Ins. Co. (1878), 43 U.C.Q.B. 384; R. Powell, "Good Faith in Contracts" (1956), 9 Curr. Legal Probs. 16.

[36] However, these broad pronouncements have been, for the most part, restricted by subsequent jurisprudence to specific types of contracts and relationships, such as insurance contracts, leaving unclear the role of the broader principle of good faith in the modern Anglo-Canadian law of contracts: Chitty on Contracts (31st ed. 2012), vol. I, General Principles, at para. 1-039; W. P. Yee, "Protecting Parties' Reasonable Expectations: A General Principle of Good Faith" (2001), 1 O.U.C.L.J. 195, at p. 195; E. P. Belobaba, "Good Faith in Canadian Contract Law", in Special Lectures of the Law Society of Upper Canada 1985 — Commercial Law: Recent Developments and Emerging Trends (1985), 73, at p. 75. One leading Canadian contracts scholar went so far as to say that the common law has taken a "kind of perverted pride" in the absence of any general notion of good faith, as if accepting that notion "would be admitting to the presence of some kind of embarrassing social disease": J. Swan, "Whither Contracts: A Retrospective and Prospective Overview", in Special Lectures of the Law Society of Upper Canada 1984 — Law in Transition: Contracts (1984), 125, at p. 148.

[37] This Court has not examined whether there is a general duty of good faith contractual performance. However, there has been an active debate in other courts and among scholars for decades over whether there is, or should be, a general or "stand-alone" duty of good faith in the performance of contracts. Canadian courts have reached different conclusions on this point.

[38] Some suggest that there is a general duty of good faith: Gateway Realty Ltd. v. Arton Holdings Ltd. (1991), 106 N.S.R. (2d) 180 (S.C. (T.D.)), aff'd on narrower grounds (1992), 112 N.S.R. (2d) 180 (S.C. (App. Div.)); McDonald's Restaurant of Canada Ltd. v. British Columbia (1997), 29 B.C.L.R. (3d) 303 (C.A.), at para. 99; Crawford v. Agricultural Development Board (N.B.) (1997), 192 N.B.R. (2d) 68 (C.A.), at paras. 7-8. They see a broad role for good faith as an implied term in all contracts that establishes minimum standards of acceptable commercial behaviour. As Kelly J. put it in Gateway Realty, at para. 38:

> The law requires that parties to a contract exercise their rights under that agreement honestly, fairly and in good faith. This standard is breached when a party acts in a bad faith manner in the performance of its rights and obligations under the contract. "Good faith" conduct is the guide to the manner in which the parties should pursue their mutual contractual objectives. Such conduct is breached when a party acts in "bad faith" — a conduct that is contrary to community standards of honesty, reasonableness or fairness.

[39] Other courts are of the view that there exists no such general duty of good faith in all contracts: Transamerica Life Canada Inc. v. ING Canada Inc. (2003), 68 O.R. (3d) 457 (C.A.), at paras. 53-54; Mesa Operating Limited Partnership v. Amoco

Canada Resources Ltd. (1994), 149 A.R. 187 (C.A.), at paras. 15-19, per Kerans J.A., dubitante; Barclays Bank PLC v. Metcalfe & Mansfield Alternative Investments VII Corp., 2013 ONCA 494, 365 D.L.R. (4th) 15, at para. 131; see G. R. Hall, Canadian Contractual Interpretation Law (2nd ed. 2012), at pp. 338-46. The detractors of such a general duty of good faith have accepted a limited role for good faith in certain contexts but have held that it would create commercial uncertainty and undermine freedom of contract to recognize a general duty of good faith that would permit courts to interfere with the express terms of a contract.

[40] This Court ought to develop the common law to keep in step with the "dynamic and evolving fabric of our society" where it can do so in an incremental fashion and where the ramifications of the development are "not incapable of assessment": R. v. Salituro, [1991] 3 S.C.R. 654, at p. 670; Bow Valley Husky (Bermuda) Ltd. v. Saint John Shipbuilding Ltd., [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1210, at para. 93; see also Watkins v. Olafson, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 750, at pp. 760-64; Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1130, at para. 85; R.W.D.S.U., Local 558 v. Pepsi-Cola Canada Beverages (West) Ltd., 2002 SCC 8, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 156; British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 473; Grant v. Torstar Corp., 2009 SCC 61, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 640, at para. 46. This is even more appropriate where, as here, what is contemplated is not the reversal of some settled rule, but a development directed to bringing greater certainty and coherence to a complex and troublesome area of the common law.

[41] As I see it, the developments that I propose are desirable as a result of several considerations. First, the current Canadian common law is uncertain. Second, the current approach to good faith performance lacks coherence. Third, the current law is out of step with the reasonable expectations of commercial parties, particularly those of at least two major trading partners of common law Canada — Quebec and the United States: see, e.g., Hall, at p. 347. While the developments which I propose will not completely address these problems, they will bring a measure of coherence and predictability to the law and will bring the law closer to what reasonable commercial parties would expect it to be.

(ii) Survey of the Current State of the Common Law

[42] Anglo-Canadian common law has developed a number of rules and doctrines that call upon the notion of good faith in contractual dealings; it is a concept that underlies many elements of modern contract law: S. M. Waddams, The Law of Contracts (6th ed. 2010), at para. 550; J. D. McCamus The Law of Contracts (2nd ed. 2012), at pp. 835-38; OLRC, at p. 165; Belobaba, at pp. 75-76; J. F. O'Connor, Good Faith in English Law (1990), at pp. 17-49; J. Steyn, "Contract Law: Fulfilling the Reasonable Expectations of Honest Men" (1997), 113 Law Q. Rev. 433. The approach, not unfairly, has been characterized as developing "piecemeal solutions in response to demonstrated problems": Interfoto Picture Library Ltd. v. Stiletto Visual Programmes Ltd., [1989] 1 Q.B. 433 (C.A.), at p. 439, per Bingham L.J. (as he then was). Thus we see, for example, that good faith notions have been applied to particular types of contracts, particular types of contractual provisions and particular contractual relationships. It also underlies doctrines that explicitly deal with fairness in contracts, such as unconscionability, and plays a role in interpreting and implying contractual terms. The difficulty with this "piecemeal" approach, however, is that it often fails to take a consistent or principled approach to similar problems. A brief review of the current landscape of good faith will show the extent to which this is the case.

[43] Considerations of good faith are apparent in doctrines that expressly consider the fairness of contractual bargains, such as unconscionability. This doctrine is based on considerations of fairness and preventing one contracting party from taking undue advantage of the other: G. H. L. Fridman, The Law of Contract in Canada (6th ed. 2011), at pp. 329-30; E. Peden, "When Common Law Trumps Equity: the Rise of Good Faith and Reasonableness and the Demise of Unconscionability" (2005), 21 J.C.L. 226; Belobaba, at p. 86; S. M. Waddams, "Good Faith, Unconscionability and Reasonable Expectations" (1995), 9 J.C.L. 55.

of terms plays a functionally similar role in common law contract law to the doctrine of good faith in civil law jurisdictions by filling in gaps in the written agreement of the parties: Chitty on Contracts, at para. 1-051. In Mesa Operating, the Alberta Court of Appeal implied a term that a power of pooling properties for the purpose of determining royalty payments be exercised reasonably. The court implied this term in order to give effect to the intentions of the parties rather than as a requirement of good faith, but Kerans J.A. stated that "[t]he rule that governs here can, therefore, be expressed much more narrowly than to speak of good faith, although I suspect it is in reality the sort of thing some judges have in mind when they speak of good faith": para. 22. Many other examples may be found in Waddams, The Law of Contracts, at paras. 499-506.

[45] Considerations of good faith are also apparent in contract interpretation: Chitty on Contracts, at para. 1-050; Hall, at p. 347. The primary object of contractual interpretation is of course to give effect to the intentions of the parties at the time of contract formation. However, considerations of good faith inform this process. Parties may generally be assumed to intend certain minimum standards of conduct. Further, as Lord Reid observed in Schuler A.G. v. Wickman Machine Tool Sales Ltd., [1974] A.C. 235 (H.L.), at p. 251, "[t]he more unreasonable the result the more unlikely it is that the parties can have intended it". As A. Swan and J. Adamski put it, the duty of good faith "is not an externally imposed requirement but inheres in the parties' relation": Canadian Contract Law (3rd ed. 2012), at §§ 8.134-8.146.

[46] Good faith also appears in numerous contexts in a more explicit form. The concept of "good faith" is used in hundreds of statutes across Canada, including statutory duties of good faith and fair dealing in franchise legislation and good faith bargaining in labour law: S. K. O'Byrne, "Good Faith in Contractual Performance: Recent Developments" (1995), 74 Can. Bar Rev. 70, at p. 71.

[47] There have been many attempts to bring a measure of coherence to this piecemeal accretion of appeals to good faith: see, among many others, McCamus, at pp. 835-68; S. K. O'Byrne, "The Implied Term of Good Faith and Fair Dealing: Recent Developments" (2007), 86 Can. Bar Rev. 193, at pp. 196-204; Waddams, The Law of Contracts, at paras. 494-508; R. S. Summers, "'Good Faith' in General Contract Law and the Sales Provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code" (1968), 54 Va. L. Rev. 195; S. J. Burton, "Breach of Contract and the Common Law Duty to Perform in Good Faith" (1981), 94 Harv. L. Rev. 369. By way of example, Professor McCamus has identified three broad types of situations in which a duty of good faith performance of some kind has been found to exist: (1) where the parties must cooperate in order to achieve the objects of the contract; (2) where one party exercises a discretionary power under the contract; and (3) where one party seeks to evade contractual duties (pp. 840-56; CivicLife.com Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General) (2006), 215 O.A.C. 43, at paras. 49-50).

[48] While these types of cases overlap to some extent, they provide a useful analytical tool to appreciate the current state of the law on the duty of good faith.

They also reveal some of the lack of coherence in the current approach. It is often unclear whether a good faith obligation is being imposed as a matter of law, as a matter of implication or as a matter of interpretation. Professor McCamus notes:

> Although the line between the two types of implication is difficult to draw, it may be realistic to assume that implied duties of good faith are likely, on occasion at least, to slide into the category of legal incidents rather than mere presumed intentions. Certainly, it would be difficult to defend the implication of terms on each of the cases considered here on the basis of the traditional business efficiency or officious bystander test. In the control of contractual discretion cases, for example, it may be more realistic to suggest that the implied limitation on the exercise of the discretion is intended to give effect to the "reasonable expectations of the parties." [pp. 865-66]

[49] The first type of situation (contracts requiring the cooperation of the parties to achieve the objects of the contract) is reflected in the jurisprudence of this Court. In Dynamic Transport Ltd. v. O.K. Detailing Ltd., [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1072, the parties to a real estate transaction failed to specify in the purchase-sale agreement which party was to be responsible for obtaining planning permission for a subdivision of the property. By law, the vendor was the only party capable of obtaining such permission. The Court held that the vendor was under an obligation to use reasonable efforts to secure the permission, or as Dickson J. (as he then was) put it, "[t]he vendor is under a duty to act in good faith and to take all reasonable steps to complete the sale": p. 1084. It is not completely clear whether this duty was imposed as a matter of law or was implied based on the parties' intentions: see p. 1083; see also Gateway Realty and CivicLife.com.

[50] Mitsui & Co. (Canada) Ltd. v. Royal Bank of Canada, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 187, is an example of the second type of situation (exercise of contractual discretion). The lease of a helicopter included an option to buy at the "reasonable fair market value of the helicopter as established by Lessor": para. 2. This Court held, at para. 34, that, "[c]learly, the lessor is not in a position, by virtue of clause 32, to make any offer that it may feel is appropriate. It is contractually bound to act in good faith to determine the reasonable fair market value of the helicopters, which is the price that the parties had initially agreed would be the exercise price of the option." The Court did not discuss the basis for implying the term, but suggested that in the absence of a reasonableness requirement, the option would be a mere agreement to agree and thus would be unenforceable, which means that the implication of the term was necessary to give business efficacy to the agreement.

[51] This Court's decision in Mason v. Freedman, [1958] S.C.R. 483, falls in the third type of situation in which a duty of good faith arises (where a contractual power is used to evade a contractual duty). In that case, the vendor in a real estate transaction regretted the bargain he had made. He then sought to repudiate the contract by failing to convey title in fee simple because he claimed his wife would not provide a bar of dower. The issue was whether he could take advantage of a clause permitting him to repudiate the transaction in the event that he was "unable or unwilling" to remove this defect in title even though he had made no efforts to do so by trying to obtain the bar of dower. Judson J. held that the clause did not "enable a person to repudiate a contract for a cause which he himself has brought about" or permit "a capricious or arbitrary repudiation": p. 486. On the contrary, "[a] vendor who seeks to take advantage of the clause must exercise his right reasonably and in good faith and not in a capricious or arbitrary manner": p. 487.

[52] The jurisprudence is not always very clear about the source of the good faith obligations found in these cases. The categories of terms implied as a matter of law, terms implied as a matter of intention and terms arising as a matter of interpretation sometimes are blurred or even ignored, resulting in uncertainty and a lack of coherence at the level of principle.

[53] Apart from these types of situations in which a duty of good faith arises, common law Canadian courts have also recognized that there are classes of relationships that call for a duty of good faith to be implied by law.

[54] For example, this Court confirmed that there is a duty of good faith in the employment context in Honda Canada Inc. v. Keays, 2008 SCC 39, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 362. Mr. Keays was diagnosed with chronic fatigue syndrome and was frequently absent from work. Honda grew concerned with the frequency of the absences. It ordered Mr. Keays to undergo an examination by a doctor chosen by the employer, required him to provide a doctor's note for any absences, and discouraged him from retaining outside counsel. The majority held that in all employment contracts there was an implied term of good faith governing the manner of termination. In particular, the employer should not engage in conduct that is "unfair or is in bad faith by being, for example, untruthful, misleading or unduly insensitive" when dismissing an employee: para. 57, citing Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd., [1997] 3 S.C.R. 701, at para. 98. Good faith in this context did not extend to the employer's reasons for terminating the contract of employment because this would undermine the right of an employer to determine the composition of its workforce: Wallace, at para. 76.

[55] This Court has also affirmed the duty of good faith which requires an insurer to deal with its insured's claim fairly, both with respect to the manner in which it investigates and assesses the claim and to the decision whether or not to pay it: Fidler v. Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada, 2006 SCC 30, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 63, citing 702535 Ontario Inc. v. Lloyd's London, Non-Marine Underwriters (2000), 184 D.L.R. (4th) 687 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 29. The breach of this duty may support an award of punitive damages: Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co., 2002 SCC 18, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 595. This duty of good faith is also reciprocal: the insurer must not act in bad faith when dealing with a claim, which is typically made by someone in a vulnerable situation, and the insured must act in good faith by disclosing facts material to the insurance policy (para. 83, citing Andrusiw v. Aetna Life Insurance Co. of Canada (2001), 289 A.R. 1 (Q.B.), at paras. 84-85, per Murray J.).

[56] This Court has also recognized that a duty of good faith, in the sense of fair dealing, will generally be implied in fact in the tendering context. When a company tenders a contract, it comes under a duty of fairness in considering the bids submitted under the tendering process, as a result of the expense incurred by parties submitting these bids: Martel Building Ltd. v. Canada, 2000 SCC 60, [2000] 2 S.C.R.

860, at para. 88; see also M.J.B. Enterprises Ltd. v. Defence Construction (1951) Ltd., [1999] 1 S.C.R. 619; Tercon Contractors Ltd. v. British Columbia (Transportation and Highways), 2010 SCC 4, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 69, at paras. 58-59; A. C. McNeely, Canadian Law of Competitive Bidding and Procurement (2010), at pp. 245-54.

[57] Developments in the United Kingdom and Australia point to enhanced attention to the notion of good faith, mitigated by reluctance to embrace it as a stand-alone doctrine. Good faith in contract performance has received increasing prominence in English law, despite its "traditional . . . hostility" to the concept: Yam Seng Pte Ltd. v. International Trade Corporation Ltd., [2013] EWHC 111, [2013] 1 AII E.R. (Comm.) 1321 (Q.B.), at para. 123, citing E. McKendrick, Contract Law (9th ed. 2011), at pp. 221-22; see also Chitty on Contracts, at para. 1-039. In Yam Seng, Leggatt J. held that a number of specific duties embodying good faith can be implied based on the presumed intentions of the parties according to the traditional approach for implying terms: para. 131. Leggatt J. identified a number of these implied duties, including honesty, fidelity to the parties' bargain, cooperation, and fair dealing: paras. 135-50. Leggatt J. stated that "[a] paradigm example of a general norm which underlies almost all contractual relationships is an expectation of honesty. That expectation is essential to commerce, which depends critically on trust": para. 135; see D. Campbell, "Good Faith and the Ubiquity of the 'Relational' Contract" (2014), 77 Mod. L. Rev. 475. The Court of Appeal considered the Yam Seng decision in Mid Essex Hospital Services NHS Trust v. Compass Group UK and Ireland Ltd., [2013] EWCA Civ 200 (BAILII), where it confirmed that good faith was not a general principle of English law, but that it could be an implied term in certain categories of cases: paras. 105 and 150.

2014 SCC 71 (CanLII)

[58] Australian courts have also moved towards a greater role for good faith in contract performance: Cheshire and Fifoot's Law of Contract (9th Australian ed. 2008), at paras. 10.43-10.47. The duty of good faith in its modern form was recognized by Priestley J.A. in Renard Constructions (ME) Pty Ltd. v. Minister for Public Works (1992), 26 N.S.W.L.R. 234 (C.A.). There is no generally applicable duty of good faith, but one will be implied into contracts in certain circumstances. The duty of good faith can be implied as a matter of law or as a matter of fact, although the cases are not always clear on the basis on which the term is being implied. Australian courts have taken a broad view of what constitutes good faith: see, e.g., Burger King Corporation v. Hungry Jack's Pty Ltd., [2001] NSWCA 187, 69 N.S.W.L.R. 558. The law of good faith performance in Australia is still developing and remains unsettled: E. Peden, "Good faith in the performance of contract law" (2004), 42 L.S.J. 64, at p. 64. However, it is clear that the duty of good faith requires adherence to standards of honest conduct: A. Mason, "Contract, Good Faith and Equitable Standards in Fair Dealing" (2000), 116 Law Q. Rev. 66, at p. 76; Burger King, at paras. 171 and 189.

(iii) The Way Forward

[59] This selective survey supports the view that Canadian common law in relation to good faith performance of contracts is piecemeal, unsettled and unclear:

Belobaba; O'Byrne, "Good Faith in Contractual Performance: Recent Developments", at p. 95; B. J. Reiter, "Good Faith in Contracts" (1983), 17 Val. U.L. Rev. 705, at pp. 711-12. It also shows that in Canada, as well as in the United Kingdom and Australia, there is increasing attention to the notion of good faith, particularly in the area of contractual performance. Opponents of any general obligation of good faith prefer the traditional, organic development of solutions to address particular problems as they arise: see, e.g., M. G. Bridge, "Does Anglo-Canadian Contract Law Need a Doctrine of Good Faith?" (1984), 9 Can. Bus. L.J. 385; D. Clark, "Some Recent Developments in the Canadian Law of Contracts" (1993), 14 Advocates' Q. 435, at pp. 436 and 440. However, foreclosing some incremental development of the law at the level of principle would go beyond what prudent caution requires and evidence an almost "perverted pride" — to use Swan's term, at p. 148 — in the law's failings.

[60] Commercial parties reasonably expect a basic level of honesty and good faith in contractual dealings. While they remain at arm's length and are not subject to the duties of a fiduciary, a basic level of honest conduct is necessary to the proper functioning of commerce. The growth of longer term, relational contracts that depend on an element of trust and cooperation clearly call for a basic element of honesty in performance, but, even in transactional exchanges, misleading or deceitful conduct will fly in the face of the expectations of the parties: see Swan and Adamski, at §1.24.

[61] The fact that commercial parties expect honesty on the part of their contracting partners can also be seen from the fact that it was the American Bar Association's Section of Corporation, Banking and Business Law that urged the adoption of "honesty in fact" in the original drafting of the Uniform Commercial Code ("U.C.C."): E. A. Farnsworth, "Good Faith Performance and Commercial Reasonableness Under the Uniform Commercial Code" (1963), 30 U. Chicago L. Rev. 666, at p. 673. Moreover, empirical research suggests that commercial parties do in fact expect that their contracting parties will conduct themselves in good faith: see, e.g., S. Macaulay, "Non-contractual Relations in Business: A Preliminary Study" (1963), 28 Am. Soc. Rev. 55, at p. 58; H. Beale and T. Dugdale, "Contracts Between Businessmen: Planning and the Use of Contractual Remedies" (1975), 2 Brit. J. Law & Soc. 45, at pp. 47-48; S. Macaulay, "An Empirical View of Contract", [1985] Wis. L. Rev. 465; V. Goldwasser and T. Ciro, "Standards of Behaviour in Commercial Contracting" (2002), 30 A.B.L.R. 369, at pp. 372-77. It is, to say the least, counterintuitive to think that reasonable commercial parties would accept a contract which contained a provision to the effect that they were not obliged to act honestly in performing their contractual obligations.

[62] I conclude from this review that enunciating a general organizing principle of good faith and recognizing a duty to perform contracts honestly will help bring certainty and coherence to this area of the law in a way that is consistent with reasonable commercial expectations.

(iv) Towards an Organizing Principle of Good Faith

[63] The first step is to recognize that there is an organizing principle of good faith that underlies and manifests itself in various more specific doctrines governing contractual performance. That organizing principle is simply that parties generally must perform their contractual duties honestly and reasonably and not capriciously or arbitrarily.

[64] As the Court has recognized, an organizing principle states in general terms a requirement of justice from which more specific legal doctrines may be derived. An organizing principle therefore is not a free-standing rule, but rather a standard that underpins and is manifested in more specific legal doctrines and may be given different weight in different situations: see, e.g., R. v. Jones, [1994] 2 S.C.R. 229, at p. 249; R. v. Hart, 2014 SCC 52, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 544, at para. 124; R. M. Dworkin, "Is Law a System of Rules?", in R. M. Dworkin, ed., The Philosophy of Law (1977), 38, at p. 47. It is a standard that helps to understand and develop the law in a coherent and principled way.

[65] The organizing principle of good faith exemplifies the notion that, in carrying out his or her own performance of the contract, a contracting party should have appropriate regard to the legitimate contractual interests of the contracting partner. While "appropriate regard" for the other party's interests will vary depending on the context of the contractual relationship, it does not require acting to serve those interests in all cases. It merely requires that a party not seek to undermine those interests in bad faith. This general principle has strong conceptual differences from the much higher obligations of a fiduciary. Unlike fiduciary duties, good faith performance does not engage duties of loyalty to the other contracting party or a duty to put the interests of the other contracting party first.

[66] This organizing principle of good faith manifests itself through the existing doctrines about the types of situations and relationships in which the law requires, in certain respects, honest, candid, forthright or reasonable contractual performance. Generally, claims of good faith will not succeed if they do not fall within these existing doctrines. But we should also recognize that this list is not closed. The application of the organizing principle of good faith to particular situations should be developed where the existing law is found to be wanting and where the development may occur incrementally in a way that is consistent with the structure of the common law of contract and gives due weight to the importance of private ordering and certainty in commercial affairs.

[67] This approach is consistent with that taken in the case of unjust enrichment. McLachlin J. outlined the approach in Peel (Regional Municipality) v. Canada, [1992] 3 S.C.R. 762, at pp. 786 and 788:

> This case presents the Court with the difficult task of mediating between, if not resolving, the conflicting views of the proper scope of the doctrine of unjust enrichment. It is my conclusion that we must choose a middle path; one which acknowledges the importance of proceeding on general principles but seeks to reconcile the principles with the established categories of recovery . . . .

> The tri-partite principle of general application which this Court has recognized as the basis of the cause of action for unjust enrichment is thus seen to have grown out of the traditional categories of recovery. It is informed by them. It is capable, however, of going beyond them, allowing the law to develop in a flexible way as required to meet changing perceptions of justice.

[68] The flexible approach that was taken in Peel recognizes that "[a]t the heart of the doctrine of unjust enrichment, whether expressed in terms of the traditional categories of recovery or general principle, lies the notion of restoration of a benefit which justice does not permit one to retain": p. 788. In that case, this Court further developed the law through application of an organizing principle without displacing the existing specific doctrines. This is what I propose to do with regards to the organizing principle of good faith.

[69] The approach of recognizing an overarching organizing principle but accepting the existing law as the primary guide to future development is appropriate in the development of the doctrine of good faith. Good faith may be invoked in widely varying contexts and this calls for a highly context-specific understanding of what honesty and reasonableness in performance require so as to give appropriate consideration to the legitimate interests of both contracting parties. For example, the general organizing principle of good faith would likely have different implications in the context of a long-term contract of mutual cooperation than it would in a more transactional exchange: Swan and Adamski, at § 1.24; B. Dixon, "Common law obligations of good faith in Australian commercial contracts — a relational recipe" (2005), 33 A.B.L.R. 87.

[70] The principle of good faith must be applied in a manner that is consistent with the fundamental commitments of the common law of contract which generally places great weight on the freedom of contracting parties to pursue their individual self-interest. In commerce, a party may sometimes cause loss to another — even intentionally — in the legitimate pursuit of economic self-interest: A.I. Enterprises Ltd. v. Bram Enterprises Ltd., 2014 SCC 12, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 177, at para. 31. Doing so is not necessarily contrary to good faith and in some cases has actually been encouraged by the courts on the basis of economic efficiency: Bank of America Canada v. Mutual Trust Co., 2002 SCC 43, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 601, at para. 31. The development of the principle of good faith must be clear not to veer into a form of ad hoc judicial moralism or "palm tree" justice. In particular, the organizing principle of good faith should not be used as a pretext for scrutinizing the motives of contracting parties.

[71] Tying the organizing principle to the existing law mitigates the concern that any general notion of good faith in contract law will undermine certainty in commercial contracts. In my view, this approach strikes the correct balance between predictability and flexibility.

(v) Should There Be a New Duty?

[72] In my view, the objection to Can-Am's conduct in this case does not fit within any of the existing situations or relationships in which duties of good faith have been found to exist. The relationship between Can-Am and Mr. Bhasin was not an employment or franchise relationship. Classifying the decision not to renew the contract as a contractual discretion would constitute a significant expansion of the decided cases under that type of situation. After all, a party almost always has some amount of discretion in how to perform a contract. It would also be difficult to say that a duty of good faith should be implied in this case on the basis of the intentions of the parties given the clear terms of an entire agreement clause in the Agreement. The key question before the Court, therefore, is whether we ought to create a new common law duty under the broad umbrella of the organizing principle of good faith performance of contracts.

[73] In my view, we should. I would hold that there is a general duty of honesty in contractual performance. This means simply that parties must not lie or otherwise knowingly mislead each other about matters directly linked to the performance of the contract. This does not impose a duty of loyalty or of disclosure or require a party to forego advantages flowing from the contract; it is a simple requirement not to lie or mislead the other party about one's contractual performance. Recognizing a duty of honest performance flowing directly from the common law organizing principle of good faith is a modest, incremental step. The requirement to act honestly is one of the most widely recognized aspects of the organizing principle of good faith: see Swan and Adamski, at § 8.135; O'Byrne, "Good Faith in

Contractual Performance: Recent Developments", at p. 78; Belobaba; Greenberg v. Meffert (1985), 50 O.R. (2d) 755 (C.A.), at p. 764; Gateway Realty, at para. 38, per Kelly J.; Shelanu Inc. v. Print Three Franchising Corp. (2003), 64 O.R. (3d) 533 (C.A.), at para. 69. For example, the duty of honesty was a key component of the good faith requirements which have been recognized in relation to termination of employment contracts: Wallace, at para. 98; Honda Canada, at para. 58.

[74] There is a longstanding debate about whether the duty of good faith arises as a term implied as a matter of fact or a term implied by law: see Mesa Operating, at paras. 15-19. I do not have to resolve this debate fully, which, as I reviewed earlier, casts a shadow of uncertainty over a good deal of the jurisprudence. I am at this point concerned only with a new duty of honest performance and, as I see it, this should not be thought of as an implied term, but a general doctrine of contract law that imposes as a contractual duty a minimum standard of honest contractual performance. It operates irrespective of the intentions of the parties, and is to this extent analogous to equitable doctrines which impose limits on the freedom of contract, such as the doctrine of unconscionability.

[75] Viewed in this way, the entire agreement clause in cl. 11.2 of the Agreement is not an impediment to the duty arising in this case. Because the duty of honesty in contractual performance is a general doctrine of contract law that applies to all contracts, like unconscionability, the parties are not free to exclude it: see CivicLife.com, at para. 52.

[76] It is true that the Anglo-Canadian common law of contract has been reluctant to impose mandatory rules not based on the agreement of the parties, because they are thought to interfere with freedom of contract: see Gateway Realty, per Kelly J.; O'Byrne, "Good Faith in Contractual Performance: Recent Developments", at p. 95; Farnsworth, at pp. 677-78. As discussed above, however, the duty of honest performance interferes very little with freedom of contract, since parties will rarely expect that their contracts permit dishonest performance of their obligations.

[77] That said, I would not rule out any role for the agreement of the parties in influencing the scope of honest performance in a particular context. The precise content of honest performance will vary with context and the parties should be free in some contexts to relax the requirements of the doctrine so long as they respect its minimum core requirements. The approach I outline here is similar in principle to that in § 1-302(b) of the U.C.C. (2012):

> The obligations of good faith, diligence, reasonableness, and care . . . may not be disclaimed by agreement. The parties, by agreement, may determine the standards by which the performance of those obligations is to be measured if those standards are not manifestly unreasonable.

[78] Certainly, any modification of the duty of honest performance would need to be in express terms. A generically worded entire agreement clause such as cl. 11.2 of the Agreement does not indicate any intention of the parties to depart from the basic tenets of honest performance: see GEC Marconi Systems Pty Ltd. v. BHP

Information Technology Pty Ltd., [2003] FCA 50 (AustLII), at para. 922, per Finn J.; see also O'Byrne, "Good Faith in Contractual Performance: Recent Developments", at p. 96.

[79] Two arguments are typically raised against an increased role for a duty of good faith in the law of contract: see Bridge; Clark; and Peden, "When Common Law Trumps Equity: the Rise of Good Faith and Reasonableness and the Demise of Unconscionability". The first is that "good faith" is an inherently unclear concept that will permit ad hoc judicial moralism to undermine the certainty of commercial transactions. The second is that imposing a duty of good faith is inconsistent with the basic principle of freedom of contract. I do not have to decide here whether or not these points are valid in relation to a broad, generalized duty of good faith. However, they carry no weight in relation to adopting a rule of honest performance.

[80] Recognizing a duty of honesty in contract performance poses no risk to commercial certainty in the law of contract. A reasonable commercial person would expect, at least, that the other party to a contract would not be dishonest about his or her performance. The duty is also clear and easy to apply. Moreover, one commentator points out that given the uncertainty that has prevailed in this area, cautious solicitors have long advised clients to take account of the requirements of good faith: W. Grover, "A Solicitor Looks at Good Faith in Commercial Transactions", in Special Lectures of the Law Society of Upper Canada 1985 — Commercial Law: Recent Developments and Emerging Trends (1985), 93, at pp. 106-

7. A rule of honest performance in my view will promote, not detract from, certainty in commercial dealings.

[81] Any interference by the duty of honest performance with freedom of contract is more theoretical than real. It will surely be rare that parties would wish to agree that they may be dishonest with each other in performing their contractual obligations.

[82] Those who fear that this modest step would create uncertainty or impede freedom of contract may take comfort from experience of the civil law of Quebec and the common and statute law of many jurisdictions in the United States.

[83] The Civil Code of Québec recognizes a broad duty of good faith which extends to the formation, performance and termination of a contract and includes the notion of the abuse of contractual rights: see arts. 6, 7 and 1375. While this is not the place to expound in detail on good faith in the Quebec civil law, it is worth noting that good faith is seen as having two main aspects. The first is the subjective aspect, which is concerned with the state of mind of the actor, and addresses conduct that is, for example, malicious or intentional. The second is the objective aspect which is concerned with whether conduct is unacceptable according to the standards of reasonable people. As J.-L. Baudouin and P.-G. Jobin explain, [TRANSLATION] "a person can be in good faith (in the subjective sense), that is, act without malicious intent or without knowledge of certain facts, yet his or her conduct may nevertheless be contrary to the requirements of good faith in that it violates objective standards of conduct that are generally accepted in society": Les obligations (7th ed. 2013), by P.-G. Jobin and N. Vézina, at para. 132. The notion of good faith includes (but is not limited to) the requirement of honesty in performing the contract: ibid., at para. 161; Bank of Montreal v. Kuet Leong Ng, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 429, at p. 436.

[84] In the United States, § 1-304 of the U.C.C. provides that "[e]very contract or duty within the Uniform Commercial Code imposes an obligation of good faith in its performance and enforcement." The U.C.C. has been enacted by legislation in all 50 states. While the provisions of the U.C.C. apply only to commercial contracts, § 205 of the Restatement (Second) of Contracts (1981) provides for a general duty of good faith in all contracts. This provision of the Restatement has been followed by courts in the vast majority of states. The notion of "good faith" in the Restatement substantially followed the definition proposed by Robert Summers in an influential article, where he proposed that "good faith" is best understood as an "excluder" of various categories of bad faith conduct: p. 206; see § 205, comment a. The general definition of "good faith" in the U.C.C. is also quite broad, encompassing honesty and adherence to "reasonable commercial standards": § 1-201(b)(20). This definition was originally limited to "honesty in fact", that is, a duty of honesty in performance, and was only later expanded: A. D. Miller and R. Perry, "Good Faith Performance" (2013), 98 Iowa L. Rev. 689, at pp. 719-20. Honesty in performance is also a key component of "good faith" under the Restatement: § 205, comments a and d.

[85] Experience in Quebec and the United States shows that even very broad conceptions of the duty of good faith have not impeded contractual activity or contractual stability: see, e.g., J. Pineau, "La discrétion judiciaire a-t-elle fait des ravages en matière contractuelle?", in La réforme du Code civil, cinq ans plus tard (1998), 141. It is also worth noting that in both the United States and Quebec, judicial developments preceded legislative action in codifying good faith. In the United States, courts had recognized the existence of a general duty of good faith before the promulgation of the U.C.C.: see, e.g., Kirke La Shelle Co. v. Armstrong Co., 263 N.Y. 79 (1933). Similarly, though there was no express provision of "good faith" in the Civil Code of Lower Canada, the Court implied such a general duty from more specific provisions of the Code: see National Bank of Canada v. Soucisse, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 339; Houle v. Canadian National Bank, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 122; Bank of Montreal v. Bail Ltée, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 554. The duty of good faith was subsequently included in the revisions leading to the enactment of the Civil Code of Québec.

[86] The duty of honest performance that I propose should not be confused with a duty of disclosure or of fiduciary loyalty. A party to a contract has no general duty to subordinate his or her interest to that of the other party. However, contracting parties must be able to rely on a minimum standard of honesty from their contracting partner in relation to performing the contract as a reassurance that if the contract does not work out, they will have a fair opportunity to protect their interests. That said, a dealership agreement is not a contract of utmost good faith (uberrimae fidei) such as an insurance contract, which among other things obliges the parties to disclose material facts: Whiten. But a clear distinction can be drawn between a failure to disclose a material fact, even a firm intention to end the contractual arrangement, and active dishonesty.

2014 SCC 71 (CanLII)

[87] This distinction explains the result reached by the court in United Roasters, Inc. v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 649 F.2d 985 (4th Cir. 1981). The terminating party had decided in advance of the required notice period that it was going to terminate the contract. The court held that no disclosure of this intention was required other than what was stipulated in the notice requirement. The court stated:

> . . . there is very little to be said in favor of a rule of law that good faith requires one possessing a right of termination to inform the other party promptly of any decision to exercise the right. A tenant under a month-to-month lease may decide in January to vacate the premises at the end of September. It is hardly to be suggested that good faith requires the tenant to inform the landlord of his decision soon after January. Though the landlord may have found earlier notice convenient, formal exercise of the right of termination in August will do. [pp. 989-90]

United Roasters makes it clear that there is no unilateral duty to disclose information relevant to termination. But the situation is quite different, as I see it, when it comes to actively misleading or deceiving the other contracting party in relation to performance of the contract.

[88] The duty of honest performance has similarities with the existing law in relation to civil fraud and estoppel, but it is not subsumed by them. Unlike promissory estoppel and estoppel by representation, the contractual duty of honest performance does not require that the defendant intend that his or her representation be relied on and it is not subject to the uncertainty around whether estoppel can be used to found an independent cause of action: Ryan v. Moore, 2005 SCC 38, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 53, at para. 5; Maracle v. Travellers Indemnity Co. of Canada, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 50; Waddams, The Law of Contracts, at paras. 195-203; B. MacDougall, Estoppel (2012), at pp. 142-44. As for the tort of civil fraud, breach of the duty of honest contractual performance does not require the defendant to intend that the false statement be relied on, and breach of it supports a claim for damages according to the contractual rather than the tortious measure: see, e.g., Parna v. G. & S. Properties Ltd., [1971] S.C.R. 306, cited with approval in Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. v. Hryniak, 2014 SCC 8, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 126, at para. 19.

[89] Mr. Bhasin, supported by many judicial and academic authorities, has argued for wholesale adoption of a more expansive duty of good faith in contrast to the modest, incremental change that I propose: A.F., at para. 51; Summers, at p. 206; Belobaba; Gateway Realty. In many of its manifestations, good faith requires more than honesty on the part of a contracting party. For example, in Dynamic Transport, this Court held that good faith in the context of that contract required a party to take reasonable steps to obtain the planning permission that was a condition precedent to a sale of property. In other cases, the courts have required that discretionary powers not be exercised in a manner that is "capricious" or "arbitrary": Mason, at p. 487; LeMesurier v. Andrus (1986), 54 O.R. (2d) 1 (C.A.), at p. 7. In other contexts, this

Court has been reluctant to extend the requirements of good faith beyond honesty for fear of causing undue judicial interference in contracts: Wallace, at para. 76.

[90] It is not necessary in this case to define in general terms the limits of the implications of the organizing principle of good faith. This is because it is unclear to me how any broader duty would assist Mr. Bhasin here. After all, the contract was subject to non-renewal. It is a considerable stretch, as I see it, to turn even a broadly conceived duty of good faith exercise of the non-renewal provision into what is, in effect, a contract of indefinite duration. This in my view is the principal difficulty in the trial judge's reasoning because, in the result, her decision turned a three year contract that was subject to an express provision relating to non-renewal into a contract of roughly nine years' duration. As the Court of Appeal pointed out, in my view correctly, "[t]he parties did not intend or presume a perpetual contract, as they contracted that either party could unilaterally cause it to expire on any third anniversary": para. 32. Even if there were a breach of a broader duty of good faith by forcing the merger, Can-Am's contractual liability would still have to be measured by reference to the least onerous means of performance, which in this case would have meant simply not renewing the contract. Since no damages flow from this breach, it is unnecessary to decide whether reliance on a discretionary power to achieve a purpose extraneous to the contract and which undermined one of its key objectives might call for further development under the organizing principle of good faith contractual performance.

[91] I note as well that, even in jurisdictions that embrace a broader role for the duty of good faith, plaintiffs have met with only mixed success in alleging bad faith failure to renew a contract. Some cases have treated non-renewal as equivalent to termination and thus subject to a duty of good faith: Shell Oil Co. v. Marinello, 294 A.2d 253 (N.J. Super. Ct. 1972), aff'd 307 A.2d 598 (N.J. 1973); Atlantic Richfield Co. v. Razumic, 390 A.2d 736 (Pa. 1978), at pp. 741-42. Other courts have seen non-renewal as fundamentally different, especially where the express terms of the contract contemplate the expiry of contractual obligations and leave no room for any sort of duty to renew: J.H. Westerbeke Corp. v. Onan Corp., 580 F.Supp. 1173 (D. Mass. 1984), at p. 1184; Pitney-Bowes, Inc. v. Mestre, 517 F.Supp. 52 (S.D. Fla. 1981), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 893 (1983).

[92] I conclude that at this point in the development of Canadian common law, adding a general duty of honest contractual performance is an appropriate incremental step, recognizing that the implications of the broader, organizing principle of good faith must be allowed to evolve according to the same incremental judicial approach.

[93] A summary of the principles is in order:

(1) There is a general organizing principle of good faith that underlies many facets of contract law.

2014 SCC 71 (CanLII)

(2) In general, the particular implications of the broad principle for particular cases are determined by resorting to the body of doctrine that has developed which gives effect to aspects of that principle in particular types of situations and relationships.

(3) It is appropriate to recognize a new common law duty that applies to all contracts as a manifestation of the general organizing principle of good faith: a duty of honest performance, which requires the parties to be honest with each other in relation to the performance of their contractual obligations.

(3) Application

[94] The trial judge made a clear finding of fact that Can-Am "acted dishonestly toward Bhasin in exercising the non-renewal clause": para. 261; see also para. 271. There is no basis to interfere with that finding on appeal. It follows that Can-Am breached its duty to perform the Agreement honestly.

[95] The immediate dispute in this case centred on the non-renewal clause contained in cl. 3.3 of the 1998 Agreement which Mr. Bhasin entered into in November 1998. It provided that the Agreement was for a three-year term and would be automatically renewed unless one of the parties gave notice to the contrary at least six months before the end of the initial or any renewed term:

> 3.3 The term of this Agreement shall be for a period of three years from the date hereof (the "Initial Term") and thereafter shall be automatically renewed for successive three year periods (a "Renewal Term"), subject to earlier termination as provided for in section 8 hereof, unless either [Can-Am] or the Enrollment Director notifies the other in writing at least six months prior to expiry of the Initial Term or any Renewal Term that the notifying party desires expiry of the Agreement, in which event the Agreement shall expire at the end of such Initial Term or Renewal Term, as applicable.

[96] The factual matrix in which the judge made her finding of dishonest performance is complicated and I will only outline it in very broad terms in order to put that finding in context. There were two main interrelated story lines.

[97] The first concerns Mr. Hrynew's persistent attempts to take over Mr. Bhasin's market through a merger — in effect a takeover by him of Mr. Bhasin's agency. The second concerns the difficulties, beginning in early April 1999, that Can-Am was having with the Alberta Securities Commission, which regulated its business and its enrollment directors in Alberta. The Commission insisted that Can-Am appoint a full-time employee to be a PTO responsible for compliance with Alberta securities law. Can-Am ultimately appointed Mr. Hrynew, with the result that he would audit his competitor agencies, including Mr. Bhasin's, and therefore have access to their confidential business information. Mr. Bhasin's refusal to allow Mr. Hrynew access to this information led to the final confrontation with Can-Am and its giving notice of non-renewal in May 2001. Can-Am, for its part, wanted to force a merger of the Bhasin agency under the Hrynew agency, effectively giving Mr.

Bhasin's business to Mr. Hrynew. It was in the context of this situation that the trial judge made her findings of dishonesty on the part of Can-Am.

[98] The trial judge concluded that Can-Am acted dishonestly with Mr. Bhasin throughout the period leading up to its exercise of the non-renewal clause, both with respect to its own intentions and with respect to Mr. Hrynew's role as PTO. Her detailed findings amply support this overall conclusion.

[99] By early 2000, Can-Am was considering a significant reorganization of its activities in Alberta; by June of that year, it sent an organizational chart to the Commission showing that Mr. Bhasin's agency was to be merged under Mr. Hrynew's. But it had said nothing of this to Mr. Bhasin: trial reasons, at paras. 167-68. The trial judge found that these representations made by Can-Am to the Commission were clearly false if, as she concluded, they intended to refer to Mr. Bhasin: para. 246. She also found that Can-Am, by June 2000, was fearful that the Commission was going to pull its licence in Alberta and that it was prepared to do whatever it could to forestall that possibility. "However, it was not dealing honestly with [Mr.] Bhasin about the realities of the situation as [it] saw them": para. 246.

[100] In August 2000, Mr. Bhasin first heard of Can-Am's merger plans for him during a meeting with Can-Am's regional vice-president. But when questioned about Can-Am's intentions with respect to the merger, the official "equivocated" and did not tell him the truth that from Can-Am's perspective this was a "done deal". The trial judge concluded that the official was "not honest with [Mr.] Bhasin" at that meeting: para. 247.

[101] When Mr. Bhasin complained about Mr. Hrynew's conflict of interest in being both auditor and competitor, Can-Am in effect blamed the Commission, claiming that the Commission had rejected its proposal to appoint a third party PTO. This was not truthful. Can-Am failed to mention that it had proposed to appoint a non-resident of Alberta who was clearly not qualified according to the Commission's criteria or that it had decided to appoint Mr. Hrynew even though he did not meet the Commission's criteria either: trial reasons, at paras. 195 and 221. It also misrepresented — repeatedly — to Mr. Bhasin that Mr. Hrynew was bound by duties of confidentiality and segregation of activities in the course of an audit, when in fact there was no such requirement. Can-Am did not even finalize its PTO contract with Mr. Hrynew until March 2001 and, notwithstanding its assurances to Mr. Bhasin, it failed to include such a provision in the contract: paras. 190-221. As the trial judge found, Can-Am "could not possibly have missed this honestly in the PTO agreement, given that [Mr. Bhasin's] very protests about [Mr.] Hrynew's appointment as PTO were about confidentiality and segregation of activities": para. 221. The judge also found that Can-Am repeated these "lies" about Mr. Hrynew's supposed obligations of confidentiality even after the PTO agreement, without these protections, had been signed: para. 204.

[102] Can-Am pushed on with the requirement that Mr. Hrynew audit Mr. Bhasin's agency as if it were required to do so by the Commission even though it had arranged to have one of its employees conduct the audit of Mr. Hrynew's agency: trial reasons, at para. 198.

[103] As the trial judge found, this dishonesty on the part of Can-Am was directly and intimately connected to Can-Am's performance of the Agreement with Mr. Bhasin and its exercise of the non-renewal provision. I conclude that Can-Am breached the 1998 Agreement when it failed to act honestly with Mr. Bhasin in exercising the non-renewal clause.

C. Liability for Civil Conspiracy and Inducing Breach of Contract

[104] In light of this conclusion, I agree with the Court of Appeal's rejection of Mr. Bhasin's claims based on the torts of inducing breach of contract and unlawful means conspiracy.

[105] The trial judge specifically found that Mr. Hrynew did not encourage Can-Am to act dishonestly in its dealings with Mr. Bhasin and that Can-Am's dishonest conduct was not fairly attributable to Mr. Hrynew: paras. 271 and 287. It follows that Mr. Hrynew did not induce Can-Am's breach of its contractual duty of honest performance.

[106] The trial judge dismissed the claim for conspiracy to injure and there is no basis to interfere with that finding. However, the trial judge held the respondents liable for unlawful means conspiracy, with the unlawful means being the breach of contract and inducing breach of contract: para. 326. Because, in light of my conclusions, the only relevant breach of contract in this case is the breach of the duty of honest performance and there was no inducement of breach of contract, the only relevant unlawful means pertained to Can-Am alone and not Mr. Hrynew. Accordingly, there can be no liability for civil conspiracy: see Agribrands Purina Canada Inc. v. Kasamekas, 2011 ONCA 460, 106 O.R. (3d) 427, at para. 43.

[107] I therefore agree with the result reached by the Court of Appeal that there could be no liability for inducing breach of contract or unlawful means conspiracy: para. 36. It follows that the claims against Mr. Hrynew were rightly dismissed.

D. What Is the Appropriate Measure of Damages?

[108] I have concluded that Can-Am's breach of contract consisted of its failure to be honest with Mr. Bhasin about its contractual performance and, in particular, with respect to its settled intentions with respect to renewal. It is therefore liable for damages calculated on the basis of what Mr. Bhasin's economic position would have been had Can-Am fulfilled that duty. While the trial judge did not assess damages on that basis given her different findings in relation to liability, she made findings that permit this Court to do so.

[109] The trial judge specifically held that but for Can-Am's dishonesty, Mr. Bhasin could have acted so as to "retain the value in his agency": paras. 258-59. In reaching this conclusion, the trial judge was well aware of the difficulties that Mr. Bhasin would have in selling his business given the "almost absolute controls" that Can-Am had on enrollment directors and that it owned the "book of business": para. 402. She also heard evidence and made findings about what the value of the business was, taking these limitations into account. These findings, in my view, permit us to assess damages on the basis that if Can-Am had performed the contract honestly, Mr. Bhasin would have been able to retain the value of his business rather than see it, in effect, expropriated and turned over to Mr. Hrynew.

[110] It is clear from the findings of the trial judge and from the record that the value of the business around the time of non-renewal was $87,000. The defendants' expert at trial valued Mr. Bhasin's business as of 2001 (the time of non-renewal) as approximately $87,000. While there is some confusion in the record about the date of evaluation and the relevance of discount rates, I am persuaded that the trial judge found that the business was worth $87,000 at the time that the Agreement expired and that she made this finding fully alive to the difficulties standing in the way of a sale of the business given the contractual arrangements between Can-Am and its enrollment directors: see, e.g., para. 451. In addition, we have had no suggestion in argument that this figure should be reassessed. In fact, the defendants, as appellants before the Court of Appeal, submitted to that court that if damages were payable, they should be assessed at the value of the business at the time of the expiry of the Agreement and noted that the trial judge had accepted the evidence of their expert witness, Mr. Bailey, that the value was $87,000.

[111] I conclude therefore that Mr. Bhasin is entitled to damages in the amount of $87,000.

IV. Disposition

[112] I would allow the appeal with respect to Can-Am and dismiss the appeal with respect to Mr. Hrynew. I would vary the trial judge's assessment of damages to $87,000 plus interest. Mr. Bhasin should have his costs throughout as against Can-Am. There should be no costs at any level in favour of or against Mr. Hrynew.

Appeal allowed in part.

Thermo King Corp. v. Provincial Bank of Canada et al.

(1982), 34 O.R. (2d) 369

ONTARIO
COURT OF APPEAL
HOULDEN, BLAIR and WILSON JJ.A.
23RD NOVEMBER 1981

1981 CanLII 1731 (ON CA)

Banks and banking -- Bank bound to honour cheques to extent of customer's balance.

Banks and banking -- Overdrafts given for value -- Notice required to terminate prevailing course of business.

Debtor and creditor -- No liability under guarantee until written demand for payment.

Debtor and creditor -- No liability under general assignment of book debts unless debt due and owing.

Torts -- Intentional interference with contract -- Bank wrongfully refusing to honour customer's instructions to make draft payable to plaintiff.

The defendant H. Co., and S. Co. which had the same shareholders, were customers of the defendant bank. S. Co. was wound down in 1973 with the agreement of the bank, and H. Co. took over its operations. The bank looked to H. Co. and the shareholders as guarantors for payment of S. Co.'s debts which were approximately $378,000. From 1973 until 1976 the bank permitted H. Co. to operate with an overdraft varying from a few hundred dollars to approximately $30,000.

H. Co. was a franchised dealer of the plaintiff. To the bank's knowledge, when H. Co. obtained orders for refrigeration units it then ordered the units from the plaintiff. The plaintiff was regularly paid by a draft from the defendant bank during the month following delivery. In 1976 H. Co. obtained three major orders, and ordered the units from the plaintiff. The orders totalled approximately $95,000 U.S. H. Co. then deposited cheques totalling approximately $102,000, including cheques from the three customers for whom the major orders had been placed, in its account in the bank. It asked the bank to issue a draft of $100,000 U.S. to the plaintiff. The bank imposed certain conditions including certification of the largest deposit cheque, and these conditions were met. Had the bank honoured the draft there would have been an overdraft of $13,447. Instead, a receiver appointed by the bank under the H. Co. and S. Co. debentures took possession of H. Co. and of the large deposit in H. Co.'s account at the bank.

The plaintiff sued H. Co. for the purchase price of the three units and joined the bank as co-defendant, alleging inter alia intentional interference with contractual relations between H. Co. and the plaintiff. The trial judge held the bank acted bona fide in its own interests, and hence that its action was justified. The plaintiff appealed.

Held, the appeal should be allowed.

Once H. Co. met the bank's conditions, the bank had no right to refuse to honour its customer's instructions to issue the draft. The evidence suggested the bank was prepared to permit the overdraft provided it was kept within reasonable bounds, and hence the bank was required to give notice before terminating the overdraft. Nor could the bank rely upon its customer's guarantee without making a prior demand on it. Finally, the bank could not rely upon a general assignment of book debts without there being a debt then due to the bank. Without the aforementioned notice or demand, there was no such debt. Therefore, the refusal to honour the draft was wrongful and could not constitute reasonable justification for the tort. Regardless of its motive the bank intentionally and knowingly induced a breach of contract between the plaintiff and H. Co.

APPEAL from judgment at trial dismissing an action for intentionally inducing breach of contract.

J. Adams, and D. Fuller, for appellant.

J.H. Francis, Q.C., for respondent, Provincial Bank of Canada.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

WILSON J.A.:-- The defendant, Hamilton Transport Refrigeration Limited ("Hamilton"), is a franchised dealer of the plaintiff, Thermo King Corporation ("Thermo King"), and was at all material times a customer of the defendant bank. The shareholders of Hamilton were the sole shareholders of a company called Southern Ontario Truck Sales and Services Inc. ("Southern") which was also a customer of the bank and very heavily indebted to it. H.B. Morris was the president of both Hamilton and Southern and, when he and the other shareholders of Southern acquired the shares of Hamilton, they borrowed the purchase money from the bank. As security for the loan they gave the bank their personal guarantees of the debts of both companies. In addition each company gave the bank an assignment of its book debts and a debenture in the amount of $100,000. The companies also guaranteed each other's debts.

In the summer of 1973 it was decided, with the concurrence of the bank, that Southern would be wound down and Hamilton would take over its operations which included its franchise from Thermo King. Southern ceased to do business in late 1974 or early 1975 leaving the bank to look henceforth to Hamilton and the personal guarantors for the payment of the debts of both companies. The indebtedness of Southern in June of 1976 when the events giving rise to this litigation took place amounted to $304,869 plus accumulated interest of $73,975.

From the end of 1973 on the bank permitted Hamilton to operate with an overdraft in its current account varying from a few hundred dollars to as high as $30,086 in May, 1976. In cross-examination Mr. Morris admitted that at the end of April, 1976, the bank threatened not to honour Hamilton's cheque that was to be used to purchase a draft for Thermo King but he was able to persuade the bank manager to change his mind. There is also evidence that at the end of May, 1976, the bank refused to pay some $18,000 to Thermo King. However, the evidence also discloses that after these incidents the bank continued to permit Hamilton to operate on an overdraft. The bank was aware of the course of dealing between Hamilton and Thermo King. It knew that refrigeration units were ordered by Hamilton on a pre-sold basis. When Hamilton received orders from its customers, Thermo King sold and delivered the required units to Hamilton on the basis that payment for the units would be made by Hamilton on the 25th of the month next following the month in which delivery of the units was made. Payment was always made by Hamilton to Thermo King by means of a draft from the bank payable to Thermo King in U.S. funds.

The evidence disclosed that in the early part of 1976

Hamilton's business was showing signs of improvement. In the first four months of that year sales equalled the combined sales of the previous two years.

In March, 1976, Hamilton received orders from three customers and ordered the requisite units from Thermo King. These orders were worth $68,762 U.S., $10,988 U.S. and $14,540 U.S. respectively. Mr. Morris testified that he told Mr. Gibson, the bank manager, about these orders and indeed gave him copies of them. Mr. Gibson acknowledged that he received a copy of the largest order but could not recall being told about the other two. However, he did acknowledge that it was Mr. Morris's practice to discuss all orders with him.

In any event, on June 25, 1976, Mr. Morris attended at the bank to deposit a number of cheques totalling $102,211, including the cheques from three customers for whom he had ordered the units from Thermo King. He asked Mr. Gibson to issue a draft for $100,000 U.S. payable to Thermo King and suggested that the bank might wire the funds to Thermo King. This suggestion was prompted by the fact that payment had to be made to Thermo King by June 25th if Hamilton was to get its dealer discount on the orders. Mr. Gibson checked into the cost of wiring the money and advised Mr. Morris that it would be cheaper for him to fly to Thermo King's offices in Minneapolis. He also said that he would require the largest cheque to be certified before he could issue the draft. Mr. Morris got the cheque certified but was told by Mr. Walker, the assistant bank manager, that there had been a delay in issuing the draft but that it would be available to be picked up on June 28th. On June 28th and June 29th Mr. Gibson advised Mr. Morris he was awaiting head office approval to issue the draft. At approximately 4:30 p.m. on June 29th Mr. Gibson arrived at Hamilton's premises along with Mr. Manton, the receiver manager appointed by the bank under the Hamilton and Southern debentures. Mr. Manton took immediate possession of the premises. Mr. Gibson testified that the prime reason for the bank's action on June 29th was the large deposits made to Hamilton's account on June 25th.

joined the bank as a co-defendant, claiming against it damages for breach of contract (as third party beneficiary), a declaration that the bank held the Canadian equivalent of the $100,000 U.S. draft in trust for it, damages for deceit, and damages for the bank's interference with Thermo King's contractual relations with Hamilton. The first three causes of action foundered on the trial judge's finding that Mr. Gibson gave no undertaking to Mr. Morris at any time that he would issue the $100,000 U.S. draft. The learned trial judge rejected Mr. Morris's evidence that Mr. Gibson promised to issue the draft if he, Mr. Morris, had the largest cheque certified. This left Thermo King with its action in tort for the bank's alleged interference with the contractual relations between Thermo King and Hamilton.

Addressing this aspect of the case, the learned trial judge said:

> The plaintiff pleads that the bank wrongfully induced Hamilton to breach its contract with the plaintiff and relied on the principle which is set out in Clerk and Tindsell on Torts, 14th ed. (1975), at para. 792 as follows:
>
> > "Knowingly to procure or, as it is sometimes put, to induce a third party to break his contract to the damage of the other contracting party without reasonable justification or excuse is a tort."
>
> On the facts in this case the action of the bank was justified and not wrongful. Hamilton's account was overdrawn, it had assigned its receivables to the bank and had given a guarantee for the indebtedness of Southern. The cheques included in the deposit were apparently covered by the assignment. Even if the assignment did not cover the cheques, the bank acted bona fide and in the honest belief that the cheques fell within its terms. The bank acted not with any intention of inflicting harm on the plaintiff but to protect its legitimate interests. The plaintiff cannot succeed on this ground.

Thermo King appeals on the basis that the learned trial judge erred in holding that the bank was "justified" in refusing to follow its customer's instructions to issue the draft to the plaintiff. It points out that it is implicit in the passage from the learned trial judge's reasons quoted above that, but for his finding of "reasonable justification", he would have found the bank liable for the tort. Counsel on the appeal accordingly focussed in on the finding of "reasonable justification".

He broke his submissions down into the following:

(1) A bank must honour its customer's drafts without delay to the extent of the balance standing to the customer's credit;

(2) Where a bank has followed a course of conduct in permitting a customer to operate on a modest overdraft, it must give notice to its customer that it no longer intends to follow this course;

(3) A bank cannot "lawfully" appropriate its customer's funds to itself pursuant to a guarantee of its customer until it has first made a demand under the guarantee;

(4) A guarantor must be given a reasonable opportunity to meet the demand once it has been made;

(5) A bank can only resort to a general assignment of book debts if there is a debt due and owing to the bank at the time of such resort because an assignment of book debts is essentially a security document. The debt in this case would have to be either (a) the overdraft or (b) the guarantee and no notice had been given on either.

For his first proposition counsel for the appellant relied on Foley v. Hill (1848), 2 H.L. Cas. 28, 9 E.R. 1002, and N. Joachimson v. Swiss Bank Corp., [1921] 3 K.B. 110. As Lord Justice Bankes pointed out in the Joachimson case the principle of Foley v. Hill is correctly set forth in the headnote as follows [at p. 118 K.B.]:

"The relation between a banker and customer who pays money into the bank, is the ordinary relation of debtor and creditor, with a superadded obligation arising out of the custom of bankers to honour the customer's drafts; and that relation is not altered by an agreement by the banker to allow the interest on the balances in the bank."

Lord Justice Bankes then went on to point out, however that an obligation was implied in the relation of banker and customer to which no reference was made in Foley v. Hill. Reference was made to it by Lord Haldane in London Joint Stock Bank, Ltd. v. Macmillan et al., [1918] A.C. 777, where he said at p. 814:

> Ever since this House in 1848 decided Foley v. Hill it has been quite clear that the relation between a banker and the customer whose balance he keeps is under ordinary circumstances one simply of debtor and creditor. But in other judgments and notably by a later decision of this House, Scholfield v. Earl of Londesborough, [1896] A.C. 514, it was made equally clear that along with this relation and consistently with it there may subsist a second one ... But the customer of a bank is under a yet more specific duty. The banker contracts to act as his mandatory and is bound to honour his cheques without any delay to the extent of the balance standing to his credit. The customer contracts reciprocally that in drawing his cheques on the banker he will draw them in such a form as will enable the banker to fulfil his obligation, and therefore in a form that is clear and free from ambiguity.

Counsel submits therefore that when Hamilton instructed the bank to issue the draft for $100,000 U.S. in favour of Thermo King, the bank should have done so. Hamilton had delivered over to the bank cheques from three of its customers totalling $102,211. At that time it therefore had no overdraft. It had a credit balance of $89,949. The overdraft prior to the deposit of the cheques was $11,236. The overdraft which would have been created by the issue of the draft in the amount of $100,000 U.S. i.e. $13,447, would have been well within the limits permitted to Hamilton over the prior three years.

In aid of its submission that the bank was obliged to issue the draft, counsel made its second submission, namely that the bank was obliged to give Hamilton notice that it was no longer prepared to carry it in an overdraft position. For this proposition counsel relied on Cumming v. Shand (1860), 5 H.&.N. 95, 157 E.R. 1114, and Johnston v. Commercial Bank of Scotland (1858), 20 Dunl. (Ct. of Session) 790.

In Cumming v. Shand, the plaintiff Cumming, who was in the habit of receiving consignments of cargoes against which bills of exchange were drawn upon him which he accepted, had an arrangement with his bank whereby he delivered to it the bills of exchange with bills of lading annexed to them and the bank paid the bills, debiting him with the amount. The bank then handed the bills of lading over to the plaintiff's broker on receiving the broker's undertaking to pay the amount of the bills out of the proceeds of sale of the goods when sold. Even before the broker reimbursed the bank, the bank was in the habit of allowing the plaintiff to draw on his account although it was then overdrawn. When the market price of a particular consignment of goods took a spectacular drop and the goods had not been sold, the bank, without giving the plaintiff any notice that it was no longer following its earlier practice, refused to honour one of his cheques.

The plaintiff's action against the bank was tried before a jury and the trial judge left it to the jury to determine what the course of dealing between the bank and its customer was. He instructed them, however, that if they came to the conclusion that the course of dealing between them was that the plaintiff was allowed to draw cheques without reference to the sums placed to his debit under the arrangement, then the bank was obliged to give the plaintiff reasonable notice that it was no longer prepared to follow that course. The jury found for the plaintiff and the bank moved for a new trial on the basis of misdirection by the trial judge. The bank argued that it was not bound to honour the plaintiff's cheque because the plaintiff was in a debit position and, even if the bank in the past had been permitting the plaintiff to overdraw his account, that was an indulgence which the bank could discontinue at any time.

Pollock C.B. stated at pp. 97-98 H. & N., p. 1116 E.R.:

> I am of opinion that the case was properly left to the jury. No doubt, if a person has been accustomed to accept bills for the accommodation of another, he may refuse to do so any longer; for there is no tenancy of a man's credit which requires any time to put an end to it. But that is not the case where a course of dealing has prevailed, and value has been given for the accommodation. It makes no difference whether the one party is a factor or a banker, if the circumstances are such as to justify the other in drawing though he has not a cash credit, he is entitled to do so until he has notice that the accommodation is discontinued. The question then is, whether there was, between the plaintiff and the Bank, a course of business which could not be put an end to without a reasonable notice. It seems to me that there is no objection to the mode in which the case was left to the jury, and that they have arrived at a proper conclusion.

(Emphasis added.) The other judges agreed with Pollock C.B.

While Pollock C.B. stressed the requirement of value having been given for the accommodation in Cumming v. Shand, this does not appear to present a problem for the appellant in light of the authorities holding that an express or implied undertaking to pay interest is sufficient consideration for an agreement to permit an overdraft: see Fleming v. Bank of New Zealand, [1900] A.C. 577 (P.C.).

In Johnston v. Commercial Bank of Scotland, supra, the plaintiff (pursuer) had an arrangement with the defendant (defender) for a cash credit of 10,000 pounds on the security of some mining lands he owned. The bond evidencing the arrangement was granted by the bank in September of 1840 and obligated the plaintiff to repay all advances when demanded any time after three months from the date of the bond. The credit was operated for some months with no demand being made and in May of 1841 the plaintiff's debit to the bank stood at just over 7,000 pounds. In the meantime the plaintiff's brother had died leaving him more mining lands. In February of 1841, prior to the plaintiff's brother's death, the bank had refused to give the plaintiff any further accommodation, giving as its reason that the plaintiff and his brother were signatories to three notes to the bank in the amount of 1,000 pounds each. The bank's position was that the 3,000 pounds owing on these notes was part of the agreed upon cash credit of 10,000 pounds. The plaintiff then took steps to change his bank and make new credit arrangements using his inheritance from his brother's estate as security. While this was in process the defendant refused to honour his cheques and made a demand on one of the three notes which had fallen due, thereby tying up the brother's property. The plaintiff sued for the damages suffered as a result of this sudden withdrawal of credit alleging that, while bankers may be entitled to refuse additional credit to a customer, due notice of such an intention must be given particularly to a trader who has provided security for the arrangement which the bank has agreed is satisfactory.

The Lord Ordinary found no merit in the action. Quoting from his reasons at p. 791:

> Under the bond and disposition in security for the cash-credit, it may be held that the defenders came under a certain duty or obligation in the first instance. They would not apparently have been justified in immediately and arbitrarily refusing to make any advance to the pursuer under the agreement therein narrated, particularly while they remained in possession of his property; and at least they might possibly have been liable for any special damage directly resulting from a sudden and capricious refusal to honour a reasonable draft. But, on the other hand, whether looking to the terms of the bond or to the nature of the transaction, it cannot be said that the defenders came under an absolute obligation in all circumstances, and for any length of time, to continue their advances to the full extent of the specified sum. If, after an interval, they gave reasonable notice of their intention to discontinue the credit and call up the amount advanced; and more especially, if, after a variety of transactions, circumstances had arisen which might reasonably affect the defenders' confidence in the pursuer, there seems no doubt that they were fully entitled to close the account, and would not certainly incur any legal responsibility by so doing.

The plaintiff appealed and his appeal was dismissed. The Lord Justice-Clerk said at p. 793:

This action is raised upon the novel and most extra-ordinary ground, that when a party gets a cash credit with a bank, the bank is bound to go on giving him credit so long as he does not exceed the bounds of his credit, whatever may be their opinion of him or of his business. It was carried so far by the pursuer's counsel as to say that his client has "purchased a credit to the extent of 10,000 pounds by the security he had given over his property," and the Bank was not entitled to stop making advances so long as he kept within that sum. When stating that proposition, it was forgotten that the security was also for the money that had been advanced. When pressed to state his proposition, the pursuer's counsel admitted that it could not be maintained to the extent of throwing on the Bank the burden of shewing that they had good reason for stopping any farther advances, and his propositions were modified to this, that the Bank was not entitled to stop farther advances without due notice. As the case was thus put, it was shortly and conclusively answered by the statements of Mr. Ross, that on the pursuer's own statement the Bank refused, on 17th May, to allow farther credit unless upon farther security. He thus got notice that farther security was considered necessary, and had recourse to Messrs Davidson and Syme to make the necessary arrangements for the transference of his business to another bank. I do not say that there may not be a case for damage where a bank, without any good cause, and capriciously, stops advances without any notice. This, however, is no such case, but the simple case where, perhaps, from better knowledge of the party dealing with them or of his affairs, the Bank > thinks it proper to stop short, and hazardous to make farther advances. In such a case, is the Bank not entitled to refuse to carry past due bills to the debit of a cash-credit account? It is the strangest proposition I ever heard, to say that they are not entitled to do so. This action seems to me utterly baseless.

Lord Murray, who concurred in the judgment, gave very brief reasons at p. 793 as follows:

> I am of the same opinion. I always understood that a bank had power to withdraw their cash-credit when they see good cause for doing so. I think there was due notice of the intention to refuse farther advances before these bills were charged on. I see nothing for the pursuer to complain of.

Lord Cowan, who also wrote concurring reasons, stated that the principles laid down by his colleagues were correct. He then added:

> There may be special cases, as where the party has been led to rely on his draft being honoured, in which there may be just cause of complaint, when they are, without notice, dishonoured, and just ground for a claim of actual loss. But the mere granting of the credit does not infer an obligation on the Bank to advance to its full amount.

The appellant in the instant appeal relies upon the Johnston case for the obiter dicta of the Lord Ordinary and the Lord Justices of Appeal to the effect that, if there has been a history of advances which the customer has come to rely on, a bank may have to give prior notice to a trader of an intention to cut off his credit. In the Johnston case such prior notice was found to have been given and the plaintiff had therefore no cause for complaint.

In Paget's Law of Banking, 8th ed. (1972), at p. 82 the editors discuss when the limitation period starts to run against a bank in a proposed action against its customer on an overdraft. They point out that on the authority of Parr's Banking Co. Ltd. v. Yates, [1898] 2 Q.B. 460, the statute starts to run from the date of each advance even if the advances are guaranteed. The reason for this is that no demand is necessary as against the principal debtor. But Parr's case was overruled insofar as a guarantor is concerned by Bradford Old Bank, Ltd. v. Sutcliffe, [1918] 2 K.B. 833, which made it clear that a guarantor only becomes liable once a demand has been made. The reason for the distinction is that a guarantee is a "collateral" security. The editors of Paget then go on to point out, however, that in the case of the principal debtor:

> A course of business might be established by which a banker who was acquiesced for a period in overdrafts to a certain amount would be precluded from withdrawing such accommodation and dishonouring cheques without notice: see Cumming v. Shand (1860), 5 H. & N. 95, but this does not necessarily preclude the operation of the statute.

And at p. 132 of Paget the editors, in discussing the nature of an overdraft, state:

> An overdraft is money lent: "A payment by a bank under an arrangement by which the customer has an overdraft is a lending by the bank to the customer of the money". Per Harman, J., in Re Hone (a bankrupt), Ex parte Trustee v. Kensington Borough Council, [1951] Ch. 85, at p. 89; [1950] 2 All E.R. 716, at p. 719. A banker is not obliged to let his customer overdraw unless he has agreed to do so or such agreement can be inferred from course of business ... Cumming v. Shand (1860), 5 H. & N. 95 ...; borrowing and lending are a matter of contract not necessarily premeditated but, possibly, spontaneous, as where a customer, without previous arrangement, draws a cheque, payment of which overdraws his account. It is generally assumed that temporary advances are repayable on demand and forms of charge over security invariably provide that the advance is so payable, i.e. without notice. How far this militates against the right of the customer not to have his account closed except after a reasonable notice, where the advance is by way of overdraft, is not clear. In any event the bank could insist that the > advance should be repaid within a reasonable time and that it should not rise in the meantime; but they could probably not insist on immediate repayment to the extent of ignoring outstanding cheques, for instance, unless the limit of overdraft had already been reached ... Johnston v. Commercial Bank (1858), 20 D. 790 ... There are clearly conflicting interests but, providing the banker is in possession of a document by which the customer agreed to repay on demand, the banker would be entitled to take any action necessary to safeguard his interests, even if it prejudiced those of his borrower.

In effect, counsel for the appellant submits on the basis of his first two propositions that, having given no notice to Hamilton of its intention to stop permitting Hamilton to operate on an overdraft, the bank was obliged to issue the draft on its customer's instructions without delay. By virtue of the course of dealing between the parties, he submits, Hamilton was entitled to be credited by the bank with the modest amount of overdraft that would have resulted from the issuance of the $100,000 U.S. draft against its then existing credit balance.

It seems to me that there may be merit in this position unless the bank was entitled on June 25, 1976, to appropriate to itself the cheques delivered to it by Hamilton with instructions that they be deposited in its account. Counsel for the appellant's last three propositions are designed to persuade us that the bank was not entitled to do this either under the general assignment of book debts it held from Hamilton or under Hamilton's guarantee of the indebtedness of Southern.

Dealing with the guarantee first, counsel directed our attention to the following language in the first paragraph:

> ... and the liability of the undersigned is to arise first when notice in writing is given to the undersigned requiring payment.

He directed us also to the fourth paragraph of the guarantee which reads:

> Upon default in payment of any sum owing by the Customer to the Bank at any time, the Bank may treat the whole of the indebtedness hereby secured as due and payable and may forthwith collect from the undersigned the total amount hereby guaranteed and may apply the sum so collected upon the Customer's debt or may place it to the credit of a special account.

Counsel points out that no demand had been made by the bank in writing when it refused to issue the draft and that, indeed, no demand in writing was made until Mr. Gibson attended with the receiver manager at Hamilton's premises on June 29, 1976. Accordingly, Hamilton's liability under the guarantee did not arise until that time at the earliest. Counsel relies, however, on the decision of Griffiths J. in Pullman Trailmobile Canada Ltd. v. Hamilton Transport Refrigeration Ltd. et al. (1979), 23 O.R. (2d) 553, 96 D.L.R. (3d) 322, and the decision of this Court in Ronald Elwyn Lister Ltd. et al. v. Dunlop Canada Ltd. (1979), 27 O.R. (2d) 168, 104 D.L.R. (3d) 702, 32 C.B.R. (N.S.) 4, for the proposition that the debtor must be given a reasonable time in which to attempt to meet the demand. Counsel submits, moreover, that even if Hamilton's liability arose "forthwith" upon his receipt of the demand in writing under the guarantee, there was no liability under the guarantee when the bank refused to issue the draft on June 25, 1976. Can the bank, he asks, refuse to honour its customer's drafts in anticipation of a liability to itself which has not yet matured? Counsel relies on Bank of British North America v. Standard Bank of Canada (1915), 34 O.L.R. 648, 26 D.L.R. 777; affirmed 38 O.L.R. 570, 35 D.L.R. 761, for the answer that it can not.

In that case a customer of the defendant bank had drawn certain cheques upon it which were endorsed by the payees of the cheques to the plaintiff bank. The cheques went through the Toronto clearing house and on presentation to the defendant bank were dishonoured. The plaintiff bank, being admittedly the lawful holder of the cheques, sued the defendant bank to recover the aggregate amount of them less payments made thereon and was held entitled to recover on the basis that there was money standing to the credit of the drawer of the cheques at the time they were presented or that there would have been such money but for the improper acts of the defendant bank. Mr. Justice Middleton affirmed the general principle that a bank must honour its customer's drafts if there are funds available in its account to meet them and went on to say at pp. 653-54 O.L.R.:

> The case is of importance as indicating the possibilities of a situation that must frequently arise, and it is open to question whether legislation is not needed to remedy the evil. When a customer draws a cheque upon his bank, and there are funds to answer it when presented, why should the bank be at liberty to refuse to honour it, retaining the money to meet some demand of its own which has not yet matured, or to pay some other cheque drawn by the customer?
> If the contention of the defendant bank in this action is right, a bank, on learning that its customer is in trouble, may refuse to pay any cheques, retaining the balance to the customer's credit to meet all liabilities, direct or indirect, which may thereafter accrue due to it by the customer.

Counsel turned next to the general assignment of book debts and his preliminary submission with respect to it was that it was a security document only. He submitted, in other words, that in order to resort to it the bank would first have to establish a debt presently owing to the bank for which the assignment was security. The debt in the circumstances of this case would have to be either the overdraft or the liability on the guarantee. Counsel submitted that neither could be relied on as constituting a debt presently due and owing to the bank at the time it purported to act on the assignment because no notice had been given to Hamilton on either the overdraft or the guarantee as is, he submitted, required by law.

Counsel is undoubtedly correct that the general assignment of book debts is a security document. It is stated to be such on its face. Paragraph (2) reads:

> (2) This assignment and transfer shall be a continuing collateral security to the Bank without impairment or novation of any other existing or future security and shall operate as a general security for all present and future indebtedness and other liability of the assignor to the Bank so long as the assignor shall remain indebted or otherwise liable to the Bank or shall continue to be receiving advances from the Bank: but the assignor shall be entitled upon the discharge of all indebtedness and other liability of the assignor to the Bank to the cancellation hereof.

However, in paras. (8) and (9) of the assignment it is provided:

> (8) It is hereby agreed that all monies received by the assignor in payment of any debts, demands and choses in action which are now due, owing or accruing due, or which may hereafter become due, owing or accruing due to the assignor or in payment of any claims of whatsoever nature or kind which the assignor now has or may hereafter have including claims against the Crown and claims under insurance policies, shall be received and held by the assignor in trust for the Bank.
> (9) The Bank shall have the right at any time to appropriate any payment made to any portion of the said indebtedness whether the same be represented by open account, overdraft, or by any bill, note, or other instrument and whether then due or to become due and may from time to time revoke or alter such appropriation and appropriate payments to any other portion of the said indebtedness as in its sole and uncontrolled discretion it may see fit.

Do these provisions in the assignment present an insurmountable obstacle for the appellant on this aspect of its argument? The question they seem to pose is whether, regardless of any notice having been given of an intention to terminate the course of dealing on an overdraft or any demand having been made under the guarantee, the bank is nevertheless entitled to appropriate the cheques to the discharge of Hamilton's liability to itself. Do paras. (8) and (9) expressly negate the application of the principles contained in the case law already referred to? Are they a blanket dispensation with the need for prior notice, prior demand, or even for an existing debt which has already matured?

I do not think this can be so. While these provisions appear on their face to constitute the assignor a trustee for the bank of any payments it receives from its customers and to permit the bank to appropriate them at will, whether or not any debt is then due to the bank by the assignor, this seems to be quite incompatible with the nature of the instrument as a collateral security. I have no doubt that in circumstances where no notice or demand with respect to the primary debt is required, immediate recourse may be had to the collateral security. But where as in this case such notice or demand is required, then I believe it follows that the assignment of book debts cannot be resorted to until that has been done. While para. (9) expressly confers to the bank the right to appropriate payments made to the customer "to any part of the said indebtedness ... and whether then due or to become due" I do not think this is intended to permit the bank at any time, whether or not there is any existing indebtedness, to start appropriating payments made to the customer to prospective future debts. I think the prospective language in the assignment is there because it is a "continuing collateral security". In other words, I think the intent of the document is that the security attaches not only to presently existing debts but to debts which may arise in the future i.e. subsequent to the giving of the security.

Assuming then for the moment that counsel's submissions on the law thus far are sound, was the factual basis for their application established at trial? Did Thermo King prove a course of dealing between the bank and Hamilton which would trigger a requirement of notice before the bank could terminate the overdraft? The learned trial judge made no finding on this aspect of the case but I believe that the evidence and the exhibits amply support that Hamilton operated with a continuous, fluctuating overdraft from the time it started business in 1973 up until June 25, 1976. Indeed, its overdraft on June 25, 1976, was lower than it had been in several months. The testimony and exhibits also disclose, however, that the bank as an internal matter was concerned about Hamilton's "unauthorized overdraft" and that Mr. Gibson, the bank manager, had been instructed by his superiors in March and again in May of 1976 that "loans to this company are to be placed on a strictly reducing basis unless you have our prior approval". Mr. Gibson was asked at trial whether his bank in March and April of 1976 were reluctant to honour Hamilton's cheques until further deposits were made to its account and he said he thought that this was true. On being asked the reason he stated (transcript p. 277):

Q. And what was the reason for the bank's reluctance?

A. The bank was concerned as to the ultimate recovery of those loans. The account at that time was in overdraft. We didn't want to see the overdraft become too high.

Q. Did Hamilton Transport ever have an authorized line of credit?

A. No.

Q. It operated simply on an overdraft basis?

A. Yes.

I do not believe that this evidence, assuming it was accepted by the trial judge, can be viewed as notice to Hamilton that it was no longer going to be permitted to function on an overdraft basis. On the contrary, if anything, it suggests that at that time the bank was quite prepared to continue the overdraft provided it was kept within reasonable limits.

I have concluded that the bank, having decided after Southern was wound down to look to Hamilton for repayment of Southern's debt, embarked on a course of dealing to accommodate Hamilton in it (the bank's) own long term interests. However, as Mr. Gibson acknowledged, the substantial deposits made to Hamilton's account on June 25, 1976, presented too good an opportunity to be missed and the bank decided at that point to "lower the boom" on Hamilton. I do not believe the bank had the right to do this in the circumstances without any prior notice to Hamilton. Nor do I think it can rely on the guarantee in support of its refusal to issue the draft since no demand was made on it until Mr. Gibson attended with the receiver manager at Hamilton's premises three days later. I think the bank had no basis for refusing to follow its customer's instructions once its requirements of certification of the largest of the deposited cheques was met.

It is submitted by counsel for the appellant that the bank's wrongful act in refusing to issue the draft in its favour when instructed to do so by Hamilton constituted the tort of inducing breach of contract: see Lumley v. Gye (1853), 2 E. & B. 216, 118 E.R. 749; Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A.C. 495. He submits that the bank not only knew of the contract between Thermo King and Hamilton but knew its precise terms. It knew that by refusing to issue the draft it was making it impossible for Hamilton to perform its obligation under the contract. Counsel submits therefore that it intended to bring about the breach or, at the very least, should be presumed to have so intended from the fact that the breach was to its knowledge the inevitable result of its refusal to issue the draft. Counsel further submitted, given that the essential elements of the tort were established, that the bank's wrongful act cannot constitute "reasonable justification" in law.

In his factum counsel states:

> It is implicit in the reasons of the trial judge that he found that the requisite elements of the tort had been proved, but that he held that, "On the facts of this case, the action of the bank was justified and not wrongful."

It is perhaps unfortunate that the learned trial judge did not address himself to the element of intent as an ingredient of the tort but dealt with it rather in the context of "reasonable justification". In that context he found that:

The bank acted not with any intention of inflicting harm on the plaintiff, but to protect its legitimate interests.

Although this is an express finding of intention by the learned trial judge, it seems to me that he put in apposition the intention to inflict harm on the plaintiff and the intention to protect its own interests because he was directing his mind to whether the bank's conduct should be excused in law. The trial judge, it seems to me, was really asking the question: What motivated the bank? What caused it to do what it did? Did it have a legitimate and defensible reason? He found that it did. It was seeking to protect its own legitimate interests. And hence he found it did nothing wrongful.

Having concluded that the learned trial judge erred in finding that the bank did nothing wrongful, the Court must now ask itself: Did the plaintiff succeed in establishing the essential elements of the tort? The bank's wrongful act cannot constitute "reasonable justification", but the plaintiff still has to prove its cause of action. Did the bank intend to cause Hamilton to breach its contract with the plaintiff? It seems to me that it clearly did. That was the only way in which it could retain the funds in Hamilton's account for its own use. I do not think this is a case of presumed intent. In other words, I do not think that the bank's act in refusing to issue the draft should be approached on the basis that, because the breach was the inevitable consequence of the bank's conduct, an intention to cause the breach must be presumed against it. Presumed intent may not be enough: see D.C. Thomson & Co. Ltd. v. Deakin et al., [1952] Ch. 646, per Upjohn J. at p. 663. I approach the matter rather on the basis that the bank's objective of applying the funds towards Hamilton's indebtedness to it could only be attained by disabling Hamilton from performing its contract with Thermo King: see Torquay Hotel Co. Ltd. v. Cousins et al., [1969] 2 Ch. 106; Celona v. Kamloops Centennial (Pacific No. 269) Branch Royal Canadian Legion et al., [1974] 2 W.W.R. 144. The bank knew the relationship between Hamilton and Thermo King. It also knew that if the draft was not issued, the contract between Hamilton and Thermo King would be breached. It intended to cause that breach. It may have intended it in order to further its own purposes, but it intended it nonetheless. On the facts of this case I have no difficulty in finding that the bank knowingly induced the breach of contract.

If the bank's action had been lawful as the learned trial judge found, then it would have constituted reasonable justification for its conduct. As it pointed out by the editors of Paget, supra, a banker is entitled to put his own interests ahead of the conflicting interests of his customer or those dealing with his customer but only if he does so in exercise of a legal right. A banker has this right absent any course of dealing giving rise to a requirement of notice. I have concluded, however, that there was such a course of dealing in this case.

I would allow the appeal, set aside paras. (2) and (3) of the judgment and award the plaintiff damages against the bank in the amount fixed by the learned trial judge. I would give the plaintiff its costs both here and in the court below.

Appeal allowed.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

GAUTHIER J.A.

[1] Burns Bog Conservation Society appeals from the judgment of Russell J. of the Federal Court (the Judge) granting the respondent's motion for summary judgment pursuant to section 215 of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106 (the Rules), and dismissing its action against the respondent.

I. BACKGROUND

[2] The Judge describes in detail the facts in his reasons at paragraphs 2 to 20, reported at 2012 FC 1024. For the purpose of this appeal, it will suffice to highlight the following facts.

[3] Burns Bog, located in British Columbia, is one of the largest raised peat bogs in the world. The appellant is a registered non-profit society dedicated to preserving Burns Bog and raising awareness of its significance (Reasons at paragraph 2).

[4] In 2004, the corporation of Delta, the Greater Vancouver Regional District and the Province of British Columbia (together, the Bog owners) purchased six parcels of Burns Bog for conservation purposes from its private owners. The Federal Government contributed $28 million to the purchase, but did not take title to any part of Burns Bog. The Contribution Agreement requires the Bog owners to ensure that at least five thousand acres of Burns Bog will be managed as protected conservation land (Reasons at paragraph 4).

[5] In March 2004, the Bog owners granted the Federal Government a conservation covenant (the Covenant) over Burns Bog under section 219 of the British Columbia Land Title Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 250. The Covenant restricts the activities that the Bog owners may undertake on Burns Bog. Specifically, the Bog owners' use of the land is subject to the terms and conditions set out in the Covenant. The Covenant is registered as a charge on Burns Bog (Reasons at paragraph 31).

[6] The Covenant provides at section 9.1 that the obligations it creates are solely contractual:

> The parties agree that this Agreement creates only contractual obligations and obligations arising out of the nature of this Agreement as a Covenant under seal. Without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the parties agree that no tort or fiduciary obligations or liabilities of any kind are created or exist between the parties in respect of this Agreement and nothing in this Agreement creates any duty of care or other duty on any of the parties to anyone else.

[7] The Covenant also includes an "entire agreement" clause:

> 16. None of the parties hereto have made any representation, Covenants, warranties, guarantees, promises or agreements (oral or otherwise) with any other party than those contained in this Agreement or in any other agreement that is reduced to writing and executed by all parties to it. This agreement may only be changed by a written instrument signed by all the parties.

[8] On March 23, 2004, the Bog owners and the Federal Government entered into the Burns Bog Management Agreement (the Management Agreement). The Management Agreement lays out the process by which the parties would develop a long-term management plan, as per the Contribution Agreement. On May 25, 2007, the Bog owners finalized the Burns Bog Ecological Conservancy Area Management Plan (the Management Plan), setting out policy directions and recommended actions to maintain Burns Bog's ecology.

[9] The British Columbia Gateway Program is a project run by the Provincial Government of British Columbia to improve bridge and road infrastructure throughout the greater Vancouver area. It includes a segment of road that runs adjacent to Burns Bog, the South Fraser Perimeter Road (SFPR). On September 3, 2008, the Federal and Provincial Governments entered into an arrangement to fund the SFPR. However, notwithstanding its financial contribution, the Federal Government did not assume any responsibility for the construction or operation of the SFPR.

[10] The construction of the SFPR required an environmental assessment under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, S.C. 1992, c. 37. This assessment was carried out jointly with the Province's own environmental study in accordance with the Canada – British Columbia Agreement for Environmental Assessment Cooperation (2004). The assessment's conclusion was that the SFPR was not likely to cause significant adverse environmental effects if certain mitigation measures were followed, such as the creation of hydrology and air quality work plans. The assessment report, dated June 27, 2008, contains a specific section dealing with Burns Bog (A.B., Vol. II, pages 377-385). It is clear that Environment Canada and the Scientific Advisory Panel were involved in making several recommendations during the assessment, the whole in accordance with section 8.2 of the Management Plan (A.B., Vol. I, page 276).

[11] In 2010, the appellant filed a statement of claim seeking to compel the respondent to protect Burns Bog, claiming that the Federal Government owes the Canadian public a trust, fiduciary, or other legal duty to protect Burns Bog, or that it is bound to protect Burns Bog under a number of federal statutes. The appellant asks the Court for an injunction halting construction of the SFPR until the Federal Government has intervened to ensure that the construction will not impact the ecological integrity of Burns Bog. Apart from damages, general and punitive, the appellant also seeks a declaration that Burns Bog is subject to a public trust and/or equitable relationship with the Federal Government who is required to protect it.

[12] After filing its statement of defence, the respondent brought a motion for summary judgment pursuant to section 215 of the Rules alleging that there was no legal basis for the appellant's claim.

A. Federal Court Decision

[13] In a comprehensive and well-reasoned decision, the Judge addresses the following issues: (i) whether the statement of claim discloses a genuine issue for trial; and (ii) whether summary judgment is appropriate.

[14] The Judge concludes that the matter is appropriate for summary judgment as there are no contested facts which need to be resolved in order to determine whether the appellant's claim has any chance of success (Reasons at paragraph 65).

[15] The Judge also concludes that after reviewing the record, the relevant agreements, and the principles and authorities put forward by the parties, he is convinced that the respondent has made its case for summary judgment (Reasons at paragraph 76). The Judge summarizes his reasoning as follows at paragraph 77:

> 77 Canada does not owe any duty to the Plaintiff, the Bog or the general public respecting the protection of the Bog's ecological integrity. This is because:
>
> a. The Covenant, Management Agreement and Management Plan do not impose upon Canada any positive obligations respecting the protection of the Bog;
>
> b. Canada does not owe any trust obligations respecting the Bog because Canada does not own the Bog. Moreover, there is no basis in law or equity for the imposition of a "public trust" duty in this case;
>
> c. Canada has not undertaken any fiduciary obligations with respect to the Bog; and,
>
> d. None of the statutes cited by the Plaintiff impose upon Canada any obligations with respect to the protection of the Bog.

2014 FCA 170 (CanLII)

[16] Regarding the Covenant, the Judge observes that it does not impose upon the Federal Government any obligation regarding Burns Bog (Reasons at paragraph 78). Moreover, the Covenant applies only to Burns Bog and as such, does not limit the use of land outside of Burns Bog (Reasons at paragraph 80). As such, it cannot be used to give rise to an obligation to ensure that the SFPR is constructed by the Provincial Government in a manner that would help preserve Burns Bog.

[17] In the Judge's opinion, the Covenant does not create a trust relationship between the Federal Government and Burns Bog, as it does not provide the Federal Government with title to Burns Bog or give it the ability to control Burns Bog, and explicitly stipulates that it does not create any "tort or fiduciary obligations or liabilities of any kind" (Reasons at paragraphs 100-105).

[18] With respect to the Management Agreement, the Judge observes that it is clear that this document was intended to act as a bridge and to provide for the management of Burns Bog while the parties worked toward the development of the long-term Management Plan. This agreement does not contain any provisions that would require the Federal Government to take any steps to protect Burns Bog, with the Government's only commitment in this agreement being to participate in the collaborative planning team to prepare the Management Plan (Reasons at paragraphs 87-88).

[19] As for the Management Plan, the Judge notes that this document is not a contract, but a policy document that identifies various priorities and recommended actions regarding Burns Bog. This Plan does not oblige the Federal Government in any way to protect Burns Bog (Reasons at paragraphs 90-91, 93).

[20] After noting that the appellant has done little to suggest how a trust or fiduciary obligation with respect to Burns Bog could have arisen on the facts of this case, the Judge notes that an analysis of the basic principles applicable to the creation of such obligations demonstrates that there is nothing to support such obligations in this particular case (Reasons at paragraph 94).

[21] After reviewing the authorities referred to by the parties, including particularly the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in British Columbia v. Canadian Forest Products Ltd., 2004 SCC 38, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 74 [Canfor], the Judge concludes that no Canadian court has recognized a public trust duty that requires the Federal Government to take positive steps to protect the environment generally or a specific property owned by other parties. In that respect, the Judge notes that the factual situation in the present matter is strikingly different from that before the Supreme Court of Canada in Canfor (Reasons at paragraph 112). In his view, the public trust duty aspect of the claim is bound to fail.

[22] The Judge also rejects the argument that there is a fiduciary obligation owed to the Canadian public at large or to Burns Bog itself. The Judge notes in respect of the latter that fiduciary obligations can only be owed to persons or classes of persons, not geographical locations, and therefore it is not possible to owe an obligation toward the land itself. With respect to a duty to the general public including particularly to the appellant, the Judge observes that to succeed, the appellant would have to demonstrate an ad hoc fiduciary relationship and that, applying the principles set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Alberta v. Elder Advocates of Alberta Society, 2011 SCC 24, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 261, this claim is also bound to fail (Reasons at paragraphs 113-125).

2014 FCA 170 (CanLII)

[23] Before concluding, the Judge reviews the appellant's allegation that there is a statutory duty to protect Burns Bog, finding that such allegation is also bound to fail because there is no basis for finding any such obligation (Reasons at paragraphs 126-128).

[24] The Judge concludes by stating that while he appreciates the appellant's concerns over the future of Burns Bog, there is nothing before him that substantiates those concerns or that suggests that the Federal Government has a legal obligation, let alone a legal right, to step in and insist that the SFPR project be reviewed again and/or modified (Reasons at paragraphs 69-73, 129-130). He thus allowed the respondent's motion for summary judgment.

II. ISSUES

[25] First, the appellant submits that the Judge erred in law by requiring it to put forward evidence of harm to Burns Bog.

[26] Second, the appellant argues that the Judge erred in law by failing to conclude that the various agreements referred to above provide a legal basis for its action. At the hearing, the appellant made it clear that the Judge referred to the appropriate legal test to determine if there was a genuine issue for trial. What the appellant disputes is how the Judge applied this test.

[27] Whereas in its memorandum the appellant appeared to concentrate on the Judge's treatment of the principles regarding trust and fiduciary obligations, during the hearing the appellant acknowledged that the Judge did not misstate the applicable general principles of law. Rather, the appellant submitted that its action raises novel issues (such as the effect of the Covenant) that require a novel remedy to ensure its performance.

[28] At the hearing, the appellant insisted that the Judge erred by failing to consider that the various agreements referred to above created a sui generis legal obligation on the Federal Government to protect Burns Bog. This novel duty would be somewhat akin to the duty alluded to in Canfor when the Government owns land. It is in that sense that the Judge would have erred in concluding as he did at paragraphs 101-105 of his Reasons. The appellant also argued that such a duty would be analogous to the concept of the "honour of the Crown" developed in aboriginal law.

[29] In the appellant's view, these novel arguments warrant further investigation. The appellant should thus be allowed to get through the discovery process so that it can better substantiate the concerns raised by Eliza Olson in her affidavit as well as add details with respect to how the agreements at issue came about. It is clear that at this stage, and this was confirmed at the hearing, that what the appellant seeks is a further assessment on the environmental impacts of the SFPR on Burns Bog.

[30] The appellant no longer argues that the respondent has a statutory duty to protect Burns Bog that goes beyond the assessment already performed.

III. ANALYSIS

[31] Absent an extricable error of law, the decision of the Judge can only be overturned if he made a palpable and overriding error. An error of law is reviewable on the standard of correctness (Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235).

[32] As noted earlier, the Judge mentions that the appellant has not put before the Court any evidence to support the concerns expressed by Eliza Olson in her affidavit. He also adds that the appellant did not present evidence of relevance to the issue of whether the respondent owes some contractual, trust, fiduciary or statutory obligation to maintain the ecological integrity of Burns Bog (Reasons at paragraphs 70 and 72).

[33] The appellant argues that "the [J]udge erred in holding that there was no evidence addressing the [r]espondent's factual and legal arguments" (Appellant's Memorandum at paragraph 31). The appellant also argues that the Judge erred in holding that there was no evidence of harm to Burns Bog given that the concerns set out at paragraph 3 of Eliza Olson's affidavit should be sufficient to support its action at this stage (Appellant's Memorandum at paragraph 40).

[34] According to the appellant, the Judge's statements in that respect constitute an error of law because, as it was set out in MacNeil Estate v. Canada (Department of Indian & Northern Affairs), 2004 FCA 50 [MacNeil], parties responding to a summary judgment motion do not have to prove all of the facts of the case and merely need to show that there is a genuine issue for trial (Appellant's Memorandum at paragraph 35).

[35] Although I agree with the legal principle stated in MacNeil, I do not believe that the Judge required that the appellant "prove all of the facts of the case". Moreover, the Judge did not base his decision to grant summary judgment on such "lack of evidence". Rather, the Judge concluded that there was no genuine issue for trial because there was no legal basis in this case to find that the respondent owes a legal duty to protect Burns Bog.

[36] The Judge had to consider the evidence of Eliza Olson as this was the only evidence put forth in response to the motion before him. His statement that her evidence is limited to her personal beliefs and that there is no real evidence to support such beliefs is an accurate description of this evidence. I agree with the Judge that such beliefs do not assist him in understanding what the respondent's legal responsibility for Burns Bog is (Reasons at paragraph 72).

[37] Moreover, at paragraph 75 of the Reasons, the Judge notes:

> There is an obvious reason for this lack of evidence. The issue of Canada's obligations is almost entirely legal. We have before us all of the relevant agreements and principles required to answer the question of whether there is a genuine case for trial on this matter.

[38] In its memorandum at paragraph 32, the appellant acknowledges that the Judge correctly described the only issue before the Court in paragraph 66 of his Reasons when he states:

> The issue is whether there is a genuine issue for trial over whether the Defendants owe to the Plaintiff any duty with respect to Burns Bog that compels any of the > Defendants to intervene and ensure that the construction of the SFPR does not impact the ecological integrity of Burns Bog.

[39] Having reviewed the agreements and the principles referred to, the Judge concludes that the respondent does not owe any duty to the appellant, Burns Bog or the general public regarding the protection of Burns Bog's ecological integrity (see paragraph 77 of the Reasons reproduced above at paragraph 15).

[40] This brings me to the second part of the appellant's submissions, namely that the Judge erred by failing to conclude that the various agreements referred to above provide a legal basis for its action.

[41] The appellant is correct when it says that its action should not be struck merely because it relies on novel arguments. That said, novelty alone is not a sufficient answer in and of itself to allow an action to proceed and to refuse to grant summary judgment. Novelty does not address the need to weed out hopeless claims.

[42] As noted by the Supreme Court recently in Hryniak v. Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7 at paragraph 34, the summary judgment motion is an important tool for enhancing access to justice because it can provide a cheaper and faster alternative to a full trial. Swift judicial resolution of a legal dispute allows individuals to get on with their lives. Proportionality is a recognized principle that can act as a benchmark for access to civil justice. Judges are tasked with recognizing when summary judgment is appropriate in order to avoid wasting resources on a full trial.

[43] I agree with the Judge that this is a clear case where the appellant's claim must be weeded out because it is bound to fail. I agree with the Judge substantially for the reasons he gave that the appellant has failed to establish the essential elements of a trust or fiduciary relationship.

[44] It is clear that in reaching his conclusion, the Judge carefully considered Canfor. He found that at best Canfor opens the door to the application of the public trust doctrine developed in the United States in respect of land owned by the Crown (see Canfor at paragraphs 74-81). Here, as mentioned, the respondent does not own Burns Bog.

[45] The appellant acknowledged at the hearing before us that the particular public trust or fiduciary duty it is relying on has not yet been recognized anywhere, including the United States. The appellant's position requires extending not only Canadian law but the American doctrine upon which the appellant relies on to a completely different situation.

[46] In the absence of a precedent dealing with the alleged sui generis public trust duty, the Judge turned to the basic principles of fiduciary and trust law. Indeed, the Supreme Court of Canada has already set out general principles that should guide the Courts when reviewing cases alleging an ad hoc fiduciary duty imposed on governments. It has also set out the general principles applicable to cases where a trust relationship is alleged.

[47] The Judge identified those principles and applied them to the matter before him. I am satisfied that he was not limiting himself to factual situations already encountered in the case law and kept an open mind as to what new circumstances these principles could apply to. I find no error in his articulation of the law or in his application of these legal principles to the facts of this case.

2014 FCA 170 (CanLII)

[48] There is no indication that the appellant raised the concept of the "honour of the Crown" before the Judge. It is not referred to in the proceedings. I do not believe that we should entertain that argument. In any event, this analogy is inappropriate.

[49] As to the appellant's argument that for every wrong there must be a legal remedy, I have not been persuaded that it has any application here. The appellant has not challenged in any way, through judicial review or otherwise, the joint environmental study performed to assess the potential impact of the SFPR on Burns Bog.

[50] In my view, there is simply no error that would justify this Court's intervention. In these circumstances, I propose that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

[1] April 4, 1995. ADAMS J.: – The plaintiffs allege that the Bank of Montreal ("the Bank") destroyed their businesses. It did so, they allege, by failing to give reasonable notice of demands for repayment of loans, by immediately appointing a receiver, Peat Marwick Thorne Inc. ("Peat"), over financially strategic assets and by wrongful "disclosures" to third parties. In their statement of claim the plaintiffs claim approximately $30,000,000 in damages. The Bank responds that the credit facilities extended to the corporate plaintiffs were in the nature of demand loans and that it was justified in requesting their immediate repayment, in simultaneously installing a receiver and in speaking to third parties. Alternatively, the Bank disputes the extent of the business losses claimed. The Bank also counterclaims for the shortfall on its loans in the amount of approximately $200,000.

I. INTRODUCTION

[2] Murano is a 32-year-old, self-educated entrepreneur. The Bank's actions, which are central to this litigation, occurred on March 27, 1991. At that time, Murano owned 100 per cent of 873047 Ontario Limited ("873047") which in turn owned and operated several retail home video rental stores in the Kitchener, Cambridge, and Waterloo areas under the trade name of "Bandito Video". In these proceedings, those stores are described as the Hilton Division. Murano had also just opened five other stores under the trade name “Top 30” and negotiated leases for a further seven stores to be opened in 1991. There were plans to open more than 70 Top 30 stores over the following four years. As well, in February of 1991, Murano had agreed to purchase the companies which owned and operated Bandito Video’s eight corporate stores and 44 franchised stores. This transaction was to close in April 1991. At the time, Bandito Video was one of the largest video rental chain store operations in Canada.

[3] Murano claims that the Bank’s actions in seizing the Hilton Division destroyed that division and prevented the Bandito Video transaction and the Top 30 trade initiative from being carried out.

[4] Murano owned several commercial properties in Kingston, Ontario, together with various mortgages and notes receivable. He contends that the taking of the Hilton stores by the defendants prevented the servicing of loans secured by his real estate assets and any opportunity of refinancing. Other financial institutions therefore seized all of his real estate and disposed of it at distressed sale prices. It is also alleged the Bank disposed of his mortgage assets and notes receivable in an improvident manner.

[5] The business losses alleged fall in a range between $9,800,000 to $9,900,000. These losses consist of $2,835,000 to $2,570,000 for losses associated with the Bank seizing the Hilton Division stores; $2,315,000 to $1,989,000 for the loss of the Top 30 stores which had been opened or for which leases had been signed; $411,000 in respect of the 1991 projected earnings for additional Top 30 stores planned to be opened that year; $1,438,000 to $1,180,000 for losses arising from the failed acquisition of the Bandito Video corporate and franchised stores; and $2,840,000 for losses associated with the sale of his various commercial properties, mortgages, and notes receivable.

[6] The Bank takes the position that the quantifiable losses suffered by Murano in connection with the disposal of the Hilton Division are in the range of $560,000 to $715,000. The Bank submits that Murano has been unable to quantify all other losses with the requisite certainty and, alternatively, disputes that such losses were foreseeable and caused by its actions. It is the Bank’s position that Murano’s business was a highly leveraged “house of cards” waiting to fall.

[7] Murano also complains that following the appointment of the receiver, the Bank told other bankers, lenders, business associates and suppliers that it had appointed Peat because of Murano's dishonest conduct arising out of his desperate financial situation. He submits that the financial disclosure was in breach of an implied contractual duty of confidentiality and that the allegation of dishonesty was untrue. It is claimed that resulting rumours of Murano's dishonesty and that his companies were in a precarious financial position spread quickly through the business community making it impossible for him to continue. The plaintiffs' claim the Bank's conduct was "callous, high-handed, and arrogant" and request that punitive damages be awarded.

[8] The Bank, however, denies that it breached any confidence with respect to the business affairs of the plaintiffs. It also denies that it acted in a high-handed, callous and arrogant manner. Rather, the Bank submits that it acted to protect its security as a result of the improper, unwarranted, and illegitimate actions of the plaintiffs in absconding with significant assets subject to the Bank's security. By counterclaim, the Bank claims $207,085 as the difference between the outstanding indebtedness of the plaintiffs at the date of the appointment of the receiver and the realization by Peat on those assets it could locate and sell.

II. FACTS

A. The Businesses

[9] Murano was a successful entrepreneur in the Kingston area prior to his ventures in the home video rental industry. By 1988 he had developed and sold approximately 11 pizza stores for in excess of $1,000,000. He owned six commercial properties as well as an eight acre site on which he planned to develop a hotel and related facilities. He owned one submarine sandwich outlet and was a co-owner of a roadhouse restaurant. His net worth was reported to be in excess of $3,000,000. These business activities brought him into contact with Bob Glenn, another Kingston entrepreneur, who owned the Bandito Video chain. Glenn operated the eight corporate stores through Bandito Video Limited ("BVL") and 44 franchised stores through 548531 Limited. Bandito Video, at the time, was one of the largest video chains in Canada, operating primarily in southern Ontario. Glenn had entered into a separate franchise arrangement through BVL with Robert Hilton in respect of four stores owned and operated by Hilton at 1050 King Street, Kitchener; 350 Hespler Road, Cambridge; 450 Erb Street, Waterloo; and 22 Weber Street, Waterloo (i.e. the Hilton Division).

1. The Hilton Division

[10] In December of 1989 Murano and Glenn, as equal partners, bought Hilton's four video stores in a share purchase transaction for a purchase price of $1.3 million. Approximately $1,000,000 of this purchase price was financed by way of a ten year promissory note to Hilton. These stores had been in operation since 1986 and had produced annual revenues in the vicinity of $2,000,000 each year. They were profitable stores for Hilton and remained profitable under the management of Glenn and Murano. In 1990 they produced revenue of $1,773,871 and a net income before income taxes of $497,582. On September 25, 1990, Murano bought Glenn's 50 per cent share for $40,000 in cash and an agreement to assume all of Glenn's liabilities in connection with the four stores.

[11] The Hilton stores were financed through the defendant Bank. The two operating companies, Hilton Video Ltd. ("HVL") and 828556 Ontario Limited ("828556"), each had a $60,000 term loan payable on demand and a $100,000 revolving credit facility, also repayable on demand. The Bank had provided the banking for these companies while Hilton owned them and it continued this relationship with Murano and Glenn albeit on the reduced basis just described. These financing and credit facilities were secured by the assets of the businesses pursuant to security agreements. Written guarantees of the indebtedness of the companies dated February 8, 1990 were provided under seal by Murano and the plaintiff, 873047 Ontario Limited.

[12] As of June 1990, the Bank appears to have been satisfied with its relationship with Murano, Glenn and the corporate plaintiffs. The account manager at the time was Brian Hughes. He had been with the Bank since 1972 and was involved in the approval of the new financing arrangement with Murano and Glenn. He was aware that the companies' year-ends had been changed so that both would have December year-end dates and that Ernst & Young had prepared financial statements as of December 1990. He was familiar with prepared projections for 1990 and with 1990 profit and loss statements to date showing a net profit of $180,000.

[13] Hughes testified that each operating company had a separate bank account and the right to borrow on the unused revolving credit facility for the related company if need be. Hughes left the branch on June 8, 1990. By that time, he had received all of the financial information requested from Murano and his partner. He understood the next scheduled review date was to be in April or May of 1991, i.e. three to four months following the expiration of the new December year-ends of the respective companies.

2. The Top 30 Division

[14] Murano had decided by November of 1990 to open at least 70 video rental stores under the name “Top 30”. These stores were to be smaller in scale than a Bandito Video Super Store and, thus, more affordable for prospective franchisees. The name “Top 30” was essentially a marketing device intended to suggest a store emphasis on the most current titles. Murano discussed the initiative with the Bank at the local branch administering the Hilton loans, but was referred to a Kingston branch said to be closer to his place of residence and his traditional operating base. That branch was not interested. The Toronto Dominion Bank (“the TD Bank”), however, was and on December 6, 1990 agreed to provide financing for the first five Top 30 stores in the amount of $850,000.

[15] The Kingston TD Bank manager of commercial credit, John Desmond Allan, conducted the credit checks leading to the approval of Murano’s application. The TD Bank viewed the Top 30 venture as “high risk” but was comfortable with its security arrangements. It estimated Murano’s net worth at the time to be $2.6 million. The first Top 30 store, situated at 180 King Street East, Gananoque, commenced operations in December 1990. It was Murano’s intention to have opened more than 70 additional video rental stores under this name by 1995. By March 27, 1991, four additional stores had been opened in Cambridge, Kingston and Brockville. A fifth store was opened in Richmond Hill as a result of the transfer of the Hilton Bandito Video store previously operated at 22 Weber Street, Waterloo. Murano had negotiated leases for seven other Top 30 stores involving lucrative landlord incentives. These stores were to be located in Kingston, Brockville, Pickering, East York and Gatineau.

3. The Bandito Video Division

[16] A “preliminary agreement” for the sale of the Bandito Video Division was negotiated in February 1991. By this agreement, Murano was to purchase from Glenn all of the issued and outstanding shares of 548531 and BVL for $1,400,000. The purchase price was to be made up of $266,000 in cash and a 9 per cent note for $1,134,000. This sale was to close in early April 1991. These eight corporate and 44 franchise stores produced revenue of $4,643,000 in 1988, $4,388,000 in 1989 and $4,064,000 in 1990. Earnings (or losses) before taxes in those years were $372,000, a loss of $7,822 and a loss of $92,400, respectively. The cash portion of the purchase price was to be financed by a second mortgage to Edward Bak on Murano's property located at 335-37 Princess Street in Kingston. The first mortgage was in the amount of $650,000 in favour of National Trust. The property had an appraised value as of March 22, 1991 of $1,235,000.

[17] Murano employed Gregory Gray, a certified general accountant, to assist him in planning and administering all these business initiatives.

4. Other Business Assets

[18] Murano owned several properties in the Kingston area. In 1991, real estate was feeling the effects of the recession. Values of commercial properties were in substantial decline, particularly vacant buildings because of the difficulty in attracting new tenants. Murano owned the commercial properties at 161 Princess Street, 335-337 Princess Street, 611 and 512 Princess Street, and 511-513 Albert Street. He also owned vacant land on Princess Street for which a hotel project was planned and a property at 180 King Street East in Gananoque.

[19] All these properties were subject to at least one mortgage. 161 Princess Street was given an estimated market value of $400,000 as of March 27, 1991 and was subject to a mortgage in favour of Royal Bank of Canada dated April 28, 1989. It had been appraised at a market value of $650,000 on October 21, 1988. It was not leased. The street addresses of 611 Princess Street and 511-513 Albert Street are considered to be one property. This site was valued at $750,000 as of March 27, 1991 and $1,035,000 as of May 10, 1989. The mortgage balance outstanding as of March 27, 1991 was $738,297. An appraised value of $1,235,000 was given to 335-337 Princess Street on March 22, 1991 and the mortgage balance outstanding in favour of National Trust Company as of March 27, 1991 was $660,114. A Top 30 Video outlet was located at 180 King Street East in the Town of Gananoque at the end of March 1991 and the property was valued at approximately $650,000, It was subject to a mortgage with the National Trust Company with an outstanding balance of $474,130.

[20] Mortgages and notes receivable in favour of Murano totalled just over $1,000,000 as of March 27, 1991. Included in these items was a mortgage given by 883544 Ontario Limited, a company of former Kingston developer Photis Liappas, which had purchased a Murano property on Elliot Avenue in Kingston in March 1990. Liappas then developed the property supported by a National Trust construction loan in the amount of $2.2 million. Murano took back a mortgage on the property in the amount of $460,000 and agreed to be the anchor tenant when the strip mall was completed. Finally, the eight acres of vacant land on Princess Street held for a hotel project was estimated to have a value of $70,000 on March 27, 1991.

B. The Bigger Picture and Immediate Challenges

[21] All of these business initiatives were interconnected. The real estate assets were used to secure business loans. Profits from the Hilton stores contributed to the service of these loans. Profits and inventory from the Hilton stores also facilitated Murano's Top 30 initiative. The Hilton management team of Rick Leach and Christopher Hagey, together with Robert Hilton acting as a consultant, provided Murano and Gray with the necessary industry expertise. Murano reviewed his "master plan" at a January 22, 1991 meeting of these key people in Kingston.

[22] The video industry was performing well in spite of the recession. This economic downturn had also permitted Murano to negotiate substantial leasehold improvements as additional financial support for his plans. The acquisition of the entire Bandito Video chain in the first week of April 1991 would have made Murano one of the largest retail video rental entrepreneurs in Canada. This purchase would have enhanced his credibility with customers, suppliers and bankers and provided further management expertise and surplus video cassette inventory to support his expansionary plans. David McTurk, who effectively managed the Bandito Video chain, testified that the relationship with Murano was much anticipated to the point where Glenn had been advised by his key staff that they were joining Murano "no matter what".

[23] On the other hand, not only were Murano's business activities highly interrelated, they were highly leveraged. He dealt with several financial institutions and used his real estate base as security in raising the capital he required. Murano's business initiatives were facing serious challenges by March 1991. In early 1991 the industry came under severe pressure from the extensive international television coverage of the Gulf War. This coverage captured the attention of the viewing public to the detriment of video rental operators everywhere. Murano was seeking to restructure his Hilton operations to respond to this pressure. At the same time he was expanding in an effort to capitalize on the continued growth and interest in the industry. Thus, he was intending to move the contents of the 22 Weber Street Bandito Video store to a Richmond Hill Top 30 outlet. He was also planning to increase rental prices and decrease Hilton store expenses which, after a year of familiarity, he and his advisors deemed to be excessive.

[24] Robert Hilton was not in disagreement with any of these initiatives. He was, however, pressing Murano for increased security because of the way the Hilton stores were being exploited. His concerns were conveyed to Murano by letters dated March 5, 1991 and March 25. The March 5, 1991 letter also pointed out a decline in revenue, the slow paying of creditors, and the poor morale of staff. Hilton's prime concern, however, was that his security was being impaired by the use of cassettes and revenue from the Hilton operations to start up the Top 30 Video stores. Murano had been assuring him additional security would be provided, but he had not actually done so. Therefore, on March 25, 1991, Hilton's lawyer made a formal demand for additional security, failing which Hilton threatened to exercise his rights. Nevertheless, Hilton saw great potential in the Top 30 initiative to provide a much needed cash flow.

C. The Bank's Demand

[25] In the midst of these expansion plans and economic pressures, the Bank demanded that 828556 and HVL immediately repay all their loans. These demand letters were hand delivered on March 27, 1991 to HVL and the numbered company at the three surviving Hilton store locations. The 22 Weber Street store had been moved to Richmond Hill the preceding weekend. Peat had been appointed receiver on March 26, 1991, and took possession of the stores two hours after the written demands for payment were delivered. Surprisingly, no effort was made to immediately contact Murano. Instead, the Bank notified him by registered letters dated March 27, 1991 addressed to his home in Glenburnie, Ontario, and to several of his business locations in Kingston. The Bank's hand delivered letters, over the signature of its lawyer W. Wayne McKinnon, were commonly worded:

Re: Bank of Montreal

We act as solicitors for the Bank of Montreal (the “Bank”) and have been advised that their records indicate that Hilton Video Ltd. (the “Company”) is indebted to the Bank for the total amount of $134,479.58 as of March 26, 1991. The Bank hereby demands payment by the Company of such principal and interest in the aggregate amount of $134,479.58 immediately. Interest shall continue to accrue on the company’s indebtedness at the rate or rates applicable thereto until the date of payment in full.

The Bank also hereby demands payment by the Company of such indebtedness pursuant to Ontario Personal Property Security Act Security Agreement dated August 25, 1987, and executed by the Company in favour of the Bank and pursuant to all other security held by the Bank from the Company as security for payment of such indebtedness.

[26] The March 27, 1994 registered letter to Murano read:

Re: Bank of Montreal

The Bank guarantee dated February 8, 1990, of payment of the liabilities of Hilton Video Ltd., Hilton Investments, 828555 Ontario Limited, 828556 Ontario Limited and 828557 Ontario Limited (the “Borrowers”) to the Bank of Montreal (the “Bank”). We are enclosing for your information a copy of our letter of today’s date addressed to 828556 Ontario Limited and Hilton Video Ltd. demanding payment of its liabilities to the Bank. We wish to inform you that if Hilton Video Ltd., Hilton Investments, 828555 Ontario Limited, 828556 Ontario Limited and 828557 Ontario Limited fails to meet the Bank demand, it is the Bank’s intention to require payment from you under your guarantee and thereby demands payment of the total amount of $278,906.06 as at March 26, 1991. Interest shall continue to accrue on the indebtedness at the rate or rates applicable thereto until the date of payment in full.

[27] Both Leach and Hilton immediately advised Peat’s personnel of the whereabouts of the inventory and equipment of the Weber Street store. Unfortunately, the defendants made no attempt to retrieve those assets until late in April and after the landlord of the Richmond Hill store had seized them. Murano was not advised of any specific reason for the Bank’s peremptory demand and installation of the receiver. Instead, his new account manager, Peter Rowlands, simply referred him to the Bank’s lawyers.

[28] Because he had no idea why the Bank had acted in the manner that it had, Murano could only tell those dealing with him that it was all a mistake which would be quickly sorted out. He then contacted his long-standing Kingston lawyer, Ken Coull. Coull spoke to the Bank's lawyer by telephone on April 2, 1991. McKinnon advised Coull there were four reasons for the Bank's actions. First, Murano had not provided financial information required since early December 1990. Second, Hilton had given notice that a receiver was to be appointed. Third, equipment and movies had been moved from Weber Street to an unknown place. And fourthly, a Bank request for a $100,000 pay-down had not been complied with.

[29] Coull advised McKinnon that because Murano was using money generated by the seized stores in his operations elsewhere, the Bank's action would likely trigger his downfall. McKinnon replied that there would be no harm because no one knew. Coull disagreed and told McKinnon that employees, creditors and landlords knew and that the damage was done. Murano also claimed that all financial information had been provided, that the equipment and movies from Weber Street had been moved to Richmond Hill with the Bank's knowledge, and that he had made the required pay-down.

D. Murano's Fall and the Bank's Disclosures

[30] The seizure of the stores had the impact Coull prophesied. Required payments elsewhere in Murano's business operations depended on the cash flow from the Hilton stores. As cheques were returned NSF, Murano's other banking and lending relationships became aware of the Hilton Division receivership. Bak immediately refused to provide Murano with the funds necessary to close the April Bandito Video transaction with Glenn. Bak testified that he had agreed to provide the financing on the assumption that all of Murano's operations were in place and available to him as a source of financial support. Nevertheless, had the Bank given Murano time to pay, Bak had no objection to some or all of the funds he was to provide being used to satisfy the Bank's demands. However, with the installation of a receiver without notice, Murano's financial viability and the reliability of what he was saying were suspect and Bak backed away.

[31] The TD Bank similarly withdrew its financial support for the Top 30 initiative. This was the direct result of the defendant Bank's actions reinforced by information that it supplied to the TD Bank without Murano's consent. On April 5, 1991, Rowlands advised TD Bank official David Day that Murano had told him on March 20 that the Hilton stores were losing money; that there were outstanding payables overdue; and that he had no funds to cover losses. Rowlands further relayed to Day that Murano believed he would have no alternative but to shut his operations down unless the defendant Bank was able to assist him in refinancing both the stores and a new franchise company. Rowlands advised that no financial statements were available and that Murano had closed one of the stores, removing all of the inventory and equipment which had been assigned to the Bank. To the best of Rowlands' knowledge, no new store had been opened in the area.

[32] The TD Bank, not surprisingly, decided to cancel the interim credit facilities for Top 30 Video. Day testified that the Bank did not believe Murano when he said it was all "a big mistake". In Day's view, a bank would not take such serious action without good reason.

[33] The cancellation of the TD Bank's Top 30 support was communicated to Murano by letter written April 9, 1991. The TD Bank also received an unsolicited call from Peter Skebo of the defendant Bank advising that a loan with Murano in Kingston was in default and that equipment was also missing from restaurant premises located there. By letter dated May 22, 1991, the TD Bank made a demand on Murano in respect of all personal accounts with him in the amount of $854,550. But even at that point in time, he was given more than two hours to respond, i.e. until June 1, 1991.

[34] On April 22, 1991, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce ("CIBC") demanded that Murano pay $84,614, $184,746, and $41,621 in respect of outstanding loans. On April 24, the TD Bank demanded a further $93,765. Canada Trust moved, by power of sale, to dispose of his property in Trenton, Ontario. The property at 161 Princess Street in Kingston was sold under power of sale as was the property in Gananoque at 180 King Street. On May 22, 1991 the TD Bank demanded payment of an additional $96,546. Robert Hilton commenced an action against Murano in April 1991, and by April 1992 had judgment against him for over $1,000,000.

[35] Photis Liappas testified that he was advised by a business associate of Murano, Stan Seto, to call Rowlands. Seto told Liappas that Rowlands had told him Murano was a crook. Liappas called Rowlands and, according to Liappas, was told that all of Murano's financials had been falsified and "that basically he was a crook". Liappas thereafter consulted his lawyers and presented Murano with the option of discharging the mortgage Murano held on the Elliot Street property or he would sue Murano alleging fraud. Liappas' lawyers put these options in writing by letter dated May 1, 1991.

[36] Craig Eno, an account manager with Canada Trust, confirmed that Canada Trust called the mortgage on the Trenton property. While Canada Trust had had a good relationship with Murano for several years, it became concerned when Rowlands advised that "in acts of desperation" Murano was taking inventory from video stores in Kitchener and restaurant equipment from premises in Kingston.

[37] Stan Seto had carried out construction work for Murano in respect of several of his stores. He called Rowlands about the receivership and claims to have been told that Murano was losing money and could not meet his payables. Seto said he was also told that Murano had moved inventory to an unknown location and that equipment had been taken from a recently closed pizza business in Kingston. Seto testified that Rowlands indicated Murano was desperate and was essentially a thief. As a result, Seto declined to lease Murano premises which he had been intending to develop in Brockville.

[38] McTurk explained Glenn's reaction to the Bank's actions. Glenn is now deceased but McTurk was present when Glenn spoke to Rowlands on a speaker phone and overheard the account manager's explanation to Glenn of the Bank's actions. Rowlands denied that there was any misunderstanding between Murano and the Bank. He told Glenn that Murano's stores were losing money and that inventory had been improperly removed. Rowlands advised this was not the first time Murano had misconducted himself and alleged that Murano had moved pizza-making equipment from certain Kingston premises and sold it without notice. Rowlands told Glenn that the Bank had no intention of removing Peat. When Glenn, in frustration, then asked to speak to Hughes to get to the bottom of the situation, Rowlands told him that Hughes did not work there any more.

[39] Glenn subsequently gave Murano to the end of April to clear up his problems. Thereafter, Glenn became very ill, was hospitalized and died. His son was not able to carry on the Bandito Video network in a manner satisfactory to the franchisees. They commenced lawsuits in 1992 and Bandito Video, as an integrated franchise operation, ceased to exist.

[40] Peter Skebo testified that he could not imagine telling David Day or anyone else that equipment was missing from Papa Pete's in Kingston. I am satisfied, however, that he did. He had recorded this information and had so advised Rowlands. He possessed the telephone numbers of several of Murano's lenders. The sheer number of creditors who claimed to have had this information shared with them and the difficulty of obtaining it elsewhere reinforces my conclusion.

[41] Rowlands denied telling anyone that Murano was "a crook". Nevertheless, I find that he spoke indiscriminately to anyone inquiring about Murano's affairs to justify the Bank's immediate installation of a receiver, and he left the clear impression that Murano had acted dishonestly. The evidence of Eno, Seto, Liappas, Day and McTurk concerning conversations with Rowlands is far too detailed and too similar to accept Rowlands' bald denial Indeed, this Bank appears to have no clear limits on what it tells third parties about a customer's economic difficulties as evidenced by Kevin Hehir's willingness to divulge otherwise confidential information if asked. Hehir was said to be responsible for the Murano relationship as of March 27, 1991. In fact, it was he who decided to call the loans and appoint a receiver without notice. While he could not recall to whom he may have spoken, he testified that, if asked, he would have expressed the Bank's belief that security had been unlawfully taken by Murano.

[42] The three Hilton stores were sold by September 27, 1991. Net realizable funds before fees totalled $103,115. These stores had been appraised, according to the receiver, at a value between $125,700 to $211,800. Daniel Girardi, a vice-president of Peat, was responsible for the receivership. Hehir contacted him on March 25 and advised that immediate action would be required. Girardi sought and obtained a full indemnification from the Bank as a condition of accepting the assignment. This is the only receivership without notice, of the more than 100 receiverships, in which he had participated. Similarly, this is the only receivership without notice that Hehir had ever directed, in his previous six years of experience with the Special Accounts Management Unit ("SAMU"). SAMU is a special "workout" unit of the Bank. Girardi took possession of Murano's assets at about 3 p.m. March 27, 1991, and by approximately 3:25 p.m. had contacted both Hilton and Murano by telephone. He had no trouble reaching Murano.

[43] Murano testified that the reactions to the receivership of the TD Bank, Seto, Liappas, and Bak were representative of the reaction of all potential lenders he approached for assistance. From an estimated net worth in excess of $2,000,000 in 1990, Murano today has judgments against him in the amount of $4.76 million. His real estate assets, which had been appraised at $3,509,000 and were mortgaged for $1,872,541, realized only $1,753,000 through untimely disposals. Murano claims the resulting losses were caused by the Bank's immediate insertion of the receiver as were the losses on his mortgages and notes receivable. The latter assets had a face value of $1,089,000 but were disposed of for only $24,600. These assets included the $460,000 mortgage given up to Liappas under the threat of a lawsuit.

E. The Previous Banking Relationships

[44] The Bank takes the position it was well within its rights. It relies on the history of its relationship with Murano and his companies including an alleged covert removal of inventory and chattels subject to the Bank's security interest. This position therefore requires a detailed review of the banking relationship and various specific events preceding March 27, 1991.

[45] The Bank had a satisfactory relationship with Murano until at least June 1990 when account manager Brian Hughes left the branch. It had been Hughes' understanding that an annual review of the Murano and Glenn companies would not be again required until April or May 1991 in light of the change in corporate year-ends. Hughes was also aware of the rights of HVL and 828556 to borrow against each other's revolving line of credit.

[46] Hughes left the Bank in early June 1990 and was replaced by Fai Murray. Murano was informed of this change by a letter dated May 31, 1990 advising him that "Brian will be spending a considerable amount of time with Fai prior to his departure to ensure that the change-over has the minimal impact and she is fully familiar with your account". In fact, Murray and Hughes spent little time together and the transfer of Murano's files was entirely perfunctory. Murray was never aware of the change in year-ends of the companies or of the right of these companies to borrow against each other's revolving loan.

[47] By August 16, 1990, she was therefore writing to Murano complaining that Hilton Video Limited had exceeded its lending limits for the third time in the past month and that financial statements for an interim review in May had not been forthcoming. In light of the right of HVL to borrow against 828556's operating line, any excesses were in fact minimal or non-existent and, according to Hughes, the December 31, 1989 Ernst & Young financial statements provided to the Bank were all that had been required prior to his departure in June.

Nevertheless, by letter dated September 11, 1990, Murray complained again that the annual review for the Murano and Glenn companies was “now past due”.

[48] Some of this confusion may have been a product of Murray’s interest in managing larger accounts coupled with a high turn-over in the Bank’s staff. Indeed, in this latter regard, Murray was writing to Gray by October 18, 1990 to advise him that Rowlands had recently joined the Kitchener main branch and would be handling the companies’ accounts. But also contributing to the misunderstanding was the failure of Murano and Gray to question the erroneous assumptions in Murray’s correspondence.

[49] The October 18th letter specifically told Gray that he should not hesitate to contact Murray or Debbie Tughan who would continue as the Account Support Officer. This letter also repeated that the annual review for the accounts was two months past due and requested Gray’s cooperation in submitting the financial statements and supporting information requested in Murray’s letter of September 11 to maintain the credit facilities then in place. Gray never appears to challenge these assertions even though in the preceding month, in accordance with her letter of August 16, 1990, Murray had gone so far as to refuse to honour several cheques which in her view exceeded the lending limits. Surprisingly, however, there was no complaint by Murano. Thus, the confusion arising from Murray’s failure to become properly briefed by Hughes was compounded by the plaintiffs’ equally vexing failure to speak up.

[50] As matters developed, Rowlands refused to take over the files until Murray had completed “her review” and obtained “the requested information”. This seems to be the reason for the first meeting between Murray, Gray and Murano on November 20, 1990. But communications were not improved even in this face to face meeting, Murano recalled that the meeting was devoted to familiarizing Murray with the detail of his operations and included a request for additional financing to support his plans for the Top 30 expansion. Murray, on the other hand, remembered the meeting as the requested “annual review” but without the necessary financial statements. She, however, conceded that the Top 30 concept may have been discussed and that Murano may have asked for more money from the Bank. Indeed, in her subsequent discussion with Mr. Laird, the Credit Manager, it was concluded that Murano’s lending limits were already generous.

[51] The next event appears to be a letter from the Bank dated December 17, 1990 which, to Murano's claimed surprise, laid down very strict terms for a continuation of the banking relationship. This letter, captioned "Without Prejudice", was over the signature of Murray and read:

> We have completed our annual review of your accounts and your request for increased financing. Based on the high leverage and debt servicing shortfall, after provision for video purchases and the general decline in financial trends and industry risk, we are only prepared to extend continued assistance on the basis of the following terms:
> 1) Operating loans in both companies limited to $25,000. with $75,000. termed out over a 4 year repayment plan.
>
> 2) Increase limited to $25,000. to Hilton Video Limited on a term basis, with total term repayments for both companies to total $6,000. per month principal, and liquidation by December 31st, 1994.
>
> 3) Increase of $25,000. to be secured by an additional guarantee from Joe Murano, supported by – > a) letter of undertaking (joint with spouse) re: family homes at Glenburnie R.R. #1 and Humberside Dr.
>
>
> b) letter of undertaking agreeing to inject funds in the event of a servicing deficit from personal funds.
>
> 4) Reconfirmation of guarantees of Feb/08/90 for $320,000. from J. Murano and R. Glenn.
>
> 5) Property searches, at your cost, on all property holdings listed on Schedule B of Joe Murano's personal statement dated Sept/24/90 to confirm title registration and encumbrances.
>
> 6) Satisfactory Bank reports from all financial institutions with which Mr. Murano has personal dealings.
>
> N.B. - Please arrange for Royal Trust, Canada Trust and National Trust to remit directly to the Bank as per the attached Bank formats.
> 7) Monthly in house profit and loss statements to be provided by the 25th of the following month.

1995 CanLII 7410 (ON SC)

N.B. – October and November statements are now outstanding.

8) Certified copy of fire insurance policy with Bank of Montreal as loss payee.

N.B. – Only FAX confirmation received from your agent.

9) Confirmation of Mr. Murano's income. (1989 tax return).

Please provide a response by December 31st as to your agreement with the above arrangements and we will proceed with the increased loan.

Should the above not be satisfactory to you, we will have no other alternative but to request that you seek alternative arrangements to liquidate all loans by January 31st, 1991.

[52] By a conciliatory letter dated January 30, 1991, Gray sent a "counteroffer" which read:

We have reviewed your letter dated December 17, 1990. We have considered your terms, and at this time would prefer to remain with your institution. I hope we can achieve this goal in the spirit of cooperation.

At this time we would ask if you would consider the following proposal:

1) Operating loans in both companies limited to $75,000 with 425,000 termed out over a 2 year repayment plan.

2) Reconfirmation of guarantees of Feb/08/90 for $320,000 from J. Murano and R. Glenn.

3) Satisfactory Bank reports from Toronto Dominion, Canada Trust and National Trust.

4) Monthly in house profit and loss statements to be provided by the 25th of the following month.

5) Certified copy of fire insurance policy with the Bank of Montreal as loss payee.

6) Confirmation of Mr. Murano's 1989 income when tax return completed.

7) Presentation of $100,000 to the Bank of Montreal March 1, 1991 to be applied to our account at your discretion.

Please feel free to call me should any questions or concerns arise.

1995 CanLII 7410 (ON SC)

[53] On February 6, 1991, Murray conveyed the Bank's acceptance of this proposal subject to certain qualifications. Her letter stated:

> We are in receipt of your letter of January 30th, proposing alternative credit facilities and repayment term.
>
> Provided we are in receipt of $100,000. by March 1st, 1991 for permanent partial repayment of loans, we are generally receptive to your proposal subject additionally to:
>
> 1) Satisfactory review of your financial statements for the 4th Quarter of 1990 plus a full year accountant prepared statement for Hilton Video Limited and 828556 Ontario Limited as at December 31st, 1990.
>
> 2) Term loan will be subject to satisfactory annual review.
>
> 3) Verification of Mr. Murano's properties by way of property searches at your cost.
>
> N.B. We are agreeable to your arranging same through your solicitor in Kingston for direct dispatch to us.
>
> 4) 1989 tax return for J. Murano.
> It is imperative that the outstanding financial information be forwarded to us at an early date to finalize this long outstanding matter.

[54] Murano and Gray, in these proceedings, took the position that the $100,000 commitment was essentially honoured by payments of February 4 and February 6, 1991 totalling $91,224. These moneys were actually paid into operating accounts before or just as Murray's letter of February 6th was received. This being so, it is difficult to see how these moneys constituted a permanent partial repayment of loans, particularly when no one advised the Bank that these payments were to be attributed to the $100,000 repayment commitment.

[55] On the other hand, Murray's letter of February 6th did not specify how the $100,000 was to be paid other than to stipulate that it had to be made by March 1, 1991. Moreover, when March 1 came and went, no one in the bank advised Murano of the Bank's position. Instead, matters remained unchanged until Rowlands called to arrange a meeting for March 20, 1991 apparently pursuant to Murray's letter of October 18, 1990 promising that Rowlands would be introducing himself in the near future. Murano and Gray were not advised this meeting was to discuss their failure to honour the commitments set out in Murray's letter of

February 6, 1991. Indeed, Murano appears to have seen the March 20, 1991 meeting as an opportunity to seek the Bank's approval of a reorganization plan for the Hilton stores.

1. Meeting of March 20, 1991 and the Move

[56] The meeting was at the Bank's King Street branch in Kitchener. It was attended by Murano, Gray and B.J. Trebor, a retail consultant to Murano. The recollections of Murano and Gray of this meeting are said to have been recorded in the following note made by Gray shortly after the meeting:

MINUTES

Bank of Montreal Meeting

DATE: Mar. 20/91

LOCATION: Bank of Montreal

King St. Kitchener

PARTICIPANTS: Peter Roland (sic) – Bank of Montreal

Joe Murano – Bandito Video

B.J. Trebor – Bandito Video

Gregory Gray C.G.A. – Bandito Video

– Introduced ourselves to Peter Roland and described our individual job functions and how it related to Hilton Video.

– Reviewed the general structure of Hilton Video and Hilton Investments to Peter Roland who had just recently been assigned to our account. We discussed Joe Murano's and Bob Glenn's initial involvement in Hilton Video and their partnership history to date.

– Discussed our video operations both past, present and future, indicating that we were in good standing with the bank in terms of payment obligations.

– We discussed the bank's letter dated Feb. 6/91 and indicated to Peter that we had prior to Feb. 28/91 injected the $100,000 into the operations.

– Introduced the financial restructuring proposal and reviewed the details with Peter.

1995 CanLII 7410 (ON SC)

– We discussed in detail the first stage of our proposal which provided for the transfer of the Bandito Video Weber St., Waterloo assets to a new more profitable location, Richmond Hill.

Joe Murano at this point requested that Peter complete the appropriate documentation to ensure that the assets remained security of the bank regardless of the location change.

We also indicated to Peter that the asset move would take place in a couple of days at which time he gave no indication that it should not occur.

– B.J. Trebor detailed a plan to renegotiate the existing leases, which included downsizing the Kitchener location with a partial sublease.

– Peter indicated that he would work with us on the proposal. He requested the following data as “bullits for his gun” when reviewing the file with his superiors.

– Personal tax return of Joe Murano – Updated financial statements

– Personal financial statement on Joe with supporting real estate appraisals.

– Purchase/Sale agreement between Murano and Glenn – Copies of store leases.

Peter gave the accountant Greg Gray a two week time period to report and indicated that he would require one week to review the data.

– The meeting ajourned on a very positive note as Joe remarked that he felt very positive based on Peter Roland’s attitude and reception of our proposal.

[57] Rowlands’ note to his file conveys a decidedly less optimistic outlook:

Typescript of Rowland’s (sic) Notes

March 20/91 1:50 p.m.

ATTENDANCE: Joe Murano – owner

1 Greg Gray – comptroller

2. Brad Trebor – consultant

1995 CanLII 7410 (ON SC)

1) Opened discussion reviewing letters issued since November and latest offer to reduce loans by $100M on March 1/91.

Floor open for discussion.

2) Principal & consultant advise companies are in a very desperate situation financially and are unable to meet their commitment to reduce Bank advances. They offer counter proposal for reorganization and sale of stores. They ask for immediate response from Bank. – we do not commit to anything.

3) Gray presented current payables information. Copy in file. It looks very bad – they don't know if they can even meet their payroll for Friday, March 22/91.

We advise they won't get any assistance from us by way of o/d ext.

Gov't receivables due and they can't pay same. If 3rd party demand is issued they are effectively finished.

Joe reconfirms he doesn't have any money to put in and won't inject any money under current circumstances.

More discussion on reorganization.

We expressed our concerns with such an offer. As it is presented it wouldn't be acceptable to us. We don't have previously requested information and communication from their side has not been acceptable to us – and has been poor at best.

Consultant advised it would be in everyone's interest to reorganize the businesses as they won't survive as is. A new Marketing strategy [?] is needed. More discussion on reorganization.

Clients ask for quick reply as time is money, they need to start closing stores as soon as possible.

We reaffirm we can't make a decision on their offer today. Our reaction is going to be "tough" and every effort to get that information to us should be made as quickly as possible.

We advise we will further discuss the situation with local account management and advise as to our position on the offer.

P.J. Rowlands

P.S. Also advised clients account would have to be classed as a higher risk and separately reported. $300 fee to do same would have to be paid. - due to financial position and lack of information.

[58] Both Murano and Gray testified that they left this meeting thinking that Rowlands had approved a move of the inventory and chattels of the Weber Street store to the Richmond Hill Top 30 location. Indeed, Murano went directly from this meeting to his local staff and authorized them to commence the closing of the Weber Street store. There was no attempt to conceal from the Bank either the store closing or the whereabouts of the transferred inventory and chattels. For example, on March 22, 1991, employee Stacey Strome, who had known of a likely move since March 10, 1991, attended the Bank's branch in the same plaza in which her store was located to close out the account. She also advised the head teller where the store was going. The previous Wednesday and Thursday the store had been closed and a sign placed in the window indicating the closure was for the purpose of taking inventory. This deception was to ensure that customers brought movies back while the contents of the store were being readied for transfer to Richmond Hill. On the evening of Friday, March 22, 1991, two new signs were posted which advised the store was being moved to Richmond Hill and that coupons could be redeemed at the Kitchener and Beechwood stores. The sign also thanked customers for their patronage. The move took several days and was not completed until March 27, 1991.

[59] The Hilton stores had been profitable for several years. However, 1991 was proving to be a serious challenge. The Gulf War, the recession, an increased debt load, and Murano's use of the cash flow and inventory to support the expansion of the Top 30 stores placed these stores under significant financial constraints. Resulting difficulties were reflected in a document that Gray presented to Rowlands at the March 20, 1991 meeting. This document indicated the stores were losing money for the first time and projected continuing losses through at least to June 1991 unless the proposed strong measures were taken. These measures indicated moving three of the four stores to locations where lease inducements were available. Rowlands recalled the situation being described to him as "desperate". He was told “the bleeding had to be stopped” and that it was not clear the next month’s rent and payroll could be met. He also recalled Murano saying that he was not in a position to put more money into the operations.

[60] Rowlands’ claims to have advised Murano and his colleagues that he would need more information and that any move would require additional security to be provided. He requested cash flow statements, copies of new leases and he estimated that two weeks would be required to assess the situation. Rowlands testified that he understood “everything” would be held in abeyance for the two weeks. He acknowledged Murano stressed the desperation of the situation and that he needed to start closing stores, but he denied authorizing the Weber Street store relocation. Rather, Rowlands recalled saying he would take the information to his supervisors to assess whether the Bank was willing to finance a change to the business and that he would get back to Murano in a “couple of days” if the credit people were interested. He also recalled Murano stating that the $100,000 reduction in the Bank’s advances would not be made. In essence, he saw Murano’s position as “a proposal” to move some of the Bank’s security into a new company called Top 30.

[61] I am satisfied that Murano volunteered to sign whatever paperwork the Bank required to facilitate the change in store locations but it is difficult to comprehend the plaintiffs’ optimistic interpretation of the meeting. Murano and Gray were meeting with Rowlands for the first time and understood that they had to provide further information within the following two week period. How is this understanding to be reconciled with a belief that the Weber Street store move had been approved? Nevertheless, Rowlands at no time expressly told Murano not to move the store. Nor did Murano undertake to refrain from doing so. The established pattern of misunderstanding and lack of clarity between these parties therefore continued.

2. Bank’s Reaction to the Meeting

[62] It is clear, however, that the content of the meeting alarmed the Bank. Rowlands’ previously reproduced report to his supervisor Ed Allinott provoked a special loan review meeting for the next day. Allinott considered the situation to involve an increased risk sufficient to call this meeting of the Credit Review Committee. As a result of the meeting, it was no longer clear the Bank would continue to support the business. The Credit Review Committee decided to send the security documentation to the Bank’s lawyers to ensure that the security was in good standing. It also decided to transfer responsibility for the file to the

SAMU because the business was now a higher than normal risk. Rowlands therefore contacted Hehir, a special accounts manager of that unit, on March 21.

[63] Obviously, the Credit Review Committee did not find Murano's proposal acceptable. But no one "within a few days" advised Murano of this fact as Rowlands had promised. Rather, by the evening of March 21, the plaintiffs files had been shipped off to Hehir by courier and the branch appears to have concluded that it was now Hehir's responsibility to deal with Murano, a customer he had never met. In my view, this peremptory action is explained by notes made of the Credit Review meeting suggesting an intention to move against the plaintiffs by calling their loans. These notes refer to obtaining both a lawyer's advice concerning the calling of the loans and a receiver's advice on appointing it to manage the business. Similarly, the March 21, 1991 lending transaction summaries prepared by Rowlands following the Credit Review meeting reveal no intention that Hehir would work with Murano. Unfortunately, the summaries did contain all of Murray's misunderstandings concerning the timing of annual reviews, the operation of the two revolving lines of credit, slow payments, NSF cheques, and that the loan of HVL was one month in arrears. Most of this information was either exaggerated or inaccurate.

[64] These documents, in my view, make clear that the decision not to advise Murano about the conclusions of the Credit Review Committee was based on the Bank's concern that any such knowledge might result in "movement of inventory, et cetera, to protect personal investment in company". There is also a specific reference to obtaining a lawyer's advice on "what is reasonable notice based on past correspondence since Dec/90", the very argument put before this Court to justify two hours' notice. In the result, while the summaries record that the proposed reorganization of the companies was unacceptable to the Bank, the customer was not advised of this conclusion and, instead, confidential preparations were made by the Bank to install a receiver with as little notice as the past correspondence with the customer would allow.

[65] The explanation for the Bank's stealth seems to be an unquestioned lack of trust combined with the Bank's self-interest. Rowlands, Allinott and the others at the Credit Review Committee meeting did not trust Murano, a person with whom none of them had worked. This unanimous assessment appears to have been the product of Murray's papering of the Bank's files. They were therefore influenced by his apparent failure to provide the financial statements she had requested; by her earlier dishonouring of three or four cheques in ignorance of the right of each company to borrow against the revolving line of credit available to the other; and by her view that Murano had breached his $100,000 pay-down commitment. These failures are insufficient grounds for acting without reasonable notice. In any event, the Bank was not concerned enough at the time to give notice of these failings to Murano, nor warn him that their relationship was at an end if they were not remedied. The Bank was primarily concerned it not "tip off" Murano.

[66] The events of March 25, 1991 require review against this background.

3. Bank's Reaction to the Move

[67] On Monday, March 25, 1991, Rowlands "discovered" that the Weber Street store was empty and advised Allinott. Allinott directed him to tell Hehir. Disturbingly, he also instructed him not to contact Murano until Hehir had time to appraise the situation. Indeed, Murano was not to be spoken to even after Allinott had confirmed that all the remaining stores were in operation. This was so notwithstanding that Rowlands and Allinott both knew Murano had previously proposed to move the store and, as Rowlands agreed on cross-examination, there was therefore no issue in his mind of Murano "back-dooring" the inventory or engaging in a "midnight run". I am satisfied that, in the absence of this direction from Allinott, Rowlands would have called Murano to inquire into the situation. Allinott's conduct is more perplexing. On the one hand, he believed Murano had gone ahead with his reorganization without Bank approval. On the other, he also claimed to be concerned that "everything else" in which the Bank had security would be moved. Yet he knew the remaining stores were still in operation and he made no effort to direct Murano to return the inventory. Finally, it was his view that Hehir now had responsibility for the accounts.

[68] Hehir, however, had never met Murano and agreed that none of the information in the lending transaction summaries contained in the files transferred to him would have justified the appointment of a receiver without notice. Thus, the appointment of the receiver without notice on Hehir's instructions turned on the information he received on March 25 that 22 Weber Street was now closed and empty. Unfortunately, however, Rowlands and Allinott did not tell him that since March 20th the Bank had been aware of Murano's plans to move the store to Richmond Hill. Hehir acknowledged that such information would have been highly relevant to his decision-making. But he insisted he would have acted as he did had he concluded Murano moved the inventory without Rowlands' concurrence. When asked what he would have done in the face of a potential misunderstanding between Rowlands and Murano, Hehir said that he would have questioned Rowlands to determine how surprised or upset he was over Murano's actions. Apparently, Hehir's decision would have hinged on that assessment. Why his assessment would not have included speaking to Murano was not explained. Nor did he explain why a receivership would be imposed before asking Murano to return the security. Moreover, much of this testimony was entirely hypothetical because Hehir acted without the knowledge of everything that Allinott and Rowlands knew.

[69] Hehir's objectivity was further compromised by Dan Hunt's serious but unfounded accusation that Murano had moved chattels in Kingston without the Bank's permission or knowledge. Hehir also admitted that he had been thinking about simultaneously calling the loans and appointing a receiver from the moment he assumed responsibility despite agreeing there was nothing in the files to justify such drastic action. One suspects this predisposition was the product of discussions with those colleagues who transferred responsibility for the accounts to him because he too had developed "a lack of trust" in Murano even before learning of the store's move. In short, there was never an intention to help Murano "work out" his problems and, thus, there was no need to speak to him. Hehir did not know where Murano lived and did not consider faxing a demand to him or otherwise speaking to him before he acted. On the basis of the information in the file, he simply concluded that Murano could not repay the Bank no matter what.

[70] If the movement of the inventory was truly the triggering event for the Bank's actions, it is strange that, on appointing Peat, Hehir made no specific reference to this property. Peat knew within minutes of its attendance at the three surviving stores where the inventory and chattels for 22 Weber Street were located. Yet Murano was not told to return those assets immediately as a condition of terminating the receivership, notwithstanding that on the appointment of the receiver no loan was in default and nothing in the lending transaction summaries for the two corporations justified the action the Bank had taken. A letter was written by lawyers on April 2, 1991 which sought a variety of information and included a request for the return of the Weber Street assets. However, this request was only for the purpose of Peat conducting the receivership. At no time was Murano told that the return of those assets would terminate the receivership.

[71] The receivership took on a Kafkaesque character. When Murano learned on March 27th that a receiver had taken over the Hilton stores, he called Rowlands. Rowlands, conforming with Allinott's instructions to the letter, told him to call the Bank's lawyers. The Bank's lawyers raised all sorts of issues in addition to the inventory, issues which Hehir admitted were insufficient justification for acting without notice. No one told him the receivership was only about having moved the inventory of one store without permission.

III. THE ISSUE OF REASONABLE NOTICE

A. The Law

[72] The law is clear that a bank must give a debtor reasonable notice that it is demanding the repayment of a loan whether or not it is payable "on demand". See Ronald Elwin Lister Ltd. v. Dunlop Canada Ltd., [1982] 1 S.C.R. 726. What period of time constitutes reasonable notice is a question of fact to be determined on the circumstances of each case. See Mister Broadloom Corporation (1968) Ltd. v. Bank of Montreal (1983), 49 C.B.R. (N.S.) 1 (Ont. C.A.). Matters to be assessed in making this determination include (1) the amount of the loan in question; (2) the risk to the creditor of losing money or security; (3) the length of the relationship between the debtor and the creditor; (4) the character and reputation of the debtor; (5) the potential ability of the debtor to raise the money required in a relatively short period; (6) the circumstances surrounding the demand for payment; and (7) any other relevant factor that may exist. See Mister Broadloom Corp., supra, at p. 7.

[73] It has been held that the time to be given a debtor to raise money will generally be of very short duration. This principle recognizes that as time passes, a debtor's financial plight will usually worsen to the detriment of a creditor. Accordingly, it is no answer to say the debtor needs more time. Obviously, the more bleak the debtor's financial condition, the more time will be needed to find replacement credit facilities. But the reciprocal of giving time to a debtor is the potential aggravation of a creditor's losses. Moreover, if a debtor would be clearly unable to raise funds, even if given time, the indulgence may constitute nothing more than an empty formalism to the prejudice of creditors. These principles, however, are based on the assumption that a demand for payment will usually be made when a debtor is in default. Where this is so, reasonable notice will usually involve notice of "a few days". See Kavcar Investments Ltd. v. Aetna Financial Services Ltd. (1989), 70 O.R. (2d) 225 (C.A.) at p. 235.

[74] The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, has now been amended, S.C. 1992, c. 27, s. 87, to require the giving often days' notice. Compare Kavcar Investments Ltd., supra, at p. 236 with the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act s. 244(2). But even previous to this amendment, it was clear that notice of 40 to 50 minutes or, by extension, two hours was not reasonable "unless there plainly were no resources available to meet the debt or unless it were certain that the debtors would abscond with their assets". See Mister Broadloom Corp., supra, at p. 9. Further, courts have been careful to distinguish between exaggerated claims of financial necessity made by a company's principal officer in negotiations with a bank to obtain additional financing and representations that might reasonably be construed by a bank as a waiver of notice. Thus, an executive's statement that he had no intention of putting additional personal funds into a venture has been held not to relieve a bank from giving reasonable notice of its demands for repayment. The precipitous appointment of a receiver therefore constituted a trespass and conversion. In this respect, Estey J. in Ronald Elwin Lister Ltd. v. Dunlop Canada Ltd., [1982] 1 S.C.R. 726, at pp. 747-748 stated:

> Mr. Lister said before the seizure that he did not intend to advance further money to the venture and that if any such money were required, Dunlop should provide it. This is something quite different from a waiver of a right to reasonable notice. This was something said by one party to another in a failing venture, incidental to continuing bargaining or negotiating for some means to save the undertaking and their respective investments in it. If Dunlop relied on this statement in seizing the assets without notice, as they did, they were, in my view, quite wrong. The Listers remained entitled to reasonable notice. The majority of the Court of Appeal concluded that the appellants were required either on these facts or generally to ask for time to pay. No authority was cited for the proposition and none was advanced in this Court. Here the Listers allowed the receiver to enter into possession and to proceed to liquidate Mr. Lister's assets and those of the Company on behalf of Dunlop. This technical or mechanical acquiescence in no way eliminated, by waiver, acquiescence or otherwise, the appellants' entitlement to reasonable notice. In the result, therefore, Dunlop and its agents, its employees and the receiver were guilty of trespass and conversion.

[75] The failure to give reasonable notice constitutes a breach of an implied contract between bank and customer and the related seizure of assets by a receiver constitutes both trespass and a conversion. See McLachlan v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (1989),

35 B.C.L.R. (2d) 100 (C.A.), at p. 105. Very short notice, particularly notice of less than one day, is prima facie unreasonable and, in such circumstances, justification lies with the creditor. See Kavcar Investments Ltd,, supra, at p. 238. In this respect, Madam Justice McKinlay stated:

> However, any very short notice period – certainly one of less than a day – is prima facie unreasonable, and in such a case it would be up to the creditor to show why, in the particular circumstances, the period allowed was reasonable. It is important for creditors to keep in mind that while the creditor of a dishonest debtor may well have evidence of that dishonesty available to him, to obtain evidence of a debtor's inability to raise funds is a much more difficult matter. Even a technically insolvent debtor may have funds available through related individuals or corporations. If a creditor demands payment and gives his debtor no time or a very short time to pay, relying on the debtor's inability to raise funds, he takes the risk that he will be unable later to prove that inability.

[76] Finally, there is judicial recognition that Canada's banks occupy a privileged position in the economy and shoulder correlative duties in respect of their customers. The policy underlying this perspective was captured by McDonald J. in Royal Bank v. W. Got & Associates Electric Ltd., [1994] 5 W.W.R. 337 (Alta. Q.B.), at p. 396, para. 148 in writing:

> Canada's major chartered banks occupy a privileged position. It is not easy for a new bank to obtain a charter and to attain an established position in the marketplace. The major chartered banks are a vital source of financing for Canada's businesses. The small group of major chartered banks enjoy prestige, respect and respect in the commercial community and among depositors (whose deposits form the source of the banks' lending capacity). This respect is engendered not only by their large and firm capital base which gives reassurance of stability, but also by their integrity and good faith in their dealings with borrowers and depositors alike. The major chartered banks are not a collectivity of retailers responsible only to their shareholders for the maximization of profits. They are looked to by the citizenry as honest, trustworthy, law-abiding leaders of the business community. The citizenry expects the ethics of the chartered banks to be above reproach and above what might be the dictates of "the bottom line". Any shocking failure on the part of any of these banks to meet those expectations may be expected not only to harm those directly affected by such conduct, but to cause cynicism and distrust on the part of present or potential borrowers, depositors and shareholders. Bad faith and law-breaking by a major chartered bank cannot but damage the fabric of Canada's banking system and hence the country's potential for prosperity and economic well-being.

B. Reasonable Notice Applied

[77] I find the Bank did not give the plaintiffs reasonable notice. There was no justification for the precipitous manner in which the Bank proceeded and I doubt the Bank ever intended to provide adequate or reasonable notice. This is suggested by the content of the lending transaction summaries and by the way the Bank conducted itself prior to learning about the closing of the Weber Street store. A creditor's interest in acting as quickly as possible will almost always be present and so may concerns over mobile inventory. Fears inherent in almost all lending situations, however, are not grounds for acting as the Bank did. More is required. To act without notice, exceptional circumstances must exist which, by definition, transcend what is inherent. The Bank, therefore, had to be at least reasonably certain that Murano was absconding. He clearly was not and the Bank could not have reasonably concluded otherwise.

[78] The Bank, through Allinott and Rowlands, was aware that Murano planned to transfer the store on Weber Street to Richmond Hill. The other stores were continuing in operation on March 25 to Allinott's knowledge. Murano had, on March 20, agreed to execute any documentation necessary to protect the Bank's security in order to facilitate the proposed move. The move was conducted in broad daylight over several days. No attempt was made to conceal the transfer of operations. The situation, then, could not have been reasonably characterized as that of an absconding debtor, particularly when no one at the Bank thought to call Murano and inquire. Murano was not intending to prejudice the Bank by defeating its security interest. While he wanted to move the store, Murano was also willing, to the Bank's knowledge, to execute a new general security agreement.

[79] Hehir acknowledged that information of this sort could have affected his assessment of the situation. Rowlands and Allinott failed to properly inform him, although Rowlands, to his credit, would have telephoned Murano had he been in charge of the situation. Thus, the Bank official closest to the situation, and the one who should have been the most upset had he believed Murano acted unilaterally, was the only person willing to give him an opportunity to explain. In the circumstances, that is what should have been done and it is what any reasonable creditor would have done who was genuinely concerned with the whereabouts of its security. Murano was managing a business that had patronized this bank for over five years. The business had been profitable in Murano's hands for over a year. In my view, the closure of 22 Weber Street became a convenient pretext for implementing a plan Hehir and his colleagues had been considering since March 20, 1991 when Murano alarmed the Bank by outlining the challenges he faced. The Bank's plan was to take action as quickly as it could to protect its loans. This was to be done by giving very little notice to the debtor. In doing so, the Bank breached its contractual relationship with Murano and the corporate plaintiffs. Both the Bank and Peat committed trespass and conversion in seizing the Hilton stores on March 27, 1991 and in all their actions thereafter.

[80] The possibility of a misunderstanding between Rowlands and Murano demanded that the Bank first contact Murano and obtain his explanation for the immediate store closure. Even if one was to assume that Murano intentionally took advantage of Rowlands' failure to specifically instruct him not to move the inventory, his conduct would not justify the immediate imposition of a receivership in the circumstances. On the evidence before the Court, the Bank could not reasonably have concluded that Murano intended to abscond with the contents of the store based on the facts then known to it. Rowlands and Allinott knew that Murano intended to move the store. Murano had volunteered to execute an amended general security agreement to protect the Bank's interest. The remaining stores were in operation. And Murano's companies were not in default under any loan obligation.

[81] In those circumstances, it was highly unlikely that Murano would have refused to return the inventory and assets had the Bank threatened the immediate imposition of a receivership. It was also highly unlikely that he would have refused to execute documentation required to protect the Bank's interests in the assets either pending their return or as a condition of them staying in Richmond Hill. Because the Bank's action was so unreasonable, one can only conclude its reliance on the store closing was a pretext for the implementing of an earlier conceived strategy of moving against Murano with little or no notice.

[82] It was argued by the Bank that even had it given reasonable notice, Murano could not have raised sufficient funds to pay the Bank. I do not agree. Not only has the Bank failed to meet the onus which it shoulders to establish this fact, but regardless of onus, I am satisfied

Murano could have repaid the funds. Bak would have provided adequate moneys in a matter of days had no receiver been in place. Alternatively, Murano could have looked to the cash flow coming from the Hilton stores or to further mortgaging of his other assets. Murano was, if anything, a tenacious entrepreneur who I believe would have successfully responded had he not been disabled by the immediate imposition of a receivership with all the attendant innuendo. The amount of the loans outstanding was not particularly large relative to Murano's net worth and the sources of funds available to him in the absence of the Bank's precipitous conduct.

[83] Murano's companies were not insolvent, distinguishing these facts from those of Kavcar Investments where the hopeless nature of a financial situation was held to dictate a "reasonable notice" of very short duration. His representations to Rowlands on March 20, 1991 must be seen in the context of the previous profitable year and what Murano was trying to achieve in that meeting. While I am satisfied he described the situation as desperate, the fact is that no loan had gone unpaid. In fact, he had made arrangements with tax officials and his other major creditors. Hilton testified that, notwithstanding his complaints, he was generally satisfied with the direction Murano was heading. Murano had a detailed plan to deal with both the challenges and the opportunities he saw ahead.

[84] This was not a situation where the loan limits imposed by the Bank were being exceeded on a daily basis to bring it within the short notice rationale of Kavcar. In my view, therefore, Murano was entitled, at least, to the equivalent of the notice now required by the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. Indeed, he should have been given until the end of April to respond. Interestingly, the TD Bank, as late as May 22, 1991, gave Murano until the end of that month to repay the funds it was demanding before engaging in self-help. Objectively speaking, Murano's situation on March 27, 1991 was nowhere near as precarious as it was in May 1991. Given more time, for example the full month of April 1991, Murano could have disposed of certain assets such as Papa Pete's and possibly his best real estate to meet the Bank's demands. Accordingly, no matter how the circumstances are viewed, Murano's situation was far from hopeless. I therefore find it more likely than not that adequate funds to meet the Bank's demands would have been available to Murano within both a few days and by the end of April, with little or no additional risk to the Bank.

[85] The Bank, to justify its actions, attempted to paint a picture of Murano as a person who could not be trusted. Even accepting that Murano was not the ideal customer, nothing in the evidence justified the immediate imposition of a receivership and the resulting destruction of his businesses. There had been a few NSF cheques in late summer. He had also failed to honour the substance of his $100,000 loan repayment commitment to the Bank by March 1, 1991. Murano's position that payments totalling approximately $90,000 made into operating accounts were in fulfilment of this permanent loan reduction commitment is not reasonable. Murano may also have intentionally taken advantage of Rowlands' failure to be explicit at their meeting. The decision of Gray to take detailed notes of the March 20, 1991 meeting is curiously at odds with his failure to document previous understandings with the Bank. Moreover, the specific reference in those notes to Rowlands' failure to tell them not to move strikes me as contrived. All of this conduct would certainly have justified a termination of the banking relationship. Indeed, no justification was necessary because these were demand loans. But none of this justified a termination of the relationship without notice and a simultaneous imposition of a receivership. The Bank was not entitled to punish Murano for these failings.

[86] The Bank is also not able to justify its conduct by pointing to the fact that Hehir, who knew little of Murano's circumstances, had control of the file by March 27, 1991. This may be a possible bureaucratic explanation for the Bank's failure to deal with Murano in a professional and businesslike way. It does not, however, obviate the legal obligation to give Murano and his corporate entities reasonable notice of a demand for repayment.

[87] Finally, the Bank's earlier letters dated August 16, 1990 and December 17, 1990 do not support the action taken. An earlier warning without an unequivocal demand is simply insufficient. See 263121 Ontario Ltd. v. Toronto Dominion Bank (September 27, 1984), Doc. 5520/81 (Ont. H.C.), summarized at 27 A.C.W.S. (2d) 381, judgment of Saunders J. at p. 25. In this respect, Saunders J. stated:

> It was submitted that long before May 4, it had been made clear to Holec that unless he was able to inject new capital into Alpha, the bank support would be withdrawn. The letter of April 10, which I find that he received and discussed, imposed a deadline of April 30. He could reasonably expect some bank action to be imminent. However, I do not consider that those circumstances satisfied the requirement that he be given reasonable time to comply. There had been continuous ongoing discussions with the bank but there was no definite unequivocal demand until May 4th. (Emphasis added)

IV. THE ISSUE OF DISCLOSURE

[88] The Bank's disclosure to third parties of Murano's financial circumstances and alleged dishonesty was also improper. It is an implied term of the contract between a banker and its customer that the banker will not divulge to third parties, without the consent of the customer, either the state of the customer's account, or any transactions with the Bank, or any information relating to the customer acquired through the keeping of an account. See Tournier v. National Provincial & Union Bank of England, [1924] 1 K.B. 461 (C.A.). While this duty is not an unqualified one, the disclosure in this case was not reasonably necessary for the protection of the Bank's own interest or for the protection of the public. In my view, there was no need for Rowlands, Skebo and Hehir to say anything beyond the fact that the Bank had installed a receiver. As it turned out, much of the information the Bank disclosed was erroneous and wrongly created the widespread impression that Murano had been so dishonest in his dealings with the Bank that the immediate imposition of a receivership was required. Atkin L.J. in Tournier v. National Provincial & Union Bank of England, supra, at pp. 485-486 described the extent of this obligation of secrecy and the exceptions to it in these terms:

> The first question is: To what information does the obligation of secrecy extend? It clearly goes beyond the state of the account, that is, whether there is a debit or a credit balance, and the amount of the balance. It must extend at least to all of the transactions that go through the account, and to the securities, if any, given in respect of the account; and in respect of such matters it must, I think, extend beyond the period when the account is closed, or ceases to be an active account. It seems to me inconceivable that either party would contemplate that once the customer had closed his account the bank was to be at liberty to divulge as it pleased the particular transactions which it had conducted for the customer while he was such. I further think the obligation extends to information obtained from other sources than the customer's actual account, if the occasion upon which the information was obtained arose out of the banking relations of the bank and its customers – for example, with a view to assisting the bank in conducting the customer's business, or in coming to decisions as to its treatment of its > customers… But I think it safe to say that the obligation not to disclose information such as I have mentioned is subject to the qualification that the bank have the right to disclose such information when, and to the extent to which it is reasonably necessary for the protection of the bank's interests, either as against their customer or as against third parties in respect of the transactions of the bank for or with their customer, or for protecting the bank, or persons interested or the public, against fraud or crime. I have already stated the obligation as an obligation not to disclose without the customer's consent. It is an implied term, and may therefore, be varied by express agreement. In any case, the consent may be expressed or implied, and to the extent to which it is given, the bank will be justified in acting… I do not desire to express any final opinion on the practice of bankers to give one another information as to the affairs of their respective customers, except to say it appears to me that if it is justified it must be upon the basis of an implied consent of the customer.

[89] The Privy Council in Robertson v. C.I.B.C., [1994] 1 W.L.R. 1493, at p. 1498 recently endorsed as a "statement of principle" the following passage from Bankes L.J. in Tournier, supra, at p. 473, on the exceptions to the duty of confidentiality:

> On principle I think that the qualifications can be classified under four heads: (a) where disclosure is under compulsion by law; (b) where there is a duty to the public to disclose; (c) where the interests of the bank require disclosure; (d) where the disclosure is made by the express or implied consent of the customer.

[90] In Canada, Goodman J.A., citing Tournier, supra, stated in Standard Investments Ltd. v. C.I.B.C (1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 473 (C.A.), at p. 503:

> As pointed out by the trial judge that aspect of confidentiality, viz., that a bank will not disclose confidential information received from its customer to others without the customer's consent, is a legal obligation imposed by law which arises independently of the establishment of a fiduciary relationship. It is an implied term of the contract between a bank and its customer that it will not do so.

[91] Tournier was also adopted in Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Sayani (1993), 83 B.C.L.R. (2d) 167 (C.A.), at pp. 172-173.

[92] None of the exceptions outlined in these cases find application to the facts of this case. The allegations of dishonesty were without foundation. Furthermore, there is no basis to imply a term in this banking relationship that would sanction the disputed disclosures made by Rowlands and others. Banking efficacy does not seem dependent on such a right. Given the extent of staff turnover experienced by the Bank, the accuracy of information in a customer's file is not fail-safe. This reality in itself should have encouraged caution in responding to the inquiries of third parties. In my view, there was no justification for the Bank to do anything other than confirm it had called its loans and imposed a receivership.

[93] This Bank not only fundamentally breached its contractual relationship with Murano, it also attempted to petition him into bankruptcy in September of 1991. Morin J., however, wisely refused the petition on the basis that there were good grounds to believe the plaintiffs had cause of action against the Bank for failing to give reasonable notice of its repayment demands. These grounds having materialized in success, the damages claimed by the plaintiffs for breach of contract and in respect of the established torts of trespass and conversion require consideration.

V. THE ISSUE OF BUSINESS LOSSES

A. Expert Evaluation

[94] It is the position of the plaintiffs that the actions of the defendants triggered the following chain of events:

- On April 22, 1991 the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce demanded repayment of its loans to two related companies, 855505 Ontario Ltd. (operating as a Bandito Video store) and 548996 Ontario Ltd. (operating as Paulos' Pizzeria) totalling approximately $170,000. In addition, the CIBC demanded repayment of a personal line of credit to Murano of approximately $42,000;
- On or about April 25, 1991 Canada Trust demanded repayment of a $300,000 mortgage on a property located in Trenton, Ontario;
- On the same date, the Toronto Dominion Bank ("TD Bank") demanded repayment of its loan of $94,000 to a related company, 548290 Ontario Ltd. (operating as Miami Subs) and refused to honour cheques over $500 relating to the Top 30 Division operating in Eastern Ontario;

1995 CanLII 7410 (ON SC)

• In that same month Robert Hilton demanded repayment of his $1,000,000 loan and commenced an action;

• On May 17, 1991 National Trust demanded repayment of $875,000 pursuant to mortgages on properties at 161 Princess Street and 180 King Street East, Kingston, Ontario;

• On May 22, 1991, the TD Bank demanded repayment of a $97,000 loan to a related company, 855519 Ontario Ltd. (operating as a Top 30 Division location);

• On May 27, 1991 the TD Bank demanded repayment of $855,000 loan in respect of 611 Princess Street and 512 Albert Street.

[95] The plaintiffs' expert, Richard Wise, a business valuator and litigation accountant, estimated that the damages suffered by the plaintiffs fall within a range of $9,800,000 to $9,900,000 over the proceeds of the liquidation of the Hilton Division. The defendants' expert, Joel Adelstein of Coopers and Lybrand, estimated the plaintiffs' losses lie somewhere between $560,715 and $715,223.

[96] Despite this stark difference in expert opinion, Wise and Adelstein agreed on the condition of the Canadian economy in general and the video retail industry in particular at the relevant times.

1. The Economic Background

[97] The economy was in the midst of a recession on March 27, 1991. After seven years of significant advances, growth ended abruptly in the spring of 1990, posting an estimated increase for the year of merely 0.8 per cent. Gross domestic product during the fourth quarter of 1990 had fallen 4 per cent below the level recorded during the same period in 1989 (measured in real terms). This downward trend was forecasted to continue by nearly 2 per cent in 1991, constituting the worst two year performance for decades. The inflation rate, which was 7.5 per cent during the three months immediately preceding March 27, 1991, had increased in comparison to the 5 per cent level it had attained in 1989. One contributing factor to this increase in prices was the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq.

[98] After being a major source of economic growth from 1985, consumer spending was expected to be severely curtailed in 1991. High consumer debt, low levels of consumer confidence, high interest rates, substantial decline in employment and the introduction of the GST were expected to cause households to cut spending sharply in 1991. Consumer spending was estimated to rise by 0.3 per cent in 1991 and then by 3.1 per cent in 1992. In the first quarter of 1991 the Ontario economy was also deep in recession. Poor performance of the U.S. economy was a major factor behind shrinking export results affecting many of Ontario's key manufacturing and resource industries. The collapse of the real estate market due to overbuilding in the 1980s was another major reason for Ontario's economic hardships.

[99] In contrast, the video retail industry had operated within a relatively buoyant environment and enjoyed significant growth prior to March 27, 1991. Growing at estimates of 15 per cent a year prior to the recession, the industry continued to grow during 1990 at 8 per cent despite the recession. As consumers tightened their belts, renting a video cassette for home viewing became the entertainment of choice for many families. The video rental market was estimated to be growing at a rate of 15 per cent annually in Canada with revenues of approximately $1 billion. In the United States, home video was a $10.3 billion industry by 1990 and had been growing at a rate of approximately $1 billion per year. The large growth in the market was the result of the increased affordability and quality of video cassette recorders (VCRs). By 1990, for example, 72.2 per cent of U.S. households with a television owned a VCR. By 1990, video revenues were forecasted to almost double those of theatre revenues.

[100] In the 1980s and early 1990s, video outlets were opening up at virtually every street corner as entrepreneurs attempted to tap into this new growth market. For example, U.S. video specialty stores grew from 2,500 in 1980 to a peak of approximately 30,000 in 1988. However, as in many other retail sectors, giant retail chains came into prominence and many single store operations could no longer compete on title selection, copies available and location. Thus, by the end of 1990, these operations were either forced out of business or acquired by one of the major operators. In 1990, however, the largest ten video companies in Canada, which included Bandito Video, still held only 15 per cent of the total market with Jumbo Video holding 5.8 per cent and Rogers and Major Video holding approximately 3 per cent each. Convenience stores, as a group, held a 10 per cent -12 per cent share.

[101] An important factor contributing to a retail video outlet's success is the relationship it has with a video distributor. The choice of distributor is vital to an operator's pricing strategy and the availability of titles to be stocked. A good distributor will advise on prevalent industry and consumer demand trends and will supply video retailers with studio displays and other point-of-sale materials to assist in marketing new video releases. Another important facet of video retailing is, of course, site selection. The most popular locations include regional shopping districts, neighbourhood strip plazas, and super malls.

[102] While a chain store operation inevitably involves greater complexities in terms of management, it also enables the business unit to realize “synergies” in advertising, promotion and relationships with suppliers. Not only do chain stores benefit from the ability to negotiate volume discounts, some large video retail chains have been able to by-pass the distributor and deal directly with the manufacturers. Multi-store organizations are also more convenient for the customer and result in increased gross revenues, as well as surplus tapes which can be circulated through the various stores. That is, older, or “used” titles can be used to open new stores or recycled through the network of stores in order to keep the libraries of individual outlets looking “fresh”.

[103] Another potentially lucrative feature of the industry is its amenability to franchising. A “franchise” permits the franchisee to use the franchiser’s intellectual property (e.g., business methods, trademarks, corporate identity, marketing tools, et cetera) for a specific period of time. In return, the franchisee must adhere to certain standards and pay for the use of the property through royalties and/or other management fees. Franchising was a key component of Murano’s business strategy, particularly with respect to the planned Top 30 stores.

[104] In Canada, VCR penetration of all domestic households had climbed from less than 25 per cent in 1982 to 63 per cent in 1990, and by 1995, was estimated to increase another 12 per cent. In 1990, an industry study showed that there were 5.7 million VCR households in Canada responsible for 350,000,000 annual tape rentals constituting 62 rentals per VCR household annually. Video tape “sell through” expenditures per VCR households in Canada reached an average of 5.7 videos annually at an average purchase price of $20.64. Sell throughs are typically “B” grade feature films or older “A” films, or special interest tapes (i.e. fitness, travel, sports, et cetera). The broad growth trend was expected to be in the direction of sell through titles. While, in 1990, annual rentals in the Canadian video market totalled $1.1 billion and sell throughs accounted for $130,000,000, these latter revenues were expected to increase dramatically in the future given the great success of popular videos such as “Batman”, “Indiana Jones”, and others.

[105] Revenue from rentals, however, has continued to be the bulk of the income generated by video stores. Each rental is known in the industry as a “turn”. A store’s objective is to rent a cassette as many turns as possible in as short a period as possible. Hence, a title which costs a retailer $50 and is rented at $2.30 per night will require nearly 22 turns to recoup the initial investment. The goal of the store is to continue renting a title after it has reached this point. This challenge is complicated by the weekend and seasonal nature of video rentals. Video rentals peak during summer months whereas video sell throughs peak during the Christmas holiday period in Canada. Every video retailer must also decide whether to utilize its limited purchasing funds to offer diversity of titles or depth (stocking multiple copies of new releases which have performed well in first-run movie theatres).

[106] The video retail industry was hit hard in the first quarter of 1991. As noted previously, this fall-off in patronage was primarily due to televised coverage of the Gulf War. Small stores were the hardest hit with rental volume falling by nearly one-third in January and February. Average super stores’ rental business fell by 12 to 13 per cent in these months. But a relatively strong March limited the damage. A lacklustre lineup of second quarter film titles, however, caused rentals to decline 7 per cent for the second quarter of 1991. Nevertheless, it was likely that, as in 1990, super stores (those with over 5,000 tapes) and chain stores would continue to see increased revenues, spurred by acquisitions and related reorganizations. In other words, the retail video markets in both Canada and the United States were buoyant in 1991 notwithstanding the presence of a general economic recession. In fact, recession related fears encouraged consumers to down-scale entertainment expenditures by renting video cassettes as a substitute for going out to the cinema or theatre. Moreover, while the first two quarters of 1991 were difficult for all video cassette rental stores, the adverse impact of CNN reporting of the Gulf War was a temporary phenomenon.

[107] It is against this background that the business valuation experts for the plaintiffs and the defendants separately evaluated the impact of the defendants’ conduct. In doing so, they each broke the plaintiffs’ activities or planned activities into three “divisions” – the Hilton Division, the Top 30 Division, and the Bandito Video Division.

2. The Plaintiffs’ Expert

i. The Hilton Division

1995 CanLII 7410 (ON SC)

a. Discounted Cash Flow Methodology

[109] In valuing existing stores, Wise & Partners used the income approach and, in doing so, applied a discounted cash flow method. While an income approach was employed for the projected stores of the Top 30 Division, a capitalized earnings method was applied to reflect the less certain results of “planned” stores.

[110] Business valuations are based on one of two major approaches. One is dependent on asset values and the other primarily on income, earnings or cash flows. The earnings approach is appropriate in most “going-concern” situations as the worth of a company is generally a function of its ability to earn income and provide an appropriate rate of return on investment. Asset values, however, can sometimes constitute the prime determinant of corporate worth depending on the nature of the operations such as those of a real estate holding company or where the outlook for a particular business is so uncertain that past and future earnings are not reliable guides.

[111] Included in the income approach in determining going-concern value are the methods of capitalized earnings and discounted cash flow. The capitalized earnings method generally establishes fair market value by capitalizing an estimate of a company’s expected maintainable level of future after tax earnings. The “future after tax earnings” are defined as the net earnings from normal operations which can reasonably be expected to be maintainable in the future. The maintainability of net earnings is heavily influenced by the earnings history of a company subject to adjustments to reported and forecasted earnings for unusual or non-recurring items. The appropriate capitalization rate or earnings multiple (the inverse of the capitalization rate) to apply to the level of after tax earnings is dependent upon a number of factors such as the nature and history of the company's business, the size of the company, the historic and prospective earnings, underlying asset coverage in so far as it affects risk, general economic and industry conditions, and the rates of return available on alternative investment opportunities.

[112] In the cash flow method, operating cash flows (derived from the elimination of non-cash items such as depreciation and amortization) are substituted for earnings from operations and then further refined into "discretionary" cash flow. This methodology also assumes a minimum level of recurring or annual capital reinvestment to sustain operations at existing levels referred to as "sustaining capital reinvestment". Because a notional purchaser in the marketplace is generally concerned with the cash in-flows and out-flows of a business, the cash flow method can often be more reliable than the earnings method, particularly when there are substantial non-cash expenses such as depreciation, amortization and deferred income taxes. And in situations where future capital investments are required and the specific timing of the cash in-flows and cash out-flows is particularly significant, a "discounted cash flow" methodology may often be most appropriate.

[113] The discounted cash flow method emphasises projected future cash flows which are discounted by a rate of return that is a function of a number of internal and external factors. These factors include (1) the nature and history of the business; (2) the state of the economy and the industry; (3) the balance sheet and financial condition of the company; (4) management quality, experience and continuity; (5) the trend and growth potential of earnings or cash flows; (6) competition and ease of entry into the marketplace; (7) the customer and supplier bases; (8) the degree of risk in achieving the projected earnings; (9) the liquidity of the investment; (10) dividend - paying capacity; and (11) whether goodwill or other intangible value exists.

[114] In employing this method, it is crucial to establish the reliability of the projections of each of the years in the forecast period. The methodology then discounts all expected cash flow in each of the future years, using a desired rate of return or discount rate. This discount rate should have regard to the various risks attached to, and the opportunity cost of, acquiring the assets. The residual or terminal value of the business assets is also included in the calculation on the assumption that assets purchased would ultimately be disposed of. Thus, the end year discretionary cash flow in the projection is capitalized and discounted to provide a present value. The total of the present value of the cash flow, the residual present value and the value of the tax shield on the undepreciated capital cost pools are judged to constitute the fair market value of the business.

b. Methodology Applied

[115] The plaintiffs' expert accepted management's financial projections for the forecast period of January 1, 1991 to December 31, 1994 in applying the discounted cash flow method to the Hilton Division. These projections were influenced by a variety of assumptions. First, that there would be additional synergistic benefits by way of volume rebates and economies of scale to be obtained in association with the Top 30 Division and the about to be acquired Bandito Video Division. Second, that revenues would increase by 12 per cent in the years 1991 to 1993 and would then level off to an annual increase of 4 per cent thereafter. The 12 per cent increase was a function of anticipated industry growth and an increase in the price of the per tape rental fee. Operating expenses were affected by the assumption that because the Hilton Division operated only three video stores no head office was required.

[116] Notwithstanding Murano's projected losses at his meeting with Rowlands on March 20, 1991, management's estimate for 1991 for the purposes of proving damages projected total revenue of $1,779,499 and earnings before taxes of $455,539. With four stores in operation in 1990, revenues were $1,773,871 and net income before taxes was $497,582. However, to reflect the degree of uncertainty inherent in the annual cash flow projections during the forecast period, risk factors were applied to the projected operating cash flows ranging from 5 per cent for the year ending December 31, 1991 to 20 per cent for the year ending December 31, 1994. These risk factors were said to be a function of: (1) the consistently profitable level of operations within the Hilton Division; (2) the fact that no major expansion was planned for the Hilton Division; (3) the existing competition in the marketplace; and (4) management's experience in operating video retail outlets. After adding back depreciation to pre-tax earnings to obtain projected cash flow, federal and provincial income taxes at a combined rate of 22.84 per cent on the first $200,000 and 44.34 per cent thereafter were deducted. The sustaining capital reinvestment was estimated to be 20 per cent of gross revenues less revenue from sell throughs and volume rebates where again estimates were made. The tax shield benefit was then deducted to arrive at the sustaining capital reinvestment net of tax shield in each of the years 1991 to 1994.

[117] After arriving at the discretionary cash flow for each year in the forecast period, a present value factor or discount factor was applied. In light of the internal and external factors previously reviewed, the appropriate discount rate to be applied to Hilton Division's discretionary cash flow was judged to be in the range of 13 per cent to 15 per cent. This created a present value range for the forecast period between $1,170,000 and $1,214,000. To this range of values was added the fair market value of Hilton Division at December 31, 1994, by applying a capitalization rate (multiple) to the discretionary cash flow of that year in the range of 16.67 per cent to 18.18 per cent (multiples of 5.5 and 6.0), yielding a value range of $2,213,800 to $2,415,000. Discounting this residual value range at 13 per cent to 15 per cent back to March 27, 1991, produced a residual value range as of that date of $1,310,000 to $1,527,000. The present value of the tax shield on the undepreciated capital cost was estimated to lie in the range of $227,000 to $231,000.

[118] The loss of fair market value of Hilton Division immediately before Peat took possession was therefore determined to be $2,835,000 and $2,570,000. This range was the aggregate of (a) the present value of the annual discretionary cash flow during the forecast period ($1,170,000 to $1,214,000); (b) the residual value of the Hilton Division at the end of the forecast period ($1,310,000 to $1,527,000); and (c) the present value of the tax shield on the undepreciated capital cost ($227,000 to $231,000); less (d) the after tax amount due the business from outstanding shareholder loans ($137,389).

ii Top 30 Division

[119] As noted previously, the Top 30 Division was segregated into two groups for the purpose of determining value. They were (1) the opened and leased locations known as "existing stores" and (2) the projected future locations known as "projected stores". The existing stores were comprised of "opened" and "unopened" stores. As of March 27, 1991, Top 30 had five opened stores and had signed leases for seven additional stores which had yet to be opened. These 12 locations were treated as existing stores. The first store, situated at 180 King Street East in Gananoque, commenced operations in December 1990. The other four stores, none of which had been open for more than approximately one month before March 27, 1991, included 383 Elgin Street, Cambridge, Ontario; Highway 7, Richmond Hill, Toronto, Ontario; 335 Princess Street, Kingston, Ontario; and 680 Williams Street, Brockville. Leases had been signed but stores were not yet opened at 68 Elliot Avenue, Kingston,

1995 CanLII 7410 (ON SC)

Ontario; 235 Gore Street, Kingston, Ontario; 122 Princess Street, Kingston, Ontario; 2379 Parkdale, Brockville, Ontario; 1515 Kingston Road, Pickering, Ontario; 2 Overlea Boulevard, East York; and Village Greger, Gatineau, Quebec. In addition to these 12 “existing stores”, Top 30 Division had plans to expand through the region of southern Ontario by opening more than 70 additional stores within the four years subsequent to March 27, 1991.

1995 CanLII 7410 (ON SC)

a. Existing Stores

1. Opened Stores

[120] The plaintiffs’ expert accepted the projections of management for the Top 30 Division existing stores during the forecast period. It was assumed that six of them would be “type A” stores having projected annual revenues averaging $600,000 and six would be “type B” stores having projected annual revenues averaging $300,000. Revenues were adjusted to allow for the staggered opening dates in 1991 and for a two month delay for start-up. For the years 1992 to 1994, revenues were increased by 4 per cent representing the approximate historical rate of inflation. To the seven unopened stores, Wise applied a risk factor of 20 per cent against gross revenues to represent the risk that these stores may not have opened on a timely basis. Due to the limited actual experience with these stores, operating expenses were estimated based on the size of the operations and the experience of management in the industry.

[121] Wise employed the discounted cash flow method as described, relying on the rationale that, as start up operations, operating results were not indicative of future operations. On the other hand, he applied the capitalized earnings method to the projected stores because he thought “it would be speculative at the damage date to include value attributable to such [planned] growth”. In fact, Wise capitalized only the 1991 projected earnings (assuming 40-45 stores would have been opened in that year) because he considered the projections for 1992 to 1994 to be too speculative as of March 27, 1991.

[122] The same methodology was employed to the existing stores as to the Hilton Division. However, to recognize the degree of uncertainty inherent in projecting annual cash flows during the forecast period for these operations, risk factors were applied to the projected cash flows over and above the risk factors that were applied to the gross revenues of the unopened stores ranging from 5 per cent for the year ending December 31, 1991 to 12.5 per cent for the years ending December 31, 1994. Wise emphasized that management was experienced in operating video retail outlets and the video rental industry continued to be buoyant throughout the recession. He adopted the same sustaining capital reinvestment rate taken with respect to the Hilton Division, i.e. 20 per cent of gross revenues in a given year, representing the replacement of prerecorded movies on video cassette as new releases enter the market. The same discount rate of 13-15 per cent was applied to the existing stores' discretionary cash flows, producing a present value range of $1,194,000 to $1,144,000. The capitalization rate for calculating the residual value of these existing stores and to be applied to the discretionary cash flow as at December 31, 1994 was estimated to be in the range of 20-22.2 per cent or multiples of 4.5 and 5.0. Applying this discount rate to the residual value of existing stores at December 31, 1994, a present value range was arrived at as of March 27, 1991 of $1,615,000 to $1,361,000.

2. Unopened Stores

[123] The capital investments required to open the unopened stores were estimated to be $2,615,550. The landlord inducements, based on the leases negotiated, were totalled at $850,000, leaving a net capital investment before tax shield of $1,765,550. This amount was discounted using the discount rate of 13 per cent and 15 per cent to arrive at a discounted required capital investment before tax shield in the range of $1,639,000 to $1,655,000. However, the present value of the tax shield, based on the assumption that a purchaser would continue to claim capital cost allowance on the balance of its undepreciated capital cost pools, was estimated to lie in a range of $1,141,000 to $1,176,000. When that range was deducted from the required capital investment range, net of landlord inducements, the present value of the net capital investment required was estimated to be between $494,000 to $516,000.

[124] These deductions then yielded a fair market value range for the existing stores of the Top 30 Division of $2,315,000 to $1,989,000 with a mid-point of $2,152,000.

b. Projected Stores

[125] An estimated $1,784,600 was determined to be the cash flow for the projected stores. "Normalize depreciation" of $1,309,434 was deducted from that figure as was income taxes at a combined rate of 22.84 per cent on the first $200,000 and 44.34 per cent thereafter. A risk factor of 25 per cent was applied to after tax earnings to arrive at indicated after tax earnings of $198,358. The 25 per cent factor was intended to take into account the risk associated with not fully achieving the projected results, not opening the projected stores as scheduled and the uncertainty in the marketplace. After considering the internal and external factors previously outlined, the 25 per cent risk factor previously applied, and the fact that the stores that would generate these earnings were not opened as of March 27, 1991, Wise applied a multiple to the projected stores' indicated earnings of 2 per cent or a 50 per cent capitalization rate. A multiple of 2 per cent applied to the indicated earnings of $198,358 produced a fair market value for the projected stores of Top 30 Division as at January 1, 1991 of $397,000 and as at March 27, 1991 of $411,000.

iii. Bandito Video Division

[126] The Bandito Video Division consisted of 44 franchised stores and eight corporate or flagship stores. Almost all the franchises were administered through 548531 Ontario Inc. ("548531") which had been incorporated on June 5, 1985. A second company, Bandito Video Ltd. ("Bandito Video"), owned and operated the eight corporate stores and administered the Hilton Division franchise stores. In February 1991 a preliminary agreement was negotiated between Murano and Robert Glenn, the owner of BVL and 548531. Pursuant to this agreement, Murano was to purchase all of the issued and outstanding shares of these two corporations for $1,400,000. The purchase price was to consist of a cash payment of $266,000 and a 9 per cent note for $1,134,000. The transaction, however, was aborted when the Bank's actions deterred Bak from providing the necessary financing, and Murano could find no alternative funding source.

[127] In this valuation, Wise made the assumption that the transaction would be closed in early April 1991 as planned. There were plans at the time to open additional stores and subsequently amalgamate this Division with the Top 30 and Hilton Divisions to reap additional economies of scale including those related to centralized operations and favourable lease terms. However, as of March 27, 1991, management had not decided whether to continue operating under the "Bandito" trade name.

[128] The 1988 gross revenues of 548531 totalled $4,643,099 and after expenses produced earnings before taxes of $372,197. In 1989 gross revenues were $4,388,541 in 1989 with a loss of $822 before taxes. In 1990, gross revenues were $4,064,700 with a loss before taxes of $92,400. Against that operating experience, the plaintiffs projected an upswing in revenues for 1991 of $4,820,400 and $5,886,716 by 1994 with earnings before taxes of $375,075 and $859,243 respectively. Wise concluded these projections were reasonable. This assessment appears to be based on the assumption that the plaintiffs would obtain additional “synergistic benefits” (such as volume rebates and other economies of scale) upon acquisition.

[129] The decline in sales in 1990 was seen as a “temporary set back” due to downward pressure on price as the video rental industry was consolidating. Revenues from the corporate stores were increased by 9 per cent per annum from the depressed levels in 1990 for 1991 and 1992. Revenues from franchise operations (e.g., royalties, franchise fees and start-up fees) were increased at levels of 46 per cent and 21 per cent for 1991 and 1992 respectively. This additional revenue was to come from the opening of 12 new franchises planned for 1991 and 1992. It was assumed revenues would increase thereafter by an annual inflation factor of 4 per cent. In projecting the cash flow of the Bandito Division, Wise again added back depreciation and management bonuses and income taxes were deducted at the combined rate notwithstanding that the Hilton Division, the Top 30 Division, and the Bandito Division would be related.

[130] Risk factors ranging from 5 per cent for the year ending December 31, 1991 to 20 per cent for the year ending December 31, 1994 were applied to the projected cash flows to recognize the uncertainty of these projections. Sustaining capital reinvestment was estimated to be 20 per cent of gross revenues annually less the value of sell throughs and volume rebates. The discount rates applied to the resulting annual discretionary cash flows for the forecast period were set from 13 per cent to 15 per cent. This created a present value range for the period of $1,223,000 to $1,179,000. Using the methodology previously outlined to calculate residual value for the 1994 discretionary cash flow of $390,183, capitalization rates in the range of 16.67 per cent to 18.18 per cent (multiples of 5.5 and 6.0) were applied to arrive at a present value range as of March 27, 1991 of $1,480,000 and $1,270,000. The present value of the tax shield was estimated to fall within a range of $135,000 to $131,000. This provided a fair market value range for Bandito Division of $1,438,000 to $1,180,000. When the projected original investment or purchase price of $1,400,000 was deducted, the fair market value of the Bandito Video Division fell within a value range of $1,438,000 to $1,180,000 with a mid-point of $1,309,000.

iv. Other Losses

[131] In quantifying the damages suffered by Murano related to real estate, Wise accepted the estimated market values of properties rendered by various appraisers on various appraisal dates. He also accepted that the financial institutions in question disposed of these properties at distressed sale prices. The appraised market values of these properties totalled $2,990,000 and mortgages totalled $1,879,541 at March 27, 1991. The financial institutions realized $1,753,000 upon disposal or $1,237,000 less than the appraised value. Murano incurred additional expenses (legal and mortgage fees) and interest costs when a financial institution demanded repayment of a mortgage on his personal residence. Murano claims the resulting $17,000 he incurred to obtain a new mortgage. Damages are also claimed for the difference between the face value of mortgages and notes receivable totalling $1,089,000 and the proceeds of $24,600 upon their forced disposition giving rise to a claim of $1,064,000 as at March 27, 1991. All of these “other losses” amount to $2,318,000.

3. The Defendants’ Expert

[132] Adelstein, the defendants’ expert, provided “a loss estimate” (in contrast to an opinion). He concluded the loss range for the Hilton Division was between $560,715 to $715,223. However, he was unable to quantify any losses incurred by Murano in respect of the Top 30 Division or in connection with the failed Bandito Division transaction with Glenn.

i. The Hilton Division

[133] Adelstein employed the income approach and the capitalized earnings method with respect to the Hilton Division. He, however, found that the projections prepared by management for all divisions appeared unduly optimistic in light of their historic operating results. He was also very concerned about the completeness and reliability of the existing internal financial statements prepared by Gray for the Hilton corporate entities for their 1990 fiscal year ends. Adelstein therefore adopted the more historical oriented capitalized earnings approach. However, statements prepared for the Hilton Division for 1990 by B. Savage, an independent chartered accountant, were filed at trial and with results very close to those obtained by Gray.

[134] The defendants’ estimate of Murano’s loss was calculated net the amount owed by Murano to Hilton Division entities (i.e. $274,777 in shareholder loans). Adelstein was also satisfied that the non-cash expenses reasonably represented the sustaining capital reinvestment necessary to maintain the level of operations. Depreciation was based upon a rate of 25 per cent of recorded sales in contrast to Wise's 20 per cent of gross rental income less sell-throughs and volume rebates. Adelstein based his approach on that adopted by Blockbuster Entertainment Corporation, a major U.S. based public chain, and the policies used in Trebor's report. Wise based his 20 per cent on the approach of Canada's largest chain, Jumbo Video.

[135] Adelstein's estimate for the operating results of the Hilton Division with four locations was capped at $1,975,613 and then adjusted downward by 20 per cent to $1,580,490 to reflect the loss of 22 Weber Street. Expenses were similarly adjusted. Taxes were deducted on a straight 44.34 per cent on the assumption that a potential purchaser would have fully utilized its small business limit for income tax purposes in respect of its existing operations. This produced a maintainable earnings after taxes of $152,072. The capitalization rate adopted was 15-18 per cent resulting in multiples of 6.5 to 5.5 times earnings. This calculation produced a value range of $835,000 to $990,000. This range was thought to be comparable to the purchase price of $1.18 million dollars paid by Murano and Glenn on December 31, 1989. Those terms and conditions of payment reflected an actual cost, as of that date, of approximately $1.05 million. Adelstein further pointed out that Murano acquired Glenn's 50 per cent share effective October 29, 1990, for an effective price of slightly less than $450,000 and implying a total value for the Division on a pro rata basis of slightly less than $900,000. Wise, on the other hand, contended that the purchase price paid to Glenn by Murano probably reflected a discount for a non-controlling interest and the fact that Glenn was ill and wanted out of the video industry. Glenn's motivation, Wise suggested, was confirmed by his subsequent sale of Bandito Video Division to Murano.

ii. The Top 30 Division

[136] Adelstein concluded reliable information was entirely lacking with respect to the Top 30 Division. He emphasized that the five stores had been opened for only one to two months and that management's estimates were too optimistic. Accordingly, in his opinion, there was insufficient certainty to use the earnings/cash flow approach to value this division. Not only was the division in a start up mode, it was also operating under a different marketing concept adding further risk to these operations. Adelstein therefore decided that an asset based valuation was the most reasonable approach to quantifying the value of this division.

[137] Using an asset based methodology, Murano's equity position would be arrived at by deducting liabilities from the assets of the division. The assets would consist of costs incurred by Murano to open the existing stores as well as those incurred in respect of unopened stores with leases. From this amount would be deducted inducements provided to Murano by landlords, as well as bank financing and other liabilities incurred but not paid as of the loss date. The net result would represent the book value of Murano's investment in the Top 30 Division. Adelstein, however, concluded that there was insufficient information and documentation available to him to support any claim of net personal investment by Murano in the Top 30 Division.

iii. The Bandito Video Division

[138] The defendants' expert defined the loss to Murano arising out of the Bandito Video Division as that represented by the excess of the fair market value of this division over the price that Murano had agreed to pay to acquire it from Glenn. Costs incurred by Murano in connection with this failed transaction would also be recoverable. Murano was to pay the sum of $1.4 million by way of $266,000 in cash and the balance in monthly instalments over a ten year period at an interest rate of 9 per cent. Evidence of this transaction included an unsigned copy of the purchase agreement dated February 1991 and the oral testimony of Murano and McTurk. Adelstein took the approach that in order for Murano to have sustained a loss, it was necessary to establish that the price he and Glenn had negotiated one month prior to the loss date was less than the fair market value of the division at the loss date. While the defendants' expert lacked financial documentation for 1990, he was of the opinion that the operating results and the financial position of the division one and a half to two years prior to the loss date did not imply a value in excess of the proposed transaction value between Murano and Glenn in 1991. Management's forecasts were considered unreliable.

iv. Other Losses

[139] On behalf of the defendants, counsel submitted that the other losses claimed were not foreseeable and, in any event, were not caused by the defendants. indeed, this position was taken with respect to all losses claimed beyond those directly associated with the Hilton

1995 CanLII 7410 (ON SC)

Division. It was submitted that the Bank had no knowledge of how the Top 30 Division was being financed or of the linkages between the various aspects of Murano's businesses.

B. Law Relating to Damages for Business Loss

1. Compensatory Damages

[140] There is a constellation of principles which guide courts in making damage assessments. These determinations are sometimes difficult because the enterprise is one of predicting what would have happened had there been no wrongdoing. There is also the need to design remedial outcomes to encourage parties to interact. Too lopsided a result in any one direction may deter socially and economically productive activity. Remedial principles must therefore be sensitive to this required calculus.

[141] The first general principle is, subject to certain narrow exceptions, damages are to be compensatory for losses sustained in both contract and tort. Contract involves a system of remedies for breach that is based on strict liability, not on fault. Breaching parties are not "punished" for their conduct but rather are required to compensate for losses caused. Because society wishes to encourage parties to enter into contracts, it has been judged that excessive societal protection through a system of penalties would be counter-productive. As Professor Farnsworth, in "Legal Remedies for Breach of Contract" (1970), 70 Colum. L. Rev. 1145, at p. 1147, has stated:

> Our system, then, is not directed at compulsion of promisors to prevent breach; rather, it is aimed at relief to promisees to redress breach. It is not much concerned with the question suggested by Frost's line: How can men be made to keep their promises? It is instead preoccupied with a different question: How can men be encouraged to deal with those who make promises? Perhaps it is more seemly for a system of free enterprise to promote the use of contract by encouraging promisees to rely on the promises of others, rather than by compelling promisors to perform their promises out of fear that the law will punish their breaches. In any event, this at least adds to the celebrated freedom to make contracts, a considerable freedom to break them as well.

[142] A similar approach has been taken in tort where the plaintiff is to be put in the position it would have been in had the wrong not occurred: BG Checo International Ltd. v. British Columbia Hydro & Power Authority, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 12, at p. 37. Thus, the general principle in both contract and tort “that the injured party should receive compensation in a sum which, so far as money can do, will put him in the same position as he would have been in if the contract had been performed or the tort had not been committed”. See Butler v. Egg and Egg Pulp Marketing Board (1966), 114 C.L.R. 185 (H.C. Australia), at p. 191. It can be seen at once, however, that this approach has some problems associated with it. For example, it requires a hypothesis of the position in which the injured party would have found itself had both parties performed or if the conduct complained of had not occurred. This raises the intertwined remedial issues of causation, foreseeability and certainty.

1995 CanLII 7410 (ON SC)

i. Causation

[143] Fundamentally the impugned conduct must have caused or contributed to the cause of the loss complained of. In Bank of Nova Scotia v. Dunphy Leasing Enterprises Ltd. (1991), 120 A.R. 241 (C.A.), at p. 258, Fraser J.A., dealing with circumstances similar to those in the proceeding at hand, stated:

> The fallacy in the Bank’s argument to this effect is the premise on which it is based. The Bank assumes that an injured party may recover something more than nominal damages only if the creditor’s tortious conduct was the sole cause of the debtor’s losses. But that is not necessary. It is enough the debtor prove that the creditor’s conduct caused some of the losses either by contributing to or exacerbating the debtor’s losses. While the debtor must show a causal connection between the creditor’s tortious acts and the losses suffered, this can be accomplished by establishing that the tortious acts were “either ‘the’ cause… or ‘a’ cause” of the losses sustained: Fridman, The Law of Torts in Canada, supra, at 323. Liability for damages can arise either way.

[144] The general common law approach to causation was summarized by McHugh J. in Commonwealth v. Amann Aviation Pty. Ltd. (1991), 174 C.L.R. 65 (H.C. Australia), at p. 175:

> In Smith, Hogg and Co. v. Black Sea and Baltic General Insurance Co. [[1940] A.C. 997], Lord Wright pointed out [at pp. 1003-1004] that: “There is always a combination of co-operating causes, out of which the law, employing its empirical or common sense view of causation, will select the one or more which it finds material for its special purpose of deciding the particular case.” Since the purpose of the inquiry involved in the causation issue is to fix legal responsibility “and not to find ultimate explanations, the > factor chosen by the common law is that which common sense fixes upon as relevant to responsibility in a particular case." [The National Insurance Co. of New Zealand Ltd. v. Espagne (1961), 105 C.L.R. 569, per Windeyer J. at p 592.] But, as Taylor J. pointed out in The Commonwealth v. Butler [(1958) 102 C.L.R. 465, at pp 476-477]: "the cause of an event is not established in the legal sense by showing, without more, that in the absence of a proved set of circumstances the event would or may not have happened, or, that a proved set of circumstances, in the widest sense, contributed to the happening of the event".

ii. Foreseeability

[146] However, an assessment of loss based only on causation contains the risk of saddling a wrongdoer with unexpected costs. Thus, even where the losses claimed can be said to have been caused by the conduct complained of, the law in both contract and tort has developed the additional limiting requirement that the losses must also have been foreseeable. Sometimes it is said that damages are excluded because they are too remote. This is simply another way of stating that they were not foreseeable: Rainbow Industrial Caterers Ltd. v. Canadian National Railway Co., [1991] 3 S.C.R. 3, at p. 17.

[147] This need for losses to have been foreseeable or not too remote arises out of the concern that full compensation might impose a crushing and undesirable burden. As Hart and Honoré in Causation in the Law (1959), at p. 281 pointed out:

> The need for limitation is especially clear in regard to compensation for a loss of economic stipulated opportunities, since the provision of opportunities for gain may have a snowball effect: opportunities breed further opportunities.

[148] Under contract law, the limitation imposed is that the damages be foreseeable. As Scarman L.J. stated in H. Parsons (Livestock) Ltd. v. Uttley Ingham & Co., [1978] 1 All E.R. 525 (C.A.), at p. 541, the Court should approach the question of loss of profits by posing this question:

1995 CanLII 7410 (ON SC)

> Given the situation of the parties at the time of contract, was the loss of profit, or market, a serious possibility, something that would have been in their minds had they contemplated breach?

[149] Or as Asquith L.J. in Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd., [1949] 1 All E.R. 997 (C.A.), at p. 1003 stated:

> It is enough… if the loss (or some factor without which it would not have occurred) is a "serious possibility" or a "real danger." For short, we have used the word "liable" to result. Possibly the colloquialism "on the cards" indicates the shade of meaning with some approach to accuracy.

[150] While contract may be concerned to ensure some equitable relationship between the benefit of the bargain and the liabilities to be assumed, the fact that particular features of the damages sustained may not have been reasonably foreseen does not mean that the losses cannot be recovered. It has not been necessary to prove a breaching party had it within its contemplation that the precise losses which in fact occurred were likely to be sustained in the event of a breach. See Canlin Ltd. v. Thiokol Fibres Canada Ltd. (1983), 22 B.L.R. 193 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 199. It is sufficient if the losses are of a type or a kind which could flow from the breach or conduct. It is in these senses then that losses in contract can be said to have been reasonably foreseen. See H. Parsons (Livestock) Ltd. v. Uttley Ingham & Co., supra.

[151] The same can be said of tort where the foresight requirement also attaches only to the type of injury not to its degree: Hughes v. Lord Advocate, [1963] 1 All E.R. 706 (H.L.), at p. 711. According to L. Rainaldi, ed., Remedies in Tort (1987), at pp. 4-25:

> In an action for conversion, the normal measure of damages is the value of the chattel at the date of conversion, together with an consequential damage flowing from the conversion, provided that it is not too remote to be recovered in law. (Emphasis added.)

[152] Still the law has traditionally distinguished between damages in tort and in contract and set forth general rules for their assessment depending on the cause of action. For instance, in contract, foreseeability is assessed at the time the contract is formed not when it is breached. See Hadley v. Baxendale (1854), 9 Exch. 341, 156 E.R. 145. In tort, foreseeability is judged at the time the tort is committed.

[153] The justification for the contractual approach lies in the consensual nature of contract. Parties to contracts voluntarily assume risk in return for negotiated consideration. Risk is therefore judged by the parties at the outset of their relationship. To assess the foreseeability of loss at some later point in time, such as the date of breach, carries with it the potential for changing the risks voluntarily assumed, i.e. the bargain.

[154] The importance of other more formal remedial distinctions between contract and tort is in decline, particularly where overlapping tort and contract causes of action exist. As Deane J. wrote in Commonwealth v. Amann Aviation Pty. Ltd., supra, at p. 116:

> The general principle governing the assessment of compensatory damages in both contract and tort is that the plaintiff should receive the monetary sum which, so far as money can, represents fair and adequate compensation for the loss or injury sustained by reason of the defendant's wrongful conduct. The application of that general principle ordinarily involves a comparison, sometimes implicit, between a hypothetical and an actual state of affairs: what relevantly represents the position in which the plaintiff would have been if the wrongful act (i.e. the repudiation or breach of contract or the tort) had not occurred and what relevantly represents the position in which the plaintiff is or will be after the occurrence of the wrongful act. While the general principle is the same in both contract and tort, the rules governing its application in the two areas may differ in some circumstances. Those differences are largely the result of historical considerations in that they reflect distinctions between causes of action rather than reasoned development or exegesis of the law. They are of diminishing significance for most purposes (note, for example, the gradual assimilation of the tests of "within the contemplation of the parties" (in contract) and "reasonably foreseeable" (in tort). [Footnotes omitted.]

[155] Similar Australian cases on this point were adopted by Jones J.A. in Rose v. Mitton (1994), 111 D.L.R. (4th) 217 (N.S. C.A.), at pp. 221-229.

[156] The Canadian case law is moving in a similar direction. Estey J. in Baud Corp., N.V. v. Brook, (sub nom. Asamera Oil Corporation Ltd v. Sea Oil & General Corporation) [1979] 1 S.C.R. 633, at p. 673 held that the same principles of remoteness apply in both contract and tort:

1995 CanLII 7410 (ON SC)

> We therefore approach the matter of the proper appraisal of the damages assessable in the peculiar circumstances of this case on the following basis: that the same principles of remoteness will apply to the claims made whether they sound in tort or contract subject only to special knowledge, understanding or relationship of the contracting, parties or to any terms express or implied of the contractual agreement relating to damages recoverable on breach.

[157] Most recently, the Supreme Court of Canada in BG Checo International Ltd. v. British Columbia Hydro & Power Authority, supra, at p. 40 has noted a tendency to give similar damages in tort and in contract. La Forest and McLachlin JJ. for the majority stated at p. 42:

> We note that in this respect the test for remoteness in contract may be of no practical difference from the test of reasonable foreseeability applicable in tort: see Asamera Oil Corporation v. Sea Oil & General Corp., [1979] 1 S.C.R. 633, at p. 673, and B.D.C. Ltd. v. Hofstrand Farms Ltd., [1986] 1 S.C.R. 228, at pp. 243-44.

[158] More generally, on the question of damages where there is joint liability in tort and contract, the majority held at p. 38:

> In situations of concurrent liability in tort and contract… it would seem anomalous to award a different level of damages for what is essentially the same wrong on the sole basis of the form of action chosen, though, of course, particular circumstances or policy may dictate such a course.

[159] There is a similar convergence of the rules of assessing damages for breach of contract and for breach of an equitable duty: Hodgkinson v. Simms, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 377, at p. 444. It can therefore be said that there is a general move towards uniform and principled rules in assessing damages that are more affected by the particularities of the case than by legal formalism. See also: Bitton v. Jakovljevic (1990), 75 O.R. (2d) 143 (H.C.), at p. 158-159, cited in Rice v. Rawluk (1992), 8 O.R. (3d) 696 (Gen. Div.), at pp. 716-717.

[160] Despite this convergence, however, a distinction is still drawn between tort and contract cases concerning the time at which foreseeability is to be judged. The distinction made that damages in contract must be foreseeable at the date of formation and not later when the wrong is committed (as is the case in tort) is generally a sound one. Contract, as previously pointed out, is a consensual relationship where risk assessment by the parties takes place at the time of formation. Thus, the focus on foreseeability at this point in time cannot usually be seen as the product of legal formalism.

[161] But this case severely tests the reasonableness of this ancient rule because of the "at will" nature of the contractual relationships. Where a party can demand full payment of a loan at will, that party can assess daily whether to break off its contractual relationship. In the case of a demand loan, it can do so without breaching its contract provided it gives reasonable notice. In that particular context, it seems strange to be thrown back to the original date of contract for the purposes of foreseeability. In fact, confining loss assessment to the formation of a long standing "at will" banking relationship seems artificial and may be inconsistent with the general trend of authority harmonizing rules in tort and contract. Indeed, in this case, judging the foreseeability of loss in light of the Bank's knowledge closer to the date of breach is not likely to upset contractual intentions given the expectations of the parties at the date of contract formation that the plaintiffs' changing conditions would be closely monitored.

iii. Certainty

[162] Another key limiting principle is the requirement that a plaintiff prove its damages on a reasonable preponderance of credible evidence. See 100 Main Street Ltd v. W.B. Sullivan Construction Ltd (1978), 88 D.L.R. (3d) 1 (C.A.), at p. 22. In Ratcliffe v. Evans, [1892] 2 Q.B. 524 (C.A.), at pp. 532-533 Bolan L.J. stated:

> As much certainty and particularity must be insisted on, both in pleading and proof of damage, as is reasonable, having regard to the circumstances and to the nature of the acts themselves by which the damage is done. To insist upon less would be to relax old and intelligible principles. To insist upon more would be the vainest of pedantry.

[163] 5 However, the inherent difficulty in piecing together what might have happened had there been no breach or tort committed will not relieve a court of its duty to assess damages. As Deane J. stated in Commonwealth v. Amann Aviation Pty. Ltd., supra, at p. 125:

> As was pointed out by Dixon and McTiernan JJ. in Fink v. Fink, [(1946), 74 C.L.R. 127 (H.C. of A.)] at p. 143: "Where there has been an actual loss of some sort, the common law does not permit difficulties of estimating the loss in money to defeat the only remedy it provided for breach of contract, an award of damages." There are, however, extreme cases in which curial procedures are simply inadequate to determine whether there was > any real or significant chance that an alleged benefit would actually have been obtained but for the repudiation or breach of contract or to assess the intrinsic worth of a particular suggested "benefit". The profit which one experienced commercial person may see as lying at the end of some commercial undertaking might be seen as an inevitable and disastrous loss by another.

[164] Because of the uncertainty surrounding nascent commercial ventures and damages associated with their failure, some American jurisdictions have a "new business rule" limiting recovery in such situations. The rationale for this rule is set out in Corning (City) v. Iowa Nebraska Light & Power Co., 282 N.W. 791 (Iowa S.C. 1938), at p. 796:

> Expected profits from a new commercial enterprise [are] too remote and speculative to warrant judgement for their loss because there are no available data of past business from which the fact of anticipated profits could have been established.

[165] However, the rule is not an absolute one. In cases, such as the one at hand, where expert evidence is tendered and the entrepreneur has a track-record, it may be possible to assess damages with the required certainty: Harsha v. State Savings Bank, 346 N.W. 2d 791 (Iowa S.C. 1984), at pp. 798-799.

[166] The applicable American case-law further holds that plaintiff need not prove damages with metaphysical certainty. As the Court of Appeals of South Carolina held in S.C. Fed. Savings Bank v. Thorton-Crosby, 399 S.E. 2d 8 (1990), at p. 11:

> When a plaintiff seeks special damages for breach of contract, he must plead and prove both the fact of damage and the amount of damage with a reasonable degree of certainty.
>
> If the fact of damage is established, the law does not require the amount of damage to be proven with mathematical certainty; damages may be recovered if there is evidence upon which a reasonable assessment of the loss can be made. The estimation of damages, however, cannot be based on conjecture or speculation; it must pass the realm of opinion not founded on the facts and must rest on evidence from which a reasonable accurate conclusion regarding the amount of loss can be logically and rationally drawn. There must be a certain standard or fixed method by which the loss may be estimated with a fair degree of accuracy. [Citations omitted.]

[167] In requiring this proof, the law does not leave the plaintiff without assistance. Where an initial finding of liability has been made, it is often stated that every reasonable presumption must be made in favour of a plaintiff because the defendant has produced the circumstances complained of: omnia praesumuntur contra spoliatorem. See Bradshaw Construction Ltd. v. Bank of Nova Scotia (1992), [1993] 1 W.W.R. 596 (B.C. C.A.), at p. 607; Kohler v. Thorold Natural Gas Co. (1916), 52 S.C.R. 514, at pp. 530-531; Eastwalsh Homes Ltd. v. Anatal Developments Ltd. (1993), 12 O.R. (3d) 675 (C.A.) and National Trust Co. v. Saks, [1994] O.J. No. 2488 (Gen. Div.), at para. 108-109, summarized 51 A.C.W.S. (3d) 539. The Supreme Court of Canada, in this respect, has appreciated that what might hypothetically have happened had there been no misconduct need not be reduced to mathematical accuracy. For justice to be done, a judge must, under many circumstances, do simply the best he or she can without fear that the decision will be set aside on the argument that the outcome is a matter of guess work. See Wood v. Grand Valley Railway Co. (1915), 51 S.C.R. 283, at p. 289. In the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario in that same case at (1913), 30 O.L.R. 44, at pp. 49-50 Meredith C.J.O. stated:

> There are, no doubt, cases in which it is impossible to say that there is any loss assessable as damages resulting from the breach of a contract, but the Courts have gone a long way in holding that difficulty in ascertaining the amount of the loss is no reason for not giving substantial damages, and perhaps the furthest they have gone in that direction is Chaplin v. Hicks, [1911] 2 K.B. 786. In that case the plaintiff, owing, as was found by the jury, to a breach by the defendant of his contract, had lost the chance of being selected by him out of fifty young ladies as one of twelve to whom, if selected, he had promised to give engagements as actresses for a stated period and at stated wages, and the action was brought to recover damages for the breach of the contract, and the damages were assessed by the jury at 100 [pounds]. The defendant contended that the damages were too remote and that they were unassessable. The first contention was rejected by the Court as not arguable, and with regard to the second it was held that “where it is clear that there has been actual loss resulting from the breach of contract, which it is difficult to estimate in money, it is for the jury to do their best to > estimate; it is not necessary that there should be an absolute measure of damages in each case:" per Fletcher Moulton, L.J., at p. 795.

[168] This approach to the required certainty in the context of assessing loss based on business valuations manifests itself in the observation that loss assessment is an exercise in "judgment" and that adherence to a mathematical formula cannot usurp the exercise of such judgment. See Cyprus Anvil Mining Corp. v. Dickson (1986), 33 D.L.R. (4th) 641, at pp. 652-654 and, more generally, Ken Cooper, "Assessing Possibilities in Damage Awards – The Loss of a Chance or Chance of a Loss" (1973), 37 Sask. L. Rev. 193 and S.M. Waddams, The Law of Damages (2d ed. 1993), c. 13. Accordingly, no methodology which might provide guidance in determining value should be rejected. As Lambert J.A. stated in Cyprus Anvil Mining Corp. v. Dickson, supra, at p. 653:

> Each formula that might prove useful should be worked out, using evidence, mathematics, assessment, judgment, or whatever is required. But when all that has been done, the judge is still left only with a mixture of raw material and processed material on which he must exercise his judgment to determine fair value.

[169] Justice Lambert went on to hold that each methodology should be given weight in proportion to its reliability (at p. 654). Thus, the discounted net cash flow approach must be viewed with care because minor variations and assumptions about discount rates can become magnified through the calculation into a gross distortion of the fair value (p. 657). While the capitalization of earnings and discounted cash flow methods are generally accepted methods for valuing a business which has a commercial value as a going-concern, which method is to be given more weight or is more appropriate must be decided in light of the facts of a given case unless both parties at trial have embraced one methodology as appropriate.

[170] In assessing the reliability of projected future profits, a record of past earnings will obviously increase the certainty of such a prediction. However, a lack of evidence of past earnings does not automatically preclude a new business from recovering for lost profits. Rather, a new business must be allowed to prove lost profits to a reasonable level of certainty by expert testimony, by evidence of actual profits of similar businesses, by evidence of proven managerial experience and expertise, and by evidence of subsequent earnings if such evidence is available. Nevertheless, damages should not be awarded for lost profits which are entirely speculative and uncertain. See Edwards v. Container Craft Carton and Paper Supply

Co., 327 P. 2d 622 (Calif. Dist. Ct. App. 1958) and Cooke Associates Inc. v. Warnick, 664 P. 2d 1161 (Utah Sup. Ct. 1983). But once a defendant has been shown to have caused a loss, liability should not be escaped because the amount of the loss cannot be proven with precision. Consequently, the reasonable level of certainty required to establish "the amount" of the loss is generally lower than that required to establish "the fact or cause of" a loss. See Cooke Associates v. Warnick, supra, at p. 1166 and Bradshaw Construction Ltd. v. Bank of Nova Scotia, supra, at p. 28.

2. Punitive Damages

[171] The plaintiffs have also claimed exemplary damages. This punitive remedy has been awarded in similar circumstances but only where the conduct of the creditor and receiver merit censure. For example, in Ronald Elwin Lister Ltd. v. Dunlop Canada Ltd., supra, at p. 749 the fact that the receiver entered into possession with an armed guard and the protracted delay by the creditor in replying to the demand for the return of certain assets clearly not available to the creditor were held to be a sufficient basis for the exercise of the trial judge's discretion to award exemplary damages. Similarly, in McLachlan v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, supra, at p. 110, exemplary damages were upheld where a bank authorized an entry and seizure of certain assets when it was known that the security did not justify the seizing of the particular assets in question and where the receiver rejected an offer of the debtor to pay off the operating loan in full and did so without referring this offer to the bank. The British Columbia Court of Appeal concluded that such circumstances were sufficient "to support a finding of the degree of high-handedness that is necessary before an award of exemplary damages can be made".

[172] In Royal Bank of Canada v. W. Got and Associates Electric Ltd., supra, at pp. 385-397 McDonald J. awarded exemplary damages in the sum of $100,000 where the bank concealed its intention to apply ex parte for an order appointing a receiver and where, in bringing those ex parte proceedings, the bank filed an intentionally misleading affidavit upon which the order was granted. In awarding exemplary relief against the bank, McDonald J. described the privileged position of Canadian banks as previously reproduced and then concluded [at pp. 396-397]:

> Obtaining such an order… which seriously affronts the administration of justice and thus offends "the ordinary standards of morality or decent conduct in the community in such marked degree that censure by way of damages is, in the opinion of the Court, warranted" (those being the words of Clement J.A. in the Paragon and Can-Alta cases).

I assess exemplary damages in the sum of $100,000. This is a substantial award, intended to emphasize two points: First, that the court will not condone a clear violation of the rule of law that requires a debentureholder to give reasonable notice of its requirement that the debtor pay its debt, and second, that the court will not condone an abuse of its process for commercial advantage. The amount of the award also reflects that, as no crime has been committed, no other form of punishment is available. Finally, the amount of award takes into account the grave and irrevocable consequences of the Bank's conduct to the business of its client.

[173] However, in Royal Bank v. Roland Home Improvements Ltd. (August 14, 1992), Doc. 13119/86 (Ont. Gen. Div.), [1992] O.J. no. 1684, summarized 35 A.C.W.S. (3d) 18, Keenan J. refused to award punitive damages where a bank had wrongfully proceeded without notice to dishonour the cheques of a customer with devastating and immediate adverse affects on the customer's business. The customer's action sounded only in contract and substantial compensatory relief had been awarded. Keenan J., however, denied both punitive and aggravated damages in stating, at pp. 24-27 of the original:

In their counter-claim, the defendant advance a claim for "punitive, exemplary, and aggravated damages". Punitive and exemplary damages are the same thing. They are awarded in an appropriate case to punish the offending party for reprehensible conduct. It is a form of civil fine ordered by the Court and is payable to the other party rather than to the State. An award of punitive damages is in addition to the award of damages which compensates the aggrieved party for the loss suffered. Aggravated damages, on the other hand, are damages which form part of the compensation of the injured party. They recognize intangible additional injury such as distress and humiliation suffered because of the manner in which the wrong was committed. The distinction was pointed out in the majority judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the *Vorvis v. CIBC (*1989), 58 D.L.R. (4th) 193, at p. 202:

"Aggravated damages are compensatory in nature and may only be awarded for that purpose. Punitive damages, on the other hand, are punitive in nature and may only be employed in circumstances where the conduct giving the cause for complaint is of such a nature that it merits punishment."

After reviewing the authorities on the subject, McIntyre J. concluded at p. 204:

"…while aggravated damages may be awarded in actions for breach of contract in appropriate cases this is not a case where they should be given…"

At p. 205:

"I would not wish to be taken as saying that aggravated damages could never be awarded in a case of wrongful dismissal, particularly where the acts complained of were also independently actionable, a factor not present here."

In the case at bar I find no evidence that the action of the Bank in breach of its agreement to honour cheques caused any additional aggravated damage to RHIL or the Filzmaiers. There remains the question of punitive damages and whether this is a case which calls for such award. To the Bank it would represent a penalty additional to the damages consequences of its breach. To the Filzmaier interests it would represent overcompensation. The majority in Vorvis v. CIBC held that punitive damages were available only when; (1) the conduct constituting the breach of contract is also a tort for which punitive damages are recoverable; (2) the conduct is deserving of punishment because it is harsh, vindictive, reprehensible and malicious, or so extreme that by any reasonable standard it is deserving of full condemnation and punishment. See pp. 207 and 208.

In Vorvis the conduct complained of was held to be not in itself an actionable wrong and would not in itself attract an award of damages and an entitlement to punitive damages. In the case at bar, the Bank's action in dishonouring cheques was a breach of their contractual agreement to do so. There was no other action by any of the Bank's agents accompanying the breach which could be considered to be in itself an actionable wrong. Failure to warn Roland Filzmaier or to give him an opportunity to respond did not violate any other rights or breach any other duty. Neither did the tough "hard ball" stance taken by the Bank Manager after the damage was done constitute or form a part of another actionable wrong done by the Bank to the Filzmaier interest.

Reliance has been placed on the case of Eli v. Royal Bank of Canada (1985) 24 D.L.R. (4th) 127 in support of the claim for punitive damages. That was a British Columbia case in which the trial judge held that the Bank had wrongfully dishonoured cheques written by a customer on behalf of an Indian bank. The Bank was also guilty of conversion of the Band's funds. The trial judge held that there was indeed a cause of action for the conversion which was done as a high-handed self-help remedy. In making an award of punitive damages (at p. 138), the Court set out a number of factors which it considered. Those factors included both the breach of contract in dishonouring the cheques and those facts which relate to the unlawful conversion of the funds by the Bank. The reasons do not appear to make a distinction, but the award can be justified on the basis that it was punishment to the bank because the breach of contract was accompanied by another actionable wrong.

As the breach of contract in the case at bar was not accompanied by or committed in a manner that gave rise to another actionable wrong, there can be no recovery of punitive damages.

[174] While Keenan J.'s damage award was varied on appeal, his consideration of punitive damages was specifically endorsed: 74 O.A.C. 250, at p. 255. This long excerpt from his reasons and the authorities reviewed therein reveal a judicial reluctance to award exemplary damages except in exceptional circumstances. This reluctance stems from the nature of exemplary damages. Monetary penalties or "fines" are usually the province of the criminal law. Civil proceedings lack many of the important protections of the criminal law including quite different onuses. There are also few guidelines for either juries or judges in determining the extent of exemplary damages or quantum. With such little guidance, there is the risk that decision-making will be highly personalized, unpredictable and more in the nature of "palm tree justice". See Cassell & Co. Ltd. v. Broome, [1972] A.C. 1027 (H.L.). There is also the concern that the potential for excessive exemplary damage awards may deter parties from entering into contracts.

[175] However, where a defendant deliberately and recklessly exposes a plaintiff to a risk without justification, particularly in a personal injury context, the inability of compensatory relief to respond to the shocking consequences of the defendant's unjustified actions often cry out for a supporting exemplary award. See S.M. Waddams, The Law of Damages (2d ed. 1993), at para. 11.210. And while exemplary damages are not normally awarded for breach of contract, there may be situations demanding the deterrence associated with such relief, particularly where overlapping tort and contract claims exist. Court created and court administered remedies must be continuously updated and refined to preserve the integrity of the substantive rights they are intended to enforce. See Flame Bar-B-Q Lid. v. Hoar (1979), 106 D.L.R. (3d) 438 (N.B. C.A.). In this respect, Professor Waddams, supra, at para. 11.260 has written:

> Refusal of exemplary damages is, it is submitted, appropriate in most commercial cases. Where, however, the plaintiff does have a personal interest in performance of the sort the Court would protect by a decree of specific performance or by an injunction to restrain the breach, a case can be made for deterring interference with such interests. In many such cases as, for example, wrongful eviction or harassment of a tenant, the defendant will usually, though not necessarily, be guilty of a tort as well as a breach of contract and there is no doubt that exemplary damages can be given for the tort. It is increasingly held that concurrent liability in contract and tort exists in many cases formally treated as purely contractual. This development will, it seems, have the effect of enlarging the scope of exemplary damages. Thus, if a professional person deliberately gives bad advice to a client, or breaks a confidence for the purpose of causing the client damage or embarrassment, or making a profit, exemplary damages would seem to be quite appropriate… There is no general objection to joining actions in contract and tort, providing the joinder is fair to the defendant. In such a case there would seem to be no objection to exemplary damages.

[176] Where exemplary damages may be appropriately awarded, a court will have regard to all of the circumstances including “the size of the defendant’s bank balance” in fashioning the extent of damages thought to be fully appropriate. See H. McGregor, McGregor on Damages (15th ed., 1988), at p. 269, para. 427. See also Waddams, supra, at paras. 11.280-11.390. So too the conduct of a plaintiff in provoking otherwise harsh or oppressive actions by a defendant is relevant and may reduce or extinguish an award of exemplary damages. See Waddams, supra, para. 11.450.

[177] We now turn to an application of this remedial framework to the facts at hand.

C. Remedial Law Applied

[178] Both experts adopted generally appropriate methodologies with respect to the Hilton Division. See Cyprus Anvil Mining Corp., supra, at p. 667. But both experts, in my view, adopted assumptions that were either too conservative or too liberal. For example, Wise's adoption of the plaintiffs' profit projections unduly minimized Murano's own quite daunting projections made to Rowlands at the meeting of March 20; the closure of 22 Weber Street; and the fact that Murano was actually contemplating the move of a second store out of the Kitchener/Waterloo area to Pickering. In the circumstances, the projected 12 per cent annual increases for the years 1991 to 1993 strike me as overly optimistic, particularly in light of the revenue experience in 1989 in comparison to previous years. Similarly, Wise's failure to attribute any head office costs to administer the Hilton Division stores when those stores were really the most concrete manifestation of Murano's foothold in the video rental industry was unfair. Unaccounted for, as well, were the concerns expressed by Robert Hilton in his letter to Murano of March 5, 1991. In my opinion, Murano faced challenges that were not adequately reflected in either management's projections or Wise's application of risk factors of 5-20 per cent over the projected period.

[179] On the other hand, Adelstein's emphasis on 1990 and the purchase price which Murano and Glenn paid Hilton for the four stores does not adequately accommodate the before tax earnings experience of Murano and Glenn in 1990 of almost one-half million dollars and the buoyant nature of the video rental industry generally. Nor do his assumptions adequately accommodate the economies of scale and additional expertise that would have been obtained by combining the Hilton Division stores with the Top 30 and Bandito Video Divisions.

[180] While the Bank's counsel argued that Murano's businesses were so highly leveraged they were bound to collapse, Murano was an experienced and aggressive entrepreneur who had more than survived up until March 27th, 1991. He had obviously made up for any lack of formal business training by both actual business experience and his considerable energy. Earlier, at considerable profit, he had disposed of businesses he had grown. The Hilton stores had been managed very profitably through 1990 and despite his presentation to Rowlands, which I think was exaggerated to produce a specific result, he had successfully juggled all his financial commitments. See Bradshaw Construction Ltd. v. Bank of Nova Scotia, supra, at pp. 613-615. Adelstein's analysis does not accord every reasonable presumption to the innocent party in any of these respects. I also find his approach to tax rates and reinvestment rates unjustified when examined against how Murano was likely to approach these issues and in light of the Jumbo Video experience. As Keenan J. stated in Roland Home Improvements, supra, at p. 8, it is not enough to say that a company with a history of losses or a previous year of difficulty will continue in that pattern. Regard must be had to a company's potential for future profit and an assessment made, no matter how difficult, of the loss of that potential.

[181] Clearly, 1991 was going to be a difficult year for Murano and his associates. But they had a reasonable plan for dealing with those problems. There was capable management in place and this expertise was growing almost by the minute. Murano had the benefit of advice from Gray and Hilton and he was on the cusp of acquiring the assistance of McTurk and the others managing the Bandito Video Division. When Murano told Rowlands he did not intend to put more money into the business, he was bargaining with the Bank in order to garner greater support. It was not an admission that insolvency was around the corner. I also accept the appropriateness of the reinvestment rate applied by Wise.

[182] Admittedly, Glenn and Murano had paid $1.4 million dollars for the four stores in 1989 and Murano had purchased Glenn's share in October of 1990 for one-half the earlier purchase price. But balanced against these transactions are the 1990 operating results, the planned acquisition of the Bandito Video Division, the buoyant nature of the industry, particularly for chains, and Murano's obvious energy and determination. In my opinion, the plaintiffs' loss on the Hilton Division should therefore be assessed at 75 per cent of the mid-point of the value range estimated by Wise or.75 times $2,702,500 or $2,026,875 less the amount owed the Bank (i.e. $207,000) and the indebtedness of Murano by way of shareholder loans from HVL and 828556 in the amounts of $127,990 and $146,787 respectively. See Ronald Elwyn Lister Ltd v. Dayton Tire Canada Ltd. (1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 88, at pp. 103, 116. I would round the resulting value of the Hilton business and therefore Murano's losses in this regard to $1,550,000.

[183] Turning to the Top 30 Division, I am satisfied this new venture was not too uncertain to sustain a damage award. Murano had substantial experience and an existing base in the video rental industry. The Top 30 "concept" was only different in name and in the size of stores. Moreover, this latter feature was designed to make franchises more available and therefore attractive to prospective buyers. Murano's operating experience was sufficient to permit an inference of probable success and profitability with this new venture. Robert Hilton, even in his letter to Murano of March 5th, 1991, considered the concept a good one. I also accept that discounted cash flow methodology can appropriately be applied only to the existing store in contrast to the capitalized earnings method which Wise applied to the projected stores.

[184] But, in the circumstances, I am not satisfied with the 5 per cent -12.5 per cent risk factors applied to the existing stores over the projected period even with the additional 20 per cent risk factor applied to the seven unopened stores. I also have concern with the way in which taxes were calculated using the small business rate for the first $200,000 where that rate had already been utilized in connection with the Hilton Division. Having regard to all of the evidence before me, I would estimate the loss on the existing stores for the Top 30 Division at 50 per cent of the mid-point value estimated by Wise or.50 times $2,152,000 or $1,076,000 rounded to $1,000,000.

[185] I do not accept Wise's estimate of the loss on the projected stores of $411,000. As stated earlier, in assessing damages, every reasonable presumption must be made in favour of the plaintiffs. On the evidence, however, I am of the view that the claim in this respect is too speculative even having regard to the 25 per cent risk factor which was applied, the limitation of the claim to 1991, and the 50 per cent capitalization rate or the multiple of two used in the methodology.

[186] With respect to the Bandito Video Division, I note that this was one of the largest video chains in Canada at the time. While the trend line in its revenues and profits prior to the proposed sale was in a downward direction, it is clear that Glenn was seriously ill and that his son was not capable of preserving the business. In contrast, Murano had great energy and ambition which the management personnel in Glenn's business appreciated. Indeed, they had made a decision to go with him no matter what. The industry data, as I have previously reviewed, indicated an upward trend in revenues particularly for these larger operations.

[187] The agreed purchase price, on the other hand, is a factor which restrains the plaintiffs' claims. Further, there appears to have been no other buyer to step in which is another restraining influence on the claimed losses associated with the failed transaction. See Cyprus Anvil Mining Corp., supra, at p. 655. Nevertheless, Glenn's illness and the fact that only Murano was available to take the business off his hands suggests a significant bargaining advantage in Murano's favour. As well, Murano intended to integrate Bandito Video with the more readily franchised Top 30 concept, potentially adding value and contributing a new dynamism to Bandito Video. Moreover, Bandito Video was one of the largest franchised video rental businesses in Canada and the video rental chains had the strongest prospects for surviving and thriving through the 1990s. In this respect, it is not irrelevant that, on the closing of the transaction, Murano would be bringing together two proven management teams under his aggressive leadership. The defendants' expert paid little or no regard to the potential of these developments.

[188] Having considered all these factors, I am of the view that management's revenue projections were overly optimistic and that the risk factors of 5 per cent to 20 per cent applied by Wise were inadequate in the circumstances. Accordingly, I assess the plaintiffs' losses on the Bandito Video Division at 75 per cent of the mid-point of the range of fair market value of the Bandito Video Division estimated by Wise or at $981,750 which I round to $1,000,000.

[189] Before turning to the issues of causation and foreseeability with respect to these losses, the losses associated with Murano's real estate and real estate related assets need consideration. I am not satisfied with the reliability of the fair market value estimates as of the loss date for the real estate in question. The market was a difficult one for commercial properties and particularly properties experiencing vacancies. Not all of the back-up documentation constituted formal appraisals and even where opinions were expressed as appraisals, extensive local market comparisons and revenue projections were not given. Murano had heavily mortgaged these properties and, thus, his asset base was highly leveraged at the very time his operations in the video industry were being challenged. Murano's claim is for losses arising from the forced sale of these properties. I think it more likely than not he would have been required to sell several of these properties to meet those challenges. Having regard to all of the circumstances, however, I am prepared to assess his loss on real estate as the difference between the total mortgage balance outstanding of $1,872,541 and the gross disposal price of $1,753,000 or $119,541 rounded to $120,000. To this I would add a further $100,000 to assess the total extent of loss due to untimely disposition of real estate assets at $220,000. Losses on mortgages, notes receivable and inducements were not established with the requisite certainty or causality. Generally the evidence ranged from skimpy to non-existent. The capitulation to Liappas was not, in my view, reasonable. Accordingly, I find that no losses along these lines were adequately established.

[190] Business losses established are therefore (Hilton Division) $1,550,000, (Top 30 Division) $1,000,000, (Bandito Video Division) $1,000,000, and (real estate) $220,000 which total $3,770,000.

[191] In considering the issues of causation and foreseeability with respect to these losses, regard must be had to commercial reality and particularly the impact on a debtor of a receivership. The imposition of a receivership is viewed as a fundamental warning to others. For this reason it is much harder for a debtor to raise money once a receiver is in place. Quite reasonably, lenders are simply reluctant to lend money under such circumstances. See Mister Broadloom Corporation (1968) Ltd. v. Bank of Montreal, supra, at p. 7. Indeed, this is the reality which fuels the policy requiring "extraordinary circumstances to justify an entry after such a short period following the demand". See McLachlan v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, supra, at p. 108. The imposition of a receivership is understood to entail immediate and devastating consequences for a business.

[192] Against this commercial reality, there is nothing unreasonable in the conclusion that the defendants' unilateral actions without notice or any prior discussion inflicted a blow to the plaintiffs from which they were unable to recover. The defendants' actions therefore can reasonably be said to have caused the losses sustained by the plaintiffs. The established damages flow as a direct result of the misconduct alleged, misconduct which constitutes both a breach of contract and the commission of the torts of trespass and conversion. See Ronald Elwyn Lister Ltd. v. Dayton Tire Canada Ltd., supra, at p. 107.

[193] With regard to the foreseeability of the damages, I am satisfied that those business losses were reasonably foreseeable at the time of contracting. The Bank sought and obtained comprehensive information from Murano and Glenn about their business activities before deciding to contract with them. The Bank was aware that Murano was an active entrepreneur with several other ventures. At all times, the Bank would be alive to the devastating impact a receivership has on a debtor's ongoing financial credibility. At all times, the Bank would also know that the adverse impact of a receivership would be magnified if it became known that the debtor could not be trusted and was generally in a desperate financial situation. In Monarch S.S. Co. v. A.B. Karlshamns Oljefarbriker, [1949] 1 All E.R. 1 (H.L.), Lord Wright stated at p. 14:

> [T]he question in a case like the present must always be what responsible business men must be taken to have contemplated as the natural or probable result if the contract was broken. As reasonable business men each must be taken to understand the ordinary practices and exigencies of the other's trade or business. That need not generally be the subject of special discussion or communication. […] The same is true in many cases of complicated consequences flowing from an unanticipated breach of contract, but the damages are not treated either as special or remote if they flow from the normal business position of the parties which the court assumes must be reasonably known to them.

[194] Under this test, it was reasonably foreseeable at the time the parties contracted that these kind of breaches could destroy Murano's business and produce losses of the order established. From what the Bank knew about Murano at the time they entered into dealings with him, I am satisfied that neither the existence of loss nor the extent of loss was unforeseeable. As well, since the plaintiffs have made joint claims in tort and contract, the difference in the timing at which foreseeability is to be assessed in tort and contract claim is not material.

[195] The Bank's knowledge only improved as the relationship developed. The torts of trespass and conversion were committed in the face of such knowledge and carried out notwithstanding Coull's prediction to McKinnon that the receivership would cause Murano's downfall. Indeed, the Bank attempted to cause Murano's bankruptcy and Hehir, at the time he acted, did not believe that Murano would be able to obtain sufficient funds to repay the Bank. The Bank was aware that Murano had expansion plans. He had raised his Top 30 initiative with Murray in November and with Rowlands in mid-March. As a result of Glenn's anxious telephone call concerning the receivership, the Bank was specifically aware of the impending Bandito Video transaction. The Bank was also aware that Murano was active with several other financial institutions and businesses such as TD Bank, Canada Trust, National Trust, Papa Pete's, Miami Subs, and of the use of his various commercial properties to secure loans. Accordingly, I find the losses established to be reasonably foreseeable in both contract and tort and caused by the defendants' wrongful actions.

[196] I might add that in an "at will" banking relationship of this type I see no unfairness in also assessing foreseeability in contract near the date of breach. The Bank sought and received regular updates on Murano's situation. Such monitoring was expected by the parties on contracting. The Bank could have extricated itself at any time by giving reasonable notice.

[197] This leaves the plaintiffs' claim for exemplary damages. The Bank was aware that Murano was not "back-dooring" or absconding with the inventory at 22 Weber Street. Rather, it used the Weber Street Store situation as pretext for moving without notice against a customer believed to be in financial difficulty. The Bank went on, through its officers and agents, to suggest to anyone who inquired that Murano's financial situation was desperate and that his conduct had been, in their view, dishonest. Indeed, it attempted to bankrupt him. This is high-handed and callous conduct on the part of a financial institution occupying a privileged position in Canadian society. Exemplary damages would normally be called for.

[198] On the other hand, Murano's actions leading up to the meeting with Rowlands on March 20, 1991 and his conduct during and after that meeting are not free of criticism. While Murano and his counsel had an answer at trial for every one of the alleged failings reported in the Bank's records, these explanations were never shared with the Bank. If corporate year-ends had been changed, why not tell Murray that? If Hughes had completed the most recent year-end review and nothing more was required until April or May of 1991, why did Murano not bring this to Murray's attention. I also find as suspect Murano's claim to have honoured his $100,000 commitment to the Bank by paying funds into an operating account. Similarly, his belief that Peter Rowlands approved the move from Weber Street to Richmond Hill was, at a minimum, unreasonable. While none of this conduct justified the Bank's actions, it extinguishes what would otherwise have been a substantial award of exemplary damages in the plaintiffs' favour. See Moase Produce Ltd. v. Royal Bank (1987), 64 C.B.R. (N.S.) 191 (P.E.I. S.C.), at p. 199.

[199] The defendants are therefore jointly and severally liable to the plaintiffs in the amount of $3,770,000.

VI. THE GUARANTEES

[200] For obvious reasons, counsel were preoccupied with all the preceding issues and related law. There was therefore little time and argument devoted to the effect of the Bank's actions on guarantees given it by some of the plaintiffs. I am, however, satisfied that its actions so materially affected the sureties' risks that they are entitled to a full discharge. See Bauer v. Bank of Montreal (1980), 110 D.L.R. (3d) 424 (S.C.C.).

VII. CONCLUSION

[201] The defendants are directed to pay to the plaintiffs damages in the amount of $3,770,000. Under the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43, s. 128, the plaintiffs may claim prejudgment interest. I may be spoken to on this matter and on the issue of costs.

Action allowed; counterclaim dismissed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ALBERTA

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DE L'ALBERTA

Limitation of actions — Action by aboriginal people — Discovery of cause of action — Action brought against Crown based on breach of fiduciary duty, fraudulent and malicious behaviour and treaty breach — Whether claims statute-barred — Limitation of Actions Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. L-15, s. 4.

In 1877, the Papaschase Indians were allotted a reserve in what is now southeast Edmonton. In 1886, Chief Papaschase and other members of his Band surrendered their treaty rights and rights connected with the Reserve in exchange for a cash payment. Three men and their families, found to be the remaining members of the Band, entered into an agreement with the government in 1889 to surrender their interest in the Reserve

Prescription — Action intentée par des Autochtones — Découverte des causes d'action — Action contre la Couronne pour manquement à une obligation fiduciaire, actes frauduleux et malveillants, et manquements à un traité — Les demandes sont-elles prescrites? — Limitation of Actions Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. L-15, art. 4.

En 1877, une réserve a été attribuée aux Indiens Papaschase à l'endroit où se trouve aujourd'hui le sud-est d'Edmonton. En 1886, le chef Papaschase et d'autres membres de la bande ont renoncé à leurs droits issus d'un traité et relatifs à la réserve en contrepartie d'un paiement en espèces. with a view to its sale or lease, on the condition that the proceeds be held in trust and paid to Band members and their descendants. In 2001, the plaintiffs, claiming to be descendants of Chief Papaschase and other Papaschase Band members, commenced an action against the Crown for breach of fiduciary duty, fraudulent and malicious behaviour, and treaty breach. The Crown applied for summary dismissal of the claims. The chambers judge granted the application. He found that (1) most of the claims in the action failed to show a genuine issue for trial; (2) the plaintiffs did not have standing to bring the action; and (3) the claims were barred by the Alberta Limitation of Actions Act, with the exception of the claim for an accounting of any proceeds of sale of the Reserve the Crown might still have in its possession. The Court of Appeal set aside the decision, holding that all or most of the issues raised were genuine, triable issues, including the standing and limitations issues.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

The chambers judge's order should be restored. A defendant who seeks summary dismissal must prove that there is "no genuine issue of material fact requiring trial". In this case, there is no "genuine issue" for trial. Assuming that the claims disclosed triable issues and that standing could be established, the claims, except the claim for an accounting, are barred by the Limitation of Actions Act. The claim relating to the accounting of any proceeds received from the sale of the Reserve is a continuing claim and not caught by the Act. The evidence filed by the government established that the causes of action now raised would have been clear in the 1970s to the plaintiffs, exercising due diligence. The plaintiffs filed no material in response to this evidence. The only available inference on the state of the evidence is that the causes of action became discoverable within the meaning of the Limitation of Actions Act in the 1970s and that the claims are now statute-barred. Accordingly, the plaintiffs' action should be dismissed, with the exception of the claim for an accounting, provided that the Crown is still in possession of the funds received from the sale of the reserve lands and that a plaintiff demonstrate that he or she has standing to bring this claim. [1] [11-12] [17-18] respective —, ont cédé leur intérêt dans la réserve en vue de sa location ou de sa vente, à la condition que le produit de l'opération soit détenu en fiducie et versé aux membres de la bande et à leurs descendants. En 2001, les demandeurs, se disant les descendants du chef Papaschase et d'autres membres de la bande Papaschase, ont intenté une action contre la Couronne pour manquements à une obligation fiduciaire, actes frauduleux et malveillants, et manquements à un traité. La Couronne a présenté une requête en jugement sommaire pour faire rejeter les demandes. Le juge en chambre a accueilli la requête. Il a conclu que (1) la plupart des allégations ne suscitaient pas de véritables questions justifiant un procès; (2) les demandeurs n'avait pas qualité pour intenter l'action; (3) les demandes étaient prescrites par application de la Limitation of Actions Act de l'Alberta, sauf pour la reddition de compte relative aux sommes provenant du produit de la vente que la Couronne pouvait avoir encore en sa possession. La Cour d'appel a infirmé cette décision, statuant que la totalité ou la plupart des questions soulevées étaient de véritables questions donnant matière à procès, notamment en ce qui concernait la qualité des demandeurs et la prescription.

L'ordonnance du juge en chambre doit être rétablie. Pour faire rejeter sommairement l'action, le défendeur doit démontrer « qu'il n'y a aucune véritable question de fait importante qui requiert la tenue d'un procès ». En l'espèce, il n'existe pas de « véritable question » à débattre. À supposer que la déclaration soulève des questions donnant matière à procès et qu'il soit possible d'établir la qualité des demandeurs, les demandes sont prescrites par application de la Limitation of Actions Act, sauf en ce qui concerne la reddition de compte. La demande de reddition de compte relative au produit de la vente de la réserve est une demande de nature continue non visée par cette loi. Il ressort de la preuve déposée par le gouvernement que, dans les années 1970, les demandeurs auraient pu constater, à l'évidence, l'existence des causes d'action maintenant invoquées s'ils avaient fait preuve de diligence raisonnable. Les demandeurs n'ont présenté aucun élément en réponse à cette preuve. Dans l'état de la preuve, la seule inférence possible est que la découverte des causes d'action, au sens de la Limitation of Actions Act, est devenue possible dans les années 1970, et que les demandes sont maintenant prescrites. Par conséquent, l'action des demandeurs devrait être rejetée, sauf pour la reddition de compte, à la condition que la Couronne ait toujours en sa possession les fonds provenant de la vente des terres de réserve et qu'un demandeur démontre avoir qualité pour réclamer cette reddition de compte. 2008 SCC 14 (CanLII)

The following is the judgment delivered by

[1] THE COURT — We are all of the view that the appeal should be allowed and the order of the chambers judge restored. It follows that the plaintiffs' action should be dismissed, with the exception of claims relating to accounting for funds received from the sale of the reserve lands, provided that the appellant is still in possession of such funds and that a plaintiff demonstrate that he or she has standing to bring this claim.

[2] The plaintiffs bring this action on their own behalf and on behalf of all descendants of the Papaschase Indian Band No. 136. The facts are shrouded in the mists of time and some details are disputed, but the broad picture is the following.

[3] In 1877, the Papaschase Indians adhered to Treaty No. 6 and were allotted a reserve in what is now southeast Edmonton. In 1886, Chief Papaschase and a number of other members of his Band — the Band's core leadership group — "took scrip". This meant that in exchange for a cash payment they surrendered their treaty rights and rights connected with the Reserve. These members left the Reserve. A few years later in 1889, the people whom government officials found to be remaining members of the Band — three men and their families — entered into an agreement to surrender their interest in the Reserve to the government with a view to its sale or lease, on condition that the proceeds be held in trust and paid to Band members and their descendants. It appears that these people ended up joining the Enoch Band. Over the years, the government paid monies from the sale of the Papaschase Reserve to the members of the Enoch Band, in accordance with an agreement signed in 1894 between the government and the two surviving Band members who had agreed to the Reserve's surrender.

[4] In 2001, the plaintiffs, claiming to be descendants of Chief Papaschase and other Papaschase Band members, commenced an action against the Crown. Their claim alleged that the government

[1] LA COUR — Nous sommes tous d'avis que le pourvoi devrait être accueilli et l'ordonnance du juge en chambre rétablie. L'action des demandeurs devrait par conséquent être rejetée, sauf pour la reddition de compte à l'égard des fonds provenant de la vente des terres de réserve, à la condition que l'appelant ait toujours ces fonds en sa possession et qu'un demandeur démontre avoir qualité pour réclamer cette reddition de compte.

[2] Les demandeurs intentent l'action en leur propre nom et au nom de tous les descendants de la bande indienne Papaschase n^{o} 136. Les faits se perdent dans la nuit des temps et certains détails sont litigieux, mais en voici néanmoins un aperçu général.

[3] En 1877, les Indiens Papaschase ont adhéré au Traité n^{o} 6 et on leur a attribué une réserve, là où se trouve aujourd'hui le sud-est d'Edmonton. En 1886, le chef Papaschase et d'autres membres de la bande — le groupe à la tête de la bande — ont « accepté un certificat ». C'est-à-dire que, en contrepartie d'un paiement en espèces, ils ont renoncé à leurs droits issus du traité et relatifs à la réserve. Ces membres de la bande ont quitté la réserve. Quelques années plus tard, en 1889, les membres restants de la bande que les représentants du gouvernement ont pu retracer — trois hommes et leur famille respective — ont accepté de céder au gouvernement leur intérêt dans la réserve en vue de sa location ou de sa vente, à condition que le produit de l'opération soit détenu en fiducie et versé aux membres de la bande et à leurs descendants. Ces personnes se seraient finalement jointes à la bande Enoch. Au fil des ans, le gouvernement a versé aux membres de la bande Enoch des sommes provenant de la vente de la réserve Papaschase, suivant une entente signée en 1894 entre le gouvernement et les deux membres survivants de la bande qui avaient consenti à la cession de la réserve.

[4] En 2001, les demandeurs, se disant les descendants du chef Papaschase et d'autres membres de la bande Papaschase, ont intenté une action contre la Couronne. Ils reprochaient au gouvernement had wrongfully allowed Papaschase Band members to take scrip without properly advising them of the consequences; that the government had wrongfully pressured the Band to surrender the Reserve under the influence of the Edmonton settlement's lobbying; and that the government had thereby caused the dissolution of the Band. The claim also alleged that the government did not follow the rules to obtain a legal surrender of the Reserve; that the government had not sold the Reserve land for market value; and that the government had mismanaged the sale proceeds, in particular by distributing them to the Enoch Band. Finally, the claim alleged that the government had breached its treaty obligations by not granting the Band all the land to which it was entitled under the Treaty; and by failing to provide the Band with farming implements, and food in times of famine. These allegations, it was said, gave rise to causes of action for breach of fiduciary duty, fraudulent and malicious behaviour, and treaty breach.

[5] The government brought a motion for summary judgment, asking that the claim be dismissed on the ground that the allegations in the statement of claim raised no genuine issue for trial. The main issues on the motion were: (1) whether the facts alleged disclosed triable issues; (2) whether the plaintiffs had standing to raise these issues; and (3) whether the claims were barred by statutes of limitations or the equitable doctrines of laches and acquiescence.

[6] The chambers judge, Slatter J., found that most of the claims lacked the factual basis necessary to qualify as genuine issues for trial: (2004), 43 Alta. L.R. (4th) 41, 2004 ABQB 655. However, he held that the statement of claim disclosed three triable issues: (1) whether the Reserve granted to the Papaschase Band was the proper size; (2) whether the government had properly disposed of the proceeds of the sale of the Reserve; and (3) whether the Crown had breached the Band's treaty rights to food.

d'avoir illicitement laissé des membres de la bande Papaschase accepter un certificat sans les informer adéquatement des conséquences; d'avoir illicitement fait pression sur la bande pour qu'elle cède la réserve, sous l'influence des pressions exercées par les colons d'Edmonton; et d'avoir ainsi causé la dissolution de la bande. Les demandeurs reprochaient en outre au gouvernement de ne pas avoir suivi les règles lors de la cession de la réserve; de ne pas avoir vendu les terres de réserve à leur valeur marchande; et de ne pas avoir correctement géré le produit de la vente, notamment en le distribuant à la bande Enoch. Ils soutenaient enfin que le gouvernement avait manqué à ses obligations énoncées dans le traité en n'octroyant pas à la bande la totalité des terres auxquelles le traité lui donnait droit et en ne lui procurant pas du matériel agricole et une aide alimentaire en période de famine. Selon les demandeurs, ces allégations donnaient naissance à des causes d'action pour manquement à une obligation fiduciaire, actes frauduleux et malveillants, et manquements à un traité.

[6] Le juge en chambre Slatter a estimé la plupart des allégations dépourvues du fondement factuel nécessaire pour pouvoir être considérées comme de véritables questions justifiant un procès : (2004), 43 Alta. L.R. (4th) 41, 2004 ABQB 655. Il a cependant conclu que la déclaration soulevait trois questions donnant matière à procès : (1) la réserve octroyée à la bande Papaschase avait-elle la superficie appropriée? (2) le gouvernement avait-il distribué correctement le produit de la vente de la réserve? (3) la Couronne avait-elle violé les droits de la bande à l'aide alimentaire prévue par le traité?

[7] The chambers judge went on to find against the plaintiffs on the remaining two issues. He found the plaintiffs lacked standing to bring the representative action; they were claiming collective rights of a Band that had ceased to exist, and did not meet the criteria for Band membership (i.e. showing their ancestors were Band members who had not taken up scrip or joined other bands, or by showing their ancestors were entitled to funds from the Reserve sale). And he found that the claims were barred by the Limitation of Actions Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. L-15, with the exception of the claim for an accounting of any proceeds of sale the Crown might still have in its possession.

[8] The majority of the Court of Appeal found that all or most of the issues raised were genuine, triable issues, with Côté J.A. dissenting and finding that the claims for malice, fraud and bad faith should be dismissed: (2006), 66 Alta. L.R. (4th) 243, 2006 ABCA 392. Unlike the chambers judge, the Court of Appeal found that whether the plaintiffs had standing to bring the action was a triable issue. It cited the circularity and unfairness of denying Band status for purposes of litigating the destruction of Band status; and held that the government bore the burden of proving that there were no persons in existence who could have standing. On the limitations issue, the Court of Appeal held that the evidence was mixed on whether the claim was discoverable in the 1970s and that this was a matter that should be resolved at trial.

[9] The government appeals to this Court, asking us to dismiss the plaintiffs' action on the grounds that they have no standing and that their claims are statute-barred, and asking us to reinstate the order of the chambers judge. We note that no notice of a constitutional question was given, and that no constitutional challenges lie before the Court.

[10] This appeal is from an application for summary judgment. The summary judgment rule serves an important purpose in the civil litigation system. It prevents claims or defences that have no chance of success from proceeding to trial. Trying unmeritorious claims imposes a heavy price in terms of time and cost on the parties to the litigation and on the justice system. It is essential to the proper operation of the justice system and beneficial to the parties that claims that have no chance of success be weeded out at an early stage. Conversely, it is essential to justice that claims disclosing real issues that may be successful proceed to trial.

[11] For this reason, the bar on a motion for summary judgment is high. The defendant who seeks summary dismissal bears the evidentiary burden of showing that there is "no genuine issue of material fact requiring trial": Guarantee Co. of North America v. Gordon Capital Corp., [1999] 3 S.C.R. 423, at para. 27. The defendant must prove this; it cannot rely on mere allegations or the pleadings: 1061590 Ontario Ltd. v. Ontario Jockey Club (1995), 21 O.R. (3d) 547 (C.A.); Tucson Properties Ltd. v. Sentry Resources Ltd. (1982), 22 Alta. L.R. (2d) 44 (Q.B. (Master)), at pp. 46-47. If the defendant does prove this, the plaintiff must either refute or counter the defendant's evidence, or risk summary dismissal: Murphy Oil Co. v. Predator Corp. (2004), 365 A.R. 326, 2004 ABQB 688, at p. 331, aff'd (2006), 55 Alta. L.R. (4th) 1, 2006 ABCA 69. Each side must "put its best foot forward" with respect to the existence or non-existence of material issues to be tried: Transamerica Life Insurance Co. of Canada v. Canada Life Assurance Co. (1996), 28 O.R. (3d) 423 (Gen. Div.), at p. 434; Goudie v. Ottawa (City), [2003] 1 S.C.R. 141, 2003 SCC 14, at para. 32. The chambers judge may make inferences of fact based on the undisputed facts before the court, as long as the inferences are strongly supported by the facts: Guarantee Co. of North America, at para. 30.

[11] C'est pourquoi les exigences auxquelles il faut satisfaire pour obtenir un jugement sommaire sont élevées. Pour faire rejeter sommairement l'action, le défendeur doit démontrer « qu'il n'y a aucune véritable question de fait importante qui requiert la tenue d'un procès » : Guarantee Co. of North America c. Gordon Capital Corp., [1999] 3 R.C.S. 423, par. 27. Il doit le démontrer en produisant des éléments de preuve; il ne peut se fonder sur de simples allégations ou sur les actes de procédure : 1061590 Ontario Ltd. c. Ontario Jockey Club (1995), 21 O.R. (3d) 547 (C.A.); Tucson Properties Ltd. c. Sentry Resources Ltd. (1982), 22 Alta. L.R. (2d) 44 (B.R. (protonotaire)), p. 46-47. Si le défendeur présente cette preuve, le demandeur doit soit la réfuter soit présenter une contre-preuve, sans quoi l'action risque d'être rejetée sommairement : Murphy Oil Co. c. Predator Corp. (2004), 365 A.R. 326, 2004 ABQB 688, p. 331, conf. par (2006), 55 Alta. L.R. (4th) 1, 2006 ABCA 69. Chaque partie doit [TRADUCTION] « présenter ses meilleurs arguments » en ce qui concerne l'existence ou la non-existence de questions importantes à débattre : Transamerica Life Insurance Co. of Canada c. Canada Life Assurance Co. (1996), 28 O.R. (3d) 423 (Div. gén.), p. 434; Goudie c. Ottawa (Ville), [2003] 1 R.C.S. 141, 2003 CSC 14, par. 32. Le juge en chambre peut faire des inférences de fait à partir des faits non contestés dont il est saisi, à la condition qu'elles soient solidement étayées par les faits : Guarantee Co. of North America, par. 30.

[12] We are of the view that, assuming that the claims disclosed triable issues and that standing could be established, the claims are barred by operation of the Limitation of Actions Act. There is "no genuine issue" for trial. Were the action allowed to proceed to trial, it would surely fail on this ground. Accordingly, we agree with the chambers judge that it must be struck out, except for the claim for an accounting of the proceeds of sale, which is a continuing claim and not caught by the Limitation of Actions Act.

[13] This Court emphasized in Wewaykum Indian Band v. Canada, [2002] 4 S.C.R. 245, 2002 SCC 79, that the rules on limitation periods apply to Aboriginal claims. The policy behind limitation periods is to strike a balance between protecting the defendant's entitlement, after a time, to organize his affairs without fearing a suit, and treating the plaintiff fairly with regard to his circumstances. This policy applies as much to Aboriginal claims as to other claims, as stated at para. 121 of Wewaykum:

> Witnesses are no longer available, historical documents are lost and difficult to contextualize, and expectations of fair practices change. Evolving standards of conduct and new standards of liability eventually make it unfair to judge actions of the past by the standards of today.

[14] Pursuant to s. 13 of the Limitations Act, S.A. 1996, c. L-15.1, Aboriginal claims are governed by the previous Limitation of Actions Act. The applicable limitation periods provision reads:

> 4(1) The following actions shall be commenced within and not after the time respectively hereinafter mentioned:
> . . .
>
> (c) actions
> (i) for the recovery of money, other than a debt charged on land, whether recoverable as a debt

[12] Nous sommes d'avis que, à supposer que la déclaration soulève des questions donnant matière à procès et qu'il soit possible d'établir la qualité des demandeurs, les demandes sont prescrites par application de la Limitation of Actions Act. Il n'existe donc « aucune véritable question » à débattre. Si on la laissait suivre son cours jusqu'à l'instruction, l'action serait assurément rejetée pour ce motif. C'est pourquoi nous estimons, comme le juge en chambre, qu'elle doit être radiée, sauf pour la demande de reddition de compte relative au produit de la vente, qui est une demande de nature continue non visée par la Limitation of Actions Act.

> Des témoins ne sont plus disponibles, des documents historiques ont disparu ou sont difficiles à mettre en contexte et l'idée de ce que constituent des pratiques loyales évolue. En raison de l'évolution des normes de conduite et de l'application de nouvelles normes en matière de responsabilité, il devient inéquitable de juger des actions passées au regard de normes contemporaines.

> [TRADUCTION]
>
> 4(1) Les actions suivantes se prescrivent par les délais respectifs indiqués ci-dessous :
>
> . . .
>
> (c) une action
> (i) en recouvrement d'une somme d'argent, sauf celle relative à une créance grevant un

(e) actions grounded on accident, mistake or other equitable ground of relief not hereinbefore specifically dealt with, within 6 years from the discovery of the cause of action;

(g) any other action not in this Act or any other Act specifically provided for, within 6 years after the cause of action therein arose.

[15] The issue becomes when the cause of action "arose" or, in the case of equitable claims, was actually "discovered".

[16] The applicable definition of when a cause of action arises was articulated by this Court in Central Trust Co. v. Rafuse, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 147, at p. 224:

. . . a cause of action arises for purposes of a limitation period when the material facts on which it is based have been discovered or ought to have been discovered by the plaintiff by the exercise of reasonable diligence . . . . [Emphasis added.]

[17] It is argued that the causes of action here advanced were discoverable as early as the 1880s and 1890s. We do not find it necessary, however, to go back so far. The evidence filed by the government establishes that in the 1970s the causes of action now raised would have been clear to the plaintiffs, exercising due diligence. In the bien-fonds, que cette somme d'argent soit recouvrable à titre de dette, de dommages-intérêts ou à un autre titre, et que cette somme découle d'un engagement, d'un cautionnement, d'un covenant, d'un autre contrat formaliste ou d'un contrat nu, exprès ou tacite;

(e) une action fondée sur un accident, une erreur ou un autre motif de recours reconnu en equity qui n'est pas régi par les dispositions qui précèdent se prescrit par 6 ans, à compter de la découverte de la cause d'action;

(g) une autre action qui n'est pas expressément régie par une disposition de la présente loi ou d'une autre loi se prescrit par 6 ans, à compter de la naissance de la cause d'action.

[15] Il s'agit donc de déterminer à quel moment la cause d'action a pris naissance ou, dans le cas d'une demande en equity, à quel moment elle a été réellement découverte.

[16] La Cour a défini le moment auquel une cause d'action prend naissance dans Central Trust Co. c. Rafuse, [1986] 2 R.C.S. 147, p. 224 :

. . . une cause d'action prend naissance, aux fins de la prescription, lorsque les faits importants sur lesquels repose cette cause d'action ont été découverts par le demandeur ou auraient dû l'être s'il avait fait preuve de diligence raisonnable . . . [Nous soulignons.]

[17] On fait valoir que les causes d'action invoquées en l'espèce auraient pu être découvertes dès les années 1880 et 1890. Mais il n'est pas nécessaire, à notre avis, de remonter aussi loin. Il ressort de la preuve déposée par le gouvernement que, dans les années 1970, les demandeurs auraient pu constater, à l'évidence, l'existence des causes d'action

mid-1970s, an Edmonton lawyer, James C. Robb, sent letters of inquiry to the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs on behalf of unidentified Papaschase descendants. The ensuing correspondence reveals that in 1974, a group of Papaschase descendants intended to submit a land claim "in the near future". This suggests some actual knowledge of the relevant facts, but there is more. When the Department advised Mr. Robb that the Enoch Band had already submitted a claim regarding the surrender of the Papaschase Reserve, Mr. Robb responded that a joint claim would not be possible. Having been informed of the Enoch Band's claim, these Papaschase descendants knew that the Enoch Band had or was in the process of gathering the relevant information. Indeed, in 1979 the Enoch Band provided funding to Kenneth James Tyler to write a Master's thesis on the events surrounding the surrender of the Papaschase Reserve. The Tyler Thesis covers most if not all of the facts that form the basis of the claims in this action. Mr. Tyler interviewed several Enoch Band elders in the course of his research. It is thus clear that members of the Enoch Band were aware of the facts on which this action was based in 1979. The chambers judge, on all the evidence, concluded that any interested party exercising due diligence could have uncovered the same facts Mr. Tyler did.

[18] The plaintiffs filed no material in response to this evidence. They did not say whether or not, in the 1970s, they knew of the causes of action they now raise. There is no explanation for how, as members of the Papaschase Descendants Council, they could have been unaware of these matters, with due diligence, when some Papaschase descendants were aware of the Enoch Band's claim. On this state of the evidence, the only available inference is that these causes of action became discoverable within the meaning of the Limitation of Actions qui sont maintenant invoquées, s'ils avaient fait preuve de diligence raisonnable. Au milieu des années 1970, un avocat d'Edmonton, James C. Robb, a écrit à plusieurs reprises au ministère des Affaires indiennes et du Nord canadien au nom de descendants non identifiés de la bande Papaschase pour demander des renseignements. La correspondance qui a suivi révèle que, en 1974, un groupe de descendants de la bande Papaschase avait l'intention de présenter une revendication territoriale [TRADUCTION] « dans un proche avenir ». Ces faits laissent croire à une certaine connaissance réelle des faits pertinents, mais il y a plus. Lorsque le ministère a informé M^e^ Robb que la bande Enoch avait déjà présenté une revendication au sujet de la cession de la réserve Papaschase, M^e^ Robb a répondu qu'une revendication conjointe ne serait pas possible. Ayant été informés de la revendication de la bande Enoch, ces descendants de la bande Papaschase savaient que la bande Enoch avait réuni l'information pertinente ou était en train de la réunir. En 1979, du reste, la bande Enoch a aidé financièrement Kenneth James Tyler à rédiger un mémoire de maîtrise sur les événements relatifs à la cession de la réserve Papaschase. Le mémoire de M. Tyler relate la plupart, voire la totalité des faits à l'origine des demandes formulées dans la présente action. Dans le cadre de sa recherche, M. Tyler s'est entretenu avec plusieurs anciens de la bande Enoch. Il est donc clair que des membres de la bande Enoch étaient au courant, en 1979, des faits sur lesquels l'action est fondée. Le juge en chambre a conclu, à la lumière de l'ensemble de la preuve, que toute partie intéressée faisant preuve de la diligence requise aurait découvert les mêmes faits que M. Tyler.

[18] Les demandeurs n'ont présenté aucun élément en réponse à cette preuve. Ils n'ont pas dit si, dans les années 1970, ils étaient ou non au courant des causes d'action qu'ils invoquent maintenant. Ils n'ont pas expliqué comment, à titre de membres du Conseil des descendants de la bande Papaschase, ils auraient pu ignorer ces choses s'ils avaient exercé la diligence requise, alors que certains descendants de la bande Papaschase étaient au courant de la revendication de la bande Enoch. Dans l'état de la preuve, la seule inférence possible

Act in the 1970s, and that the claims are now statute-barred.

[19] We add this. In the Court of Appeal and here, the case for the plaintiffs was put forward, not only on the basis of evidence actually adduced on the summary judgment motion, but on suggestions of evidence that might be adduced, or amendments that might be made, if the matter were to go to trial. A summary judgment motion cannot be defeated by vague references to what may be adduced in the future, if the matter is allowed to proceed. To accept that proposition would be to undermine the rationale of the rule. A motion for summary judgment must be judged on the basis of the pleadings and materials actually before the judge, not on suppositions about what might be pleaded or proved in the future. This applies to Aboriginal claims as much as to any others.

[20] For these reasons, we would allow the appeal and restore the order of the chambers judge. Each party should bear its own costs in this Court.

The Majority:

Overview

[1] This is an appeal from the dismissal of the appellants' oppression application. This appeal engages the analytical framework applied to oppression claims and remedies stipulated by the Supreme Court of Canada in BCE Inc v 1976 Debentureholders, 2008 SCC 69, [2008] 3 SCR 560.

[2] Not all unfair conduct rises to the level of oppression for which a court may grant a remedy; what may be oppressive in one factual context may not be oppressive in a slightly different factual context. Fact findings are the crucial foundation for the legal analysis that must follow, because within such fact findings the hearing court identifies the interests that merit relief, and within such fact findings the court assesses the nature of the impugned conduct and its effect. "The evidence is also critical to the court's determination of the appropriate remedy in the event that oppression is found": David S. Morritt, Sonia L. Bjorkquist & Allan D. Coleman, The Oppression Remedy [Toronto: Canada Law Book, 2015] at 1-10-1-11.

[3] Although this reviewing Court may have assessed the evidence differently, we have identified no juridically permissible basis upon which to interfere with the chambers judge's decision. Fact findings are entitled to a high degree of deference. The parties were well aware of the limitations of the summary procedure they chose and we are satisfied from our review of the entire record that the chambers judge was entitled to find the facts and apply the law as he did; accordingly, the appeal is dismissed, for the reasons that follow.

Background

[4] Detailed background information can be found in the decision of the special chambers judge: Shefsky v California Gold Mining Inc, 2014 ABQB 730 [Decision].

[5] In brief, this was a fight for control of the Board of Directors of California Gold Mining Inc (CGMI), a public corporation involved in mineral exploration. The appellants Martin Shefsky and his solely owned holding company, 2350183 Ontario Inc, alleged that the respondents breached Mr. Shefsky's reasonable expectations that he would control the corporation if he raised at least $5,000,000 in investments for CGMI. In particular, he would be entitled to name three of five directors on the board and would retain control through the shares owned by him and the investors he introduced to CGMI. The appellants assert that the respondents engaged in oppressive conduct, including a secret placement of shares that diluted Mr. Shefsky's voting power and refusing to allow Mr. Shefsky to appoint a third member to the board when his initial nominee, Mr. Cohen, refused to accept the position.

Decision Below

[6] The chambers judge set out the uncontested facts, the facts that he found could be inferred from the affidavit evidence and documents, and the contested facts, before defining the issues, undertaking a legal analysis and setting out his conclusions. During the two-day special chambers hearing – which hearing was preceded by important interlocutory motions – the sole issues before the chambers judge were:

(i) whether the newly-elected Board of Directors of CGMI ought to be replaced by a Board selected by Mr. Shefsky;

(ii) whether shares ought to be offered to Mr. Shefsky and his designees on the same terms as what the appellants refer to as the "Secret Private Placement" (which also is the terminology used by the chambers judge in his Decision and which phrase we will continue to use as an aid to comprehension); and,

(iii) whether the Court should give control of CGMI to Mr. Shefsky?

[7] The chambers judge reviewed a substantial volume of affidavits, documents and transcripts from cross-examinations on numerous affidavits.

[8] The chambers judge specifically noted the admonition about conflicting evidence in Charles v Young, 2014 ABCA 200 at paras 4-5, 577 AR 54 and the cases cited therein, and to that end reviewed "the extensive materials to ensure that I make findings based on uncontested facts or, where there are contested facts, on reasonable inferences which can be drawn from uncontested facts, objective evidence, and the conduct of the parties": Decision at para 6. The chambers judge identified facts, and drawn inferences, and noted many of the instances where the evidence conflicted.

[9] After citing the culture shift embedded in Hyrniak v Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7 at para 2, [2014] 1 SCR 87, and this Court's endorsement of same in Windsor v Canadian Pacific Railway Ltd., 2014 ABCA 108 at para 15, 572 AR 317, the chambers judge noted that the parties chose a chambers procedure knowing the limitations of affidavit evidence, and were aware of the implications of such a decision. Further, the chambers judge noted that the parties expressed a desire to avoid the expense and complication of trial if possible because most, if not all, of the witnesses were in Ontario, some of the lawyers are from Ontario, and because matters in issue were relatively time-sensitive.

[10] The chambers judge identified the alleged reasonable expectations that Mr. Shefsky contended merited oppression relief:

- the Term Sheet be honoured;
- Mr. Shefsky be permitted to appoint a director to replace Mr. Cohen; and
- Mr. Shefsky retain control of CGMI.

[11] As to the first expectation, the chambers judge determined that even though Mr. Shefsky did not raise $5,000,000 by the deadline specified in the Term Sheet, and despite the dispute about whether to count certain investors, Mr. Shefsky had a reasonable expectation that the Term Sheet would be extended and honoured: Decision at paras 81-103.

[12] As to the second expectation, the chambers judge concluded that Mr. Shefsky had a reasonable expectation that he would be permitted to appoint a director other than Mr. Cohen when the latter refused to take the position: Decision at paras 104-108. However, he declined to find that Mr. Shefsky had an ongoing right to name a new director after the April 2013 shareholders' meeting because Mr. Shefsky had never taken steps to appoint a new director (which finding of fact is strenuously disputed by the appellants). Since Mr. Shefsky had not taken steps to appoint a new director, the chambers judge decided that Mr. Shefsky was asserting a "purely hypothetical breach of expectations" and concluded that "[w]hile the actions of the Board suggest that its members agreed that Shefsky could nominate a third person to the Board, thus giving rise to both a subjective and objective expectation, Shefsky never tried to act on that expectation and therefore it was never breached": Decision at paras 109-121.

[13] As to the expectation of control of CGMI, the chambers judge found as a fact that Mr. Shefsky did not have a reasonable expectation that he had sufficient shareholders' support to control CGMI, at any time: Decision at paras 122-126.

[14] In the result, the chambers judge dismissed the appellants' motion for oppression.

Applicable Legislation

[15] The oppression remedy is located in the Alberta Business Corporations Act, RSA 2000, c B-9, in particular sections 239 and 242:

> 239 In this Part,
>
> (a) "action" means an action under this Act or any other law;
>
> (b) "complainant" means
>
> (i) a registered holder or beneficial owner, or a former registered holder or beneficial owner, of a security of a corporation or any of its affiliates,

2016 ABCA 103 (CanLII)

> (ii) a director or an officer or a former director or officer of a corporation or of any of its affiliates,
>
> (iii) a creditor
>
> (A) in respect of an application under section 240, or
>
> (B) in respect of an application under section 242, if the Court exercises its discretion under subclause (iv), or
>
> (iv) any other person who, in the discretion of the Court, is a proper person to make an application under this Part.

2016 ABCA 103 (CanLII)

[16] A complainant within the categories mentioned may apply to the court for an oppression remedy:

> 242(1) A complainant may apply to the Court for an order under this section.
>
> (2) If, on an application under subsection (1), the Court is satisfied that in respect of a corporation or any of its affiliates
>
> (a) any act or omission of the corporation or any of its affiliates effects a result,
>
> (b) the business or affairs of the corporation or any of its affiliates are or have been carried on or conducted in a manner, or
> (c) the powers of the directors of the corporation or any of its affiliates are or have been exercised in a manner that is oppressive or unfairly prejudicial to or that unfairly disregards the interests of any security holder, creditor, director or officer, the Court may make an order to rectify the matters complained of.
>
> (3) In connection with an application under this section, the Court may make any interim or final order it thinks fit including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, any or all of the following:
>
> (a) an order restraining the conduct complained of;
>
> (b) an order appointing a receiver or receiver-manager;
> (c) an order to regulate a corporation's affairs by amending the articles or bylaws;

(d) an order declaring that any amendment made to the articles or bylaws pursuant to clause (c) operates notwithstanding any unanimous shareholder agreement made before or after the date of the order, until the Court otherwise orders;

(e) an order directing an issue or exchange of securities;

(f) an order appointing directors in place of or in addition to all or any of the directors then in office;

(g) an order directing a corporation, subject to section 34(2), or any other person, to purchase securities of a security holder;

(h) an order directing a corporation or any other person to pay to a security holder any part of the money paid by the security holder for securities;

(i) an order directing a corporation, subject to section 43, to pay a dividend to its shareholders or a class of its shareholders;

(j) an order varying or setting aside a transaction or contract to which a corporation is a party and compensating the corporation or any other party to the transaction or contract;

(k) an order requiring a corporation, within a time specified by the Court, to produce to the Court or an interested person financial statements in the form required by section 155 or an accounting in any other form the Court may determine;

(l) an order compensating an aggrieved person;

(m) an order directing rectification of the registers or other records of a corporation under section 244;

(n) an order for the liquidation and dissolution of the corporation;

(o) an order directing an investigation under Part 18 to be made;

(p) an order requiring the trial of any issue;

(q) an order granting permission to the applicant to

> (i) bring an action in the name and on behalf of the corporation or any of its subsidiaries, or
>
> (ii) intervene in an action to which the corporation or any of its subsidiaries is a party, for the purpose of prosecuting, defending or discontinuing an action on behalf of the corporation or any of its subsidiaries.

2016 ABCA 103 (CanLII)

(4) This section does not confer on the Court power to revoke a certificate of amalgamation.

(5) If an order made under this section directs an amendment of the articles or bylaws of a corporation, no other amendment to the articles or bylaws may be made without the consent of the Court, until the Court otherwise orders.

(6) If an order made under this section directs an amendment of the articles of a corporation, the directors shall send articles of reorganization in the prescribed form to the Registrar together with the documents required by sections 20 and 113, if applicable.

(7) A shareholder is not entitled to dissent under section 191 if an amendment to the articles is effected under this section.

(8) An applicant under this section may apply in the alternative under section 215(1)(a) for an order for the liquidation and dissolution of the corporation.

Grounds of Appeal

[17] Although the appellants list numerous grounds of appeal in their factum, the only issues on which they provided written and oral argument can be summarized as follows:

(a) the chambers judge erred by mischaracterizing the appellants' argument about the Secret Private Placement as being loss of control rather than loss of the opportunity to gain control;

(b) the chambers judge erred by limiting their complaint about the Secret Private Placement to being an issue about control and failing to consider that regardless of control, the appellants had a reasonable expectation that the Secret Private Placement would not proceed in the circumstances; and

(c) the chambers judge erred by concluding that the issue of Mr. Shefsky's reasonable expectation that he would be permitted to appoint a third director to the Board was moot because Mr. Shefsky did not propose a replacement nominee for Mr. Cohen.

Standard of Review

[18] Issues of jurisdiction and the test for oppression are questions of law, and should be reviewed on a standard of correctness: Sandhu v Siri Guru Nanak Sikh Gurdwara of Alberta, 2015 ABCA 101 at para 33, 382 DLR (4th) 150; McRoberts v Whissell, 2006 ABCA 388 at para 4, 2006 CarswellAlta 1689.

[19] The application of a legal test to a set of facts is a question of mixed fact and law. Whether conduct amounts to oppression is a question of mixed fact and law and is therefore reviewable for palpable and overriding error. The same standard is applicable to whether a party possessed reasonable expectations, which is a question of fact: 1216808 Alberta Ltd (Prairie Bailiff Services) v Devtex Ltd, 2014 ABCA 386 at para 24, 35 BLR (5th) 1.

[20] Normally, when reviewing a decision that omits an issue, an appeal court is left with two options: (1) direct a new trial on the issue; or (2) review the record and attempt to arrive at a conclusion with respect to the missed issue: Adeco Exploration Company Ltd v Hunt Oil Company of Canada Inc, 2008 ABCA 214 at para 49, 437 AR 33.

[21] The imposition of a remedy for oppression is discretionary, and deference should be accorded to it unless an error in principle has been made or the decision is otherwise unjust: Naneff v Con-Crete Holdings Ltd (1995), 23 OR (3d) 481 at 487, 23 BLR (2d) 286 (CA).

Analysis

The Supreme Court of Canada's Analytical Framework in BCE

[22] A court's broad equitable jurisdiction under the oppression remedy is subject to three governing principles.

- First: not every expectation, even if reasonably held, will give rise to a remedy because there must be some wrongful conduct, causation and compensable injury in the claim for oppression: BCE at paras 68, 89-94.
- Second: not every interest is protected by the statutory oppression remedy. Although other personal interests may be connected to a particular transaction, the oppression remedy cannot be used to protect or advance, directly or indirectly, these other personal interests. "[I]t is only their interests as shareholder, officer or director as such which are protected": Naneff v Con-Crete Holdings Ltd at para 27. Furthermore, "the oppression remedy protects only the interests of a shareholder qua shareholder. Oppression remedies are not intended to be a substitute for an action in contract, tort or misrepresentation": Stahlke v Stanfield, 2010 BCSC 142 at para 23, aff'd 2010 BCCA 603 at para 38, 305 BCAC 18.
- Third: courts must not second-guess the business judgment of directors of corporations. Rather, the court must decide whether the directors made decisions > which were reasonable in the circumstances and not whether, with the benefit of hindsight, the directors made perfect decisions. Provided the directors acted honestly and reasonably, and made a decision in a range of reasonableness, the court must not substitute its own opinion for that of the Board. If the directors have chosen from one of several reasonable alternatives, deference is accorded to the Board's decisions: Stahlke at para 22; Pente Investment Management Ltd v Schneider Corp (1998), 42 OR (3d) 177 at para 36, 44 BLR (2d) 115 (CA); BCE at para 40.

[23] In BCE the Supreme Court underlines that the stakeholder's actual expectations are not conclusive; rather, reasonableness implies that the analysis is objective and contextual. "In the context of whether it would be 'just and equitable' to grant a remedy, the question is whether the expectation is reasonable having regard to the facts of the specific case, the relationships at issue, and the entire context, including the fact that there may be conflicting claims and expectations": BCE at para 62.

[24] BCE at para 68 stipulates a two-step inquiry in an oppression claim:

1. Does the evidence support the reasonable expectation asserted by the claimant?

2. Does the evidence establish that the reasonable expectation was

   (a) violated by conduct, and

   (b) falls within the terms "oppression", "unfair prejudice" or "unfair disregard" of a relevant interest?

[25] It is essential that the complainant establish wrongful conduct, causation and compensable injury: BCE at para 90.

[26] BCE at paras 72-83 sets out some useful factors the court may consider in determining whether a reasonable expectation exists, including:

- general commercial practice
- the nature of the corporation
- the relationship between the parties
- past practice
- steps the claimant could have taken to protect himself
- any representations and agreements, and
- the fair resolution of conflicts between corporate stakeholders

[27] As the chambers judge states in para 75 of his decision:

> Once it is determined what an applicants' reasonable expectations were, and that those expectations were not met, the Court must go on to determine whether the failure to meet the expectation was unfair. Not all failures to meet a reasonable expectation "will give rise to the equitable considerations that ground actions for oppression." The conduct must be oppressive or demonstrate unfair prejudice, or unfair disregard of the claimants' interests (at para 89). Often the proof required to establish reasonable expectation will also be relevant to the proof of oppression, unfair prejudice or unfair disregard of interests (para 90).

[28] The chambers judge goes on to state that oppression has been described as conduct that is "burdensome, harsh and wrongful", "a visible departure from standards of fair dealing", and an "abuse of power" related to the conduct of the corporations' affairs. That is, "a wrong of the most serious sort": Decision at para 76.

[29] Unfair prejudice is described in BCE at para 93 as conduct that is less serious than oppression and includes such things as:

> . . . squeezing out a minority shareholder, failing to disclose related party transactions, changing corporate structure to drastically alter debt ratios, adopting a "poison pill" to prevent a takeover bid, paying dividends without a formal declaration, preferring some shareholders with management fees and paying directors' fees higher than the industry norm . . .

[30] Unfair disregard is described as the least serious of the three, and it includes favoring a director by failing to properly prosecute claims, improperly reducing dividends, or failing to deliver a claimant's property: BCE at para 94.

[31] With all this in mind, each specific ground of appeal is discussed below.

Did the chambers judge err by mischaracterizing the appellants' argument about the Secret Private Placement as being loss of control rather than loss of the opportunity to gain control?

[32] The chambers judge found that there is no evidence the appellants ever had control of CGMI. This finding is supported by the evidentiary record and is fatal to the suggestion that Mr. Shefsky had a reasonable expectation that he could control CGMI, or that this alleged expectation was defeated by the Secret Private Placement.

[33] The appellants now assert that the special chambers judge did not properly characterize their submissions regarding the Secret Private Placement. They say their argument was not that the Secret Private Placement was oppressive because it resulted in Mr. Shefsky losing control of CGMI, but rather because it resulted in him losing the opportunity to gain control of the company. The appellants acknowledge that it was not a certainty that Mr. Shefsky would win control. However, they argue that the issuance of the Secret Private Placement diluted his shares and ensured that he could not win a shareholder vote. The appellants essentially argue that the Secret Private Placement resulted in the loss of a chance for control of CGMI.

[34] However, the appellants' argument about their expectation as summarized above was not clearly articulated before the chambers judge. The transcript of the hearing below shows that the appellants' arguments focused on Mr. Shefsky's expectation that he would control CGMI once he raised the funds specified in the Term Sheet, and the issue of control underlies the appellants' entire case including their requested remedies; the chambers judge cannot be faulted for characterizing the appellants' expectation in the manner he did. In addition to establishing that their expectations were reasonable, the onus is on the claimants to identify the particular expectations that they allege have been violated: BCE at para 70.

[35] The respondents rely on Quan v Cusson, 2009 SCC 62 at paras 36-37, [2009] 3 SCR 712 to urge us not to entertain a new issue raised for the first time on appeal because they say the interests of justice do not require it and there is not a sufficient evidentiary record.

[36] We do not agree the appellants are raising a new issue for the first time on this appeal. Despite the fact that their position was not clearly articulated before the chambers judge, the record shows that the appellants did make submissions effectively stating that insofar as Mr. Shefsky was concerned, the true intention of the Secret Private Placement was to dilute his shares and prevent him from winning a proxy war that, absent the Secret Private Placement, would have been a possibility. This issue was sufficiently canvassed on the record such that this Court can address it on appeal.

[37] The essential difficulty with Mr. Shefsky's position is that a finding of oppression requires objective evidence that there has been oppression. A mere speculation or hope or, as the respondents put it, an "aspirational belief" is insufficient to form the foundational evidence for this type of extraordinary action and remedy. The ability of the disappointed or aggrieved to avail themselves of the oppression action and its remedies must be carefully circumscribed so as not to expand the legal right to mere aspirations or disappointments. This is why wrongful conduct, causation, and compensable injury must all be established by the claimant in an oppression claim: BCE at para 90. An expectation based on a loss of an opportunity, without proof that such opportunity was more than merely speculative, is insufficient to ground an oppression claim because causation and compensable injury have not been established.

[38] In our view, the chambers judge did not err in failing to find that the loss of an opportunity to gain control of CGMI was a reasonable expectation violated by the Secret Private Placement.

Did the chambers judge err by limiting the appellants' complaint about the Secret Private Placement to being an issue about control and failing to consider that regardless of control, the appellants had a reasonable expectation that the Secret Private Placement would not proceed in the circumstances?

[39] Aside from the issue of control, the appellants argue that the Secret Private Placement was also oppressive because of the circumstances in which it occurred; they allege it involved the issuance of shares to a select group of investors that did not include Mr. Shefsky, at a price below market value, without Mr. Shefsky's knowledge but after he had advised the other Board members that he intended to call a shareholders' meeting for the purpose of electing a new slate of directors, and in the context of what the appellants allege was a significantly better offer from Mr. Caland.

[40] The difficulty with this argument is that the appellants have failed to identify any specific expectation, apart from the expectation of control, which was violated by these actions. The appellants submit that a shareholder does not need to prove control in order to establish that the act of issuing shares to a select group of investors well below market value is oppressive, and that every shareholder, including Mr. Shefsky, has a reasonable expectation that directors will not do this. However, the oppression remedy is a personal claim and requires the complainant to identify a personal interest that is alleged to have been violated. It is not sufficient to allege that shareholders generally have an expectation that directors generally will not act oppressively. Such assertions are contrary to the analytical framework set out in BCE.

[41] In Rea v Wildeboer, 2015 ONCA 373 at paras 34-35, the distinction between a generalized expectation and a personal claim that potentially attracts the oppression remedy is clearly set out:

> The oppression remedy is not available – as the appellants contend – simply because a complainant asserts a "reasonable expectation" (for example, that directors will conduct themselves with honesty and probity and in the best interests of the corporation) and the evidence supports that the reasonable expectation has been violated by conduct falling within the terms "oppression", "unfair prejudice" or "unfair disregard". The impugned conduct must be "oppressive" of or "unfairly prejudicial" to, or "unfairly disregard" the interests of the complainant: OBCA, s. 248(2). No such conduct is pled here.
>
> That the harm must impact the interest of the complainant personally – giving rise to a personal action – and not simply the complainant's interests as a part of the collectivity of stakeholders as a whole – is consistent with the reforms put in place to attenuate the rigours of the rule in Foss v. Harbottle. The legislative response was to create two remedies, with two different rationales and two separate statutory foundations, not just one: a corporate remedy, and a personal or individual remedy.

[42] We agree that the cases cited in support of Mr. Shefsky's claim that he had some other reasonable expectation that was violated are distinguishable. In contradistinction to Legion Oils Ltd v Barron (1956), 2 DLR (2d) 505, 17 WWR 209 (AB SC-TD), Keho Holdings Ltd v Noble, 1987 ABCA 84, 38 DLR (4th) 368 and Smith v Hanson Tire Company Ltd, [1927] 3 DLR 786, 21 Sask LR 621 (CA), in the case at bar Mr. Shefsky did not have an articulated reasonable expectation that was violated by the Secret Private Placement. Moreover, oppression cases are highly fact-specific and what may be oppressive or improper in the case of a closely-held private corporation is not necessarily oppressive in the context of a publicly-held corporation: BCE at para 59.

[43] In any event, the chambers judge did not find that the Secret Private Placement was below market value, nor was there any evidentiary foundation for that assertion. Indeed, the determination of market value for a junior mining company in the context of a private placement (as opposed to a sale of a small block on the stock market) would require expert evidence. The pricing of shares issued through the Secret Private Placement was made in accordance with the rules established by the TSX Venture Exchange. On August 12, 2013 CGMI's lawyers filed for a price reservation at a price of $0.05, which was approved by the TSX Venture Exchange as an acceptable price in light of prevailing market prices.

[44] In connection with the requirement to raise additional funds, there was evidence accepted by the chambers judge that in the aftermath of the COO's termination, it was necessary for CGMI to raise additional funds in order to redo the geological reports and other work that the directors determined had been done improperly. As is a common occurrence in junior mining companies, as admitted by Mr. Shefsky, the Board of CGMI decided to turn to existing shareholders to try to raise these funds. There is no reason that Mr. Shefsky was entitled to prevent the corporation from offering additional shares to investors. The directors were entitled to make decisions in the best interests of the corporation, including raising additional capital, which may adversely affect the interests of particular stakeholders.

[45] Absent any evidence to the contrary, the timing, source and pricing of this financing was solely a matter of business judgment. We agree that a board of directors is entitled to substantial deference and we are loath to step into the discretionary purview of the Board absent any evidence which would lead us to a contrary view. We agree that based upon the unassailable findings of the chambers judge and our review of the record, the decision of the CGMI Board to engage in the Secret Private Placement was reasonable and entitled to judicial deference.

[46] Even if Mr. Shefsky and other shareholders had a claim for loss of value of their shares due to the Secret Private Placement, that claim belonged to the corporation. In Alvi v Misir (2004), 73 OR (3d) 566, 50 BLR (3d) 175 (SCJ), Cameron J. determined that a claim brought by shareholders for loss of value of their shares was a claim that belonged to the corporation. He stated at para 57 that directors cannot owe statutory fiduciary duties and duties of care to shareholders if they are already owed to the corporation without placing the directors in an intolerable conflict of interest and explained that "[s]uch parallel duties would create untenable and unreasonable conflicts" that would render impossible the jobs of directors and officers.

[47] The Supreme Court of Canada has adopted a similar analysis in BCE at para 66:

> The fact that the conduct of the directors is often at the centre of oppression actions might seem to suggest that directors are under a direct duty to individual stakeholders who may be affected by a corporate decision. Directors, acting in the best interests of the corporation, may be obliged to consider the impact of their decisions on corporate stakeholders, such as the debentureholders in these appeals. This is what we mean when we speak of a director being required to act in the best interests of the corporation viewed as a good corporate citizen. However, the directors owe a fiduciary duty to the corporation, and only to the corporation. People sometimes speak in terms of directors owing a duty to both the corporation and to stakeholders. Usually this is harmless, since the reasonable expectations of the stakeholder in a particular outcome often coincides with what is in the best interests of the corporation. However, cases (such as these appeals) may arise where these interests do not coincide. In such cases, it is important to be clear that the directors owe their duty to the corporation, not to stakeholders, and that the reasonable expectation of stakeholders is simply that the directors act in the best interests of the corporation.

[48] Put simply, Mr. Shefsky's interests in not having his shares diluted by the Secret Private Placement were not interests that the directors of the corporation were obliged to consider. In fact, Mr. Shefsky's sole interests were diametrically opposed to the interests of the corporation and its directors' attempts to raise additional funding for this junior mining company so that exploration could continue after Mr. Moeller's departure. Mr. Shefsky's only reasonable expectation in these circumstances was that the directors would act in the best interests of the corporation, and there is no evidence to suggest that they did not do so.

[49] Moreover, it was entirely reasonable and open to the Board of CGMI to reject the deal offered by Mr. Caland for reasons that were before the chambers judge as reflected in the minutes of the director's meeting of September 10, 2013. Notwithstanding the rejection of Mr. Caland's offer, there is further evidence upon which the chambers judge did decide that the CGMI Board was open to the possibility of both doing the Secret Private Placement and Mr. Caland's deal, but Mr. Shefsky indicated that the deals were mutually exclusive and that to accept Mr. Caland's offer would require rejection of the other financing.

[50] The chambers judge was not persuaded that the Board's purpose in approving the Secret Private Placement was to dilute Mr. Shefsky's ownership; rather, the chambers judge found that the Secret Private Placement was intended to raise money to replace the money that had been wasted on the improper exploration work done by the COO. Even if the effect was dilutive, Mr.

Shefsky's only reasonable expectation was that the directors act in the best interests of the corporation, despite that so acting may not have coincided with Mr. Shefsky's personal interests. As BCE makes clear, the directors owe fiduciary obligations to the corporation only, and when particular shareholder interests do not coincide with the best interests of the corporation, the directors are nonetheless duty bound to protect the interests of the corporation above all else.

[51] Assuming that there was some evidence to support Mr. Shefsky's theory that the CGMI Board was acting to buttress the existing management slate of directors through the Secret Private Placement, contrary to Mr. Shefsky's personal interests, that is insufficient. Mr. Shefsky is required to prove that the Board's actions were contrary to the best interests of the corporation. Directors are entitled to consider who is seeking control and why. If the Board believes there will be substantial damage to the company's interests if the company is taken over, then the exercise of their powers to defeat those seeking a majority will not necessarily be categorized as improper: Teck Corp Ltd v Millar (1972), 33 DLR (3d) 288 at para 99, [1973] 2 WWR 385 (BCSC); Icahn Partners LP v Lions Gate Entertainment Corp, 2011 BCCA 228 at para 83, 333 DLR (4th) 257.

[52] Accordingly, we see no reviewable error in the chambers judge's articulation and application of the binding law, or in his findings of fact or inferences drawn based upon the evidentiary record that was before him. This ground of appeal is dismissed.

> Did the chambers judge err by concluding that the issue of Mr. Shefsky's reasonable expectation that he would be permitted to appoint a third director to the Board was moot because Mr. Shefsky did not propose a replacement nominee for Mr. Cohen?

[53] The chambers judge did not find it necessary to decide whether Mr. Shefsky had a continuing right after the April 2013 annual meeting to appoint a third member to the Board of CGMI because Mr. Shefsky did not attempt to exercise this asserted right, and therefore any reasonable expectation he may have had in this regard was never breached.

[54] The appellants argue that it was an error for the chambers judge to rely on this narrow technicality, rather than considering all the circumstances of the alleged oppression. Moreover, the appellants contend that Mr. Shefsky did in fact nominate a third director to the Board, in a letter from his lawyer dated October 2, 2013. Implicit in their argument is the assumption that Mr. Shefsky had a continuing right to appoint a third member to the Board up until the January 2014 annual shareholders' meeting, when a different management slate of board members was elected.

[55] The respondents suggest that there are three fatal problems with the appellants' position:

(i) It mischaracterizes the reasonable expectation that was actually found by the chambers judge in this case;

(ii) Mr. Shefsky's expectations did not arise in his capacity as a shareholder, director, or officer of CGMI and therefore are not protected by the oppression remedy; and

2016 ABCA 103 (CanLII)

(iii) Mr. Shefsky's expectation, if it did exist, was not disregarded in an oppressive manner.

[56] Each of these contentions is addressed separately below.

(i) Mischaracterization of the reasonable expectation that was actually found by the chambers judge in this case

[57] The chambers judge found that Mr. Shefsky had not attempted to exercise his right to appoint a third member of the Board of CGMI. In April 2013, the slate of directors was duly elected by the shareholders, so the relevant period of time for complaint by Mr. Shefsky was between April 2013 and the January 2014 annual shareholders' meeting.

[58] Contrary to the appellants' suggestion, the chambers judge did not make a finding that Mr. Shefsky had a continuing right to appoint a third member to the Board up until the January 2014 annual shareholders' meeting. As noted above, the chambers judge found it unnecessary to decide this point, and the evidence does not support the appellants' position. Rather, the record shows that any reasonable expectation Mr. Shefsky may have had to appoint a third member to the Board was extinguished by the April 2013 annual meeting, because any expectation to control the composition of the Board past this date is inconsistent with the corporation's public statements, its statutory disclosure obligations, and the basic rights of its shareholders as a whole to choose the board of directors of their publicly-traded company.

[59] Prior to the April 2013 annual meeting, Mr. Shefsky had an opportunity to comment on the draft circular but did not propose any changes to the slate which listed Messrs. Shefsky, Brandolini, Churchill, Cronin and Cinq-Mars as the management slate of directors. Indeed, at the April 2013 meeting Mr. Shefsky voted for the slate nominated and set out in the circular.

[60] As the respondents point out, if there had in fact been an arrangement whereby Mr. Shefsky retained a unilateral power after the April 2013 shareholders' vote to compel one of the elected directors to resign in favor of an unidentified nominee of his choice, that would have been contrary to the voting shareholders' wishes and would be material information requiring disclosure in the circular. Failure to disclose would constitute an offence under s 122(1)(b) of the Ontario Securities Act, RSO 1990, c S-5, the commission of which would clearly not be in the corporation's best interests.

[61] Moreover, the Board has a fiduciary interest to act in the best interests of the corporation, which includes an obligation not to fetter its discretion absent a unanimous shareholders' agreement: 820099 Ontario Inc v Harold E Ballard Ltd (1991), 3 BLR (2d) 113 at 123 at paras 102-103 (Ont Gen Div), aff'd (1991), 3 BLR (2d) 123 (Ont Div Ct). The expectation alleged by Mr. Shefsky is inconsistent with his own obligations as a director, and is not reasonable.

(ii) Mr. Shefsky's expectations did not arise in his capacity as shareholder, director, or officer of CGMI and therefore are not protected by the oppression remedy

[62] The respondents suggest that there is doubt about the correctness of the chambers judge's analysis of Mr. Shefsky's alleged expectations arising from the Term Sheet.

[63] In particular, they submit that the chambers judge erred in principle in finding that the oppression remedy protects Mr. Shefsky's expectation to appoint Mr. Cohen (or his replacement), when that expectation arose in Mr. Shefsky's capacity as a financier or underwriter of CGMI, and not as a shareholder, officer or director.

[64] In this branch of their argument, the respondents note that the oppression remedy protects the interests of a "complainant" within the meaning of s 239(b) of the Alberta Business Corporations Act, which includes security holders, creditors, officers and directors. The statute does not protect the interests of those acting as financiers, underwriters or investment dealers for or on behalf of a corporation.

[65] Simply put, where harm is alleged to have been done to a complainant's interests in a capacity outside of the scope of s 239(b), the oppression remedy is not engaged so as to protect these interests outside the scope of the legislation: Markus Koehnen, Oppression and Related Remedies (Toronto: Thomson Carswell, 2004) at 265-267.

[66] In particular, Rogers Communications Inc v MacLean Hunter Ltd (1994), 2 CCLS 233 (Gen Div) makes clear that in a position qua bidder, relief cannot be obtained under the applicable legislation; rather, it is only in the position qua shareholder that there can be a claim of oppression. Looking at matters as a whole in that case, the court concluded that Rogers' complaint arose in its position as a bidder and not as a shareholder: Rogers at para 9.

[67] The same point is made by the British Columbia Supreme Court in Icahn Partners LP v Lions Gate Entertainment Corp, 2010 BCSC 1547 at paras 179-83, 15 BCLR (5th) 132, aff'd 2011 BCCA 228, 333 DLR (4th) 257, and in Stahlke at para 23 where it stated: "The oppression remedy protects only the interests of a shareholder qua shareholder. Oppression remedies are not intended to be a substitute for an action in contract, tort or misrepresentation."

[68] We agree that Mr. Shefsky's reasonable expectation to appoint a third director found in the Term Sheet, or grounded in the various representations that were made by Mr. Churchill to Mr. Tomlinson, were not made by, or to, Mr. Shefsky in his capacity as a shareholder, director or officer of CGMI. We note that the initial version of the Term Sheet was signed on or about October 19, 2012, well before Mr. Shefsky became an officer (in December of 2012), a shareholder (in February of 2013) or a director (in April of 2013).

[69] We also agree with the respondents' contention that the October 19, 2012 Term Sheet – replaced by the December 12, 2012 Term Sheet but with no change to material terms – is simply a sui generis contract made between CGMI and Mr. Shefsky in his capacity as a potential financier, promoter or underwriter in relation to the $5,000,000-8,000,000 private placement to be arranged for CGMI.

[70] The respondents further argue that prospective shareholders do not have standing under the oppression remedy. The requirement that a complainant actually be a shareholder at the time of the oppression complained of is logical, since the question whether a complainant shareholder has sustainable grounds of oppression that brings the shareholder within the ambit of the oppression remedy "requires a time-related factual nexus between the complainant and the oppression complained of": Ford Motor Co of Canada Ltd v Ontario Municipal Employees Retirement Board (2004), 41 BLR (3d) 74 at para 246, [2004] OTC 53 (SCJ), rev'd (but not on this point) (2006), 263 DLR (4th) 450 (CA), leave to appeal to SCC refused (2006), 267 DLR (4th) ix.

[71] Although this is a legally correct proposition, we find that in October of 2012 Mr. Shefsky possessed a legal entitlement to acquire shares. He had acquired an option, a right of first refusal, to shares and his subscription (and that of other accredited investors) was to be reflected in a formal subscription agreement to be entered into prior to December of 2012. In other words, Mr. Shefsky's acceptance of the Term Sheet conferred upon him the right to perform confirmatory due diligence and exercise his option in respect of the "Issue", defined in the Term Sheet as "[p]rivate placement of units (each unit consisting of one common share . . . in the Capital of the Company and three-quarters one Common Share purchase warrant, each whole warrant . . . being exercisable for one Common Share) of the Corporation (the "Units") (together, the "Offering")" at a price of $0.10 per Unit.

[72] What the Term Sheet did not do, however, was confer upon Mr. Shefsky a right to enjoin any further share placements. Quite simply, an existing shareholder cannot complain about subsequent share offerings even if it has the effect of diluting that complaining shareholder's shares, provided the share offering is done in the best interests of the corporation. And, no shareholder has the right to acquire additional shares and no corporation is obliged to offer additional shares to existing shareholders. When a corporation offers its shares for sale, an individual can decide whether to accept the offer. But, it is not the case that a shareholder or putative shareholder can demand that shares be sold to him personally. There are good corporate business judgment reasons why a corporation may not, in fact, wish to sell shares to a certain individual or entity, either because of regulatory issues or because the directors do not believe that the putative purchaser's participation in the corporation would serve the best interests of the corporation. In this corporate exercise of business judgment, this Court will not and should not lightly interfere.

[73] We reject the respondents' assertion that because the Subscription Agreement contains an "entire agreement" clause that governs the relationship of Mr. Shefsky qua shareholder, the effect of the entire agreement clause is that it supersedes any prior understanding between Mr. Shefsky qua shareholder and CGMI. Since the Subscription Agreement does not contain any reference to the management provisions in the revised Term Sheet upon which Mr. Shefsky bases his claim, the respondents submit that is the end of the matter. We disagree. Similarly, we disagree that Mr. Shefsky's role as CEO, as governed by the terms of the Consulting Agreement between CGMI and 2350183 Ontario Inc, is a complete answer to Mr. Shefsky's oppression claim, despite that the Consulting Agreement also contains an "entire agreement" clause. Put another way, the fact that neither the Subscription Agreement nor Consulting Agreement contain a reference to any expectation or right on behalf of Mr. Shefsky to control the composition of CGMI's Board is not determinative. Rather, we must consider the entire context, not merely the discrete contracts made between the appellants and some of the respondents.

[74] The essential difficulty with Mr. Shefsky's invocation of the oppression remedy in respect of the Term Sheet, however, is that he attempts to gain access to the court's equitable oppression remedy jurisdiction for a personal claim that arises pursuant to the provisions of the Term Sheet: his personal claim for breach of contract. At its core, the Term Sheet is a commercial agreement negotiated at arm's-length by sophisticated parties. That commercial agreement must not be rewritten by a court importing notions of "just and equitable". It would be dangerous territory, indeed, and an improper conflation of contract law and equitable oppression principles to suggest that the latter can come to the aid of a claim for breach of any contractual promises made to Mr. Shefsky in his personal capacity. See, for example, JSM Corp (Ontario) Ltd v Brick Furniture Warehouse Ltd, 2008 ONCA 183 at para 60, 234 OAC 59.

[75] The legal and jurisdictional boundaries which circumscribe, and delineate, resort to an oppression remedy must be firmly set. A party aggrieved, whether by having made an imprudent, or incomplete, or improvident personal bargain, cannot be permitted to seize an oppression remedy and, thus, gain an equitable remedy that was never in the contemplation of the contracting parties.

[76] In summary, Mr. Shefsky and 2350183 Ontario Inc's claims derivative of the provisions of the Term Sheet are contractual in nature. These claims fall outside the legal and jurisdictional boundaries of an oppression remedy.

(iii) Mr. Shefsky's reasonable expectation, if it did exist, was not disregarded in an oppressive manner

[77] Assuming the appellants had proven that their reasonable expectations were unmet, they must go farther to prove that those reasonable but unmet expectations were violated by conduct that falls within the terms 'oppression', 'unfair prejudice' or 'unfair disregard' of a relevant interest. This proposition is made abundantly clear in BCE at para 68. See also Rea v Wildeboer at paras 34-35.

[78] On appeal, the parties conceded that the chambers judge had articulated correctly the principles of law and, in particular, that he was required to consider the meaning of "oppression" and "unfair prejudice" and "unfair disregard".

[79] In his decision at paras 76-77 the chambers judge correctly notes:

> [76] Oppression has been described as conduct that is "burdensome, harsh and wrongful", "a visible departure from standards of fair dealing", and an "abuse of power" related to the conduct of the corporations affairs: "a wrong of the most serious sort" (at para 92). Unfair prejudice is conduct that is less serious than oppression, and includes such things as:
> > . . . squeezing out a minority shareholder, failing to disclose related party transactions, changing corporate structure to drastically alter debt ratios, adopting a "poison pill" to prevent a takeover bid, paying dividends without a formal declaration, preferring some shareholders with management fees and paying directors' fees higher than the industry norm . . . (at para 93)
> [77] The Supreme Court went on to describe unfair disregard as the least serious of the three, and noted that it included favouring a director by failing to properly prosecute claims, improperly reducing dividends, or failing to deliver a claimant's property.

[80] The chambers judge found that the appellants had not met their persuasive burden of showing that they had suffered oppression, unfair prejudice or unfair disregard because Mr. Shefsky did not name a replacement, seek to call, or actually call a shareholders' meeting himself, or propose a different slate of directors. The appellants challenge the trial judge's finding in this regard on the basis of an October 2, 2013 letter from the appellants' lawyer to the respondents.

[81] A demand letter emanating from counsel's office does not amount to Mr. Shefsky naming a replacement, seeking to call, or actually calling a shareholders' meeting himself, nor does it equate to Mr. Shefsky proposing a different slate of directors. The October 2, 2013 letter from WeirFoulds says as follows:

> Mr. Shefsky demands:
>
> (a) that one of Michael Churchill, Kevin Cinq-Mars or Patrick Cronin immediately resigns from the board so that his place can be taken by Charlie Cohen who is prepared to accept the nomination; and
> (b) that the September Placement be immediately unwound.

[82] After making the demands cited, the letter abruptly concludes: "If we have not received a positive response by October 11, 2013 our client intends to commence immediate legal proceedings against you, and to seek any appropriate injunction or mandatory order."

[83] The reader of the demand letter would appreciate that the demand to replace one of the duly elected directors within 9 days, without any notice or regard to the shareholders of the corporation, would expose the corporation to significant jeopardy. The law requires that all shareholders be notified of material information. Mr. Shefsky's assertion of a right to appoint a third director was certainly material information. The demand letter from the lawyer was not copied to all other shareholders; thus, it cannot in any sense amount to notification that would have satisfied the reasonable expectations of the other shareholders, which may not have comported with Mr. Shefsky's personal interests, or with the best interests of the corporation.

[84] We find that the demand letter does not meet the requisite degree of proof required of Mr. Shefsky to meet his burden of controverting evidence on the record that he did not – within the corporate governance structure – name a replacement, seek to call, or actually call a shareholders' meeting, or propose a different slate of directors. Compliance with that which was demanded, within a 9-day period, would not have been in the best interests of CGMI.

[85] We conclude that the October 2, 2013 letter is not an exercise of Mr. Shefsky's right to appoint a third member of the Board of Directors, nor is it sufficient evidence to controvert the chambers judge's finding that Mr. Shefsky took no steps to appoint a third director. Further, there is no evidence that Mr. Shefsky's expectation that he could appoint a third director to the Board was violated in a manner that was oppressive, unfairly prejudicial, or that unfairly disregarded his protected interests.

Conclusion

[86] In conclusion, and for the foregoing reasons, the appeal is dismissed.

Dissenting Memorandum of Judgment
of the Honourable Mr. Justice Slatter

2016 ABCA 103 (CanLII)

[87] The issue on this appeal is whether the appellants Shefsky and 2350183 Ontario Inc. are entitled to a remedy for oppressive conduct arising from the way the business of California Gold Mining Inc. was conducted.

Facts

[88] California Gold Mining is a junior mining company listed on the TSX-Venture Exchange. In 2012 it was managed and controlled by its president and CEO, Michael Churchill; its chairman Patrick Cronin; a director, Kevin Cinq-Mars; a major shareholder, R.W. Tomlinson; and other associates of theirs. This original group can conveniently be described as the "Incumbent Group".

[89] California Gold Mining had unsuccessfully attempted to raise money to purchase a gold mining property in Mariposa County, California. The company's financial advisor, Haywood Securities, introduced Shefsky as a person who might be able to assist in raising the necessary funds.

[90] In October 2012, California Gold Mining and Shefsky signed a Term Sheet respecting the raising of funds to purchase the Mariposa property. The essential terms were that Shefsky would attempt to raise between $5 million and $8 million via a private placement of shares by November 30, 2012. If he was successful, certain changes would be made to the management structure of the company:

- two existing board members would resign in favour of Shefsky and his nominee, Charlie Cohen;
- Nuno Bandolini, another ally of the appellants, would be appointed to the board, provided he invested at least $100,000;
- Churchill would resign as CEO, but remain as president, and Shefsky would be appointed as CEO;
- the Chief Operating Officer would resign in favour of Eric Moeller.

The expectation was that Shefsky would nominate three members of a five-person board, and Shefsky and Moeller would essentially control the day-to-day operations: reasons, para. 105.

[91] Shefsky was unable to raise the funds by the original deadline of November 30, 2012, and the deadline was extended to December 31. All of the money was actually raised by February, 2013, when the private placement closed. The chambers judge found that nobody involved considered time to be "of the essence", and all were content that the funds were actually raised. There was ample evidence about the words and conduct of the parties to support the inference that Shefsky had complied with the fundraising pre-conditions of the Term Sheet.

[92] At some point a dispute arose as to whether Shefsky was entitled to credit for all of the $5 million raised. It was suggested that Shefsky was not entitled to credit for subscriptions from incumbent shareholders, or subscriptions that had been solicited by other members of the Board, or for units given to Haywood Securities for services rendered. Shefsky took the position that he had raised $5 million, or alternatively that the Term Sheet merely required that $5 million be raised for the private placement, regardless of the exact motivation for any specific investment. It is unclear whether this issue was only raised later, after the eventual falling out of the various groups. The chambers judge found (reasons, paras. 60, 102-3) ". . . it was objectively reasonable for Shefsky to conclude that his obligations under the Term Sheet had been met . . .".

[93] However, once Shefsky had raised the necessary funds, there was some resistance among the Incumbent Group to the agreed changes to the Board. None of the incumbents were keen to resign, and the suggestion was made that the deal had "morphed significantly" from what was originally contemplated. Further, Cohen was unexpectedly unable to serve on the Board, and Shefsky could not immediately find a replacement. There were various discussions about the final makeup of the Board, with Shefsky continuing to assert his right to nominate three members of a five-person board.

[94] In March 2013, when the time came to send out the management information circular for the April Annual General Meeting, Shefsky had still not identified a replacement for Cohen. As a result, the slate of directors proposed by management was Churchill, Shefsky, Bandolini, Cronin and Cinq-Mars. The appellants voted in favour of that slate. As a result, the appellants cannot complain that the election of these directors was in any way oppressive. On the other hand the record does not support an inference that Shefsky had abandoned his long-term right to appoint three members of a five-member board. The chambers judge declined to make a finding of fact about whether there were conversations about one board member resigning when a replacement for Cohen was identified: reasons, para. 36.

[95] Problems in the relationship started to appear. None of the incumbent directors was eager or willing to resign in favour of Shefsky's nominee. Moeller was terminated in July, allegedly for shortcomings in the performance of his work. Shefsky had some concerns about his own employment contract. There was evidence on the record that Shefsky continued to raise the topic of calling another shareholders meeting to restructure the composition of the Board.

[96] Matters came to a head in August of 2013. California Gold Mining's lawyers were instructed to file a price reservation with the TSX-V for a private placement with a share price of

$0.05. This was below both the recent trading range and the book value of the company. At the Board meeting on August 21, 2013, Churchill made a general statement about seeking financing in the short term. Shefsky again expressed a desire to call a shareholders meeting to reconstitute the Board. Churchill approached the Incumbent Group and its supporters to subscribe to a proposed new private placement. The appellants were neither informed of the impending private placement, nor were they invited to participate. On September 9, 2013, a notice was sent to the Board members indicating that a vote would be held the next day to authorize the private placement, which by this point had been fully subscribed. This was the first time that Shefsky and Bandolini became aware of what they accurately describe as the Secret Private Placement.

[97] The Secret Private Placement contemplated the issuance of 15,860,000 units at $0.05 a unit, for gross proceeds to California Gold Mining of $793,000. Shefsky immediately contacted Pierre Caland, an investor, and persuaded him to finance a competing private placement. Within 48 hours, Shefsky was able to present to the Board a "Bought Deal" which contemplated the issuance of about 14,286,000 units at $0.07 a unit, for gross proceeds to California Gold Mining of approximately $1 million. In other words, the Bought Deal generated more capital for the company, through less dilution of the shareholdings.

[98] The Board raised a number of technical objections to the Bought Deal. It refused even a 48-hour adjournment of the meeting to allow Shefsky to address some of their concerns. The Secret Private Placement was approved, thereby diluting the shareholdings of the appellants and their supporters. The next week, Cinq-Mars proposed an equivalent private placement for the appellants' supporters in the sum of $793,000. Churchill, however, would not permit a further private placement for any more than $304,454. That obviously would not neutralize the dilution resulting from the Secret Private Placement. That, combined with the apparent repudiation of the overall arrangement in the Term Sheet by the Incumbent Group, caused Shefsky to decline the offer. Given all that had happened, it was now abundantly clear that the Incumbent Group was not going to implement the provisions of the Term Sheet which would have given Shefsky control of the Board.

[99] The appellants then commenced this litigation, alleging that the affairs of California Gold Mining had been conducted in an oppressive manner that unfairly disregarded their interests.

The Reasons of the Chambers Judge

[100] After reviewing the evidence and the facts, and stating the law with respect to oppression, the chambers judge identified the following issues:

1. What reasonable expectations are alleged by Shefsky? The chambers judge concluded at para. 79 that the applicants had asserted three:

    a. The Term Sheet would be honoured;

b. Shefsky would be permitted to appoint a director to replace Cohen; and

c. Shefsky would have control of California Gold Mining.

2. Were these expectations reasonable?

   a. The Term Sheet

      (i) Did Shefsky meet the deadline? If not, was there conduct that could have led Shefsky to a reasonable expectation that the deadline in the Term Sheet was extended?

      (ii) Did Shefsky reach the goal of $5 million in subscriptions?

   b. Appointment of a director to replace Cohen

      (i) Did Shefsky have a reasonable expectation that he could nominate a third director when Cohen refused the nomination?

      (ii) Were Shefsky's reasonable expectations regarding Board nominations breached?

   c. The expectation of control.

3. If any reasonable expectations were breached, did any actions of the respondents constitute oppressive conduct?

4. If oppressive conduct was found, what is the appropriate remedy?

In summary, the chambers judge found (reasons at para. 127) that the applicants had established the first two reasonable expectations: that the Term Sheet would be honoured, and that Shefsky would be allowed to appoint a third member to the Board. The chambers judge concluded, however, that those two expectations were not violated. He found that the third expectation, that of "retaining control", was not reasonable, because Shefsky never had control.

[101] The chambers judge found that the first expectation, respecting the honouring of the Term Sheet, was established on the record. Even considering the dispute about who brought in some of the subscribers, Shefsky could reasonably expect that he had met his obligation of raising $5 million: reasons at para. 103. The record showed that the parties did not regard time as being "of the essence", and the fact that a small amount of the money was raised after December 31 was not significant.

[102] With respect to the second expectation, the chambers judge found that Shefsky had a reasonable expectation that he could appoint a third member to the Board. He was not limited to appointing only Cohen, and Shefsky was entitled to find a replacement when Cohen was unable to accept the appointment: reasons at para. 108. However, this expectation was not breached. Shefsky voted for the slate in the 2013 management circular, and never thereafter named a replacement director: reasons at para. 114. Whether one of the existing directors would have resigned in favour of this nominee was therefore moot. Further, Shefsky did not prove that if he had nominated a replacement, a majority of the shareholders would have elected that nominee.

[103] The chambers judge found that the third expectation, that Shefsky would retain control of the Board, was not reasonable since he never had control to start with. Shefsky had not brought forward affidavits from a majority of the shareholders indicating that they would vote for him, an absence of evidence that the chambers judge found to be fatal: reasons at paras. 119, 123, 126. Thus, any expectation that Shefsky had about control was unreasonable.

[104] Given these conclusions, it was not necessary for the chambers judge to decide the third issue (whether any of the conduct was oppressive) nor the fourth issue (the appropriate remedy): reasons at para. 127.

Issues and Standards of Review

[105] The formulation of the core standards of review is set out in Housen v Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 SCR 235:

(a) conclusions on issues of law are reviewed for correctness: Housen para. 8,

(b) findings of fact, including inferences drawn from the facts are reviewed for palpable and overriding error: Housen paras. 10, 23; H.L. v Canada (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 25 at para. 74, [2005] 1 SCR 401, and

(c) findings on questions of mixed fact and law call for a "higher standard" of review, because "matters of mixed law and fact fall along a spectrum of particularity": Housen para. 36. A deferential standard is appropriate where the decision results more from a consideration of the evidence as a whole, but a correctness standard can be applied when the error arises from the statement of the legal test: Housen paras. 33, 36.

The standard of review for findings of fact and of inferences drawn from the facts is the same, even when the judge heard no oral evidence: Housen at paras. 19, 24-25; Attila Dogan Construction and Installation Co. v AMEC Americas Ltd., 2015 ABCA 406 at para. 9.

[106] The appellants allege a number of errors. Firstly they argue that the chambers judge mischaracterized the third complaint as being limited to "a reasonable expectation of control". They argue that in the whole context, they had a reasonable expectation that the Incumbent Group would not proceed with the Secret Private Placement, which itself was an oppressive act that unfairly disregarded their interests. This issue engages a mixed question of fact and law. The facts surrounding the Secret Private Placement are not materially in dispute; the remaining issue is whether they can reasonably amount in law to oppressive conduct.

[107] Secondly, error is alleged in the finding that any question about the reasonable expectation of nominating three directors out of five was moot. This is essentially a finding of fact.

[108] Thirdly, it is alleged that the chambers judge erred in requiring that the appellants bring forth direct evidence from shareholders that they would support Shefsky by voting their shares as he recommended. This is primarily a question of the weight of the evidence, which is only reviewable for palpable and overriding error.

The State of the Record

[109] The chambers judge unfortunately declined to make key findings of fact on some issues. He concluded that the law prevents a chambers judge from making findings on disputed evidence. He thus decided at para. 6 to resolve contested factual issues only "on reasonable inferences which can be drawn from uncontested facts, objective evidence, and the conduct of the parties." The reluctance of the chambers judge to draw inferences from the evidence before him leaves gaps in the record that require the necessary inferences to be drawn on appeal.

[110] There are admittedly cases that point out the dangers of attempting to resolve disputed issues, especially those that rely on findings of credibility, based on conflicting affidavits and documents that would support either party's position. An example is Charles v Young, 2014 ABCA 200 at para. 4, in which the chambers judge attempted to decide whether the respondent was the adult interdependent partner of the deceased. But the record before the court will never be perfect or complete, even after a trial. Not every conflict in the evidence precludes the chambers judge from drawing inferences from the admitted facts, the disputed evidence, the conduct of the parties, and the corroborating evidence (such as documents with objective reliability).

[111] Hryniak v Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, [2014] 1 SCR 87, a summary judgment case, pointed out the need to make greater use of summary procedures for deciding disputes. Rules that saw the trial as a default method of proving disputed facts should be moderated:

> 4 In interpreting these [new summary judgment] provisions, the Ontario Court of Appeal placed too high a premium on the "full appreciation" of evidence that can be gained at a conventional trial, given that such a trial is not a realistic alternative for most litigants. In my view, a trial is not required if a summary judgment motion can achieve a fair and just adjudication, if it provides a process that allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact, apply the law to those facts, and is a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result than going to trial.

The mere fact that there might be some conflicting evidence on the record did not mean that a "fair and just adjudication" was not possible.

[112] The cases where it was impossible to resolve disputed factual issues in chambers tend to be more extreme. One category is cases that depend almost entirely on credibility, without any collateral documentation to support either side: Nieuwesteeg v Barron, 2009 ABCA 235 at paras. 9-10, 460 AR 329; Haluschak v Stokowski (1990), 104 AR 10 at paras. 23-25, 39 CPC (2d) 8 (Master). In these cases, sometimes there has not even been cross-examination on the affidavits: Montgomery v Riviere, [1989] AJ No 958 (CA); Guimond v Sornberger (1980), 25 AR 18 at para. 20, 13 Alta LR (2d) 228 (CA); Burton v Burton (1987), 84 AR 338 at para. 15, 12 RFL (3d) 113 (CA). As another example, in Schmidt v Wood, 2013 ABCA 138, which involved an application for contempt, it could not be seen from the record with clarity what the underlying order actually required, never mind whether the respondent had complied. Some issues are particularly unsuited to resolution on a paper record: Achtem v McConnell, [1986] AJ No 207 (CA) (the bona fides of a party); Barter v Barter (1996), 42 Alta LR (3d) 221 at para. 8 (CA) (best interests of a child with special medical needs).

[113] Not every piece of disputed evidence requires a trial. For example, a "bare denial" or bald allegation does not raise a triable issue: Canada (Attorney General) v Lameman, 2008 SCC 14 at para. 11, [2008] 1 SCR 372; Goldman v Devine, 2007 ONCA 301 at para. 23; R. Floden Services Ltd. v Solomon, 2015 ABQB 450 at para. 23, 24 Alta LR (6th) 76; Confederation Trust Co. v Alizadeh, [1998] OJ No 408 (QL) (Gen Div). Nor does a self-serving affidavit unsupported by other evidence: Guarantee Co. of North America v Gordon Capital Corp., [1999] 3 SCR 423 at pp. 436-37. Nor does evidence that flies in the face of the balance of the record: Dagher v Glenn, 2016 ABCA 38 at paras. 30-2; Pioneer Exploration Inc. (Trustee of) v Euro-Am Pacific Enterprises Ltd., 2003 ABCA 298 at para. 25-6, 27 Alta LR (4th) 62; Rogers Cable TV Ltd. v 373041 Ontario Ltd. (1994), 22 OR (3d) 25 (Gen Div); Klein v Wolbeck, 2016 ABQB 28 at para. 26; Pizza Pizza Ltd. v Gillespie (1990), 75 OR (2d) 225 at p. 253 (Gen Div). Whether there is truly a "genuine issue requiring resolution at a trial" requires a nuanced balancing of the weight and perceived reliability of the evidence, the importance of the issue, the likelihood of there being a better record at trial, and any other relevant considerations.

[114] Where the parties decide, for whatever reason, that they do not wish to suffer the expense or delay of a full trial, a chambers judge should still attempt to resolve the dispute, if possible. It is important to note that the Business Corporations Act, RSA 2000, c. B-9, contemplates that oppression disputes will be decided "on application". Section 242(3)(p) includes as a possible remedy "an order requiring the trial of any issue", which demonstrates that a trial is not the presumptive forum for oppression litigation. Rigid rules preventing the reconciliation of inconsistent evidence in a chambers setting are inconsistent with this approach.

[115] As the chambers judge noted at para. 9:

> 9 In this case, the parties chose a chambers procedure, knowing the limitations of affidavit evidence and aware of the implications of such a decision. It is appropriate, then, to decide the issues that I can, based on the best available evidence before me.

This is the proper approach, but it should not be constrained by artificial or formalistic rules stating that any issue of fact disputed on the record cannot be resolved in chambers. As noted in Windsor v Canadian Pacific Railway Ltd., 2014 ABCA 108 at para. 15, 94 Alta LR (5th) 301: "Interlocutory decisions that can resolve a dispute in whole or in part should be made when the record permits a fair and just adjudication."

The Oppression Remedy

[116] The Business Corporations Act provides a remedy to any "complainant" (defined to include any security holder, creditor, director, officer or "other proper person") who has been the subject of oppressive conduct with respect to the business of the corporation. The scope of the remedy is provided in s. 242(2):

> (2) If, on an application under subsection (1), the Court is satisfied that in respect of a corporation or any of its affiliates
> (a) any act or omission of the corporation or any of its affiliates effects a result,
>
> (b) the business or affairs of the corporation or any of its affiliates are or have been carried on or conducted in a manner, or
>
> (c) the powers of the directors of the corporation or any of its affiliates are or have been exercised in a manner
> that is oppressive or unfairly prejudicial to or that unfairly disregards the interests of any security holder, creditor, director or officer, the Court may make an order to rectify the matters complained of.

This statutory remedy has been described as extending beyond strict legal rights to encompass "not just what is legal but what is fair . . . . It follows that courts considering claims for oppression should look at business realities, not merely narrow legalities": BCE Inc. v 6796508 Canada Inc., 2008 SCC 69 at para. 58, [2008] 3 SCR 560. The three types of conduct mentioned in s. 242(2) are not mutually exclusive and should be read in combination: BCE at para. 89.

[117] BCE at para. 68 outlines a two-step process for the analysis:

(1) Does the evidence support the reasonable expectation asserted by the claimant? and

(2) Does the evidence establish that the reasonable expectation was violated by conduct falling within the terms "oppression", "unfair prejudice" or "unfair disregard" of a relevant interest?

Once these two initial conditions are satisfied, the applicant must still go on to establish wrongful conduct, causation, and compensable injury: BCE at para. 90.

[118] The first part of the analysis is factually and contextually driven:

> 59 Second, like many equitable remedies, oppression is fact-specific. What is just and equitable is judged by the reasonable expectations of the stakeholders in the context and in regard to the relationships at play. Conduct that may be oppressive in one situation may not be in another. . . .
> 62 As denoted by "reasonable", the concept of reasonable expectations is objective and contextual. The actual expectation of a particular stakeholder is not conclusive. In the context of whether it would be "just and equitable" to grant a remedy, the question is whether the expectation is reasonable having regard to the facts of the specific case, the relationships at issue, and the entire context, including the fact that there may be conflicting claims and expectations.

Again, the assessment of the "reasonable expectations" is driven by the context and business realities, not merely by the strict legal rights and relationships existing between the parties.

[119] There is no strict legal constraint on what can generate reasonable expectations. BCE listed some factors that might commonly be in play:

> 72 Factors that emerge from the case law that are useful in determining whether a reasonable expectation exists include: general commercial practice; the nature of the corporation; the relationship between the parties; past practice; steps the claimant could have taken to protect itself; representations and agreements; and the fair resolution of conflicting interests between corporate stakeholders.

Reasonable expectations may also arise from the dealings and relationships of the parties, and from the way the corporation was operated.

[120] However, not every disappointed expectation will be oppressive:

> 89 Thus far we have discussed how a claimant establishes the first element of an action for oppression - a reasonable expectation that he or she would be treated > in a certain way. However, to complete a claim for oppression, the claimant must show that the failure to meet this expectation involved unfair conduct and prejudicial consequences within s. 241 of the CBCA. Not every failure to meet a reasonable expectation will give rise to the equitable considerations that ground actions for oppression. The court must be satisfied that the conduct falls within the concepts of "oppression", "unfair prejudice" or "unfair disregard" of the claimant's interest, within the meaning of s. 241 of the CBCA. Viewed in this way, the reasonable expectations analysis that is the theoretical foundation of the oppression remedy, and the particular types of conduct described in s. 241, may be seen as complementary, rather than representing alternative approaches to the oppression remedy, as has sometimes been supposed. Together, they offer a complete picture of conduct that is unjust and inequitable, to return to the language of Ebrahimi.

It is thus necessary for the applicant to prove that the challenged conduct was oppressive, or unfairly prejudicial to it, or unfairly disregarded its interests.

[121] It is not suggested on appeal that the chambers judge erred in his statement of the law of oppression. The alleged errors arise primarily from the way the law was applied to the facts.

Status of the Appellants

[122] The respondents argue that the Act only gives rights to "complainants" and that the appellants' complaints arise in another context. Complainants are defined to include any security holder, creditor, director, officer or "other proper person". The appellants are clearly security holders, and Shefsky was a director and officer. It is sufficient that their status arose as a result of the Term Sheet; it matters not that Shefsky was not a director when the Term Sheet was signed, because the oppressive conduct occurred later. Given the conduct of the Incumbent Group in entering into the Term Sheet, it would be artificial to think that the appellants are not also "other proper persons" for the purposes of the oppression remedies.

[123] The respondents argue, however, that the dispute does not arise out of Shefsky's status as a shareholder, director, or officer. Rather, they argue that the complaints of oppression arise in his capacity as a financier or underwriter, which does not entitle him to oppression remedies. In support of this argument, the respondents cite Rogers Communications Inc. v Maclean Hunter Ltd. (1994), 2 CCLS 233 at para. 9; Stahlke v Stanfield , 2010 BCSC 142 at para. 23; and Icahn Partners LP v Lions Gate Entertainment Corp., 2010 BCSC 1547 at paras. 182-3, 75 BLR (4th) 212 affirmed other grounds 2011 BCCA 228 at para. 89. Those cases are, however, distinguishable; while the applicants were shareholders, the complaints they made did not arise out of their status as shareholders, but rather out of collateral contracts or relationships.

[124] Allegations of oppression will generally arise against a background of other legal rights. There will frequently be contractual relationships between the various parties. Further, there are always corporate law rights in play, some of which are loosely analogous to contractual rights. It is generally not oppressive for a party to rely on clear contractual rights, unless they are asserted entirely out of proportion to the reasonable expectations of the parties. If the real complaint is a breach of contract, it should be pursued as such, and not under the guise of an oppression claim: Stahlke at para. 23. "Reasonable expectations", however, can arise from a background of contractual rights, and can also arise absent any specific contractual right. In this case the expectations of the appellants arose primarily as a result of the terms of the Term Sheet, combined with rights arising from the law of corporations. There were also contractual relationships between the parties, but they were primarily in place to implement the understandings set out in the Term Sheet.

[125] It is difficult to regard the Term Sheet as being merely a contract. The only parties to it were California Gold Mining and Shefsky, yet the expectations it created required the cooperation of other parties. Many of the things outlined in the Term Sheet were beyond the practical power of the corporation, for example, the composition of its own board. As another example, it contemplated that one or more of the sitting directors would resign in favour of Shefsky's nominees. Given the reality of "shareholder democracy", the Term Sheet contemplated others (such as the Incumbent Group) voting their shares in ways that would make possible the realization of the reasonable expectations it created. Whatever its contractual content, the Term Sheet was equally important in creating reasonable expectations that could be relied on by the appellants once they became shareholders and Shefsky became a director and officer.

[126] Further, describing Shefsky as merely an underwriter or financier does not accurately describe his role. It is true that he was to raise a certain amount of money for California Gold Mining, but that was only the precondition to him taking a larger role. In addition to becoming a shareholder, Shefsky was to become the Chief Executive Officer, a board member, and was also to have a control of the appointment of the Board. The expectations thus created went well beyond what he might have had as a mere financier.

[127] Given the factual context, and having regard to the particular allegations and complaints being made by the appellants, they are properly regarded as being complainants, and the allegations that they make are properly characterized as complaints about oppressive corporate conduct.

The Expectation of Control

[128] The chambers judge found that Shefsky had met the requirement of raising $5 million in capital, which created a reasonable expectation that the provisions of the Term Sheet would be honoured. That in turn created an expectation that Shefsky could nominate three directors, but this issue was said to be moot because Shefsky never purported to name a third director. Finally, the chambers judge found that the Shefsky's expectation of "control" was unreasonable because the appellants never had control.

[129] The appellants argue that the chambers judge defined the alleged scope of the oppressive conduct too narrowly. They argue that the expectation of control went well beyond demonstrating that they could prove a majority of the shareholders would vote as Shefsky recommended. Further, the chambers judge erred in concluding that Shefsky had never nominated a replacement director. The respondents argue that any expectation of control was unreasonable because, at the end of the day, the shareholders control who will be elected as a director.

[130] On this issue it is important to highlight what is not in dispute. Neither side disputes the concept of "shareholder democracy". It is not disputed that only the shareholders can elect the directors. It is thus artificial to characterize Shefsky's asserted expectation of "control", as an expectation that he could override shareholder democracy. His expectations could, however, encompass:

(a) an agreement by the Incumbent Group that they would vote their shares with the appellants in such a way that they could maximize their chances of obtaining control of the Board,

(b) an understanding that Shefsky would never have to concern himself with "winning a proxy fight", because the Incumbent Group agreed that they would vote to elect his three nominees; there would never be a proxy fight, and

(c) the business reality that if Shefsky had control of the Board he could effectively control the management nominees for directors.

The chambers judge's description of the appellants' expectation as centering around whether they could "maintain control" artificially characterizes what was alleged, and sets up an expectation that would be impossible to achieve. It focusses on "narrow legalities" rather than "business realities": BCE at para. 58.

[131] Further, in the context of an oppression action, "shareholder democracy" is not an absolute. The Business Corporations Act allows the Court to order several remedies that are inconsistent with a strict view of shareholder democracy. Thus, the Court can amend the articles or bylaws, appoint additional or replacement directors, and make other corporate changes that usually require shareholder approval. The respondents' artificial reliance on the concept of "shareholder democracy" to justify their oppressive conduct is unsupported by the statute. The statute makes it clear that "shareholder democracy" is not a trump card that always overrides reasonable expectations.

[132] The chambers judge also set an unreasonably high evidentiary standard. The appellant filed affidavits from a few key investors indicating that they had invested because of the appellant's involvement. The chambers judge would not, however, draw an inference that they would have voted as Shefsky recommended. The chambers judge would not accept that Shefsky could have ensured the election of his nominees because he had not brought forward affidavits from all of those who subscribed for units at his invitation indicating that they would support him. The suggestion that such affidavits would be required from every shareholder sets an artificially high evidentiary standard that could never be met for a publicly traded company.

[133] In any event, the only reasonable inference is that many, if not all who subscribed for units at Shefsky's invitation had a considerable measure of confidence in him, which they demonstrated by writing cheques for units. Absent some noticeable change of circumstances, it is unreasonable to infer that they would have abandoned support for him in favour of the Incumbent Group. Any findings and inferences to the contrary represent palpable and overriding errors.

[134] Further, as noted the chambers judge ignored the business realities. Churchill acknowledged that the "shareholders had never voted against the slate of directors proposed by management": reasons, para. 15. If Shefsky had control of the Board, he controlled the management slate. Further, the Term Sheet implied that the Incumbent Group would vote their shares to support Shefsky's nominees, or at the very least they would not obstruct the process. The finding that the appellants had not proven an ability to control the Board is inconsistent with the finding that they had a legitimate expectation that the Term Sheet would be honoured. The chambers judge's refusal to draw the inference that the board of a company could be controlled notwithstanding the concept of "shareholder democracy" was unreasonable. The only reasonable inference is that if the appellants and the Incumbent Group had joined together to nominate and then vote for a particular slate, that slate would undoubtedly have been elected.

[135] It is also unreasonable to interpret the Term Sheet as only creating reasonable expectations about control of the Board until the next shareholders meeting. Gold mining is not a short-term enterprise. There is nothing in the Term Sheet to suggest that Shefsky's control of the Board would end only a few months after he raised the $5 million. The Term Sheet in fact specifies that Shefsky's initial term as Chief Executive Officer would be for 36 months. The respondents argue that because of "shareholder democracy" no one could guarantee the composition of the Board beyond the next shareholders meeting. As previously discussed, that is an artificial argument and no answer to Shefsky's reasonable expectations that he would have control of the Board, with the support of the Incumbent Group at least in the medium term.

[136] The appellants argue that their reasonable expectation that Shefsky could nominate a third member of the Board was well-established on this record, and that this issue was not moot.

[137] The essence of the arrangement in the Term Sheet was that Shefsky would be able to nominate three members of a five-person board. The Term Sheet specifically provides that if the $5 million was raised "two of the existing members of the board of the Company shall resign in favour of Martin Shefsky and Charlie Cohen". The essential business arrangement was control of the Board, and it is unreasonable to interpret the Term Sheet as meaning that Shefsky could only nominate the two candidates specifically named. If (as it turned out) one of them could not act, or if one commenced to serve but had to resign, the only commercially reasonable interpretation is that Shefsky could nominate qualified replacements: reasons, paras. 107-8. Indeed, the record does not appear to disclose that the respondents ever asserted otherwise. Further, it must be implicit in this arrangement that incumbent directors would resign in order to make place for Shefsky's nominee; in any event the Term Sheet says so explicitly.

[138] The chambers judge concluded at para. 114 that the refusal of any members of the Incumbent Group to resign was a "red herring and moot" because Shefsky "did not name a replacement, seek to call, or actually call a shareholders meeting himself". This fact finding and inference are surprising, as all the objective evidence on the record discloses that Shefsky was persistently asserting his right to nominate three members of a five-member board. On several occasions he proposed calling a shareholders meeting, but was rebuffed. On October 2, 2013 the appellants' counsel wrote a letter demanding that one of the Incumbent Group's directors "immediately resign from the board so that his place can be taken by Charlie Cohen who is prepared to accept the nomination". The chambers judge appears to have overlooked this evidence.

[139] The appellants are justified in arguing that the findings on this point represent palpable and overriding error. Shefsky did nominate a third director, and none of the incumbent directors resigned as specifically required by the Term Sheet, which further defeated a reasonable expectation of the appellants.

[140] In summary, the appellants have demonstrated palpable and overriding error with respect to the expectation of control. The conclusion that Shefsky could not prove potential control arose only because an impossible and unreasonable standard of proof was set. Further, the chambers judge's failure to draw the inference that Shefsky, once in control of the Board, could effectively control the election of directors, reflects palpable and overriding error. The finding that Shefsky never nominated a third director reflects a reviewable error of fact; the letter of October 2, 2013 proves that he did do so no later than then. The failure of one of the incumbent directors to resign to make room for Shefsky's nomination reflected a clear breach of the Term Sheet and the expectation that it would be honoured.

Was the Conduct Oppressive?

[141] BCE confirms that it is not sufficient for a complainant to prove a breach of a reasonable expectation. The complainant must also show that the offending conduct falls within the terms "oppression", "unfair prejudice" or "unfair disregard" of a relevant interest.

[142] The Secret Private Placement unfairly disregarded the appellants' interests and was prejudicial to them, making it oppressive. The primary reason it unfairly disregarded the appellants' interests was that it was in direct breach of the Term Sheet. As the chambers judge found, once Shefsky had raised $5 million, he had a reasonable expectation that the Term Sheet would be honoured. Not only did the Secret Private Placement dilute the shareholdings of the company, it was part of an overall pattern of conduct by the Incumbent Group that demonstrated their repudiation of the Term Sheet.

[143] No later than at the time of the Secret Private Placement, it became apparent that the Incumbent Group had no further intention of respecting the provisions of the Term Sheet. It may well be that the conditions of the financing had "morphed significantly", but that did not justify secret, unilateral steps by the Incumbent Group to change the agreement. At this point, Shefsky had completely performed his side of the deal; he had raised the $5 million that California Gold Mining needed to buy the Mariposa property. It was unfair and oppressive for the Incumbent Group to aspire to enjoy the benefits of Shefsky's performance of the Term Sheet, while not performing their reciprocal obligations under it.

[144] The inference is clear that the Incumbent Group was not motivated to perform its obligations under the Term Sheet. It appears that in some quarters there was a lack of enthusiasm from the very beginning for the concept of giving Shefsky control of the company. There was also the view that the capital structure had "morphed" from what was originally envisioned. The Incumbent Group was not disposed to perform its obligations under the Term Sheet, and persistently resisted or deflected attempts by Shefsky to call a shareholders meeting or to appoint a third member to the Board. They seized on the idea, rejected by the chambers judge, that Shefsky had not performed his obligations under the Term Sheet.

[145] There are further aspects of the Secret Private Placement which demonstrate that it unfairly disregarded the appellants' rights. Its very secrecy was objectionable, as was the appellants' exclusion from the opportunity to subscribe to shares. It was only offered to supporters of the Incumbent Group, not to the shareholders as a whole. It was done on very short notice, without opportunity for any amendment or mitigation. For the purposes of the oppression analysis, another important distinction between the Bought Deal and the Secret Private Placement is that the former was consistent with the Term Sheet, which stipulated that Shefsky would retain control, whereas the latter was inconsistent with that agreement.

[146] Further, the Secret Private Placement was oppressive because it was not in the best interests of the corporation. The Secret Private Placement contemplated the issuance of 15,860,000 units at $0.05 a unit, for gross proceeds to the California Gold Mining of $793,000. At the time, the shares were trading at about $0.07 each, and the book value was higher than that. The Bought Deal contemplated the issuance of about 14,286,000 units at $0.07 a unit, for gross proceeds of approximately $1 million. In other words, the Bought Deal generated more capital for the company through less dilution of the shareholdings. While the directors of a company are entitled to act in what they consider to be in the best interests of the company, it is impossible to rationalize how the Secret Private Placement could possibly have been the better deal.

[147] The respondents argue that it is neither unusual nor improper for a junior mining company to want to raise additional capital. That is not the issue. No one doubts that any junior mining company can benefit from more capital. That, however, does not justify oppressive methods of raising that capital.

[148] It also unfairly disregards the interests of the shareholders if the Board acts in its own best interest, rather than in the interests of the corporation: Legion Oils Ltd v Barron (1956), 2 DLR (2d) 505 at p. 516 [33], 17 WWR 209 (Alta SC, TD); Noble v Keho Holdings Ltd, 1987 ABCA 84 at para. 38, 52 Alta LR (2d) 195. While the courts defer to the reasonable business judgment of the directors, no reasonable justification for the Secret Private Placement has been advanced. The respondents cite Teck Corp Ltd. v Millar, [1973] 2 WWR 385 at p. 413 (BCSC) for the proposition that it may sometimes be acceptable for the directors to act to retain control of the corporation:

> My own view is that the directors ought to be allowed to consider who is seeking control and why. If they believe that there will be substantial damage to the company's interests if the company is taken over, then the exercise of their powers to defeat those seeking a majority will not necessarily be categorized as improper.

Having expressly agreed in the Term Sheet to voluntarily give control of the company to Shefsky, the Incumbent Group can hardly argue that there was anything contrary to the interests of the company in that change of control. The Secret Private Placement was undoubtedly better for the Incumbent Group, but it cannot reasonably be said to have been in the best interest of the company.

Justification for the Oppressive Conduct

[149] While BCE makes it clear that corporate oppression is as much concerned with equitable expectations as it is with strict legal rights, the respondents' frequent response to the appellants' claims is that they are inconsistent with strict legal rules.

[150] For example, the respondents argue that after the Term Sheet was signed, the appellants subscribed to shares using a standard form subscription agreement. That agreement had a "whole agreement" clause that disclaimed any prior representations or covenants. Thus, the respondents argue, the subscription agreement overtook the Term Sheet, and at that point any of Shefsky's expectations arising from it expired. This is a completely technical and artificial argument. It was obvious that the arrangements in the Term Sheet would not become operational until after the $5 million private placement had been successfully completed. If that was the true meaning of the whole agreement clause, Shefsky would never be entitled to become Chief Executive Officer, or to nominate three out of five directors; the entire Term Sheet would become meaningless. This proposition is simply unreasonable. The whole agreement clause in the subscription agreement must mean that there were no prior surviving representations representing the subscription itself, not representing other agreements relating to the operation of the company.

[151] Another example of this technical response is the respondents' reliance on artificial and technical concepts of "shareholder democracy", as previously discussed.

[152] The respondents justify the Board's refusal of the Bought Deal in favour of the Secret Private Placement on other technical grounds. For example:

(a) the respondents reply that the Bought Deal, as proposed, was not compliant with the securities regulations because Caland was not licensed to engage in underwriting. That is undoubtedly so, but that does not mean that the Bought Deal could not have easily been made compliant, for example by enlisting Haywood Securities as the underwriter;

(b) the respondents also allege that the Bought Deal required shareholder approval because it would result in Caland owning more than 20% of the shares. That presupposes that Caland was going to retain control of that entire block, whereas the concept of a "bought deal" is that the underwriter will sell the shares to numerous investors. Indeed, the minutes of the Directors' meeting of September 10, 2013 confirm that the "proposed financing would be distributed widely so as to avoid creation of a control person".

If some of the proposed steps and filings were inadvertently non-compliant with securities regulations, that does not necessarily mean that the appellants' expectations were unreasonable.

[153] Neither side disputes that the securities industry is highly regulated. All concerned were sophisticated players, and they knew that whatever was to be done had to be done in compliance with the rules of the TSX-Venture Exchange and the directives of the Securities Commission. The Term Sheet contains numerous references to securities' regulatory requirements. Thus, when proposals were made to take certain steps with respect to California Gold Mining, it must have been the intention of all concerned that such steps were subject to, and would be undertaken in compliance with, the appropriate securities regulation. Securities regulation being extremely complex, it must have been anticipated that expert advice would have been sought on how exactly to implement any steps. It is thus no answer to the oppression claim, or to the appellants' expectations, to say that any particular proposed step required regulatory approval, as it must have been anticipated that such approval would be obtained. It is also no answer that any particular step, as proposed, would be offside the securities regulations, because it must have been intended that all steps would be structured to be compliant.

[154] It should also be remembered that the Bought Deal was put together and presented to the Board with great haste because the Incumbent Group had essentially ambushed the appellants with the Secret Private Placement. It is hardly surprising that the appellants had not had time to explore all of the regulatory requirements that would have to be met, but it was not unreasonable for them to think that those details could be worked out if the Board accepted the Bought Deal in principle. The Board would not even consider a 48 hour adjournment of the meeting to allow the appellants to deal with these regulatory details.

[155] The respondents argue that any agreements about the composition of the board, or about control of the company, should have been publicly disclosed in accordance with the securities regulations. If such an obligation rested on the company or the directors, they may well have been in breach of them. However, those breaches cannot fairly be used to defeat Shefsky's rights; any consequences of a breach of the Board's duties in that regard more fairly lie on the Incumbent Group. Any such duty of disclosure was equally knowable to all involved, including counsel for the company, and any deficiencies in disclosure should obviously have been promptly remedied as soon as they were identified. The failure to comply with those duties does not, in any event, justify oppressive conduct.

[156] The respondents complain that the Bought Deal was presented on an "all or nothing" basis. Having unilaterally foisted the Secret Private Placement on the appellants, they can hardly complain about the Bought Deal on that basis. The appellants had made it clear that the Bought Deal was an "either/or" proposal, in that it could not proceed contemporaneously with the Secret Private Placement. But it would be unreasonable to permit the Incumbent Group to acquire units at $0.05 under the Secret Private Placement, and then expect those participating in the Bought Deal to acquire units at $0.07. Any of the subscribers to the Secret Private Placement would undoubtedly have been offered shares under the Bought Deal.

[157] The respondents also argue that the appellants failed to mitigate the effect of the Secret Private Placement because they refused an offer to take up units on the same terms. A few days after the Secret Private Placement, Cinq-Mars proposed a further private placement for the appellant's supporters in the sum of $793,000. Churchill, however, would not permit a further private placement for any more than $304,454. That obviously would not neutralize the dilution resulting from the Secret Private Placement. Combined with the Incumbent Group's obvious repudiation of the overall arrangement in the Term Sheet, there was ample justification for the appellants to decline this offer.

[158] In summary, the conduct of the respondents breached the expectations of the appellants in ways that were unfairly prejudicial, and unfairly disregarded their interests. The reasons disclose reviewable error to the extent that they overlooked these breaches based on any of the technical defences raised. They overlook the point that oppression remedies are as much concerned with fairness as they are with strict legal rights, and they are based on unreasonable assumptions, or draw unreasonable inferences about the legitimate expectations of the parties.

The Appropriate Remedy

[159] Given a finding of oppressive conduct, it would be necessary to consider the appropriate remedy. Both parties agree that, given the passage of time, it would be inappropriate to attempt to devise an appropriate remedy from this record. It would accordingly be appropriate to refer the issue of a remedy back to the chambers judge.

2016 ABCA 103 (CanLII)

Conclusion

[160] In conclusion, the appeal should be allowed. The appellants were able to demonstrate breaches of their reasonable expectations resulting from conduct of the respondents that was unfairly prejudicial and unfairly disregarded their interests. The question of remedy should be referred back to the chambers judge.

Memorandum of Judgment

The Majority:

[1] Mr. Arndt suffered an injury that he attributed to his work. He was dissatisfied with the procedures followed by the Workers' Compensation Board, and the compensation and treatment he received. He sued the WCB and some of its staff, including the medical consultant who had assessed his claim, Dr. Banerji. Dr. Banerji brought an application to summarily dismiss the claim, which was partly successful. Dr. Banerji appealed, arguing that the entire claim should have been dismissed (appeal #1701-0158AC). That same day Mr. Arndt also appealed, arguing that his entire claim should have been sent to trial (appeal #1701-0161AC). The two appeals, which are essentially an appeal and cross-appeal, were argued together.

[2] One issue on appeal is whether a medical consultant of the WCB is entitled to a privilege or immunity from a damages suit for advice given to the WCB. A related issue is whether any such suit is an impermissible collateral attack on the WCB's decisions.

Facts

[3] Mr. Arndt pleads that he was employed by the Scandinavian Cultural Society of Calgary. The Society is affiliated with the Calgary Scandinavian Centre Co-Op Ltd., although the exact legal relationship between the two is unclear on this record. It is alleged that one of them may have been an "employer" under the Workers' Compensation Act, RSA 2000, c. W-15, but that the other was not.

[4] For reasons that are in dispute, Mr. Arndt's contract was not extended beyond February 7, 2007, and shortly thereafter he reported work related injuries. For example, he complained of stiffness, pain and numbness in his hands, wrists, elbows, and shoulders that he attributed to repetitive lifting of furniture. He also reported lung problems from inhaling dust, fumes, and other irritants. It appears that Mr. Arndt had reported some of these symptoms to his family doctor, Dr. Beeharry, shortly before he was laid off, but no workers' compensation claim was filed.

[5] The WCB retained Dr. Banerji as a medical consultant to review medical documentation and provide an opinion to the Board. Specifically, he was asked to identify the most reasonable diagnosis for Mr. Arndt's condition, and to advise whether a relationship could be established between that diagnosis and the mechanism of injury. As instructed, Dr. Banerji reviewed the medical documentation, but did not examine Mr. Arndt. Dr. Banerji also spoke with Dr. Beeharry, Mr. Arndt's family doctor. Dr. Banerji recorded his activities, conversations, and conclusions in various correspondence with the Board and Dr. Beeharry. In his correspondence he generally invited Dr. Beeharry to indicate if he had not correctly recorded their conversations.

[6] Dr. Banerji could not initially connect Mr. Arndt's symptoms to work related injuries. Dr. Banerji was under the impression that the injuries had not been reported by Mr. Arndt until his employment was terminated. Dr. Banerji accordingly put forward the possibility that there were "secondary gain factors" at play (EKE A22). It subsequently emerged that Mr. Arndt had previously reported some of these symptoms to his family doctor, Dr. Beeharry, although the Board, and possibly the employer, had not been advised of that.

[7] The WCB ultimately acknowledged a work related claim arising from bilateral shoulder strain, and for bilateral medial and lateral epicondylitis. The Board determined that those injuries should resolve within six weeks. The Board denied coverage for bilateral carpal tunnel syndrome. In assessing Mr. Arndt's claim for compensation for carpal tunnel syndrome both Dr. Banerji and the WCB applied the Board's published position paper on Carpal Tunnel Syndrome (EKE A270).

[9] In June 2008 the Appeals Commission sent the claim for bilateral carpal tunnel syndrome back for further assessment of whether or not there was a causal connection between this syndrome and the mechanism of injury. Dr. Banerji recommended that a pre-accident job demand census be done (EKE A15). When that census was completed, it revealed a sharp disagreement between Mr. Arndt and his employer over the nature of his duties. One source of the carpal tunnel syndrome was said to be vibrations from a floor scrubber, but the job assessor reported that vibration was not discernible through the handles (EKE A40). There was also a discrepancy in how frequently Mr. Arndt had been required to move furniture. Dr. Banerji reviewed the new information, and confirmed his previous opinion that the carpal tunnel symptoms were not work related.

[10] Mr. Arndt applied for judicial review of one of these WCB decisions (ABQB #1101-02777), but abandoned that application before it was heard. Mr. Arndt subsequently applied for a reconsideration of a decision of the Appeals Commission, but that application was dismissed. All of his opportunities for appeal and review have been exhausted.

[11] Mr. Arndt also sued his former employer. The claim alleged, in part, that his employer was not actually covered by the workers' compensation system, and accordingly it could be sued for the injuries Mr. Arndt had suffered on the job. That litigation is not yet finally resolved.

[12] In addition, Mr. Arndt commenced the present action (ABQB #1301-02123). In it he sues the Workers' Compensation Board, a number of its employees, and its medical consultant, Dr. Banerji. This action alleges many wide-ranging forms of actionable misconduct:

- It alleges that the WCB "began private communications with the Employer to develop specific measures intended to prevent proper medical assessment and acceptance of the Plaintiff's claim for compensation".
- It alleges that the: "WCB . . . The Office of the Appeals Advisor for WCB Matters, and the Appeals Commission . . . took clear and calculated advantage of their respective positions and capacities over the Plaintiff and further proceeded to behave improperly, abusively and with the utmost bad faith and intent, details of which exceed 200 words but shall be proven at the trial of this action."

- It pleads that the Scandinavian Cultural Society was not eligible for WCB coverage, and did not have WCB coverage.
- It names a number of individual employees of the WCB, and makes wide claims that they "made false statements and claims, ignored and altered testimony . . . all . . . designed to disparage the Plaintiff and to cause further conflict and bias . . .", including that they ignored the instructions of the Appeals Commission.
- It alleges that all of the defendants acted intentionally to punish the plaintiff, raised false allegations, manipulated information, acted outside the legislation, concealed medical information, and generally abused their positions.

No particulars are provided for these allegations, which provide context to these appeals but which are not directly in issue.

[13] The statement of claim contains specific allegations against Dr. Banerji:

> 14. The Plaintiff states . . .
>
> b) Beginning in March of 2007, the Defendant, Dr. Banerji, acting as a medical consultant under the Act ("Medical Consultant") and thus agent for the WCB:
>
> (i) failed to perform within his mandate as such Medical Consultant;
>
> (ii) failed to provide valid and proscribed medical assessment as required and set out the Act, acted outside the scope and intent of his duties in a punitive manner, and further made actions and decisions intended to conceal his errors;
>
> (iii) neglected, failed and ignored entirely his responsibilities as a duly licensed physician in the Province of Alberta, which not only led to improper diagnosis, but also led to further injury of the Plaintiff;
>
> and
>
> (iv) in attempts to conceal his aforesaid errors, pressured and harassed the Plaintiff's physician, Dr. Beeharry, on several occasions in an effort to promote and foster distrust of the Plaintiff by his own physician.

2018 ABCA 176 (CanLII)

Dr. Banerji brought an application for summary dismissal of this part of the claim that was made specifically against him. It is the outcome of that application which forms the subject matter of these appeals.

[14] Dr. Banerji's application for summary dismissal was based on his own affidavit, in which he deposed that his only role in this matter was as a medical consultant to the WCB. He deposed that he discharged his duties honestly, in good faith, independently, and within the acceptable standard of care. He also filed an affidavit of Dr. C. Edward Findlay, who provided an expert opinion confirming that Dr. Banerji had met the applicable standard of care. Dr. Banerji and Dr. Findlay were subsequently questioned on their affidavits.

[15] One specific basis for Dr. Banerji's application for summary dismissal was s. 34(4) of the Workers' Compensation Act:

> 34(1) A physician who attends an injured worker shall
>
> (a) forward a report to the Board . . .
>
> (b) advise the Board when, in the physician's opinion, the worker will be or was able to return to work, . . . , and
>
> (c) without charge to the worker, give all reasonable and necessary information, advice and assistance to the worker and the worker's dependants in making a claim for compensation . . . .
> (4) A report made or submitted to the Board under this Act by a physician or a hospital or other treating agency is for the use and purpose of the Board only, and is a privileged communication of the person making or submitting it and, unless it is proved that it was made maliciously, is not admissible in evidence or subject to production in any court in an action or proceeding against that person.

Dr. Banerji argues that s. 34(4) is a complete answer to this action, and accordingly the scope and interpretation of the section is central to these appeals.

[16] Mr. Arndt filed an affidavit in response to the summary dismissal application, which he stated was a rebuttal of the affidavits of Dr. Banerji and Dr. Findlay. This wide-ranging affidavit covers a number of topics:

- It states Mr. Arndt's belief that there is no evidence that the Workers' Compensation Act is applicable to his claim, including whether Dr. Banerji's opinions were provided within the workers' compensation system.
- It expresses the belief that the court will have to determine the scope of s. 34(4), and the presence of malice, in deciding the application.

2018 ABCA 176 (CanLII)

- It expresses the opinion that Dr. Banerji's communications with Dr. Beeharry were unauthorized, unwarranted, improper, false, misleading, or outside Dr. Banerji's role as a medical consultant to the WCB.
- It alleges that the documents produced by the WCB and his former employer are intentionally incomplete, inaccurate, untruthful, or mal-intended.
- It alleges that Dr. Banerji relied on these inaccurate records, and failed to give any or sufficient weight to other information, documents and records.
- Mr. Arndt deposes that he does "verily believe" that Dr. Banerji "used his position to benefit and protect the employer and the WCB, and later used his position to protect himself and conceal his errors." No particulars are provided.
- Mr. Arndt specifically challenges Dr. Banerji's inference that he did not report his injuries until he was laid off, noting that he had consulted his family doctor, Dr. Beeharry, prior to that, and he specifically denies any "secondary gain factors" were in play. He alleges that Dr. Banerji and the WCB misapplied the WCB policy Cost and Entitlement Adjustments 05-01 Part II (EKE A296) on the effect of deliberate misrepresentations in claims.
- Mr. Arndt challenges the accuracy of Dr. Banerji's reporting of his conversations with Dr. Beeharry, and specifically challenges Dr. Banerji's interpretation of Dr. Beeharry's opinion about Mr. Arndt's injuries.
- Mr. Arndt asserts that Dr. Banerji acted outside his "role as a medical consultant for the WCB", exceeded his authority or mandate, and that he acted with "unwarranted malice".
- The affidavit also challenges many particulars of the interpretations, opinions, and statements of individual employees of the WCB that are found in the documents.
- Mr. Arndt also asserts that Dr. Banerji failed to properly assess and test him, failed to properly diagnose his problems, and failed to properly conclude that they were work-related injuries. This is alleged to have arisen from Dr. Banerji's reliance on inaccurate information on the file, a lack of professional care and skill, and bad faith.
- Mr. Arndt asserts that Dr. Banerji and other employees of the WCB did not properly follow the directions of the Appeals Commission when it directed a reassessment of his carpal tunnel claim. He further asserts that the need for a reassessment caused delay, and was a result of Dr. Banerji's initial inadequate assessment.
- Overall, Mr. Arndt asserts that the WCB and its employees and consultants did not properly diagnose his conditions, did not accurately review the documentation provided, did not conduct the proper tests, and generally failed to come to the correct conclusion with respect to his claim.

As can be seen, this affidavit is partly argumentative, partly engages questions of law, and is largely based on Mr. Arndt's opinions or beliefs on various subjects. He repeatedly deposes that he "takes issue" with various documents, actions, and findings relating to his claim, by which he seems to mean merely that he disagrees with them. Mr. Arndt did not file any expert medical opinions to engage the opinion provided by Dr. Findlay. There was no affidavit from Dr. Beeharry asserting that he had been misquoted, his opinions misinterpreted, or that he was harassed or otherwise intimidated.

2018 ABCA 176 (CanLII)

The Summary Dismissal

[17] The case management judge gave lengthy oral reasons in disposing of the summary dismissal application. After outlining the facts and stating the legal test for summary dismissal, she proceeded to review the issues that had been raised.

[18] The first issue was whether s. 34(4) of the Act applied. This depended on whether it applied to "claims that should have been dealt with outside the WCB regime", and whether it applied to a medical consultant or only to "treating physicians".

[19] Mr. Arndt argued that his employer was not covered by the workers' compensation system, so that the entire Act, including s. 34(4), did not apply. Further, if the Act did not apply to his injuries, then Dr. Banerji was working entirely outside the statute, and s. 34(4) would not apply to him. The case management judge assumed that whether Mr. Arndt's employer was covered by the statute was still undecided, but that in any event the protection of s. 34(4) applied to Dr. Banerji because he was acting at the request of the WCB, and was presumptively working under the auspices of the Act.

[20] The case management judge followed the decision in Milne v Barnes, 2013 ABCA 379, 561 AR 256 (Milne #2), and assumed that s. 34(4) applied to "medical consultants", not just treating physicians. In the alternative, she was prepared to consider Dr. Banerji's reports in assessing his potential liability in negligence.

[21] The protection provided by s. 34(4) is specifically conditional on the absence of malice. The case management judge disregarded the opinion of Dr. Findlay that there was no malice, as that was a topic outside the proper scope of his expert opinion. Even if Dr. Banerji's diagnosis and conclusions were careless or inept, that would not constitute malice. Further, there was no indication on the record that the interactions between Dr. Banerji and Dr. Beeharry demonstrated malice. On the record, malice had not been proven.

[22] The case management judge next considered the claim for misfeasance of public office, which requires a) deliberate unlawful conduct in the exercise of public functions, and b) awareness that the conduct is unlawful and likely to injure the plaintiff. The case management judge found no evidence of unlawful conduct or an intention to harm.

[23] Mr. Arndt argued that Dr. Banerji's conduct was actionable, regardless of whether the contents of his reports were privileged and protected under s. 34(4). He drew a distinction between Dr. Banerji's "report", and Dr. Banerji's activities in assessing Mr. Arndt's injuries. The case management judge agreed that s. 34(4) and Milne #2 meant that Dr. Banerji's report could not be used as evidence in an action for negligence. However, she concluded that the section did not insulate any action or conduct of the physician from suit. Liability, however, would have to be established without reliance on the report.

[24] The case management judge next discussed Mr. Arndt's claim that Dr. Banerji was negligent. Mr. Arndt alleged that Dr. Banerji erred in suggesting there was secondary gain motivating the claim, and that such considerations were outside the scope of his expertise. Further, it was alleged that Dr. Banerji's authority did not extend to discussing the case with Dr. Beeharry, and that Dr. Banerji was not entitled to dispute the existence of the injury, only to determine if it was caused by work related activities.

[25] The case management judge examined the four part test for medical negligence or malpractice: a) the existence of a duty of care, b) a breach of the standard of care, c) the suffering of damage, and d) proof of causation.

[26] The case management judge held that the duty of care owed by a medical consultant is unsettled, but for the purposes of the summary judgment application she assumed a duty of care, recognizing that the duty owed by a medical consultant might be different from that owed by a treating physician.

[27] The standard of care applied to a medical consultant was not the same as that for a treating physician. Whatever the standard of care might be, Mr. Arndt had not produced any expert medical evidence to establish a breach by Dr. Banerji with respect to the allegations that he had failed to reasonably diagnose Mr. Arndt's symptoms. The evidence of Dr. Findlay on this issue was uncontradicted. With respect to the allegations that Dr. Banerji had failed to properly perform his duties under the Workers' Compensation Act, the evidence on the record was inadequate:

- Dr. Findlay's opinion only concluded that Dr. Banerji had reached a reasonable conclusion based on the information available, not whether he had reached the "correct" conclusion.
- No opinion was provided on whether the WCB position paper on Carpal Tunnel Syndrome was reflective of the state of the art, only that Dr. Banerji's diagnosis was consistent with that position. Thus, there was no evidence on whether following the position paper was negligent.
- There was no opinion provided on whether the WCB's procedures met the standard of care.

As a result, there were gaps in the expert evidence and the rest of the record as to whether the standard of care had been met.

[28] The case management judge found that Mr. Arndt had clearly suffered loss or damage, because it was not disputed that he had carpal tunnel syndrome. For the purposes of the summary judgment application, she was prepared to assume that Mr. Arndt would be able to prove that the carpal tunnel syndrome was a work related injury.

[29] On the final issue of causation, there was no evidence that Dr. Banerji's conduct caused, prolonged or worsened Mr. Arndt's medical conditions. Dr. Banerji was not the treating physician, and Dr. Beeharry was free to recommend any medical care that Mr. Arndt needed. There was, however, a potential related source of loss occasioned by the "delay or denial of Mr. Arndt's claim":

> Having said all of this, the remaining argument that is open to a possible finding of actual and legal cause of the loss sustained by Mr. Arndt is that Dr. Banerji, in complying with WCB policies and procedures, including the WCB position papers on carpal tunnel syndrome, had in any event failed in the requisite standard of care in identifying a causal connection between Mr. Arndt's work duties and the injuries that he has sustained. (reasons, p. F22, l. 13-7)

Since there was no expert opinion on whether the WCB's carpal tunnel syndrome paper was "correct", or whether a physician had an obligation to go beyond the WCB policies, a triable issue remained.

[30] One week later, the case management judge supplied supplemental oral reasons. She clarified that the issue that remained open was ". . . whether Dr. Banerji failed to meet the standard of care by not identifying a causal connection between Mr. Arndt's work and the injuries that he sustained" (reasons, p. F31, l. 34-6). This failure might potentially exist whether or not Dr. Banerji was operating within or outside the WCB parameters. As a result, the issue of whether Dr. Banerji was working within or with outside the WCB policy was also a triable issue. With respect to the duty of care, the case management judge clarified that:

> ". . . somebody owes Mr. Arndt a duty of care to ensure that his claim has been reviewed with the level of care, skill and knowledge of an average practitioner in the relevant specialty based on the knowledge and practice of a medical practitioner at the time of the alleged negligence. Who owes that duty is left open to be determined at trial; whether that duty rests with Dr. Banerji or with the WCB . . ." (reasons, p. F32, l. 10-4)

The supplemental reasons accordingly expanded the identified triable issues.

[31] The formal order ultimately signed by the case management judge reads as follows:

> 1. Partial Summary Judgment is granted in favour of the Defendant, Dr. Kunal Banerji MD, and the action against him is hereby dismissed on all issues except the following:

2018 ABCA 176 (CanLII)

2018 ABCA 176 (CanLII)

(a) recognizing one or both of Dr. Banerji and the Workers' Compensation Board ("WCB") owe the Plaintiff such a duty, whether Dr. Banerji owes the Plaintiff a duty of care to ensure the Plaintiff's claim is reviewed with the level of knowledge, competence and skill expected of a similarly qualified practitioner;

(b) whether Dr. Banerji failed to meet that standard of care by not identifying a causal connection between the Plaintiff's work duties and the injuries he sustained, not limited to Dr. Banerji's consideration of this issue within the policies or procedures of the WCB;

(c) whether the Plaintiff suffered an injury or loss not recognized by the WCB;

(d) whether Dr. Banerji's failure to comply with the applicable standard of care was the actual and legal cause of the Plaintiff's loss or injury not recognized by the WCB; and

(e) whether some or all of Dr. Banerji's actions fall outside the scope of subsection 34(4) of the Workers' Compensation Act where there is no malice.

These appeals are from this order.

Issues on Appeal and Standard of Review

[32] In appeal #1701-0158AC Dr. Banerji raises the following issues:

(a) Whether Dr. Banerji's involvement is covered by s. 34(4) of the Act whether or not he was operating "within or outside" the parameters of the WCB.

(b) Whether there is a genuine issue for trial as to whether Dr. Banerji failed to meet the standard of care by not identifying a causal connection between Mr. Arndt's work and the injuries he sustained.

In order to properly analyse the substantive issues it is necessary to confirm the mandate of the Workers' Compensation Board (infra, para. 49). Further, it is necessary to examine the role of medical consultants within that system (infra, para. 73). Threshold issues are the test for summary judgment in a case like this, and the standard of review when appeals are brought from summary judgment decisions.

Summary Judgment

[33] In appeal #1701-0158AC Dr. Banerji argues that the case management judge erred in only summarily dismissing part of Mr. Arndt's claim, and should not have sent any of it to trial. In appeal #1701-0162AC Mr. Arndt argues generally that the case management judge erred in summarily dismissing any parts of the claim. He argues that the correct test for summary judgment was not stated, or alternatively that it was an error in the exercise of discretion to strike parts of the claim. Mr. Arndt alleges misapprehensions of the facts and evidence, and misinterpretation of the law, including the relevant provisions of the Act. He argues that the entire claim should be sent to trial.

[34] In Hryniak v Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7 at para. 28, [2014] 1 SCR 87 the Supreme Court of Canada called for a "shift in culture" with respect to the resolution of litigation. Reliance on the "the conventional trial no longer reflects the modern reality and needs to be re-adjusted" in favour of more proportionate, timely and affordable procedures. Summary judgment procedures should increasingly be used, and the previous habit of routinely referring any contentious matter to trial should end:

> 34 The summary judgment motion is an important tool for enhancing access to justice because it can provide a cheaper, faster alternative to a full trial. With the exception of Quebec, all provinces feature a summary judgment mechanism in their respective rules of civil procedure. Generally, summary judgment is available where there is no genuine issue for trial.

This new approach to the disposition of litigation applies in Alberta: Windsor v Canadian Pacific Railway Ltd., 2014 ABCA 108 at para. 14, 94 Alta LR (5th) 301, 572 AR 317.

[35] In Alberta an action may be summarily dismissed where "there is no merit to a claim or part of it": R. 7.3(1)(b). Summary judgment is an appropriate procedure when the process (a) allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact, (b) allows the judge to apply the law to the facts, and (c) is a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result: Hryniak v Mauldin at para. 49; Windsor v Canadian Pacific Railway at para. 13.

[36] Summary judgment and summary dismissal applications usually fall into one of two categories:

(a) Those where the "merit" of the claim is said to rest on the facts and the evidence. In that sort of case, if the moving party can prove on a balance of probabilities that it has proven the facts needed to support its claim or defence, it is entitled to summary disposition: Stefanyk v Sobeys Capital Incorporated, 2018 ABCA 125 at paras. 14-6.

(b) Those where the "merit" is said to rest on the legal basis for the claim. This type of summary dismissal application proceeds on the assumption either that the plaintiff (i) will be able to prove the facts alleged, or (ii) has proven the relevant facts, but those facts do not support any claim in law.

The analytical approach in these two types of cases, and the standard of review, are subtly different.

[37] The suitability of the summary judgment procedure in the first category of case is often tied back to whether "there is a genuine issue requiring a trial". The test in factually based summary judgment applications is naturally tied back to "issues requiring trial", because trials are designed to find facts. Material disputed facts will often preclude summary judgment. Where none of the material facts are unknown or uncertain, a trial is not called for.

[38] Parties to a summary disposition application are expected to put their "best foot forward", meaning that gaps in the record do not necessarily prevent summary disposition: Canada (Attorney General) v Lameman, 2008 SCC 14 at para. 11, [2008] 1 SCR 372. A summary judgment motion must be decided on the record before the Court, and not by speculation about what evidence may be adduced in the future if the matter is allowed to proceed to trial: Lameman at para. 19.

[39] On the other hand, where the summary dismissal application is based on questions of law, a trial will less frequently be necessary. If the factual basis of the claim is established on the record, or if the plaintiff's claim discloses no merit even if the underlying facts are assumed to be true, summary judgment is generally the appropriate procedure: Lameman at para. 12; Jackson v Canadian National Railway, 2013 ABCA 440 at para. 29, 91 Alta LR (5th) 401, 566 AR 247. There is usually no need for a trial, because as noted trials are for finding facts. There are cases where the legal issues are complex and intertwined with the facts, in which event a trial still may be necessary: Tottrup v Clearwater (Municipal District No. 99), 2006 ABCA 380 at para. 11, 68 Alta LR (4th) 237, 401 AR 88. However, litigation that depends primarily on the applicable law is ideally suited for summary disposition.

[40] This appeal and the underlying litigation fall into the second category of summary disposition applications, those that are primarily based on the law. The argument that is that even assuming the facts alleged by Mr. Arndt are true, the claim he advances has no merit. Where the outcome of the summary dismissal application depends on resolving questions of law, the necessary legal decisions should be made, and the dispute should not simply be kicked down the road. A full trial of this action would consume significant court resources, take a considerable amount of time, and be very expensive for all concerned. This would be contrary to the new culture mandated by Hryniak v Mauldin.

[41] As will be seen, Mr. Arndt's claim is premised on certain assumptions that are wrong in law. Many of the issues discussed in the reasons for decision do not properly arise on this record. They are, simply put, red herrings. This appeal is primarily concerned with the legal assumptions underlying the claim asserted by Mr. Arndt.

[42] Mr. Arndt's claim and his affidavit contain many sweeping allegations of misconduct that are unsupported by any particulars or confirming documentation. They include allegations of untruthful, false or misleading statements, bad faith, ulterior motives, interference with Mr. Arndt's claim, and "malice". Such allegations do not bar summary dismissal of the action unless there is credible evidence to support them: Goodswimmer v Canada (Attorney General), 2017 ABCA 365 at para. 96; Papaschase Indian Band No. 136 v Canada (Attorney General), 2004 ABQB 655 at para. 54, 43 Alta LR (4th) 41, 365 AR 1, affirmed on other grounds by Lameman (SCC). As stated in Ernst v Alberta Energy Regulator, 2017 SCC 1 at para. 57, [2017] 1 SCR 3: "Immunity is easily frustrated where the mere pleading of an allegation of bad faith or punitive conduct in a statement of claim can call into question a decision-maker's conduct". These unproven allegations are insufficient to support Mr. Arndt's appeal.

Standard of Review

[43] The legal test for summary dismissal is subject to review for correctness. Where the summary dismissal application depends on assessment of the facts, the case management judge's assessment of the facts, the application of the law to those facts, and the ultimate determination on whether summary resolution is appropriate are all entitled to deference: Hryniak v Mauldin at paras. 81-4; Amack v AW Holdings Corp., 2015 ABCA 147 at para. 27. While there is a discretionary element to summary disposition, the discretion is not unbridled and it must be exercised in a manner consistent with the underlying principles, having regard to the reasonable expectations of and fairness to both of the parties.

[44] Issues of law are reviewed at the appellate level for correctness. The legal components of the cause of action underlying a summary dismissal application are thus subject to review for correctness; there is no point in having a trial on a claim that does not exist in law, or is otherwise unsustainable. If the chambers judge has made errors of law, or has proceeded on incorrect assumptions about what the law is, no deference is owed. The Court of Appeal must intervene and correct those errors. The core business of the Court of Appeal is to opine on the legal merits of claims.

[45] As a practical matter, the applicable standard of review will therefore depend on the type of summary disposition application under appeal. Where summary judgment was sought under the first category, that is based on the factual merits of the claim, the standard of review will be deferential. The chambers judge's decision to grant summary judgment on the facts will not be interfered with unless it reflects palpable and overriding error. Likewise, a decision to refuse summary judgment, and direct a trial, is a discretionary decision that will not be interfered with unless it is unreasonable.

[46] On the other hand, where summary judgment was sought because the underlying claim had no legal basis, the standard of review is more likely to be correctness. An appeal on this kind of summary disposition application will generally raise issues of law. If the claim has no merit because it lacks a proper legal foundation, a discretionary refusal to grant summary disposition would invite appellate review. As noted, the present appeal falls into this category. If Mr. Arndt's claim has no legal foundation, there it was no principled basis to refuse summary dismissal.

[47] The outcome of summary disposition applications is always going to depend on the record. If the record is inadequate, the chambers judge might not be able to grant summary judgment, and a trial might be necessary. On the other hand, if the record is robust and complete, either summary judgment or summary disposition will be a likely outcome. Likewise, appellate review, and the outcome of appellate review, will depend on the state of the record that was before the chambers judge, and that is brought forward before the Court of Appeal. That being said, there is no reason to think that some types of summary dismissal appeals are more likely to be amenable to appellate review than others. The standard of review is the same, and it must be applied to the record as it actually exists: Lameman at para. 19. Specifically, some of the leading cases involve successful appeals from denial of summary dismissal, confirming that appeals like the present one should be fully adjudicated on the merits: see Lameman and Windsor v Canadian Pacific Railway Ltd.

Summary

[48] In summary, the summary dismissal application underlying this appeal is primarily concerned with questions of law, and the presumptive standard of review is correctness. The basis for the application was that even if the facts alleged by Mr. Arndt were assumed to be true, they do not disclose a claim with merit. Accordingly, there is no reason why the Court cannot fully adjudicate on all of the issues raised.

The Workers' Compensation System

[49] Workers' compensation is a system of compulsory no fault mutual insurance administered by the state. Its features are:

(a) compensation is paid to injured workers without regard to fault;

(b) employers must pay the premiums required to support the system, but in return the insurance component of the scheme insulates them from potentially financially crippling claims;

(c) injured workers enjoy security of payment, independent of the employer's solvency;

(d) the compensation scheme and adjudication of claims is handled by an independent commission, and

(e) compensation is provided to injured workers quickly without court proceedings.

The system is based on what has been described as the "historic trade-off" by which workers lost their cause of action against their employers or fellow employees who were responsible for their injuries, but gained compensation that depends neither on the fault of the injured worker, nor of the employer: Pasiechnyk v Saskatchewan (Workers' Compensation Board), [1997] 2 SCR 890 at paras. 24-7; Downs Construction Ltd. v British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Appeal Tribunal), 2012 BCCA 392 at paras. 23-6, 38 BCLR (5th) 105.

[50] An important feature of workers' compensation schemes is that they are administered by an independent administrative tribunal. That tribunal registers eligible employers, collects premiums from those employers, assesses complaints of workplace injuries, provides compensation for those injuries, and also provides rehabilitative medical services to injured workers. In Alberta that administrative tribunal is the Workers' Compensation Board: Buckley v Entz Estate, 2007 ABCA 7 at para. 26, 71 Alta LR (4th) 25, 401 AR 231. The scope of its mandate is confirmed by the Act:

> 13.1(1) Subject to sections 13.2(11) and 13.4, the Appeals Commission has exclusive jurisdiction to examine, inquire into, hear and determine all matters and questions arising under this Act and the regulations in respect of . . .
> (c) appeals from determinations of the Board under section 21(3), . . .
>
> and the decision of the Appeals Commission on the appeal or other matter is final and conclusive and is not open to question or review in any court. . . .
>
> 17(1) Subject to section 13.1, the Board has exclusive jurisdiction to examine, inquire into, hear and determine all matters and questions arising under this Act or the regulations and the action or decision of the Board on such matters and questions is final and conclusive, and is not open to question or review in any court.
>
> (2) No proceedings by or before the Board shall be restrained by injunction, prohibition or other process or proceedings in any court or are removable by certiorari or otherwise into any court, nor shall any action be maintained or brought against the Board, any employee or officer of the Board or any member of the board of directors in respect of any act or decision done or made in the honest belief that it was within the jurisdiction of the Board. . . .
>
> 21(1) No action lies for the recovery of compensation under this Act and all claims for compensation shall be determined by the Board.
>
> (2) This Act and the regulations apply instead of all rights and causes of action, statutory or otherwise, to which a worker, the worker's legal personal representatives or the worker's dependants are or might become entitled against the employer of the worker by reason of any accident happening to the worker, and no action in respect of that accident lies against the employer.
> (3) Any party to an action may, on notice to the other parties, apply to the Board for determination of whether a worker who is a party to the action is entitled to compensation under this Act and the regulations.

As noted, a key feature of the system is that claims are resolved through the Board's processes, not in court.

[51] The Workers' Compensation Act sets the broad framework of the rights and obligations under the system. The Board sets the overall compensation policy, as in the Board's position paper on Carpal Tunnel Syndrome: Workers' Compensation Act, s. 6(a)(ii); Nabors Canada Ltd. v Alberta (Appeals Commission for Alberta Workers' Compensation), 2010 ABCA 243 at para. 23, 35 Alta LR (5th) 21, 490 AR 121; Denton v British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Appeal Tribunal), 2017 BCCA 403, 4 BCLR (6th) 250. There are internal review and appeal mechanisms, and specifically s. 13.1 empowers the Appeals Commission to review many decisions made under the system. There is a right of appeal under s. 13.4 to the Court of Queen's Bench on a question of law or jurisdiction, and a further right of appeal to the Court of Appeal under s. 13.4(14).

[52] Once the Board makes a decision on compensation, and all appeals are exhausted, issue estoppel applies. In Penner v Niagara (Regional Police Services Board), 2013 SCC 19, [2013] 2 SCR 125 the Court confirmed the principles governing the discretionary application of issue estoppel to administrative proceedings, as previously set out in Danyluk v Ainsworth Technologies Inc., 2001 SCC 44, [2001] 2 SCR 460. As Penner noted at para. 28, issue estoppel is a legal doctrine in support of finality of decisions:

> 28 Relitigation of an issue wastes resources, makes it risky for parties to rely on the results of their prior litigation, unfairly exposes parties to additional costs, raises the spectre of inconsistent adjudicative determinations and, where the initial decision maker is in the administrative law field, may undermine the legislature's intent in setting up the administrative scheme. For these reasons, the law has adopted a number of doctrines to limit relitigation.

Issue estoppel will not be applied when it would result in an injustice, but the discretion to not apply it "must not be exercised so as to, in effect, sanction collateral attack, or to undermine the integrity of the administrative scheme": Penner at para. 31.

[53] Unfairness in applying issue estoppel may arise from unfairness of the prior proceedings, or unfairness in using the decision to preclude the subsequent claim. The second type of unfairness may arise "where there is a significant difference between the purposes, processes or stakes involved in the two proceedings": Penner at para. 42. In these proceedings, the purposes and stakes involved are identical. Mr. Arndt's claim to the Board was to receive that reasonable compensation for his workplace injuries to which he was entitled under the Act, and his civil action substantively seeks the same remedy. Issue estoppel must clearly arise in the circumstances, because allowing the civil action to proceed would "undermine the legislature's intent in setting up the administrative scheme", "sanction collateral attack", and "undermine the integrity of the administrative scheme".

[54] In summary, the system is designed as a "closed system". All issues about coverage under the Act and entitlement to compensation are to be dealt with within the system. One of the premises of the system is that compensation is determined outside court. Attempting to bring an action in the ordinary courts for benefits under the workers' compensation system is not an option. Specifically:

(a) Whether Mr. Arndt's employer was an "employer" under the system is within the exclusive mandate of the Board, and can only be challenged through the review and appeal procedures in the Act: Pasiechnyk at paras. 30-1, 42-3. In this case the Board provided compensation to Mr. Arndt for his bilateral medial and lateral epicondylitis. A finding that Mr. Arndt's employer was covered by the system was implicit in that ruling; unless the employer was covered, no compensation was possible. In any event, any dispute about whether an employer is covered by the system is within the mandate of the Board. It was an error of law for the case management judge to assume this issue might be at play in Mr. Arndt's action.

(b) The Board's policy on how particular injuries, such as carpal tunnel syndrome, should be compensated is within the Board's mandate. It is not open to any injured worker (such as Mr. Arndt), any worker's experts or personal physician, or any court to second guess the Board's position paper on Carpal Tunnel Syndrome. The test is not whether that position paper is "appropriate", "correct", "state of the art", or inapplicable in a particular case. At best the policy could be challenged on the basis that it is "one that no reasonable Board would have enacted": Green v Law Society of Manitoba, 2017 SCC 20 at para. 20, [2017] 1 SCR 360. Any such challenge, however, must prima facie be made through the appeal and review mechanisms in the Act. It is not open to an injured worker to commence an independent civil action for damages second-guessing the policy or the decisions made in applying it: ss. 17, 21; Gill v WorkSafeBC, 2017 BCCA 239, leave to appeal denied April 5, 2018 SCC #37803.

(c) Further, an application of any Board policy to a particular worker is not open to review in a civil action. The case management judge erred in law in assuming that there was an open issue as to whether "Dr. Banerji, in complying with WCB policies and procedures, including the WCB position paper on carpal tunnel syndrome, had in any event failed in the requisite standard of care". The "standard of compensation" available to Mr. Arndt is that provided in the Board's policies, and Mr. Arndt is not entitled to collaterally attack the Board's decisions by asserting a "standard of care" based on a different policy.

(d) Whether any particular injury was caused by workplace factors is also within the mandate of the Board. In this case the Board decided that Mr. Arndt's bilateral medial and lateral epicondylitis did arise in the workplace, but his carpal tunnel syndrome did not. Mr. Arndt is not able to challenge those findings in a separate civil action in court, and it was an error of law for the case management judge to assume that Mr. Arndt might be able to prove, in this action, that his carpal tunnel syndrome was work related: Medicine Hat (City) v Wilson, 2000 ABCA 247 at paras. 30-5, 88, 87 Alta LR (3d) 25, 271 AR 96; Quimado v Aetna Life Insurance Co. (1996), 19 CCEL (2d) 150 at para. 3 (Ont Gen Div).

It follows that many components of Mr. Arndt's claim are an impermissible collateral attack on the decisions of the Board and the entire workers' compensation system.

[55] All sorts of compensation decisions are made on a daily basis within the workers' compensation system by the claims managers. A worker who is dissatisfied with a decision is not without remedies: Medicine Hat (City) v Wilson at paras. 33-4. As noted, there are internal appeal procedures. There is a further right of appeal to the Appeals Commission. There are further appeals to the courts on questions of law or jurisdiction. Commencing an ordinary civil action against the Board for failure to properly assess and compensate an injury is not an available remedy; it is an impermissible collateral attack on the processes and decisions of the Board: Gill v WorkSafeBC.

[56] In this case Mr. Arndt took advantage of some of these appeal procedures. He also applied for judicial review. When his appeals were unsuccessful, or he allowed the appeal periods to run without filing an appeal, he exhausted his remedies. The present action against Dr. Banerji is not maintainable as a matter of law. It follows that all of the issues found to be triable as against Dr. Banerji should have been summarily dismissed.

"Someone Owes a Duty"

[57] The supplemental reasons clarified that there was a finding that "someone owes a duty" to Mr. Arndt. That duty might have been owed by Dr. Banerji, or by the Board, but the trial of the issues was to be held based on that assumption.

[58] It was not unreasonable to assume that Mr. Arndt had a legitimate expectation that his claim would be processed fairly and properly. This assumption does, however, conceal an error of law as the supplemental reasons assume that the duty is a "duty in tort". The Board, as a public institution, clearly owes a duty under the statute to employers, injured workers, and the public generally to administer the workers' compensation regime in a reasonable manner. It is, however, a statutory, public duty, not a duty in tort. Further, if the Board fails to discharge that duty, the remedy is to be found within the appeal and review procedures contemplated by the Act. It is not a "duty in tort remedied by a damage award" that can be enforced through an ordinary civil action: Yuill v Alberta (Workers' Compensation Appeals Commission), 2017 ABQB 523 at para. 33; Goodwin v New Brunswick (Workplace Health, Safety and Compensation Commission), 2015 NBQB 32 at paras. 287-8, 439 NBR (2d) 124.

[59] The law does not recognize any tort such as "negligent administration of a regulatory scheme" or "negligent processing of a claim for statutory benefits". As was said in Ernst v Alberta Energy Regulator at para. 44 (affirming Ernst v Alberta Energy Regulator, 2014 ABCA 285 at para. 17, 580 AR 341, 2 Alta LR (6th) 293):

> 44 No one contests that the Board owes Ms. Ernst no duty of care under the private law of negligence. In negligence law, whether there is a duty of care depends on the existence of foreseeability and proximity, and the absence of countervailing policy considerations: Cooper v. Hobart, 2001 SCC 79, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 537, at para. 30; Hill v. Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police Services Board, 2007 SCC 41, [2007] 3 S.C.R. 129. In the case of public regulators, for reasons of insufficient > proximity or countervailing policy considerations, or both, courts have generally held that these state actors do not owe claimants a duty of care: Cooper; Edwards v. Law Society of Upper Canada, 2001 SCC 80, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 562.

The particular "duty" on a medical consultant, such as Dr. Banerji, is discussed infra, paras. 73ff. However, to the extent that Dr. Banerji's work, opinions, and recommendations were done as part of the Board's process of assessing Mr. Arndt's claims, they too do not generate a "duty in tort": Lowe v Guarantee Co. of North America (2005), 80 OR (3d) 222 at paras. 52-4, 256 DLR (4th) 518 (CA).

[60] As the Supreme Court points out in Ernst at para. 54, tort actions of this type amount to impermissible collateral attacks of the tribunal's decisions:

> 54 Furthermore, allowing Charter damages claims to be brought for the Board's actions and decisions has the potential to distort the appeal and review process. The corollary of immunity is that a judicial or quasi-judicial decision can be challenged only through judicial review or the appeals process: Royer v. Mignault, [1988] R.J.Q. 670 (C.A.), at pp. 673-74. This prevents judicial and quasi-judicial decision-makers from having to justify their decisions beyond the justification disclosed by the record which will be available for appeal or judicial review: Canada (Attorney General) v. Slansky, 2013 FCA 199, [2015] 1 F.C.R. 81, at para. 136, per Mainville J.A., concurring. It is worth remembering that in order not to compromise the decision-maker's impartiality or the finality of his or her decision, the decision-maker has a limited role in an appeal or judicial review proceeding: see, e.g., Ontario (Energy Board) v. Ontario Power Generation Inc., 2015 SCC 44, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 147. However, no such limit can apply to the scope of a quasi-judicial regulatory board's defence against damages claims. Moreover, damages claims against such bodies, whether under the Charter or otherwise, open up new avenues of collateral attack. By protecting judicial and quasi-judicial decision-makers from having to defend their decisions against damages suits, the immunity simultaneously strengthens public confidence in the legal system, preserves impartiality, both in fact and in perception, and closes off routes of collateral attack. See MacKeigan v. Hickman, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 796, at pp. 828-30.

The remedy for a claim for workers' compensation benefits is to be found within the workers' compensation system, not in an action for damages for negligent administration of the system.

[61] Similar issues were raised in the Milne litigation, which was also a claim against doctors who had never examined or met the claimant, but who had provided opinions to the Board based on a review of documentation. The claimant sued them, claiming their reports were negligent or otherwise actionable. In 2008 a Master summarily dismissed the action against these doctors based on conspiracy, dismissed some claims based on the expiry of the limitation period, but concluded there was a triable issue with respect to whether they owed a duty to be fair, and whether they were negligent: Milne v Alberta (Workers' Compensation Board), 2008 ABQB 710, 100 Alta LR (4th)

311 (Milne #1). That decision was never appealed, but after multiple examinations for discovery the doctors brought a second application for summary dismissal, which was ultimately successful based on the privilege established by s. 34(4): Milne #2. The result in Milne #2 clearly undermined the decision in Milne #1. In any event, the reasoning in Milne #1 is inconsistent with Yuill, Goodwin, Ernst and the other modern authorities on the existence of a duty of care in tort. Even if Milne #1 left any legal question open, the proper solution would be to decide that question, not to direct a trial.

Inside or Outside the System

[62] The supplemental reasons left open the issue of whether Dr. Banerji was operating "inside or outside the workers' compensation system". There was said to be a triable issue about the effect this would have on the standard of care, on Dr. Banerji's immunity under s. 34(4), and overall on whether Mr. Arndt's claims for compensation were properly dealt with. This reflects reviewable error.

[63] There were several facets to the "inside or outside" argument. The first one was whether Mr. Arndt's employer was covered by the system. Mr. Arndt appeared to take inconsistent positions on this issue. On the one hand, he argued that his employer was outside the system, and therefore not protected by the immunity from suit that is an integral part of the "historic trade-off" underlying the system. This allowed him to commence a separate action against his employer for his injuries. On the other hand, he argued that the Board had wrongly denied him compensation for his carpal tunnel syndrome, which would depend on his employer being within the system. As previously noted, the Board's acceptance of Mr. Arndt's claim for his bilateral medial and lateral epicondylitis implicitly determined that his employer was covered by the system. Mr. Arndt is not in a position to collaterally attack that decision in any civil court action: Pasiechnyk at para. 42.

[64] The second facet of the "inside or outside" argument was whether Mr. Arndt's carpal tunnel syndrome was a work related injury. The Board decided that it was not, and Mr. Arndt is not able to collaterally attack that decision either. Whether an injury is work related is a core part of the Board's mandate.

[65] The third facet was whether, depending on the answers to the first two facets of the issue, Dr. Banerji was operating inside or outside the workers' compensation system. A consequential issue was whether his conduct therefore fell within s. 34(4). The argument appeared to be that if either a) Mr. Arndt's employer was not within the system, or b) Mr. Arndt's injuries were not work related, then Dr. Banerji had no business making any recommendations about them. Dr. Banerji's mandate was said to be exclusively limited to matters within the workers' compensation system.

[66] The argument is doubly circular:

(a) Firstly, it is that if a medical consultant is retained by the WCB to decide if an injury was work related, and the medical consultant decides that it was not work related, then the medical consultant had no mandate in the first place to examine whether or not the injury was work related.

2018 ABCA 176 (CanLII)

(b) Secondly, it is that if Dr. Banerji was acting outside the system, he is not protected by s. 34(4). However, if Mr. Arndt's claim is not covered by the system, then any opinion given by Dr. Banerji to the Board could not cause him any damage. If Mr. Arndt can sue his own employer for his injuries, what Dr. Banerji said or did can have no effect on that action, and there is nothing for s. 34(4) to protect. On the other hand, if Dr. Banerji concluded that the carpal tunnel syndrome was not work related, that can only have relevance or meaning for a claim that is within the system, and s. 34(4) must apply.

Neither of these arguments identifies or supports any issue that requires a trial of this action.

[67] The third facet of the "inside or outside" argument, if nothing else, is inconsistent with Mr. Arndt's pleading, which expressly alleges that Dr. Banerji was "acting as a medical consultant under the Act ("Medical Consultant") and thus agent for the WCB". Not only is that a binding admission, it is an incontrovertible fact on this record. Dr. Banerji's only involvement with the matter came as a result of this retainer by the WCB, and all of his actions occurred solely within the discharge of that mandate. A consultant who is asked to determine whether a claim is within the workers' compensation system does not somehow take himself out of that system if he concludes that the claim is not covered.

[68] It follows that there was no triable issue as to whether Mr. Arndt's claim was within the system, or whether Dr. Banerji was acting inside or outside the system. The Board decided that Mr. Arndt's employer was covered by the system, but that his carpal tunnel syndrome was not a work related injury. No collateral attack of those conclusions is possible in this action. Further, Dr. Banerji was at all times acting as a medical consultant for the Board, and his liability has to be determined on that basis.

Application of WCB Policies

[69] The second identified triable issue was, in part, whether processing Mr. Arndt's claims "within the policies or procedures of the WCB" breached the standard of care. This issue arose from the comment that there was no evidence on the summary dismissal application demonstrating that the Board's position paper on carpal tunnel syndrome was "correct" or "state of the art". As previously discussed (supra, paras. 52-4), whether a Board policy is inappropriate in general, or inapplicable to a specific injured worker, must be decided within the system. If the Board adopts a policy, and the claims manager applies that policy, that decision is final once any appeal to the Appeals Commission and the court either is waived or is unsuccessful.

[70] Once again, an injured worker who has been denied compensation cannot collaterally attack that decision by commencing a civil tort action claiming that the Board's policy with respect to his type of injury is not "correct" or "state of the art". Unless the policy has been attacked in an appropriate manner, in a timely way, as being one that "no reasonable Board could adopt", the Board is entitled to apply it. Further, any challenge of this type must be to the Board policy itself; if employees and consultants of the Board apply in good faith the policies that are given to them, no civil cause of action exists against them personally.

[71] The order under appeal also identified the following triable issues:

> (c) whether the Plaintiff suffered an injury or loss not recognized by the WCB;
> (d) whether Dr. Banerji's failure to comply with the applicable standard of care was the actual and legal cause of the Plaintiff's loss or injury not recognized by the WCB;

The intended scope of these two issues is not clear. The reference to injuries "not recognized by the WCB" should not be read as meaning that the Board denied that Mr. Arndt had carpal tunnel syndrome. No one disputed that he did, and the two surgeries that he had are compelling evidence of the existence of the underlying condition. What the WCB decided (based on Dr. Banerji's opinions) was that the carpal tunnel syndrome was not work related. As previously noted, a collateral attack of that conclusion in a tort action is not possible.

[72] The reference to injuries "not recognized by the WCB" may be intended as a challenge to the Board's position paper on carpal tunnel syndrome. Alternatively, it may be a suggestion that the Board failed to properly conclude that Mr. Arndt's carpal tunnel syndrome was work related. As discussed, neither a challenge to the underlying policy, nor to the application of that policy to Mr. Arndt's injuries is susceptible to collateral attack in this action.

The Liability of Consultants and Advisors

[73] Decision makers from time to time seek the input and recommendations of persons with special expertise. The expert generally owes a duty to the person retaining him or her to provide that advice in a reasonable (i.e., non-negligent) manner.

[74] Expert advisors generally do not owe any duty to third parties, even those who might be specifically impacted by the advice given: Elliott v Insurance Crime Prevention Bureau, 2005 NSCA 115 at para. 80, 256 DLR (4th) 674. An important reason for not recognizing any duty by an advisor in favour of a third party is that the advisor would be put in a conflict of interest: Elliott v Insurance Crime Prevention Bureau at paras. 90-2. As was said in O'Connor Associates Environmental Inc. v. MEC OP LLC, 2014 ABCA 140 at para. 21, 95 Alta LR (5th) 264, 572 AR 354:

> Those who are retained to give advice must be singularly committed to the person who retained them. They must be free to give full and frank advice to their principal, without being concerned about the impact that their advice would have on others.

Thus, a medical consultant retained by the WCB has an overriding duty to give full and frank advice to the WCB about the injured worker and his injuries. The injured worker can challenge that advice within the WCB system and through the WCB review and appeal processes. The injured worker, however, cannot in the absence of malice sue a medical consultant on the basis that the advice given was "negligent" or "incorrect".

[75] It follows that the injured worker cannot sue the medical consultant based on the scope of his retainer, or the nature of the opinion requested. Here Dr. Banerji was retained to do an assessment of Mr. Arndt's injuries based on a review of documentation only, without actually examining Mr. Arndt. Dr. Banerji did that, and did not represent that his report was based on anything else. It is not open to Mr. Arndt to sue Dr. Banerji at all for providing his advice to the Board, much less on the basis that he should have provided his report on a different basis, i.e. after a physical examination. Likewise, Dr. Banerji cannot be faulted for assessing Mr. Arndt's claims in light of the Board's position paper on carpal tunnel syndrome. Dr. Banerji was not retained to advise if that position paper was "state of the art", or anything else. His assessment of Mr. Arndt's claims within the existing Board policies, as instructed, is not actionable.

[76] "Expert witnesses" are a special type of professional advisor. They are retained to provide an opinion about an issue that is the subject of litigation. Where the expert witness is a physician giving an opinion on an injury, the expert is usually not the treating physician. The duties owed by such an expert witness were set out in White Burgess Langille Inman v Abbott and Haliburton Co., 2015 SCC 23 at para. 32, [2015] 2 SCR 182:

> Underlying the various formulations of the duty [of the expert witness to the court] are three related concepts: impartiality, independence and absence of bias. The expert's opinion must be impartial in the sense that it reflects an objective assessment of the questions at hand. It must be independent in the sense that it is the product of the expert's independent judgment, uninfluenced by who has retained him or her or the outcome of the litigation. It must be unbiased in the sense that it does not unfairly favour one party's position over another.

Medical consultants for the WCB operate in an analogous situation. The proceedings before the WCB can become adversarial, in which case the medical consultants take on the role of expert witnesses.

[77] If an expert witness's opinion is not sufficiently impartial and unbiased, the opinion may be inadmissible as evidence. However, once the expert is qualified to testify and provides the opinion, the expert cannot be sued on the basis that the opinion was "incorrect" or even "negligent". There are repercussions for a faulty expert opinion, but liability in a tort action for damages is not one of them.

[78] A litigant may, in limited circumstances, sue its own expert for negligence: Jones v Kaney, [2011] UKSC 13, [2011] 2 AC 398; Kelly v Lundgard, 2001 ABCA 185, 95 Alta LR (3d) 11, 286 AR 1. The standard of care, however, is nuanced. While the expert has a duty to provide a non-negligent opinion to the litigant, that duty is informed by the expert's obligation to provide an honest, unbiased opinion. The expert cannot be sued just because the litigant "does not like the advice", or because the advice given is not supportive of the litigant's position in the underlying lawsuit.

[79] A suit against the adverse party's expert is generally blocked by the immunity provided to witnesses. The rationales for that common law protection are that immunity is necessary a) to promote the candour and cooperation of expert witnesses, and b) to prevent inappropriate relitigation: Elliott v Insurance Crime Prevention Bureau at paras. 119, 203; Jones v Kaney at paras. 15, 39-41; Meadow v General Medical Council, [2006] EWCA Civ 1390 at para. 14, [2007] QB 462. The immunity was originally intended to protect witnesses from suits in defamation, but it was later extended into a general immunity from suit: Jones v Kaney at paras. 11-2, 72. The objective is to bar actions that are effectively a collateral attack on the original adjudication, and raise a risk of inconsistent verdicts, because the "value or truth of the evidence of a witness would be tried all over again": Jones v Kaney at para. 17.

[80] The exact boundaries of expert witness immunity are at present unclear: see Jones v Kaney and Sansome v Rubens, 2017 NLCA 32. It has been asserted in the following circumstances:

(a) where a claim is alleged to have been settled on improvident terms, or with greater difficulty, because of faulty expert advice:

in an action by the party who retained the expert: Jones v Kaney at paras. 10, 71; Kelly v Lundgard; or

(i) in an action by the party adverse in interest: Sansome v Rubens;

(b) where an opinion was provided, although never actually used in evidence: M.N. v Froberg, 2009 ABQB 145 at para. 49, 11 Alta LR (5th) 117, 468 AR 33; Smith (Next friend of) v Kneier, 2001 ABQB 291, 98 Alta LR (3d) 299, 288 AR 144.

(c) after the issue has been adjudicated, in a suit by a disgruntled, adverse litigant: Elliott v Insurance Crime Prevention Bureau at para. 80; Carnahan v Coates (1990), 47 BCLR (2d) 127, 71 DLR (4th) 464; and

(d) in professional disciplinary proceedings against the expert: Meadow v General Medical Council.

These particular appeals involve a suit against the expert after the adjudication, in this instance an adjudication before an administrative tribunal (the WCB), not an ordinary court. The protection can extend to quasi-judicial administrative proceedings in the right circumstances: McLennon v Furlong, [2001] OJ No 890 (CA).

[81] It is not, generally, permissible for a litigant to sue the other party's expert on the basis that the expert gave that other litigant "negligent advice". Sometimes such actions are commenced for tactical reasons, in the hope that the expert will change or moderate his or her opinion, or be dissuaded from testifying. Actions of that kind are an abuse of process. On other occasions the losing litigant may attempt to sue the expert, after-the-fact, alleging that the litigant only lost because the court or tribunal accepted the expert's opinion. Such actions are not maintainable as a matter of law, because the opposing party's expert does not owe the losing litigant a duty of care in tort.

[82] If the expert's opinion is accepted by the court or tribunal, then any external attack on that opinion amounts to a collateral attack on the decision. On the other hand, if the expert's opinion is rejected by the court or tribunal, then that opinion cannot have caused any damage. If the trial judge rejected that expert's opinion, and relied on a competing expert, or decided without reliance on expert evidence, the only consequence of the rejected expert opinion might potentially be some increased court costs or disbursements. Such increased court costs are dealt with in the very action, and cannot be claimed in a collateral suit for damages: Lowe v Guarantee Co. at paras. 53-4.

[83] It follows that Mr. Arndt's claim against Dr. Banerji for the opinions he provided to the Board is flawed as a matter of law. Dr. Banerji did not owe Mr. Arndt a duty of care in tort. Dr. Banerji's obligation was to provide an honest, unbiased and objective opinion, and that duty was owed to the Board. Any challenge to Dr. Banerji's opinion had to have been made within the workers' compensation system. Once the WCB has adjudicated the claim, and all appeals are exhausted, issue estoppel prevents the re-litigation of the merits of the evidence (including the expert evidence) in a fresh civil action.

[84] Dr. Findlay's opinion on the standard of care that would be applied in a medical malpractice action is irrelevant. This is not a medical malpractice action, and the reasons for decision reflect an error of law in analysing the claim on that basis. Dr. Banerji did not have any duty in tort to properly diagnose Mr. Arndt's injuries or their causes. Since the Board accepted Dr. Banerji's opinion, any challenge of that opinion amounts to a collateral attack on the Board's decision.

[85] As just discussed, expert advisors and consultants, including expert witnesses, are generally immune from suit because they do not owe any duty of care in tort to the opposing litigant. In addition, witnesses enjoy immunity for testimony given in court. Absent a finding of perjury, a witness cannot be sued based on whether their testimony was inaccurate, unreasonable, or rejected by the trial judge. A witness cannot be sued in defamation for things said in court.

[86] Section 34(4) is a specific manifestation of these general common law principles. It provides that a medical opinion given to the WCB ". . . is a privileged communication [and] is not admissible . . . in an action or proceeding against . . ." the expert providing the opinion. It expresses the protective shield as a "privilege", which can be defeated by "malice".

[87] The reasons for decision concluded that s. 34(4) creates a privilege over the physician's report, but does not insulate any action or conduct of the physician from suit. A medical consultant might be liable for the opinion expressed, but that liability would have to be established without reliance on the report. The underlying assumption that s. 34(4) creates an evidentiary privilege is inconsistent with Milne #2 and reflects an error of law.

[88] The privilege referred to in s. 34(4) is not an evidentiary privilege. To illustrate, expert reports prepared for the dominant purpose of litigation are covered by an evidentiary privilege. That includes, for example, medical reports prepared in personal injury litigation. The litigant that commissions such a report can assert evidentiary privilege and suppress the report. However, litigants who commission such reports routinely waive that privilege, and use the reports at trial. If that is to be done, proper notice of the intention to use the expert report must be given under R. 5.35.

[89] That, however, is not what s. 34(4) is about. As stated in Milne #2, the privilege created in the section is a defensive privilege, not an evidentiary privilege. It is more like the defences of "qualified privilege" and "absolute privilege" that exist in the law of defamation. The opinions of a consultant to the WCB are not actionable, including the background actions of the consultant used to develop that opinion: Smith (next friend of) v Kneier, 2001 ABQB 291 at paras. 10-11, 98 Alta LR (3d) 299, 288 AR 144; Lowe v Guarantee Company of North America (2005), 80 OR (3d) 222 at para. 58, 256 DLR (4th) 518 (CA). They are provided to the WCB on a privileged occasion, and the resulting privilege can only be defeated by malice. There is no distinction between the report and the opinion of the consultant, and the section does not merely bar the use of the "report" as evidence. It bars the underlying action. As stated in Milne #2 at para. 4 the privilege "provides a justification for the allegedly actionable act", it does not just block some evidence.

[90] It follows that there is no triable issue in this action with respect to the applicability of s. 34(4). As noted in the next section of these reasons, all of Dr. Banerji's actions took place within his retainer by the WCB. There is no basis for excluding the operation of s. 34(4) based on him "stepping outside his role". Further, there is no legal distinction between what Dr. Banerji did and his reports. It is his entire involvement that is privileged.

[91] In any event, even if Dr. Banerji did not strictly fit within the parameters of s. 34(4), he would still be entitled to the common law protection that is available to a person who gives advice to his principal, and whose opinion becomes evidence in an adversarial proceeding. Since the case management judge specifically found that "malice" had not been proven, no cause of action can be maintained against Dr. Banerji.

Dr. Banerji's Mandate

[92] Dr. Banerji was retained to provide an opinion to the WCB. His mandate and duties arose from that retainer. He was not the treating physician. As discussed, Dr. Banerji's duties were as an expert advisor or consultant, and extended only to providing an honest and unbiased opinion to the WCB.

[93] Mr. Arndt's claim includes a number of allegations about the scope of Dr. Banerji's mandate, none of which demonstrate actionable conduct:

(a) It is asserted that Dr. Banerji was only entitled to opine whether Mr. Arndt's injuries were work related, but he was not entitled to identify other causes, specifically "secondary gain factors". If a WCB medical consultant concludes that an injury is not work related, it is only natural that the consultant might try to identify an alternative source of the injury. Indeed, eliminating other potential sources might be one method of proving that the injuries were work related. A medical consultant is entitled to explore various possible causes of the injury, including whether the claim is motivated by "secondary gain factors".

(b) It is asserted that Dr. Banerji was not entitled to dispute the existence of Mr. Arndt's injuries, only whether they were work related. Firstly, Dr. Banerji never denied that Mr. Arndt had carpal tunnel syndrome. Secondly, a medical consultant is entitled to form an opinion that the worker does not in fact have the injury reported.

(c) It is asserted that Dr. Banerji was not entitled to discuss the case with Dr. Beeharry. Discussing the injured worker's symptoms with the family doctor is not only permissible, it is highly desirable. There is no merit to this assertion.

There is no merit to any of these pleadings, and any claims arising from them were properly summarily dismissed.

Summary on the Claim Against Dr. Banerji

[94] It follows that the first two of the identified triable issues relating specifically to Dr. Banerji also do not arise:

(a) recognizing one or both of Dr. Banerji and the Workers' Compensation Board ("WCB") owe the Plaintiff such a duty, whether Dr. Banerji owes the Plaintiff a duty of care to ensure the Plaintiff's claim is reviewed with the level of knowledge, competence and skill expected of a similarly qualified practitioner;

(b) whether Dr. Banerji failed to meet that standard of care by not identifying a causal connection between the Plaintiff's work duties and the injuries he sustained, not limited to Dr. Banerji's consideration of this issue within the policies or procedures of the WCB;

As noted, any duty owed is not a duty in tort. This is not a medical malpractice action. Dr. Banerji was a medical consultant retained to provide an opinion to the Board. This does not engage the tort standard of care of "knowledge, competence and skill of a medical practitioner". Dr. Banerji was not retained to diagnose or treat Mr. Arndt. Dr. Banerji was not retained to comment on whether the Board's carpal tunnel syndrome policy met some "standard of care", and in any event Mr. Arndt is not able to challenge that policy or decisions made under it in this civil action.

Conclusion

[95] In conclusion, Mr. Arndt submitted a claim for workplace injuries to the Board. The Board assessed those claims, granted some, and denied others. Mr. Arndt exhausted the appeal and review procedures in the statute. Neither the opinion of Dr. Banerji nor the decisions of the Board can be collaterally attacked in an action of this type. Appeal #1701-0158AC is allowed, and the action against Dr. Banerji dismissed. Appeal #1701-0161AC is dismissed. Dr. Banerji is entitled to assessed costs and disbursements of the action against him, including the summary dismissal proceedings, assessed on Column 5. He is also entitled to assessed costs of these two appeals, on the basis that they were an appeal by him and a cross appeal.

Introduction

[96] As a general principle, when a trial judge, or a case management judge on behalf of the trial court, dismisses an application to summarily dismiss a claim, this Court ought to be loathe to second-guess either. An appellate court does not ordinarily assess the merits of claims until the trial court has completed its assessment. Appellate courts are confined to reviewing the assessment of the merits of claims by trial judges. Much of the analysis in the majority reasons is devoted to assessing the merits of the claims of Mr. Arndt which were permitted to go to trial. In my view, our reasons should be limited to assessing whether the case management judge was unreasonable in concluding that the court required more evidence and more fulsome legal argument in order for it to properly assess the plaintiff's claims. The majority's assessment of the merits of the plaintiff's claims may ultimately be found to be correct, but that assessment was done in the absence of evidence, argument and the answers to a number of questions which the case management judge felt needed to be answered with that further evidence and more fulsome legal argument.

[97] When a trial judge, or a case management judge on behalf of the trial court, finds herself in the position of being unable to decide a matter without more evidence and argument, deference ought to be accorded to her decision to seek more evidence and further argument. After all, in order for a trial court to either allow a claim or dismiss a claim, it, not this Court, must be satisfied on a balance of probabilities that the claim is valid or that it has no merit. Absent obvious error, it is the trial judge's conviction which governs. Determining whether a claim has merit is a matter of persuasion based on both law and evidence. If the trial court is not persuaded of the merits of a claim, one way or the other, what is it to do? Certainly not summarily dismiss it. As the U.S. District Court in New York put it in a 1971 case, Chubbs v New York (City of), 324 F Supp 1183 (Dist Ct ED NY 1971), "Since courts are composed of mere mortals they can decide matters only on the basis of probability, never on certainty." But if a trial judge or case management judge is uncertain about the merits (the probability) of a claim or a defence, summary judgment is out of the question.

[98] As Justice Berger of this Court pointed out in another context, the overarching principle governing judicial decision-making is that the judge should decide what justice requires: R v Gashikanyi, 2017 ABCA 194 at para 7. If one's vision of the law is the search for truth and justice, then for an appellate court to cut short that search which the trial court has decided to conduct requires that it be plain and obvious that the search will be futile. Considerations of judicial resources, of proportionality and timely and affordable procedures surely are secondary considerations, particularly where the state is the party seeking to cut the process short.

[99] What this Court might think about the merits of a claim in respect of which the trial court is uncertain is ordinarily of no import until the trial court has ruled on the merits aided by whatever evidence and argument it might seek. In this case, there was no ruling on the merits of the claims of Mr. Arndt which were permitted to proceed for this Court to assess. The case management judge simply declined to dismiss the appellant's claim without further evidence and argument. As this Court stated in IFP Technologies (Canada) Inc. v EnCana Midstream and Marketing, 2017 ABCA 157 at 71, [2017] CarswellAlta 1133, "[r]estrictions on appellate review are not simply matters of polite deference but of jurisdiction." Unless it can be demonstrated to the trial court that a claim is "without merit", this Court's jurisdiction to summarily dismiss claims which have not been litigated and adjudicated upon ought to be limited to cases of obvious error.

[100] When a trial judge has summarily dismissed a claim, as the case management judge did with respect to some of Mr. Arndt's claims, this court can then safely commence to assess the merits of the claim which has been summarily dismissed.[1] But absent plain and obvious error, this Court ought not to be assessing the merits of claims which have not been summarily dismissed.

[101] The so-called modern approach to summary judgment motions is intended to improve access to justice by empowering trial courts to adjudicate more cases through summary judgment motions, not by compelling them to do so when they find they are unable to make the necessary findings of fact without more evidence. The so-called modern approach is likewise not intended to empower appellate courts to decide the merits of claims at first instance. As this Court stated in 776826 Alberta Ltd v Ostrowercha, 2015 ABCA 49 at para 7, 593 AR 391, "appeals from denials of motions for summary judgment will be difficult to establish" [emphasis in original]. Again, in Ostrowercha, which was a case where the chambers judge declined to summarily dismiss a claim, this Court stated at paragraph 7:

> While the culture shift in Canadian law towards using alternative but fair and just methods of adjudication is well established in Alberta, front line judges are entitled to deference on their decisions as to whether summary judgment under Rule 7.3 is a fair and appropriate means for adjudication in a given case: W. P. v Alberta, 2014 ABCA 404 at para 15.

And in Mulholland v Rensonnet, 2018 ABCA 24 at paragraph 3, this Court stated:

> A chambers judge is not required to grant summary judgment where he or she does not feel they can fairly and properly adjudicate the issue before them on the record presented.

[102] As Justice Wakeling of this Court pointed out in his extensive examination of summary judgment in Stoney Tribal Council v Canadian Pacific Railway, 2017 ABCA 432, most, but not all, jurisdictions make the granting of summary judgment discretionary. The Ontario rule which was the subject of the litigation in Hryniak v Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, [2014] 1 SCR 87 employs the phrase "shall grant summary judgment" if there is no genuine issue requiring a trial with respect to a claim.

[1] Ironically, very little analysis of the claims which were summarily dismissed is to be found in either the majority or the dissent reasons, notwithstanding that their dismissal was also appealed. Most of the analysis is directed at the claims which were not summarily dismissed. And therein lies irony.

The Alberta rule provides that the trial court "may" summarily dismiss claims if they have "no merit". There are, of course, other fundamental differences between Ontario summary judgment/summary trial rules and Alberta's. But the point is that the phrase "may grant summary judgment" if a claim has "no merit" in the Alberta rule expressly preserves the discretion.

[103] Hryniak v Mauldin, which articulated the so-called modern approach, was a case involving a group of plaintiff-investors who were granted summary judgment against a defendant promoter. The promoter in Hyrniak had taken the plaintiffs' money and the money disappeared without having been invested. It was not a case of a denial of a summary dismissal application. It was a case where summary judgment was granted in favour of the plaintiffs and therefore the decision was ripe for appellate review. Keeping this distinction in mind, the Supreme Court in Hryniak had this to say about the granting of summary judgment at paragraphs 47 and 49:

> Summary judgment motions must be granted whenever there is no genuine issue requiring a trial …
> There will be no genuine issue requiring a trial when the judge is able to reach a fair and just determination on the merits on a motion for summary judgment. This will be the case when the process (1) allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact, (2) allows the judge to apply the law to the facts, and (3) is a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result.

[104] In the case before us, the case management judge, who was familiar with the litigation, was unable to make the necessary findings of fact and unable to apply the law to the facts without more evidence and argument.

[105] While a party resisting summary dismissal must "put its best foot forward" (Canada (Attorney General) v Lameman, 2008 SCC 14, [2008] 1 SCR 372), many of the facts required to establish the plaintiff's claim in this case appear to be within the sole knowledge of the Workers' Compensation Board (WCB) and may only become evident upon document production, discovery or trial. In such cases, plaintiffs can only provide evidence of facts they are aware of because necessary supporting facts, if they exist at all, are within the defendants' knowledge. The question for the judge hearing the summary dismissal application in such circumstances is whether there is anything to indicate that such evidence might reasonably exist.

[106] In Hryniak, the Supreme Court confirmed the long-held view that, absent an error of law, the decision to grant summary judgment to a plaintiff attracts deference and should not be overturned absent palpable and overriding error. That, of course, has implications for the standard of review to be applied in this case. The standard of review of a refusal to summarily dismiss a claim must be at least as deferential, if not more deferential, than the standard of review of a summary judgment or a summary dismissal of a claim. In a refusal to summarily dismiss a claim, all that has been decided is that the trial court is not yet persuaded of the merit of a claim, one way or the other. The decision is a non-decision except from the perspective of requiring further proceedings. It is not final or dispositive. One might even question why it would be subject to appellate review at all except in cases of obvious error. A trial judge's decision not to summarily dismiss a claim is not the same as summary dismissal of a claim or summary judgment for the plaintiff. In the latter two cases, the ruling is final and dispositive and therefore ripe for appellate review.

[107] The foregoing are essentially my reasons for dissenting in this case. However, since the majority hold that there was obvious error in this case and provide extensive reasons for so doing, it is incumbent upon me to deal with the merits of Mr. Arndt's claim as well. Opining on the merits of a claim which has yet to be litigated, let alone decided, is something I do reluctantly. I do so only for the purpose of suggesting that it is premature to conclude that it is plain and obvious that the plaintiff's claim is without merit, particularly as the law in this area appears not to be completely settled.

[108] For the purposes of deciding the summary dismissal application, the case management judge identified issues raised by the summary judgment application. Some of them she dismissed. That is, on the record before her and presumably only for the purpose of deciding the summary dismissal application, the trial judge found, for example, that there was no evidence of malice on the part of Dr. Banerji. She also found that Dr. Banerji did not act with the express purpose of harming Mr. Arndt. Whether those findings can bind the ultimate trier of fact if convincing evidence to the contrary comes out at trial I leave for another day. Suffice it to say that while eliminating issues prior to trial or the discovery process for the purpose of identifying the real issues between the parties is commendable, the dangers of trying to define or limit the issues to be litigated on the basis of an incomplete record is one of the challenges of case management.

Discussion

A. Duty of Care owed by Dr. Banerji?

[109] One of the issues the case management judge was unable to summarily dismiss was whether the defendant, Dr. Banerji owed Mr. Arndt a duty of care and, if so, what the standard of care might be. Was Dr. Banerji required to ensure that Mr. Arndt's Workers' Compensation claim was reviewed with the level of knowledge, competence and skill expected of a similarly qualified practitioner?

[110] As an aside, when novel duties or standards of care are sought to be established, it is not only open to the applications judge to direct a trial, it may be preferable. As this Court stated in Condominium Corporation No 0321365 v Cuthbert, 2016 ABCA 46 at 35, 612 AR 284:

> While it may be possible to determine in a summary judgment application whether a novel duty of care is owed (particularly when material facts are undisputed), it is often preferable to consider novel claims at trial on a full factual record: Royal Bank v Société Générale (Canada) (2006), 219 OAC 83 at para 51, 31 BLR (4th) 63 (Ont CA). This approach is consistent with Hryniak, Amack and Templanza; that is, a trial may be required when the action involves unsettled legal issues or the applications > judge is not satisfied she can fairly resolve the dispute on the record. The case management judge's decision is entitled to deference.

[111] For the purpose of the summary dismissal application, the case management judge assumed the existence of a duty of care after making brief reference to three decisions with comparable factual matrices (one from a Master of the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench; the other two from Ontario). Those cases are considered in some detail below. That consideration led me to conclude that it was reasonable, based on the case law the case management judge referred to, for her to assume a duty of care for the purpose of the summary dismissal application before her.

[112] The first of the decisions referred to by the case management judge was Milne v Alberta (Workers' Compensation Board), 2008 ABQB 710, 461 AR 117 [Milne No 1], a decision of Master Hanebury. Master Hanebury's decision in Milne No 1 was based on a different record and considered different issues than that of the Court of Queen's Bench in Milne v Alberta (Workers' Compensation Board), 2012 ABQB 302, 541 AR 112 [Milne No 2], summarily dismissing Mr. Milne's claim against medical advisors to the WCB, which was upheld by this court in Milne v Barnes, 2013 ABCA 379, 561 AR 256 [Milne No 2 CA]. Master Hanebury's decision in Milne No 1 apparently was not appealed and her reasons therefor were never subjected to appellate review. In my view, they are instructive on the issue of a potential duty of care owed by a medical advisor to the WCB. The Master relied on Worthman v AssessMed Inc (2006), 80 OR (3d) 249, 265 DLR (4th) 682 (SCDC) and Lowe v Guarantee Co of North America (2005), 80 OR (3d) 222, 256 DLR (4th) 518 (CA), neither of which were referred to us by the parties in this appeal.

[113] The circumstances in Milne No 1 were similar to those here. Master Hanebury considered an application for summary dismissal of Mr. Milne's claims by the two defendant doctors (employed by the WCB). As in this case, the doctors in Milne No 1 provided advice to the WCB with respect to Mr. Milne's WCB claim. Mr. Milne sued the doctors and the WCB seeking damages for a wide-range of claims including negligence, misfeasance, failure to discharge their statutory duties, conspiracy and defamation. One of main issues in the doctors' summary dismissal application was whether the doctors, as independent medical examiners of the WCB, were immune from liability. The doctors argued that they owed no duty of care to Mr. Milne because of that immunity.

[114] In Milne No 1, after reviewing Worthman and Lowe, Master Hanebury made a number of observations. She observed that the law of negligence in this area continues to evolve, and that there was no case on point in Alberta. She also noted that, unlike in Worthman and Lowe, in the case before her there were no actual physical examinations of Mr. Milne by the defendant doctors. She then reflected on the purpose of the WCB as expressed by Alberta courts. She pointed out that, as in the Ontario cases, the legislated scheme was mandatory. She concluded by posing and then responding to the question as to the existence of a duty of care, at paragraph 54:

> Do the professionals utilized or employed pursuant to that legislative scheme owe a duty of care to the injured worker? There is no case law precisely on point and in my view, this question cannot be determined on a summary judgment application. It is a > decision that must be made after a careful analysis of the Anns/Kamloops test and, if necessary, a consideration of important public policy factors. Therefore, this aspect of the claim of Mr. Milne cannot be summarily dismissed.

[115] Master Hanebury was clearly of the view that careful analysis and a consideration of important policy considerations were required before the claim could be dismissed. In dismissing the doctors' summary dismissal application and in concluding that Mr. Milne's claims in negligence, breaches of the duty to be fair and neutral, and defamation should proceed to trial, Master Hanebury found the cases of Lowe and Worthman to be instructive because they too concerned a statutorily mandated insurance scheme that limited the options and remedies open to injured claimants.

[116] Briefly, in Lowe, the plaintiffs were injured in a motor vehicle accident and applied to their insurer for statutory accident benefits. The insurer refused to pay for the rehabilitative devices/treatments recommended by the plaintiffs' treating physicians. Pursuant to a statutory scheme for settling such claims, the plaintiffs were sent to a designated assessment centre for a third party medical and rehabilitation assessment. Under the statutory scheme this assessment was final and binding unless one of the parties chose to dispute it. The assessors who examined the plaintiffs determined that the cost of recommended rehabilitative devices/treatments were not reasonable and not necessary. The plaintiffs brought an action against the two assessors and the assessment centre. The defendants brought an application to strike, and a motions judge struck out their claims on the basis that they disclosed no reasonable cause of action for reasons similar to those given by the majority in this case.

[117] The plaintiffs in Lowe appealed and some of their claims against the assessors, including a claim in bias, were permitted to go forward on the basis that it was not plain and obvious that there was no cause of action for conducting a statutorily-prescribed assessment in a biased manner. In allowing the claims to go forward, the Ontario Court of Appeal also held that it was not plain and obvious that the doctors were protected by the doctrine of witness immunity notwithstanding that the Ontario Legislature had indicated an intention to provide witness immunity by subsequently amending the Ontario Insurance Act, RSO 1990, c I-8, s 268.4 to include an immunity provision for such medical and rehabilitative assessments conducted in good faith. The Ontario provision is not unlike that contained in Alberta's Workers' Compensation Act.

[118] On the issue of whether or not a duty of care was owed, the Ontario Court of Appeal held that on an application to strike a claim, the question is not whether a duty of care will be recognized, but rather whether or not it is plain and obvious that no duty of care can be recognized. If the trial court is unable to discern that it is plain and obvious that no duty of care is owed without further evidence and argument, the trial court's view of the matter is entitled to deference.

[119] On the issue as to whether there was a duty of care owed by the defendants, the Ontario Court of Appeal concluded that it was at least arguable that the relationship between the assessors and the insured persons had both relational and causal proximity. The court posited that even if such relationship was not an analogous category (see Cooper v Hobart, 2001 SCC 79, [2001] 3 SCR 537), it may have constituted a new category in which a duty of care should be established. In order to determine that, a trial was deemed necessary.

[120] Notwithstanding that it allowed the claim to go forward, the Ontario Court of Appeal suggested there may be policy reasons not to recognize the alleged duty of care. The Ontario Court identified three policy reasons that militated against recognizing a duty as to a claim in negligence. First, rejecting the existence of such a duty was thought to encourage neutrality on the part of a decision-maker on the theory that affording immunity for simple negligence to the decision-maker encourages neutrality. Second, the dispute resolution context in which the designated assessment centre's opinion was rendered would provide relief for most, if not all, of any damages that an insured person was likely to suffer as a result of a careless medical assessment. And third, the plaintiffs' losses would have been substantially, if not wholly, recoverable against the insurer. In my view, the latter two policy reasons from Lowe militating against the existence of a duty in negligence may not apply to the instant case.

[121] But with respect to public policy considerations generally, the Ontario Court of Appeal stated that, without evidence, an appellate court should be circumspect in using such public policy concerns to determine that it is plain and obvious that the cause of action could not succeed, citing Hughes v Sunbeam Corp (Canada) Ltd (2002), 61 OR (3d) 433, 219 DLR (4th) 467 (CA). In the case before us, there was no such evidence put before the case management judge.

[122] With respect to witness immunity, the Ontario Court of Appeal in Lowe stated that it was not prepared to conclude that it was plain and obvious that the role of the doctors should be viewed as merely providing expert opinions to the insurer and the insured. The Court stated that because of the consequences arising from their opinions, it might be reasonable to require them to assume responsibility for the accuracy of their opinions and reports.

[123] Lowe may be applicable to the facts of the instant case. It may not be. But until some of the unanswered questions posed by the case management judge are answered and argument made with respect to their significance, it cannot be asserted with certainty that some of the principles enunciated in Lowe are not applicable.

[124] I now turn to Worthman, where the injured plaintiff applied to her auto insurer for certain statutory accident benefits on the basis that she could not perform essential tasks of her employment as a result of injuries she sustained in a motor vehicle accident. Pursuant to a regulation authorizing same, the insurer required that Worthman be examined by a health professional of its choosing. The insurer made an appointment for the plaintiff to be examined. A physician examined the plaintiff and prepared a report for the insurer. The insurer subsequently stopped providing income replacement benefits to Worthman. The matter proceeded to arbitration and the arbitrator determined that the plaintiff was entitled to receive income replacement benefits notwithstanding the doctor's opinion. Subsequent to the conclusion of the arbitration, the plaintiff sued the physician who prepared the report and the company he worked for. She claimed damages for, among other things, bad faith, bias, misrepresentation, and negligence. The doctor and the company for which he performed the examination applied unsuccessfully to have the claim summarily dismissed.

2018 ABCA 176 (CanLII)

[125] In dismissing the appeal of the trial court's decision not to summarily dismiss the respondent's claim, the majority in Worthman relied on Lowe in concluding that the doctor who prepared the report may have owed a duty of care to the plaintiff. All of the plaintiff's claims, including the claim in negligence, were permitted to proceed. The court noted that the allegations were not simply based on the medical-legal report of the doctor, but also related to the role played by the doctor with respect to the manner in which the medical examination was conducted. The majority concluded at paragraph 31:

> [The motion's judge] was correct in holding that "although many of the authorities cited seem to establish the principle that a doctor retained by a third party to examine and report on a person to the third person owes no legal duty to the person other than to avoid injuring her, it may well be that, on the facts of this case, the legal duty owed by the defendants to the plaintiff may have been broader in the context of the mechanism established for the resolution of contested claims for no-fault benefits by the Insurance Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. I.8."

The Ontario Court of Appeal's reasoning was not unlike that of the case management judge in this case.

[126] The court in Worthman also made the following remarks with respect to the plaintiffs' claims and their attendant public policy issues, at paragraph 21:

> [The motion's judge] was…correct in concluding that it would be dangerous for him, on a summary judgment motion, to conclude that the plaintiff's claims are inevitably bound to fail and that, in fact, the plaintiff had demonstrated to him that her claims raise genuine issues for trial. The plaintiff must have a full opportunity to develop her claim so that the trial judge will be in a position to weigh the relevant facts and to consider the public policy issues that are inherent in this proceeding.

[127] On my reading of Lowe, Worthman, and the Master's Milne No 1 decision, there is at least some uncertainty with respect to the existence of a duty of care in relation to the plaintiff's negligence claim against Dr. Banerji, that being a potential duty owed by the WCB's medical consultant to an injured worker under the various legislated schemes for compensating injured workers. And I say this cognizant of contrary authority such as the British Columbia Court of Appeal's recent decision in Gill v WorkSafeBC, 2017 BCCA 239. In my view, deference is owed the case management judge's conclusion that this issue could not be determined summarily.

B. Duty of Care owed by WCB?

[128] Although the question as to the existence of a duty of care owed by the WCB to the plaintiff (important in the plaintiff's broader action against the WCB) is not directly at issue in this particular appeal (this being an appeal of Dr. Banerji's application for summary dismissal), the issue was touched upon by the case management judge in her supplementary oral reasons and addressed by the majority in its reasons. In those supplementary reasons, the case management judge stated:

> …somebody owes Mr. Arndt a duty of care to ensure that his claim had been reviewed with the level of care, skill and knowledge of an average practitioner in the relevant specialty based on the knowledge and practice of a medical practitioner at the time of the alleged negligence. Who owes that duty is left open to be determined at trial; whether that duty rests with Dr. Banerji, or with the WCB[.]

[129] The majority concluded that the WCB does not owe a duty in tort to an injured worker. Rather, they said that the duty owed by the WCB is a public and statutory one, the remedies for which are found solely within the appeal and review procedures in the Workers' Compensation Act, RSA 2000, c W-15.

[130] While this is generally the case and may ultimately be the case here, it is a generalization which is not without exception. When policy considerations otherwise working against the duty are absent, it may not be the case. Where there has been a deprivation of a common law right to sue for damages and the common law right is replaced with a legislative scheme which binds the ultimate decision-maker to adhere to the policies of the party which determines compensation in the first instance (under s. 13(6)(b) of the Alberta Workers' Compensation Act, the Appeals Commission is bound by the Board's policies with respect to the matter under appeal), there may be a duty on that party to have policies which are fairly compensatory and not designed to preclude what would otherwise be appropriate compensation in order to save money, whether that saved money be in the form of industry assessments or the public purse. In such cases, the regulatory body may owe duties which are not owed by other regulatory tribunals who are not administering compensation schemes which are put in place expressly for the purpose of replacing rights of action which would otherwise have been available to injured parties at common law. It is unclear whether the policy considerations identified by the majority are at work in this case until that issue has been litigated, and I am of the view that the chambers judge was correct in being hesitant to endorse an all-encompassing conclusion that the WCB or its assessors owe no duty in tort to an injured worker. The initial determination as to whether a duty of care is owed by the WCB in these circumstances is best left to the trial court.

[131] I note the recent case of Castrillo v Workplace Safety and Insurance Board, 2017 ONCA 121, 136 OR (3d) 654, a proposed class action against the Workplace Safety and Insurance Board, Ontario's version of the WCB. The proposed class of plaintiffs had their non-economic loss benefits reduced by the Board allegedly as a result of the Board's implementation of an internal policy that broadened the interpretation of what was considered to be a pre-existing impairment. The appellant (the proposed representative plaintiff) asserted that the interpretation was improperly made to limit legitimate claims to reduce the cost of claims where there might have been a previous impairment. They sued in negligence among other claims including misfeasance and bad faith. The Board successfully brought an application to strike the statement of claim on the basis that (1) it disclosed no reasonable cause of action and (2) that the court had no jurisdiction over the subject matter.

[132] On appeal, the Ontario Board argued that it owed no duty of care in negligence to individual workers. The Ontario Court of Appeal was not persuaded that the appellant's claim in negligence had no reasonable prospect of success, despite a strongly worded privative clause similar to that found at s.17 of the Alberta Workers' Compensation Act. With respect to duty of care, the court indicated that the Cooper v Hobart test to determine whether a duty of care existed is fact and policy intensive and made in the context of a statute, and that such an analysis was not undertaken by the motions judge or by the parties.

[133] Castrillo, of course, was not simply a case of a complaint about the Board not granting an individual the entitlement to benefits he or she sought. The Ontario Court of Appeal was of the view that such a duty of care would not ordinarily be owed by the Board: Castrillo at para 51; Taylor v Workplace Safety and Insurance Board, 2018 ONCA 108 at para 9. Rather, the claim in Castrillo was brought by a class of plaintiffs and challenged the legality of Board's actions "across a category of benefits" (Castrillo at para 51)—i.e., those relating to persons alleged to have pre-existing conditions. The Ontario Court of Appeal concluded that the proposed plaintiffs were entitled in the circumstances to a proper assessment as to the existence of a duty of care. In the instant case, while we are not dealing with a class action, certain policies (position papers) of the WCB with respect to the assessment of carpal tunnel syndrome were questioned as being something less than state of the art. As in Castrillo, the claimant may have lost his entitlement to WCB coverage as a result of policies which were something less than state of the art. His claim arguably touches on WCB policy "across a category of benefits", which may distinguish his case from others in which a duty of care was held not to arise.

[134] Parallels may be drawn between the Ontario Board's policy of defining pre-existing impairment with the Alberta Board's policies on carpel tunnel syndrome. But the propriety of drawing such parallels ought to be determined by the trial court after hearing relevant evidence and argument. The Castrillo case may ultimately be distinguished because it was a class action lawsuit, but it was not clear to the case management judge why an individual complainant cannot likewise challenge a policy of the Board which causes him to be denied entitlement to compensation for a work-related injury if that policy is not science-based or empirically valid. Section 13.2(6)(b) of the Alberta Workers' Compensation Act appears to preclude such a challenge before the Appeals Commission of the Workers' Compensation Board. The British Columbia Court of Appeal in Lockyer-Kash v Workers' Compensation Board, 2013 BCCA 459 held that such challenges to the British Columbia Board's orders must be brought by judicial review. Clearly the respondent seeks a form of judicial review.

[135] Finally, I am not persuaded by the majority that Ernst v Alberta Energy Regulator, 2017 SCC 1, [2017] 1 SCR 3 is authoritative for the proposition that the WCB cannot be liable for negligently administering a regulatory scheme or negligently processing a claim for statutory benefits. Such immunity from liability is very much dependent upon the nature of the regulatory scheme the specific regulator was administering.

[136] The "historic trade-off" upon which the WCB system is based, as discussed in the reasons of the majority, makes the WCB a much different tribunal that the Alberta Energy Regulator which regulates oil and gas exploration, extraction and production which, but for the regulation, could be conducted without restrictions. The WCB scheme is decidedly different. It extinguishes common law rights and replaces them with what is considered to be a superior system for assessing claims and compensating injured workers. The WCB scheme is thought to be superior because it provides benefits to employers (who are exempt from being sued by the injured worker) and to workers (who are compensated without regard to fault). But injured workers who may have been wrongfully denied coverage by WCB policies and who are otherwise prevented from asserting their previously-held common law rights to sue may not perceive the scheme as benefitting them. For reasons which follow, I am of the view that they may require recourse to the courts in certain limited circumstances.

[137] The existence of internal WCB processes, including the opportunity to appeal to the Appeals Commission to rectify any potential errors made by the Board, supports the majority's conclusion that, generally speaking, no duty of care is owed to individual claimants. However, in cases in which unfair WCB policies affecting a range of possible claimants are being applied, the Appeals Commission does not have the jurisdiction to assess those policies, but is instead bound to decide the workers' appeals on the basis of those policies: section 13(6)(b) of the Workers' Compensation Act. In such cases, there may be no public policy reasons to preclude a finding of a duty of care.

[138] Underlying the issues in this appeal is whether the existence of a Workers' Compensation Appeals Commission, a tribunal assigned with judicial branch functions (making decisions on workers' rights to be compensated for job-related losses) insulates the Workers' Compensation Board from action. In his book, Unjust by Design (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2013), Ron Willis, the first chair of Ontario's Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal (now the Workplace Safety and Insurance Appeals Tribunal) relays the story of his first 10 years (1985-1995) as chair of that tribunal during which time he suggested the Ontario Tribunal was a properly structured judicial tribunal, impartial and independent (relatively free from interference by the executive branch). A new government apparently changed all that. Legislation and certain executive orders limited the Tribunal's independence. Significantly, among the legislative provisions limiting the Tribunal's independence was one ensuring that the Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal was bound by the Board's policies. The Ontario provision binding the Workers' Compensation Appeals Tribunal to the Board's policies is different than section 13(6)(b) of the Alberta Act. But both provisions have the effect of binding the appeals commission or tribunal to policies which may limit a claimant's recovery of compensation to which he might otherwise have been reasonably entitled. Now it may be argued, as the majority does with some justification, that if the statute makes it clear that was the Legislature's intention to bind the Appeals Commission to Board policies, then the only remedy is legislative change. And just such legislative and regulatory changes have been made from time to time which presume that certain disabilities are work-related if suffered by persons in certain specified industries or vocations. But I can do no more than suggest that if a branch of the executive arm of government (the Workers' Compensation Board) restricts the ability of a tribunal exercising a judicial branch function (the Workers' Compensation Appeals Commission) to discharge its function impartially and independently, then a duty of care may be owed to ensure that the restriction does not unfairly prejudice one of the parties to the judicial proceeding (namely, the injured worker). That is, if one party to a lis is given the right to have the lis decided in accordance with its policies, then the policies must permit a fair determination of the matter. A duty may be owed to the other party to insist only on binding policies which ensure that the overall mandate of the compensation scheme is properly discharged in accordance with the legislation and the historic trade off upon which it is based.

[139] And so, like the case management judge, I am not persuaded at this stage of the proceedings that the Workers' Compensation Board necessarily owes no duty of care to ensure that its policies do not unfairly prevent compensation from being awarded to workers for injuries which are work-related, which is one of the Board's core mandates. And since the Workers' Compensation Appeals Commission is legislatively precluded from ensuring that Board policies do not prevent the awarding of appropriate compensation for work-related injuries, there may be a need for the court to determine whether such a duty is owed and whether or not it was discharged in this case. And both determinations require evidence and argument.

C. Standard of Care

[140] With respect to whether a trial is required to determine whether Dr. Banerji failed to meet the standard of care, the order of the case management judge stated as follows:

> (a) recognizing one or both of Dr. Banerji and the [Workers'] Compensation Board ("WCB") owe the Plaintiff such a duty, whether Dr. Banerji owes the Plaintiff a duty of care to ensure the Plaintiff's claim is reviewed with the level of knowledge, competence and skill expected of a similarly qualified practitioner;
> (b) whether Dr. Banerji failed to meet that standard of care by not identifying a causal connection between the Plaintiff's work duties and the injuries he sustained, not limited to Dr. Banerji's consideration of this issue within the policies or procedures of the WCB[.]

[141] In my view, the case management judge's determination that the issue of standard of care required a trial was reasonable. She recognized that the scope of Dr. Banerji's duty of care might be limited by the understanding that the medical consultant is not conducting an examination on the claimant directly, but rather reviewing the medical and related information made available to him to fulfil various tasks assigned to him, including providing a medical opinion and identifying missing information necessary to come to an appropriate opinion.

[142] In the case management judge's view, Dr. Banerji's burden to establish that there was no merit to Mr. Arndt's claim was not discharged because a number of questions about the nature of Dr. Banerji's assessment remained unanswered. For instance, little by way of WCB policy or mandate was provided to the court to make an assessment outside of Dr. Findlay's expert opinion that Dr. Banerji met the standard of care required by the WCB policies. While Dr. Findlay provided his opinion as to whether a similarly qualified medical consultant would have reached the same conclusion as Dr. Banerji, the opinion was reached using a WCB position paper and supplementary background paper on carpal tunnel syndrome as the benchmark. Dr. Findlay did not provide an opinion as to whether the WCB papers were reflective of the state of the art at the time of the assessments. Neither was the case management judge informed as to whether the WCB's medical consultants were at liberty to deviate from the WCB policies. The case management judge pointed to the possibility that the WCB policies might have prevented Dr. Banerji from meeting the standard of care required of him following a trial of the issue.

[143] The case management judge was also alive to the fact that Mr. Arndt had provided little by way of evidence to support his claim. However, she referred to case-law suggesting that want of evidence by the plaintiff is not necessarily fatal to a claim that has been challenged on a summary dismissal application: see, for instance, Sabey v Whidden, 2016 ABQB 487. Ultimately, the case management judge permitted the matter to proceed on the issue of standard of care because she was not satisfied the claim had no merit. "No merit" is the test our Rules of Court prescribe.

D. Applicability of section 34(4) of the Workers Compensation Act

[144] The case management judge assumed, for the purposes of the summary dismissal application, that Dr. Banerji was covered by the protection of section 34(4) of the Workers' Compensation Act as she found no evidence of malice, which would have provided an exception to the provision's application.

[145] The more significant question then becomes the extent to which section 34(4) protects Dr. Banerji from liability for the conduct alleged against him by Mr. Arndt. On this point, the case management judge determined that notwithstanding that a report under s.34(4) could not be used in a negligence action, that provision did not mean that "any action or conduct of the physician [was] therefore protected by virtue of the existence of that report". The case management judge gave examples of situations in which a medical consultant may not be protected. For example, if the medical consultant were to pressure a general practitioner to change his mind or come to a different conclusion, there might be liability. Another example she gave was a situation in which injury was caused to the patient during an examination. The effect she found section 34(4) had in those situations was that a claimant would need to establish his or her claim without reliance on the medical report.

[146] The majority concludes that the underlying assumption in the case management judge's reasons that section 34(4) merely creates an evidentiary privilege reflects an error of law because it is inconsistent with the Court of Appeal decision in Milne No 2 CA.

[147] A few words of background might be said here about this Court's decision in Milne No 2 CA which upheld a lower court decision summarily dismissing Mr. Milne's claim against medical advisors to the WCB (Milne No 2). This summary dismissal application was made subsequent to Master Hanebury's decision in Milne No 1, discussed earlier, and was based on a different record and considered different issues. Master Hanebury's reasoning and the Ontario cases cited therein do not appear to have been considered by either the chambers judge or this Court in Milne No 2. The second summary dismissal application in Milne was based on section 34(4) of the Workers' Compensation Act and made after additional examinations for discovery had been completed. This Court upheld the summary dismissal and found that section 34(4) was a "defensive privilege that provided a justification for the allegedly actionable act" (para 4). The Court found that the doctors' reports were "the very tortious act that [was] alleged", which justified its decision to uphold the chambers judge's decision to grant summary dismissal of the action. The Court noted that the justification provided by section 34(4) was not absolute, it could be defeated by evidence of malice.

[148] In this case, assessing the case management judge's decision in light of the conclusions in Milne No 2 CA may not be as straightforward as suggested by the majority. For example, Dr. Banerji argued in his factum:

> The allegations against the Appellant arose solely as a result of his tasks for the WCB and subsection 34(4) provides justification for his conduct. The Appellant submits that even if he did not draw the correct conclusions, even if the WCB position paper did not reflect the state of the art at the time, or even if he had an obligation to go beyond the WCB's policies to meet a duty of care to the claimant, subsection 34(4) applies to provide him a defensive privilege. [emphasis in original]

Can the existence of a defensive privilege as articulated in Milne No 2 truly extend as far as that asserted by Dr. Banerji? The question remains to be answered and the case management judge did not err in concluding that more evidence and argument would better enable a considered answer to be given. With respect, I do not share the view that, assuming the facts alleged by Mr. Arndt are true (and for which there was some evidence), his claim has no merit.

[149] The majority correctly states in its reasons that section 34(4) is a manifestation of the general common law principles concerning witness immunity. The majority indicates that the opinions of a consultant to the WCB, including the background actions of the consultant used to develop his or her opinion, are simply not actionable. The majority cites, inter alia, Lowe for this proposition. In Lowe, however, on the issue of witness immunity, the Ontario Court of Appeal was not persuaded that witness immunity applied in the circumstances, given that an alleged "independent wrong" had been alleged to have been committed by the defendants. Here, the alleged independent wrongs committed by Dr. Banerji may include Dr. Banerji's failure to properly assess the case of Mr. Arndt's injury pursuant to his professional obligations, notwithstanding that WCB policies may have purported to limit those obligations. As the Ontario Court of Appeal stated in Lowe at paragraph 59:

> Notwithstanding the broad scope of the doctrine of witness immunity, I am not persuaded that it is plain and obvious that it applies in this case. As already noted, the foundation of the appellants' claim is not the potential testimony of the respondents as witnesses nor their actions in collecting or considering material on which they may be called upon to testify. Rather, the appellants rely on the independent wrong occasioned by the respondents' conduct as decision-makers, i.e., the delay in receiving the benefits to which they are otherwise entitled.

[150] Also note that in Worthman (discussed earlier in this judgment), the majority of the court, in allowing the plaintiff's claims to proceed, stated at paragraph 71 that: "if [the plaintiff's] allegations are proven, surely it would be contrary to public policy to cloth the defendants with an absolute privilege or immunity".

[151] In my view, the majority's conclusion that defensive privilege under section 34(4) bars the plaintiff's claims may extend the protection of section 34(4) too far. But that will be up to the trial judge to assess in light of the evidence. Then and, in my view, only then may this Court get an opportunity to opine. The case management judge's conclusion to allow Mr. Ardnt's claim in negligence to proceed despite section 34(4) of the Workers' Compensation Act was reasonable. In short, I do not see any of the issues identified by the case management judge as requiring further evidence and argument as being settled such that one could, without more, conclude that Mr. Arndt's claim against Dr. Banerji was without merit. I would have dismissed Dr. Banerji's appeal. With respect to Mr. Arndt's appeal, I have nothing to say other than the point made earlier in these reasons about the focus of this appeal.

Summary:

The appellant filed a claim challenging the constitutionality of provisions of the Jury Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 242 and Supreme Court Civil Rules providing for civil jury fees. The appellant argued that the provisions are vague, ultra vires the power of Sheriff Services and wrongfully impede access to justice, thereby offending the rule of law and impinging on the court's jurisdiction under s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. After a summary trial, the trial judge dismissed the appellant's claim. The appellant appealed on the basis that the trial judge erred in finding the impugned provisions constitutional. Held: Appeal dismissed. The trial judge did not err in concluding that the provisions are not an unlawful impediment to access to justice. He also did not err in concluding that Sheriff Services acted intra vires the Jury Act when collecting the fees. The provisions are not unconstitutionally vague; a "sum sufficient to pay for the jury and the jury process" meets the requisite standard of precision.

2017 BCCA 324 (CanLII)

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Chief Justice Bauman:

Introduction

[1] The Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia (the "Association") appeals from Chief Justice Hinkson's order pronounced 26 July 2016 following a summary trial, dismissing its constitutional challenge to civil jury fees. The Association seeks to have this Court set aside that order and make the following declarations:

a) s. 17 of the Jury Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 242 (the "Act") and Rule 12-6(3)(b) of the Supreme Court Civil Rules (the "Rules") are unconstitutional and of no force and effect;

b) the sheriff's civil jury fees are ultra vires the Act; and

c) the sheriff's civil jury fees are unconstitutional and of no force and effect.

[2] The Association also seeks an order restraining and enjoining the sheriff from publishing and demanding payment of the civil jury fees. It says the choice between a civil trial by judge alone and a trial by jury is at the core of the court's jurisdiction under s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and is a fundamental part of providing equal rights to access justice.

[3] The Association seeks to build on the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 59 ("TLA, 2014"). In my view, the Association's reach in this regard exceeds its grasp. I would dismiss the appeal.

Facts

[4] The option to try a civil matter before a judge and jury has been available in British Columbia since the Proclamation of Governor James Douglas on 19 November 1858. Since that time, British Columbia has adopted different variants of a user-pay system that requires a litigant wishing to have a civil jury trial to deposit some amount of money with the sheriff. Presently, s. 17 of the Act requires that the party must pay to the sheriff "a sum sufficient to pay for the jury and jury process", and any additional fees prescribed by the Act or the Rules for the expenses of a jury and attendance of the sheriffs. Rule 12-6(3)(b) requires that a party pay to the sheriff "a sum sufficient for the jury and the jury process" at least 45 days before trial. The Association challenges these two provisions.

[5] On 1 July 2013, Sheriff Services issued a notice to the legal profession and public to advise of changes in the process for collecting civil jury fees (the "Deposit Notice"). It replaced an earlier notice that had been effective as of 1 July 2011. The Deposit Notice advised that Sheriff Services requires a deposit of $1500 no less than 45 days prior to the scheduled trial date, and daily deposits, paid in advance, of $800 for days two through ten, $900 for days 11 through 49, and $1200 for days 50 and beyond. According to Staff Sergeant Steven Jervis, the initial deposit amount has been $1500 since 2003. This initial amount reflects an estimate of the fees required to pay for the jury and jury process up to and including the first day of the jury trial. The further deposits are based on daily jury fees and expenses and an estimate of the costs to the sheriff in summoning and empanelling the jury, attending in court, escorting the jury, and related administration duties. At the end of a jury trial, the sheriff provides the party responsible for paying the jury fees with information about the total costs associated with the trial and their breakdown.

[6] The Association is a registered British Columbia non-profit society consisting of lawyers from across the province. Its constitutional mandate includes, among other things, to uphold and defend the rights and freedoms of individuals inherent in a free and democratic society; to seek justice for all; to further the rule of law and administration of civil and criminal justice for the public good; to uphold and preserve the right to trial by jury; and to promote access to justice.

[7] On 2 December 2014, the Association filed a notice of civil claim, challenging the constitutionality of the provisions of the Act and Rules providing for civil jury fees, and seeking an order restraining and enjoining Sheriff Services from demanding payment of the fees. On 26 January 2016, the Association filed a notice of application to have the claim determined by way of summary trial. The Chief Justice heard this application over two days on 11 and 12 April 2016 and rendered his decision on 26 July 2016. He dismissed the Association's claim.

Decision Under Appeal

[8] In his reasons, the Chief Justice dealt first with the issue of standing. The Association sought public interest standing. Applying the three-pronged test from Canada (Attorney General) v. Downtown Eastside Sex Workers United Against Violence Society, 2012 SCC 45 at para. 37, the judge found that a serious justiciable issue had been raised (at para. 16); the Association had a genuine interest in the validity of the civil jury fees (at para. 18); and the proposed suit was the only reasonable and effective way to bring the litigation (at paras. 28-31).

[9] Turning to the substantive issue of the constitutionality of the fees, the Chief Justice laid out the common law and statutory framework surrounding civil juries and the associated fees in British Columbia as compared to other Canadian provinces. He outlined the portions of the Rules and the Supreme Court Family Rules, B.C. Reg. 169/2009 dealing with juries and the circumstances in which a trial by jury is and is not permitted. He then set out the legislative history surrounding jury remuneration and civil jury fees in British Columbia, and the present legislation empowering the Lieutenant Governor in Council (the "LGIC") to make rules governing the conduct of proceedings in British Columbia courts.

[10] The Chief Justice then outlined the background to the present case, which included the Deposit Notice and Staff Sergeant Jervis' evidence regarding the role of civil jury fees in the process and Sheriff Services' requirements for collecting jury fees.

[11] Before the Chief Justice the Association argued that (a) the language of s. 17(1)(a) of the Act and Rule 12-6(3)(b) — namely, a "sum sufficient to pay for the jury and the jury process" — is too vague to meet the requirements of the Charter; (b) the Deposit Notice was ultra vires the power of the sheriffs since the power to make regulations is given to the LGIC, not the sheriffs; and (c) that the legislative scheme wrongfully impedes access to justice, thereby offending the rule of law and the court's s. 96 Constitution Act, 1867 jurisdiction.

[12] The Chief Justice prefaced his discussion of these arguments with the point that there is no unqualified right to trial by jury. He set out a number of appellate authorities from British Columbia and Ontario establishing this to be the case. He refused to draw the inference that the decline in the number of civil jury trials in British Columbia was due to the unaffordability of the jury fees for large numbers of people in the province. However, he accepted the evidence of an economist (Mr. Robert Carson) that outlined the proportion of households likely to be deterred by civil jury fees, and the fact that those households are more likely to include younger or older people living in one- or two-person households, those living in First Nations households, recent immigrants and those living in households in which there is a disabled member (at para. 85). He then addressed the Association's arguments specifically.

[13] On vagueness, the Chief Justice analyzed in detail R. v. Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 606 ("Nova Scotia"). He rejected the invitation of the Attorney General of British Columbia and Director of Sheriff Services (collectively, the "Province") to dismiss the action on the basis that the Association failed to show a deprivation of life, liberty or security of the person so as to engage s. 7 of the Charter. However, he found that the language of "a sum sufficient to pay for the jury and jury process" was sufficiently precise to provide an intelligible standard and an adequate basis for legal debate. It plainly met the standard set out in Nova Scotia.

[14] On vires, the judge found that s. 17 of the Act and Rule 12-6(3) of the Rules are the explicit authority for collecting jury fees. He determined that the fees are intra vires the Act and accepted the Province's argument that the notices issued by the sheriffs were not the source of their authority but merely a means of providing notice to litigants and counsel regarding the anticipated costs.

[15] Finally, the Chief Justice also rejected the argument that the fees infringe a right of access to justice and thereby offend the rule of law and s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. He distinguished this case from TLA, 2014 on the basis that requiring civil court fees was not equivalent to requiring civil jury fees. The former would deprive a litigant of access to the courts if they could not pay them while the latter would not. The judge found that it was not a restriction on access to justice for a litigant who cannot or will not sacrifice reasonable expenses to have his or her case determined by a judge. He held that the Charter does not confer a right to a jury trial in civil matters and nor should ss. 7 and 15 be interpreted as though they do.

Submissions

[16] On appeal, the Association argues that the Chief Justice erred in his conclusions on all three issues that it raised before him. The Province does not challenge the judge's grant of public interest standing, but notes that by consequence, the case below was decided on a limited factual record and in the absence of an actual litigant before the court asserting that they had been deprived of a trial by jury on account of having to pay the required jury fees.

2017 BCCA 324 (CanLII)

[17] During oral submissions, the Association focused it submissions on s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the rule of law, but maintained that the other two grounds of appeal were still important.

a) Infringement of Constitutional Guarantee of Rule of Law and Access to Justice

[18] The Association argues that the Chief Justice erred in finding that the denial of a civil jury trial to persons who desired one and for whom paying jury fees would amount to an undue hardship was justifiable because they could have their cases tried by judge alone. It says his discussion of the absence of a Charter guarantee of a trial by jury in civil cases is a red herring. The judge failed to address the fact that juries are an integral part of "the court" as that concept has been defined in the context of s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. His interpretation treats that section as a staffing provision and allows the government to determine who can have access to one of the two adjudicative modalities protected by the core of s. 96 based on their financial means. The Chief Justice erred by equating access to justice with access to trial by a judge alone. The Association says the provisions interfere with the rule of law and access to justice by depriving the less wealthy and poor of the right of access to juries. They also threaten the independence of the courts. This interference infringes on the court's core jurisdiction. Where a right to a civil jury trial exists, its exercise cannot be conditioned on inequality; its denial must be based on cogent and legitimate reasons.

[19] In oral submissions, the Association encouraged this Court to consider its submissions under the rule of law both as a freestanding principle underlying the Constitution Act, 1867 and as a principle encompassed within superior courts' s. 96 jurisdiction. It said TLA, 2014 can be read as being decided under either of these principled analyses. It also emphasized the notion of fairness in considering the content of the rule of law.

[20] The Province breaks this ground of appeal into two sub-issues: (a) does the core jurisdiction of superior courts under s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 include the right to have a civil claim tried by jury; and (b) is trial by jury a constitutionally protected mode of trial in civil claims? It submits that civil jury trials are not constitutionally protected. The Association has failed to identify the source or nature of the protected constitutional right and instead cites a broad range of principles that do not constitutionally guarantee the right to a civil jury trial. There is no constitutional protection for any particular mode of trial.

[21] In oral submissions, the Province responded to the Association's reliance on fairness concerns by citing portions of the decision in British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49 ("Imperial Tobacco"), which it said established that fairness is not guaranteed either by the principle of judicial independence or the rule of law. Access to the courts means access to a public forum to have one's dispute resolved by an independent and impartial arbiter; it does not guarantee a particular modality of trial for civil claims.

[22] The Province also argues that the Association's proposition would have the effect of undermining rather than promoting access to justice. If accepted, any limitation on the trial process would constitute an impediment to access to justice.

[23] The Province further submits that the Charter does not confer a right to trial by jury in civil cases. Jurisprudence from a number of provincial appellate courts have all recognized that there is no constitutionally protected right to a civil jury in Canada. It notes the Association's references to the discriminatory effects of the fees, but says it has not asserted a s. 15 challenge and, in any event, impecuniosity is not an express or analogous ground under s. 15. The Association's attempt to expand its case on appeal highlights the inadequacy of the factual record below.

[24] In reply, the Association argues, inter alia, that TLA, 2014 is a complete answer to the argument that s. 15 must be argued where there are concerns about discrimination.

b) Vagueness

[25] The Association submits that the Chief Justice erred in not finding unconstitutionally vague the phrase "a sum sufficient to pay for the jury and the jury process". It points to Chief Justice McLachlin's reasons in TLA, 2014 where she found that it was arbitrary to force a litigant to choose how to proceed in the absence of knowing the financial risk. This is precisely what the Act requires here. A litigant does not get a civil jury trial unless it pays an arbitrary amount in advance and agrees to be exposed to further cost if the trial goes longer. This fails to delineate risk, provide fair notice and limit discretion, as the rule of law demands.

[26] The Province submits that vagueness is not a stand-alone ground of constitutional review. It must be raised in the context of an alleged infringement of the right to life, liberty or security of the person. In any event, it says, the impugned provisions of the Act meet the required standard of precision. The standard does not require that all sums payable under statute be known in advance; it is enough if there is an adequate basis for legal debate. "A sum sufficient to pay for the jury and jury process" is a fact-based inquiry that can be determined on an objective basis.

c) Ultra Vires

[27] The Association says the trial judge erred in finding that the impugned jury fees in the Deposit Notice are intra vires. The delegated authority to set the deposit amount is given to the LGIC under s. 34 of the Act, not to the sheriff. And yet the sheriff has and continues to collect jury fees in the amount it has set pursuant to the Deposit Notice and earlier such notices. The LGIC has not expressly sub-delegated its regulation-making power, but that is the effect of it leaving the broad language of the Act for the sheriff to figure out. This renders such fees, as presently collected, ultra vires s. 17 of the Act and Rule 12-6(3) of the Rules.

[28] The Province submits that the Association's focus on the Deposit Notice is misplaced. The notice is provided to the public as a matter of administrative convenience. The authority for collecting jury fees is clearly set out in the Act. Further, the sheriff is not left the discretion to decide the amount charged; the Act requires that the amount charged be the total required to administer the jury process.

Analysis

[29] I turn to deal with the issues raised by the Association on this appeal. I will deal with them on the basis of the degree of reliance placed upon them by the Association.

[30] First, I will discuss the constitutional issue; it lies at the centre of the Association's submissions before us. It reduces to this question: do civil jury fees in British Columbia represent an unlawful impediment to access to justice?

[31] Second, I will address the jurisdictional issue: are the "Sheriff's Civil Jury Fees" otherwise ultra vires the Act?

[32] Finally, I will deal with the vagueness issue: is the phrase "a sum sufficient to pay for the jury and the jury process" in s. 17(1)(a) of the Act unconstitutionally vague?

1. An Unlawful Impediment to Access?

[33] There are at least two aspects to the constitutional issue. The first involves the Charter and the question of whether it protects the citizen's access to a civil jury at least to the extent of prohibiting civil jury fees as currently set in British Columbia.

[34] The second aspect involves s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867: do civil jury fees as currently set in British Columbia unlawfully infringe on the core jurisdiction of the superior courts by denying some people access to those courts?

[35] Arguably there is a third aspect; it was mooted before us in oral argument: is there some form of constitutional protection against what we might conclude is an "unfair" law? Here the Association began its written submissions so:

> This appeal is about whether the provincial government may give wealthy persons who pay the fees it sets a choice of how a civil case may be tried – > judge-alone or jury trial – and deny that choice to those who cannot afford what the government demands.

[36] The Association has not invoked s. 15 of the Charter so that is not in play before the court. Rather, this aspect of the issue rests on some notion of a stand-alone doctrine of fairness in legislative initiatives. The Legislative Assembly is constrained by the Charter, the division of powers as broadly set out in the Constitution Act, 1867, and an abstract duty to do what is right, just and fair for its citizens.

[37] Chief Justice Hinkson dealt with the Charter issue below. He cited and adopted the view in Ontario set out in Legroulx v. Pitre, 2009 ONCA 760 at para. 5, leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused [2010] S.C.C.A. No. 34: the Charter does not confer a right to a jury trial in civil matters and ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter should not be interpreted to confer such a right (at para. 80). I do not understand the Association to take issue with this particular conclusion: it rather says that a focus on the Charter misses the thrust of its argument. In its factum, the Association asserts:

> The Charter line of thought emphasized by the Trial Judge is, with respect, a red herring. Given that juries are part of the court, the fact that there may be no Charter guarantee of a right to choose jury trials in civil matters does not answer the question whether the impugned provisions infringe or impinge upon the court's core jurisdiction. [TLA, 2014] did not rely upon the Charter to come to its result. Neither does [Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3] or many other cases where interference by the legislative and executive branches of government with the judicial branch is in question. While attaching the rights of a litigant to a Charter guarantee, as in criminal cases, provides additional support for arguing against such interference, it is not a sine qua non.

[38] In my view, the Chief Justice was correct in adopting Legroulx as the law in this province. In particular, I adopt this statement from the Ontario Court of Appeal's endorsement in that case:

> [3] The Charter confers a right to a jury trial only in certain criminal matters. The Charter does not confer a right to a jury trial in civil matters and we see no merit in the submission that ss. 7 and 15 should be interpreted to confer such a right. In our view, the appellants' claim that their ss. 7 and 15 rights have been denied exceeds by a very significant margin the reach of both the letter and the spirit of those Charter provisions.

[39] This brings us to the critical aspect of the Association's constitutional submission: the s. 96 issue.

[40] The Association complains that Chief Justice Hinkson missed their s. 96 point by focussing on the Charter. I disagree. The Chief Justice, in most efficient reasons on this aspect, noted the Association's assertion that civil jury fees infringe a right of access to justice and thereby offend the rule of law and s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (at para. 110).

[41] The Chief Justice cited amongst others TLA, 2014 and British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Christie, 2007 SCC 21 ("Christie").

[42] Chief Justice Hinkson found that the existence of civil jury fees is not a "restriction on access to justice". This was said in the face of his finding that "a litigant who cannot or will not sacrifice reasonable expenses has his or her case determined by a judge" (para. 116). Accordingly, these fees do not "infringe the right of access to justice and do not offend the rule of law or s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867" (at para. 117).

[43] Again, in my view, the Chief Justice was correct. I will develop the argument in somewhat more detail but essentially the answer to the s. 96 aspect in respect of civil jury fees largely lies in the court's reasons in TLA, 2014.

[44] Before I turn to that case I would note the historical record on the imposition of various restrictions on the freedom to choose a trial by civil jury. These include restrictions imposed in British Columbia and across Canada. That background is fully set out in Chief Justice Hinkson's reasons (at paras. 32-74) and no issue is taken with it on appeal. I will not repeat it. It is sufficient to note the trial judge's conclusion in Legroulx in the face of a similar record in Ontario (2008 CarswellOnt 664 at para. 39 (S.C.J.)):

> …access to a jury in a civil trial has been amended and limited many times and in many ways.

[45] In the face of the many limitations on access to a civil jury in any particular case, TLA, 2014 instructs us to ask the critical question: do civil jury fees infringe the core jurisdiction of the superior courts and thereby contravene s. 96?

[46] I will concentrate on the majority's reasons in TLA, 2014 as set out in the judgment of Chief Justice McLachlin.

[47] In the Chief Justice's view, s. 96 is of course much more than a mere staffing provision, it protects the core jurisdiction of the superior courts (at para. 2). While the provinces enjoy authority over the administration of justice under s. 92(14) and that authority is a wide one, "it must be exercised harmoniously with the core jurisdiction of provincial superior courts protected by s. 96" (para. 17). Just what lies at the "core jurisdiction" of the superior courts is a nice question, but it has never been definitively answered.

[48] However, we do have some guidance in the cases. The jurisdiction of the superior courts to judicially review the exercise of jurisdiction by inferior tribunals certainly lies within the "core jurisdiction" protected by s. 96: Crevier v. Attorney General (Québec), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 220 and TLA, 2014 at para. 33.

[49] According to Chief Justice McLachlin's view, laws denying access to the powers traditionally exercised by superior courts is the theme of much of the jurisprudence on s. 96 violations (para. 33).

[50] The Chief Justice reiterated Chief Justice Lamer's view in MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725, that Crevier "establishes… that powers which are 'hallmarks of superior courts' cannot be removed from those courts" (para. 34). Among the "hallmarks of superior courts" is the essence of what the courts do – decide cases (para. 32):

> The historic task of the superior courts is to resolve disputes between individuals and decide questions of private and public law. Measures that prevent people from coming to the courts to have those issues resolved are at odds with this basic judicial function. The resolution of these disputes and resulting determination of issues of private and public law, viewed in the institutional context of the Canadian justice system, are central to what the > superior courts do. Indeed, it is their very book of business. To prevent this business being done strikes at the core of the jurisdiction of the superior courts protected by s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. As a result, hearing fees that deny people access to the courts infringe the core jurisdiction of the superior courts.

[51] What the hearing fees in TLA, 2014 did was to actually bar access to the superior courts, access to the constitutionally protected dispute resolution tribunals they represent. And they did so by imposing fees "that prevent some individuals from having their private and public law disputes resolved by the courts of superior jurisdiction" (para. 35). There is no doubt that the province has jurisdiction to levy hearing fees under s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867, but the power is not unlimited (paras. 23 and 24). It is a matter of striking the proper balance, drawing the appropriate line. Where that line is was described was Chief Justice McLachlin so (para. 36):

> It follows that the province's power to impose hearing fees cannot deny people the right to have their disputes resolved in the superior courts. To do so would be to impermissibly impinge on s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Rather, the province's powers under s. 92(14) must be exercised in a manner that is consistent with the right of individuals to bring their cases to the superior courts and have them resolved there.

[52] This is not a case of the province purporting to transfer an aspect of the core jurisdiction of the superior courts to another decision-making body. To succeed here, in my view, the Association must show that the jury fees at issue bar access to the courts; that these fees prevent some individuals from having their disputes resolved by the court.

[53] In my view, the Association has failed to demonstrate an interference with access to the courts of the significant degree contemplated by TLA, 2014. As the court in Christie said, s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867 "implies the power of the province to impose at least some conditions on how and when people have a right of access to the courts" (Christie at para. 17). The jury fees here fall into this category of regulation.

[54] In aid of its submission that the "right" to a civil jury trial lies at the heart of the superior court's jurisdiction, the Association cites a number of decisions underlining the importance of the jury in our common law traditions. These include King v. Colonial Homes Ltd., [1956] S.C.R. 528 (S.C.C.); R. v. Burke, 2002 SCC 55; R. v. White, 2011 SCC 13; R. v. Spence, 2005 SCC 71; and R. v. Bain, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 91 (S.C.C.).

[55] More broadly, in a recent decision from the Supreme Court for the United Kingdom, Lord Reed set out the importance of access to justice to the rule of law, and, in turn, the fundamental importance of the rule of law to a democratic society: Unison, R. (on the application of) v. Lord Chancellor, [2017] UKSC 51 at paras. 66-78. In doing so, he acknowledged the long tradition of the common law guarantee of access to the courts (at para. 74):

> In English law, the right of access to the courts has long been recognised. The central idea is expressed in chapter 40 of the Magna Carta of 1215 ("Nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus aut differemus rectum aut justiciam"), which remains on the statute book in the closing words of chapter 29 of the version issued by Edward I in 1297:
> > "We will sell to no man, we will not deny or defer to any man either Justice or Right."
> Those words are not a prohibition on the charging of court fees, but they are a guarantee of access to courts which administer justice promptly and fairly.

[56] The proposition that access to the courts is fundamental and constitutionally protected is undisputed. But none of these cases assist in establishing what the Association must: that a right to a civil jury lies within the core jurisdiction protected by s. 96. The Association is pressed to make the essential submission that because a jury is the court, a right to that modality of trial must lie within the core jurisdiction of the superior courts. It is true that when a jury sits in trial, it is the finder of fact and the judge is the master of the law. In this sense "the jury is the court". But it does not follow that when a jury is not part of the trial process, the court is anything less than "the court". It is just that: a forum within which citizens may have their disputes heard and resolved. Access to the court remains notwithstanding the inability of some to fund a jury to hear their case. In my view, the Association cannot prevail on this aspect of the constitutional question.

[57] I turn to the "fairness" point, what I take to be a third aspect of the Association's constitutional argument. It is essentially raised in the Association's over-arching submission that the jury fees in issue give "wealthy persons… a choice of how a civil case may be tried – judge-alone or jury trial – and deny that choice to those who cannot afford what the government demands". As I said above, this submission prompted the Province to cite and rely upon Imperial Tobacco. There, the court considered the constitutionality of British Columbia's Tobacco Damages and Healthcare Costs Recovery Act, S.B.C. 2000, c. 30. Justice Major, for the court, was considering the argument that this Act impermissibly interfered with judicial independence. At para. 54 he stated:

> None of this is to say that legislation, being law, can never unconstitutionally interfere with courts' adjudicative role. But more is required than an allegation that the content of the legislation required to be applied by that adjudicative role is irrational or unfair, or prescribes rules different from those developed at common law. The legislation must interfere, or be reasonably seen to interfere, with the courts' adjudicative role, or with the essential conditions of judicial independence. As McLachlin C.J. stated in Babcock, at para. 57:
> > It is well within the power of the legislature to enact laws, even laws which some would consider draconian, as long as it does not fundamentally alter or interfere with the relationship between the courts and the other branches of government.

[58] At paras. 63 and 64, in the course of discussing the appellants' arguments on the rule of law, Justice Major continued:

> The appellants' conceptions of the rule of law can fairly be said to fall at one extreme of the spectrum of possible conceptions and to support Strayer J.A.'s thesis. They submit that the rule of law requires that legislation: (1) be prospective; (2) be general in character; (3) not confer special privileges on the government, except where necessary for effective governance; and (4) ensure a fair civil trial. And they argue that the Act breaches each of these requirements, rendering it invalid.
>
> A brief review of this Court's jurisprudence will reveal that none of these requirements enjoy constitutional protection in Canada. But before embarking on that review, it should be said that acknowledging the constitutional force of anything resembling the appellants' conceptions of the rule of law would seriously undermine the legitimacy of judicial review of legislation for constitutionality. That is so for two separate but interrelated reasons.

[59] Justice Major went on to explain these two reasons: first, that the appellants' proposed requirements of the rule of law were simply broader versions of Charter rights; and, second, that other constitutional principles strongly favour upholding legislation that conforms to the terms of the written Constitution (at paras. 65-66). He concluded (at para. 66):

> Put differently, the appellants' arguments fail to recognize that in a constitutional democracy such as ours, protection from legislation that some might view as unjust or unfair properly lies not in the amorphous underlying principles of our Constitution, but in its text and the ballot box. See Bacon v. Saskatchewan Crop Insurance Corp. (1999), 180 Sask. R. 20 (C.A.), at para. 30; Elliot, at pp. 141-42; Hogg and Zwibel, at p. 718; and Newman, at p. 187.

[60] In my view, this riposte answers the Association's "fairness" argument.

2. Vires

[61] It is not clear what the thrust of the Association's argument here is. In my view, the ultra vires submission is largely answered by the reasoning I have offered under the constitutional head.

[62] The Association under this head of argument also appears to argue that the Deposit Notice represents an improper delegation by the LGIC to the sheriff to set the deposit amount. I disagree that there has been any improper delegation. Regardless of the manner in which the LGIC chooses to administer the Act, the source of legal authority remains s. 17 of the Act. That provision directly references payment of the required sum "to the sheriff". Section 19 directs the sheriff to pay jurors out of deposited funds, and to notify the judge where there is a deficiency. Jurors' fees are prescribed by regulation. What is clear from the Act is that the sheriff is directed to collect the fees. The amount of fees remains the "sum sufficient". In issuing the Deposit Notice, Sheriff Services is merely attempting to provide an estimate of that amount as a matter of administrative assistance to litigants. The source of authority remains the Act such that, in collecting the fees, the sheriff is acting intra vires the Act.

[63] It follows that I agree with Chief Justice Hinkson's conclusion on this issue set out at paras. 107 and 108 of his reasons.

3. Vagueness

[64] At para. 93 of its factum the Association argues:

> The Trial Judge erred in not finding unconstitutionally vague the phrase "a sum sufficient to pay for the jury and the jury process" in s. 17(1)(a) of the Jury Act. His findings in paras. 107-108 are inconsistent with his legal conclusion. There, he held that the sum would "differ from case to case and from jury to jury," and that "the actual amounts required for a specific jury for a specific case can only be determined once the case has been heard…" Whatever the sum might turn out to be is neither clear, nor a sum certain.

[65] The Province argues that vagueness is not a stand-alone ground on which to challenge legislation but must be raised in the context of an alleged Charter infringement.

[66] I need not discuss this issue as, in my view, the "sum sufficient" language set out in s. 17 of the Act meets the required standard of precision set out in Nova Scotia. In that case Justice Gonthier described an unconstitutionally vague provision as follows (at 639-640):

> A vague provision does not provide an adequate basis for legal debate, that is, for reaching a conclusion as to its meaning by reasoned analysis applying legal criteria. It does not sufficiently delineate any area of risk, and thus can provide neither fair notice to the citizen nor a limitation of enforcement discretion. Such a provision is not intelligible, to use the terminology of previous decisions of this Court, and therefore it fails to give sufficient indications that could fuel a legal debate. It offers no grasp to the judiciary. This is an exacting standard, going beyond semantics. The term "legal debate" is used here not to express a new standard or one departing from that previously outlined by this Court. It is rather intended to reflect and encompass the same standard and criteria of fair notice and limitation of enforcement discretion viewed in the fuller context of an analysis of the quality and limits of human knowledge and understanding in the operation of the law.

[67] I conclude that "a sum sufficient to pay for the jury and the jury process" and any additional prescribed fees meets this standard. As the Province points out, the sum sufficient to pay for the jury and jury process is readily determinable through objective evidence as to the costs of administering the process and amounts paid to the jury. Sergeant Jervis' evidence establishes that any amounts a litigant pays over and above the actual expenses incurred are held in trust and returned at the conclusion of trial. To the extent a litigant challenges the amount charged, he or she can make that argument and demand that the Province provide evidence substantiating those charges. While a litigant may not know the precise amount he or she must pay at the outset, his or her lawyer or, in the case of a self-represented litigant, the judge, will be able to give the litigant some idea of how long the trial will likely take and therefore, the amount of money he or she will be liable to pay.

[68] This illustrates that the standard provides fair notice to citizens — the amount required to administer the process — and imposes real limitations on the discretion of those charged with enforcement (Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, 2002 SCC 1 at para. 81) — namely, whether the evidence substantiates that the amount charged is consistent with the actual expenses incurred.

[69] The threshold for vagueness is relatively high (Nova Scotia at 632; R. v. Levkovic, 2010 ONCA 830 at para. 93). A provision is unconstitutionally vague where it sets a standard that is not intelligible, that cannot provide the basis for coherent judicial interpretation, and that is not capable of guiding legal debate (Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth & the Law v. Canada Attorney General), 2004 SCC 4 at paras. 15-17). What is required is that a court examining the provision can give sensible meaning to its terms (Reference re ss. 193 & 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Canada), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1123 (S.C.C.) at 1160). Both the government agent enforcing its terms and the person who is subject to those terms must be able to determine whether the fees in question are permissible or not under the Act and the Rules (Mussani v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario (2004), 248 D.L.R. (4th) 632 at para. 63). In my view, the impugned provisions meet this standard.

2017 BCCA 324 (CanLII)

Conclusion

[70] In the circumstances, I would not give effect to the Association's alleged errors in the judgment from the Supreme Court and I would dismiss the appeal therefrom.

I. THE ISSUES

[1] The defendants Magicuts Inc. (Magicuts), Christopher R. Cawston (Mr. Cawston) and Brian A. Luborsky (Mr. Luborsky) (together, the defendants) are appealing a judgment from the Court of Queen's Bench (as it then was) in which the trial judge found that they had intentionally harmed the plaintiff, Ultracuts Franchises Incorporated (Ultracuts), by means of an unlawful act (civil fraud) against a third party, Wal-Mart Canada Inc. (Wal-Mart), by deceiving Wal-Mart regarding assurances that Wal-Mart had given to Magicuts, thereby committing the tort of unlawful interference with economic interests (unlawful means) (see para 37 herein). He awarded damages of $34,575,000 and costs to Ultracuts.

[2] The defendants argue that the trial judge committed a number of errors:

(i) regarding the tort of unlawful means, by failing to find, or even consider, whether Magicuts intended to harm Ultracuts;

(ii) regarding the tort of civil fraud, by failing to consider whether the impugned statements were statements of fact, as opposed to statements of position, opinion or future intentions of a third party;

(iii) regarding the tort of civil fraud, by failing to consider whether Wal-Mart relied on the alleged misrepresentations;

(iv) by finding that Mr. Cawston and Mr. Luborsky, who were directors and corporate officers of Magicuts, were personally liable without any substantive legal analysis of the basis for personal liability;

(v) by finding that Ultracuts had satisfied its obligation to mitigate damages, notwithstanding that it unreasonably rejected Wal-Mart's offers;

(vi) by determining damages based on incorrect considerations; and

(vii) by failing to render an independent and impartial decision due to verbatim copying of key findings and analysis from an earlier decision issued by another judge in an uncontested motion against Magicuts, where that judge said that that decision would not affect this case.

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

[3] In my view, the trial judge erred as set out in grounds (ii) and (iii), and it is not necessary to determine the other grounds. I would grant the appeal and dismiss Ultracuts' claim against the defendants. (Note: the citations for the academic authorities referred to herein are set out in the appendix to these reasons.)

II. BACKGROUND

[4] Ultracuts and Magicuts are competitors in the hair salon business. Each operated a chain of hair salons in Canada in 1994 and continues to do so.

[5] Mr. Cawston and Mr. Luborsky were officers of Magicuts at the relevant times, Mr. Cawston being the president and in charge of Canadian operations and Mr. Luborsky being the chief executive officer (CEO) and in charge of operations in the United States. Further, each was a director of Magicuts and indirectly held shares in it. Meril Rivard (Mr. Rivard) was, throughout the relevant period, the owner of Ultracuts.

[6] This claim is one in a series of claims that began in 1994, when Wal-Mart announced its agreement with Woolworth Canada Inc. to buy out 120 of the Woolco department stores throughout Canada (the Woolco stores), with plans to convert them to Wal-Mart stores. At that time, Magicuts operated 170 hair salons across Canada, 59 of which were located in Woolco stores. Of those, 45 were owned by franchisees and 14 were owned by Magicuts (together, the hair salons). When he learned of the announcement, Mr. Cawston began contacting members of the Wal-Mart transition team to determine how the sale would affect the Magicuts hair salons located in Woolco stores.

[7] Wal-Mart was of the view that it did not have enough space for the hair salons in the Woolco stores, so on March 22, 1994, Woolco notified Magicuts that it was terminating the licence agreements for the hair salons, and most hair salons were given a notice to vacate the Woolco stores within 30 days, that is, by April 21, 1994. The franchisees threatened legal action against Woolco, Wal-Mart and Magicuts.

[8] Mr. Cawston eventually arranged a meeting with Melvin Redman (Mr. Redman), Wal-Mart's senior vice president in charge of the Woolco transition, to discuss the effect of the sale on the hair salons and the threatened legal action by the franchisees. Of particular concern to Magicuts was the effect of the closures on its franchisees.

[9] There were three meetings between Messrs Cawston and Redman on April 12, 1994, May 13, 1994 and May 24, 1994 (the Redman meetings). The first meeting included a Woolco representative, while the others included other Magicuts representatives.

[10] During those meetings, Mr. Redman maintained that the Magicuts hair salons would have to be closed, but he gave Mr. Cawston certain assurances regarding future opportunities to open Magicuts hair salons in existing or new stores, should there be any opportunities (the Redman agreement). It is uncontested that Mr. Redman refused to put any assurances in writing, but he said that "Wal-Mart's words [were] its bond" and he shook hands with Mr. Cawston.

[11] The franchisees and Magicuts filed a class action lawsuit against Woolworth on March 14, 1995, but did not include Wal-Mart as a defendant. Mr. Redman left Wal-Mart in June 1995.

[12] Some time after the Woolco purchase was completed, Wal-Mart determined that it would put hair salons into some of its stores, and it entered into agreements with Magicuts to open hair salons in a number of stores in Eastern Canada, which were opened during the fall of 1994 and through 1995.

[13] In August 1995, Ultracuts, through a real estate broker, began discussions with Brad Messer (Mr. Messer), the international property manager with Wal-Mart, to open hair salons in some of Wal-Mart's stores in Western Canada, which led to it opening hair salons in Wal-Mart stores in Winnipeg and Calgary in late 1995. Some of these locations were former Woolco stores in which there had been franchise Magicuts hair salons.

[14] In October 1995, Magicuts became aware that Ultracuts was negotiating with Wal-Mart, and Mr. Cawston called Mr. Redman (who was then no longer with Wal-Mart) to voice his concerns about Wal-Mart not upholding its part of their bargain. In January 1996, Mr. Luborsky met with Mr. Messer to explain Magicuts' concerns.

[15] Despite those discussions, Wal-Mart continued to offer further locations to Ultracuts, with the result that Ultracuts would have had 10 hair salons in Wal-Mart stores.

[16] In April or May 1996, Magicuts became aware that Ultracuts was to open two hair salons in Edmonton later that year.

[17] In March 1996, Scott Robertson (Mr. Robertson) replaced Mr. Messer. Shortly thereafter, Messrs Cawston and Luborsky called Mr. Robertson to discuss their position regarding the Ultracuts hair salons. Mr. Robertson discussed the issue with Wal-Mart's senior management team.

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

Wal-Mart's in-house counsel, Robert Wasserman (Mr. Wasserman), who was part of that team, told Mr. Robertson to get Magicuts' position in writing. In response, Mr. Cawston sent a letter to Mr. Robertson dated May 14, 1996 (the letter). It is this letter that Ultracuts argues contains the false representations that form the basis of its claim against the defendants.

[18] Mr. Robertson's evidence was that Wal-Mart's senior management reviewed the letter with Mr. Wasserman, and he and Mr. Wasserman undertook an investigation. Following this investigation, Wal-Mart concluded that, while an agreement had been reached in 1994, it was not a legally binding agreement, and that there was a potential that Wal-Mart might get sued by Magicuts franchisees, should Ultracuts open further hair salons in former Woolco stores.

[19] In late June 1996, Mr. Robertson told Mr. Rivard that Wal-Mart could not offer any new locations to Ultracuts due to its agreement with Magicuts.

[20] Wal-Mart then entered into separate discussions with both Magicuts and Ultracuts to find a solution to the competing requests for additional hair salons. Magicuts put forward a proposal to divide the Western Canadian locations between itself and Ultracuts, as set out in Mr. Robertson's internal memo of July 10, 1996, to David Ferguson (Mr. Ferguson), then the president of Wal-Mart Canada, and others.

[21] In a letter to Mr. Ferguson dated July 9, 1996, Ultracuts took the position that it had agreements with Wal-Mart regarding hair salons in Western Canada, and that allowing Magicuts hair salons into any Wal-Mart stores in Western Canada would be an act of bad faith. Mr. Ferguson replied, asking for written confirmation of the locations for which there were legally binding agreements. Mr. Ferguson took the position that there were four such locations, and he offered to go ahead with those agreements, together with a commitment to give Ultracuts an exclusive agreement to operate in any municipal market in which it had a hair salon in a Wal-Mart store.

[22] The result, as found by the trial judge, was that Wal-Mart agreed to honour an offer to Ultracuts that would give it seven locations in Wal-Mart stores in Western Canada, with an agreement not to put a competitor in a market where it was operating a hair salon. Ultracuts rejected this offer.

[23] Other discussions followed, but there was no agreement. In a letter dated September 16, 1996, Mr. Wasserman advised Ultracuts that Wal-Mart would only honour its written agreements. On September 18, 1996, Ultracuts sued Wal-Mart in the courts in Arkansas, United States (the Arkansas proceeding), which was the location of Wal-Mart's head office. On November 13, 1996, Ultracuts advised Wal-Mart that it would proceed with the remaining hair salons in the written agreements only if Wal-Mart would agree that it was without prejudice to its rights in the litigation. Wal-Mart refused, so Ultracuts chose not to proceed with any further hair salons, and none were constructed.

[24] There has been a significant amount of litigation arising from these events. Ultracuts' claims against Wal-Mart in both Arkansas and Manitoba alleging breach of contract and fraud have all been dismissed or lapsed and all litigation between those parties has concluded. Depositions taken from several people in the Arkansas proceeding have been admitted as evidence in this trial by agreement.

[25] In the current action, Ultracuts' claim alleging unlawful interference with economic relations was dismissed on summary judgment against all defendants except for Magicuts, Mr. Cawston and Mr. Luborsky (see Ultracuts Franchises Incorporated v Magicuts Inc et al, 2005 MBQB 294, aff'd 2010 MBCA 34). Ultracuts' claim in this matter, alleging interference with contractual relations, related to two alleged contracts with Wal-Mart dated January 22, 1996, and April 11, 1996. That claim was dismissed against all defendants on summary judgment, with the judge finding that Ultracuts had failed to establish triable issues with respect to either alleged contract. Regarding the earlier contract, he found that there had been no breach and that the later document was not a contract but only an agreement to agree (see Ultracuts Franchises Incorporated v Magicuts Inc et al, 2009 MBQB 23 at paras 3, 26).

The Redman Meetings and the Redman Agreement

[26] One of the keys to this case is the Redman meetings and the resulting Redman agreement. The trial judge explained this as follows (at paras 23-26):

> There were three meetings between Magicuts representatives and [Mr.] Redman during which the parties discussed an arrangement for Magicuts' cooperation in vacating the Woolco salons and to effectively manage the impact of the transition on Magicuts and its franchisees. . . .
>
> . . .
>
> During the course of these meetings, there were essentially three key points discussed:
>
> i) Magicuts agreed to dissuade its franchisees from litigating against Wal-Mart.

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

> ii) Wal-Mart agreed to allow Magicuts an additional two months to vacate Woolco stores.
>
> iii) Wal-Mart told Magicuts that it would have an opportunity to open salons in former Woolco stores or new Wal-Marts in Canada, if Wal-Mart were to open hair salons in these stores, provided Magicuts met Wal-Mart's requirements.
>
> In at least two of the three meetings, [Mr.] Redman made it clear that Wal-Mart would not enter into any formal agreement in that regard and that any relationship between Magicuts and Wal-Mart would be dependent on performance.
>
> With respect to the May 13, 1994 meeting, [Mr.] Redman did not offer any evidence in his deposition about this meeting. Both [Mr.] Cawston and [Mr.] Luborsky testified in their direct examinations that at that meeting [Mr.] Redman told them that if there were ever any opportunity to put hair salons in Wal-Mart stores in Canada, Magicuts would get the first opportunity.

[27] Although Mr. Redman did not specifically reference the May 13, 1994 date, he did, contrary to the trial judge's finding, explain the meetings in his deposition on December 14, 1996, as follows:

> [MR. REDMAN] In [the Redman meetings], I said, "[Mr. Cawston], [not putting Magicuts hair salons in Wal-Mart stores] has nothing to do with you operating and the way you operate. It's a space problem, and we don't have any space for you."
>
> And at that time, we shook hands, and I said, "Let me tell you this. If there's ever an opportunity that we would consider putting a haircutting company back in, as long as you meet our requirements" -- and I said, "look, I don't handle that, but as long as you meet our requirements, and as long as you're competitive, you all have the right to come back in, and I'll let you come back in."

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

> And that was basically the verbiage that's in the [May 14, 1996] letter, the way I recollected the conversation. And that's exactly -- I mean, I'm very clear on what we said, and that's exactly what we said.
>
>
> [MR. REDMAN] I, in turn, called [Mr.] Messer, with [Mr. Cawston] on the phone, and said, "[Mr. Messer], let me tell you, these guys are going to lose a whole bunch of stores. And what I have agreed to with [Mr. Cawston] is that if we build a new store, or if [for ever] any reason there's space available in existing stores, as long as they're competitive, and as long as they meet our requirements that you set, they ought to have the right to come back in these stores." And that was -- That's all of that conversation.

[28] Mr. Redman was also questioned about who, at Wal-Mart, was involved in or aware of the decisions made to keep or remove independent businesses from the former Woolco stores. He referenced a number of Wal-Mart executives, including David Glass, Bobby Martin (Mr. Martin), Carl Ownbey (Mr. Ownbey) and Mr. Messer, and stated that "there [were] a lot of people involved in that."

[29] Mr. Redman was then asked the following questions and gave the following answers:

> . . .
> [COUNSEL FOR MAGICUTS] Okay. And that would include, I assume, the meeting you had with Mr. Cawston where you agreed to put him back in the stores?
>
> [MR. REDMAN] There was no misunderstanding on anybody's part at Wal-Mart, in my opinion -- that's my personal opinion, based on being the guy that was in charge of the operation

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

> -- about what the intention was about removing Magicuts, and then what the agreement was when we went back in with Magicuts.
>
> [COUNSEL FOR MAGICUTS] And you told Mr. Martin that in 1994, in that early time period in 1994?
> [MR. REDMAN] I would have had to tell Mr. Martin that. I mean that was -- that's a huge move. I would have had to tell Mr. Martin that.
> . . .
> [COUNSEL FOR MAGICUTS] Is it fair to say that the only licensee type user that you, on behalf of Wal-Mart, agreed to go back in these stores, supposedly, was Magicuts?
>
> [MR. REDMAN] No, I did agree to that, and yes, that's the one that I made an absolute commitment to, yes.
> . . .
> [COUNSEL FOR MAGICUTS] All right. Why didn't you put this, as you've described, absolute commitment in writing to Mr. Cawston?
>
> [MR. REDMAN] I didn't feel a need to, [Counsel for Magicuts].
>
> [COUNSEL FOR MAGICUTS] Is Wal-Mart's word its bond?
>
> [MR. REDMAN] Well --
>
> [COUNSEL FOR MAGICUTS] Is that right?
>
> [MR. REDMAN] In my opinion, that's what it is. I mean, in my experience at Wal-Mart, that's what it was. I will tell you that I shook hands with [Mr.] Cawston and told him that that's what we would do, and that's what my intention was.
> . . .

[30] During the deposition, Mr. Redman testified to receiving a call from Mr. Cawston in 1995 that Wal-Mart was giving locations to someone else contrary to the agreement, so Mr. Redman called Mr. Ownbey to explain the situation to him and remind him of the agreement with Magicuts. He said that Mr. Ownbey left him a message that he had spoken to Mr. Messer.

[31] Finally, Mr. Redman confirmed that he had a conversation with Mr. Cawston about the contents of the letter:

> . . .
> [COUNSEL FOR MAGICUTS] And [Mr. Cawston] said, "I'm going to send you a letter" concerning what supposedly you and he had agreed to?
>
> [MR. REDMAN] What happened exactly was, he called me first and said, "I am contemplating writing a letter, and let me run by you what our agreement was in Canada. Let me make sure that there's not anything that's not accurate."
>
> And we had a conversation, in chronological order, if you will, about me looking at him and us shaking hands and me telling him that, you know, if there's an opportunity to ever come back in the stores, or if we open a new store, that as long as they met the criteria set up by our licensing department, that they should have the opportunity first to go in the stores.
>
> And I agreed with that summation that he gave me on the telephone. He said, "I'm, in turn, going to write a letter, and I will forward you a copy of it."
> . . .

[32] Mr. Redman said that he received a copy of the letter after that, but he was busy and did not look at it closely.

[33] The trial judge pointed out differences between the evidence of Mr. Redman and Mr. Cawston as to the sequence of their conversation regarding the contents of the letter and Mr. Redman receiving drafts of the letter to review, and he drew a negative inference about the accuracy of Mr. Cawston's evidence (see paras 119-20).

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

[34] In my view, given that both Messrs Redman and Cawston were testifying to events that occurred more than 25 years earlier, a discrepancy as to the sequence of the conversation and letters is not material. What is important about this testimony is not whether the conversation occurred before or after Mr. Redman received or read the letter, but the fact that he was advised of the details in the letter regarding the agreement and confirmed to Mr. Cawston then, and repeated at the deposition, that they were accurate. That confirmation is the more important credibility factor.

[35] Ultracuts has not pointed to any evidence that disputes that of Mr. Redman, and the trial judge made no adverse credibility findings regarding his evidence. In fact, he accepted Mr. Redman's evidence.

III. THE LAW

[36] This appeal relates to Ultracuts' claim that the defendants unlawfully interfered with its economic relations with Wal-Mart. As I will explain, this tort is premised on the commission by the defendants of an unlawful act in relation to a third party, which Ultracuts alleges was civil fraud. I will begin with a review of the elements of these two torts.

Unlawful Means (Unlawful Interference with Economic Interests)

[37] The leading Canadian decision on the tort of unlawful means is AI Enterprises Ltd v Bram Enterprises Ltd, 2014 SCC 12 (Bram SCC). In that case, Cromwell J, speaking for the Court, noted that the tort was "unsettled and need[ed] clarification" (at para 2), including that it has been referred to in a number of ways: "unlawful interference with economic relations", "interference with a trade or business by unlawful means", "intentional interference with economic relations" and "causing loss by unlawful means" (ibid). He adopted but did not mandate the name "causing loss by unlawful means", shortened to "unlawful means", and he undertook an extensive review of the jurisprudence to clarify its scope and the applicable legal principles (ibid).

[38] Cromwell J described the tort as one that applies in a three-party situation "in which the defendant commits an unlawful act against a third party and that act intentionally causes economic harm to the plaintiff" (at para 5). He explained that it "creates a type of 'parasitic' liability in a three-party situation" (at para 23) because the defendant's liability to the plaintiff is based not on any direct unlawful act against the plaintiff, but its unlawful act against a third party. He also emphasized that "this is an intentional tort; the focus of the dispute . . . is on the unlawful means element" (ibid; see also para 28). He concluded that the rationale for the tort is "liability stretching" (at para 37), in that it does not create a new tort but, rather, "expand[s] the range of persons who may sue for harm intentionally caused by existing actionable wrongs to a third party" (at para 45).

[39] An early example of this tort is found in Tarleton and Others v M'Gawley (1794), 170 ER 153 (UK). In that case, the master of a trading ship (the defendant) fired its cannons at a canoe (the third party) that was attempting to trade with the trading ship's competitor (the plaintiff) to prevent the trade. The plaintiff recovered damages for economic loss from the defendant, based on the defendant's wrongful conduct towards the occupants of the canoe, which conduct had been committed with the intention of inflicting economic injury on the plaintiff.

[40] In Bram SCC, Cromwell J also clarified several aspects of the tort. The first issue that he addressed was the type of unlawful means or act that was required. He rejected a wide interpretation that would include any unlawful means that was forbidden by law whatever its source and regardless of whether it was actionable, including criminal offences and breach of a statute (see paras 40, 42, 45). He also pointed out that the common law has traditionally been reluctant to develop rules about fair competition (see para 31). He opted, instead, for a narrow interpretation that would limit the unlawful act or means to "conduct [that would] give rise to a civil cause of action by the third party or would do so if the third party [had] suffered loss as a result of that conduct" (at para 76; see also paras 5A(1), 26, 75, 86) (unlawful act).

[41] Cromwell J concluded that there is no requirement that the unlawful acts be limited to those where the plaintiff has no cause of action against the defendant (see paras 82, 85) and that there is no principled exception that gives a judge discretion to address unanticipated situations (see paras 83-86).

[42] The second issue that Cromwell J addressed was that of the relationship between the plaintiff and the third party, and the defendant's knowledge of that relationship. The Court of Appeal in Bram (see AI Enterprises Ltd and Schelew v Bram Enterprises and Jamb Enterprises, 2012 NBCA 33) had found that essential elements of the tort included the requirement of a valid business relationship between the plaintiff and the third party and that the defendant had knowledge of that relationship (see para 21). Cromwell J rejected both as elements of the tort. He found that the focus was unlawful conduct that intentionally harmed the plaintiff's economic interests, but that there did not need to have been either a contract or other formal dealings between the plaintiff and the third party, so long as the defendant's conduct was unlawful and it intentionally harmed the plaintiff's economic interests. He stated that, in Bram SCC, it was sufficient to show that the defendant knew that "various persons were negotiating with the majority of investors" (at para 93) and that the allegedly wrongful acts were committed with the intention of causing economic harm to the plaintiff.

[43] The third issue that Cromwell J addressed was that of the required intention on the part of the defendant. He noted, in reference to Douglas v Hello! Ltd (No 3), [2005] EWCA Civ 595 at para 159, aff'd on other grounds OBG Ltd v Allan, [2007] UKHL 21, that five types of intention have been identified (at para 95): (a) an intention to cause economic harm to the plaintiff as an end in itself; (b) an intention to cause economic harm to the plaintiff because it is a necessary means of achieving an end that serves some ulterior motive; (c) knowledge that the course of conduct undertaken will have the inevitable consequence of causing the plaintiff economic harm; (d) knowledge that the course of conduct will probably cause the plaintiff economic harm; and (e) knowledge that the course of conduct undertaken may cause the plaintiff economic harm, coupled with reckless indifference as to whether it does or does not.

[44] Cromwell J concluded that only the first two types of intention "represent the core intention required for the unlawful means tort" (at para 95). He explained (ibid):

> . . . It is the intentional targeting of the plaintiff by the defendant that justifies stretching the defendant's liability so as to afford the plaintiff a cause of action. It is not sufficient that the harm to the plaintiff be an incidental consequence of the defendant's conduct, even where the defendant realizes that it is > extremely likely that harm to the plaintiff may result. Such incidental economic harm is an accepted part of market competition.

[45] While Cromwell J appears to have rejected the third type of intention, being "knowledge that the course of conduct undertaken will have the inevitable consequence of causing the [plaintiff] economic harm" (at para 95), he does not comment on how that differs from the second type of intention. This may be problematic in practice, because direct evidence of an intention to bring about a result is often not available and resort must be had to inferences that arise where that result is the natural/inevitable consequence of what a person knew would flow from his deliberate actions. (See, for example, Grand Financial Management Inc v Solemio Transportation Inc, 2016 ONCA 175, at para 63, leave to appeal to SCC refused, 36982 (8 September 2016); see also Douglas at paras 159-60, 223-24. This issue has also been the subject of academic comment. (See Chamberlain at p 1003 n 127, pp 1004, 1006-7; Burns at sections 4.45-4.50; and Carty at pp 83-84.)

[46] In my view, for reasons that will become clear, it is not necessary for this Court to resolve this issue. That said, Cromwell J was careful in his decision to clarify that the law does not accept that the intentional harming of someone else's economic interests is a tort, unless that harm was the result of an unlawful act.

[47] In conclusion, the basic elements of this tort can best be described as follows:

(i) the defendant committed an unlawful act against a third party;

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

(ii) the unlawful act caused economic harm to the plaintiff; and

(iii) the defendant intended to cause economic harm to the plaintiff when committing the unlawful act.

Civil Fraud

[48] In this case, Ultracuts alleges that the unlawful act that was committed by the defendants against Wal-Mart was the tort of civil fraud. The elements of civil fraud, also known as deceit and fraudulent misrepresentation (see Dhillon v Dhillon, 2006 BCCA 524 at para 77), are settled and have been explained in a number of legal texts and decisions from all levels of court, albeit in somewhat different language. It would be fair to say that all rely, at least to some extent, on the principles set out in Herschell LJ's decision in Derry and others v Peek (1889), [1886-90] All ER Rep 1; [1889] UKHL 1 at 374 (HL (Eng)). I am going to list the elements and then explain the principles of each.

(a) The Elements of Civil Fraud

[49] The elements of civil fraud can best be described as follows:

(i) a representation or statement of fact made by the representor that was false;

(ii) the representor knew that the representation was false or was reckless as to its truth or falsity;

(iii) the false representation was made with the intention that the representee would act upon it;

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

(iv) the representee relied on the false representation, sometimes stated as the misrepresentation caused (i.e., induced) the representee to act; and

(v) the representee's reliance on the representation caused/resulted in a loss.

(i) There Must Be a False Representation or Statement of Fact

[50] This element requires proof of both a representation of fact and the falsity of that representation.

[51] A representation includes verbal and written statements, but it can also include conduct, such as a nod or active concealment, silence or half-truths, depending on the circumstances (see Alevizos v Nirula, 2003 MBCA 148 at paras 19-27). As this case involves written statements (the representations), I will not consider other types of representations.

[52] First, any statement purported to be a false representation for the purpose of civil fraud must be one of fact, which must relate to something in the past or present. (See, for example, Parna v G & S Properties Ltd, [1971] SCR 306 at 316; Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc v Hryniak, 2014 SCC 8 at para 19; and York University v Markicevic, 2018 ONCA 893 at para 21, leave to appeal to SCC refused, 38607 (18 July 2019); Youyi Group Holdings (Canada) Ltd v Brentwood Lanes Canada Ltd, 2020 BCCA 130 at para 83, leave to appeal to SCC refused, 39246 (21 January 2021); Chamberlain at p 860; and Burns at section 7.17.)

[53] Generally speaking, "[o]pinions, predictions as to future events and promises are all statements that, as far as their explicit content is concerned, are neither true nor false" (Burns at section 7.18).

[54] Second, an opinion, estimate, prediction or promise that "may convey factual information by implication, which [could open] up the possibility of liability in civil fraud" (Burns at section 7.18). That is, such a statement may constitute a representation if it implies that facts exist that are consistent with it, in which case, it would be treated as a representation of implied fact. (See, for example, KRM Construction Ltd v British Columbia Railway, 1982 CarswellBC 257 (CA); and Burns at section 7.19.)

[55] That said, an "opinion about facts that both parties know equally well will not usually be a statement of fact" (MacDougall at section 2.148). That is, if two parties are privy to the same facts underlying the opinion, that opinion will not be based on implied facts known only to the party giving the opinion, so there will be no representation of implied facts. (See also Williams v Saanich School District No 63, 1986 CarswellBC 699 (SC), aff'd on other grounds, 1987 CarswellBC 146 (CA).)

[56] Third, the existence and meaning of a representation should be construed objectively from the perspective of a reasonable recipient of that communication in all of the circumstances of the actual representee. (See Primus Telecommunications Plc v MCI Worldcom International Inc, [2004] EWCA Civ 957 at para 30; and MacDougall at section 2.32.)

[57] Fourth, as previously noted, the representation must be false. The onus to prove that falsity is on the plaintiff; there is no onus on the representor to prove that the representation is true. (See MacDougall at section 2.65, relying on Melbourne Banking Corporation v Brougham (1882), [1881-82] 7 AC 307 (HL (Eng)), as implied in Queen v Cognos Inc, [1993] 1 SCR 87 at 109-10.)

[58] Further, the test when determining whether a representation is false is an objective one, by considering the effect of the words on a reasonable person in the circumstances of the representee. (See 2249659 Ontario Ltd v Sparkasse Siegen, 2018 ONCA 371 at para 35; see also Toronto-Dominion Bank v Leigh Instruments Ltd (Trustee of) (1999), 178 DLR (4th) 634 at para 9 (ON CA), leave to appeal to SCC refused (2000), 188 DLR (4th) vi (note) (SCC); and Burns at section 7.32.)

(ii) The Representor Knew That the Representation Was False or Was Reckless as to Its Truth or Falsity

[59] It was established in Derry that the tort of deceit (and civil fraud) requires proof that the representor made the representation knowing that it was false, or with reckless disregard for its truth or falsity. In neither case would there be "an honest belief in [the] truth" of the statement (at p 374). Stated otherwise, if the representor had an honest belief in the truthfulness of the statement, then it would not be fraudulent, even if the statement was, in fact, false (see p 370).

[60] Derry also established that the representor's honest belief in the truthfulness of the statement should not be judged objectively, on the basis of whether it was reasonable, but subjectively, from the representor's point of view (see pp 358, 363, 370).

[61] However, a belief is a state of mind and direct evidence of a person's beliefs is not often available, which raises the question of how to determine whether a belief was honestly held. A person's belief, like knowledge or intention, can be determined by inference from the surrounding circumstances. A court should consider the context and surrounding circumstances in which the representation was made. The more unreasonable the belief, when considered in the context and circumstances, the less likely it may be for a court to find that it was honestly held. (See Derry at pp 369, 375-76; Burns at section 7.24.) However, the absence of reasonable grounds for a belief does not establish that there was, at law, no honest belief.

[62] Further, if a representation is capable of different meanings, a court must determine whether the representor honestly believed that the representation was true in the sense in which he or she understood it when making it, even if that understanding was objectively wrong. (See Burns at section 7.24; and Hoyano at p 481.)

[63] Finally, while the representor has to know that the representation is false, the motive for making the false statement is irrelevant. As stated in Derry, "if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the [representee]" (at p 374).

(iii) The False Representation Was Made with the Intention That the Representee Would Act Upon It

[64] It has generally been agreed that an element of civil fraud/fraudulent misrepresentation is that the representor made the representation with the intention that the representee would act/rely on it. This was one of the elements set out in the early case of Pasley v Freeman (1789), 100 ER 450 (KB UK), as cited in Halsbury's Laws of Canada (online), Misrepresentation and Fraud, "Fraudulent Misrepresentation Founded in Tort: The Tort of Fraudulent Misrepresentation: Requisite Elements of the Tort" (IV.1(2)) at HMF-28 "Requisite Elements of the Tort of Fraudulent Misrepresentation" (2019 Reissue), and was recognized as an element by the Supreme Court of Canada in Redican v Nesbitt, [1924] SCR 135 at 147; and Parna at p 316.

[65] Likewise, it has been recognized as an element of civil fraud in other Canadian secondary sources. See MacDougall at section 5.10; Osborne at p 336; Klar at p 803; and Burns at section 7.1.

[66] In Bruno, Karakatsanis J made no mention of this element in her summary of the elements of civil fraud (see paras 18-21). While this omission has been noted and has caused some controversy (see Singh v Trump, 2016 ONCA 747 at para 141; and P(P) v D(D), 2017 ONCA 180 at para 41 n 1), it seems unlikely that Karakatsanis J intended to change such long-standing law, given that she neither discussed making this change nor provided any reason for doing so. This is the interpretation suggested by Osborne and Klar, who have continued to recognize it as an element of the tort. Recent decisions from the Ontario Court of Appeal have continued to include it as an element of civil fraud with no mention of its omission in Bruno. (See Midland Resources Holding Ltd v Shtaif, 2017 ONCA 320 at para 162, leave to appeal to SCC refused, 37653 (21 December 2017); and Paulus v Fleury, 2018 ONCA 1072 at para 9.)

[67] In my view, the weight of the jurisprudence and the academic commentary supports a finding that the elements of civil fraud include the requirement that the representor must have made the false representation with the intention that the representee would act/rely on it, and I would so find.

[68] Proving intention, like proving knowledge or belief, can be difficult because it is a state of mind, and, unless the representor admits to having a particular state of mind, it can only be proven by inference from the surrounding circumstances. This starts with the basic legal premise that the law infers that a person intends the natural consequences of his actions, often called a common sense inference (the common sense inference). (See Burns at section 7.34; Hoyano at p 485; Jago v Virden Credit Union Ltd, 1990 CarswellMan 392 (QB) at para 30, aff'd 1993 CarswellMan 411 at para 13 (CA).)

[69] Once it is proven that a representor knowingly made a false representation to the representee about a material fact, it would be open to the court to infer that the representor intended the natural consequences of making that statement, that is, to draw the common sense inference. Here, the common sense inference would be that the representor intended that the representee would rely on the representation.

[70] However, as with any inference, before drawing the common sense inference, it is important to consider the specific circumstances in which the representation was made and the relationship between the parties. Considered in context, a judge may conclude that reliance on the representation, although a common sense inference, was not, in fact, intended.

[71] For example, circumstances that have been found to negate the common sense inference include where a representation related to matters of law or the construction of a contract and was made when the parties were in an adversarial legal situation, as those are circumstances where a representee would be expected to rely on advice from his or her own lawyer, not on legal advice from an adversarial party. (See Dorsch et al v City of Weyburn et al (1985), 23 DLR (4th) 379 at 389 (SK CA); and Apotex Inc v Sanofi-Aventis, 2010 FC 182 at para 61.)

[72] Regarding opinions in general, MacDougall stated that "[s]ome opinions do not constitute representations because they are clearly not intended to be relied on by the other party" (at section 2.142). In the Law of Torts, Osborne stated that "[s]tatements of opinion, law and prediction, and vague and boastful sales commendations ('puffs') are not normally sufficient [to be a misrepresentation] because the representation must be of a kind on which a reasonable person would rely" (at p 336).

(iv) The Representee Relied in the False Representation, Sometimes Stated as the False Representation Caused (i.e., Induced) the Representee to Act

[73] Reliance by the representee on the false representation, that is, that the representation caused/induced the representee to act, is a required element of civil fraud and requires proof that the representee, in fact, relied on the representation (see Parna at pp 316-17; Kelemen v El-Homeira, 1999 ABCA 315 at paras 9-10, leave to appeal to SCC refused, 2000 CarswellAlta 1156; Bruno at para 19; York at para 21; and Chamberlain at pp 851, 874-75).

[74] Whether the representee relied on the representation is "a question of fact to be inferred from all the circumstances of the case and [the] evidence at the trial" (Fridman at p 291, as quoted in York at para 21; see LK Oil & Gas Ltd v Canalands Energy Corporation, 1989 ABCA 153 at paras 31, 36, 38, leave to appeal to SCC refused, [1989] SCCA No 383 (QL). Although this statement was made in the contractual context, it applies equally to tortious misrepresentation.

[75] The jurisprudence has established that an outwardly positive act by the representee, such as entering into a contract, is not required to prove reliance; all that is required is an alteration of position, which can include acts such as forbearance. (See, generally, XY, LLC v Zhu, 2013 BCCA 352 at paras 24-27, leave to appeal to SCC refused, 35557 (20 February 2014).)

[76] There is divergent jurisprudence on two aspects of this element of the tort: materiality and the onus of proof. For reasons that will become clear, these issues do not have to be resolved in this case; however, I will provide a brief explanation of each.

[77] One issue that sometimes arises when considering causation relates to the materiality of the representation, in the sense of being a positive inducement for the representee's actions (see Burns at section 7.36; Derry at p 361; LK Oil at para 24; Genesis Tower Ltd v Cheung and Chiu, 2002 BCCA 582 at paras 16, 21-22; see also Klar at p 811; Burns at section 7.38; MacDougall at sections 2.338, 2.343, 2.345). While the representation must be material to the representee's decision, it does not need to be the sole inducing factor (see Sidhu Estate v Bains, 1996 CarswellBC 1262 at para 36 (CA); and Midland at para 137).

[78] The first divergence relates to the test to determine materiality—that is, whether it should be determined on a subjective or objective basis. If determined on a subjective basis, the question is whether the representation was material to the representee (see Kelemen at paras 9-10). If determined on an objective basis, the question would be whether the representation would be likely to induce a person to act (see LK Oil at paras 24-25; Wang v Shao, 2019 BCCA 130 at para 48, leave to appeal to SCC refused, 38704 (14 November 2019)).

[79] Some jurisprudence holds that the plaintiff must prove that the representation was objectively material as an element of the tort, with the result that a finding that it was not would dispose of the claim, even if all of the other elements were proven. (See Chamberlain at pp 877-78).

[80] The second divergence relates to a shifting of the onus of proof of reliance. This arises where a court finds that the defendant made an objectively material false representation that was intended to induce the plaintiff to act to his or her detriment, that the plaintiff acted to his detriment and there was a loss. One line of authorities holds that these findings would shift the legal onus to the defendant to prove that the plaintiff (in this case, Wal-Mart) did not rely on the representation, while another line of authorities holds that these findings would lead to an inference of fact that there was reliance and put an evidentiary onus on the defendant to rebut the inference, but there would be no shift of the legal onus (see Chamberlain at p 878).

[81] On these two issues, the conclusion in Chamberlain, is that "[g]iven these confusions and divergences, it cannot be authoritatively determined how materiality interacts with the tort of deceit" (at p 878).

[82] Reliance is an inference that relates to the representee's state of mind, which must be determined by taking into account the context in which the representation was made and all of the surrounding circumstances (see Sidhu Estate at para 41). Aside from whether it is an element of the tort, the objective materiality of the representation is one factor to consider in determining actual reliance, as a finding that the representation was objectively trivial or irrelevant would weigh against a finding that the representee actually relied on it, i.e., that it was an inducement. This was the finding in Genesis Tower; see also Parna at p 319.

[83] There are a number of circumstances that may indicate that it is unlikely that the representee acted on the false representation, such as:

- where the representee made his own investigations or inquiries into the matter (see Amertek Inc et al v Canadian Commercial Corp et al (2005), 256 DLR (4th) 287 (ON CA), leave to appeal to SCC refused, 31141 (16 February 2006); Abdossamadi v TD Insurance Direct Agency Inc, 2016 ONSC 1363; and 1348623 Alberta Ltd v Choubal, 2016 SKQB 129);

- where it can be shown that the misrepresentation played no role in the representee's decision to act (see Seaver v Winnipeg Regional Health Authority Inc et al, 2014 MBCA 55 at paras 5, 13-14; and Patten v Hants Realty Ltd, 2015 NSSC 349);

- where it can be shown that the representee knew that the misrepresentation was false, or it did not believe the truth of the representation (see Parna; and Brent v Slegg Construction Materials Ltd, 2007 BCSC 661);

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

- where the representee, after initially believing the misrepresentation, learns the truth before actually relying on it (see Sorensen v Kaye Holdings Ltd, 1979 CarswellBC 242 (CA)).

(v) The Representee's Actions Resulted in a Loss

[84] While proof that a representee suffered a loss due to relying on a misrepresentation is an element of the tort of civil fraud, it is not required to be proven for the tort of unlawful interference in economic relations (see Bram SCC at paras 5A(1), 26, 76). The relevant loss for the tort of unlawful interference in economic relations is that suffered by the plaintiff due to the unlawful interference. As a result, nothing need be said about this element of civil fraud.

(b) Standard of Proof

[85] The standard of proof in civil cases involving particularly grave and serious allegations such as fraud, professional misconduct and criminal conduct was settled by the Supreme Court of Canada in FH v McDougall, 2008 SCC 53, being the same standard of proof on a balance of probabilities that applies to all civil cases (see para 40). Rothstein J, for the Court, stated that "in all cases, evidence must be scrutinized with care by the trial judge" (at para 45); that in all cases it "must always be sufficiently clear, convincing and cogent to satisfy the balance of probabilities test" (at para 46); and that there is "no objective standard to measure sufficiency" (ibid). He noted that it would be for the judge to determine whether the evidence was sufficient to meet the standard of proof (ibid).

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

IV. STANDARD OF REVIEW

[86] The applicable standards of review are those set out in Housen v Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, being that questions of law are reviewed on the standard of correctness (see para 8), while questions of fact, inferences of fact and questions of mixed fact and law are reviewed on the standard of palpable and overriding error (see paras 10, 25, 32, 37).

[87] However, where the alleged error can be attributed to the application of an incorrect standard, a failure to consider a required element of a legal test or a similar error in principle, this can be characterized as an error of law, which is reviewed on the correctness standard. As stated by the majority, caution must be exercised in finding an extricable question of law because it is often difficult to extricate the legal questions from the factual ones (see para 36).

[88] The classic example of an extricable question of law arises where a legal test requires a trial judge to consider A, B, C and D, but the trial judge only considers A, B and C. The result is that the trial judge has applied the wrong law, which is an error of law (see para 27).

[89] It has been held that the determination as to whether there was causation or reliance is a factual finding (see, for example, Youyi at para 83).

V. ANALYSIS–CIVIL FRAUD

(a) The Trial Judge's Decision

[90] The trial judge set out the elements of the tort of unlawful means, including the requirement to prove that the interference was by way of an unlawful act (see paras 132, 136), which he found to be civil fraud in relation to the defendants' representations to Wal-Mart (see para 138).

[91] The trial judge's analysis regarding civil fraud was brief (at paras 136-39):

> The only component of the cause of action [of causing loss by unlawful means] that warrants further discussion is whether the interference by the defendants was by way of unlawful means. In this case, pursuant to the definition set out above (at para. 134(b)), the question is whether Wal-Mart had a right of action against the defendants.
>
> With respect to this issue, the evidence establishes the following key points:
>
> a) The defendants alleged that they had a verbal agreement with Wal-Mart for Magicuts to be its exclusive haircare provider in Canada;
>
> b) The defendants advised Wal-Mart that if the plaintiff opened additional salons, in breach of the alleged exclusivity agreement, both Magicuts and Wal-Mart would be sued by Magicuts' franchisees;
>
> c) The [defendants'] allegations caused Wal-Mart to change its position relative to its ongoing business relationship with the plaintiff; and
>
> d) The defendants were aware that Wal-Mart did not grant exclusive rights and they did not actually believe that Magicuts had a binding agreement with Wal-Mart to be its exclusive haircare provider in Canada, but made that allegation to "posture for legal reasons".
>
> [Ultracuts] argued on the basis of these points that the defendants made an allegation that was not factually correct, something which they were aware of at the material time, in an attempt to gain an advantage. Accordingly, the defendants' actions constituted a civil fraud, the requirements of which were set out recently in [Bruno] as follows (at para. 21):

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

> From this jurisprudential history, I summarize the following four elements of the tort of civil fraud: (1) a false representation made by the defendant; (2) some level of knowledge of the falsehood of the representation on the part of the defendant (whether through knowledge or recklessness); (3) the false representation caused the plaintiff to act; and (4) the plaintiff's actions resulted in a loss.
>
> I find on a balance of probabilities that the defendants made false statements to Wal-Mart, which led to Wal-Mart's refusal to expand the scope of its business with [Ultracuts] and caused a loss. I also accept that the defendants' conduct was actionable by Wal-Mart.

(b) Grounds of Appeal Regarding Civil Fraud

There Must Be a False Representation or Statement of Fact

[92] This element of the tort requires Ultracuts to prove on a balance of probabilities both that the defendants made a representation of fact and that it was false.

[93] The trial judge did not clearly identify the allegedly false representations; however, he seemed to conclude that the letter contained the following two misrepresentations (at para 137):

> . . .
> a) the defendants alleged that they had a verbal agreement with Wal-Mart for Magicuts to be its exclusive haircare provider in Canada; [and]
>
> b) the defendants advised Wal-Mart that if [Ultracuts] opened additional salons, in breach of the alleged exclusivity agreement, both Magicuts and Wal-Mart would be sued by Magicuts' franchisees.
>
> . . .

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

[94] He may also have considered the following statement from the letter to be a misrepresentation (at para 60):

> . . .
> Our real difficulty is that [the franchisees] would, in the opinion of our counsel, easily win the action, as the factual evidence is clearly on their side; a deal was made, and now Wal-Mart has simply decided to change their minds.

[95] The defendants argue that the trial judge erred by failing to set out and apply the correct legal test because he failed to identify the requirement that the representation must be one of fact, and he carried out no analysis and made no finding that any of these statements was one of fact. They argue that this was an error of law that is reviewed on the standard of correctness.

[96] Their position is that none of these statements is a representation of fact, so the tort of civil fraud has not been proven.

[97] Ultracuts does not address the question of whether the trial judge erred as alleged. It argues that this case is "about numerous false statements made to [Wal-Mart] coupled with the threat that if [Wal-Mart] did not stop its relationship with [Ultracuts] and give that opportunity to [Magicuts], [Wal-Mart] would get sued."

[98] Regarding the standard of review, Ultracuts argues that determining whether the defendants' statements support the unlawful act requirement involves applying the facts to the law, and is a question of mixed fact and law.

Error of Law

[99] The trial judge summarized this element as "a false representation made by the defendant" (at para 138). He made no mention, either here or elsewhere in his reasons, of the requirement that the representation must be one of fact and not "opinions, predictions as to future events [or] promises" (at para 53 herein). Further, he carried out no analysis and made no findings in this regard. Thus, there is no evidence that the trial judge considered the correct legal principles when addressing this element of civil fraud.

[100] While the trial judge did state that "[Ultracuts] argued on the basis of [the points in para 137] that the defendants made an allegation that was not factually correct" (at para 138), there is no indication that he actually considered whether the representations were ones of fact or even that he accepted that part of Ultracuts' argument. He just goes on to find "that the defendants made false statements to Wal-Mart" (at para 139).

[101] In my view, the trial judge erred in law by failing to consider the correct legal principles related to this element of civil fraud. This is an error of law, and this Court need not give deference to his conclusion regarding this element. Rather, it is open to this Court to make its own determination by applying the correct legal principles.

Analysis

[102] I will now consider the three representations that are alleged to have been false.

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

(i) The Defendants Alleged That They Had a Verbal Agreement with Wal-Mart to Be Its Exclusive Haircare Provider in Canada

[103] While the trial judge found that the defendants represented that there was an agreement that Magicuts would be the "exclusive haircare provider" (at paras 137(a)-137(b)), these are not the words in the letter, which refers to a guarantee that Magicuts would be the "sole haircare operator" (at para 127).

[104] The distinction is important because, as the trial judge noted, both Messrs Cawston and Luborsky testified that Mr. Redman said that Wal-Mart does not give exclusive rights (see paras 27, 61, 114). A finding that the defendants represented that there was an agreement to be the "exclusive haircare provider" amounts to a finding that they knew that the representation was false and that they intended to make a false representation.

[105] However, both Messrs Cawston and Luborsky testified that Mr. Redman said that Magicuts would have the "first crack" at any haircare salons in Canada if they met Wal-Mart's conditions. Mr. Redman testified in his deposition that he had agreed that "as long as they met the criteria set up by [Wal-Mart's] licensing department, that they should have the opportunity first to go in the stores" (at para 31 herein).

[106] Further, Mr. Cawston explained what being the "sole haircare operator" meant to them. Mr. Cawston testified that he viewed Magicuts as being the sole haircare operator because, if Wal-Mart decided to put salons in any of their stores (which was not guaranteed in 1994) and if Magicuts performed, i.e., did a good job, Magicuts would get the "first crack" at the Canadian locations. He said that "the reason Wal-Mart won't give exclusivity is if [Magicuts chooses] not to start taking the sites that they're offering, they're not going to leave empty holes. They will, at that point, look for another operator. So in that sense, we don't have an exclusive." He testified that Magicuts had never turned down a store, and he told Wal-Mart that it would not, and, further, that Magicuts was performing.

[107] Mr. Luborsky testified that Mr. Redman was "quite complimentary about our salons" and said that the reason Wal-Mart never gave exclusives was "they didn't have to." He also testified that Mr. Redman assured them that, if they performed and if Wal-Mart added haircare salons to their stores, Magicuts "would get first crack".

[108] The trial judge did not refer to any of this evidence. In my view, his finding that the defendants represented that there was an agreement to be the "exclusive haircare provider" is not supported by the evidence and is wrong.

[109] The trial judge did not raise or address the question of whether this was a representation of fact or opinion. Reviewing the statement in context, and taking an objective view of the contents of the letter, it is difficult to understand how this could be considered a representation of fact, rather than a representation of opinion.

[110] An objective review of the background reveals that Mr. Robertson requested the letter at the direction of Wal-Mart's legal counsel, Mr. Wasserman, in response to the defendants' concerns that Wal-Mart was not honouring the agreements that Mr. Redman, on behalf of Wal-Mart, had made. Upon receipt of the letter, Mr. Robertson forwarded it to his immediate supervisor, Mario Pilozzi (Mr. Pilozzi), and to Mr. Wasserman and Mr. Ferguson, and the four discussed it.

[111] The letter set out background details, starting from the 1994 sale of the Woolco stores to Wal-Mart and the effect on Magicuts' franchisees. It explained the discussions with Mr. Redman, the agreements that were concluded on the part of both Magicuts and Wal-Mart, the fact that Mr. Redman assured Mr. Cawston that Wal-Mart's "word [was] its bond", that Wal-Mart could be relied upon to keep its promises and that Mr. Redman and Wal-Mart frequently did business on the basis of trust and a handshake.

[112] The "sole haircare operator" representation in the letter must also be considered in light of the fact that it is found in the same letter where it is opined that the franchisees will sue and easily win if Wal-Mart continues to disregard the agreement. This suggests that the representations in the letter are tied together and should be read together. This results in the letter being objectively seen as a single opinion in which Magicuts is opining that it reached an agreement with Mr. Redman, which was shared with the franchisees, and that the franchisees will sue and easily win if Wal-Mart continues to disregard the agreement.

[113] The context of the representations includes:

- Wal-Mart's apparent disregard of the agreement, in that Mr. Messer, who had been involved by speakerphone in one of the Redman meetings in 1994, refused to acknowledge the agreement when dealing with Ultracuts in 1995, and Mr. Robertson's response in 1996, which was to propose a sharing of the locations;

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

- the varied and imprecise language that Mr. Cawston used in the letter to describe the agreement—"guarantee", "personal assurances", "promises", "deal", "bargain"; and

- how the agreement was reached–lawyerless, trust and a handshake, assurances that Wal-Mart's "word [was] its bond".

[114] In my view, a reasonable person in Wal-Mart's circumstances, reading the details in the letter in the above context, would not objectively conclude that the representation that there was an agreement for Magicuts to be Wal-Mart's "sole haircare operator" was one of fact. A reasonable person would be much more likely to judge that representation as an opinion, rather than a fact.

[115] Further, the representations in the letter were all known to Wal-Mart, as explained above. First, they were either made by, or explained to, several members of Wal-Mart's senior management in 1994. Second, they were all based on the facts shared with Wal-Mart in the letter, so Wal-Mart was made aware of the facts underlying these representations in the letter. As a result, Wal-Mart could come to its own conclusion as to whether there had been a legally binding agreement, i.e., a contract, or an agreement that was not legally binding.

[116] In my view, this representation was an expression of opinion, not one of fact.

(ii) The Defendants Advised Wal-Mart That if Ultracuts Opened Additional Salons, in Breach of the Alleged Exclusivity Agreement, Both Magicuts and Wal-Mart Would Be Sued by Magicuts' Franchisees

[117] The words "if [Ultracuts] opened additional salons . . . both Magicuts and Wal-Mart would be sued by Magicuts' franchisees" (at para 137(b)), in the context of the letter, strongly suggest that Mr. Cawston was providing an opinion or advice about the future acts of third parties. As noted earlier, the law generally does not treat opinions and predictions about future acts as factual representations unless they imply underlying factual information that is otherwise unknown.

[118] In this case, the opinion that some of the franchisees "will sue" was supplemented with the factual information that some of the franchisees had been threatening to sue and that one of them had already done so, so the factual implication in the statement and the factual statement, itself, were one and the same—there are no unknown implied facts.

[119] Further, Ultracuts had the burden of proving that the representation was false, that is, that the franchisees were not threatening to sue; the defendants did not have to prove that it was true. While Ultracuts argues that the "statement was knowingly false as not one of the 17 franchisees testified at trial that they were threatening litigation", it was Ultracuts' responsibility to call the franchisees to establish that none of them had threatened litigation. It was not for the defendants to produce evidence that the franchisees were threatening to do so.

[120] In my view, this representation was an expression of opinion, not one of fact, and, further, Ultracuts has not proven that the representation was false.

(iii) Our Real Difficulty Is That the Franchisees Would, in the Opinion of Our Counsel, Easily Win the Action, as the Factual Evidence Is Clearly on Their Side; A Deal Was Made and Now Wal-Mart Has Simply Decided to Change Their Minds

[121] This statement was clearly an expression forecasting the outcome of future litigation, which the law does not treat as a factual representation (see Williams at para 32). In Williams, the Court held that "[t]he statement [by an employer] about the [outcome of a future] grievance procedure was one of opinion and not fact. It related to a future event" (at para 33).

[122] Ultracuts argues that this statement was knowingly false because "[g]iven the conflicting evidence of Gordon [Luborsky], [Mr.] Cawston and [Mr.] Luborsky, it cannot be concluded that a verbal legal opinion was given." Gordon Luborsky is Mr. Luborsky's brother. He is a lawyer and was Magicuts' general counsel and a vice president from January 1994 to October 1995. He also acted as Mr. Luborsky's counsel for his Arkansas deposition.

[123] As the trial judge found, Gordon's testimony about seeing a draft of the letter was inconsistent (see paras 63, 123). The trial judge stated that, in his deposition, Gordon testified that the letter was written on the advice of counsel, with counsel "assisting" with the wording, while, at trial, Gordon said that he did not recall reviewing it (at para 123). However, Gordon did not deny seeing the letter. Mr. Luborsky's evidence was also inconsistent. In his examination for discovery, he said that he did not recall discussing the letter with Gordon, while he testified at the trial that he did, in fact, have some discussions with Gordon (see para 65). Mr. Cawston's evidence was that he "believe[d]" that Gordon saw a draft of the letter. While the evidence was inconsistent, there was no evidence that Gordon did not see the letter.

[124] However, whether Gordon saw the letter is not important; what is important is that all three were in agreement that Gordon had given a legal opinion that the Redman agreement was legally binding and that the franchisees could win if they sued Wal-Mart (second legal opinion) (see para 164 herein). There was no evidence to suggest that he did not give this opinion.

[125] As noted, Ultracuts has the burden of proving the elements of civil fraud, including whether a representation was false, by clear, convincing and cogent evidence, albeit on a balance of probabilities; the defendants do not have to prove that it was true. All of the evidence indicates that that opinion was given, and there is no evidence to the contrary.

[126] In my view, this representation was an expression of opinion, not one of fact, and, further, Ultracuts has not proven that the representation was false in the manner argued by Ultracuts.

Conclusion–Representations of Fact

[127] Taking an objective view of the letter in its entirety, as well as the background and context, in my view, it is clear that the three representations were merely opinions, incapable of being judged as true or false. They were not representations of fact. Therefore, Ultracuts has not proven an essential element of civil fraud, being that the defendants' impugned representations were representations of fact.

[128] This also means that an essential element of the unlawful means tort, being proof of an unlawful act (civil fraud), has not been proven.

The Representee Must Have Relied on the Representation

[129] The law requires that the representation caused the representee to act, in the sense that the representee actually relied on the representation. The fact of reliance can be inferred from the circumstances and the evidence at trial, keeping in mind that, if there is nothing else but the representation that could have induced the representee to act, then it can be inferred, as a fact, that the representation induced the action. However, where the circumstances suggest other factors could have induced the representee to act, that evidence must be considered.

[130] Whether there was reliance is a finding of fact that must be determined on a subjective assessment of the representee's state of mind, in this case, Wal-Mart.

[131] The trial judge simply concluded that "[t]he defendants' allegations caused Wal-Mart to change its position relative to its ongoing business relationship with [Ultracuts]" (at para 137(c)) and that "the defendants made false statements to Wal-Mart, which led to Wal-Mart's refusal to expand the scope of its business with [Ultracuts] and caused a loss" (at para 139).

[132] The defendants argue that the trial judge erred in law by failing to set out and apply the correct legal test for causation, in that he failed to mention or consider whether Ultracuts had proven that Wal-Mart relied on, or was induced by, the representation and acted on it to change its position regarding its business relations with Ultracuts. They argue that this was an error of law that is reviewed on the standard of correctness.

[133] Ultracuts' position is that there was ample evidence to establish that Wal-Mart relied on the defendants' false statements and acted on them.

Error of Law

[134] The trial judge described this element as "the false representation caused [Ultracuts] to act" (at para 138), and he made no mention, here or elsewhere, that causation requires proof that the representee relied on the representation. Further, he carried out no analysis and made no findings regarding reliance; he appears to have jumped to an inference of causation from the finding of a false representation to Wal-Mart without considering key evidence relevant to reliance.

[135] In my view, in failing to turn his mind to the legal requirements for causation, the trial judge failed to consider the correct legal principles related to this element of civil fraud, which is an error of law. This Court need not give deference to the trial judge's conclusions regarding this element; rather, it is open to this Court to conduct its own analysis of causation and reliance.

Analysis

[136] The question of whether there was reliance on the representation is one of fact, so it is necessary to determine what the facts were.

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

[137] The letter was sent to Mr. Robertson. Mr. Robertson's evidence was admitted by way of an affidavit, a cross-examination on that affidavit and the 1996 deposition that he gave in the Arkansas proceeding.

[138] In his deposition, Mr. Robertson stated that, on receiving the letter, he provided a copy to Messrs Ferguson, Pilozzi and Wasserman and they and he (the senior management team) first discussed it on or about June 21, 1996. He said in his cross-examination in 2005 that "[t]here was nothing in [the] letter that was contrary [to] or seemed to be inconsistent with what [Wal-Mart] felt took place in 1994."

[139] Mr. Ferguson testified at his deposition that he only became aware of Magicuts' claim when he received a copy of the letter. He told Mr. Robertson to look "for documentation that showed our position; where we are; what's the status"; he did the same when advised of Ultracuts' claim to have a legally binding agreement. He also testified that, in addition to discussing the letter with Messrs Robertson, Pilozzi and Wasserman, he also discussed it with two other Wal-Mart lawyers, Jon Comstock and Charles Wuest, who worked in Wal-Mart's Arkansas office.

[140] Around the time of the letter, Mr. Robertson also received a letter from Mr. Rivard dated May 27,1996, alleging that Ultracuts had an agreement with Mr. Messer regarding the opening of Ultracuts hair salons in all Wal-Mart stores in Western Canada, although he said that he did not appreciate Ultracuts' position until early July.

[141] Over the next weeks, Mr. Robertson had a number of meetings, discussions and written communications with both Mr. Rivard and Mr. Cawston regarding their competing claims, as well discussions with the management team, and both Ultracuts and Magicuts were approached to resolve their claims by splitting the cities between them. Magicuts put forward a proposal, but, as the correspondence discloses, Ultracuts refused to negotiate and, eventually, sued Wal-Mart.

[142] In his July 1, 2004 affidavit, Mr. Robertson stated:

> Wal-Mart made its own decision in 1996 not to open any other Ultracuts stores other than those covered by certain written agreements with Ultracuts. It [was] also decided for the time being not to open any Magicuts salons in Western Canadian stores.
> . . .
> Wal-Mart had access to its own legal advice and did not rely upon legal advice from any of the Defendants in this action as to the legal effect of the 1994 discussions between Wal-Mart and Magicuts or its legal obligations to either Magicuts or Ultracuts.

[143] In the cross-examination on his affidavit, Mr. Robertson stated as follows:

> [COUNSEL FOR ULTRACUTS] . . . But what [Mr. Cawston] was saying to you was that he had a legally enforceable agreement with Wal-Mart which you were in breach of. That's how you read his letter?
>
> [MR. ROBERTSON] I did not read his letter that way.
> . . .

[144] Mr. Robertson testified as follows on redirect:

> . . .
> [COUNSEL FOR MAGICUTS] . . . During the period of time following May 14, 1996 did Wal-Mart believe it had a legally > binding agreement with Magicuts in respect of providing stores in Western Canada to Magicuts?

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

>
> . . .
>
> [MR. ROBERTSON] No, we did not.
>
> . . .
>
> [COUNSEL FOR MAGICUTS] You also testified that a Mr. Wasserman was at certain meetings?
>
> [MR. ROBERTSON] [Mr.] Wasserman is our general counsel and he was [at] all our meetings that we had as a senior management team.
>
> [COUNSEL FOR MAGICUTS] When you used the word agreement in the various depositions and conversations, was it your intention to refer to a legally binding agreement?
>
> [MR. ROBERTSON] No, they were discussions that we had, they were not legally binding. They were not written agreements that we had.

[145] The trial judge did not refer to any of this evidence in his decision, and he made no credibility findings about it or about Mr. Robertson's testimony in general. While a trial judge does not have to refer to every piece of evidence, he is required to refer to the important or key evidence and to explain how he resolved important inconsistencies in that evidence. (See Brown at section 13:48.)

[146] Mr. Robertson's evidence was key evidence on the element of reliance and causation, but the trial judge failed to either refer to it or to resolve the inconsistency between Mr. Robertson's evidence and his own factual finding of causation.

[147] There is other evidence that supports that of Mr. Robertson. There is evidence that Wal-Mart's management team did not act in a manner consistent with a belief that Wal-Mart had a binding exclusivity agreement with Magicuts. Mr. Redman testified that he refused to enter into a binding agreement with Magicuts. He was clear that Mr. Messer was aware of the terms of the Redman agreement in May 1994, yet, just over a year later, Mr. Messer was discussing leasing space for hair salons with Ultracuts. When the real estate broker advised him that Magicuts was asserting an exclusivity agreement in Canada, Mr. Messer replied that he would be meeting with Magicuts and if they did not like it, he would "cut them off totally" (at para 54).

[148] Further, after the management team had received the letter, it still offered Ultracuts the locations that had been discussed with it, together with exclusivity in those markets, which would have breached an exclusivity contract with Magicuts.

[149] As well, Mr. Rivard's letters to Wal-Mart do not indicate that Wal-Mart expressed the view that it had a binding agreement with Magicuts. In a letter to Mr. Robertson dated June 27, 1996, Mr. Rivard refers to "Wal-Mart's concern that it may have some liability" to Magicuts (emphasis added). In his letter to Mr. Ferguson of July 10, 1996, Mr. Rivard refers to being told at a meeting the day before that senior management had just recently been told of an "alleged agreement" with Magicuts (emphasis added).

[150] All of this evidence is relevant to the issue of reliance, as it goes to establish the subjective views of Wal-Mart's senior management team regarding the letter.

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

[151] Ultracuts' position, as set out in its statement of claim, was that "the defendants . . . represented to Wal-Mart that they had a contract with Wal-Mart to put Magicuts . . . [hair] salons in all of the Wal-Mart stores in Western Canada" (emphasis added) and that Wal-Mart relied on that representation in deciding not to continue its relationship with Ultracuts.

[152] However, Mr. Robertson's evidence, as noted earlier, was clear that Wal-Mart did not accept that the Redman agreement was legally binding—that is, that it was a contract.

[153] Likewise, the correspondence between Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Rivard shows that, contrary to Ultracuts' position, Wal-Mart did not accept that it had any contract with Ultracuts beyond the four locations for which there were written agreements.

[154] Wal-Mart attempted to resolve the competing claims of Ultracuts and the defendants by negotiating an agreement. The defendants made a proposal to divide the store locations between them and Ultracuts, but Ultracuts refused to discuss a settlement.

[155] As Mr. Robertson explained, the senior management team had a "business discussion" based on the information that they had, and in consultation with their legal counsel, and made a "business decision" that they would only open the four Ultracuts hair salons, and that they would not open any additional ones.

[156] The bottom line is that the senior management team made up their own minds regarding the nature of the agreement between Magicuts and Wal-Mart, relying on their own legal counsel to advise them whether the Redman agreement was a contract. They came to the conclusion that it was not. Their decision to limit their relationship with Ultracuts to the four salons in the written agreements was a business decision, made for business reasons, and not because they were relying on the defendants' representations of an exclusivity contract.

[157] Mr. Robertson's explanation accords with common sense. The context of Wal-Mart's actions is that Wal-Mart was, and is, one of the largest corporations in the world, with its own legal departments, including in Canada and Arkansas. The response to the competing claims of the defendants and Ultracuts was not a hasty decision, but one that involved many meetings and conversations and the exchange of many letters to determine how to respond to those claims. Common sense dictates that, before the senior management team made a decision, it would consult with and obtain advice from its own legal department, rather than relying on the representations of those companies and their executives. This is more so given that one of Wal-Mart's own lawyers was directly involved in the decisions.

Conclusion–Reliance

[158] Mr. Robertson's evidence was admitted and there were no adverse credibility findings. In my view, that evidence answers and rebuts any inference of reliance; it certainly cannot be said that there is clear, convincing and cogent evidence of reliance or causation.

[159] Thus, in my view, Ultracuts has not proven on a balance of probabilities that Wal-Mart relied on the representation or that the representation caused Wal-Mart to act. Thus, Ultracuts has not proven this element of civil fraud.

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

[160] This also means that an essential element of the unlawful means tort, being proof of an unlawful act (civil fraud), has not been proven.

VI. OTHER ISSUES

The Remaining Grounds of Appeal

[161] Ultracuts argues that the defendants have used a shotgun approach in this appeal and are simply attempting to reargue the case by challenging almost every finding that the trial judge made. While that is sometimes the case, in my view, that is not so in this matter.

[162] As the appeal and the claim can be determined by analyzing the two grounds of appeal dealt with above, it is not necessary, in my view, to address the remaining five grounds. That is not to be taken as an indication that they are without merit, as that is not the case; rather, for reasons of judicial economy, there is no need to undertake further lengthy legal analysis.

The Trial Judge's Factual and Credibility Findings

[163] The trial judge made a number of factual findings, some of which he relied on to question the credibility of Mr. Cawston and Mr. Luborsky. Some of these factual findings are not accurate and/or supported by the evidence. Some have already been addressed in these reasons. The rest are not key to the two grounds of appeal that have been analyzed, but they do relate to other grounds of appeal and, generally, undermine the trial judge's credibility findings.

2023 MBCA 71 (CanLII)

[164] I will explain a couple of these errors:

- At para 33, the trial judge states that Mr. Cawston had nothing written in his files about any agreement reached with Mr. Redman, and, at para 110, he uses this as a reason to discredit Mr. Cawston's testimony.

  Whether or not there was a note in Mr. Cawston's file, the fact is that Mr. Redman testified that there was an "agreement" reached with Mr. Cawston, which refutes the negative credibility inference that the trial judge was drawing.

- The trial judge noted, at para 34, that Mr. Cawston testified that part of the agreement with Mr. Redman was that Magicuts would not sue Wal-Mart, yet one year later, Magicuts sought a legal opinion from Lang Michener LLP (Lang Michener) on the strength of an action against Wal-Mart. He then states, "[t]his is inconsistent with the allegation that some sort of agreement was reached with [Mr.] Redman" (ibid). He repeats this statement later in his reasons dealing with Mr. Cawston's credibility (see para 111).

  The evidence shows that Lang Michener had given a preliminary legal opinion in 1994 that an action against Wal-Mart for purchasing Woolco stores without tenants was not likely to be winnable. On February 2, 1995, Lang Michener sent Gordon a 16-page opinion letter, 15 pages of which addressed an action against Woolco and less than one page advised that a claim against Wal-Mart was "not worth pursuing". Given that the defendants were trying to persuade the franchisees to sue Woolco but not to sue Wal-Mart, this letter supported Magicuts' strategy. The trial judge's inference is not supported by the underlying facts.

- Regarding Mr. Luborsky, the trial judge stated that it was clear from his deposition that he and Mr. Cawston "never believed" (at para 122) that there was an agreement between Magicuts and Wal-Mart.

  However, as the trial judge goes on to note, Mr. Luborsky had received a legal opinion from Gordon shortly before the letter was sent stating that there was an agreement, so that at the time of the letter, he had legal advice, which he accepted, that there was an agreement. Both Gordon and Mr. Cawston testified to Gordon having given that opinion. While Gordon gave a second legal opinion that came to the opposite conclusion, that opinion was given months later, and certainly some time after the letter. Thus, the statement that both Messrs Cawston and Luborsky "never believed" that there was an agreement is not supported by the evidence.

  Further, the important date for determining what Messrs Cawston and Luborsky knew and intended was at the time that the letter was sent, being May 14, 1996, not months later, at the date of the depositions, which were after Gordon's second legal opinion.

VII. DECISION

[165] In my view, for the above reasons, the trial judge erred in law in his interpretation and application of the elements of civil fraud by failing to consider the correct legal principles. First, he failed to consider that the representation at issue must be one of fact, not one of opinion, estimate or prediction about future events or promise. Second, he failed to consider the requirement for causation that the representee must have relied on the false representation.

[166] In my view, the appropriate remedy is for this Court to determine the issues, rather than ordering a new trial (see section 26 of The Court of Appeal Act, CCSM c C240). First, there was a lengthy trial and a full evidentiary record, so this Court is well placed to make the required findings. Second, this matter has been outstanding before the courts in one form or another for more than 25 years, and has been through several hearings. It is not in the interests of either the parties or the administration of justice to order yet another trial.

[167] Applying the facts to the correct legal principles, I would find, for the reasons set out above, that Ultracuts has not proven either of the two elements at issue in grounds (ii) and (iii) on a balance of probabilities. I would find that the representations at issue were opinions, not facts, and that the representee, Wal-Mart, was not proven to have relied on the representations in determining whether to act.

[168] Thus, I would find that Ultracuts has failed to prove that the representations constituted the unlawful act of civil fraud and, therefore, it has failed to prove that the defendants committed the tort of unlawful means (unlawful interference with economic interests).

[169] In the result, I would allow the defendants' appeal and dismiss Ultracuts' claim of unlawful means against these defendants.

[170] As costs were not addressed at the hearing, I would give the parties 14 days from the release of these reasons to advise the Court whether they wish to file written arguments in that regard, at which time, the Registrar will contact them to set dates for the filing of those arguments.

[171] If there is no such indication within that time, there will be an order of costs to the defendants both in the appeal and in the Court below.

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Bankruptcy and insolvency — Debts not released by order of discharge — Provincial securities commission imposing administrative penalties and disgorgement orders on bankrupts for breach of securities legislation — Commission applying to prevent release of debts by order of discharge on basis of exceptions set out in federal bankruptcy legislation — Whether commission's administrative penalties and disgorgement orders fall within exceptions provided for in bankruptcy legislation such that they are not released by order of discharge and therefore survive bankruptcy — Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, s. 178(1)(a), (e).

Between 2007 and 2009, the bankrupts engaged in market manipulation that caused vulnerable investors to lose millions of dollars. The British Columbia Securities Commission found that the bankrupts had contravened the province's Securities Act. It ordered the bankrupts to pay $13.5 million in administrative penalties; it also ordered them to disgorge approximately $5.6 million, which represented the amounts they obtained as a result of the market manipulation scheme. These sanctions were registered with the Supreme Court of British Columbia pursuant to the Securities Act, which provides that, on being filed in a registry of that court, a decision of the Commission has the same force and effect, and all proceedings may be taken on it, as if it were a judgment of that court.

Section 178(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act sets out a specific list of debts that are not released by an order of discharge and that therefore survive bankruptcy. Relying on some of these exceptions, the Commission applied for a declaration that the amounts owed to it by the bankrupts, who remain undischarged, not be released by any order of discharge. The chambers judge allowed the application, finding that the exceptions in s. 178(1)(a) — "any fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature to a fine, penalty or restitution order, imposed by a court in respect of an offence, or any debt arising out of a recognizance or bail" — and in s. 178(1)(e) — "any debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation" — both applied and that the bankrupts' debts were exempt from and would survive any discharge. The bankrupts appealed. According to the Court of Appeal, the debts were not exempt from discharge pursuant to s. 178(1)(a) because the Commission's decisions could not be said to have been "imposed" by a court as required by the provision. However, the court upheld the chambers judge's conclusion that both the administrative penalties and the disgorgement orders were exempt under s. 178(1)(e). Given that the debts were still exempt, the appeal was dismissed.

Held (Karakatsanis and Martin JJ. dissenting in part): The appeal should be allowed in part.

Per Wagner C.J. and Côté, Rowe, Jamal and O'Bonsawin JJ.: Neither the administrative penalties nor the disgorgement orders are exempt from discharge pursuant to s. 178(1)(a). The words "imposed by a court" in s. 178(1)(a) do not capture orders made by administrative tribunals or regulatory agencies, such as the Commission, that are subsequently registered as judgments of a court. In addition, the administrative penalties do not come within the exception in s. 178(1)(e), as they did not result directly from the fraudulent scheme; rather, they arose indirectly as a result of the Commission's decision to sanction the bankrupts. The disgorgement orders, however, are captured by the s. 178(1)(e) exception because there is a direct link between them and the bankrupts' fraudulent conduct. Therefore, they will not be released by any possible future order of discharge.

For a debt to survive bankruptcy under s. 178(1)(a), the creditor must establish that the debt is (1) a fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature, (2) imposed by a court, and (3) imposed in respect of an offence. This provision is not restricted to penalties associated with criminal or quasi-criminal proceedings. However, the word "court" does not capture administrative tribunals or regulatory bodies. If Parliament had wanted fines, penalties, restitution orders or other orders similar in nature imposed by regulatory bodies, administrative tribunals or other administrative decision makers to be exempt from discharge under this section, it could have said so expressly. Moreover, this provision cannot be read so broadly as to include fines imposed by tribunals that are registered in a court. The registration of a decision with a court does not change the fact that it was made and imposed by an administrative decision maker, nor does it overcome the requirement that the exempt debt be imposed by a court. When a decision is registered with a court, the court's involvement is passive, whereas the act of "imposing" a fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature requires that the court be actively involved in making the decision. In the instant case, the administrative penalties and disgorgement orders were imposed by the Commission, not by a court, and therefore are not captured by s. 178(1)(a).

For a debt or liability to survive bankruptcy under s. 178(1)(e), the creditor must establish three elements: (1) false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation; (2) a passing of property or provision of services; and (3) a link between the debt or liability and the fraud. To establish the first requirement, the onus is on the creditor to prove that the debts or liabilities were obtained as a result of the debtor's false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation. A court cannot take judicial notice of fraud, nor can it infer fraud in a cursory manner. When a party relies on the findings and conclusions of an administrative decision maker to establish that the debtor made a fraudulent statement, the court must still make its own determination based on a review of the record, even where the administrative findings of fraud are express. The evidence tendered to prove fraud or dishonesty must be clear and cogent and courts must be consistent and rigorous in assessing the evidence presented to them in this regard. Even where all of the required findings for false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation have been expressly made by an administrative decision maker, a determination of whether the claim falls within one of the categories of non dischargeable claims must be made by a court.

To establish the second requirement, there must be a loss in the form of a transfer of property or delivery of services, as well as a debt or liability corresponding to that loss. Section 178(1)(e) does not require that the bankrupt be the recipient of the property of which a person was deprived. The property need not have been obtained, or retained, by the bankrupt and may have passed directly or indirectly from the person to a third party at the bankrupt's direction or on his or her behalf. What is required is that the fraudulent misrepresentation induced a person to give the property to the bankrupt or someone associated with the bankrupt.

To establish the third requirement, the debt or liability must have been created as a result of false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation. This requires a direct link whereby only the debt or liability that represents the value of the property or services obtained by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation qualifies as non dischargeable. While in most cases, the claiming creditor will be the party directly victimized by the false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation, the wording of s. 178(1)(e) does not import a direct victim requirement. A creditor who is not a direct victim is thus not barred from bringing a claim under this section provided that the claim is the result of a person being deprived of property or services after having detrimentally relied on the debtor's false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation.

In the instant case, the first s. 178(1)(e) requirement is met. The market manipulation was characterized as fraudulent by both the Commission and the chambers judge, because the bankrupts falsely and knowingly misrepresented the price of shares in order to turn a profit. The second requirement is also met, as the bankrupts obtained property or services as a result of their fraudulent misrepresentation. While some of the amounts obtained as a result of the market manipulation scheme were obtained indirectly, it is not necessary that the bankrupt directly obtain or retain the property for the s. 178(1)(e) exception to apply. The property may pass from a person or group of people (the deceived investors) to a third party (another participant) at the direction of the bankrupt.

With respect to the third requirement, it is not met in the case of the administrative penalties, which therefore do not survive a discharge from bankruptcy under s. 178(1)(e). A direct link between the debt or liability and the fraudulent conduct is required and it is only the value of the property or services obtained as a result of that conduct that is not released by an order of discharge. The debt represented by the Commission's administrative penalties did not result directly from the bankrupts' fraudulent misrepresentation, but arose indirectly as a result of the Commission's decision to sanction them for having obtained property through deceitful statements to investors. If the exempt debt or liability is not restricted to the value of the property or services obtained by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation, then s. 178(1)(e) has the potential to capture debts or liabilities that are not the direct result of deceit.

However, the Commission's disgorgement orders are captured by the s. 178(1)(e) exception and will not be released by any order of discharge. Where a person has not complied with a provision of the Securities Act, the Commission may order that person to pay to it any amount obtained as a result of the failure to comply. The disgorgement orders were made under the Securities Act and represent the value of the bankrupts' fraud — the funds that they gained as a result of their market manipulation. There is therefore a direct link between the fraudulent conduct of the bankrupts and the Commission's disgorgement orders.

Per Karakatsanis and Martin JJ. (dissenting in part): The appeal should be dismissed. Although there is agreement with the majority that the administrative penalties and the disgorgement orders imposed by the Commission do not survive bankruptcy under s. 178(1)(a), both the disgorgement orders and the administrative penalties properly fall within the narrow scope of s. 178(1)(e) and should not be released by any order of discharge. They are both debts that originate from the bankrupts having obtained property by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentations. Both are monetary sanctions imposed because of, and thus resulting from, deceitful conduct that Parliament specifically sought to address.

There is disagreement with the majority regarding the scope of the causation requirement contemplated by the words "resulting from" in s. 178(1)(e) and the degree of link required between the debt and the deceitful behaviour. Just as s. 178(1)(e) does not require that there be an exact correlation between the person claiming the exemption and the victims of that deceitful conduct, it does not require that the quantum of the debt or liability be limited by the quantum of the property obtained as a result of that deceitful conduct. Such a requirement is unsupported by the jurisprudence, is not found in the text of the provision, and is inconsistent with the provision's central focus. The central focus is the deceitful conduct at the source of the debt or liability, not the exact gain derived thereby.

A direct causation requirement does not mean that the debt or liability must be limited to the value of the property obtained; rather it means that where only part of a liability can be traced to deceitful conduct, but not the balance, only the part induced by fraudulent conduct will be exempt from discharge. Where a debt or liability is entirely caused by fraudulent conduct, such as punitive damages imposed to sanction the conduct, there is no reason to limit the application of s. 178(1)(e) only to the gain ultimately obtained by the bankrupt. The jurisprudence in fact overwhelmingly shows that punitive damages exceeding the value of the property obtained qualify for the exception as long as they directly result from the deceitful conduct targeted by s. 178(1)(e).

In the instant case, the amounts the Commission submits should survive discharge have as their only source or origin the bankrupts' deceitful conduct. Both the disgorgement orders and the administrative penalties under the Securities Act are monetary sanctions for the unlawful conduct. Like punitive damages imposed at private law, the administrative penalties arise directly from the type of conduct that they sanction. To exclude administrative penalties on the basis that they have an element of general deterrence amounts to reading in an additional limitation that is found nowhere in the text of the provision, and is inconsistent with the purpose of the exception.

Parliament has determined that some bankrupts simply do not deserve to be free of particular debts, based on the nature of the conduct giving rise to those debts. It provided for many exceptions to the fresh start principle, in s. 178(1), that are focused not on the person claiming the exemption but on categories of specific wrongful conduct that give rise to debts that are not released. Section 178(1)(e) should ultimately be interpreted purposively so as to ensure that dishonest debtors do not benefit from their dishonesty. This purpose would surely extend to a decision of a securities commission, charged with enforcing securities laws in order to protect the interests of the public and promoting the integrity of the capital markets.

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

I. Introduction

[1] The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"), furthers two important purposes: the equitable distribution of a bankrupt's assets among creditors and the bankrupt's financial rehabilitation. Financial rehabilitation means that a debtor will be afforded a "fresh start" when appropriate. The fresh start principle is codified in s. 178(2) of the BIA; it allows a bankrupt to be released from outstanding debts at the end of the bankruptcy process. Thus, subject to reasonable conditions, the BIA permits an honest but unfortunate debtor to be freed from the burdens of indebtedness and to reintegrate into economic life.

[2] Financial rehabilitation operates as the general rule, such that every provable claim is presumptively swept into the bankruptcy. However, it has its limits. Through s. 178(1) of the BIA, Parliament has enacted specific exceptions to this general rule. An order of discharge does not release the bankrupt from a claim captured by a s. 178(1) exception. Indeed, where an exception applies, the fresh start principle yields to certain overriding policy objectives which demand that such a claim survive a discharge from bankruptcy.

[3] This appeal requires our Court to interpret two of these exceptions, codified in s. 178(1)(a) and (e) of the BIA. It arises in the context of the application of the British Columbia Securities Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 418. Our Court must determine whether the administrative financial penalties and/or the disgorgement orders imposed by the respondent, the British Columbia Securities Commission ("Commission"), survive a discharge from bankruptcy under one of these exceptions.

[4] The appellants, Thalbinder Singh Poonian and Shailu Poonian, are undischarged bankrupts. Between 2007 and 2009, the Poonians engaged in market manipulation that caused vulnerable investors to lose millions of dollars. The Commission found that the Poonians had contravened s. 57(a) (now s. 57(1)(a)) of the Securities Act. It ordered the payment of administrative penalties by both Mr. Poonian ($10 million) and Ms. Poonian ($3.5 million). The Commission also issued orders pursuant to s. 161(1)(g) of the Securities Act requiring Mr. Poonian to disgorge $1,319,167 as well as $1,126,260 jointly and severally with another participant, and requiring Ms. Poonian to disgorge $3,149,935. The disgorgement orders represent the amounts the Poonians obtained as a result of the market manipulation scheme.

[5] Relying on the exceptions set out in s. 178(1) of the BIA, the Commission applied for a declaration that the amounts owed to it by the Poonians not be released by any order of discharge. The question before our Court is whether the administrative penalties and/or the disgorgement orders imposed by the Commission can be characterized as either "any fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature to a fine, penalty or restitution order, imposed by a court in respect of an offence, or any debt arising out of a recognizance or bail" (s. 178(1)(a)) or "any debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation, other than a debt or liability that arises from an equity claim"

(s. 178(1)(e)). If so, they will not be released by any order of discharge and will survive bankruptcy.

[6] For the reasons I explain below, I conclude that the administrative penalties imposed by the Commission do not fall within the exceptions set out in either s. 178(1)(a) or (e) and therefore do not survive a discharge from bankruptcy on those bases. I also conclude that the disgorgement orders imposed by the Commission do not fall within the s. 178(1)(a) exception and do not survive a discharge from bankruptcy on that basis. However, they are captured by s. 178(1)(e) and therefore will not be released by any possible future order of discharge.

II. Facts

[7] On August 29, 2014, the Commission found that the Poonians, together with a number of relatives, friends and acquaintances, had engaged in market manipulation, contrary to s. 57(a) of the Securities Act. The Poonians had acquired a majority position in a public oil and gas company called OSE Corp. ("OSE") and had then increased the price of OSE's shares by various manipulations, including trades between themselves. Using pseudonyms and multiple nominee accounts, they had artificially inflated the share price from $0.10 to $0.17 per share to a high of near $2.00.

[8] The Commission found that the Poonians, and those working with them in this scheme, had sold the overpriced OSE shares to investors with the assistance of an entity called the Phoenix Group. The Poonians had paid commissions to the Phoenix Group, which had in turn encouraged its clients, generally unsophisticated investors seeking to escape personal debt through investment in higher-yield vehicles, to purchase OSE shares at the artificially inflated prices.

[9] The Commission described the scheme as "serious misconduct" and as "elaborate, involving layers of deception to conceal the . . . participation [of the Poonians and their associates] in the manipulation" (2015 BCSECCOM 96 ("Sanctions Decision"), at para. 17 (CanLII)). The Commission ordered the payment of administrative penalties by Mr. Poonian ($10 million) and Ms. Poonian ($3.5 million) (para. 96). The Commission later issued orders pursuant to s. 161(1)(g) of the Securities Act, which are commonly referred to as disgorgement orders. Mr. Poonian was ordered to disgorge $1,319,167 to the Commission and an additional $1,126,260 on a joint and several basis with another participant in the scheme, and Ms. Poonian was ordered to disgorge $3,149,935 (2018 BCSECCOM 160 ("Reassessment Decision"), at para. 85 (CanLII)). As a result, the Poonians together owe $19,095,362 (plus interest) to the Commission. These sanctions were registered with the Supreme Court of British Columbia pursuant to s. 163 of the Securities Act, which provides that, on being filed in a registry of that court, a decision of the Commission has the same force and effect, and all proceedings may be taken on it, as if it were a judgment of that court. The Poonians owe $4,335,252.60 to their next largest creditor, the Canada Revenue Agency.

[10] On April 20, 2018, the Poonians made a voluntary assignment in bankruptcy. On February 13, 2020, they applied for discharge from bankruptcy, which the Commission and the Canada Revenue Agency opposed. The Supreme Court of British Columbia dismissed the Poonians' application on April 8, 2020, and they remain undischarged bankrupts.

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

III. Judicial History

A. Supreme Court of British Columbia, 2021 BCSC 555 (Crerar J.)

[11] The Commission applied to the Supreme Court of British Columbia for a declaration that the debts represented by the administrative penalties and disgorgement orders not be released by any order of discharge, pursuant to s. 178(1)(a), (d) and (e) of the BIA. The chambers judge allowed the Commission's application, finding that the debts were exempt from and would survive any discharge. While only one exception had to apply for the debts not to be released, the chambers judge found that the exceptions in s. 178(1)(a) and (e) both applied.

[12] With respect to s. 178(1)(a), the chambers judge rejected the Poonians' argument that it applies only to fines, penalties or restitution orders imposed in criminal or quasi-criminal proceedings. He noted that the inclusion of the words "restitution order" in s. 178(1)(a) implies that the scope of this provision extends beyond monetary orders imposed in a criminal or quasi-criminal context. The chambers judge also rejected the Poonians' argument that an order of the Commission that is subsequently registered with a court is not an order "imposed by a court", as required by s. 178(1)(a). According to the chambers judge, both the administrative penalties and the disgorgement orders could be characterized as fines, penalties, restitution orders or other orders similar in nature that had been imposed by a court in respect of an offence. On this basis, he ordered that they not be released on discharge from bankruptcy.

[13] As for s. 178(1)(e), the chambers judge agreed with the Commission that the Poonians' market manipulation, particularly the multi-party elaborate scheme they had orchestrated, was at its core a fraudulent misrepresentation and false pretence. He held that, through that scheme, the Poonians had "obtained property" in the form of millions of dollars and that, in doing so, they had engaged in deceitful conduct, which he deemed "the essence of s 178(1)(e)" (para. 105 (CanLII)). The chambers judge concluded that the Poonians' market manipulation and knowing exploitation of vulnerable investors, which corrodes public confidence in securities markets, were evidence of the deceit lying at the heart of s. 178(1)(e). As a result, the administrative penalties and disgorgement orders were also exempt from discharge under s. 178(1)(e).

[14] The Commission argued in the alternative that the disgorgement orders (but not the administrative penalties) should be exempt under s. 178(1)(d). However, in light of his conclusion that both the disgorgement orders and the administrative penalties were exempt under s. 178(1)(a) and (e), the chambers judge declined to consider this alternative ground. No further arguments were made in respect of s. 178(1)(d), either before the British Columbia Court of Appeal or before our Court.

B. British Columbia Court of Appeal, 2022 BCCA 274, 65 B.C.L.R. (6th) 213 (Harris, Willcock and Fenlon JJ.A.)

[15] The Poonians appealed to the British Columbia Court of Appeal, challenging the chambers judge's interpretation of the BIA. They also argued that the chambers judge had erred in adopting and following the rationale in Alberta Securities Commission v. Hennig, 2020 ABQB 48, 8 Alta. L.R. (7th) 177, a decision later reversed by the Alberta Court of Appeal (2021 ABCA 411, 34 Alta. L.R. (7th) 219). Justice Willcock, writing for the British Columbia Court of Appeal, held that the chambers judge had erred in concluding that the debts were exempt from discharge pursuant to s. 178(1)(a) of the BIA. However, he upheld the chambers judge's conclusion that the debts were exempt under s. 178(1)(e). Given that the debts were exempt, albeit only under s. 178(1)(e), the appeal was dismissed.

[16] Justice Willcock agreed with the chambers judge that s. 178(1)(a) is not limited to monetary orders imposed in criminal or quasi-criminal proceedings. However, he disagreed that a decision of the Commission that is merely registered with the Supreme Court of British Columbia can be considered an order "imposed by a court". Once the Commission's decisions are registered with the court, they can be enforced as if they were judgments of the court, but they cannot be said to be "imposed" by the court. The Commission's penalties and disgorgement orders therefore did not fall within the s. 178(1)(a) exception.

[17] Justice Willcock upheld the chambers judge's conclusion that the Commission's administrative penalties and disgorgement orders came within the s. 178(1)(e) exception. He held that the Poonians' debts had arisen from obtaining property, in the form of millions of dollars, by fraudulent misrepresentation, that is, through their market manipulation.

[18] In Hennig, the Alberta Court of Appeal held that "[t]he required link between the fraudulent statement and the debt is established only if the debtor makes the fraudulent statement to the creditor relying on s 178(1)(e)" (para. 78). Under this approach, the Poonians would have had to make their fraudulent misrepresentation to the Commission itself. The s. 178(1)(e) exception would not be applicable, because the Poonians' fraudulent misrepresentation was made not to the Commission but rather to the victim investors.

[19] Justice Willcock rejected the narrow approach adopted by the Alberta Court of Appeal in Hennig. Instead, he concluded that s. 178(1)(e) is not restricted to cases in which the bankrupt made a fraudulent statement to the specific creditor relying on this provision. The Commission was therefore permitted to invoke s. 178(1)(e). Justice Willcock concluded that both the administrative penalties and the disgorgement orders imposed by the Commission were non-dischargeable debts under s. 178(1)(e), because they had arisen from the Poonians having obtained property by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation.

IV. Issues

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

[20] This appeal raises two issues:

1. Do the Commission's administrative penalties and disgorgement orders against the Poonians constitute debts falling within s. 178(1)(a) of the BIA, such that they are not released by an order of discharge and therefore survive bankruptcy?

2. Do the Commission's administrative penalties and disgorgement orders against the Poonians constitute debts or liabilities falling within s. 178(1)(e) of the BIA, such that they are not released by an order of discharge and therefore survive bankruptcy?

V. Analysis

A. General Principles Governing the Discharge of a Bankrupt

[21] The proper interpretation of the BIA "requires the acceptance of the principle that every claim is swept into the bankruptcy and that the bankrupt is released from all of them upon being discharged unless the law sets out a clear exclusion or exemption" (Schreyer v. Schreyer, 2011 SCC 35, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 605, at para. 20). This general rule is codified in s. 178(2), which states that "[s]ubject to subsection (1), an order of discharge releases the bankrupt from all claims provable in bankruptcy." The purpose of s. 178(2) "is to give effect to one of the goals underlying the BIA regime — the financial rehabilitation of the debtor — by releasing 'the bankrupt from all claims provable in bankruptcy'" (Alberta (Attorney General) v. Moloney, 2015 SCC 51, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 327, at para. 77). Through discharge, the "honest but unfortunate" debtor is given a fresh start and is provided "with relief from the weight of oppressive indebtedness" (Moloney, at para. 77, citing L. W. Houlden, G. B. Morawetz and J. Sarra, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada (4th ed. rev. (loose-leaf), at p. 1-2.1; J. D. Honsberger and V. W. DaRe, Honsberger's Bankruptcy in Canada (5th ed. 2017), at p. 478). This process also allows "the discharged bankrupt to reintegrate into economic life so he or she can become a productive member of society" (Moloney, at para. 36).

[22] While financial rehabilitation is an important goal of the BIA, it has its limits. These limits are set out in both ss. 172 and 178(1) of the BIA (Moloney, at para. 37). Section 172 provides that an order of discharge may be granted, refused, its operation may be suspended, or it may be granted subject to conditions. Section 178(1) lists specific debts that are not released by discharge and that survive bankruptcy. "These provisions demonstrate Parliament's attempt to balance financial rehabilitation with other policy objectives, such as confidence in the credit system, that require certain debts to survive bankruptcy" (Moloney, at para. 37, citing R. J. Wood, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law (2009), at pp. 273 and 289). Both of these sections play a distinct and crucial role in the discharge process. I address each of them in turn.

(1) Section 172: Court May Grant or Refuse Discharge

[23] Section 172 of the BIA addresses the discharge of a bankrupt. It establishes that, on the hearing of a bankrupt's application for discharge, a bankruptcy court retains broad discretion to grant or refuse an absolute order of discharge, to suspend the operation of such an order for a specified time or to grant a conditional order of discharge. The BIA provides no guidance for the exercise of this discretion, aside from stating that a court must refuse an absolute discharge if any fact referred to in s. 173 is proven against the debtor (J. Sarra, G. B. Morawetz and L. W. Houlden, The 2024 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (2024), at § 7:69). If a court finds that any fact referred to in s. 173 is proven, the bankrupt's discharge must be refused, suspended or granted conditionally (s. 172(2)). Many of those facts bear directly on the bankrupt's conduct and culpability, while others reflect standards of commercial morality (s. 173(1)(a) to (o); R. J. Wood, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law (2nd ed. 2015), at pp. 297-98). For example, ss. 172(2) and 173(1)(k) establish that a bankrupt who is guilty of any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust is not entitled to an absolute discharge.

[24] A court has broad discretion under s. 172(1). In exercising that discretion, the court considers three factors: the interests of the creditors in obtaining payment of their claims, the interests of the bankrupt in obtaining relief from his or her financial obligations, and the integrity of the bankruptcy process (F. Bennett, Bennett on Bankruptcy (26th ed. 2024), at p. 737, citing Shakell, Re (1988), 70 C.B.R. (N.S.) 270 (Ont. S.C.J.); Phenix, Re (1989), 76 C.B.R. (N.S.) 82 (Sask. Q.B.)).

(2) Section 178(1): Debts Not Released by Order of Discharge

[25] Section 178(1) sets out a specific list of debts that are not released by an order of discharge and that therefore survive bankruptcy (Moloney, at para. 37). These debts are non-discretionary exceptions to the general rule and represent "the kind of claims that society, through Parliament, considers to be of a quality that outweighs any possible benefit in the bankrupt being relieved of them" (Sarra, Morawetz and Houlden, at § 7:185, citing Jerrard v. Peacock (1985), 37 Alta. L.R. (2d) 197 (Q.B.)).

[26] The exceptions in s. 178(1)(a) through (h) must be interpreted narrowly and applied only in clear cases (Montréal (City) v. Deloitte Restructuring Inc., 2021 SCC 53, at para. 25; Korea Data Systems (USA), Inc. v. Aamazing Technologies Inc., 2015 ONCA 465, 126 O.R. (3d) 81, at para. 63). A narrow interpretation is required partly because courts have no discretion respecting their application: ". . . the policy objective protected by the exception must, in all circumstances, trump the discharge of the bankrupt" (H. Murray and H. Fisher, "You're Hot and You're Cold, You're Yes and You're No: Conflicting Appellate Decisions Regarding Whether Regulators' Fines, Penalties or Restitution Orders Survive Bankruptcy", in J. Corraini and D. B. Nixon, eds., Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2022 (2023), 569, at p. 618; J. Girgis and T. G. W. Telfer, "Do Securities Commission Debts Survive a Bankruptcy Discharge? An Analysis of Poonian v. British Columbia (Securities Commission) (BCCA)" (2023), 67 Can. Bus. L.J. 438 ("Girgis and Telfer (2023)"), at pp. 453-54). Section 178(1) is not "a catchall of debts arising from morally objectionable conduct", but rather sets out "categories of specific wrongful conduct that give rise to debts that are not released, and specifies the criteria to be applied" (Shaver-Kudell Manufacturing Inc. v. Knight Manufacturing Inc., 2021 ONCA 925, 160 O.R. (3d) 205, at para. 39; see also A. Nocilla, "Comment on Shaver-Kudell Manufacturing Inc. v Knight Manufacturing Inc." (2022), 45:2 Man. L.J. 177, at p. 187).

[27] The s. 178(1) exceptions must also be interpreted narrowly because of the fact that "the more claims that survive bankruptcy, the more difficult it becomes for a debtor to rehabilitate" (Moloney, at para. 79; see also Schreyer, at para. 19; Martin v. Martin, 2005 NBCA 32, 282 N.B.R. (2d) 61, at para. 11). As a result, "[w]here there is doubt as to whether a creditor falls within an exemption, the benefit should go to the bankrupt" (Murray and Fisher, at p. 576, citing Jerrard, at p. 206).

(3) The Poonians' Application for Discharge Was Refused Under Section 172

[28] In 2020, the Poonians applied for discharge under s. 172 (2020 BCSC 547, 78 C.B.R. (6th) 135 ("Discharge Application reasons"), aff'd 2021 BCSC 222, 86 C.B.R. (6th) 263, aff'd 2021 BCCA 417, 58 B.C.L.R. (6th) 276). Their application was opposed by the Commission and the Minister of National Revenue primarily on the basis that the fact referred to in s. 173(1)(a) was proven: the Poonians' assets were not of a value equal to $0.50 on the dollar of the amount of their unsecured liabilities. The Commission and the Minister alleged that the Poonians' precarious financial situation had arisen from circumstances for which the Poonians could justly be held responsible (para. 29).

[29] The Supreme Court of British Columbia refused the Poonians' application for an absolute discharge and held that it was impossible "to conclude on these facts that the vast disparity between the Poonians' assets and liabilities arose from circumstances for which they cannot justly be held responsible" (Discharge Application reasons, at para. 53). The court also refused the Poonians' application for a suspended discharge on the basis that granting such a discharge "would be contrary to the public interest" (para. 60). The court concluded that the "circumstances of this case are extreme and that the pre-bankruptcy conduct of the Poonians requires the court to distance itself from their efforts to use the bankruptcy process to absolve themselves of the financial consequences of their actions" (para. 69). As of the date of the hearing before our Court, the Poonians remained undischarged bankrupts. As demonstrated by their unsuccessful application for discharge, even if a claim does not fall within a s. 178(1) exception, a bankruptcy court still retains the discretion to refuse an order of discharge under s. 172.

[30] The question before our Court is whether the Commission's administrative penalties and disgorgement orders can be characterized as debts not released by an order of discharge under one of the exceptions in s. 178(1). As the creditor, the Commission bears the onus of proving that its claims fall within one of the listed exceptions (Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp. v. Gray, 2014 ONCA 236, 119 O.R. (3d) 710, at para. 24). While the Poonians' application for discharge under s. 172 failed, if the Commission succeeds in proving that its claims come under a s. 178(1) exception, this will mean that those claims cannot be released notwithstanding any future order of discharge the Poonians may seek.

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

B. Do the Commission's Claims Fall Within the Section 178(1) Exceptions?

(1) Section 178(1)(a)

[31] For a debt to survive bankruptcy under s. 178(1)(a), the creditor must establish that the debt is (1) a fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature, (2) imposed by a court, and (3) imposed in respect of an offence:

> 178 (1) An order of discharge does not release the bankrupt from
> > (a) any fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature to a fine, penalty or restitution order, imposed by a court in respect of an offence, or any debt arising out of a recognizance or bail;

[32] This appeal raises two questions with respect to the proper interpretation of s. 178(1)(a). First, must the fines, penalties and orders referred to in this section be imposed in either a criminal or quasi-criminal context? Second, do the words "imposed by a court" capture orders that are initially imposed by an administrative tribunal but that are subsequently registered as judgments of a superior court?

(a) Section 178(1)(a) Is Not Limited to Orders Imposed in a Criminal or Quasi-Criminal Context

[33] It is clear that the terms "fine" and "penalty" in s. 178(1)(a) include at least monetary penalties imposed as punishment for offences in criminal or quasi-criminal proceedings (see Hennig (C.A.), at paras. 46-51; Air Canada, Re (2006), 28 C.B.R. (5th) 317 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 42; Chaytor, Re, 2006 BCSC 1742, 26 C.B.R. (5th) 574, at para. 38; Belair v. Gottschlich, 2008 ABQB 47, 89 Alta. L.R. (4th) 268, at para. 25; R. v. Manzioros, 2004 MBQB 121, 183 Man. R. (2d) 279, at para. 40; Chambre des notaires du Québec v. Dugas, [2003] R.J.Q. 1, at para. 22; Simone v. Daley (1999), 43 O.R. (3d) 511, at p. 522; Buland Empire Development Inc. v. Quinto Shoes Imports Ltd. (1999), 123 O.A.C. 288, at para. 19; D. Brochu, Précis de la faillite et de l'insolvabilité (6th ed. 2022), at ¶31-5).

[34] The chambers judge and Willcock J.A. both agreed that penalties imposed in a criminal or quasi-criminal context are clearly captured by s. 178(1)(a), but they found that this section is not limited to fines, penalties and restitution orders imposed in such a context. The chambers judge held that the inclusion of restitution orders, which do not seek to punish but rather to compensate and restore, "implies a broader scope to s 178(1)(a) than criminal or quasi-criminal offences" (para. 85). Justice Willcock agreed, holding that "s. 178(1)(a) has occasionally been interpreted too narrowly in that respect" (para. 39).

[35] Like the chambers judge and Willcock J.A., I am of the view that s. 178(1)(a) is not restricted to penalties associated with criminal or quasi-criminal proceedings. The plain and ordinary meaning of s. 178(1)(a), a comparative reading of the English and French versions of this section, and the legislative history of the section all support this interpretation. While I have explained that the s. 178(1) exceptions must be interpreted narrowly, this interpretive principle does not have primacy over other principles of statutory interpretation that clearly support a particular meaning.

[36] As a first remark, I note that the plain and ordinary meaning of s. 178(1)(a) quite simply does not limit this section to penalties imposed in a criminal or quasi-criminal context (see Vancouver (City) v. Alliston, 2003 BCPC 105, 47 C.B.R. (4th) 142, at paras. 19-20 and 22). In fact, this section employs very broad language. The English version of s. 178(1)(a) merely requires that the fine, penalty, restitution order or other order be "in respect of an offence". The words "in respect of" are of "the widest possible scope" in conveying a link between related subject matters (Nowegijick v. The Queen, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29, at p. 39; Markevich v. Canada, 2003 SCC 9, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 94, at para. 26).

[37] The English and French versions of s. 178(1)(a) are slightly different. Importantly, the words "in respect of an offence" in the English version are absent from the French version. "The shared meaning rule for the interpretation of bilingual legislation dictates that the common meaning between the English and French legislative texts should be accepted" (Merck Frosst Canada Ltd. v. Canada (Health), 2012 SCC 3, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 23, at para. 203, citing R. Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (5th ed. 2008), at pp. 99 et seq., and M. Bastarache et al., The Law of Bilingual Interpretation (2008), at pp. 32 et seq.). The shared meaning rule points to a broader reading of s. 178(1)(a) that encompasses any fine, penalty, restitution order or other order that is imposed by a court. Under this interpretation, there is no indication that such an order needs to be imposed in a criminal or quasi-criminal context.

[38] Notwithstanding this difference between the English and French versions of s. 178(1)(a), I note that, in any event, the unqualified term "offence" is not necessarily restricted to a criminal or quasi-criminal context. Offences can also exist in a regulatory context; statutes outside of the criminal or quasi-criminal context frequently deem certain contraventions of their provisions to be offences (J. Swaigen and S. McRory, Regulatory Offences In Canada: Liability and Defences (2nd ed. 2018), at p. 9). Indeed, in this case, a contravention of s. 57 of the Securities Act is deemed to be an offence under s. 155(1)(b) of that Act.

[39] Furthermore, the legislative history of s. 178(1)(a) demonstrates that Parliament's intention has been to expand the scope of this section, not to restrict it. A previous version of this section, as it appeared from 1985 until 1992, read as follows:

> 178 (1) An order of discharge does not release the bankrupt from
> (a) any fine or penalty imposed by a court or any debt arising out of a recognizance or bail bond;

[40] In 1992, An Act to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend the Income Tax Act in consequence thereof, S.C. 1992, c. 27, s. 64, widened the scope of s. 178(1)(a):

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

> 64. (1) Paragraph 178(1)(a) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
>
> > (a) any fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature to a fine, penalty or restitution order, imposed by a court in respect of an offence, or any debt arising out of a recognizance or bail;

[41] Parliament intentionally added this more expansive language to s. 178(1)(a). Interpreting this broad language as capturing only penalties imposed in a criminal or quasi-criminal context would run counter to Parliament's intent and would also render the words or "other order similar in nature" surplusage (C.A. reasons, at para. 41). It is a well-accepted principle that such an interpretation is to be avoided (R. v. Proulx, 2000 SCC 5, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 61, at para. 28; see further, R. Sullivan, The Construction of Statutes (7th ed. 2022), at § 8.03).

[42] Ultimately, if Parliament had intended to limit the application of this section to criminal or quasi-criminal proceedings, it could have done so more clearly. The fines, penalties, restitution orders and other orders that it exempts are not restricted to those imposed in a criminal or quasi-criminal context.

(b) The Words "Imposed by a Court" Do Not Capture Orders Made by Administrative Tribunals That Are Subsequently Registered as Judgments of a Court

[43] For a debt to survive bankruptcy pursuant to s. 178(1)(a), the creditor must establish that the debt is a fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature that was "imposed by a court". There is some uncertainty about what constitutes a "court" for the purposes of s. 178(1)(a) and about what is meant by the term "imposed".

[44] The word "court" as it appears in s. 178(1)(a) is undefined. While this word is defined in s. 2 of the BIA, the definition specifically excludes s. 178(1)(a):

> 2 In this Act,
>
> . . .
> court, except in paragraphs 178(1)(a) and (a.1) and sections 204.1 to 204.3, means a court referred to in subsection 183(1) or (1.1) or a judge of that court, and includes a registrar when exercising the powers of the court conferred on a registrar under this Act;

[45] Subsections 183(1) and (1.1) of the BIA refer to the superior courts of each province and territory. The exclusion of s. 178(1)(a) from the definition in s. 2 suggests that Parliament did not intend to limit the application of s. 178(1)(a) to fines, penalties or restitution orders made by superior courts (C.A. reasons, at para. 42). In this way, the s. 2 definition draws a distinction between a court administering the BIA process and other courts that may impose fines, penalties or restitution orders for the purposes of s. 178(1)(a) (J.R.B. v. Jimenez, 2018 ABQB 847, at para. 23 (CanLII)). Provincial courts, federal courts, appellate courts and this Court all fall within the meaning of "court" for the purposes of s. 178(1)(a) (see Sarra, Morawetz and Houlden, at § 1:26).

[46] However, the word "court" in s. 178(1)(a) does not capture administrative tribunals or regulatory bodies. The term "court" implies that a dispute will be adjudicated by a judge or judges (Black's Law Dictionary (11th ed. 2019), at p. 444). By comparison, an "administrative tribunal" is "[a] court-like decision-making authority that resolves disputes [or] an administrative agency exercising a quasi-judicial function" (p. 1814). A "regulatory agency" can be defined as "[a]n official body, esp. within the government, with the authority to implement and administer particular legislation" (pp. 77-78 and 1538). "Court" refers to the judiciary, whereas administrative bodies are hybrid entities "falling between the judiciary and government departments created to perform as separate bodies functions transferred from both" (L. Sossin, Practice and Procedure Before Administrative Tribunals (loose-leaf), at § 2:1).

[47] Moreover, for the purposes of s. 69.6 of the BIA, Parliament saw it fit to define the term "regulatory body".[1] While the definition is limited to that section and does not apply to s. 178(1)(a), the decision to set out a specific definition of "regulatory body" further confirms that Parliament intended these different terms — "court" and "regulatory body" — to be understood as having different meanings (Agraira v. Canada (Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness), 2013 SCC 36, [2013] 2 S.C.R. 559, at para. 81; Alberta (Information and Privacy Commissioner) v. University of Calgary, 2016 SCC 53, [2016] 2 S.C.R. 555, at para. 53). Thus, the word "court" in s. 178(1)(a) does not include administrative bodies. If Parliament had wanted fines,

[1] Section 69.6(1) of the BIA reads as follows:

> 69.6 (1) In this section, regulatory body means a person or body that has powers, duties or functions relating to the enforcement or administration of an Act of Parliament or of the legislature of a province and includes a person or body that is prescribed to be a regulatory body for the purpose of this Act.

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

penalties, restitution orders or other orders similar in nature imposed by regulatory bodies, administrative tribunals or other administrative decision makers to be exempt from discharge under s. 178(1)(a), it could have said so expressly.

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

[48] Having defined the term "court", I now consider what it means for a fine, penalty or order to be "imposed by a court". The Commission argues that this language captures orders that are imposed by an administrative tribunal and that, once registered with a court, are deemed by statute to be enforceable as orders of that court (R.F., at para. 93). It argues that its disgorgement orders and administrative penalties fall within the ambit of s. 178(1)(a) of the BIA because, under s. 163(2) of the Securities Act, once a decision it has made is filed with the Supreme Court of British Columbia, the decision has the same force and effect as if it were a judgment of that court:

> 163 (1) If the commission has made a decision under section 161 or 162, or if the executive director has made a decision under section 161, the commission or the executive director, as applicable, may file the decision at any time in a Supreme Court registry by filing a certified copy of the decision.
> (2) Upon filing, a decision referred to in subsection (1), (1.1) or (1.2) or a notice, order or decision referred to in subsection (1.01) has the same force and effect, and all proceedings may be taken on it, as if it were a judgment of the Supreme Court.

[49] The effect of an administrative decision being registered with a court is that the creditor is able to use civil methods to enforce the decision as if it were a judgment of that court. The registration of the decision does not change the fact that it was made and imposed by an administrative decision maker, nor does it overcome the BIA's requirement that the exempt debt be imposed by a court (C.A. reasons, at para. 48; Hennig (C.A.), at para. 52). When a decision is registered with a court, the court's involvement is passive, whereas the act of "imposing" a fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature requires that the court be actively involved in making the decision (see Hennig (C.A.), at para. 52).

[50] Justice Willcock correctly concluded in this case that s. 178(1)(a) "is broad enough to include at least fines, penalties and restitution orders imposed by courts other than the superior courts of the provinces, but cannot be read so broadly as to include fines imposed by tribunals that are registered in a court" (para. 44).

(c) Application of Section 178(1)(a) to the Commission's Orders

(i) The Commission's Administrative Penalties Are Not Exempt From Discharge Under Section 178(1)(a)

[51] In light of the foregoing, the Commission's argument that the administrative penalties it imposed on the Poonians are captured by the s. 178(1)(a) exception must fail. While the administrative penalties were imposed in respect of a statutory offence (Securities Act, ss. 57(a) and 155(1)(b)), they were not imposed by a court. They were imposed by the Commission — a regulatory agency.

(ii) The Commission's Disgorgement Orders Are Not Exempt From Discharge Under Section 178(1)(a)

[52] In the same way, the Commission's disgorgement orders are not captured by s. 178(1)(a). The disgorgement orders were imposed by the Commission, not by a court.

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

(2) Section 178(1)(e)

[53] The Commission also relies on the s. 178(1)(e) exception:

> 178 (1) An order of discharge does not release the bankrupt from
>
> . . .
> (e) any debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation, other than a debt or liability that arises from an equity claim;

[54] For a debt or liability to survive bankruptcy pursuant to s. 178(1)(e), the creditor must establish three elements: (1) false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation; (2) a passing of property or provision of services; and (3) a link between the debt or liability and the fraud (Hennig (C.A.), at para. 57, citing McAteer v. Billes, 2007 ABCA 137, 409 A.R. 143, at para. 16).

[55] My colleague Karakatsanis J. and certain courts have held that s. 178(1)(e) embodies a "morality concep[t]" which "ensures that a deceitful wrongdoer will not be able to use the court system and the state's bankruptcy provisions as a mechanism for avoiding the consequence of his or her actions" (Cruise Connections Canada v. Szeto, 2015 BCCA 363, 78 B.C.L.R. (5th) 82, at para. 15; see also Jerrard, at p. 206; Bryant

v. Benjamin, 2023 QCCA 1021, at para. 42 (CanLII); see Karakatsanis J.'s reasons, at paras. 138-39). While I essentially agree that s. 178(1)(e) targets morally blameworthy conduct, I share the view stated by Professors Girgis and Telfer:

> . . . the common feature that underlies most cases interpreting section 178(1)(e), though sometimes imperfectly expressed, is the protection of creditors who have been victimized by deceitful statements. The case law in this area interprets this provision to target morally blameworthy conduct that gave rise to debt, not simply morally blameworthy conduct. [Emphasis added.]
> ((2023), at p. 452; see also Shaver-Kudell, at para. 23.)

[56] The Superintendent of Bankruptcy takes a similar view. Intervening on appeal, the Superintendent explains that s. 178(1)(e) "is aimed at making fraud victims whole, rather than at preserving penalties imposed for deterrence purposes" (I.F., at para. 18). By not releasing debts or liabilities that resulted directly from deceit, s. 178(1)(e) prevents debtors "from profiting as a result of their wrongdoing" (H.Y. Louie Co. v. Bowick, 2015 BCCA 256, 386 D.L.R. (4th) 117, at para. 47, per Newbury J.A., dissenting, but not on this point). I therefore disagree with my colleague that the "central focus" of s. 178(1)(e) is "deceitful conduct", not the "gain derived" from that conduct (para. 126 (emphasis deleted)). I am of the view that in the interpretation of s. 178(1)(e), "deceitful conduct" and "gain derived" are two inextricably linked concepts.

[57] Furthermore, it is through s. 172 of the BIA that Parliament has entrusted bankruptcy courts with broad discretion to decide whether morally reprehensible conduct should prevent a bankrupt from being discharged. Bankrupts who are not "honest but unfortunate" are not discharged or only discharged if certain conditions are met. In contrast, the s. 178(1) exceptions are focused on "excluding specific debts from being released by the order of discharge" (Moloney, at para. 85). I therefore do not agree with my colleague that s. 178(1)(e)'s "intention [is] to preclude dishonest debtors from benefitting from their dishonesty" (para. 139 (emphasis added)). As I have explained above, the "intention" behind this provision is more nuanced.

[58] In Deloitte Restructuring, our Court interpreted s. 19(2)(d) of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, which "is analogous in every respect to" s. 178(1)(e) of the BIA (para. 24; 9354-9186 Québec inc. v. Callidus Capital Corp., 2020 SCC 10, [2020] 1 S.C.R. 521, at para. 74; Century Services Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 SCC 60, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 379, at para. 78). Articulating the section's elements in a four-part test, our Court held as follows:

> To discharge its burden of proving that its claim relates to a debt "resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation", a creditor must establish on a balance of probabilities, the following four elements: (i) the debtor made a representation to the creditor; (ii) the representation was false; (iii) the debtor knew that the representation was false; (iv) the false representation was made to obtain property or a service . . . .
> (Deloitte Restructuring, at para. 25)

[59] This test applies in determining whether the administrative penalties and disgorgement orders are exempt from discharge under s. 178(1)(e). Prior to applying this test to the Commission's administrative penalties and disgorgement orders, I provide some guidance on each of s. 178(1)(e)'s three elements, which are reflected in, and form the basis of, the four-part Deloitte Restructuring test.

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

[60] At the outset, I note that the first step of the Deloitte Restructuring test may appear to stand for the proposition that only the creditor who was directly victimized by the false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation may bring a claim under s. 178(1)(e). As I explain below, that is not the case.

(a) False Pretences or Fraudulent Misrepresentation

[61] The terms "false pretences" and "fraudulent misrepresentation" are not defined in the BIA, but the case law has been unanimous in finding that deceitful statements are at the core of both (Shaver-Kudell, at paras. 5 and 42; see also C.A. reasons, at paras. 55 and 58-60; Hennig (C.A.), at para. 58; Cruise Connections, at para. 13; The Toronto-Dominion Bank v. Merenick, 2007 BCSC 1261, at para. 29 (CanLII); Buland Empire, at para. 14). For both concepts, the "essential test . . . is that the property was obtained by 'deceit', whether by positive act or failure to disclose material facts" (Sarra, Morawetz and Houlden, at § 7:199; see also Hennig (C.A.), at para. 112, per Pentelechuck J.A., concurring; Iroquois Falls Community Credit Union Ltd. (Liquidator of) v. Miljours (2009), 52 C.B.R (5th) 231 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 18).

[62] To establish "fraudulent misrepresentation" for the purposes of s. 178(1)(e), courts have relied on the classic elements from the House of Lords' decision in Derry v. Peek (1889), 14 App. Cas. 337, at p. 374 (Sarra, Morawetz and Houlden, at § 7:203; Wood, at p. 317; J. Girgis and T. G. W. Telfer, "The Fraudulent Misrepresentation and False Pretences Exception to the Bankruptcy Discharge: Balancing the Debtor's Fresh Start with Confidence in the Credit System", in Corraini and Nixon, eds., Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2022, 143 ("Girgis and Telfer (2022)"), at p. 154; Hennig (C.A.), at para. 58; Ste. Rose & District Cattle Feeders Co-op v. Geisel, 2010 MBCA 52, 255 Man. R. (2d) 45; Morris Bureau v. Darde, 2013 NSCA 121, 335 N.S.R. (2d) 378; Woolf v. Harrop (2003), 50 C.B.R. (4th) 309 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 71). These elements are as follows: (i) a representation was made; (ii) the representation was false; (iii) the representation was made knowingly, without belief in its truth (including with willful blindness or recklessness); and (iv) the creditor relied on the representation and turned over property to the debtor.

[63] As for "false pretences" in s. 178(1)(e), courts have relied on s. 361(1) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, for a definition of this term (Shaver-Kudell, at paras. 26-28; Water Matrix Inc. v. Carnevale, 2018 ONSC 6436, 65 C.B.R. (6th) 109, at para. 63, aff'd 2016 ONCA 875). Section 361(1) states:

> 361 (1) A false pretence is a representation of a matter of fact either present or past, made by words or otherwise, that is known by the person who makes it to be false and that is made with a fraudulent intent to induce the person to whom it is made to act on it.

[64] Therefore, it appears that the elements of fraudulent misrepresentation and false pretences are substantively the same, except that the definition of "false pretence" in s. 361(1) of the Criminal Code does not require detrimental reliance. However, given that s. 178(1)(e) of the BIA requires that property or services be obtained as a result of the fraudulent misrepresentation or false pretences, "that difference is immaterial in this context" (Girgis and Telfer (2022), at p. 154, citing Hennig (C.A.), at para. 58).

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

[65] Justice van Rensburg came to this same conclusion in Gray, noting that "[i]rrespective of whether one considers fraudulent misrepresentation or false pretences, s. 178(1)(e) requires a finding that the bankrupt 'obtained property by' such conduct" (para. 31; see also Shaver-Kudell, at paras. 30 and 35; Hennig (C.A.), at para. 58). "Most cases, when discussing s. 178(1)(e), treat fraudulent misrepresentation and false pretences as closely connected terms with the same requirements" (Shaver-Kudell, at para. 35). As a result, the Deloitte Restructuring test does not distinguish between the terms "false pretences" and "fraudulent misrepresentation". The overlap between the two terms ensures that debts or liabilities obtained by deceit that otherwise fulfill the s. 178(1)(e) elements are not discharged.

[66] The onus is on the creditor to prove that the debts or liabilities were obtained as a result of the debtor's false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation. A court cannot take judicial notice of fraud (B. Durnford, "Recent Developments under Section 178(1)(a) and (e) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act: A Case Study of Poonian v. British Columbia (Securities Commission)" (2023), 12 J.I.I.C. 107, at p. 128; see also p. 123, citing Hennig (C.A.), at para. 70, citing Canada (Attorney General) v. Bourassa (Trustee of), 2002 ABCA 205, 6 Alta. L.R. (4th) 223), nor can a court infer fraud in a cursory manner (Deloitte Restructuring, at para. 21). A party cannot simply presume or assume that a claim resulted from a deceitful statement without proving the required elements (Deloitte Restructuring, at para. 26).

[67] There are a number of ways in which a claimant can establish false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation for the purposes of s. 178(1)(e). The most straightforward is via a prior judgment that contains findings of fact to the effect that a debt resulted from false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation (Wood, at p. 313; Hennig (C.A.), at para. 62). Where a claimant has obtained a judgment that contains sufficient findings of fact, "nothing else need be done" (Wood, at p. 313; see also Bryant, at para. 69). If a judgment does not make express findings as to the necessary elements, it is open to the bankruptcy court to consider the pleadings that were available to the court that rendered a prior judgment, as well as the proceedings before that other court, in order to determine whether the elements can be established on the basis of those documents. A bankruptcy court can therefore look to the entire context of the proceedings in a previous action to determine whether the judgment debt can be characterized as one falling within the ambit of s. 178(1)(e) (Cruise Connections, at para. 29, citing H.Y. Louie, at paras. 87-88; see also Lawyers' Professional Indemnity Co. v. Rodriguez, 2018 ONCA 171, 139 O.R. (3d) 641, at para. 33; Hennig (C.A.), at para. 62).

[68] However, "even where findings possibly linked to fraud have been made in a previous trial or where a default judgment or a consent to judgment might have contained such findings", a court must generally make its own findings of fact in applying s. 178(1)(e) of the BIA (Deloitte Restructuring, at para. 29). Courts must be "consistent and rigorous in assessing the evidence presented to them in this regard" (para. 29; see also Pelletier v. CAE Rive-Nord, 2019 QCCA 2164, at paras. 13-19 (CanLII)). It follows that "the evidence tendered to prove fraud or dishonesty must be 'clear and cogent'" (Sharma v. Sandhu, 2019 MBQB 160, at para. 26 (CanLII)).

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

[69] In the case of a debt or liability resulting from a finding by an administrative tribunal, an application judge must make his or her own determination, based on a review of the record, as to whether the debt or liability falls within a s. 178(1) exception (Hennig (C.A.), at para. 63). Thus, even where all of the required findings for false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation have been expressly made by an administrative decision maker, "[a] determination of whether the claim falls within one of the categories of non-dischargeable claims must be made by a court" (Wood, at p. 314). In sum, for a creditor to be able to pursue its claim against a bankrupt under s. 178(1)(e), a court order declaring fraud must be obtained, whether "before, during or after a discharge from bankruptcy" (Bourassa, at para. 5).

(b) Passing of Property or Provision of Services

[70] The second requirement for a debt or liability to survive bankruptcy under s. 178(1)(e) is that there must have been a passing of property or provision of services. This requirement is reflected in the final element of the Deloitte Restructuring test, which is that "the false representation was made to obtain property or a service"

(para. 25). There must be a loss in the form of a transfer of property or delivery of services, as well as a debt or liability corresponding to that loss.

[71] The Poonians argue that s. 178(1)(e) should apply only when the debtor, and not a third party, obtains the property or services (A.F., at paras. 72-75). I disagree.

[72] This argument was also made and rejected in McAteer v. Billes, 2006 ABCA 312, 397 A.R. 365. The bankrupt argued that "property must pass to the bankrupt in order for s. 178(1)(e) to apply" (para. 8). The Alberta Court of Appeal held that "s. 178(1)(e) does not require property to pass to the tortfeasor in cases of fraudulent misrepresentation" (para. 7, citing Morgan v. Demers (1986), 71 A.R. 244 (C.A.)). I agree. The section does not specify that the "person perpetrating the fraud must be the person who obtained the property" (Varvis (Bankrupt), Re, 1999 ABQB 853, 254 A.R. 197, at para. 8).

[73] Section 178(1)(e) does not require that the bankrupt be the recipient of the property of which a person was deprived. The property need not have been obtained, or retained, by the bankrupt. It may have passed directly or indirectly from the person to a third party at the bankrupt's direction or on his or her behalf (Merenick, at para. 18). What is required is that the fraudulent misrepresentation induced a person to give the property to some other person (see Wood, at p. 317, citing McAteer (2006), and Merenick). That other person may be the bankrupt or someone associated with the bankrupt.

(c) Link Required Between the Debt or Liability and the Fraud

[74] Section 178(1)(e), in using the expression "resulting from", requires a causal link between the creation of the debt or liability and the debtor's deceit. In other words, to come within s. 178(1)(e), the debt or liability must have been created as a result of false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation (Sarra, Morawetz and Houlden, at § 7:198). Section 178(1)(e) therefore requires detrimental reliance by a person (Shaver-Kudell, at para. 30). However, as I explain in the next section, that person need not be the creditor.

[75] The words "resulting from" in s. 178(1)(e) connote a strict causation requirement. This is especially so given that the s. 178(1) exceptions must be interpreted narrowly. It is not sufficient that "the debt or liability 'arose out of' a fraudulent scheme'" (Gray, at para. 31). Nor is it sufficient for a debt or liability to be "in respect of", "in connection with" or "in relation to" a fraudulent scheme. Indeed, Parliament's intention to impose a strict causation requirement by choosing the words "resulting from" becomes clear when s. 178(1)(e) is compared with s. 178(1)(a), which employs the term "in respect of". As noted by Dickson J. (as he then was), "[t]he phrase 'in respect of' is probably the widest of any expression intended to convey some connection between two related subject matters" (Nowegijick, at p. 39; Markevich, at para. 26; see also Sullivan (7th ed.), at § 4.05). The same cannot be said of the phrase "resulting from", which requires a causal link: a debt or liability was caused by the debtor (or someone associated with the debtor) having obtained property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation.

[76] Section 178(1)(e) thus requires a "direct link". The direct link approach holds that only the debt or liability that represents the "value of the property [or services] obtained by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation" qualifies as non-dischargeable (Molloy v. Janes & Noseworthy Ltd. (1998), 164 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 176 (Nfld. C.A.), at para. 8; see also Sarra, Morawetz and Houlden, at § 7:202). This approach "is more consistent with the fresh start policy underlying bankruptcy law, since it limits the exception to the value obtained by the debtor as a result of her dishonesty" (Wood, at p. 318).

[77] The direct link requirement has been recognized and applied by several courts across Canada. In Gray, van Rensburg J.A. held that "[a] causal connection between the bankrupt's wrongdoing and the creation of the debt or liability is required" (para. 31). In Shaver-Kudell, Zarnett J.A. held that a deceitful statement by the debtor "must be the source of the debt or liability to the creditor" (para. 35). In The Workers' Compensation Board v. Petkau, 2018 SKCA 85, 429 D.L.R. (4th) 92, Schwann J.A. held that "there has to be evidence of a causal connection between the alleged fraud and the debt or liability said to have resulted from it" (para. 45). In Pietrzak, Re (2016), 39 C.B.R. (6th) 145 (Ont. S.C.J.), Master Mills concluded that "[i]t is not sufficient to show that a fraudulent misrepresentation or false pretence was made unless it is also shown that the property or service was obtained directly as a result thereof" (para. 9).

In McAteer (2007), the Alberta Court of Appeal held that s. 178(1)(e) requires "a finding of fraud, misrepresentation, or other reprehensible conduct that is clearly linked to the bankrupt's debt" (para. 28; see also Groupe Unigesco inc. v. Michaud, 2021 QCCQ 10330, at paras. 18-20 (CanLII); Water Matrix Inc., at para. 61; Dead End Survival, LLC v. Marhasin, 2020 ONSC 766, 77 C.B.R. (6th) 299, at para. 22).

[78] While the direct link requirement is rooted in ample authority, some courts have applied a less stringent standard. For example, the standard has been described as a "but-for" test: "But for the fraudulent misrepresentation by the [debtor], [the] Corporation would not have loaned him [the money]" (Woolf, at para. 72). The requisite link has also been described as "a material connection": "The false statement made by the defendant need only be materially connected to the actions of the plaintiff that resulted in damage" (Morris Bureau, at para. 18). Respectfully, I am not convinced that a debt or liability that is not directly linked to a deceitful statement by the debtor, or someone associated with the debtor, can survive a discharge from bankruptcy on the basis of the s. 178(1)(e) exception. The proper scope of s. 178(1)(e) "requires a deceitful statement by which the debtor obtained property or services, causing the debt or liability of the creditor to arise" (Shaver-Kudell, at para. 44).

[79] Goldstein, Re, 2011 ONSC 561, 74 C.B.R. (5th) 296, provides an illustration of the direct link requirement. In that case, a hearing panel of the Law Society of Upper Canada ruled that Mr. Goldstein had participated in dishonest or fraudulent conduct to obtain mortgage funds under false pretences, and it disbarred him. Mr. Goldstein was ordered to pay the Law Society $60,000 in costs in relation to the disbarment hearing. Mr. Goldstein subsequently made an assignment in bankruptcy. The Law Society sought a declaration under s. 178(1) of the BIA that the costs award would not be released by any discharge. Justice Morawetz concluded that the costs award resulted not from the fraud but rather from the Law Society disbarment hearing (para. 10). The costs award was therefore not directly linked to the fraud committed by Mr. Goldstein.

[80] My colleague would apply a less stringent causal link, one that does not limit the non-dischargeable debt or liability under s. 178(1)(e) to the value of the property or services obtained by deceit (paras. 118 and 125). She cites cases where courts have deemed punitive damages to be non-dischargeable debts under s. 178(1)(e) even though they exceed the value of the property or services obtained by deceit (para. 128). Punitive damages do not represent the value of property or services obtained by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation and therefore do not come within the s. 178(1)(e) exception. This does not mean, however, that such a debt will be released by an order of discharge. Punitive damages may be captured by another applicable s. 178(1) exception or by s. 172 of the BIA.

[81] I reiterate that s. 178(1) is not a "catchall of debts arising from morally objectionable conduct" (Shaver-Kudell, at para. 39). With respect, I disagree with my colleague that s. 178(1)(e) "should ultimately be interpreted purposively" (para. 138). My colleague's use of the word "purposively" is simply inconsistent with our Court's jurisprudence, which clearly establishes that s. 178(1)(e) "must be interpreted narrowly" (Deloitte Restructuring, at paras. 24-25). Through s. 178(1), Parliament "identifies categories of specific wrongful conduct that give rise to debts that are not released, and specifies the criteria to be applied" (Shaver-Kudell, at para. 39). "[E]ven though other forms of morally objectionable conduct giving rise to debts can easily be imagined", s. 178(1)(e) must be interpreted narrowly on the basis of "the specific terms identified" (ibid.). A narrow interpretation favours a direct link that limits the non-dischargeable debt or liability to the value of the property or services obtained by deceit.

[82] Thus, for a s. 178(1)(e) claim to succeed, there must be a direct link between the fraudulent statement in issue and the debt or liability the creditor is claiming.

(d) There Is No "Direct Victim" Requirement

[83] There is a final point I wish to address before determining whether the Commission's administrative penalties or disgorgement orders survive a discharge from bankruptcy under the s. 178(1)(e) exception. As I previously mentioned, the first step of the Deloitte Restructuring test may appear to stand for the proposition that only the creditor who was the victim of the false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation may bring a claim under s. 178(1)(e). That is not the case.

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

[84] In Hennig, Khullar J.A. (as she then was) held that "[a] creditor should only fall within s 178(1)(e) if he or she has been directly victimized by the fraudulent behaviour of the debtor" (para. 81 (emphasis in original)). Under this approach, "[t]he required link between the fraudulent statement and the debt is established only if the debtor makes the fraudulent statement to the creditor relying on s 178(1)(e)" (para. 78). She held that this is because "creditors deserve the preferential treatment given by s 178(1)(e) only if they are the victims of the debtor's fraudulent behaviour" (para. 92; see also Durnford, at p. 125).

[85] In the Court of Appeal below, Willcock J.A. expressly rejected this direct victim requirement and held that "the plain language of s. 178(1)(e) of the BIA does not restrict this exception to only those claims where the bankrupt made a deceitful statement to the creditor" (para. 70).

[86] Like Willcock J.A., I am not convinced that s. 178(1)(e) requires that the claiming creditor be the direct recipient of the deceitful statement. That being said, since s. 178(1)(e) requires detrimental reliance, there will always be a person who has been deprived of property or services as a result of a deceitful statement made by the debtor or someone associated with the debtor. More often than not, the person to whom the deceitful statement was made will be the claiming creditor. However, the jurisprudence reveals circumstances in which, even though the claiming creditor was not the direct recipient of the deceitful statement, all of the s. 178(1)(e) elements were met and the debt or liability properly survived bankruptcy.

[87] For example, in Woolf, the creditor bank sought a declaration that its judgment debt against the bankrupt, Mr. Harrop, had not been released by the order of discharge granted. The bank was the assignee of a mortgage that Mr. Harrop had originally executed in favour of another company. When Mr. Harrop took out the mortgage, he provided a statutory declaration to the original mortgagee indicating that he did not owe any income tax arrears. That declaration was false, and Mr. Harrop knew it was false. After the original mortgagee assigned the mortgage to the bank, Mr. Harrop defaulted and the bank obtained a judgment against him for the outstanding amount. Mr. Harrop made an assignment in bankruptcy, and following his discharge the bank sought a declaration that its default judgment survived under s. 178(1)(e) because Mr. Harrop had made a fraudulent misrepresentation to the original mortgagee. Mr. Harrop argued that the bank could not rely on s. 178(1)(e) because the fraudulent misrepresentation had been made not to it but rather to the original mortgagee. He also argued that the bank had not relied on his fraudulent misrepresentation.

[88] Justice Trafford rejected Mr. Harrop's arguments. He found that the bank had acquired all the legal rights and entitlements of the original mortgagee, including the right to sue Mr. Harrop. Further, he inferred that, had the bank known of the fraudulent misrepresentation, it would not have acquired the original mortgagee's legal interest. The bank's entitlement to relief under s. 178(1)(e) was no different than what the original mortgagee's entitlement would have been.

[89] Even though the bank was not the direct victim of Mr. Harrop's fraudulent misrepresentation, the outstanding debt on the mortgage was the direct result of Mr. Harrop having obtained property by fraudulent misrepresentation. I agree with Trafford J.'s conclusion that the bank's entitlement to relief under s. 178(1)(e) was no different than that of the original mortgagee (para. 75). The bank was entitled to a declaration that its judgment debt had not been released by the order of discharge, and Mr. Harrop could not protect himself against the legal consequences of his fraudulent misrepresentation on the basis that the bank was not the direct victim (para. 75; Girgis and Telfer (2023), at p. 452; see also Shaver-Kudell, at para. 5).

[90] In Ste. Rose, the Manitoba Court of Appeal found that a liability had not been released on discharge because it fell within s. 178(1)(e), even though the creditor was not the direct victim of the false pretences. The Ste. Rose & District Cattle Feeders Co-op and the debtor had entered into an agreement providing that Co-op would authorize funding so that the debtor could purchase cattle. The agreement also required the debtor to notify Co-op when the cattle were to be sold and to ensure that the proceeds of that sale were paid directly to Co-op. The debtor and his son devised a plan whereby the son sold the cattle in his own name. The son deceitfully held out to a transport driver and an auctioneer that he owned the cattle. The proceeds of sale were deposited in the son's credit union account, in accordance with the plan. However, the son was indebted to the credit union. When the funds were deposited in the son's account, the credit union seized the amount and applied it to his debt. The debtor defaulted on repaying Co-op's loan, and Co-op suffered a corresponding loss. The debtor and his son consented to judgment in favour of Co-op. Both the debtor and his son then made assignments in bankruptcy and were later discharged. Co-op filed an application seeking a declaration under s. 178(1)(e) that the liability of the debtor and his son arising from the judgment had not been released by the discharge.

[91] Justice Freedman held that the debtor and his son had obtained "property", in the form of the proceeds of sale, by false pretences. This had created a liability toward Co-op, which had resulted in the judgment. The debtor had withheld relevant information from Co-op by not telling it that the proceeds of sale would be kept by his son. Co-op had relied on the debtor's fraudulent misrepresentation to its detriment. Further, by participating in the fraudulent sale of the cattle, the debtor had kept up the false pretence that his son was entitled to the proceeds. On this basis, the debtor's liability to Co-op survived the discharge from bankruptcy.

[92] With respect to the son's liability to Co-op, his false statements had been made to the auction house and the truck driver, not to the creditor, Co-op. However, this third-party involvement did not change the fact that Co-op had been deprived of its property because of the son's false statements. For this reason, the court found under s. 178(1)(e) that the debt had not been discharged.

[93] In most cases, the claiming creditor will be the party directly victimized by the false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation. This is especially so given that the creditor bears the onus of proving that a debt or liability falls within one of the listed exceptions.

[94] In fact, it is on this basis that the Deloitte Restructuring test appears to endorse the direct victim requirement: "To discharge its burden of proving that its claim relates to a debt 'resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation', a creditor must establish [that] the debtor made a representation to the creditor . . ." (para. 25 (emphasis added)). Deloitte Restructuring was a "typical" case in the sense that the City of Montréal was both the victim of the alleged fraud and the creditor invoking s. 19(2)(d) of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act. However, the wording of s. 178(1)(e) of the BIA does not import a direct victim requirement. A creditor who is not a direct victim is thus not barred from bringing a claim under s. 178(1)(e) provided that the claim is the result of a person being deprived of property or services after having detrimentally relied on the debtor's false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation.

[95] I reject a direct victim requirement on the basis that it would read an additional requirement into s. 178(1)(e): that the statements that resulted in a person being deprived of property or services must have been made directly to the creditor, not to a third party (Girgis and Telfer (2022), at p. 183). However, the absence of a direct victim requirement does not change the fact that s. 178(1)(e) is limited to the value of the property or services obtained by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation.

(e) Application of Section 178(1)(e) to the Commission's Orders

[96] To discharge its burden of proving that its claims relate to a debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation, the Commission must establish that the Poonians knowingly made a false representation in order to obtain property or services (Deloitte Restructuring, at para. 25). The debt or liability being claimed must be directly linked to the Poonians' false representation.

[97] In assessing whether the Poonians knowingly made false statements, the chambers judge considered the Commission's decisions. As noted above, when a party relies on the findings and conclusions of an administrative decision maker to establish that the debtor made a fraudulent statement, the court must still make its own determination based on a review of the record, even where the administrative findings of fraud are express.

[98] On review of the Commission's Reassessment Decision, the chambers judge concluded that because the Poonians' deceitful scheme had deliberately misled the public and investors as to the true value of the OSE shares, it was "at its core a fraudulent misrepresentation and false pretense" (para. 103). In the Reassessment Decision, the Commission held that the Poonians had breached s. 57(a) of the Securities Act "by engaging in, or participating in, conduct that they knew, or reasonably should have known, would result in, or contribute to, a misleading appearance of trading activity in, or an artificial price for, shares of OSE Corp." (para. 6). The Poonians' market manipulation was thus characterized as fraudulent by both the Commission and the chambers judge.

[99] Like Willcock J.A., I see no error in the chambers judge's conclusion that the Poonians' scheme to mislead and exploit investors amounted to fraudulent misrepresentation (para. 56). The Poonians falsely and knowingly misrepresented the price of the OSE shares in order to turn a profit. The first s. 178(1)(e) requirement is therefore met.

[100] The Poonians obtained property or services as a result of their fraudulent misrepresentation. As the chambers judge noted, "[t]hrough that scheme the Poonians 'obtained property', in the form of millions of dollars" (para. 103). Mr. Poonian obtained $746,676 directly and $572,491 indirectly through the accounts of secondary participants in the scheme. In addition, he obtained $1,126,260 through the account of another participant and was ordered to pay that amount on a joint and several basis. Ms. Poonian obtained $3,149,935 (Reassessment Decision, at paras. 77-79). While Mr. Poonian obtained some amounts indirectly through the accounts of other participants in the scheme, I have concluded that it is not necessary that the bankrupt directly obtain or retain the property for the s. 178(1)(e) exception to apply. As is the case here, the property may pass from a person or group of people (the deceived investors) to a third party (another participant) at the direction of the bankrupt (Mr. Poonian). The second s. 178(1)(e) requirement is therefore met.

[101] The Commission claims that both its administrative penalties and its disgorgement orders will survive any discharge from bankruptcy by operation of the exception in s. 178(1)(e) because they are debts resulting from the Poonians having obtained millions of dollars because of their fraudulent misrepresentation. To determine whether this is the case, I must consider separately whether the administrative penalties and the disgorgement orders meet the third s. 178(1)(e) requirement.

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

(i) The Commission's Administrative Penalties Did Not Result From the Fraudulent Scheme

[102] As noted above, a claim under s. 178(1)(e) must result from the debtor (or someone associated with the debtor) having obtained property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation. A direct link between the debt or liability and the fraudulent conduct is required. It is only the value of the property or services obtained as a result of that conduct that is not released by an order of discharge (Molloy, at para. 8). On this basis, the Commission's administrative penalties do not come within the purview of s. 178(1)(e).

[103] The debt represented by the Commission's administrative penalties did not result directly from the Poonians' fraudulent misrepresentation. Rather, it arose indirectly as a result of the Commission's decision to sanction the Poonians for having obtained property through deceitful statements to investors (Girgis and Telfer (2023), at p. 448; Nocilla, at p. 186).

[104] As I explained above, Goldstein helps to illustrate the direct link requirement. In that case, Morawetz J. concluded that the costs award at issue resulted not from the bankrupt's fraud but rather from a Law Society disbarment hearing. Even though the Law Society found that Mr. Goldstein "had knowingly assisted or participated in dishonest or fraudulent conduct to obtain mortgage funds under false pretenses", the costs award itself did not result directly from the fraud committed by Mr. Goldstein and therefore did not fall within s. 178(1)(e) (Goldstein, at paras. 3 and 10-11). My colleague acknowledges that the "costs award was a step removed from and thus not 'directly caused' by the fraudulent conduct" and that the source of the liability was the disbarment hearing, not the deceit (para. 133 (emphasis in original)). However, she distinguishes Goldstein on the basis that, in the instant case, the Commission does not claim that the costs of its proceeding against the Poonians are non-dischargeable and that "the purpose of the Commission's hearing was to create such a debt or liability resulting directly from the false pretences" (para. 134). With respect, this distinction is untenable.

[105] Both a costs award and a penalty imposed by a regulator arise indirectly from deceitful conduct. Without the occurrence and sanctioning of that conduct, neither a penalty nor a costs award would exist. Fundamentally, however, both a costs award and an administrative penalty result from the regulator's choice to sanction the impugned conduct. Neither is the direct result of the deceit. In other words, but for Mr. Goldstein's fraud, there would have been no costs award. Similarly, but for the Poonians' fraud, there would be no administrative penalty. However, as I have explained, and as my colleague acknowledges at para. 124 of her reasons, a but-for connection is not the appropriate link under s. 178(1)(e). A direct causal link is required. I therefore respectfully disagree with my colleague that the Commission's administrative penalties "have as their only source or origin the Poonians' deceitful conduct" (para. 134 (emphasis in original)). Rather, their only source is the Sanctions Decision: "Considering it to be in the public interest, and pursuant to sections 161 and 162 of the Act, we order that . . . a) [Thalbinder] Poonian pay to the Commission an administrative penalty of $10 million; b) [Shailu] Poonian pay to the Commission an administrative penalty of $3.5 million" (para. 96).

[106] If the exempt debt or liability is not restricted to the value of the property or services obtained by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation — regardless of whether the claimant is the direct victim or a party like the Commission — then s. 178(1)(e) has the potential to capture debts or liabilities that are not the direct result of deceit. My colleague relies on Justice Romaine's interpretation of s. 178(1)(e) in Hennig (Q.B.) to find that the Commission's administrative penalties are captured by this section (para. 139). That decision was reversed on appeal. Justice Khullar (as she then was) held that Romaine J. had "incorrectly identified the purpose of s 178(1)" and engaged in "a bit of reverse engineering", and that her "purposive and remedial approach . . . resulted in shifting the delicate balance achieved by Parliament" (Hennig (C.A.), para. 26). I agree. As professors Girgis and Telfer note, if such other debts or liabilities, including administrative penalties, "are to survive bankruptcy discharge, it should be through a clear and intentional exemption provided by Parliament, not because of a court's overly broad interpretation of an exception to the discharge" ((2023), at p. 454; see also Nocilla, at p. 187; Hennig (C.A.), at para. 102).

[107] The administrative penalties are not the direct result of the Poonians' fraudulent misrepresentation. They do not survive a discharge from bankruptcy under s. 178(1)(e).

(ii) The Commission's Disgorgement Orders Did Result From the Fraudulent Scheme

[108] While the administrative penalties did not result from the Poonians having obtained property by fraudulent misrepresentation, the situation is different for the disgorgement orders.

[109] The disgorgement orders were made under s. 161(1)(g) of the Securities Act and represent the value of the Poonians' fraud — the funds that the Poonians gained as a result of their market manipulation. Section 161(1)(g) states:

> 161 (1) If the commission or the executive director considers it to be in the public interest, the commission or the executive director, after a hearing, may order one or more of the following:
> . . .
>
> (g) if a person has not complied with this Act, the regulations or a decision of the commission or the executive director, that the person pay to the commission any amount obtained, or payment or loss avoided, directly or indirectly, as a result of the failure to comply or the contravention;

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

Thus, where a person has not complied with a provision of the Securities Act, the Commission may order that person to pay to the Commission any amount obtained as a result of the failure to comply.

[110] The purpose of this section "is to compel a wrongdoer to give up any ill-gotten amounts" (2017 BCCA 207, 95 B.C.L.R. (5th) 319 ("Poonian (2017)"), at para. 81). By taking away the amounts obtained as a result of a contravention of the Securities Act, the section "deprives a person who fails to comply of any benefit" (para. 82; see also para. 100).

[111] Sections 15 and 15.1 of the Securities Act address what the Commission must do with the funds received from s. 161(1)(g) disgorgement orders. Section 15.1 and the Securities Regulation, B.C. Reg. 196/97, set out a notice and claims procedure for persons who have suffered a pecuniary loss as a direct result of misconduct that resulted in an order under s. 161(1)(g). The Commission must publish a notice if it receives money from an order under s. 161(1)(g) (s. 15.1(1)). A person may make a claim to the money by submitting an application (s. 15.1(2)). If the Commission receives such an application, it will administer the claim in accordance with the regulations, and pay to the applicant all or part of the amount claimed (s. 15.1(3)).

[112] As noted by the British Columbia Court of Appeal, s. 161(1)(g) deters persons from contravening the Securities Act by removing the incentive to contravene, because it strips them of the benefit of their wrongdoing (Poonian (2017), at para. 88). When issuing an order under s. 161(1)(g), the Commission may deduct any amounts already returned to the victim or victims (para. 143). The amounts owed under disgorgement orders thus represent the amounts the debtor obtained as a result of his or her wrongful conduct. Furthermore, though compensation is not the purpose of this section, compensation is a possible effect of a s. 161(1)(g) order, because restitution may occur via the s. 15.1 claims procedure (paras. 75-76).

[113] The amounts that the Poonians have been ordered to pay under s. 161(1)(g) represent the amounts they obtained as a result of their fraudulent market manipulation. There is therefore a direct link between their fraudulent conduct and the Commission's disgorgement orders. While I have concluded that the Commission need not have been directly victimized by the Poonians' conduct in order to claim that the disgorgement orders are non-dischargeable under s. 178(1)(e), the victim investors may very well be the ultimate recipients of the sums of which they were deprived, provided that they submit appropriate claims in accordance with the s. 15.1 procedure.

[114] The Commission's disgorgement orders are captured by the s. 178(1)(e) exception and will not be released by any order of discharge.

VI. Conclusion

[115] I would overturn the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the Commission's administrative penalties are debts not released by any order of discharge because they fall within s. 178(1)(e) of the BIA. I would affirm the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the Commission's disgorgement orders come within the purview of s. 178(1)(e). The disgorgement orders thus remain enforceable against the Poonians and survive any order of discharge under the BIA. I would also uphold the Court of Appeal's conclusion that neither the administrative penalties nor the disgorgement orders are exempt from discharge pursuant to s. 178(1)(a).

[116] Therefore, the appeal is allowed in part and the chambers judge's order is set aside in part. The Commission's application for a declaration that the amounts the Poonians owe to the Commission pursuant to the Sanctions Decision (i.e. the administrative penalties) shall not be released by any order of discharge is dismissed. For clarity, the chambers judge's order that the amounts the Poonians owe to the Commission pursuant to the Reassessment Decision (i.e. the disgorgement orders) shall not be released by any order of discharge is upheld. In the particular circumstance of this appeal, I would not award costs.

The reasons of Karakatsanis and Martin JJ. were delivered by

KARAKATSANIS J. —

[117] I agree with Justice Côté, for the reasons she gives, that the administrative penalties and the disgorgement orders imposed by the British Columbia Securities Commission do not survive bankruptcy under s. 178(1)(a) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 (BIA).

2024 SCC 28 (CanLII)

[118] We part company, however, on interpreting the scope of the causation requirement contemplated by the words "resulting from" in s. 178(1)(e) of the BIA. I do not accept that "any debt or liability" is limited to the value of the property obtained by deceit (s. 178(1)(e)). I conclude, as did the British Columbia Court of Appeal (2022 BCCA 274, 65 B.C.L.R. (6th) 213), that both the disgorgement orders and the administrative penalties fall within s. 178(1)(e) as "any debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation". Thus, both orders survive bankruptcy. I would dismiss the appeal.

[119] The bankrupts, Thalbinder Singh Poonian and Shailu Poonian, engaged in a "complex, predatory and highly deceptive . . . scheme that targeted unsophisticated investors" facing financial distress (2021 BCSC 555, at para. 31 (CanLII); see also 2015 BCSECCOM 96 (Sanctions Decision), at para. 18 (CanLII)). The Commission found that the bankrupts manipulated the market, contravening s. 57(a) (now s. 57(1)(a)) of the British Columbia Securities Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 418, a deemed offence under that Act. Based on this, the Commission sanctioned the Poonians in the public interest, with disgorgement orders under s. 161(1)(g) of the Securities Act of about $5.6 million; and administrative penalties under s. 162(1) totalling $13.5 million.

[120] The Poonians' market manipulation scheme satisfied the condition of s. 178(1)(e) of the BIA that property be obtained as a result of their false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentations. They obtained about $5.6 million through their scheme

(Côté J.'s reasons, at paras. 99-100; see also 2018 BCSECCOM 160, at paras. 77-79 (CanLII)).

[121] Thus, the only remaining question is whether the debts or liabilities at issue "result from" the Poonians' deceitful conduct. Are the different monetary sanctions the Commission imposed "resulting from" the fact that property was obtained by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation?

[122] In answering this question, I share a number of Côté J.'s conclusions, for the reasons she gives. The property need not directly pass to the bankrupt; the "person perpetrating the fraud" need not be the person who obtained the property (para. 72, citing Varvis (Bankrupt), Re, 1999 ABQB 853, 254 A.R. 197, at para. 8). It is enough if someone associated with the bankrupt benefits (Côté J.'s reasons, at paras. 71-73). Further, s. 178(1)(e) does not require that the person claiming the exemption be the person who has directly sustained the loss as a result of the false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation (paras. 83-95).

[123] Rather, what is required is simply that the deceitful conduct be that of the bankrupt, as long as someone associated with them has obtained property or services by pretences that the bankrupt knew to be false. The passing of property or services ensures that abstract fraudulent statements do not trigger the application of the exception when they have not resulted in detrimental reliance (see Côté J.'s reasons, at para. 74, citing Shaver-Kudell Manufacturing Inc. v. Knight Manufacturing Inc., 2021 ONCA 925, 160 O.R. (3d) 205, at para. 30).

[124] The more difficult issue, however, is the degree of link required between the debt and the deceitful behaviour. Given the scheme of the BIA and its broader purpose of financial rehabilitation, the non-discretionary exception in s. 178(1)(e) must be interpreted narrowly. It is common ground that there must be a direct link between the debt or liability claimed and the fraudulent statement (Côté J.'s reasons, at para. 77, citing Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp. v. Gray, 2014 ONCA 236, 119 O.R. (3d) 710, at para. 31; Shaver-Kudell, at para. 35; The Workers' Compensation Board v. Petkau, 2018 SKCA 85, 429 D.L.R. (4th) 92, at para. 45; Pietrzak, Re (2016), 39 C.B.R. (6th) 145 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 9; McAteer v. Billes, 2007 ABCA 137, 409 A.R. 143, at para. 28; Groupe Unigesco inc. v. Michaud, 2021 QCCQ 10330, at paras. 18-20 (CanLII); Water Matrix Inc. v. Carnevale, 2018 ONSC 6436, 65 C.B.R. (6th) 109, at para. 61; Dead End Survival, LLC v. Marhasin, 2020 ONSC 766, 77 C.B.R. (6th) 299, at para. 22). I too would reject a weak link such as "in respect of", "in connection with", "in relation to" or "but for" (Côté J.'s reasons, at paras. 75 and 78). A direct causal link between the creation of the debt or liability and the debtor's deceit is required by the language "resulting from", in an exception that must be narrowly construed (paras. 74-75).

[125] But I would not go further and require that there must be a direct correspondence between the value of the debt or liability and the gain made by the bankrupt or the person associated with the bankrupt. My colleague reasons that because there must be detrimental reliance in the form of a transfer of property or service, the quantum of the non-dischargeable debt or liability must be limited to "only the value" obtained as a result of the deceit (para. 102; see also para. 76). I disagree. While the exception must be interpreted narrowly, it must be tethered to the provision fashioned by Parliament.

[126] Just as s. 178(1)(e) does not require that there be an exact correlation between the person claiming the exemption and the victims of that deceitful conduct, it does not require that the quantum of the debt or liability be limited by the quantum of the property obtained as a result of that deceitful conduct. Such a requirement is unsupported by the jurisprudence, is not found in the text of the provision, and is inconsistent with the provision's central focus. The central focus is the deceitful conduct at the source of the debt or liability, not the exact gain derived thereby.

[127] Section 178(1)(e) has been applied by courts to permit the exemption of debts or liabilities that exceed the value of the bankrupt's gain. If the quantum of the debt or liability under s. 178(1)(e) was limited to the value of property obtained, neither compensatory damages exceeding the value of the gain nor punitive damages awarded at private law would ever be exempt from discharge under s. 178(1)(e).

[128] Unsurprisingly, it is hard to find a single instance when courts have limited the recovery of punitive damages against a bankrupt, under s. 178(1)(e), on the basis that it would exceed the value of the property obtained by the bankrupt. On the contrary, the jurisprudence overwhelmingly shows that if punitive damages directly result from the deceitful conduct targeted by s. 178(1)(e), they qualify for the exception (see, e.g., Grewal v. Brar, 2015 MBQB 3, 313 Man. R. (2d) 94, at para. 30; Bank of Montreal v.

1886758 Ontario Inc., 2022 ONSC 4642, 1 C.B.R. (7th) 213, at paras. 38 and 45; A.J. Lanzarotta Fruits & Vegetables Ltd. v. United Farmers, 2024 ONSC 1780, 12 C.B.R. (7th) 371, at paras. 79 and 82; Celanese Canada Inc. v. Murray Demolition Corp., 2010 CanLII 29089 (Ont. S.C.J.), at paras. 14 and 22; Horth v. Lalonde-Rousseau, 2021 QCCQ 3668, at paras. 102 and 119-21 (CanLII); Maison des jeunes de Contrecœur v. Bourdon, 2011 QCCQ 3476, at paras. 103-7 (CanLII); Vivacqua v. Contino, 2009 CanLII 14574 (Ont. S.C.J.), at paras. 18-23; Agriculture Financial Services Corp. v. Zaborski, 2009 ABQB 183, 58 C.B.R. (5th) 301, at paras. 3 and 24; see also Dead End Survival, at paras. 28-30).

[129] The cases my colleague relies on, as noted above, help show that a weak link is not enough to satisfy the requirements of s. 178(1)(e). An overly broad causation threshold would stray from a narrow reading of s. 178(1)(e). For the threshold to be met, the conduct must be at the source, or origin, of the debt or liability. The deceitful conduct must have directly created it. But none of those cases stand for the proposition that a strict causation test requires the debt or liability to be limited to the value of the property obtained.

[130] Instead, as Roderick J. Wood notes, a direct causation requirement means that where only part of a liability can be traced to deceitful conduct, but not the balance, only the part induced by fraudulent conduct will be exempt from discharge (Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law (2nd ed. 2015), at pp. 317-18). Courts can and should undertake an apportionment exercise to determine the part of a debt or liability that can be attributed to fraudulent conduct. This exercise is "consistent with the fresh start policy underlying bankruptcy law" (p. 318), as it ensures bankrupts can obtain the benefit of a discharge for the part of the total debt that was incurred honestly (Copper Cliff Community Credit Union Ltd. v. Parker (1977), 18 O.R. (2d) 49 (C.A.), at p. 54; see also J. Sarra, G. B. Morawetz and L. W. Houlden, The 2024 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (2024), at § 7:202).

[131] But where a debt or liability is entirely caused by fraudulent conduct, such as punitive damages imposed to sanction the conduct, there is no reason to limit the application of s. 178(1)(e) only to the gain ultimately obtained by the bankrupt (or someone associated with the bankrupt).

[132] In Goldstein, Re, 2011 ONSC 561, 74 C.B.R. (5th) 296, a lawyer, Mr. Goldstein, obtained mortgage funds as a result of false pretences. Given this fraudulent conduct, the Law Society of Upper Canada held a hearing to disbar him. The costs award Mr. Goldstein was ordered to pay in relation to the disbarment hearing was found not to "result from" the underlying fraud for the purposes of s. 178(1)(e).

[133] The circumstances in Goldstein differ from those in this case. The costs award was a step removed from and thus not "directly caused" by the fraudulent conduct. The source or origin of the liability was the disbarment hearing, not the false pretences (paras. 10-11). It cannot be said that the debt resulted from the fraudulent conduct itself. The purpose of a disbarment hearing is not to impose or recover payment on "any debt or liability" envisaged by s. 178(1)(e).

[134] Here, by contrast, the purpose of the Commission's hearing was to create such a debt or liability resulting directly from the false pretences. The amounts the Commission submits should survive discharge (which do not include costs) thus have as their only source or origin the Poonians' deceitful conduct. Both the disgorgement orders and the administrative penalties under the Securities Act are monetary sanctions for the unlawful conduct. This is not a step removed. As my colleague notes, the breach of the Securities Act is factually based on obtaining property by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation within the meaning of s. 178(1)(e) of the BIA (paras. 99-100).

[135] Granted, the administrative penalties include an element of general deterrence for the "egregious" nature of the conduct and the magnitude of the scale on which it took place (Sanctions Decision, at paras. 18 and 92). Administrative penalties imposed under the Securities Act deter particular conduct and induce compliance (British Columbia Securities Commission v. Branch, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 59; Cartaway Resources Corp. (Re), 2004 SCC 26, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 672, at paras. 58-62). But like punitive damages imposed at private law, the administrative penalties arise directly from the type of conduct that they sanction. Nothing in s. 178(1)(e) excludes a debt or liability that has an element of general deterrence (or compensatory damages that exceed the gain), provided it directly results from obtaining a financial benefit through false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentations. To exclude administrative penalties on that basis amounts to reading in an additional limitation that is found nowhere in the text of the provision.

[136] Limiting the debt or liability based on the value of the gain derived by the bankrupt is not only absent from the text, it is also inconsistent with the purpose of the exception set out in s. 178(1)(e). As this court has acknowledged, the financial rehabilitation of the bankrupt has its limits (Alberta (Attorney General) v. Moloney, 2015 SCC 51, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 327, at para. 37). The general availability of a discharge — a fresh start — is limited by the exceptions in s. 178(1), which reflect policy choices that some debts or liabilities should survive bankruptcy. They are "the kind of claims that society, through Parliament, considers to be of a quality that outweighs any possible benefit in the bankrupt being relieved of them" (Sarra, Morawetz and Houlden, at § 7:185; Jerrard v. Peacock (1985), 37 Alta. L.R. (2d) 197 (Q.B.), at p. 206).

[137] Many exceptions provided for in s. 178(1) ensure that only "honest but unfortunate" debtors can benefit from a discharge (Sarra, Morawetz and Houlden, at § 7:69). They are based on society's view, reflected by Parliament, that a bankrupt should not be free of some types of debts or liabilities where they are the direct consequences of an undesirable conduct. Parliament has determined that some bankrupts simply do not deserve to be free of particular debts, based on the nature of the conduct giving rise to those debts. These exceptions are focused not on the person claiming the exemption but on "categories of specific wrongful conduct that give rise to debts that are not released" (Shaver-Kudell, at para. 39). For example, the following all survive bankruptcy because the principle of financial rehabilitation gives way to society's denunciation of these kinds of conduct: fines or penalties imposed by a court in respect of an offence (s. 178(1)(a)); damages awarded in respect of intentional infliction of bodily harm or sexual assault (s. 178(1)(a.1)); and debts or liabilities arising out of fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity (s. 178(1)(d)). The objective is to prevent abuse of the fresh start principle, and the focus is the nature of the wrongful conduct.

[138] A similar objective animates s. 178(1)(e). It is a "moral sanction" aimed at preventing the bankrupt from being rewarded by a release of liability because of their undeserving conduct that has resulted in detrimental reliance (Shaver-Kudell, at para. 40; Simone v. Daley (1999), 43 O.R. (3d) 511 (C.A.), at pp. 521-22; Cruise Connections Canada v. Szeto, 2015 BCCA 363, 78 B.C.L.R. (5th) 82, at para. 15; Ste. Rose & District Cattle Feeders Co-op v. Geisel, 2010 MBCA 52, 255 Man. R. (2d) 45, at paras. 109-16). Section 178(1)(e) should ultimately be interpreted purposively so as to "ensure that dishonest debtors do not benefit from their dishonesty" (McAteer v. Billes, 2006 ABCA 312, 397 A.R. 365, at para. 10; see also Alberta Securities Commission v. Hennig, 2020 ABQB 48, 8 Alta. L.R. (7th) 177, at para. 66, rev'd 2021 ABCA 411, 34 Alta. L.R. (7th) 219).

[139] I agree with Romaine J. in Hennig (Q.B.) that an interpretation of s. 178(1)(e) that considers the provision's intention to preclude dishonest debtors from benefitting from their dishonesty "would surely extend to a decision of a securities commission, charged with enforcing securities laws in order to protect the [interests of the] public and promoting the integrity of the capital markets" (para. 76). The Commission is "a regulatory authority representing the interests of those affected by the fraudulent misrepresentations and/or false pretences" (para. 76) and as a result, its administrative penalties should not be treated as if they were a debt stemming from an unrelated creditor seeking to unduly invoke s. 178(1)(e).

[140] Focusing only on the gain derived in the abstract would circumvent the precise mischief s. 178(1)(e) was meant to address, as it would permit bankrupts to benefit from their dishonesty through a release of liability, even when the debt directly results from the specific misconduct targeted by Parliament. Rehabilitation of the bankrupt is not best served if the bankrupt can obtain a discharge for liabilities directly resulting from fraudulent conduct.

[141] In conclusion, both the disgorgement orders and the administrative penalties are monetary sanctions imposed because of, and thus resulting from, deceitful conduct that Parliament specifically sought to address. They are both debts that originate from the Poonians having obtained property by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentations. Accordingly, both properly fall within the narrow scope of s. 178(1)(e) and should not be released by any order of discharge.

[142] I would dismiss the appeal.

c. R-2.2.0.0.3 — Voluntary Reimbursement Program, CQLR, c. R-2.2.0.0.3, r. 1.

In August 2018, the Superior Court made an initial order by which SM Group, a consulting engineering firm, became subject to proceedings under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act ("CCAA"). The order stayed the rights and remedies of creditors, among other things, and appointed a monitor. Following that order, SM Group continued to perform work for Ville de Montréal ("City"). However, the City refused to pay for that work and invoked its right to effect compensation between what it owed SM Group and two claims it allegedly had against SM Group that arose before the initial order. Those claims are related to the application of the Act to ensure mainly the recovery of amounts improperly paid as a result of fraud or fraudulent tactics in connection with public contracts ("Bill 26") and, according to the City, result from fraud on SM Group's part. The first claim arises from a settlement agreement entered into under the Voluntary Reimbursement Program ("VRP") that resulted from Bill 26 ("VRP claim"). The second claim is based on a proceeding brought by the City against SM Group, in which it claimed money from SM Group for allegedly having participated in collusion in relation to a call for tenders for a water meter contract.

In response to the City's refusal to pay for the work done by SM Group after the initial order, the monitor applied for a declaratory judgment stating that compensation could not be effected with respect to the amounts owed by the City to SM Group. The supervising judge granted the application. The Court of Appeal reached the same conclusion as the supervising judge: that the compensation invoked by the City could not be effected. It found that a claim relating to fraud falling within s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA is not an exception to the rule stated in Quebec (Agence du revenu) v. Kitco Metals Inc., 2017 QCCA 268, whereby compensation between debts arising before and after an initial order ("pre-post compensation") is prohibited. It was also of the view that the City had not proved that s. 19(2)(d) applied to its claims. Finally, with regard to the water meter contract claim, the Court of Appeal agreed with the supervising judge that the conditions for judicial compensation were not met, since the certainty, liquidity and exigibility of that claim had to be determined later in a proceeding other than that of the restructuring case.

19(2)d), 21 — Loi visant principalement la récupération de sommes payées injustement à la suite de fraudes ou de manœuvres dolosives dans le cadre de contrats publics, RLRQ, c. R-2.2.0.0.3 — Programme de remboursement volontaire, RLRQ, c. R-2.2.0.0.3, r. 1.

En août 2018, la Cour supérieure rend une ordonnance initiale assujettissant Groupe SM, une firme de génie-conseil, à des procédures déposées en vertu de la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies (« LACC »). L'ordonnance suspend notamment les droits et recours des créanciers et nomme un contrôleur. Postérieurement à cette ordonnance, Groupe SM continue à effectuer des travaux dont bénéficie la Ville de Montréal. La Ville refuse toutefois de payer ces travaux et invoque son droit d'opérer compensation entre ce qu'elle doit à Groupe SM et deux créances, nées avant l'ordonnance initiale, qu'elle prétend détenir contre celui-ci. Ces créances sont liées à l'application de la Loi visant principalement la récupération de sommes payées injustement à la suite de fraudes ou de manœuvres dolosives dans le cadre de contrats publics (« Loi 26 ») et, selon la Ville, résulteraient de fraude de Groupe SM. La première créance découle d'une entente de règlement intervenue dans le cadre du Programme de remboursement volontaire (« PRV ») issu de la Loi 26 (« créance PRV »). La seconde créance est fondée sur un recours intenté par la Ville contre Groupe SM dans lequel elle lui réclame de l'argent au motif qu'il aurait participé à une collusion relativement à l'appel d'offres du contrat des compteurs d'eau.

En réponse au refus de la Ville de payer les travaux effectués par Groupe SM après l'émission de l'ordonnance initiale, le contrôleur demande un jugement déclaratoire portant que les sommes dues à Groupe SM par la Ville ne peuvent faire l'objet de compensation. La juge surveillante accueille la demande. À l'instar de cette dernière, la Cour d'appel conclut que la compensation invoquée par la Ville ne peut s'opérer. Elle estime qu'une créance relative à la fraude visée par l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC ne constitue pas une exception à la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Québec (Agence du revenu) c. Métaux Kitco inc., 2017 QCCA 268, 46 C.B.R. (6th) 173, selon laquelle la compensation entre des dettes nées avant et après l'émission d'une ordonnance initiale (« compensation pré-post ») est interdite. Elle est également d'avis que la Ville n'a pas prouvé que ses créances sont visées par l'al. 19(2)d). Enfin, en ce qui concerne la créance relative au contrat des compteurs d'eau, la Cour d'appel, tout comme la juge surveillante, estime que les conditions de la compensation judiciaire ne sont pas réunies, le caractère certain, liquide et exigible de cette créance devant être déterminé postérieurement dans une autre instance que celle du dossier de restructuration.

Held (Brown J. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Wagner C.J. and Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Côté, Rowe and Martin JJ.: First, a claim arising from an agreement entered into under the VRP is not necessarily a claim that relates to a debt resulting from fraud pursuant to s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA. In this case, the City has not shown that the VRP claim relates to a debt resulting from fraud within the meaning of that provision. Second, with regard to pre-post compensation, a supervising judge has the discretion to stay the exercise of a right to pre-post compensation, or set-off, invoked by a creditor under the civil law or the common law. However, the supervising judge may refuse to stay this right, or may lift such a stay, only in exceptional circumstances, given the high disruptive potential of this form of compensation. In the case at bar, the initial order stayed the City's right to pre-post compensation, and it would not be appropriate to lift the stay in relation to the claims in issue.

To answer the question with respect to compensation in the context of this appeal, the Court must first determine whether a claim arising from an agreement entered into under the VRP is necessarily a "claim that relates to" a "debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation" pursuant to s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA.

The first step in characterizing the VRP claim is to distinguish, for the purposes of the CCAA, claims that are subject to a compromise or arrangement from those that are not. Section 19(2) provides, by way of exception, that certain claims may not be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement, including those that result from fraud. To prove that its claim relates to a debt resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation pursuant to s. 19(2)(d), a creditor has the burden of establishing, on a balance of probabilities, the following four elements: (i) the debtor made a representation to the creditor; (ii) the representation was false; (iii) the debtor knew that the representation was false; (iv) the false representation was made to obtain property or a service.

In this case, the City did not try to prove or even allege any of these elements. The content of the VRP agreement, Bill 26 and the regulation made under it ("VRP

Arrêt (le juge Brown est dissident) : Le pourvoi est rejeté.

Le juge en chef Wagner et les juges Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Côté, Rowe et Martin : Premièrement, une créance découlant d'une entente conclue dans le cadre du PRV n'est pas nécessairement une réclamation se rapportant à une dette qui résulte de fraude aux termes de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC. En l'occurrence, la Ville n'a pas démontré que la créance PRV se rapporte à une dette qui résulte de fraude au sens de cette disposition. Deuxièmement, en ce qui concerne la compensation pré-post, le juge surveillant possède le pouvoir discrétionnaire de suspendre l'exercice du droit à la compensation pré-post invoqué par un créancier en vertu du droit civil ou de la common law. Toutefois, le juge surveillant peut refuser de suspendre ou lever la suspension du droit à la compensation pré-post dans des circonstances exceptionnelles seulement, considérant le fort potentiel perturbateur de cette forme de compensation. En l'espèce, l'ordonnance initiale a suspendu le droit de la Ville à la compensation pré-post, et il n'est pas indiqué de lever cette suspension pour ce qui est des créances en litige.

Pour trancher la question relative à la compensation dans le contexte du présent pourvoi, la Cour doit d'abord déterminer si une créance découlant d'une entente conclue dans le cadre du PRV constitue nécessairement une « réclamation se rapportant à » une « dette ou obligation résultant de l'obtention de biens ou de services par des faux-semblants ou la présentation erronée et frauduleuse des faits » aux termes de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC.

Pour qualifier la créance PRV, il faut d'abord distinguer, au sens de la LACC, les réclamations compromises par la transaction ou l'arrangement de celles qui ne le sont pas. Le paragraphe 19(2) prévoit exceptionnellement que certaines réclamations ne peuvent être compromises dans le cadre d'une transaction ou d'un arrangement, notamment celles découlant de fraude. Afin de démontrer que sa créance est une réclamation qui se rapporte à une dette résultant de l'obtention de biens ou de services par des faux-semblants ou la présentation erronée et frauduleuse des faits aux termes de l'al. 19(2)d), le créancier intéressé a le fardeau d'établir, par prépondérance des probabilités, les quatre éléments suivants : (i) le débiteur lui a fait une représentation; (ii) cette représentation était fausse; (iii) le débiteur savait que la représentation était fausse; (iv) cette fausse représentation a été faite dans le but d'obtenir un bien ou un service.

En l'espèce, la Ville n'a pas cherché à prouver ni même à alléguer l'un ou l'autre de ces éléments. Il est donc nécessaire d'interpréter le contenu de l'entente PRV, la

2021 SCC 53 (CanLII)

Regulation") must therefore be interpreted to determine whether the VRP claim may be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement. This interpretation exercise confirms that s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA does not apply to the VRP claim.

First, it is clearly stipulated in the VRP agreement entered into by the parties that the amount fixed in the agreement can in no way be considered to constitute an admission of liability. As a result, it cannot be presumed that the VRP claim is a claim that falls within s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA.

Second, Bill 26 and the VRP Regulation do not create a statutory presumption or a presumption of fact that a debtor made fraudulent representations to a public body. The use of the words "may have been" in s. 3 of Bill 26 and in s. 1 of the VRP Regulation to describe the purpose of the VRP indicates that fraud is a possibility rather than a certainty. Section 7 of the VRP Regulation supports this point, since it states that the fact that a natural person or an enterprise participates in the VRP does not constitute an admission of liability or of a fault committed by the natural person or enterprise. The fault in question in s. 7 is a matter of civil liability and is limited to the public contract to which a VRP agreement pertains. Where the legislature intends to refer to penal or criminal proceedings, or to civil proceedings outside the scope of a VRP agreement, it does so expressly. This interpretation is confirmed when s. 7 of the VRP Regulation is read in conjunction with s. 8.

The City is wrong to say that reading ss. 1, 3 and 10 of Bill 26 together leads to the conclusion that a natural person or enterprise that participated in the VRP necessarily defrauded a public body. Although s. 1 of Bill 26 does not refer to fraud as being hypothetical, s. 3 of Bill 26 and s. 1 of the VRP Regulation are clear: the substantive provisions of Bill 26 and the VRP Regulation contemplate fraud only hypothetically. Finally, the two schemes created by Bill 26 must not be confused. Section 10 states that fraud was committed, but this section is part of the scheme introduced by Chapter III (ss. 10 to 17), which applies to judicial proceedings brought against a natural person or enterprise that allegedly participated in fraud in relation to a public contract, and not part of the VRP scheme introduced by Chapter II (ss. 3 to 9). It is up to the courts to conclude that fraud has been committed, and the existence of fraud will be recognized by a court only under the Chapter III scheme, which did not take effect until the VRP scheme introduced by Chapter II ended. The reference to s. 10 in s. 3 merely serves to specify the natural persons Loi 26 ainsi que son règlement d'application (« règlement PRV ») pour déterminer si la créance PRV peut être considérée dans le cadre d'une transaction ou d'un arrangement. Cet exercice d'interprétation confirme que la créance PRV n'est pas visée par l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC.

En premier lieu, il est clairement stipulé dans l'entente PRV intervenue entre les parties que la somme convenue dans celle-ci ne peut en aucun cas être assimilée à une admission de responsabilité. On ne saurait donc présumer que la créance PRV constitue une réclamation visée à l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC.

En deuxième lieu, la Loi 26, tout comme le règlement PRV, ne créent pas une présomption légale ou factuelle de l'existence de représentations frauduleuses de la part d'un débiteur à l'endroit d'un organisme public. L'emploi du conditionnel à l'art. 3 de la Loi 26 et à l'art. 1 du règlement PRV pour décrire l'objet du PRV signale que la fraude est une éventualité, par opposition à quelque chose de certain. L'article 7 du règlement PRV appuie ce constat puisqu'il précise que le fait pour une personne physique ou une entreprise de se prévaloir du PRV ne constitue pas une reconnaissance de responsabilité ni une admission qu'elle a commis une faute. La faute dont il est question à l'art. 7 relève de la responsabilité civile et se limite au contrat public visé par l'entente PRV. Lorsque le législateur entend faire référence à des procédures de nature pénale ou criminelle, ou encore à des recours civils se situant hors du champ de l'entente PRV, il le fait expressément. L'article 7 du règlement PRV, lu conjointement avec l'art. 8, confirme cette interprétation.

La Ville a tort de dire qu'une lecture conjointe des art. 1, 3 et 10 de la Loi 26 mène à une conclusion que la personne physique ou l'entreprise qui participe au PRV a nécessairement fraudé un organisme public. Bien que l'art. 1 de la Loi 26 ne traite pas de la fraude à titre hypothétique, l'art. 3 de la Loi 26 et l'art. 1 du règlement PRV sont clairs : les dispositions substantielles de la Loi 26 et du règlement PRV ne considèrent la fraude que de façon hypothétique. Enfin, il ne faut pas confondre les deux régimes créés par la Loi 26. L'article 10 énonce qu'une fraude a été commise, mais celui-ci fait partie du régime introduit par le chapitre III (art. 10 à 17) qui est applicable aux recours judiciaires intentés contre une personne physique ou une entreprise qui aurait participé à une fraude visant un contrat public, et non du régime du PRV, introduit par le chapitre II (art. 3 à 9). Il appartient aux tribunaux de conclure qu'une fraude a été commise, et la reconnaissance judiciaire de l'existence d'une fraude n'intervient que dans le régime propre au chapitre III, lequel entre en vigueur seulement lorsque le régime du to whom the VRP applies. Accordingly, the City has not shown that the VRP claim falls within s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA. Neither the content of the VRP agreement nor its legal framework supports a presumption that SM Group admitted to having committed a fraudulent act.

Furthermore, a right to pre-post compensation, or set-off, invoked by a creditor under the civil law or the common law can be stayed by a court under ss. 11 and 11.02 of the CCAA. Under s. 11.02 of the CCAA, a court may stay any action, suit or other proceeding that might be brought against the debtor company. While at first glance the language of this provision limits the power to order a stay to judicial proceedings, the courts have taken a large and liberal approach in interpreting the scope of the rights and remedies that can be included in a stay order. A court has the power to stay rights held by creditors if the exercise of those rights could jeopardize the restructuring process. This includes a creditor's right to effect pre-post compensation. Such an interpretation advances the CCAA's remedial objectives and is consistent with its scheme.

In the vast majority of cases, an initial order will, and should, stay a creditor's right to set up pre-post compensation against the debtor. However, a court may in its discretion refuse to impose such a prohibition or, if pre-post compensation was stayed by the order, lift the stay at a later date to allow an interested creditor to assert its rights. The absolute prohibition against pre-post compensation imposed by the Quebec Court of Appeal in Kitco must therefore be tempered. However, a court must be cautious before allowing such a form of compensation, given its high disruptive potential.

Moreover, s. 21 of the CCAA does not grant creditors a right to pre-post compensation that would be shielded from a supervising judge's power to order a stay under ss. 11 and 11.02 of the CCAA. Read in light of its context, its purpose and the scheme of the CCAA, s. 21 is limited to authorizing compensation between debts that arise before an initial order is made ("pre-pre compensation") for the purpose of quantifying creditors' claims on the date of commencement of proceedings. This provision does not have the effect of authorizing pre-post compensation. That being said, s. 21 of the CCAA does not prohibit this form of compensation either. It follows that a supervising judge PRV, introduit par le chapitre II, prend fin. Le renvoi à l'art. 10 dans l'art. 3 ne sert qu'à préciser quelles sont les personnes physiques visées par le PRV. En conséquence, la Ville n'a pas démontré que la créance PRV relevait de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC. Ni le contenu de l'entente PRV ni le cadre juridique qui lui est propre ne permettent de présumer que Groupe SM a admis avoir commis un acte frauduleux.

Par ailleurs, le droit à la compensation pré-post invoqué par un créancier en vertu du droit civil ou de la common law peut être suspendu par un tribunal en application des art. 11 et 11.02 de la LACC. L'article 11.02 de la LACC permet de suspendre toute action, poursuite ou autre procédure pouvant être intentée contre la compagnie débitrice. Bien que le texte de cette disposition limite à première vue aux procédures judiciaires l'application du pouvoir de suspension, la jurisprudence interprète de manière large et libérale l'étendue des droits et recours susceptibles d'être inclus dans une ordonnance de suspension. Le tribunal est habilité à suspendre des droits reconnus aux créanciers mais dont l'exercice serait susceptible de mettre en péril la restructuration, y compris le droit d'opérer compensation pré-post. Une telle interprétation favorise les objectifs réparateurs de la LACC, en plus d'être cohérente avec l'économie de cette loi.

Dans la très vaste majorité des cas, l'ordonnance initiale suspendra, et devrait suspendre, le droit d'un créancier d'opposer à la débitrice la compensation pré-post. En revanche, le tribunal peut à sa discrétion refuser d'imposer une telle interdiction ou, si la compensation pré-post a été suspendue par l'ordonnance, lever cette suspension par la suite pour permettre à un créancier intéressé de faire valoir ses droits. L'interdiction absolue énoncée par la Cour d'appel du Québec dans l'arrêt Kitco à l'égard de la compensation pré-post doit donc être tempérée. Cependant, le tribunal doit faire preuve de prudence avant de permettre une telle forme de compensation, considérant son fort potentiel perturbateur.

En outre, l'art. 21 de la LACC ne confère pas aux créanciers un droit à la compensation pré-post qui serait à l'abri du pouvoir de suspension dont dispose le juge surveillant en vertu des art. 11 et 11.02 de la LACC. Lu à la lumière de son contexte, de son objet et de l'esprit de la LACC, l'art. 21 se limite à autoriser la compensation entre des dettes nées avant le prononcé de l'ordonnance initiale (« compensation pré-pré ») aux fins de quantification des réclamations des créanciers au jour de l'ouverture. Cette disposition n'a pas pour effet d'autoriser la compensation pré-post. Cela dit, l'art. 21 de la LACC n'a pas non plus pour effet d'interdire cette forme de compensation. Il retains the discretion to stay or to authorize the exercise of a right to pre-post compensation, or set-off, invoked by a creditor under the civil law or the common law.

In exercising its discretion under the CCAA, a court must keep three baseline considerations in mind: (1) the appropriateness of the order being sought, (2) due diligence and (3) good faith on the applicant's part. The first consideration relates both to the order itself and to the means that are employed. It is assessed in light of the CCAA's remedial objectives, which include protecting the public interest. In very specific circumstances, a court could conclude that protection of the public interest and the CCAA's other remedial objectives justify authorizing pre-post compensation in favour of a creditor that has proved that it was a victim of fraud within the meaning of s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA. However, the court should take care not to reduce the public interest to the interests of a particular creditor or group of creditors. The second consideration is also important because it discourages parties from sitting on their rights and ensures that creditors do not strategically manoeuver or position themselves to gain an advantage.

In the case at bar, the words of the stay order made by the Superior Court are broad enough to stay pre-post compensation, and it would not be appropriate to lift the stay in relation to the VRP claim. Because the City has not proved the alleged fraud and has not relied, in support of its position, on any of the CCAA's remedial objectives other than protecting the public interest, it has not discharged its burden of proving that the order being sought is appropriate. In addition, the City did not act with the diligence expected in CCAA proceedings.

With regard to the water meter contract claim, the Superior Court agreed to lift the stay of proceedings to allow the City to establish the existence and amount of its claim in that case. That order did not authorize the City to withhold the amounts owed to SM Group for the work subsequent to the initial order with a view to effecting compensation if the City was successful in the case relating to the water meter contract. In the circumstances, an order allowing the City to withhold the amounts owed to SM Group pending the outcome of that case would not be appropriate for the same reasons as those relating to the VRP claim.

s'ensuit que le juge surveillant conserve le pouvoir discrétionnaire de suspendre ou d'autoriser l'exercice du droit à la compensation pré-post invoqué par un créancier en vertu du droit civil ou de la common law.

Dans l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire que lui confère la LACC, le tribunal doit garder à l'esprit trois considérations de base : (1) l'opportunité de l'ordonnance sollicitée, (2) la diligence et (3) la bonne foi du demandeur. La première considération vise tout autant l'ordonnance elle-même que les moyens utilisés et s'évalue au regard des objectifs réparateurs de la LACC, dont la protection de l'intérêt public. Dans des circonstances bien particulières, le tribunal pourrait conclure que la protection de l'intérêt public, de même que les autres objectifs réparateurs de la LACC, justifient d'autoriser la compensation pré-post en faveur d'un créancier qui a démontré avoir été victime de fraude au sens de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC. Par contre, le tribunal doit se garder de réduire l'intérêt public à l'intérêt d'un créancier ou d'un groupe de créanciers en particulier. La deuxième considération est également importante étant donné qu'elle décourage les parties de rester sur leurs positions et fait en sorte que les créanciers n'usent pas stratégiquement de ruse ou ne se placent pas eux-mêmes dans une position pour obtenir un avantage.

Dans la présente affaire, les termes de l'ordonnance de suspension rendue par la Cour supérieure sont suffisamment larges pour suspendre la compensation pré-post et il n'est pas indiqué de lever cette suspension en ce qui concerne la créance PRV. Puisque la Ville n'a pas apporté la preuve de la fraude alléguée et n'a pas invoqué un objectif réparateur de la LACC autre que la protection de l'intérêt public au soutien de sa position, elle ne s'est pas déchargée du fardeau qui lui incombait d'établir le caractère indiqué de l'ordonnance sollicitée. Au surplus, la Ville n'a pas fait montre de la diligence attendue dans le cadre d'une procédure fondée sur la LACC.

Pour ce qui est de la créance relative au contrat des compteurs d'eau, la Cour supérieure a accepté de lever la suspension des procédures pour permettre à la Ville d'établir l'existence et le montant de sa créance dans ce dossier. Cette ordonnance n'a pas autorisé la Ville à retenir les sommes dues à Groupe SM pour les travaux postérieurs à l'ordonnance initiale en vue d'opérer compensation dans l'éventualité où elle aurait gain de cause dans le dossier relatif au contrat des compteurs d'eau. Dans les circonstances, une ordonnance permettant à la Ville de retenir les sommes dues à Groupe SM jusqu'au dénouement du litige relatif au contrat des compteurs d'eau ne serait pas indiquée pour les mêmes motifs que ceux relatifs à la créance PRV.

Per Brown J. (dissenting): The appeal should be allowed solely for the purpose of remanding the case to the Superior Court so it can decide whether the City may effect pre-post compensation for the VRP claim and whether compensation is available in respect of the water meter claim. There is agreement with the majority that a supervising judge has a discretion under s. 11 of the CCAA as to whether to allow a creditor to effect pre-post compensation, or set-off. However, this discretion is not limited solely to the exceptional circumstances the majority describes. The scope of s. 21 of the CCAA is not limited to pre-pre compensation; pre-post compensation is permitted, but must be subject to the exercise of a supervising judge's discretion. Moreover, nothing in s. 21 of the CCAA prohibits judicial compensation.

The approach taken by the Quebec Court of Appeal in Kitco, according to which pre-post compensation will never be authorized under the CCAA, involves several errors and must be rejected. To begin with, the Court of Appeal erred in relying on a judgment rendered by the Court in the context of a bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA"). Although the scheme established by the CCAA and the one established by the BIA must be viewed as an integrated body of insolvency law, there remain many differences between them, including two that are fundamental. First, when an insolvent company has recourse to the CCAA, it continues its business activities and is not divested of its property in favour of a third party, unlike with the measures put in place under the BIA that vest the bankrupt's property in a trustee. There is thus no loss of mutuality under the CCAA. This mutuality, which survives the initial order, is what makes compensation possible under the CCAA, unlike under the BIA. Secondly, the scheme established by the CCAA is flexible and allows creative solutions to be put forward to achieve the objective of restructuring a financially distressed company, in contrast to the BIA, which provides a set of pre-established rules. The CCAA's provisions must be interpreted expansively to enable its remedial objectives to be achieved. Because of these objectives, a broad discretion is also conferred on supervising judges by s. 11 of the CCAA. This discretion has no equivalent in the BIA.

Next, the state of the law elsewhere in Canada is clear: pre-post set-off is possible under the CCAA, subject to a supervising judge's discretion to stay such set-off having Le juge Brown (dissident) : L'appel devrait être accueilli à seule fin de retourner le dossier devant la Cour supérieure pour qu'il soit décidé, d'une part, si la Ville peut opérer compensation pré-post à l'égard de la créance PRV et, d'autre part, si la réclamation à l'égard des compteurs d'eau donne ouverture à compensation. Il y a accord avec l'avis de la majorité portant que le juge surveillant possède, en vertu de l'art. 11 de la LACC, le pouvoir discrétionnaire d'autoriser ou non un créancier à opérer compensation pré-post. Cependant, ce pouvoir n'est pas limité aux seules circonstances exceptionnelles décrites par la majorité. Le champ d'application de l'art. 21 de la LACC n'est pas restreint à la compensation pré-pré; la compensation pré-post est permise, mais doit être assujettie à l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire du juge surveillant. De plus, rien dans l'art. 21 de la LACC n'interdit la compensation judiciaire.

L'approche établie par la Cour d'appel du Québec dans l'arrêt Kitco, selon laquelle la compensation pré-post ne sera jamais autorisée en vertu de la LACC, contient plusieurs erreurs et doit être rejetée. Tout d'abord, la Cour d'appel s'appuie erronément sur un arrêt de la Cour rendu dans un contexte de faillite sous le régime de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité (« LFI »). Or, bien que le régime établi par la LACC et celui établi par la LFI doivent être perçus comme un ensemble intégré de règles du droit de l'insolvabilité, de nombreuses différences persistent entre ceux-ci, dont deux distinctions fondamentales. Premièrement, lorsque l'entreprise insolvable a recours à la LACC, elle continue ses opérations commerciales et n'est pas dessaisie de ses biens au profit d'un tiers, contrairement aux mesures mises en place en vertu de la LFI, suivant lesquelles le syndic obtient la saisine des biens du failli. Il n'y a donc pas de perte de réciprocité sous le régime de la LACC. Cette réciprocité, qui subsiste au-delà de l'ordonnance initiale, est ce qui rend possible la compensation en vertu de la LACC, par opposition à la LFI. Deuxièmement, le régime établi par la LACC est flexible et permet de mettre de l'avant des solutions créatives afin d'atteindre l'objectif de restructuration d'une entreprise en difficultés financières, par contraste avec la LFI, qui prévoit un ensemble de règles préétablies. Les dispositions de la LACC doivent être interprétées largement afin de permettre la réalisation de ses objectifs réparateurs, en raison desquels un vaste pouvoir discrétionnaire est également conféré au juge surveillant par l'art. 11 de la LACC. Ce pouvoir n'a pas d'équivalent dans la LFI.

Ensuite, l'état du droit ailleurs au Canada est clair : la compensation pré-post est possible sous le régime de la LACC, sous réserve du pouvoir discrétionnaire du juge regard to its effects on the status quo period, the underlying objectives of this period, the advancement of efforts to reach an arrangement, and the remedial objectives of the CCAA. The approach proposed in Kitco has created an asymmetry between the interpretation given to s. 21 of the CCAA by the Quebec courts and the interpretation given to it by the courts of other Canadian provinces, which is contrary to the principle of homogenous interpretation of federal statutes.

Lastly, staying the remedies of an insolvent company's creditors under the CCAA to allow the company to develop a plan of arrangement is of critical importance. However, where a plan of arrangement cannot be contemplated and the insolvent company will be liquidated or sold in any event, to conclude that pre-post compensation is never allowed could be unfair to the company's creditors with claims that are certain, liquid and exigible. In such cases, the creditors' remedies will be stayed indefinitely and they will never be able to effect pre-post compensation, since the insolvent company will become an "empty shell" after the sale. Moreover, allowing pre-post compensation will not have the effect of derailing the company's restructuring process, as there is no such process in this situation.

In the instant case, there is no need to decide whether the VRP claim must be characterized as a claim based on "false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation" within the meaning of s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA. Section 21 of the CCAA must be interpreted as allowing pre-post compensation regardless of whether a claim results from fraud for the purposes of s. 19(2)(d). It is true that proof that the debt underlying a claim is fraudulent is a relevant factor in the exercise of a supervising judge's discretion to permit pre-post compensation; however, whether the City's VRP claim results from fraud is a question to be decided by the supervising judge, not by the Court.

Given that the supervising judge did not exercise her discretion under s. 11 of the CCAA, believing herself to be bound by the conclusions of the Quebec Court of Appeal in Kitco, it is not for the Court to exercise that discretion in order to determine whether to permit pre-post compensation. Supervising judges are in the best position to decide whether to exercise their discretion in a particular case. In cases involving an exercise of discretion by a court of first surveillant d'en suspendre l'application pour tenir compte des incidences de la compensation pré-post sur la période de statu quo et de ses objectifs sous-jacents, du bon déroulement des efforts déployés pour réaliser un arrangement et des objectifs réparateurs de la LACC. L'approche avancée dans l'arrêt Kitco crée une asymétrie entre l'interprétation de l'art. 21 de la LACC par les tribunaux du Québec et par les tribunaux d'autres provinces canadiennes, qui va à l'encontre du principe de l'interprétation uniforme des lois fédérales.

Enfin, la suspension, en vertu de la LACC, des recours des créanciers d'une entreprise insolvable afin de permettre à celle-ci d'élaborer un plan d'arrangement revêt une importance cruciale. Par contre, lorsqu'un plan d'arrangement n'est pas envisageable et que l'entreprise insolvable sera de toute manière liquidée ou vendue, conclure que la compensation pré-post n'est jamais permise pourrait être injuste pour les créanciers de cette entreprise ayant une créance certaine, liquide et exigible. En effet, dans ces cas, les recours des créanciers seront suspendus indéfiniment et ils ne pourront jamais exercer compensation pré-post, l'entreprise insolvable étant devenue après la vente une « coquille vide ». Par ailleurs, permettre la compensation pré-post n'aura pas comme effet de faire dérailler le processus de restructuration de l'entreprise, ce processus étant alors inexistant.

En l'espèce, il n'est pas nécessaire de trancher la question de savoir si la créance PRV doit être qualifiée de réclamation fondée sur des « faux-semblants ou la présentation erronée et frauduleuse des faits » au sens de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC. L'article 21 de la LACC doit être interprété comme permettant d'opérer compensation pré-post, peu importe qu'il s'agisse ou non d'une réclamation qui découle d'une fraude au sens de l'al. 19(2)d). Certes, la démonstration du caractère frauduleux de la dette à l'origine d'une créance constitue un facteur pertinent dans l'exercice par le juge surveillant de son pouvoir discrétionnaire de permettre la compensation pré-post; cependant, la question de savoir si la créance PRV de la Ville résulte d'une fraude est une question à laquelle il appartient à la juge surveillante de répondre, et non à la Cour.

Étant donné que, s'estimant liée par les conclusions de la Cour d'appel du Québec dans l'arrêt Kitco, la juge surveillante n'a pas exercé le pouvoir discrétionnaire que lui confère l'art. 11 de la LACC, il ne revient pas à la Cour de l'exercer afin de décider s'il y a lieu d'autoriser ou non la compensation pré-post. Les juges surveillants sont les mieux placés pour décider s'ils doivent exercer leur pouvoir discrétionnaire dans une situation donnée.

2021 SCC 53 (CanLII)

instance, it is not in the interests of justice for the Court to step into that court's shoes and decide these matters.

I. Introduction

[1] This appeal raises an issue relating to compensation, or set-off in a common law setting, between two debts in the context of proceedings under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"). The question is whether compensation is permitted for debts between the same parties: on the one hand, a debt resulting from the Act to ensure mainly the recovery of amounts improperly paid as a result of fraud or fraudulent tactics in connection with public contracts, CQLR, c. R-2.2.0.0.3 ("Bill 26"), that predates an initial order made under the CCAA and, on the other hand, a debt between the same parties that postdates that order. In these reasons, we will use the expression "pre-post compensation" to refer generally to compensation between debts arising before and after an initial order.

[2] This question thus affords the Court an occasion to interpret, for the first time, certain provisions of Bill 26 as well as the regulation made under it, the Voluntary Reimbursement Program, CQLR, c. R-2.2.0.0.3, r. 1 ("VRP Regulation"). In doing so, we will clarify for public bodies the burden of proof that rests on them in seeking to establish that a claim arising from an agreement entered into under the Voluntary Reimbursement Program ("VRP") is fraudulent.

VI. Conclusion 100

I. Introduction

[1] Le présent pourvoi soulève un problème de compensation entre deux dettes dans le contexte de procédures engagées sous le régime de la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies, L.R.C. 1985, c. C-36 (« LACC »). Il s'agit de savoir si la compensation est permise entre des dettes entre les mêmes parties, d'une part, une dette résultant de la Loi visant principalement la récupération de sommes payées injustement à la suite de fraudes ou de manœuvres dolosives dans le cadre de contrats publics, RLRQ, c. R-2.2.0.0.3 (« Loi 26 »), antérieure à une ordonnance initiale émise en vertu de la LACC, et, d'autre part, une dette postérieure à cette ordonnance encourue entre les mêmes parties. Dans les présents motifs, nous utiliserons l'expression « compensation pré-post » pour désigner de manière générale la compensation entre des dettes nées avant et après l'émission d'une ordonnance initiale.

[2] Cette question fournit ainsi à notre Cour l'occasion d'interpréter pour la première fois certaines dispositions de la Loi 26, ainsi que son règlement d'application, le Programme de remboursement volontaire, RLRQ, c. R-2.2.0.0.3, r. 1 (« règlement PRV »). Ce faisant, nous clarifions, à l'intention des organismes publics, le fardeau de preuve qui leur incombe lorsqu'ils tentent d'établir le caractère frauduleux d'une créance résultant d'une entente conclue en vertu du Programme de remboursement volontaire (« PRV »).

[3] La Loi 26 a été adoptée par l'Assemblée nationale du Québec en mars 2015 à la suite d'une of inquiry that had brought to light the existence of schemes involving collusion and corruption in the awarding and management of public contracts in the construction industry ("Charbonneau Commission"), and the VRP Regulation was made a few months later. The program resulting from this legislation, which was in effect for two years, allowed enterprises to "reimburse certain amounts improperly paid in the course of the tendering, awarding or management of a public contract in relation to which there may have been fraud or fraudulent tactics" (s. 3 of Bill 26).

[4] To answer the question with respect to compensation in the context of this appeal, the Court must first determine whether a claim arising from an agreement entered into under the VRP is necessarily a "claim that relates to" a "debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation" pursuant to s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA. We would answer this question in the negative. It cannot be presumed that a claim arising from the VRP falls within that provision where no evidence to this effect has been tendered. We also conclude that a court should generally exercise its discretion to stay pre-post compensation, although it may, in rare cases, refuse such a stay. As well, the court may later lift the stay of the right to pre-post compensation in appropriate cases. In the case at bar, however, we conclude that the initial order stayed the right of the appellant, Ville de Montréal ("City"), to pre-post compensation and that it would not be appropriate to lift the stay in relation to the claims in issue.

[5] The appeal should therefore be dismissed.

II. Facts

[6] SM Group, which at the relevant time was a consulting engineering firm, performed a variety of contracts for the City over a period of several years. The Charbonneau Commission's work uncovered a commission d'enquête qui a mis en lumière l'existence de stratagèmes de collusion et de corruption dans l'octroi et la gestion de contrats publics dans l'industrie de la construction (« Commission Charbonneau »), et le règlement PRV a été pris quelques mois plus tard. Mis en vigueur pour une période de deux ans, le programme issu de cette loi a permis à des entreprises de « rembourser certaines sommes payées injustement dans le cadre de l'adjudication, de l'attribution ou de la gestion d'un contrat public et pour lequel il aurait pu y avoir fraude ou manœuvre dolosive » (art. 3 de la Loi 26).

[4] Pour trancher la question relative à la compensation dans le contexte du présent pourvoi, notre Cour doit d'abord déterminer si une créance découlant d'une entente conclue dans le cadre du PRV constitue nécessairement une « réclamation se rapportant à » une « dette ou obligation résultant de l'obtention de biens ou de services par des faux-semblants ou la présentation erronée et frauduleuse des faits » aux termes de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC. Nous sommes d'avis de répondre à cette question par la négative. On ne peut présumer qu'une créance issue du PRV est visée par cette disposition lorsqu'aucune preuve n'a été administrée à cet effet. Nous concluons par ailleurs que le tribunal devrait généralement exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire afin de suspendre la compensation pré-post, bien qu'il puisse, dans de rares cas, refuser de la suspendre. De même, le tribunal peut, par la suite, lever la suspension du droit à la compensation pré-post dans les cas qui s'y prêtent. En l'espèce, toutefois, nous concluons que l'ordonnance initiale a suspendu le droit de l'appelante Ville de Montréal (« Ville ») à la compensation pré-post et qu'il n'est pas indiqué de lever cette suspension pour ce qui est des créances en litige.

[5] En conséquence, l'appel doit être rejeté.

II. Faits

[6] Groupe SM, qui était au moment des faits une firme de génie-conseil, a exécuté divers contrats pour la Ville sur une période de plusieurs années. Les travaux de la Commission Charbonneau ont link between SM Group and certain central players in the collusion schemes. Two of its former officers were in fact charged with criminal offences. SM Group subsequently became insolvent.

[7] On August 24, 2018, the Quebec Superior Court made an initial order by which SM Group became subject to proceedings under the CCAA and the rights and remedies of creditors were stayed. The respondent, Deloitte Restructuring Inc. ("Deloitte"), was appointed as monitor. Following that order, SM Group continued to perform work for the City, including the construction of the Samuel De Champlain Bridge and the rebuilding of the Turcot Interchange.

[8] The City refused to pay for that work. On November 7, 2018, it invoked its right to effect compensation between its debt to SM Group for the work done after the initial order and two claims against SM Group that, according to the City, arose before the order and resulted from fraud on SM Group's part.

[9] On November 12, 2018, the Superior Court approved the sale of some of SM Group's assets to Thornhill Investments Inc. ("Thornhill"). One week later, SM Group's contracts were assigned to Thornhill.

[10] The two claims raised by the City are related to the application of Bill 26. The purpose of that statute, read in conjunction with the Integrity in Public Contracts Act, S.Q. 2012, c. 25, enacted in 2012, and the Act to give effect to the Charbonneau Commission recommendations on political financing, S.Q. 2016, c. 18, enacted in 2016, is to strengthen public confidence in government institutions by addressing the revelations made by the Charbonneau Commission. Bill 26 has been described as [TRANSLATION] "a statutory benchmark for establishing a lack of ethics and lax (if not criminal) morals in a number of enterprises in relation to the awarding of public contracts in Quebec" (R. v. Fedele, 2018 QCCA 1901, at para. 44 (CanLII)).

révélé l'existence d'un lien entre Groupe SM et des acteurs au cœur des stratagèmes de collusion. Deux de ses anciens dirigeants ont d'ailleurs fait l'objet d'accusations criminelles. Par la suite, Groupe SM est devenu insolvable.

[7] Le 24 août 2018, la Cour supérieure du Québec (« Tribunal ») rend une ordonnance initiale assujettissant Groupe SM à des procédures déposées en vertu de la LACC et suspendant les droits et recours des créanciers. L'intimée Restructuration Deloitte Inc. (« Deloitte ») est nommée à titre de contrôleur. Postérieurement à cette ordonnance, Groupe SM continue à effectuer des travaux dont bénéficie la Ville, notamment la construction du pont Samuel-De Champlain et la réfection de l'échangeur Turcot.

[8] La Ville refuse de payer ces travaux. Le 7 novembre 2018, elle invoque son droit d'opérer compensation entre sa dette envers Groupe SM résultant des travaux effectués postérieurement à l'ordonnance initiale, et deux créances de Groupe SM qui, soutient-elle, sont nées avant l'ordonnance et résulteraient de fraude de ce dernier.

[9] Le 12 novembre 2018, le Tribunal approuve la vente partielle des actifs de Groupe SM à Thornhill Investments Inc. (« Thornhill »). Une semaine plus tard, les contrats de Groupe SM sont cédés à Thornhill.

[10] Les deux créances invoquées par la Ville sont liées à l'application de la Loi 26. Lue avec la Loi sur l'intégrité en matière de contrats publics, L.Q. 2012, c. 25, adoptée en 2012, et la Loi donnant suite aux recommandations de la Commission Charbonneau en matière de financement politique, L.Q. 2016, c. 18, adoptée en 2016, la Loi 26 a pour objectif de renforcer la confiance du public dans les institutions publiques en donnant suite aux révélations émanant de la Commission Charbonneau. Elle a été décrite comme « un repère législatif permettant de conclure au manque d'éthique et à la morale laxiste (sinon criminelle) dans plusieurs entreprises en lien avec l'octroi de contrats publics au Québec » (R. c. Fedele, 2018 QCCA 1901, par. 44 (CanLII)).

[11] The first claim the City alleges it has against SM Group arises from a settlement agreement entered into in November 2017 by SM Group and the Minister of Justice, acting on the City's behalf, under the VRP ("VRP claim"). The second is based on a proceeding brought by the City against SM Group in September 2018, in which it claimed more than $14 million from SM Group for allegedly having participated in collusion in relation to a call for tenders for a water meter contract ("water meter contract claim").

[12] Because SM Group had failed to repay the VRP claim and because the sale of certain assets to Thornhill was imminent, the City advised SM Group that it intended to effect compensation between what it owed SM Group and the above-mentioned claims, noting that those claims could not be discharged or dealt with by a compromise or arrangement in the planned restructuring process given that they resulted from fraud and from a misappropriation of public funds.

[13] In response, Deloitte applied for a declaratory judgment stating that compensation could not be effected with respect to the amounts owed by the City to SM Group for work performed for the City.

III. Judicial History

A. Quebec Superior Court, 2019 QCCS 2316 (Corriveau J.)

[14] The supervising judge granted Deloitte's application for a declaratory judgment and held that pre-post compensation could not be effected in favour of the City. Even though, in her view, the VRP claim was linked to an allegation of fraud that had not been refuted by SM Group, she concluded that, according to the principles laid down in Quebec (Agence du revenu) v. Kitco Metals Inc., 2017 QCCA 268, pre-post compensation was not possible. She also concluded that the water meter contract claim was neither liquid nor exigible, which precluded compensation.

[11] La première créance que la Ville prétend détenir contre Groupe SM résulte d'une entente de règlement intervenue en novembre 2017 entre Groupe SM et la ministre de la Justice, agissant pour le compte de la Ville, dans le cadre du PRV (« créance PRV »). La seconde créance est fondée sur un recours intenté par la Ville contre Groupe SM, en septembre 2018, dans lequel elle lui réclame plus de 14 millions de dollars au motif qu'il aurait participé à une collusion relativement à l'appel d'offres du contrat des compteurs d'eau (« créance relative au contrat des compteurs d'eau »).

[12] Vu le défaut de Groupe SM de rembourser la créance PRV et l'imminence de la vente de certains actifs à Thornhill, la Ville informe Groupe SM de son intention d'opérer compensation entre ce qu'elle lui doit et les créances ci-haut mentionnées, tout en précisant que ces créances ne peuvent être purgées ou compromises par la restructuration envisagée puisqu'elles découlent de la fraude et d'un détournement de fonds du Trésor public.

[13] En réponse, Deloitte demande un jugement déclaratoire portant que les sommes dues à Groupe SM par la Ville pour des travaux exécutés pour son bénéfice ne peuvent faire l'objet de compensation.

III. Historique judiciaire

A. Cour supérieure du Québec, 2019 QCCS 2316 (la juge Corriveau)

[14] La juge surveillante accueille la demande en jugement déclaratoire de Deloitte et décide que la compensation pré-post ne peut s'opérer en faveur de la Ville. Même si, selon elle, la créance PRV est liée à une allégation de fraude non réfutée par Groupe SM, la juge surveillante conclut que, selon les enseignements de l'arrêt Québec (Agence du revenu) c. Métaux Kitco inc., 2017 QCCA 268, 46 C.B.R. (6th) 173, la compensation pré-post n'est pas possible. Elle statue par ailleurs que la créance relative au contrat des compteurs d'eau n'est ni liquide ni exigible, de sorte que la compensation ne peut être opérée.

B. Quebec Court of Appeal, 2020 QCCA 438 (Rochette and Healy JJ.A., Ruel J.A. Dissenting in Part)

[15] Rochette J.A., writing for the majority, rejected the City's argument regarding the VRP claim. Relying on Kitco, he reached the same conclusion as the supervising judge: that pre-post compensation could not be effected in this case. He also rejected the City's argument that a claim relating to fraud falling within s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA is an exception to the rule stated in that case. In any event, he expressed the view that the City had not proved that s. 19(2)(d) applied to its claims. Finally, with regard to the water meter contract claim, Rochette J.A. added that the conditions for judicial compensation were not met, since the certainty, liquidity and exigibility of that claim had to be determined later in a proceeding other than that of the restructuring case.

[16] Ruel J.A., dissenting in part, agreed with his colleagues on the nature of the water meter contract claim. However, he was of the view that the VRP claim had to be presumed to fall within s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA and that Kitco had to be distinguished on the basis that it had been rendered in a different context. In the final analysis, Ruel J.A. found that s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA represents an exception to the principle established in that case and that it therefore allowed pre-post compensation between the two parties' respective debts.

IV. Issues

[17] This appeal raises the following three questions:

1. Is the VRP claim a claim that relates to a debt resulting from fraud pursuant to s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA?
2. Does the CCAA permit compensation between a debt that arises before an initial order and one that arises after that order?
3. If compensation is permitted, should the City be authorized to withhold the payments owed

B. Cour d'appel du Québec, 2020 QCCA 438 (les juges Rochette et Healy, le juge Ruel, dissident en partie)

[15] Rédigeant pour la majorité, le juge Rochette rejette la prétention de la Ville relativement à la créance PRV. S'appuyant sur l'arrêt Kitco, il conclut, à l'instar de la juge surveillante, que la compensation pré-post ne peut s'opérer en l'espèce. En outre, il rejette l'argument de la Ville selon lequel une créance relative à la fraude visée par l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC constitue une exception à la règle énoncée dans cet arrêt. Quoi qu'il en soit, il se dit d'avis que la Ville n'a pas prouvé que ses créances sont visées par cette disposition. Enfin, en ce qui concerne la créance relative au contrat des compteurs d'eau, le juge Rochette ajoute que les conditions de la compensation judiciaire ne sont pas réunies, le caractère certain, liquide et exigible de cette créance devant être déterminé postérieurement dans une autre instance que celle du dossier de restructuration.

[16] Dissident en partie, le juge Ruel partage l'avis de ses collègues sur la nature de la créance relative au contrat des compteurs d'eau. Cependant, il est plutôt d'avis qu'il faut présumer que la créance PRV est visée par l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC et que l'arrêt Kitco doit être distingué étant donné qu'il a été rendu dans un contexte différent. En dernière analyse, le juge Ruel estime que l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC fait exception au principe établi dans cet arrêt et permet donc la compensation pré-post entre les dettes respectives des deux parties.

IV. Questions en litige

[17] Le présent pourvoi soulève les trois questions suivantes :

1. La créance PRV est-elle une réclamation se rapportant à une dette qui résulte de fraude aux termes de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC?
2. La LACC autorise-t-elle la compensation entre une dette née avant une ordonnance initiale et une dette née après cette ordonnance?
3. Si la compensation est permise, la Ville devrait-elle être autorisée à retenir les paiements dus to SM Group until judgment is rendered in the case relating to the water meter contract?

2021 SCC 53 (CanLII)

[18] We will deal with these questions by considering each of the City's claims separately.

V. Analysis

[19] In essence, the City argues that the VRP claim cannot be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement because it relates to a debt resulting from fraud pursuant to s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA. According to the City, such a claim falls outside the absolute prohibition against pre-post compensation imposed by Kitco. The City also argues that the absolute nature of the Kitco rule is inconsistent with the broad discretion conferred on supervising judges by the CCAA. It submits that supervising judges can, in exercising their discretion, authorize pre-post compensation in appropriate circumstances. The exercise of this discretion is particularly appropriate where fraud is involved.

[20] For the reasons that follow, we are of the view that the VRP claim in this case is not a claim that relates to a debt resulting from fraud pursuant to s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA. We also conclude that a right to pre-post compensation, or set-off, invoked under the civil law or the common law can be stayed under ss. 11 and 11.02 of the CCAA. In our opinion, however, a supervising judge has the discretion to authorize pre-post compensation only in exceptional circumstances, given the high disruptive potential of this form of compensation. In this regard, the fact that the debt underlying a VRP claim is fraudulent, where this is shown, is a relevant factor in the exercise of the supervising judge's discretion. In this case, we find that it would not be appropriate to allow the City to effect compensation with respect to the VRP claim. Nor would it be appropriate to authorize the City to withhold the payments owed to SM Group pending the outcome of the case relating to the water meter contract.

à Groupe SM en attendant que jugement soit rendu dans le dossier relatif au contrat des compteurs d'eau?

[18] Nous traiterons de ces questions en abordant séparément chacune des créances invoquées par la Ville.

V. Analyse

[19] Essentiellement, la Ville soutient que la créance PRV est une réclamation qui ne peut être considérée dans le cadre d'une transaction ou d'un arrangement, puisqu'elle se rapporte à une dette qui résulte de fraude aux termes de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC. Selon la Ville, une telle réclamation échappe à l'interdiction absolue énoncée dans l'arrêt Kitco à l'égard de la compensation pré-post. La Ville plaide également que le caractère absolu de la règle de l'arrêt Kitco est incompatible avec le large pouvoir discrétionnaire conféré au juge surveillant par la LACC. La Ville estime que le juge surveillant peut, dans l'exercice de son pouvoir discrétionnaire, autoriser la compensation pré-post dans des circonstances appropriées. L'exercice de ce pouvoir est d'autant plus indiqué en présence de fraude.

[20] Pour les motifs qui suivent, nous sommes d'avis que la créance PRV visée en l'espèce n'est pas une réclamation se rapportant à une dette qui résulte de fraude aux termes de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC. Nous concluons par ailleurs que le droit à la compensation pré-post invoqué en vertu du droit civil ou de la common law peut être suspendu en application des art. 11 et 11.02 de la LACC. Toutefois, nous somme d'avis que le juge surveillant possède le pouvoir discrétionnaire d'autoriser la compensation pré-post dans des circonstances exceptionnelles seulement, considérant le fort potentiel perturbateur de cette forme de compensation. À cet égard, le caractère frauduleux de la dette à l'origine d'une créance PRV, lorsque démontré, constitue un facteur pertinent dans l'exercice de la discrétion du juge surveillant. En l'espèce, nous estimons qu'il ne serait pas indiqué de permettre à la Ville d'opérer compensation en ce qui concerne la créance PRV. Il ne serait pas non plus approprié d'autoriser la Ville à retenir les paiements dus à Groupe SM jusqu'au dénouement du litige relatif au contrat des compteurs d'eau.

A. Voluntary Reimbursement Program Claim

(1) Characterization of the Voluntary Reimbursement Program Claim

[21] We must begin by determining whether the VRP claim is a claim that relates to a fraudulent debt, because this is the premise behind the City's reasoning. For the reasons that follow, we conclude that this basic premise is not correct: the VRP claim is not a claim that relates to a debt resulting from fraud pursuant to s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA. The mere fact that a debtor company participated in the VRP is not sufficient to infer that the company defrauded a public body. In light of this conclusion, it is not necessary for us to deal with Deloitte's alternative argument that s. 19 of the CCAA is inapplicable in this case because there is no plan providing for a compromise or arrangement.

[22] The first step in characterizing the VRP claim is to distinguish, for the purposes of the CCAA, claims that are subject to a compromise or arrangement from those that are not. Section 19(1) of the CCAA sets out the general scheme governing claims that may be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement:

19 (1) Subject to subsection (2), the only claims that may be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement in respect of a debtor company are

(a) claims that relate to debts or liabilities, present or future, to which the company is subject on the earlier of

(i) the day on which proceedings commenced under this Act, and

(ii) if the company filed a notice of intention under section 50.4 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or commenced proceedings under this Act with the consent of inspectors referred to in section 116 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the date of

A. Créance du Programme de remboursement volontaire

(1) Qualification de la créance du Programme de remboursement volontaire

[21] Il nous incombe de déterminer, d'entrée de jeu, si la créance PRV est une réclamation se rapportant à une dette frauduleuse, puisque cette prémisse explique le raisonnement de la Ville. Pour les motifs qui suivent, nous concluons que cette prémisse fondamentale n'est pas fondée : la créance PRV n'est pas une réclamation se rapportant à une dette qui résulte de fraude aux termes de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC. En effet, la seule participation au PRV par une société débitrice n'est pas suffisante pour inférer la commission d'une fraude par cette dernière à l'endroit d'un organisme public. Considérant cette conclusion, il n'est pas nécessaire de nous prononcer sur l'argument subsidiaire de Deloitte selon lequel l'art. 19 de la LACC serait inapplicable en l'espèce, en raison de l'absence de plan prévoyant une transaction ou un arrangement.

[22] Pour qualifier la créance PRV, il faut d'abord distinguer, au sens de la LACC, les réclamations compromises par la transaction ou l'arrangement de celles qui ne le sont pas. Le paragraphe 19(1) de cette loi énonce le régime général encadrant les réclamations qui peuvent être considérées dans le cadre d'une transaction ou d'un arrangement :

19 (1) Les seules réclamations qui peuvent être considérées dans le cadre d'une transaction ou d'un arrangement visant une compagnie débitrice sont :

a) celles se rapportant aux dettes et obligations, présentes ou futures, auxquelles la compagnie est assujettie à celle des dates ci-après qui est antérieure à l'autre :

(i) la date à laquelle une procédure a été intentée sous le régime de la présente loi à l'égard de la compagnie,

(ii) la date d'ouverture de la faillite, au sens de l'article 2 de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, si elle a déposé un avis d'intention sous le régime de l'article 50.4 de cette loi ou qu'elle a intenté une procédure sous le régime de la présente loi avec le

2021 SCC 53 (CanLII)

the initial bankruptcy event within the meaning of section 2 of that Act; and

(b) claims that relate to debts or liabilities, present or future, to which the company may become subject before the compromise or arrangement is sanctioned by reason of any obligation incurred by the company before the earlier of the days referred to in subparagraphs (a)(i) and (ii).

[23] As an exception to this scheme, s. 19(2) of the CCAA provides that certain claims may not be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement, including those that result from fraud:

(2) A compromise or arrangement in respect of a debtor company may not deal with any claim that relates to any of the following debts or liabilities unless the compromise or arrangement explicitly provides for the claim's compromise and the creditor in relation to that debt has voted for the acceptance of the compromise or arrangement:

(d) any debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation, other than a debt or liability of the company that arises from an equity claim; . . .

[24] The burden of proof applicable to this scheme can be determined by referring to the case law and academic commentary on s. 178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"), which is analogous in every respect to s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA. As this Court noted in Century Services Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 SCC 60, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 379, these two statutes "for[m] part of an integrated body of insolvency law" (para. 78; see also 9354-9186 Québec inc. v. Callidus Capital Corp., 2020 SCC 10, [2020] 1 S.C.R. 522, at para. 74).

[25] To discharge its burden of proving that its claim relates to a debt "resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation", a creditor must establish, on a balance of probabilities, the following four elements: (i) the debtor made a representation to the consentement des inspecteurs visés à l'article 116 de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité;

b) celles se rapportant aux dettes et obligations, présentes ou futures, auxquelles elle peut devenir assujettie avant l'acceptation de la transaction ou de l'arrangement, en raison d'une obligation contractée antérieurement à celle des dates mentionnées aux sous-alinéas a)(i) et (ii) qui est antérieure à l'autre.

[23] À titre d'exception à ce régime, le par. 19(2) de la LACC prévoit que certaines réclamations ne peuvent être compromises, notamment celles découlant de fraude :

(2) La réclamation se rapportant à l'une ou l'autre des dettes ou obligations ci-après ne peut toutefois être ainsi considérée, à moins que la transaction ou l'arrangement ne prévoie expressément la possibilité de transiger sur cette réclamation et que le créancier intéressé n'ait voté en faveur de la transaction ou de l'arrangement proposé :

d) toute dette ou obligation résultant de l'obtention de biens ou de services par des faux-semblants ou la présentation erronée et frauduleuse des faits, autre qu'une dette ou obligation de la compagnie qui découle d'une réclamation relative à des capitaux propres;

[24] Pour déterminer le fardeau de preuve applicable à ce régime, il convient de se référer à la jurisprudence et à la doctrine portant sur l'al. 178(1)e) de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, L.R.C. 1985, c. B-3 (« LFI »), lequel s'apparente en tous points à l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC. Comme notre Cour l'a souligné dans l'arrêt Century Services Inc. c. Canada (Procureur général), 2010 CSC 60, [2010] 3 R.C.S. 379, ces deux lois « [font] partie d'un ensemble intégré de règles du droit de l'insolvabilité » (par. 78; voir aussi 9354-9186 Québec inc. c. Callidus Capital Corp., 2020 CSC 10, [2020] 1 R.C.S. 522, par. 74).

[25] Afin de satisfaire au fardeau qui lui incombe, c'est-à-dire démontrer que sa créance est une réclamation qui se rapporte à une dette « résultant de l'obtention de biens ou de services par des faux-semblants ou la présentation erronée et frauduleuse des faits », le créancier intéressé devra établir, par creditor; (ii) the representation was false; (iii) the debtor knew that the representation was false; (iv) the false representation was made to obtain property or a service (Léger v. Ouellet, 2011 QCCA 1858, at para. 30 (CanLII); Dupuis v. Cernato Holdings Inc., 2019 QCCA 376, at para. 37 (CanLII); see also L. W. Houlden, G. B. Morawetz and J. Sarra, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada (4th ed. rev. (loose-leaf)), vol. 3, at H§63; Berger, Re, 2010 ONSC 4376, 70 C.B.R. (5th) 225, at para. 28; J. P. Sarra, G. B. Morawetz and L. W. Houlden, The 2020-2021 Annotated Bankruptcy And Insolvency Act (2020), at pp. 1001 and 1006; D. Brochu, Précis de la faillite et de l'insolvabilité (5th ed. 2016), at pp. 502-3). Once these elements have been proved, the creditor of a claim to which s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA applies is in a better position than other ordinary creditors, insofar as such a claim, while not conferring secured creditor status, cannot be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement (see Houlden, Morawetz and Sarra, at H§63). This exception to the general scheme established by s. 19(1) of the CCAA must be interpreted narrowly (see, e.g., by analogy, Lambert v. Macara, [2004] R.J.Q. 2637 (C.A.), at para. 96; Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp. v. Gray, 2014 ONCA 236, 119 O.R. (3d) 710, at para. 24).

[26] The City's burden was certainly not negligible: it had to prove that SM Group had knowingly made a false representation that led to the VRP claim. However, the City considered it sufficient for that purpose to mention that the claim existed, and did not try to prove or even allege any of these elements, presuming or assuming that the VRP claim resulted from fraudulent representations.

[27] As a result, the content of the VRP agreement, Bill 26 and the VRP Regulation must be interpreted to determine whether the VRP claim may be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement. In this regard, and for the reasons that follow, we agree with the prépondérance des probabilités, les quatre éléments suivants : (i) le débiteur lui a fait une représentation; (ii) cette représentation était fausse; (iii) le débiteur savait que la représentation était fausse; (iv) cette fausse représentation a été faite dans le but d'obtenir un bien ou un service (Léger c. Ouellet, 2011 QCCA 1858, par. 30 (CanLII); Dupuis c. Cernato Holdings Inc., 2019 QCCA 376, par. 37 (CanLII); voir aussi L. W. Houlden, G. B. Morawetz et J. Sarra, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada (4e éd. rév. (feuilles mobiles)), vol. 3, H§63; Berger, Re, 2010 ONSC 4376, 70 C.B.R. (5th) 225, par. 28; J. P. Sarra, G. B. Morawetz et L. W. Houlden, The 2020-2021 Annotated Bankruptcy And Insolvency Act (2020), p. 1001 et 1006; D. Brochu, Précis de la faillite et de l'insolvabilité (5e éd. 2016), p. 502-503). Une fois ces éléments prouvés, le créancier d'une réclamation visée par l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC bénéficie d'une position plus avantageuse que les autres créanciers ordinaires, dans la mesure où cette réclamation ne peut être compromise dans le cadre d'une transaction ou d'un arrangement, quoiqu'elle ne confère pas le statut de créancier garanti (voir Houlden, Morawetz et Sarra, H§63). Cette exception au régime général institué par le par. 19(1) de la LACC doit être interprétée restrictivement (voir notamment, par analogie, Lambert c. Macara, [2004] R.J.Q. 2637 (C.A.), par. 96; Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp. c. Gray, 2014 ONCA 236, 119 O.R. (3d) 710, par. 24).

[26] Le fardeau qui incombait à la Ville n'était certes pas négligeable. En effet, elle devait prouver que Groupe SM avait sciemment fait une fausse représentation ayant mené à la créance PRV. Toutefois, la Ville a estimé, aux fins de cette démonstration, qu'il suffisait de mentionner l'existence de cette créance, et n'a pas cherché à prouver ni même à alléguer l'un ou l'autre de ces éléments, présumant ou tenant pour acquis que la créance PRV découlait de représentations frauduleuses.

[27] En conséquence, pour déterminer si la créance PRV peut être considérée dans le cadre d'une transaction ou d'un arrangement, il est nécessaire d'interpréter le contenu de l'entente PRV, la Loi 26 ainsi que le règlement PRV. À cet égard, et pour les raisons majority of the Court of Appeal that s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA does not apply to the VRP claim.

[28] First, the content of the VRP agreement itself is a complete bar to the City's argument that participation in the program in itself justifies a finding that the City's claim results from SM Group's fraudulent activities. Because this confidential agreement entered into by the parties clearly stipulates that the amount fixed in the agreement can in no way be considered to constitute an admission of liability, it cannot be presumed that the VRP claim is a claim that falls within s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA. The onus was therefore on the City to prove, in accordance with the provisions of that statute, that SM Group had knowingly made a false representation to it in order to obtain property or a service.

[29] In this regard, there is, moreover, a well-established principle in the case law that a court must generally make its own findings of fact in applying s. 19(2)(d) (see Houlden, Morawetz and Sarra, at H§63). This is true, for example, even where findings possibly linked to fraud have been made in a previous trial or where a default judgment or a consent to judgment might have contained such findings. It can be inferred by analogy from the case law on s. 178(1)(e) of the BIA that the courts have been particularly consistent and rigorous in assessing the evidence presented to them in this regard (see, e.g., Terrain DEV Immobilier inc. v. Charron, 2021 QCCA 417, at para. 2 (CanLII); Dupuis, at paras. 36-40; Pelletier v. CAE Rive-Nord, 2019 QCCA 2164, at paras. 13-19 (CanLII); Tavan v. Rostami, 2014 QCCA 304, at paras. 3-6 (CanLII); Léger, at paras. 30-40; Guilbert v. Economical Mutual Insurance Co., 2020 MBQB 179, [2021] I.L.R. ¶I-6280, at paras. 20-25; Sharma v. Sandhu, 2019 MBQB 160, at paras. 38-45 (CanLII); Royal Bank of Canada v. Hejna, 2013 ONSC 1719, at paras. 90-92 (CanLII); Berger, at paras. 28-35; Re Horwitz (1984), 52 C.B.R. (N.S.) 102 (Ont. H.C.J.), at pp. 106-7, aff'd (1985), 53 C.B.R. (N.S.) 275 (C.A.); Agriculture Financial Services Corp. v. Zaborski, 2009 ABQB que nous expliquons ci-dessous, nous partageons les conclusions des juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel : la créance PRV n'est pas visée par l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC.

[28] En premier lieu, le contenu même de l'entente PRV constitue un obstacle dirimant à la prétention de la Ville selon laquelle le seul fait de la participation à ce programme suffit pour conclure que sa créance résulte des activités frauduleuses de Groupe SM. En effet, comme il est clairement stipulé dans cette entente confidentielle intervenue entre les parties que la somme convenue dans celle-ci ne peut en aucun cas être assimilée à une admission de responsabilité, on ne saurait présumer que la créance PRV constitue une réclamation visée à l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC. En conséquence, il incombait à la Ville de prouver, conformément aux dispositions de cette loi, que Groupe SM lui avait faussement et sciemment fait une représentation afin d'obtenir un bien ou un service.

[29] D'ailleurs, en cette matière, une règle jurisprudentielle bien établie veut qu'un tribunal tire généralement ses propres conclusions factuelles aux fins d'application de l'al. 19(2)d) (voir Houlden, Morawetz et Sarra, H§63). Il en est ainsi, notamment, malgré la présence de conclusions liées possiblement à la fraude prononcées dans le cadre d'un procès antérieur, ou encore lorsqu'un jugement par défaut ou un acquiescement à jugement contiendrait de telles conclusions. La jurisprudence portant sur l'al. 178(1)e) de la LFI permet d'inférer, par analogie, que les tribunaux se montrent particulièrement constants et rigoureux dans l'appréciation de la preuve qui leur est présentée à cet égard (voir notamment Terrain DEV Immobilier inc. c. Charron, 2021 QCCA 417, par. 2 (CanLII); Dupuis, par. 36-40; Pelletier c. CAE Rive-Nord, 2019 QCCA 2164, par. 13-19 (CanLII); Tavan c. Rostami, 2014 QCCA 304, par. 3-6 (CanLII); Léger, par. 30-40; Guilbert c. Economical Mutual Insurance Co., 2020 MBQB 179, [2021] I.L.R. ¶I-6280, par. 20-25; *Sharma c. (2d) 369, at paras. 53-58).

[30] Second, Bill 26 and the VRP Regulation published in the Gazette officielle du Québec pursuant to ss. 3 and 4 of that statute do not provide any greater support for the City's position. We agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal, who rejected the idea of a statutory presumption or a presumption of fact that a debtor made fraudulent representations based solely on the fact that it participated in the VRP. That scheme, which was in effect from November 2015 to December 2017, created no such presumption.

[31] The purpose of the VRP as defined in s. 3 of Bill 26 — in Chapter II, entitled "Reimbursement Program" — supports this conclusion:

3. The Minister publishes in the Gazette officielle du Québec a voluntary, fixed-term reimbursement program to make it possible for an enterprise or a natural person mentioned in section 10 to reimburse certain amounts improperly paid in the course of the tendering, awarding or management of a public contract in relation to which there may have been fraud or fraudulent tactics.

[32] The use of the words "may have been" in the phrase "there may have been fraud or fraudulent tactics" clearly contradicts the City's argument. Moreover, the same words are also used in s. 1 of the VRP Regulation in describing the purpose of that program:

1. The Voluntary Reimbursement Program makes it possible for every natural person and every enterprise to reimburse certain amounts improperly paid by a public body in the course of the tendering, awarding or management of a public contract entered into after 1 October 1996 in relation to which there may have been fraud or fraudulent tactics.

Agriculture Financial Services Corp. c. Zaborski, 2009 ABQB 183, 58 C.B.R. (5th) 301, par. 12-18; Szeto, Re, 2014 BCSC 1563, 15 C.B.R. (6th) 255, par. 37-63; The Toronto-Dominion Bank c. Merenick, 2007 BCSC 1261, par. 30-48 (CanLII); Johnson c. Erdman, 2007 SKQB 223, 34 C.B.R. (5th) 108, par. 10-12; Coyle (Bankrupt), Re, 2011 NSSC 238, 304 N.S.R. (2d) 369, par. 53-58).

[30] En deuxième lieu, la Loi 26, tout comme le règlement PRV publié dans la Gazette officielle du Québec en vertu des art. 3 et 4 de cette loi, n'appuient pas davantage la thèse de la Ville. Nous partageons l'avis des juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, qui rejettent l'idée d'une présomption légale ou factuelle de l'existence de représentations frauduleuses de la part d'un débiteur du seul fait de sa participation au PRV. Ce régime, qui a été en vigueur de novembre 2015 à décembre 2017, n'a pas créé une telle présomption.

[31] En effet, l'objet du PRV tel qu'il est défini à l'art. 3 de la Loi 26, au chapitre II intitulé « Programme de remboursement », étaye cette conclusion :

3. Le ministre publie à la Gazette officielle du Québec un programme de remboursement volontaire à durée déterminée afin qu'une entreprise ou une personne physique mentionnée à l'article 10 puisse rembourser certaines sommes payées injustement dans le cadre de l'adjudication, de l'attribution ou de la gestion d'un contrat public et pour lequel il aurait pu y avoir fraude ou manœuvre dolosive.

[32] L'emploi du conditionnel dans l'expression « il aurait pu y avoir fraude ou manœuvre dolosive » contredit clairement la thèse avancée par la Ville. De plus, le conditionnel est également utilisé à l'art. 1 du règlement PRV pour décrire l'objet de ce programme :

1. Le Programme de remboursement volontaire permet à toute personne physique et à toute entreprise de rembourser certaines sommes payées injustement par un organisme public dans le cadre de l'adjudication, de l'attribution ou de la gestion d'un contrat public, conclu après le 1er octobre 1996, et pour lequel il aurait pu y avoir fraude ou ma[n]œuvre dolosive.

2021 SCC 53 (CanLII)

[33] The fact that fraud is characterized as a possibility rather than a certainty is by no means surprising. Given the VRP's purpose of recovering amounts paid improperly by public bodies, it stands to reason that Bill 26 does not provide for any mechanism to determine whether amounts agreed to under the VRP are in fact related, in whole or in part, to fraud. Section 7 of the VRP Regulation supports this point, since it states the following:

7. The fact that a natural person or an enterprise participates in the Program does not constitute an admission of liability or of a fault committed by the natural person or enterprise.

[34] The fault in question in s. 7 is a matter of civil liability and is limited to the public contract to which a VRP agreement pertains. Where the legislature intends to refer to penal or criminal proceedings, or to civil proceedings outside the scope of a VRP agreement, it does so expressly. This interpretation is confirmed when s. 7 of the VRP Regulation is read in conjunction with s. 8:

8. Every natural person or enterprise participating in the Program acknowledges that revealing information or sending documents within the Program framework does not restrict in any manner whatever a public body's capacity to bring civil proceedings against the natural person or enterprise in relation to public contracts for which a settlement has not been reached under the Program or to which the Act does not apply.

Every natural person or enterprise acknowledges that participation in the Program and the conclusion of an agreement under it in no manner protects the natural person or enterprise, or its officers, against any penal or criminal proceedings that have been or may be brought in connection with public contracts entered into by the natural person or enterprise.

[35] Evidence that a natural person or enterprise participated in the VRP therefore cannot on its own justify characterizing a claim as being related to a debt resulting from fraud pursuant to s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA.

[33] Que la fraude soit caractérisée comme une éventualité, par opposition à quelque chose de certain, n'a rien de surprenant. En effet, comme l'objectif du PRV consiste à récupérer des sommes payées injustement par des organismes publics, il va de soi que la Loi 26 ne prévoit aucun mécanisme pour déterminer si, dans les faits, les sommes convenues dans le cadre du PRV sont reliées, en partie ou en totalité, à une fraude. L'article 7 du règlement PRV appuie ce constat, puisqu'il précise ce qui suit :

7. Le fait pour une personne physique ou une entreprise de se prévaloir du Programme ne constitue pas une reconnaissance de responsabilité ni une admission qu'elle a commis une faute.

[34] La faute dont il est question à l'art. 7 relève de la responsabilité civile et se limite au contrat public visé par l'entente PRV. Lorsque le législateur entend faire référence à des procédures de nature pénale ou criminelle, ou encore à des recours civils se situant hors du champ de l'entente PRV, il le fait expressément. L'article 7 du règlement PRV, lu conjointement avec l'art. 8, confirme cette interprétation :

8. Toute personne physique ou entreprise qui se prévaut du Programme reconnaît que le fait qu'elle révèle des informations ou transmette des documents dans ce cadre n'a pas pour effet de limiter, de quelque façon que ce soit, la capacité d'un organisme public d'entreprendre contre elle tout recours civil concernant des contrats publics qui n'auront pas fait l'objet d'un règlement dans le cadre du Programme ou qui ne sont pas visés par la Loi.

De plus, toute personne physique ou entreprise reconnaît que sa participation au Programme, et la conclusion d'une entente en vertu de celui-ci, ne la protège, ni ses dirigeants, d'aucune façon de poursuites pénales et/ou criminelles qui ont été ou pourraient être intentées contre elle à l'égard de contrats publics qu'elle a conclus.

[35] En conséquence, la seule preuve qu'une personne physique ou une entreprise a participé au PRV ne saurait à elle seule permettre de qualifier une créance de réclamation se rapportant à une dette qui résulte de fraude aux termes de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC.

2021 SCC 53 (CanLII)

[36] However, the City submits that reading ss. 1, 3 and 10 of Bill 26 together leads to an entirely different conclusion, namely that a natural person or enterprise that participated in the VRP necessarily defrauded a public body. In our view, the City is wrong.

[37] It is true that s. 1 of Bill 26 does not refer to fraud as being hypothetical:

1. This Act provides for exceptional measures for the reimbursement and recovery of amounts improperly paid as a result of fraud or fraudulent tactics in the course of the tendering, awarding or management of public contracts.

As we saw above, however, s. 3 of Bill 26 and s. 1 of the VRP Regulation are clear: there is no question that, unlike s. 1 of Bill 26, which sets out the purpose of that statute generally, the substantive provisions of Bill 26 and the VRP Regulation contemplate fraud only hypothetically. In addition, the City's interpretation cannot be reconciled with ss. 7 and 8 of the VRP Regulation, which are reproduced above.

[38] That being said, the City points out that s. 3 of Bill 26 refers to s. 10, which specifically states that fraud was committed:

10. Any enterprise or natural person who has, in any capacity, participated in fraud or fraudulent tactics in the course of the tendering, awarding or management of a public contract is presumed to have caused injury to the public body concerned.

In such a case, the officers of the enterprise in office at the time the fraud or fraudulent tactics occurred are held liable unless they prove that they acted with the care, diligence and skill that a prudent person would have exercised in similar circumstances.

The directors of the enterprise in office at the time the fraud or fraudulent tactics occurred are also held liable if it is established that they knew or ought to have known that fraud or fraudulent tactics were committed in relation to the contract concerned, unless they prove that they acted with the care, diligence and skill that a prudent person would have exercised in similar circumstances.

[36] Cependant, la Ville soutient qu'une lecture conjointe des art. 1, 3 et 10 de la Loi 26 mène à une toute autre conclusion, à savoir que la personne physique ou l'entreprise qui participe au PRV a nécessairement fraudé un organisme public. Nous sommes d'avis qu'elle a tort.

[37] Il est vrai que l'art. 1 de la Loi 26 ne traite pas de la fraude à titre hypothétique :

1. La présente loi prévoit des mesures exceptionnelles adaptées au remboursement et au recouvrement de sommes payées injustement à la suite de fraudes ou de manœuvres dolosives dans le cadre de l'adjudication, de l'attribution ou de la gestion de contrats publics.

Toutefois, comme nous l'avons vu précédemment, l'art. 3 de la Loi 26 et l'art. 1 du règlement PRV sont clairs : il est acquis que, contrairement à l'art. 1 de la Loi 26, qui énonce l'objet de cette loi de manière générale, les dispositions substantielles de la Loi 26 et du règlement PRV ne considèrent la fraude que de façon hypothétique. L'interprétation de la Ville est également inconciliable avec les art. 7 et 8 du règlement PRV, qui sont reproduits plus haut.

[38] Cela dit, la Ville fait remarquer que l'art. 3 de la Loi 26 renvoie à l'art. 10 lequel énonce explicitement qu'une fraude a été commise :

10. Toute entreprise ou toute personne physique qui, à quelque titre que ce soit, a participé à une fraude ou à une manœuvre dolosive dans le cadre de l'adjudication, de l'attribution ou de la gestion d'un contrat public est présumée avoir causé un préjudice à l'organisme public concerné.

Le cas échéant, la responsabilité de ses dirigeants en fonction au moment de la fraude ou de la manœuvre dolosive est engagée, à moins qu'ils ne démontrent avoir agi avec le soin, la diligence et la compétence dont ferait preuve, en pareilles circonstances, une personne prudente.

La responsabilité des administrateurs de l'entreprise en fonction au moment de la fraude ou de la manœuvre dolosive est également engagée s'il est établi qu'ils savaient ou qu'ils auraient dû savoir qu'une fraude ou une manœuvre dolosive a été commise relativement au contrat visé, à moins qu'ils ne démontrent avoir agi avec le soin, la diligence et la compétence dont ferait preuve, en pareilles circonstances, une personne prudente.

The enterprises and natural persons referred to in this section are solidarily liable for the injury caused, unless such liability is waived by the public body.

[39] We do not agree with the City's interpretation on this point. It is up to the courts to conclude that fraud of this kind has been committed. More precisely, we are of the view that the City is confusing two schemes created by Bill 26: one — the VRP (ss. 3 to 9) — introduced by Chapter II and the other by Chapter III, which is entitled "Special Rules Applicable to Judicial Proceedings" (ss. 10 to 17). The first scheme was designed to encourage — for a two-year period — natural persons or enterprises fearing that a public body would bring civil proceedings against them to participate in the VRP with a view to entering into an agreement through a completely confidential process (s. 7 of Bill 26; s. 4 of the VRP Regulation). It was only once the first scheme ended that the second, one of an entirely different nature, took effect.

[40] The scheme provided for in ss. 10 to 17 of Bill 26 is one that deviates from the general law. It applies to judicial proceedings brought by a public body, or by the Minister of Justice on behalf of a public body, against a natural person or enterprise that allegedly participated in fraud in relation to a public contract. When a court allows such an action, not only can it assume that the defendant caused injury to the public body through its fraudulent act (s. 10 para. 1), but in addition, "[t]he injury is presumed to correspond to the amount claimed by the public body concerned for the contract concerned if the amount does not exceed 20% of the total amount paid for that contract" (s. 11 para. 1). The enterprises and natural persons contemplated by the statute are solidarily liable for such injury (s. 10 para. 4). An amount granted "bears interest from the date the work is accepted by the public body concerned for the contract concerned" (s. 11 para. 3). As well, the court "must add a lump sum equal to 20% of any amount granted for injury, to cover expenses incurred for the purposes of th[e] Act" (s. 14).

Les entreprises et les personnes physiques visées au présent article sont solidairement responsables du préjudice causé, à moins que l'organisme public n'y renonce.

[39] Nous ne partageons pas cette interprétation de la Ville. Il appartient aux tribunaux de conclure qu'une fraude de cette nature a été commise. Plus précisément, nous estimons que la Ville confond deux régimes créés par la Loi 26 : l'un introduit par le chapitre II — le PRV — (art. 3 à 9), l'autre par le chapitre III intitulé « Règles particulières applicables aux recours judiciaires » (art. 10 à 17). Le premier régime a été conçu afin d'inciter, pendant une période de deux ans, les personnes physiques ou les entreprises craignant qu'un organisme public introduise contre elles une poursuite civile à participer au PRV dans le but de conclure une entente en toute confidentialité (art. 7 de la Loi 26; art. 4 du règlement PRV). Or, ce n'est qu'une fois que le premier régime prend fin que le second entre en vigueur, lequel est d'une toute autre nature.

[40] Le régime prévu aux art. 10 à 17 de la Loi 26 est un régime exorbitant du droit commun, applicable aux recours judiciaires intentés par un organisme public ou le ministre de la Justice, pour le compte d'un organisme public, contre une personne physique ou une entreprise qui aurait participé à une fraude visant un contrat public. Lorsqu'un tel recours est accueilli, non seulement le tribunal peut-il tenir pour acquis que le défendeur a causé par son acte frauduleux un préjudice à l'organisme public (art. 10 al. 1), mais aussi que « [c]e préjudice est présumé correspondre à la somme réclamée par l'organisme public concerné pour le contrat visé lorsque cette somme ne représente pas plus de 20 % du montant total payé pour le contrat visé » (art. 11 al. 1), préjudice pour lequel les entreprises et les personnes physiques visées par la loi sont solidairement responsables (art. 10 al. 4). La somme accordée « porte intérêt à compter de la réception de l'ouvrage par l'organisme public concerné pour le contrat visé » (art. 11 al. 3). De même, le tribunal « doit ajouter à la somme qu'il accorde en réparation du préjudice un montant forfaitaire égal à 20 % de cette somme à titre de frais engagés pour l'application de la [. . .] loi » (art. 14).

[41] In other words, these provisions are designed to make it easier to prove causation and injury when such a proceeding is brought, but it should be noted that they are of no effect if a court finds that the evidence of fraud is insufficient; as well, and most importantly, they in no way make it easier to prove such a fault. Section 10 of Bill 26 is therefore of no assistance to the City, which in any event has not sought to show, on any basis other than the mere existence of the VRP agreement, that SM Group took part in fraud in connection with a contract the City awarded to it. The schemes created by Bill 26 suggest that a court will recognize the existence of fraud only under the Chapter III scheme. Moreover, it appears that the reference to s. 10 in s. 3 merely serves to specify the natural persons to whom the VRP applies, namely directors and officers of enterprises.

[41] Autrement dit, ces dispositions visent à faciliter la preuve du lien de causalité et du préjudice lorsqu'un tel recours est intenté, mais, faut-il le souligner, elles demeurent sans effet dans l'éventualité où un tribunal judiciaire conclut que la preuve relative à la fraude s'avère insuffisante; aussi, et surtout, elles ne facilitent en aucun cas la preuve d'une telle faute. Partant, l'art. 10 de la Loi 26 n'est d'aucun secours pour la Ville, qui, de toute manière, n'a pas cherché à démontrer, autrement qu'en invoquant la seule existence de l'entente PRV, que Groupe SM a participé à une fraude dans le cadre d'un contrat qu'elle lui a octroyé. À en juger par les régimes mis en œuvre par cette loi, la reconnaissance judiciaire de l'existence d'une fraude n'intervient que dans le régime propre au chapitre III de celle-ci. De plus, il appert que le renvoi à l'art. 10 dans l'art. 3 ne sert qu'à préciser quelles sont les personnes physiques visées par le PRV, en l'occurrence les administrateurs et dirigeants des entreprises.

[42] Lastly, it should be mentioned that it can easily be imagined that an enterprise that entered into a potentially contentious public contract with a public body would make the strategic choice to participate in the VRP out of fear of bad publicity or to avoid exposing itself to the exceptional scheme of Chapter III of Bill 26, the result of which, if the proceeding were decided in the public body's favour, would likely be significant additional financial liability for the enterprise on top of the legal fees it would have to pay.

[43] In sum, neither the content of the VRP agreement nor its legal framework supports a presumption that SM Group admitted to having committed a fraudulent act; nor does the VRP agreement constitute a serious, precise and concordant presumption of fact (art. 2849 of the Civil Code of Québec). It follows that the City has not shown that the VRP claim falls within s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA.

[43] En somme, ni le contenu de l'entente PRV ni le cadre juridique qui lui est propre ne permettent de présumer que Groupe SM a admis avoir commis un acte frauduleux, pas plus que l'entente PRV ne constitue une présomption de fait grave, précise et concordante (art. 2849 du Code civil du Québec). Il s'ensuit que la Ville n'a pas démontré que la créance PRV relevait de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC.

[44] The bankruptcy of large companies often resulted in "the entire disruption of the corporation, loss of goodwill, and sale of assets on a discounted basis" (J. P. Sarra, Rescue! The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (2nd ed. 2013), at pp. 22-23; see also Century Services, at para. 16). Parliament, wishing to protect the survivability of such companies, which are essential to economic prosperity and to a high rate of employment, therefore set up a restructuring process in the CCAA that was designed to prevent them from being dismantled and having their assets liquidated at a discount (Century Services, at paras. 17-18 and 70; Callidus, at paras. 41-42).

[45] Initially, restructuring under the CCAA was done through a plan of arrangement or compromise negotiated between the debtor company and its creditors that averted the company's bankruptcy by allowing it to adjust its debts and reorganize its business (S. E. Edwards, "Reorganizations Under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act" (1947), 25 Can. Bar Rev. 587, at pp. 588-90 and 592). Later, liquidation under the CCAA emerged as a practice. Liquidation can also serve as a tool for restructuring a struggling business "by allowing the business to survive, albeit under a different corporate form or ownership" (Callidus, at para. 45; see also Sarra, at p. 169; K. P. McElcheran, Commercial Insolvency in Canada (4th ed. 2019), at p. 311).

[46] The primary tool that allows the CCAA to achieve its restructuring objective is a stay of proceedings and of creditors' rights (Sarra, at pp. 17 and 52; McElcheran, at p. 5). The direct effect of a stay is that it creates a status quo period that stabilizes the debtor company's situation by shielding it from its creditors while the restructuring process is under way (Century Services, at para. 60; see also Kitco, at para. 43 (CanLII)). Without such a period, there would be a free-for-all in which individual creditors would fight it out to enforce their rights without regard for the company's survival or the maximization of its liquidation value (Century Services, at para. 22).

[47] During the status quo period, the debtor company can therefore continue operating without fear of being driven into bankruptcy by its creditors. This perturbation complète des activités de l'entreprise, à la perte de sa clientèle et à la vente à rabais de son actif » (J. P. Sarra, Rescue! The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (2e éd. 2013), p. 22-23; voir aussi Century Services, par. 16). Le législateur, soucieux de protéger la capacité de survie de ces compagnies essentielles à la prospérité économique et à un taux d'emploi élevé, a donc mis en place dans la LACC un processus de restructuration destiné à éviter leur démantèlement et la liquidation à rabais de leurs actifs (Century Services, par. 17-18 et 70; Callidus, par. 41-42).

[45] Initialement, la restructuration sous le régime de la LACC se faisait au moyen d'un plan d'arrangement ou de transaction négocié entre la compagnie débitrice et ses créanciers qui évitait sa mise en faillite en lui permettant de rajuster ses dettes et de réorganiser ses affaires (S. E. Edwards, « Reorganizations Under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act » (1947), 25 R. du B. can. 587, p. 588-590 et 592). Puis a émergé, en application de la LACC, une pratique de liquidation qui peut elle aussi constituer un outil de restructuration de l'entreprise en difficulté « en lui permettant de survivre, quoique sous une forme corporative différente ou sous la gouverne de propriétaires différents » (Callidus, par. 45; voir aussi Sarra, p. 169; K. P. McElcheran, Commercial Insolvency in Canada (4e éd. 2019), p. 311).

[46] L'instrument principal qui permet à la LACC de réaliser son objectif de restructuration est la suspension des procédures et des droits des créanciers (Sarra, p. 17 et 52; McElcheran, p. 5). L'effet direct de la suspension est qu'elle instaure une période de statu quo qui stabilise la situation de la compagnie débitrice en la mettant à l'abri de ses créanciers pendant que la restructuration suit son cours (Century Services, par. 60; voir aussi Kitco, par. 43). L'absence d'une telle période entraînerait une situation anarchique où chaque créancier se battrait pour faire valoir ses droits, sans égard à la survie de l'entreprise ou à la maximisation de sa valeur de liquidation (Century Services, par. 22).

[47] Durant cette période, la compagnie débitrice peut donc poursuivre ses activités sans craindre d'être poussée à la faillite par ses créanciers. Ce temporary respite creates an environment conducive to fair negotiations between the various stakeholders and gives the debtor the necessary time to prepare a plan of compromise or arrangement ensuring its survival, or to take steps to maximize the value of the business it operates with a view to its liquidation under the CCAA (Meridian Developments Inc. v. Toronto Dominion Bank (1984), 32 Alta. L.R. (2d) 150 (Q.B.), at para. 15; Kitco, at para. 43; Callidus, at paras. 40 and 46).

[48] The fundamental feature of the CCAA is a grant to the courts that apply it of a broad discretion to make any orders needed to ensure that restructuring is successful and that the CCAA's objectives are achieved (Century Services, at para. 19). The true "engine" driving the statutory scheme (Callidus, at para. 48, citing Stelco Inc. (Re) (2005), 253 D.L.R. (4th) 109 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 36), this judicial discretion also plays a prominent part in stays of proceedings.

[49] In principle, a court may deny a stay application. Such applications are rarely denied, however, to the point where the terms "initial order" and "stay order" have, in practice, become interchangeable (Sarra, at p. 51). Stays are in fact requested and granted systematically, other than in certain exceptional cases (p. 51).

[50] A stay is a temporary measure, however; once it has been lifted, creditors regain their ability to fully exercise their rights and remedies (Quinsam Coal Corp., Re, 2000 BCCA 386, 20 C.B.R. (4th) 145, at paras. 9 and 14). On an initial application in respect of a debtor company, a court may include in its initial order a first stay period of no more than 10 days (s. 11.02(1) of the CCAA). After that, the court may renew the stay for any period it considers necessary (s. 11.02(2) of the CCAA). When a stay is renewed, or at any other time in the course of the proceedings, an interested creditor may, in accordance with the procedure set out in the initial order, apply to the court to lift a stay affecting any of its rights or remedies (Sarra, at pp. 58-60 and 88; see also Muscletech Research & Development Inc., Re moment de répit crée un environnement propice à une négociation équitable entre les différentes parties prenantes, en plus d'offrir à la débitrice le temps nécessaire pour préparer un plan de transaction ou d'arrangement assurant sa survie ou pour prendre des mesures maximisant la valeur de l'entreprise qu'elle exploite en vue de sa liquidation en vertu de la LACC (Meridian Developments Inc. c. Toronto Dominion Bank (1984), 32 Alta. L.R. (2d) 150 (B.R.), par. 15; Kitco, par. 43; Callidus, par. 40 et 46).

[49] En principe, le tribunal peut refuser une demande de suspension. Ces demandes sont toutefois rarement refusées, à tel point que les termes « ordonnance initiale » et « ordonnance de suspension » sont devenus, en pratique, interchangeables (Sarra, p. 51). La suspension est en effet demandée et accordée systématiquement, si ce n'est dans certains cas exceptionnels (p. 51).

[50] La suspension est cependant une mesure temporaire; une fois levée, les créanciers retrouvent la capacité d'exercer pleinement leurs droits et recours (Quinsam Coal Corp., Re, 2000 BCCA 386, 20 C.B.R. (4th) 145, par. 9 et 14). Dans le cas d'une demande initiale visant une compagnie débitrice, le tribunal peut assortir son ordonnance initiale d'une première période de suspension d'une durée maximale de 10 jours (par. 11.02(1) de la LACC). Par la suite, la suspension peut être renouvelée par le tribunal pour la période qu'il estime nécessaire (par. 11.02(2) de la LACC). Au moment du renouvellement de la suspension, ou à tout autre moment au cours des procédures, un créancier intéressé peut, conformément à la procédure prévue à cet effet dans l'ordonnance initiale, demander au tribunal de lever (2006), 19 C.B.R. (5th) 54 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 5; Parc industriel Laprade inc. v. Conporec inc., 2008 QCCA 2222, [2008] R.J.Q. 2590, at paras. 7-8 and 14-15).

[51] While it is true that the BIA and the CCAA form part of an integrated body of insolvency law, there are nonetheless some fundamental differences between the two schemes (Century Services, at para. 78). Unlike the BIA, the CCAA gives courts a broad discretion to decide whether a stay is appropriate, to determine how long it should last and to adjust its scope depending on what is needed to restructure the debtor company and to achieve the objectives of the CCAA. In this regard, the CCAA has been described as a "skeletal" statute that does not contain "a comprehensive code that lays out all that is permitted or barred" (Century Services, at para. 57, quoting Metcalfe & Mansfield Alternative Investments II Corp. (Re), 2008 ONCA 587, 92 O.R. (3d) 513, at para. 44).

[52] To fully understand the rights and restrictions applicable in a given case, it is therefore not enough to read the legislation; it is also important to consider the court's exercise of its discretion, which is reflected in all of the many orders made throughout the proceedings.

[53] The question raised by this appeal is therefore whether a court's discretion allows it to stay a right to pre-post compensation, or set-off, invoked by a creditor under the civil law or the common law and, by extension, to authorize pre-post compensation in appropriate cases.

(a) Power to Grant and Lift a Stay of the Right to Pre-post Compensation

[54] In our view, the broad discretion conferred on a court by ss. 11 and 11.02 of the CCAA allows it to stay rights held by creditors if the exercise of those rights could jeopardize the restructuring process.

la suspension affectant l'un de ses droits ou recours (Sarra, p. 58-60 et 88; voir aussi Muscletech Research & Development Inc., Re (2006), 19 C.B.R. (5th) 54 (C.S.J. Ont.), par. 5; Parc industriel Laprade inc. c. Conporec inc., 2008 QCCA 2222, [2008] R.J.Q. 2590, par. 7-8 et 14-15).

[51] Bien que la LFI et la LACC fassent partie d'un ensemble intégré de règles du droit de l'insolvabilité, il existe tout de même des différences fondamentales entre les deux régimes (Century Services, par. 78). En effet, contrairement à ce qui prévaut sous la LFI, la LACC confère au tribunal un large pouvoir discrétionnaire lui permettant de décider de l'opportunité d'une suspension, de déterminer la durée de celle-ci et d'en ajuster la portée selon les besoins de la restructuration et selon ce qui est nécessaire pour réaliser les objectifs de la LACC. En ce sens, la LACC a été décrite comme une loi [TRADUCTION] « schématique » ne contenant « pas un code complet énonçant tout ce qui est permis et tout ce qui est interdit » (Century Services, par. 57, citant Metcalfe & Mansfield Alternative Investments II Corp. (Re), 2008 ONCA 587, 92 O.R. (3d) 513, par. 44).

[52] Pour bien saisir les droits et restrictions applicables dans un cas donné, il ne suffit donc pas de lire la loi; il faut également se pencher sur l'exercice par le tribunal de son pouvoir discrétionnaire, lequel se manifeste dans toute la multitude d'ordonnances rendues tout au long des procédures.

[53] La question que soulève le présent pourvoi consiste donc à déterminer si le pouvoir discrétionnaire dont dispose le tribunal lui permet de suspendre le droit d'opérer compensation pré-post qu'invoque un créancier en vertu du droit civil ou de la common law et, corollairement, d'autoriser la compensation pré-post dans les cas qui s'y prêtent.

a) Pouvoir d'accorder et de lever une suspension du droit à la compensation pré-post

[54] Nous sommes d'avis que le vaste pouvoir discrétionnaire conféré au tribunal par les art. 11 et 11.02 de la LACC permet à celui-ci de suspendre des droits reconnus aux créanciers mais dont l'exercice

2021 SCC 53 (CanLII)

This includes a creditor's right to effect pre-post compensation.

[55] Under s. 11.02 of the CCAA, a court may stay any action, suit or other proceeding that might be brought against the debtor company. Despite the language of s. 11.02, which at first glance limits the power to order a stay to judicial proceedings, the courts have taken a large and liberal approach in interpreting the scope of the rights and remedies that can be included in a stay order (see Meridian, at para. 26; Quintette Coal Ltd. v. Nippon Steel Corp. (1990), 51 B.C.L.R. (2d) 105 (C.A.), at pp. 113-14; Smoky River Coal Ltd., Re, 1999 ABCA 179, 71 Alta. L.R. (3d) 1, at paras. 31-33; McElcheran, at pp. 135 and 245-46; R. J. Wood, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law (2nd ed. 2015), at p. 363). For example, in Quintette Coal, the British Columbia Court of Appeal concluded that a creditor's right to pre-post set-off can be stayed just like any other enforcement measure with a high disruptive potential (see also Associated Investors of Canada Ltd. (Manager of) v. Principal Savings & Trust Co. (Liquidator of) (1993), 13 Alta. L.R. (3d) 115 (C.A.), at paras. 23-24; North American Tungsten Corp., Re, 2015 BCCA 390, 377 B.C.A.C. 6, at paras. 13-16, aff'd 2015 BCCA 426, 378 B.C.A.C. 116, at paras. 28-30). In our view, this interpretation is the correct one, as it advances the CCAA's remedial objectives and is consistent with its scheme.

[56] It can also be seen from the various model initial orders adopted by the country's superior courts that prohibitions against setting off debts are standard practice, and in the vast majority of cases take effect as soon as an initial order is made (see Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta, Alberta Template CCAA Initial Order, January 2019 (online), at paras. 14 and 16; Supreme Court of British Columbia, Model CCAA Initial Order, August 1, 2015 (online), at paras. 16 and 18; Ontario Superior Court of Justice, Commercial List, Initial Order, January 21, 2014 (online), at paras. 15-16; Superior Court of Quebec, Commercial Division, Initial Order, May 2014 (online), at paras. 10 and 12; Court of Queen's Bench for serait susceptible de mettre en péril la restructuration, y compris le droit d'opérer compensation pré-post.

[55] L'article 11.02 de la LACC permet de suspendre toute action, poursuite ou autre procédure pouvant être intentée contre la compagnie débitrice. Malgré le texte de l'art. 11.02, qui limite à première vue aux procédures judiciaires l'application du pouvoir de suspension, la jurisprudence interprète de manière large et libérale l'étendue des droits et recours susceptibles d'être inclus dans une ordonnance de suspension (voir Meridian, par. 26; Quintette Coal Ltd. c. Nippon Steel Corp. (1990), 51 B.C.L.R. (2d) 105 (C.A.), p. 113-114; Smoky River Coal Ltd., Re, 1999 ABCA 179, 71 Alta. L.R. (3d) 1, par. 31-33; McElcheran, p. 135 et 245-246; R. J. Wood, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law (2e éd. 2015), p. 363). À titre d'exemple, dans l'arrêt Quintette Coal, la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a conclu que le droit d'un créancier d'opérer compensation pré-post pouvait être suspendu au même titre que toute autre mesure d'exécution possédant un fort potentiel perturbateur (voir aussi Associated Investors of Canada Ltd. (Manager of) c. Principal Savings & Trust Co. (Liquidator of) (1993), 13 Alta. L.R. (3d) 115 (C.A.), par. 23-24; North American Tungsten Corp., Re, 2015 BCCA 390, 377 B.C.A.C. 6, par. 13-16, conf. par 2015 BCCA 426, 378 B.C.A.C. 116, par. 28-30). Selon nous, cette interprétation est la bonne, puisqu'elle favorise les objectifs réparateurs de la LACC, en plus d'être cohérente avec l'économie de cette loi.

[56] À la lumière des divers modèles d'ordonnances initiales adoptés par les cours supérieures du pays, on constate d'ailleurs que l'interdiction d'opérer compensation entre des dettes est pratique courante et que, dans la très vaste majorité des cas, une telle interdiction entre en vigueur dès le prononcé de l'ordonnance initiale (voir Cour du Banc de la Reine de l'Alberta, Alberta Template CCAA Initial Order, janvier 2019 (en ligne), par. 14 et 16; Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique, Model CCAA Initial Order, 1er août 2015 (en ligne), par. 16 et 18; Cour supérieure de justice de l'Ontario, rôle des affaires commerciales, Ordonnance initiale, 21 janvier 2014 (en ligne), par. 15-16; Cour supérieure du Québec, Saskatchewan, Saskatchewan Template CCAA Initial Order, December 6, 2017 (online), at paras. 15-16).

[57] A court's discretion is therefore broad enough to allow it to stay the right of creditors to effect pre-post compensation. In such a case, the prohibition against pre-post compensation flows directly from the stay order. Conversely, a court may in its discretion refuse to impose such a prohibition or, if pre-post compensation was stayed by the order, lift the stay at a later date to allow an interested creditor to assert its rights. On this point, we reject the absolute prohibition proposed by the Quebec Court of Appeal in Kitco, because we conclude that a court has the discretion to allow pre-post compensation in appropriate cases.

[58] The instances in which a court should not stay the right to effect pre-post compensation in an initial order will be rare, however. It must be borne in mind that a supervising judge's discretion, although broad, is not boundless. It must be exercised in furtherance of the CCAA's remedial objectives (Callidus, at para. 49).

[59] The status quo period could be rendered pointless if creditors were allowed to effect pre-post compensation without restraint (see Kitco, at paras. 20 and 43). Tungsten, in which the court stayed pre-post set-off, provides a good example of the disruptive potential of this form of set-off (North American Tungsten Corp., Re, 2015 BCSC 1382, 28 C.B.R. (6th) 147 ("Tungsten (S.C.)"), at para. 32, aff'd 2015 BCCA 390, 377 B.C.A.C. 6, at paras. 16, 20 and 25, and 2015 BCCA 426, 378 B.C.A.C. 116, at para. 29). If a creditor could rely on compensation to refuse to pay for goods or services supplied by the debtor during the status quo period, the restructuring could be torpedoed. The debtor would have a disincentive to provide its creditors with goods and services because it would fear not being paid for them; it would then be deprived of the funds needed to continue Chambre commerciale, Ordonnance initiale, mai 2014 (en ligne), par. 10 et 12; Cour du Banc de la Reine de la Saskatchewan, Saskatchewan Template CCAA Initial Order, 6 décembre 2017 (en ligne), par. 15-16).

[57] Le pouvoir discrétionnaire dont dispose le tribunal est donc suffisamment large pour lui permettre de suspendre le droit des créanciers d'opérer compensation pré-post. Dans un tel cas, l'interdiction d'opérer compensation pré-post découle directement de l'ordonnance de suspension. En revanche, le tribunal peut à sa discrétion refuser d'imposer une telle interdiction ou, si la compensation pré-post a été suspendue par l'ordonnance, lever cette suspension par la suite pour permettre à un créancier intéressé de faire valoir ses droits. Sur ce point, nous écartons l'interdiction absolue proposée par la Cour d'appel du Québec dans l'arrêt Kitco, puisque nous concluons que le tribunal possède le pouvoir discrétionnaire de permettre la compensation pré-post dans les cas qui s'y prêtent.

[58] Rares seront toutefois les occasions où un tribunal ne devrait pas suspendre le droit d'opérer compensation pré-post dans l'ordonnance initiale. Faut-il le rappeler, le pouvoir discrétionnaire du juge surveillant, quoique vaste, n'est pas sans limites. Il doit tendre à la réalisation des objectifs réparateurs de la LACC (Callidus, par. 49).

[59] En effet, la période de statu quo pourrait devenir lettre morte si l'on permettait aux créanciers d'opérer sans retenue la compensation pré-post (voir Kitco, par. 20 et 43). L'affaire Tungsten, dans laquelle le tribunal avait suspendu l'exercice de la compensation pré-post constitue un bon exemple du potentiel perturbateur de cette forme de compensation (North American Tungsten Corp., Re, 2015 BCSC 1382, 28 C.B.R. (6th) 147 (« Tungsten (C.S.) »), par. 32, conf. par 2015 BCCA 390, 377 B.C.A.C. 6, par. 16, 20 et 25, et par 2015 BCCA 426, 378 B.C.A.C. 116, par. 29). Si le créancier pouvait, en invoquant la compensation, refuser de payer le prix pour les biens ou services fournis par la débitrice pendant la période de statu quo, la restructuration risquerait d'être torpillée. La débitrice serait incitée à ne fournir ni biens ni services à ses créanciers par operating (see Kitco, at paras. 46-48). Section 32 of the CCAA in fact gives the debtor a right — subject to the limits and formal requirements provided for in that provision — to disclaim or resiliate any agreement to which it is a party on the day on which the restructuring proceedings commence. In addition, an interim lender would most likely refuse to continue to finance the debtor's operations during this period if the loaned funds were destined to enrich another creditor at its expense. Lastly, the rampart set up by a stay to protect against attacks from all sides by creditors would also crumble, thereby increasing the risk of the debtor's collapse and bankruptcy (see also A. R. Anderson, T. Gelbman and B. Pullen, "Recent Developments in the Law of Set-off", in J. P. Sarra, ed., Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2009 (2010), 1, at pp. 22 and 29).

[60] The inevitable interruption of the business relationship between the debtor and those who are at once creditors and customers could not come at a worse time. Without these contracts and without the payment of accounts receivable and interim financing to replenish the debtor's working capital, the resale value of its business would melt away, thus setting up roadblocks for restructuring it by way of liquidation. And such a situation could also be unfavourable to creditors that wish to effect compensation. If the debtor terminates a contract and refuses to perform it, the creditor concerned will be deprived of the benefit of the contract and will have to find a new contracting party in place of the debtor, with no guarantee that the price will remain the same.

[61] Furthermore, where pre-post compensation has been stayed, the court retains the discretion to lift the stay based on the specific facts of each case. However, it must be cautious in doing so, given the high disruptive potential of such compensation.

[62] In conclusion, we are of the view that ss. 11 and 11.02 of the CCAA authorize a court to stay pre-post compensation. Although we would temper the rule from Kitco, which involves an absolute prohibition against pre-post compensation, it is our view crainte de ne pas être payée en retour; elle serait alors privée des fonds nécessaires pour poursuivre ses opérations (voir Kitco, par. 46-48). L'article 32 de la LACC lui donne justement le droit de résilier tout contrat auquel elle est partie à la date à laquelle les procédures de restructuration ont été intentées, sous réserve des limites et formalités qui sont prévues par cette disposition. De plus, le prêteur intérimaire refuserait fort probablement de continuer à financer les opérations de la débitrice durant cette période, si les sommes prêtées sont destinées à enrichir un autre créancier à son détriment. Enfin, le rempart érigé par la suspension contre les attaques tous azimuts des créanciers s'effriterait lui aussi, augmentant ainsi les risques de déconfiture et de faillite de la débitrice (voir aussi A. R. Anderson, T. Gelbman et B. Pullen, « Recent Developments in the Law of Set-off », dans J. P. Sarra, dir., Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2009 (2010), 1, p. 22 et 29).

[60] L'inévitable interruption de la relation d'affaires entre la débitrice et ceux qui sont à la fois créanciers et clients ne pourrait intervenir à un pire moment. Sans ces contrats et sans un fonds de roulement regarni par le paiement des comptes à recevoir et le financement intérimaire, la valeur de revente de l'entreprise exploitée par la débitrice s'atrophierait, dressant alors des écueils à sa restructuration par voie de liquidation. Par ailleurs, une telle situation peut également être défavorable pour le créancier qui désire opérer compensation. Si la débitrice met fin au contrat et refuse de s'exécuter, le créancier concerné sera privé du bénéfice du contrat et devra trouver un nouveau cocontractant à la place de la débitrice, sans garantie que le prix restera le même.

[61] En outre, lorsque la compensation pré-post a été suspendue, le tribunal conserve le pouvoir discrétionnaire de lever la suspension selon les faits particuliers de chaque affaire. Cependant, il doit faire preuve de prudence, considérant le fort potentiel perturbateur d'une telle compensation.

[62] Pour conclure, nous sommes d'avis que les art. 11 et 11.02 de la LACC autorisent le tribunal à suspendre l'exercice de la compensation pré-post. Tout en tempérant la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Kitco, qui interdisait de manière absolue la compensation that in the vast majority of cases an initial order will, and should, stay a creditor's right to set up pre-post compensation against the debtor. Finally, where an initial order has stayed the right of creditors to pre-post compensation, the court retains the discretion to lift the stay having regard to the circumstances.

(b) Scope of Section 21 of the CCAA

[63] In addition, we note that s. 21 of the CCAA does not grant creditors a right to pre-post compensation that would be shielded from a supervising judge's power to order a stay under ss. 11 and 11.02 of the CCAA. Although s. 21 of the CCAA indicates that there is a right to effect compensation in proceedings under that statute, we are of the opinion that it applies only to compensation between debts that arise before an initial order is made (in other words, "pre-pre compensation"). The modern approach to statutory interpretation dictates this conclusion (Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, at para. 21, citing E. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87). Our interpretation of s. 21 of the CCAA is not based on an inappropriate analogy with the provisions of the BIA.

[64] Section 21 does state that it is possible to effect compensation in insolvency proceedings under the CCAA, but it does not specifically deal with pre-post compensation. It reads as follows:

Law of set-off or compensation to apply

21 The law of set-off or compensation applies to all claims made against a debtor company and to all actions instituted by it for the recovery of debts due to the company in the same manner and to the same extent as if the company were plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be.

Read in light of its context, its purpose and the scheme of the CCAA, s. 21 is, in our view, limited to authorizing pre-pre compensation for the purpose pré-post, nous estimons que, dans la très vaste majorité des cas, l'ordonnance initiale suspendra, et devrait suspendre, le droit d'un créancier d'opposer à la débitrice une telle forme de compensation. Finalement, lorsque l'ordonnance initiale a suspendu le droit des créanciers à la compensation pré-post, le tribunal conserve le pouvoir discrétionnaire de lever la suspension en fonction des circonstances.

b) La portée de l'art. 21 de la LACC

[63] Nous soulignons par ailleurs que l'art. 21 de la LACC ne confère pas aux créanciers un droit à la compensation pré-post qui serait à l'abri du pouvoir de suspension dont dispose le juge surveillant en vertu des art. 11 et 11.02 de la LACC. Bien que l'art. 21 de la LACC atteste d'un droit d'opérer compensation dans le cadre des procédures prises sous cette loi, nous sommes d'avis qu'il ne vise que la compensation entre des dettes nées avant le prononcé de l'ordonnance initiale (autrement dit, la « compensation pré-pré »). Cette conclusion s'impose suivant la méthode moderne d'interprétation des lois (Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), [1998] 1 R.C.S. 27, par. 21, citant E. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2e éd. 1983), p. 87). Notre interprétation de l'art. 21 de la LACC ne repose pas sur une analogie inappropriée avec les dispositions de la LFI.

[64] En effet, cet article précise qu'il est possible d'opérer compensation dans le cadre de procédures en insolvabilité introduites sous le régime de la LACC, mais il ne traite pas expressément de la compensation pré-post. Cette disposition est rédigée ainsi :

Compensation

21 Les règles de compensation s'appliquent à toutes les réclamations produites contre la compagnie débitrice et à toutes les actions intentées par elle en vue du recouvrement de ses créances, comme si elle était demanderesse ou défenderesse, selon le cas.

Lu à la lumière de son contexte, de son objet et de l'esprit de la LACC, nous sommes d'avis que l'art. 21 se limite à autoriser la compensation pré-pré aux fins of quantifying creditors' claims on the date of commencement of proceedings.

[65] With regard to the context, s. 21 is in a different part of the statute than the one that provides for a court's discretion to order a stay. The power to order a stay (ss. 11 and 11.02) and most of the exceptions to it (see, e.g., ss. 11.01, 11.08 and 11.1) appear in Part II, which is entitled "Jurisdiction of Courts". Section 21, meanwhile, is in the division of Part III entitled "Claims", which also includes ss. 19 and 20. This indicates that Parliament probably did not consider s. 21 to be an exception to the stay period. If Parliament had in fact intended s. 21 to be an exception, it would have included it in Part II or expressly stated that it was an exception.

[66] What is more, when s. 21 is considered in the broader context of the "Claims" division, it becomes clear that this provision is part of a set of rules governing the claims that may be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement and the quantification of the resulting amounts.

[67] Section 19 specifies which claims may be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement (s. 19(1)) and those which will remain intact despite the creditors' agreement to a compromise or arrangement and its sanction by a court (s. 19(2)). Only claims arising before the date of commencement of bankruptcy or insolvency proceedings are "claims" that fall under s. 19 and therefore give creditors a right to vote on a compromise or arrangement. As for s. 20, it contains rules for determining the amount of claims. Once that amount has been determined, it can then be used to define the relative weight of the voting rights of each creditor with a claim.[1] de quantification des réclamations des créanciers au jour de l'ouverture.

[65] En ce qui concerne le contexte, l'art. 21 fait partie d'une section différente de celle visant le pouvoir discrétionnaire de suspension conféré au tribunal. Le pouvoir de suspension (art. 11 et 11.02) ainsi que la plupart de ses exceptions (voir, p. ex., art. 11.01, 11.08 et 11.1) figurent dans la partie II, intitulée « Juridiction des tribunaux ». Pour sa part, l'art. 21 fait plutôt partie de la section « Réclamations » de la partie III, qui comprend également les art. 19 et 20. Ceci indique que le législateur ne considérait vraisemblablement pas l'art. 21 comme une exception à la période de suspension. Si son intention avait été plutôt d'en faire une exception, il aurait inclus l'art. 21 dans la partie II ou affirmé expressément qu'il s'agit d'une exception.

[66] Au surplus, il ressort d'un examen de l'art. 21 dans le contexte plus large de la section « Réclamations » que cette disposition fait partie d'un ensemble de règles encadrant les réclamations qui peuvent être considérées dans le cadre d'une transaction ou d'un arrangement et la quantification des montants qui en découlent.

[67] L'article 19 précise quelles sont les réclamations qui peuvent être considérées dans le cadre d'une transaction ou d'un arrangement (par. (1)) et celles qui demeureront intactes malgré l'acceptation par les créanciers d'une transaction ou d'un arrangement et son homologation par le tribunal (par. (2)). Seules les créances ayant pris naissance avant la date d'ouverture des procédures en faillite ou insolvabilité constituent des « réclamations » visées par l'art. 19 et donnent ainsi aux créanciers le droit de voter sur une transaction ou un arrangement. Quant à l'art. 20, il contient des règles permettant de déterminer le montant des réclamations. Une fois déterminé, ce montant permet ensuite de définir le poids relatif du droit de vote de chaque créancier détenant une réclamation[1].

[1] A plan of compromise or arrangement must be approved by a special majority representing two thirds in value of the creditors or a class of creditors (s. 6(1) of the CCAA).

[1] Le plan de transaction ou d'arrangement doit être approuvé par une majorité qualifiée des deux tiers en valeur des créanciers ou d'une catégorie de créanciers (par. 6(1) de la LACC).

2021 SCC 53 (CanLII)

[68] Section 21 complements ss. 19 and 20; the compensation authorized by s. 21 is intended, among other things, to determine the value of the claim that a creditor may have against the debtor on the date of commencement of proceedings. In other words, the purpose of s. 21 is to provide an accurate picture of the pecuniary interest each creditor has in the restructuring on the date of commencement of proceedings, and of the number of votes each creditor should have (see Kitco, at para. 83). This provision is not concerned with what might happen to the debtor's business after that date, because the date of commencement of proceedings is when [TRANSLATION] "the claims must be established" and therefore when the mutuality of debts must be assessed (B. Boucher, "Procédures en vertu de la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies", in JurisClasseur Québec — Collection Droit des affaires — Faillite, insolvabilité et restructuration (loose-leaf), by S. Rousseau, ed., fasc. 14, at No. 70; see also Kitco, at para. 34).

[68] L'article 21 complète les art. 19 et 20; la compensation autorisée par l'art. 21 vise, entre autres, à déterminer la valeur de la réclamation qu'un créancier peut avoir contre la débitrice au jour de l'ouverture. Autrement dit, l'art. 21 vise à donner l'heure juste sur l'intérêt pécuniaire que détient chaque créancier dans la restructuration au jour de l'ouverture et le nombre de votes dont il devrait disposer (voir Kitco, par. 83). Cette disposition s'intéresse peu à ce qui pourrait se passer postérieurement à cette date dans les affaires de la débitrice; en effet, c'est au jour de l'ouverture que « doivent être établies les réclamations » et donc que la réciprocité des dettes doit s'apprécier (B. Boucher, « Procédures en vertu de la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies », dans JurisClasseur Québec — Collection Droit des affaires — Faillite, insolvabilité et restructuration (feuilles mobiles), par S. Rousseau, dir., fasc. 14, nº 70; voir aussi Kitco, par. 34).

[69] With all due respect for our colleague, in light of the context of s. 21, it is evident that this provision is not meant to legitimize pre-post compensation.

[69] Avec égards pour l'opinion de notre collègue, à la lumière du contexte de l'art. 21, il est apparent que cette disposition n'a pas pour vocation de légitimer la compensation pré-post.

[70] This contextual interpretation of s. 21, which limits its scope to pre-pre compensation, is also confirmed by the section's purpose. It was added to the CCAA to prevent the unfair situation that would result from a creditor being required to pay its debt to the debtor company in full but receiving almost nothing from the debtor in payment of its claim under an arrangement or compromise. The effect of s. 21 is that the creditor receives payment of its claim up to the value of the debt it owes to the debtor (Anderson, Gelbman and Pullen, at p. 27; Boucher, at No. 70; McElcheran, at p. 116).

[70] Cette interprétation contextuelle de l'art. 21, qui limite son champ d'application à la compensation pré-pré, est également confirmée par son objet. Cette disposition a été ajoutée à la LACC afin de prévenir l'injustice qui résulterait du fait qu'un créancier serait tenu de payer intégralement sa dette à la compagnie débitrice, mais ne recevrait presque rien de la débitrice en paiement de sa créance aux termes d'un arrangement ou d'une transaction. En raison de l'art. 21, le créancier reçoit paiement de sa créance jusqu'à concurrence de la valeur de la dette qu'il devait à la débitrice (Anderson, Gelbman et Pullen, p. 27; Boucher, nº 70; McElcheran, p. 116).

[71] It is true that compensation "creat[es] a type of security interest in the [insolvent company's] estate" because it "[authorizes] the party claiming set-off [to] 'reorde[r]' . . . his priority" by reducing the value of that party's claim (Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453, at paras. 59-60; see Kitco, at paras. 63-68). The creditor uses its indebtedness to the debtor as a form of security for its claim, security that is equal in value to its debt to the insolvent company (Stein v. Blake, [1996] 1 A.C. 243 (H.L.), at p. 251). This portion of its claim is therefore sure to be paid in full (Husky Oil, at para. 58). The effect of compensation is thus to deviate from the principle of equality among ordinary creditors, a fundamental principle of insolvency law that applies with equal force in proceedings under the CCAA, one of the remedial objectives of which is to ensure the fair and equitable treatment of the claims made against a debtor (Callidus, at para. 40). The exception created by compensation must therefore be interpreted narrowly. As a general rule, "[o]nce a formal insolvency process commences, all unsecured creditor remedies are stayed and the creditor must stand in line behind secured and preferred creditors and share any remaining recoveries in the estate pro rata with all other unsecured creditors" (McElcheran, at p. 78).

[71] Il est vrai que la compensation « crée une sorte de garantie sur l'actif de la [compagnie insolvable] », parce qu'elle « autorise la partie qui invoque la compensation à "modifier" l'ordre de priorité » en réduisant la valeur de sa créance (Husky Oil Operations Ltd. c. Ministre du Revenu national, [1995] 3 R.C.S. 453, par. 59-60; voir Kitco, par. 63-68). Le créancier

[72] The prejudice suffered by a creditor wishing to effect pre-post compensation does not justify expanding the scope of s. 21. When the debt owed by the creditor arises after a stay order has been made, prejudice is merely illusory. The fact that the creditor contracted obligations toward the debtor company during the stay period does not place it in a worse situation than it would have been in had it contracted with a third party instead. If it had contracted with a third party, it would likewise have had to pay the full price of the goods or services it obtained (Tungsten (S.C.), at para. 27). A creditor that contracts with the debtor company during the status quo period knows or ought to know that it will probably receive only pennies on the dollar in payment of its pre-order claim and that payment of its post-order debt will benefit it and the other creditors.

[73] Because there is really prejudice only in the case of pre-pre compensation, this exception to the se sert de sa dette envers la débitrice comme d'une forme de garantie à l'égard de sa créance, une garantie d'une valeur égale à sa dette envers la compagnie insolvable (Stein c. Blake, [1996] 1 A.C. 243 (H.L.), p. 251). Cette portion de sa créance est donc assurée d'être payée en totalité (Husky Oil, par. 58). Par ses effets, la compensation déroge ainsi au principe de l'égalité entre les créanciers ordinaires, un principe fondamental du droit de l'insolvabilité qui s'applique avec autant de force dans le cadre de procédures intentées sous le régime de la LACC, dont l'un des objectifs réparateurs vise à assurer un traitement juste et équitable des réclamations déposées contre un débiteur (Callidus, par. 40). L'exception créée par la compensation doit donc être interprétée de manière restrictive. En règle générale, [TRADUCTION] « [u]ne fois que s'amorce formellement une procédure en matière d'insolvabilité, tous les recours des créanciers non garantis sont suspendus et chaque créancier doit faire la queue derrière les créanciers garantis et les créanciers privilégiés, et partager avec tous les autres créanciers non garantis, au prorata, toute somme qui reste dans le patrimoine » (McElcheran, p. 78).

[72] Le préjudice subi par un créancier désirant opérer compensation pré-post ne justifie pas d'élargir la portée de l'art. 21. Lorsque la dette due par le créancier prend naissance après le prononcé de l'ordonnance de suspension, le préjudice n'est qu'illusoire. Le fait que le créancier ait contracté des obligations envers la compagnie débitrice durant la période de suspension ne le place pas dans une pire situation que celle dans laquelle il aurait été s'il avait plutôt contracté avec un tiers. S'il avait contracté avec un tiers, il aurait de la même façon été contraint de payer intégralement le prix des produits ou services qu'il a obtenus (Tungsten (C.S.), par. 27). Le créancier qui contracte avec la compagnie débitrice durant la période de statu quo sait ou devrait savoir qu'il ne recevra probablement que des sous pour chaque dollar de sa créance pré-ordonnance et que le paiement de sa dette post-ordonnance lui bénéficiera, ainsi qu'aux autres créanciers.

[73] Puisque le préjudice ne se manifeste réellement qu'en ce qui concerne la compensation pré-pré, principle of equality should apply to only one of the debtor's assets on the date of commencement of insolvency proceedings, that is, the debt owed to it by the creditor (Kitco, at para. 68; Husky Oil, at para. 59). Otherwise, giving the green light to pre-post compensation would amount to granting certain creditors an additional "type of security interest" in respect of new assets acquired by the debtor after the commencement of proceedings (for example, amounts received as interim financing). Professor Wood aptly describes the injustice that would thus befall the other ordinary creditors whose rights and remedies have been stayed:

> The ability to exercise a right of set-off in restructuring proceedings can operate to improve greatly the position of one creditor at the expense of the other creditors. This is illustrated in the following example. Suppose that the debtor company owes $1,000 to a creditor. The debtor company then initiates restructuring proceedings. While the proceedings are under way, the debtor company sells and delivers goods to the creditor for $1,000. By exercising its right of set-off, the creditor obtains full recovery of its claim at the expense of the other unsecured creditors whose claims will be compromised or otherwise affected by the plan. [p. 400]

[74] Yet the very purpose of the stay period is to ensure that no creditor gains an advantage over the others while the restructuring of the debtor company is under way (Woodward's Ltd., Re (1993), 79 B.C.L.R. (2d) 257 (S.C.), at para. 12; Lehndorff General Partner Ltd., Re (1993), 17 C.B.R. (3d) 24 (Ont. C.J. (Gen. Div.)), at para. 6); Hawkair Aviation Services Ltd., Re, 2006 BCSC 669, 22 C.B.R. (5th) 11, at para. 17). Pre-post compensation should not allow a creditor to do indirectly what it cannot do directly. Parliament could not have intended to create such an additional security interest that can be realized during the stay period simply because the creditor and the debtor company have a continuing business relationship.

[75] To repeat, viewing s. 21 as allowing pre-post compensation would undermine the effectiveness of the status quo period, would jeopardize the survival cette exception au principe de l'égalité ne devrait donc porter que sur un seul des éléments d'actifs de la débitrice au jour de l'ouverture des procédures en insolvabilité, c'est-à-dire la dette du créancier à son endroit (Kitco, par. 68; Husky Oil, par. 59). Autrement, donner le feu vert à la compensation pré-post équivaudrait à attribuer à certains créanciers une « sorte de garantie » additionnelle sur de nouveaux éléments d'actif acquis par la débitrice après l'ouverture des procédures (par exemple, les sommes reçues à titre de financement intérimaire). Le professeur Wood décrit bien l'injustice qui serait ainsi causée aux autres créanciers ordinaires dont les droits et recours sont suspendus :

> [TRADUCTION] La capacité d'exercer un droit d'opérer compensation lors de procédures de restructuration peut avoir pour effet d'améliorer grandement la position d'un créancier au détriment des autres. Voici un exemple qui illustre cette affirmation. Supposons qu'une compagnie débitrice doit 1 000 $ à un créancier. Cette compagnie entame des procédures de restructuration. Alors que les procédures sont en cours, la compagnie débitrice vend et livre au créancier des biens d'une valeur de 1 000 $. Exerçant son droit d'opérer compensation, ce dernier recouvre entièrement le montant de sa réclamation, au détriment des autres créanciers non garantis, dont les réclamations seront compromises ou autrement affectées par le plan. [p. 400]

[75] Faut-il le rappeler, considérer que l'art. 21 autorise la compensation pré-post minerait l'efficacité de la période de statu quo, mettrait en péril la survie of the debtor company or the business it operates and could derail the restructuring process. It is clear that Parliament could not have intended that a struggling company, deprived of its only lifeline, be condemned to drown in its debts solely because a single creditor wanted to gain an advantage over the others. Such an outcome is contrary to the fundamental objectives of the CCAA.

[76] Before concluding, we will pause to briefly discuss Kitco. In that case, the Court of Appeal rejected a literal interpretation of s. 21 as allowing all forms of compensation, including pre-post compensation, without any restrictions. Our colleague is of the view that Kitco, which was applied by the majority of the Court of Appeal and by the supervising judge in the instant case, has created an asymmetry between the interpretation given to s. 21 of the CCAA by the Quebec courts and the interpretation given to it by the courts of other Canadian provinces. He cites Air Canada, Re (2003), 45 C.B.R. (4th) 13 (Ont. S.C.J.), and Tungsten in this regard.

[77] In our view, Kitco is not at odds with the jurisprudence of the rest of the country on the interpretation of s. 21. Air Canada and Tungsten did not determine whether pre-post compensation is consistent with the interpretation and objectives of the CCAA, let alone establish a framework for the exercise of this right by creditors.

[78] First of all, in Air Canada, the issues did not relate to the impact of pre-post compensation on the achievement of the CCAA's objectives. Rather, the case concerned the requirements for legal set-off at common law and the interpretation of a provision of the Winding-up and Restructuring Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. W-11, that was worded differently from s. 18.1 (now s. 21) of the CCAA. On the subject of legal set-off, Air Canada argued that the making of an initial order under the CCAA results in a loss of mutuality between debts, by analogy with the vesting of a bankrupt's property in a trustee under the BIA. This was the context in which the court found that an de la compagnie débitrice ou de l'entreprise qu'elle exploite et pourrait faire dérailler la restructuration. Il ne fait aucun doute que le législateur ne peut avoir souhaité qu'une compagnie en difficulté, privée de sa seule bouée de sauvetage, soit condamnée à crouler sous le poids de ses dettes, uniquement parce qu'un seul créancier a souhaité s'avantager au détriment des autres. Un tel résultat va à l'encontre des objectifs fondamentaux de la LACC.

[76] Avant de conclure, nous ouvrons une parenthèse au sujet de l'arrêt Kitco. Dans cette affaire, la Cour d'appel a rejeté l'interprétation littérale de l'art. 21 selon laquelle cette disposition autoriserait sans réserve toute forme de compensation, y compris la compensation pré-post. Notre collègue est d'avis que cet arrêt, appliqué par la majorité de la Cour d'appel et la juge surveillante dans la présente affaire, crée une asymétrie entre l'interprétation par les tribunaux québécois de l'art. 21 de la LACC et celle des tribunaux des autres provinces canadiennes. Notre collègue cite à cet égard les affaires Air Canada, Re (2003), 45 C.B.R. (4th) 13 (C.S.J. Ont.), et Tungsten.

[77] À notre avis, l'arrêt Kitco ne s'inscrit pas en faux contre la jurisprudence du reste du pays en ce qui concerne l'interprétation de l'art. 21. En effet, les affaires Air Canada et Tungsten n'ont pas tranché la question de savoir si la compensation pré-post est conforme à l'interprétation et aux objectifs de la LACC, et encore moins établi les balises entourant l'exercice de ce droit par des créanciers.

initial order under the CCAA does not alter the status of creditor and debtor of the insolvent company, unlike what happens in a bankruptcy proceeding.

[79] Moreover, in Tungsten, the dispute related primarily to the possibility of staying the right to pre-post set-off. The judge who ruled on the applications did not analyze the arguments concerning the effects of pre-post set-off on the status quo period and on the underlying objectives of this period, finding that it was not necessary to do so in the circumstances. Our colleague maintains that the question of whether pre-post set-off could be effected was never raised by the parties, which by implication showed that it was permitted by s. 21 of the CCAA. In our view, the fact that the possibility of effecting pre-post set-off was not argued tends more to weaken the authority of that decision than to strengthen it.

[80] Therefore, and with due respect for the contrary view, the state of the law on the interpretation of s. 21 had not been settled elsewhere in Canada. When ruling in Kitco, the Court of Appeal was not bound by Air Canada and Tungsten.

[81] In summary, we conclude, as the Court of Appeal did in Kitco, that s. 21 of the CCAA allows pre-pre compensation for the purpose of quantifying creditors' claims on the date of commencement of proceedings (Kitco, at para. 82). This provision does not have the effect of authorizing pre-post compensation. That being said, s. 21 of the CCAA does not prohibit this form of compensation either. A supervising judge therefore retains the discretion to stay or to authorize the exercise of a right to pre-post compensation, or set-off, invoked by a creditor under the civil law or the common law.

[82] We turn now to the situation in this case.

les dettes, par analogie avec la saisine des biens du failli par un syndic sous le régime de la LFI. C'est dans ce contexte que le tribunal a conclu que l'ordonnance initiale rendue en application de la LACC ne modifie pas les qualités de créancière et de débitrice de la société insolvable, contrairement à une procédure de faillite.

[79] De plus, dans l'affaire Tungsten, le litige portait principalement sur la possibilité de suspendre le droit à la compensation pré-post. En première instance, le juge n'a procédé à aucune analyse des arguments relatifs aux impacts de la compensation pré-post sur la période de statu quo et sur les objectifs sous-jacents de cette dernière, estimant qu'il n'était pas nécessaire de le faire dans les circonstances. Notre collègue soutient que la question de savoir si la compensation pré-post pouvait s'opérer n'a jamais été soulevée par les parties, ce qui démontrait implicitement que cette compensation était permise par l'art. 21 de la LACC. Selon nous, l'absence de débat sur la possibilité d'opérer compensation pré-post a davantage pour effet d'affaiblir l'autorité de cette décision que de la renforcer.

[81] En somme, à l'instar de la Cour d'appel dans l'arrêt Kitco, nous concluons que l'art. 21 de la LACC permet la compensation pré-pré aux fins de quantification des réclamations des créanciers au jour de l'ouverture (Kitco, par. 82). Cette disposition n'a pas pour effet d'autoriser la compensation pré-post. Cela dit, l'art. 21 de la LACC n'a pas non plus pour effet d'interdire cette forme de compensation. Ainsi, le juge surveillant conserve le pouvoir discrétionnaire de suspendre ou d'autoriser l'exercice du droit à la compensation pré-post invoqué par un créancier en vertu du droit civil ou de la common law.

[82] Voyons ce qu'il en est en l'espèce.

(c) Application

[83] In the case at bar, the words of the stay order made by the Superior Court are broad enough to prohibit pre-post compensation:

No Exercise of Rights or Remedies

ORDERS that during the Stay Period, and subject to, inter alia, subsection 11.1 CCAA, all rights and remedies, including, but not limited to modifications of existing rights and events deemed to occur pursuant to any agreement to which any of the Debtors is a party as a result of the insolvency of the foreign Debtors and/or these CCAA proceedings, any events of default or non-performance by the Debtors or any admissions or evidence in these CCAA proceedings, of any individual, natural person, firm, corporation, partnership, limited liability company, trust, joint venture, association, organization, governmental body or agency, or any other entity (all of the foregoing, collectively being "Persons" and each being a "Person") against or in respect of the Debtors, or affecting the Business, the Property or any part thereof, are hereby stayed and suspended except with leave of this Court.

c) Application

[83] Dans la présente affaire, les termes de l'ordonnance de suspension rendue par le Tribunal sont suffisamment larges pour interdire la compensation pré-post :

[TRADUCTION]

Suspension des droits et recours

ORDONNE CE QUI SUIT : Durant la Période de suspension, et sous réserve, entre autres, de l'article 11.1 de la LACC, tous les droits et recours, notamment les modifications aux droits existants et les événements réputés survenir suivant toute entente à laquelle l'un des Débiteurs est partie en raison de l'insolvabilité des Débiteurs étrangers et/ou des présentes procédures fondées sur la LACC, de quelque manquement ou inexécution par les Débiteurs ou de quelque admission ou témoignage dans le cadre de ces procédures fondées sur la LACC, de quelque personne physique, firme, personne morale, société de personnes, société à responsabilité limitée, fiducie, coentreprise, association, organisation, organisme ou agence du gouvernement, ou de toute autre entité (toutes les entités énumérées précédemment étant appelées collectivement « Personnes » et individuellement « Personne ») visant les Débiteurs ou s'y rapportant, ou touchant l'Entreprise, les Biens ou toute partie de ceux-ci, sont suspendus par les présentes, sauf sur autorisation de la Cour.

Interdiction de porter atteinte aux droits

ORDONNE CE QUI SUIT : Durant la Période de suspension, il est interdit à toute Personne de supprimer, de refuser d'honorer, de modifier, de violer, de répudier, de résilier ou de cesser d'exécuter, selon le cas, quelque droit, droit de renouvellement, contrat, entente, licence ou permis en faveur des Débiteurs ou détenu par ceux-ci, sauf avec le consentement écrit des Débiteurs, le cas échéant, et du Contrôleur, ou sur autorisation de la Cour. [84] L'ordonnance ayant suspendu la compensation à l'égard des créances pré-post, il reste à déterminer si le Tribunal aurait dû exercer son exercised its discretion under s. 11 of the CCAA and allowed such compensation in respect of the VRP claim. Although we are of the view that the supervising judge erred in finding, in reliance on Kitco, that she had no discretion to authorize pre-post compensation, we feel that remanding the case to the court of original jurisdiction would be unhelpful and would not be in the interests of justice. What is more, the delays resulting from this case have prejudiced the rights of third persons in good faith involved in the restructuring of SM Group. In this regard, Thornhill was unable to reimburse, as stipulated, the transition financing granted by the interveners Alaris Royalty Corp. and Integrated Private Debt Fund V LP, which are also creditors of SM Group, largely because of the City's refusal to pay the cost of the work done by SM Group.

pouvoir discrétionnaire en vertu de l'art. 11 de la LACC et permettre l'application de cette compensation à l'égard de la créance PRV. Bien que nous soyons d'avis que la juge surveillante a fait erreur en concluant qu'elle ne possédait aucun pouvoir discrétionnaire l'habilitant à autoriser la compensation pré-post en se basant sur l'arrêt Kitco, il nous apparaît que le renvoi du dossier en première instance serait inutile et contraire aux intérêts de la justice. Au surplus, les délais occasionnés par le présent dossier causent préjudice aux droits des tiers de bonne foi ayant participé à la restructuration de Groupe SM. À cet égard, Thornhill n'a pas été en mesure de rembourser, selon les termes stipulés, le financement de transition consenti par les intervenantes Alaris Royalty Corp. et Integrated Private Debt Fund V LP, également créancières de Groupe SM, notamment en raison du refus de la Ville d'acquitter le coût des travaux effectués par Groupe SM.

[85] In exercising its discretion under the CCAA, a court must keep three baseline considerations in mind: (1) the appropriateness of the order being sought, (2) due diligence and (3) good faith on the applicant's part (Callidus, at para. 49; Century Services, at para. 70).

[85] Dans l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire que lui confère la LACC, le tribunal doit garder à l'esprit trois considérations de base : (1) l'opportunité de l'ordonnance sollicitée, (2) la diligence et (3) la bonne foi du demandeur (Callidus, par. 49; Century Services, par. 70).

[86] The first consideration, the appropriateness of the order being sought, relates both to the order itself and to the means that are employed (Century Services, at para. 70). It is assessed in light of the remedial objectives of the CCAA (Callidus, at para. 49; Century Services, at para. 70). These remedial objectives include the following: avoiding the social and economic losses resulting from the liquidation of an insolvent company; maximizing creditor recovery; ensuring fair and equitable treatment of the claims against the debtor company; preserving going-concern value where possible; protecting jobs and communities affected by the company's financial distress; and enhancing the credit system generally (Callidus, at paras. 40-42). In this regard, the context of restructuring by way of liquidation, and the impact of pre-post compensation on its progress, can be weighed by a court in exercising its discretion. In addition, protecting the public interest, although it overlaps a number of the remedial objectives to be considered by the courts, must also be included in this list (Callidus, at para. 40; Century Services, at para. 60).

[86] La première considération, soit le caractère opportun de l'ordonnance sollicitée, vise tout autant l'ordonnance elle-même que les moyens utilisés (Century Services, par. 70). Elle s'évalue au regard des objectifs réparateurs de la LACC (Callidus, par. 49; Century Services, par. 70). Parmi ces objectifs réparateurs, mentionnons les suivants : éviter les pertes sociales et économiques résultant de la liquidation d'une compagnie insolvable; maximiser le recouvrement au profit des créanciers; assurer un traitement juste et équitable des réclamations déposées contre la compagnie débitrice; préserver la valeur d'exploitation dans la mesure du possible; protéger les emplois et les collectivités touchées par les difficultés financières de l'entreprise; améliorer le système de crédit de manière générale (Callidus, par. 40-42). À ce chapitre, le contexte d'une restructuration par voie de liquidation, ainsi que les répercussions de la compensation pré-post sur son bon déroulement, peuvent être soupesés par le tribunal dans l'exercice de son pouvoir discrétionnaire. De

[87] Here, the City argues that protecting the public interest is a consideration that favours pre-post compensation. It submits that the majority of the Court of Appeal erred in not considering [TRANSLATION] "the public interest in ensuring the recovery of fraudulently misappropriated public funds" (A.F., at para. 2; see also para. 80). We cannot accept this argument, for the following reasons.

[88] In our view, the City is wrongly conflating the public interest with its own interest as a public body with a claim. The objective of protecting the public interest does not mean that public bodies should be placed in a better position than other creditors because their claims relate to public funds. That would be contrary to the principle of equality among creditors. In the context of the CCAA, protecting the public interest therefore cannot be reduced to protecting the interests of a particular creditor. It involves taking account of interests beyond those of the debtor company and its creditors, such as the interests of employees whose jobs are threatened or of the community in which the debtor company operates (Ernst & Young Inc. v. Essar Global Fund Ltd., 2017 ONCA 1014, 139 O.R. (3d) 1, at para. 102; Metcalfe, at paras. 50-52; Sarra, at pp. 162 and 501; Wood, at p. 341; see also, for a clear illustration, Canadian Red Cross Society/Société canadienne de la Croix-Rouge, Re (1998), 5 C.B.R. (4th) 299 (Ont. C.J. (Gen. Div.)), at para. 50).

[89] Protecting the public interest can also encompass considerations of commercial morality that reflect societal norms, such as considerations related to the fact that no one should profit from fraudulent activities in which they have taken part (A. Keay, "Insolvency Law: A Matter of Public Interest?" (2000), 51 N. Ir. Legal Q. 509, at pp. 513 and 525). In very specific circumstances, a court could therefore conclude that protection of the public interest and the CCAA's other remedial objectives justify authorizing surcroît, bien qu'elle recoupe un certain nombre des objectifs réparateurs dont les tribunaux doivent tenir compte, la protection de l'intérêt public doit elle aussi figurer sur cette liste (Callidus, par. 40; Century Services, par. 60).

[87] En l'espèce, la Ville prétend que la protection de l'intérêt public milite en faveur de la compensation pré-post. Elle estime que les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont commis une erreur en ne considérant pas « l'intérêt public de voir à la récupération des deniers publics détournés frauduleusement » (m.a., par. 2; voir aussi par. 80). Nous ne pouvons retenir cette prétention. Voici pourquoi.

[88] Selon nous, la Ville amalgame à tort l'intérêt public avec son propre intérêt en tant qu'organisme public titulaire d'une créance. L'objectif de protection de l'intérêt public ne signifie pas que les entités publiques devraient être placées dans une position plus avantageuse que les autres créanciers parce que leurs créances concernent des deniers publics. Cela contredit le principe de l'égalité entre les créanciers. Dans le contexte de la LACC, la protection de l'intérêt public ne saurait donc être réduite à la protection de l'intérêt d'un créancier en particulier. Elle suppose la prise en compte d'intérêts qui dépassent ceux de la compagnie débitrice et de ses créanciers, comme celui des employés dont les emplois sont menacés ou celui de la communauté dans laquelle évolue la compagnie débitrice (Ernst & Young Inc. c. Essar Global Fund Ltd., 2017 ONCA 1014, 139 O.R. (3d) 1, par. 102; Metcalfe, par. 50-52; Sarra, p. 162 et 501; Wood, p. 341; voir aussi, pour une illustration éloquente, Canadian Red Cross Society/Société canadienne de la Croix-Rouge, Re (1998), 5 C.B.R. (4th) 299 (C.J. Ont. (Div. gén.)), par. 50).

[89] La protection de l'intérêt public peut aussi s'étendre à des considérations de moralité commerciale qui reflètent les normes sociales, comme des considérations liées au fait que nul ne devrait bénéficier d'activités frauduleuses auxquelles il a pris part (A. Keay, « Insolvency Law : A Matter of Public Interest? » (2000), 51 N. Ir. Legal Q. 509, p. 513 et 525). Dans des circonstances bien particulières, le tribunal pourrait donc conclure que la protection de l'intérêt public, de même que les pre-post compensation in favour of a creditor that has proved that it was a victim of fraud within the meaning of s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA, which explains the relevance of determining whether the VRP claim is a claim resulting from fraud in this case. But while such a conclusion is possible in law, it should not be drawn automatically. In every case, a court should exercise its discretion as indicated in Callidus and Century Services, and if it so happens that predominant weight must be given to the objective of protecting the public interest, the court should take care not to reduce the public interest to the interests of a particular creditor or group of creditors.

[90] In the instant case, the City's VRP claim is an ordinary claim because, as we have indicated, the City has not proved the alleged fraud and such proof cannot be inferred solely from the fact that its claim is related to an agreement entered into under the VRP. Its argument that the objective of protecting the public interest favours pre-post compensation must therefore be rejected. The City has not relied on any of the CCAA's other remedial objectives in support of its position. It follows that it has not discharged its burden of proving that the order being sought is appropriate. Moreover, the work performed for the City by SM Group was in the public interest, as it involved continuing to carry out major projects, such as the construction of the Samuel De Champlain Bridge and the rebuilding of the Turcot Interchange.

[91] The second consideration, due diligence, clearly weighs against pre-post compensation by the City. Under the CCAA, this consideration is important because it "discourages parties from sitting on their rights and ensures that creditors do not strategically manoeuver or position themselves to gain an advantage" (Callidus, at para. 51). The procedure set out in the CCAA involves negotiations as well as compromises between the debtor and stakeholders and is overseen by a court and a monitor; it follows that all those who participate must be on an equal footing and must have a clear understanding of their respective obligations and rights (para. 51). This autres objectifs réparateurs de la LACC, justifient d'autoriser la compensation pré-post en faveur d'un créancier qui a démontré avoir été victime de fraude au sens de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC, d'où la pertinence de déterminer si la créance PRV est une réclamation qui découle de fraude dans le cas qui nous occupe. Mais si une telle conclusion est possible en droit, elle ne devrait pas relever de l'automatisme. Dans chaque cas, le tribunal doit exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire de la façon indiquée dans les arrêts Callidus et Century Services, et si d'aventure il est appelé à accorder un poids prépondérant à l'objectif de protection de l'intérêt public, il doit se garder de réduire l'intérêt public à l'intérêt d'un créancier ou d'un groupe de créanciers en particulier.

[90] En l'espèce, la créance PRV de la Ville est une créance ordinaire, puisque, comme nous l'avons indiqué, la Ville n'a pas apporté la preuve de la fraude alléguée et cette preuve ne saurait s'inférer du seul fait que sa créance se rattache à une entente conclue en vertu du PRV. En conséquence, sa prétention selon laquelle l'objectif de protection de l'intérêt public milite en faveur de la compensation pré-post doit être rejetée. La Ville n'a pas invoqué d'autre objectif réparateur de la LACC au soutien de sa position. Il s'ensuit qu'elle ne s'est pas déchargée du fardeau qui lui incombait d'établir le caractère indiqué de l'ordonnance sollicitée. De plus, les travaux effectués par Groupe SM pour la Ville étaient dans l'intérêt public, puisqu'ils consistaient à poursuivre la réalisation de chantiers majeurs, tels que la construction du pont Samuel-De Champlain et la réfection de l'échangeur Turcot.

[91] La deuxième considération, soit celle de la diligence, milite clairement à l'encontre de l'exercice de la compensation pré-post par la Ville. Sous le régime de la LACC, cette considération est importante étant donné qu'elle « décourage les parties de rester sur leurs positions et fait en sorte que les créanciers n'usent pas stratégiquement de ruse ou ne se placent pas eux-mêmes dans une position pour obtenir un avantage » (Callidus, par. 51). La procédure prévue par la LACC implique des négociations ainsi que des transactions entre le débiteur et les intéressés et elle est supervisée par le tribunal et le contrôleur; il s'ensuit que tous les acteurs qui y participent doivent

Court accordingly reached the following conclusion in Callidus:

> A party's failure to participate in CCAA proceedings in a diligent and timely fashion can undermine these procedures and, more generally, the effective functioning of the CCAA regime (see, e.g., North American Tungsten Corp. v. Global Tungsten and Powders Corp., 2015 BCCA 390, 377 B.C.A.C. 6, at paras. 21-23; Re BA Energy Inc., 2010 ABQB 507, 70 C.B.R. (5th) 24; HSBC Bank Canada v. Bear Mountain Master Partnership, 2010 BCSC 1563, 72 C.B.R. (5th) 276, at para. 11; Caterpillar Financial Services Ltd. v. 360networks Corp., 2007 BCCA 14, 279 D.L.R. (4th) 701, at paras. 51-52, in which the courts seized on a party's failure to act diligently). [para. 51]

[92] In this case, it is clear that the City did not act in accordance with the standard of diligence expected in CCAA proceedings. On this point, Deloitte submits that the City should have given notice of its intention to effect compensation in the days after the initial order was made on August 24, 2018. The record does not show that the City learned of the initial order on August 24, 2018, but, as indicated in an email to counsel for Deloitte, the City was aware of the existence of that order by at least September 10, 2018. Whatever the case may be, we are of the view that a diligent creditor, after learning of the debtor's insolvency when it is subject to proceedings under the CCAA, cannot wait 47 to 58 days to notify the debtor of its intention to effect compensation.

[93] The City justifies the lateness of its application by stating that it was waiting for one of the payments on the VRP claim, which was due on October 31, 2018, before taking any action. Yet the VRP agreement indicates that the payment in question was actually due on October 1, 2018. Furthermore, the City knew or ought to have known that the term had already expired several weeks earlier, as SM Group's insolvency had resulted in the loss of the benefit of the term of the VRP claim.

se trouver sur un pied d'égalité et avoir une compréhension sans équivoque de leurs obligations et droits respectifs (par. 51). En conséquence, dans l'arrêt Callidus, notre Cour a conclu :

> La partie qui, dans le cadre d'une procédure fondée sur la LACC, n'agit pas avec diligence et en temps utile risque de compromettre le processus et, de façon plus générale, de nuire à l'efficacité du régime de la Loi (voir, p. ex., North American Tungsten Corp. c. Global Tungsten and Powders Corp., 2015 BCCA 390, 377 B.C.A.C. 6, par. 21-23; Re BA Energy Inc., 2010 ABQB 507, 70 C.B.R. (5th) 24; HSBC Bank Canada c. Bear Mountain Master Partnership, 2010 BCSC 1563, 72 C.B.R. (5th) 276, par. 11; Caterpillar Financial Services Ltd. c. 360networks Corp., 2007 BCCA 14, 279 D.L.R. (4th) 701, par. 51-52, où les tribunaux se sont penchés sur le manque de diligence d'une partie). [par. 51]

[92] Dans la présente affaire, il appert clairement que la Ville ne s'est pas comportée conformément à la norme de diligence attendue dans le cadre d'une procédure fondée sur la LACC. À ce propos, Deloitte soutient que la Ville aurait dû signifier son intention d'opérer compensation dans les jours qui ont suivi le prononcé de l'ordonnance initiale, le 24 août 2018. Le dossier ne révèle pas que la Ville a pris connaissance de l'ordonnance initiale dès le 24 août 2018, mais, tel qu'indiqué dans un courriel adressé au procureur de Deloitte, elle connaissait l'existence de cette ordonnance depuis le 10 septembre 2018 au moins. Quoi qu'il en soit, nous sommes d'avis qu'un créancier diligent, une fois qu'il a pris connaissance de l'insolvabilité du débiteur alors qu'il est l'objet d'une procédure intentée en vertu de la LACC, ne peut attendre de 47 à 58 jours pour lui signifier son intention d'opérer compensation.

[93] La Ville justifie la tardiveté de sa demande en affirmant qu'elle attendait un des paiements de la créance PRV dû le 31 octobre 2018, avant de prendre quelque action que ce soit. Or, l'entente PRV indique plutôt que ce paiement était dû le 1er octobre 2018. De plus, la Ville savait ou aurait dû savoir que le terme était échu depuis plusieurs semaines déjà, puisque l'insolvabilité de Groupe SM a entraîné la perte du bénéfice du terme de la créance PRV.

[94] Whether intentional or not, this inaction on the City's part tended to place it in a better position than other ordinary creditors at what, we should point out, was a critical time in the restructuring process. By invoking compensation, the City could obtain services without paying for them. The City had to suspect that if it had indicated its intention to proceed in this manner right from the start, as due diligence requires, SM Group would likely have refused to undertake the work provided for in the contract, knowing that it would not be paid and that this would be a major stumbling block in the interim financing process. What is more, under s. 32 of the CCAA, SM Group could even have asked that the contract be resiliated.

[95] In summary, the considerations that guide the exercise of a court's discretion do not justify lifting the stay of the City's right to pre-post compensation. Given our conclusions on the first two considerations, it is not necessary for us to discuss the City's good faith. In our view, remanding the case to the court of original jurisdiction would lead inevitably to the same outcome.

B. Water Meter Contract Claim

[96] Here again, the words of the stay order made by the Superior Court are broad enough to prohibit pre-post compensation. However, the Superior Court agreed to lift the stay of proceedings to allow the City to establish the existence and amount of its claim in the case relating to the water meter contract. The relevant excerpts from its judgment are as follows:

LIFTS, in favour of the Applicant, Ville de Montréal, the stay of proceedings ordered in this case with regard to S.M.

[94] Intentionnelle ou non, cette inaction de la Ville était de nature à la placer dans une position plus avantageuse que celle des autres créanciers ordinaires, et ce, faut-il le souligner, à un moment crucial des procédures de restructuration. En effet, en invoquant compensation, elle pouvait, ce faisant, obtenir des services sans les payer. La Ville devait se douter que si elle avait manifesté son intention de procéder ainsi dès le départ, en toute diligence, Groupe SM aurait vraisemblablement refusé d'entreprendre les travaux prévus au contrat, sachant qu'il ne serait pas payé et qu'il s'agirait là d'un obstacle majeur au processus de financement intérimaire. Qui plus est, suivant l'art. 32 de la LACC, Groupe SM aurait même pu demander la résiliation de ce contrat.

[95] En somme, les considérations guidant l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire du tribunal ne justifient pas de lever la suspension du droit à la compensation pré-post de la Ville. Considérant nos conclusions relatives aux deux premières considérations, il n'est pas nécessaire de nous pencher sur la bonne foi de la Ville. Nous sommes d'avis que le renvoi du dossier en première instance mènerait inéluctablement au même résultat.

B. Créance relative au contrat des compteurs d'eau

LE TRIBUNAL, saisi de la Demande de la Ville de Montréal datée du 27 septembre 2018 pour être autorisée à lever la suspension des procédures afin de traiter et liquider une réclamation en Chambre civile (la « Demande »);

Consultants Inc., The S.M. Group Inc., The SMI Group Inc. and The S.M. Group International L.P. ("Debtors Concerned") . . . for the sole purpose of allowing the Applicant, Ville de Montréal, to establish its claim against the Debtors Concerned . . . in the proceedings instituted in the Superior Court of Quebec bearing number 500-17-104932-184; [Emphasis added.]

(A.R., vol. IV, at p. 129)

[97] This order did not authorize the City to withhold the amounts owed to SM Group for the work subsequent to the initial order with a view to effecting compensation if the City was successful in the case relating to the water meter contract. The City submits that it is entitled to withhold the payments owed to SM Group until judgment is rendered in that case.

[98] In the circumstances, an order allowing the City to withhold the amounts owed to SM Group pending the outcome of the case relating to the water meter contract would not be appropriate. Remanding the case to the court of original jurisdiction for a decision on this question would, once again, be unhelpful and contrary to the interests of justice.

[99] Not only would the order being sought by the City place Thornhill at the mercy of the outcome of lengthy and complex judicial proceedings — which, it must not be forgotten, concern a claim for several million dollars — but it would not be appropriate for the same reasons as those relating to the VRP claim. The City is conflating the public interest with its own interest as a public body with a claim that was never established. In addition, the City did not act diligently. Although its originating application in the case relating to the water meter contract was filed on September 26, 2018, it breached its obligation of diligence by waiting until November 7, 2018 before indicating its intention to effect compensation, even though it had been aware of the initial order since at least September 10, 2018.

à l'égard de Les Consultants S.M. inc., Le Groupe S.M. inc., le Groupe SMI inc. et Le Groupe S.M. International S.E.C. (les « Débitrices visées ») [. . .] afin uniquement de permettre à la Requérante, Ville de Montréal, d'établir sa réclamation contre les Débitrices visées [. . .] dans le cadre des procédures initiées devant la Cour supérieure du Québec portant le numéro 500-17-104932-184; [Nous soulignons.]

(d.a., vol. IV, p. 129)

[97] Cette ordonnance n'a pas autorisé la Ville à retenir les sommes dues à Groupe SM pour les travaux postérieurs à l'ordonnance initiale en vue d'opérer compensation dans l'éventualité où elle aurait gain de cause dans le dossier relatif au contrat des compteurs d'eau. La Ville affirme qu'elle est en droit de retenir les paiements dus à Groupe SM jusqu'à ce qu'un jugement soit rendu dans l'affaire relative au contrat des compteurs d'eau.

[99] En effet, non seulement l'ordonnance recherchée par la Ville placerait Thornhill à la merci du résultat de procédures judiciaires longues et complexes — qui, faut-il le rappeler, concernent une créance de plusieurs millions —, mais elle ne serait pas indiquée pour les mêmes motifs que ceux relatifs à la créance PRV. La Ville confond ici l'intérêt public et son propre intérêt en tant qu'organisme public titulaire d'une créance qui n'a jamais été établie. Ensuite, la Ville n'a pas fait montre de diligence. Même si sa demande introductive d'instance dans le dossier relatif au contrat des compteurs d'eau a été introduite le 26 septembre 2018, la Ville a manqué à son obligation de diligence en attendant au 7 novembre 2018 pour signaler son intention d'opérer compensation, alors qu'elle avait connaissance de l'ordonnance initiale au moins depuis le 10 septembre 2018.

VI. Conclusion

[100] For these reasons, we would dismiss this appeal with costs.

English version of the reasons delivered by

[101] BROWN J. (dissenting) — I agree with the majority that a supervising judge has a discretion under s. 11 of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36 ("CCAA"), as to whether to allow a creditor to effect compensation, or set-off, between pre-initial order and post-initial order debts ("pre-post compensation"). I find, however, that this discretion is not limited solely to the exceptional circumstances the majority describes. While my colleagues in the majority recognize the broad discretion conferred on a supervising judge by the CCAA, in my view they fail to give full effect to it by concluding that pre-post compensation will never be authorized unless there are exceptional circumstances.

[102] Moreover, unlike my colleagues who limit the scope of s. 21 of the CCAA to compensation between debts arising before an initial order is made, I conclude that pre-post compensation is permitted under s. 21 of the CCAA but that it must be subject to the exercise of a supervising judge's discretion. The majority at the Quebec Court of Appeal (2020 QCCA 438), like the supervising judge (2019 QCCS 2316), erred in relying on the Quebec Court of Appeal's decision in Quebec (Agence du revenu) v. Kitco Metals Inc., 2017 QCCA 268, to conclude that pre-post compensation will never be authorized. But, for the reasons set out below, this Court must in my view reject the approach taken in Kitco.

[103] Given that the supervising judge in this case did not exercise her discretion, believing herself to be bound by Kitco, it would be unwise for this Court to exercise that discretion for the first time in order to determine whether Ville de Montréal

VI. Conclusion

[100] Pour ces motifs, nous sommes d'avis de rejeter le présent pourvoi avec dépens.

Les motifs suivants ont été rendus par

[101] LE JUGE BROWN (dissident) — Je partage l'avis de la majorité selon lequel le juge surveillant possède, en vertu de l'art. 11 de la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies, L.R.C. 1985, c. C-36 (« LACC »), le pouvoir discrétionnaire d'autoriser ou non un créancier à opérer compensation entre des dettes pré-ordonnance initiale et post-ordonnance initiale (« compensation pré-post »). Cependant, j'estime que ce pouvoir n'est pas limité aux seules circonstances exceptionnelles décrites par la majorité. En effet, à mon avis, bien qu'ils reconnaissent le large pouvoir discrétionnaire conféré au juge surveillant par la LACC, mes collègues majoritaires échouent à lui donner plein effet en ce qu'ils concluent que la compensation pré-post ne sera jamais autorisée sauf circonstances exceptionnelles.

[102] En outre, contrairement à mes collègues, qui restreignent le champ d'application de l'art. 21 de la LACC à la compensation entre des dettes nées avant la délivrance de l'ordonnance initiale, je conclus que la compensation pré-post est permise en vertu de l'art. 21 de la LACC, mais doit être assujettie à l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire du juge surveillant. Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel du Québec (2020 QCCA 438), ainsi que la juge surveillante (2019 QCCS 2316), s'appuient erronément sur l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel du Québec dans Québec (Agence du revenu) c. Métaux Kitco inc., 2017 QCCA 268, 46 C.B.R. (6th) 173, pour conclure que la compensation pré-post ne sera jamais autorisée. Mais, pour les raisons exprimées ci-dessous, l'approche établie dans l'arrêt Kitco doit à mon avis être rejetée par la Cour.

[103] Étant donné que la juge surveillante n'a pas exercé son pouvoir discrétionnaire dans la présente affaire, se croyant liée par l'arrêt Kitco, il serait mal avisé pour la Cour d'exercer pour la première fois ce pouvoir afin de déterminer si la Ville de Montréal peut

(the "City") may effect compensation here. I would therefore allow the appeal solely for the purpose of remanding the case to the Superior Court so it can decide whether the City may effect compensation between the debts incurred by SM Group before the initial order and the amounts owed by the City to SM Group for work performed by the latter after the initial order. I would also allow the appeal so that it can be determined whether compensation is available in respect of the City's water meter claim against SM Group, as nothing in s. 21 of the CCAA prohibits judicial compensation.

[104] Furthermore, and again unlike my colleagues, I find that there is no need in this appeal to decide whether the City's claim against SM Group, which derives from the Act to ensure mainly the recovery of amounts improperly paid as a result of fraud or fraudulent tactics in connection with public contracts, CQLR, c. R-2.2.0.0.3, must be characterized as a claim based on "false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation" within the meaning of s. 19(2)(d) of the CCAA. In my view, s. 21 of the CCAA must be interpreted as allowing pre-post compensation regardless of whether a claim results from fraud for the purposes of s. 19(2)(d). I nonetheless agree with my colleagues that proof by a creditor that it was a victim of fraud within the meaning of s. 19(2)(d) is a factor favouring pre-post compensation that must be weighed by a supervising judge along with the other relevant considerations.

[105] My colleagues consider it necessary to characterize the City's claim arising from the Voluntary Reimbursement Program ("VRP") because proof that the debt underlying a claim is fraudulent is a relevant factor in the exercise of a supervising judge's discretion to permit or to deny pre-post compensation (para. 20). As they acknowledge, this is a relevant factor in the exercise of a supervising judge's discretion. As I will explain in greater detail below, whether the City's VRP claim results from fraud is a question to be decided by the supervising judge in opérer compensation en l'espèce. Par conséquent, j'accueillerais l'appel à seule fin de retourner le dossier devant la Cour supérieure pour qu'il soit décidé si la Ville peut opérer compensation entre les dettes de Groupe SM antérieures à l'ordonnance initiale et les sommes dues par la Ville à Groupe SM pour des travaux réalisés par ce dernier après l'ordonnance initiale. J'accueillerais également l'appel afin qu'il soit décidé si la réclamation de la Ville à l'encontre de Groupe SM à l'égard des compteurs d'eau donne ouverture à compensation, puisque rien dans l'art. 21 de la LACC n'interdit la compensation judiciaire.

[104] Au surplus, et contrairement à mes collègues, j'estime qu'il n'est pas nécessaire dans le présent pourvoi de trancher la question de savoir si la réclamation de la Ville de Montréal à l'encontre de Groupe SM, laquelle s'appuie sur la Loi visant principalement la récupération de sommes payées injustement à la suite de fraudes ou de manœuvres dolosives dans le cadre de contrats publics, RLRQ, c. R-2.2.0.0.3, doit être qualifiée de réclamation fondée sur des « faux-semblants ou la présentation erronée et frauduleuse des faits » au sens de l'al. 19(2)d) de la LACC. À mon avis, l'art. 21 de la LACC doit être interprété comme permettant d'opérer compensation pré-post, peu importe qu'il s'agisse ou non d'une réclamation qui découle d'une fraude au sens de l'al. 19(2)d). Je conviens néanmoins avec mes collègues que le fait pour un créancier de démontrer qu'il a été victime d'une fraude au sens de l'al. 19(2)d) est un facteur favorable à la compensation pré-post qui doit être soupesé par le juge surveillant avec les autres considérations pertinentes.

[105] Mes collègues estiment qu'il est nécessaire de qualifier la créance de la Ville de Montréal issue du Programme de remboursement volontaire (« PRV »), parce que la démonstration du caractère frauduleux de la dette à l'origine d'une créance constitue un facteur pertinent dans l'exercice par le juge surveillant de son pouvoir discrétionnaire de permettre ou non la compensation pré-post (par. 20). Tel qu'ils le reconnaissent, il s'agit d'un facteur pertinent dans l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire du juge surveillant. Comme je l'explique the exercise of her discretion, not by my colleagues or this Court.

I. Decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal in Kitco

[106] Kitco Metals Inc. specialized in buying scrap gold and extracting fine gold from it for resale. It was subject to special tax rules: it paid the goods and services tax and the Quebec sales tax on the purchase of scrap gold ("inputs"), but the sale of fine gold was not subject to these taxes. Under these special rules, Kitco paid the taxes to its gold suppliers, which were required to remit them to the Agence du revenu du Québec ("Agency"). When the fine gold was sold, Kitco was then entitled to a refund of the taxes paid. The Agency, however, became aware of a fraudulent scheme by which the gold suppliers were not remitting to it the taxes they collected, even though it was refunding Kitco for them.

[107] The Agency, suspecting that Kitco was involved in this fraudulent scheme, sent it a notice of assessment for more than $300 million (the pre-order debt). On June 7, 2011, the Agency proceeded with compulsory execution on that notice to recover the amounts it considered it was owed. The next day, Kitco filed a notice of intention to make a proposal under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"), thereby staying its creditors' remedies (s. 69). One month later, it instead obtained an initial order under the CCAA that continued the stay of remedies (stay still in effect at the time of judgment). Meanwhile, Kitco had been continuing its business activities since June 8, 2011: it was paying taxes on inputs and claiming tax refunds from the Agency in accordance with the applicable tax rules. The Agency owed it more than $1.7 million in refunds (the post-order debt) but applied this amount as compensation against the tax assessments it was claiming from Kitco. Kitco successfully brought a plus amplement ci-après, la question de savoir si la créance PRV de la Ville de Montréal résulte d'une fraude est une question à laquelle il appartient à la juge surveillante de répondre dans le cadre de l'exercice de son pouvoir discrétionnaire, et non à mes collègues ou à la Cour.

I. L'arrêt Kitco de la Cour d'appel du Québec

[106] Métaux Kitco inc. est une entreprise qui se spécialise dans l'achat de ferraille d'or, dont elle extrait l'or fin afin de pouvoir le revendre. En vertu des règles fiscales, elle est soumise à un régime spécial, c'est-à-dire qu'elle paie la taxe sur les produits et services et la taxe de vente du Québec à l'achat de ferraille d'or (« intrants »), mais la vente d'or fin n'est pas assujettie à ces taxes. Conformément à ce régime spécial, Kitco paie les taxes à ses fournisseurs d'or, lesquels doivent remettre ces taxes à l'Agence du revenu du Québec. Par la suite, lors de la vente d'or fin, Kitco a droit à un remboursement des taxes payées. Cependant, l'Agence constate l'existence d'un stratagème frauduleux suivant lequel les fournisseurs d'or ne lui versent pas les taxes perçues, alors qu'elle rembourse Kitco pour celles-ci.

[107] L'Agence suspecte Kitco d'être impliquée dans ce stratagème frauduleux et lui envoie un avis de cotisation de plus de 300 millions de dollars (soit la dette pré-ordonnance). Le 7 juin 2011, elle entreprend l'exécution forcée de cet avis pour récupérer les sommes qu'elle estime dues. Dès le lendemain, Kitco dépose un avis d'intention de faire une proposition sous le régime de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, L.R.C. 1985, c. B-3 (« LFI »), suspendant les recours de ses créanciers (art. 69). Un mois plus tard, elle obtient plutôt, en vertu de la LACC, une ordonnance initiale qui continue la suspension des recours (suspension toujours en vigueur au moment de l'arrêt). Parallèlement, Kitco continue ses activités commerciales depuis le 8 juin 2011 : elle paie des taxes sur les intrants et en réclame le remboursement à l'Agence, conformément au régime fiscal en place. L'Agence lui doit plus de 1,7 million de dollars en remboursement (soit la dette post-ordonnance), mais impute par compensation cette somme sur les motion in the Superior Court to force the Agency to refund it $1.7 million on the basis that this compensation was unlawful.

[108] Vézina J.A., writing for the Court of Appeal in Kitco, began by explaining that June 8, 2011 was the date of commencement of insolvency proceedings and therefore the date on which the creditors' remedies were stayed and their claims had to be established (para. 34 (CanLII)). He also took the view that the compensation effected by the Agency was unlawful. In his opinion, although s. 21 of the CCAA does not expressly state that compensation can be effected only in respect of debts that arose prior to insolvency proceedings, a literal interpretation of the section must be rejected because it would be incompatible with, among other things, the principle that ordinary creditors must be treated equally (para. 20). Such an interpretation would also undermine the status quo period that companies in financial difficulty need in order to develop a plan of arrangement (para. 43). Vézina J.A. therefore concluded that a literal interpretation would ultimately be contrary to the CCAA's restructuring objective (para. 45).

[109] This conclusion was based in large part on Vézina J.A.'s observation that the schemes of the BIA and the CCAA have [TRANSLATION] "close links" and are two "integrated" schemes, which means that "case law and scholarly opinion can be applied to both equally" (paras. 51-52). Relying on para. 56 of D.I.M.S. Construction inc. (Trustee of) v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 52, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 564, he considered that "[t]he general principles of the BIA preclude any transaction that would have the effect of granting a security that did not exist before the bankruptcy" (Kitco, at para. 61). On this point, he found that the principles laid down in Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, [1995] 3 S.C.R. 453, in which the Court stated that set-off is like a form of security, cannot readily be transposed into the civil law, in which compensation is automatic and is effected by operation of law once two debts coexist and are certain, liquid and exigible (para. 65). Lastly, he was of the view that s. 21 of the cotisations fiscales qu'elle réclame à Kitco. Cette dernière présente avec succès une requête devant la Cour supérieure pour forcer l'Agence à lui rembourser 1,7 million de dollars au motif qu'il s'agit d'une compensation illégale.

[108] Dans l'arrêt Kitco, le juge Vézina, qui rédige les motifs de la Cour d'appel, explique d'abord que le 8 juin 2011 constitue la date d'ouverture de la procédure en insolvabilité, et donc la date à laquelle les recours des créanciers sont suspendus et leurs réclamations doivent être établies (par. 34). Il se dit aussi d'avis que la compensation opérée par l'Agence est illégale. Selon lui, bien que l'art. 21 de la LACC ne dise pas expressément que seules les dettes nées avant les procédures en insolvabilité sont susceptibles de compensation, il faut rejeter l'interprétation littérale de cet article, puisqu'elle serait contraire notamment au principe voulant qu'il faille traiter les créanciers ordinaires sur un pied d'égalité (par. 20). Elle fait également échec à la période de statu quo, laquelle est nécessaire aux entreprises en difficultés financières pour leur permettre d'élaborer un plan d'arrangement (par. 43). Il conclut donc qu'une interprétation littérale serait au final contraire à l'objectif de restructuration de la LACC (par. 45).

[109] Cette conclusion s'appuie en grande partie sur le constat du juge Vézina que les régimes de la LFI et de la LACC entretiennent des « liens étroits » et constituent « deux régimes intégrés », de telle sorte que « les enseignements de la jurisprudence et les avis des auteurs sont transposables de l'[un] à l'autre » (par. 51-52). Il s'appuie sur le par. 56 de l'arrêt D.I.M.S. Construction inc. (Syndic de) c. Québec (Procureur général), 2005 CSC 52, [2005] 2 R.C.S. 564, et en retient que « [l]es principes généraux de la LFI s'opposent à toute opération qui aurait pour effet d'accorder une garantie qui n'existait pas avant la faillite » (Kitco, par. 61). À cet égard, il estime que les enseignements de l'arrêt Husky Oil Operations Ltd. c. Ministre du Revenu national, [1995] 3 R.C.S. 453, qui a précisé que la compensation s'apparentait à une forme de garantie, sont difficilement transposables en droit civil où la compensation est automatique et s'opère de plein droit dès que deux dettes coexistent et sont

CCAA and s. 97(3) of the BIA identify the point in time when compensation may be effected, that is, on the date on which the creditors' "provable claims" must be established, which is the date of commencement of insolvency proceedings:

[TRANSLATION] In my opinion, sections 21 CCAA and 97(3) BIA, which provide that the "law of set-off or compensation applies to all claims. . .", thereby identify the point in time when compensation is effected, or in other words, the moment at which the claims must be established: it is on the date of [commencement of proceedings] that temporal reciprocity is established. [para. 82]

[110] Vézina J.A. found, at para. 78, that the question of what constitutes a "provable claim" is answered by s. 121(1) of the BIA, which refers to "[a]ll debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt".

[111] With respect, I am of the view that several errors were made in Kitco. First, Vézina J.A. erred in relying on this Court's judgment in D.I.M.S. Construction to reach the conclusion that pre-post compensation can never be allowed under the CCAA, even though that judgment was rendered in the context of a bankruptcy under the BIA. Despite the similarities between the insolvency schemes established by the CCAA and the BIA, these are two different statutes, and their differences are significant in the case at bar. Secondly, Kitco was based on an inappropriate narrow interpretation of s. 21 of the CCAA that disregarded the "flexible" nature the CCAA is recognized as having (Century Services Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 SCC 60, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 379, at para. 14; R. J. Wood, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law (2nd ed. 2015), at p. 337) as well as the broad discretion conferred on supervising judges, whereas courts of other Canadian provinces have held that pre-post set-off can be permitted. Thirdly, Kitco was decided in a context where a company in financial difficulty was actually restructured, and it certaines, liquides et exigibles (par. 65). Finalement, il considère que l'art. 21 de la LACC et le par. 97(3) de la LFI précisent à quel moment peut s'opérer la compensation, soit à la date où doivent être établies les « réclamations prouvables » des créanciers, c'est-à-dire le jour de l'ouverture des procédures d'insolvabilité :

À mon avis, les articles 21 L.a.c.c. et 97 (3) L.f.i. qui édictent que « les règles de la compensation s'appliquent à toutes les réclamations. . . », précisent par là le moment où la compensation s'opère, soit au moment où doivent être établies les réclamations; c'est au jour d'Ouverture que s'établit la réciprocité temporelle. [par. 82]

[110] Le juge Vézina estime, au par. 78, que la réponse à la question de savoir en quoi consiste une « réclamation prouvable » se trouve au par. 121(1) de la LFI, c'est-à-dire « [t]outes créances et tous engagements, présents ou futurs, auxquels le failli est assujetti à la date à laquelle il devient failli, ou auxquels il peut devenir assujetti avant sa libération, en raison d'une obligation contractée antérieurement à cette date ».

[111] Avec égards, je suis d'avis que plusieurs erreurs ont été commises dans l'arrêt Kitco. Premièrement, le juge Vézina s'est erronément appuyé sur l'arrêt de la Cour dans D.I.M.S. Construction pour arriver à la conclusion que la compensation pré-post ne pouvait jamais être autorisée en vertu de la LACC, alors que cet arrêt a été rendu dans un contexte de faillite sous le régime de la LFI. Malgré les similitudes entre les régimes d'insolvabilité établis par la LACC et la LFI, ces deux lois sont distinctes — et de manière significative en l'espèce. Deuxièmement, l'arrêt Kitco repose sur une interprétation restrictive et inappropriée de l'art. 21 de la LACC, qui fait fi du caractère « souple » (Century Services Inc. c. Canada (Procureur général), 2010 CSC 60, [2010] 3 R.C.S. 379, par. 14) et [TRADUCTION] « flexible » (R. J. Wood, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law (2e éd. 2015), p. 337) reconnu à la LACC ainsi que du vaste pouvoir discrétionnaire dont le juge surveillant est investi, alors que les tribunaux d'autres provinces canadiennes ont jugé que la compensation pré-post pouvait être permise. Troisièmement, l'arrêt Kitco a cannot readily be transposed into a context such as the one in the instant case, which instead involves the liquidation of a company's assets and contracts.

A. Fundamental Differences Between the Two Insolvency Schemes

[112] It is important to underscore the fundamental differences between the scheme established by the CCAA and the one established by the BIA, differences that highlight that, under the CCAA scheme, the mutuality of debts is maintained and supervising judges have a broad discretion that allows them to authorize pre-post compensation. I do not question the notion that these two schemes must be viewed as "an integrated body of insolvency law" and that legislative efforts to harmonize them have been going on for several decades (Century Services, at paras. 19-24 and 78). As I recount below, however, there remain many differences between the two schemes (Wood, at p. 337).

[113] The three principal Canadian statutes dealing with insolvency, the CCAA, the BIA and the Winding-up and Restructuring Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. W-11 ("WURA"), have the following main objectives: ". . . to treat the claims of creditors fairly and equitably, to protect the public interest, to create a fair, timely and cost-effective process, and to achieve a balance of benefit and cost in deciding whether to restructure or liquidate a business, maximizing enterprise value" (J. P. Sarra, "The Oscillating Pendulum: Canada's Sesquicentennial and Finding the Equilibrium for Insolvency Law", in J. P. Sarra and B. Romaine, eds., Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2016 (2017), 9, at pp. 9-10, objectives referred to with approval by the Court in 9354-9186 Québec inc. v. Callidus Capital Corp., 2020 SCC 10, [2020] 1 S.C.R. 522, at para. 40). More specifically, the CCAA's main objective is the financial and commercial rehabilitation of an insolvent company through the filing of a plan of arrangement with its creditors (Wood, at p. 338; B. Boucher, "Procédures en vertu de la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies", in JurisClasseur Québec — Collection été rendu dans un contexte de restructuration réelle d'une entreprise en difficultés financières, et il est difficilement transposable dans un contexte comme celui qui nous occupe, où il s'agit plutôt d'une liquidation des actifs et des contrats d'une entreprise.

A. Les distinctions fondamentales entre les deux régimes d'insolvabilité

[112] Il importe de souligner les différences fondamentales entre le régime établi par la LACC et celui établi par la LFI, lesquelles font ressortir, sous le régime de la LACC, le maintien de la réciprocité des dettes ainsi que le vaste pouvoir discrétionnaire permettant au juge surveillant d'autoriser la compensation pré-post. Je ne remets pas en doute l'idée que ces deux régimes doivent être perçus comme « un ensemble intégré de règles du droit de l'insolvabilité » et que des efforts législatifs visant à harmoniser les deux régimes ont été déployés depuis plusieurs décennies (Century Services, par. 19-24 et 78). Toutefois, comme nous le verrons ci-dessous, de nombreuses différences persistent entre ces deux régimes (Wood, p. 337).

[113] Les trois principales lois canadiennes en matière d'insolvabilité, c'est-à-dire la LACC, la LFI et la Loi sur les liquidations et les restructurations, L.R.C. 1985, c. W-11 (« LLR »), ont comme objectifs fondamentaux : [TRADUCTION] « . . . le traitement juste et équitable des réclamations des créanciers, la protection de l'intérêt public, la création d'un processus juste, opportun et efficient, et, lors de la prise de la décision de restructurer ou de liquider une entreprise, l'établissement d'un équilibre coûts-avantages maximisant la valeur de celle-ci » (J. P. Sarra, « The Oscillating Pendulum : Canada's Sesquicentennial and Finding the Equilibrium for Insolvency Law », dans J. P. Sarra et B. Romaine, dir., Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2016 (2017), 9, p. 9-10, objectifs mentionnés avec approbation par la Cour dans 9354-9186 Québec inc. c. Callidus Capital Corp., 2020 CSC 10, [2020] 1 R.C.S. 522, par. 40). La LACC a plus particulièrement comme objectif principal de permettre à une entreprise insolvable de se rétablir financièrement et commercialement par le dépôt d'un plan d'arrangement auprès de ses créanciers (Wood, p. 338; B. Boucher, « Procédures en vertu Droit des affaires — Faillite, insolvabilité et restructuration (loose-leaf), by S. Rousseau, ed., fasc. 14, at Nos. 2 and 8). In seeking an initial order, an insolvent company shields itself from its creditors, staying their remedies for a certain period so that all its energy can be channeled into preparing a plan of arrangement for a viable recovery (Boucher, at No. 2).

[114] For these reasons, the scheme established by the CCAA is flexible and allows creative solutions to be put forward to achieve the objective mentioned above, the restructuring of a financially distressed company, in contrast to the BIA, which provides a set of pre-established rules (Boucher, at No. 8; Wood, at p. 337). The CCAA is therefore characterized as "remedial" legislation (J. P. Sarra, Rescue! The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (2nd ed. 2013), at p. 500; Boucher, at No. 3).

[115] The Court has found that the CCAA's provisions must be interpreted expansively to enable its remedial objectives to be achieved, and in particular to allow a company to continue its activities and to avoid the social and economic losses that can result from its liquidation (Century Services, at para. 70). Because of the remedial scope of the CCAA, a "broad" discretion is also conferred on supervising judges by s. 11 of the CCAA (Callidus, at para. 48; Century Services, at para. 14). This section provides that a supervising judge may make "any order that [the judge] considers appropriate", although it specifies that such an order must be consistent with the restrictions set out in the CCAA and must be "appropriate" in light of the circumstances of each case. As this Court noted in Callidus, s. 11 is in a sense the "engine" of the CCAA (para. 48, quoting Stelco Inc. (Re) (2005), 253 D.L.R. (4th) 109 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 36). This discretion granted to supervising judges under the CCAA allows for the implementation of "creative and effective" solutions (Century Services, at para. 21, quoting Industry Canada, Marketplace Framework Policy Branch, Report on the Operation and Administration of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and the Companies' Creditors de la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies », dans JurisClasseur Québec — Collection Droit des affaires — Faillite, insolvabilité et restructuration (feuilles mobiles), par S. Rousseau, dir., fasc. 14, nº 2 et 8). En demandant une ordonnance initiale, l'entreprise insolvable se met à l'abri de ses créanciers, suspendant ainsi leurs recours pendant une certaine période, afin de pouvoir concentrer toutes ses énergies sur la confection d'un plan d'arrangement permettant une relance viable (Boucher, nº 2).

[114] Pour ces raisons, le régime établi par la LACC est flexible et permet de mettre de l'avant des solutions créatives afin d'atteindre l'objectif énoncé précédemment, soit la restructuration d'une entreprise en difficultés financières, par opposition à la LFI, qui prévoit un ensemble de règles préétablies (Boucher, nº 8; Wood, p. 337). En tant que telle, la LACC est une loi qualifiée de « réparatrice » (Boucher, nº 3; J. P. Sarra, Rescue! The Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act (2e éd. 2013), p. 500).

[115] La Cour a reconnu que les dispositions de la LACC doivent être interprétées largement afin de permettre la réalisation de ses objectifs réparateurs, notamment permettre la survie des activités de l'entreprise et éviter les pertes sociales et économiques pouvant résulter de la liquidation de cette dernière (Century Services, par. 70). En raison de la portée réparatrice de la LACC, un « vaste » pouvoir discrétionnaire est également conféré au juge surveillant par l'art. 11 de la LACC (Callidus, par. 48; Century Services, par. 14). Cet article prévoit qu'un juge surveillant peut rendre « toute ordonnance qu'il estime indiquée », mais précise toutefois qu'une telle ordonnance ne peut être contraire aux restrictions prévues par la LACC et qu'elle doit être « indiquée » au regard des circonstances de chaque affaire. La Cour a indiqué dans l'arrêt Callidus que l'art. 11 est en quelque sorte le « moteur » de la LACC (par. 48, citant Stelco Inc. (Re) (2005), 253 D.L.R. (4th) 109 (C.A. Ont.), par. 36). Ce pouvoir discrétionnaire conféré au juge surveillant en vertu de la LACC permet la mise en place de solutions « créatives et efficaces » (Century Services, par. 21, citant Industrie Canada, Direction générale des politiques-cadres du marché, Rapport sur la mise en application de la Arrangement Act (2002), at p. 41), in recognition of the "positional advantage" gained by supervising judges, who "acquir[e] extensive knowledge and insight into the stakeholder dynamics and the business realities of [CCAA] proceedings" (Callidus, at paras. 47-48). Examples of "creative" solutions adopted by courts under the CCAA include "security for debtor in possession financing or super-priority charges on the debtor's assets" and the release of "claims against third parties as part of approving a comprehensive plan of arrangement and compromise, even over the objections of some dissenting creditors" (Century Services, at para. 62).

Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité et de la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies (2002), p. 50), en reconnaissance de la « position avantageuse » du juge surveillant, lequel « acquiert une connaissance approfondie de la dynamique entre les intéressés et des réalités commerciales entourant la procédure [fondée sur la LACC] » (Callidus, par. 47-48). À titre de solutions « créatives » retenues par les tribunaux sous le régime de la LACC, mentionnons la « constitution de sûretés pour financer le débiteur demeuré en possession des biens ou encore la constitution de charges super-prioritaires grevant l'actif du débiteur », ainsi que la libération de « tiers des actions susceptibles d'être intentées contre eux, dans le cadre de l'approbation d'un plan global d'arrangement et de transaction, malgré les objections de certains créanciers dissidents » (Century Services, par. 62).

[116] As the Court again recently recognized, the broad discretion conferred on supervising judges by s. 11 of the CCAA enables them to propose solutions "that respond to the circumstances of each case and 'meet contemporary business and social needs'" (Callidus, at para. 48, quoting Century Services, at para. 58). This broad discretion is unique to the CCAA and has no equivalent in the BIA, which is based instead on pre-established rules designed to apply to a range of situations. This is, therefore, one major difference between the two insolvency schemes.

[116] Comme l'a reconnu la Cour encore récemment, le vaste pouvoir discrétionnaire conféré au juge surveillant par l'art. 11 de la LACC permet à ce dernier de mettre de l'avant des solutions « susceptibles de répondre aux circonstances de chaque cas et de "[s'adapter] aux besoins commerciaux et sociaux contemporains" » (Callidus, par. 48, citant Century Services, par. 58). Ce vaste pouvoir discrétionnaire du juge surveillant est unique à la LACC et n'a pas d'équivalent dans la LFI, laquelle est plutôt fondée sur des règles préétablies visant à régir une gamme de situations. Il s'agit donc là d'une distinction majeure entre les deux régimes d'insolvabilité.

[117] Another major difference between these two schemes is that the CCAA allows a company that has obtained an initial order to continue its business activities during the restructuring or reorganization period (Callidus, at para. 41). The continuation of a struggling company's business activities averts "the social and economic losses resulting from liquidation of an insolvent company" (Century Services, at para. 70) and "preserves going-concern value" (Callidus, at para. 46). Accordingly, when an insolvent company has recourse to the CCAA, it is not divested of its property in favour of a third party, unlike with the measures put in place under the BIA that vest the bankrupt's property in a trustee (s. 71 of the BIA). There is thus no loss of mutuality under the CCAA. The status of debtor or creditor of the insolvent company remains unchanged and is not bestowed on a third party.

[117] Une autre différence majeure entre ces deux régimes est le fait que la LACC permet à une entreprise, après qu'elle a obtenu une ordonnance initiale, de poursuivre ses activités commerciales pendant la période de restructuration ou de réorganisation (Callidus, par. 41). La poursuite des activités commerciales de l'entreprise en difficulté évite « les pertes sociales et économiques résultant de la liquidation d'une compagnie insolvable » (Century Services, par. 70) et permet de « protéger sa valeur d'exploitation » (Callidus, par. 46). Ainsi, lorsque l'entreprise insolvable a recours à la LACC, elle n'est pas dessaisie de ses biens au profit d'un tiers, contrairement aux mesures mises en place en vertu de la LFI, suivant lesquelles le syndic obtient la

[118] This mutuality, which survives the initial order, is what makes compensation possible under the CCAA, unlike under the BIA. This same fundamental difference between the CCAA scheme and the BIA scheme also played a crucial role in D.I.M.S. Construction, on which Vézina J.A. largely relied in Kitco. In D.I.M.S. Construction, this Court had to determine whether the schemes established in two Quebec labour law statutes subverted the scheme of distribution provided for by the BIA. Those two statutes created a similar mechanism that required an employer subject to one of them to pay an assessment due from a contractor whose services it had retained. Once the employer had paid the assessment, it was entitled to retain the amount it had paid out of any sums it owed to the contractor, thereby effecting compensation (para. 2). In that case, three employers had been directed to pay the assessments of a contractor, D.I.M.S. Construction inc., before it went bankrupt on April 1, 1999, but only one of them had done so before that date (paras. 3-4). D.I.M.S. Construction's trustee in bankruptcy, relying on the Court's judgment in Husky Oil, asked the Court to declare that two sections of the statutes in question were inoperable in the context of a bankruptcy under the BIA (para. 5).

[119] In her analysis, Deschamps J. began by discussing s. 97(3) of the BIA, which concerns compensation, and made two relevant observations. First, because s. 97(3) applies to claims against a bankrupt's estate, a creditor must meet the conditions set out in s. 121(1) of the BIA, which means that, in order to effect compensation, the creditor must "prove the bankrupt was subject to a debt by reason of an obligation incurred before the bankruptcy" (para. 40 (emphasis added)). Second, s. 97(3) states that compensation is effected in the same manner as if the saisine des biens du failli (art. 71 de la LFI). Il n'y a donc pas de perte de réciprocité sous le régime de la LACC. La qualité de débitrice ou de créancière de l'entreprise insolvable demeure inchangée et n'est pas octroyée à un tiers.

[118] Cette réciprocité, qui subsiste au-delà de l'ordonnance initiale, est ce qui rend possible la compensation en vertu de la LACC, par opposition à la LFI. En outre, cette même distinction fondamentale entre le régime de la LACC et celui de la LFI a joué un rôle crucial dans l'arrêt D.I.M.S. Construction, sur lequel s'est en grande partie appuyé le juge Vézina dans l'arrêt Kitco. En effet, dans l'arrêt D.I.M.S. Construction, la Cour devait décider si les régimes législatifs établis dans deux lois québécoises en matière de droit du travail portaient atteinte au plan de répartition prévu par la LFI. Ces deux lois établissaient un mécanisme similaire par lequel un employeur assujetti à l'une de ces lois devait payer la cotisation due par un entrepreneur dont il retenait les services. Une fois la cotisation payée par l'employeur, ce dernier avait le droit de retenir sur les sommes qu'il devait à l'entrepreneur le montant de la cotisation qu'il avait déboursé, et donc d'opérer compensation (par. 2). Dans cette affaire, trois employeurs avaient été sommés de payer les cotisations de l'entrepreneur D.I.M.S. Construction inc. avant sa faillite le 1er avril 1999, mais un seul d'entre eux avait payé la cotisation avant cette date (par. 3-4). Le syndic à la faillite de D.I.M.S. Construction demandait à la Cour de déclarer inopérants deux articles de ces lois dans le cadre d'une faillite sous le régime de la LFI en invoquant l'arrêt de la Cour dans Husky Oil (par. 5).

[119] Dans son analyse, la juge Deschamps s'attarde d'abord au par. 97(3) de la LFI portant sur la compensation et fait deux constats utiles. Premièrement, comme le par. 97(3) s'applique aux réclamations visant l'actif du failli, le créancier doit remplir les conditions prévues au par. 121(1) de la LFI, c'est-à-dire que, pour qu'il puisse opérer compensation, il doit « prouver une créance à laquelle le failli était assujetti en raison d'une obligation contractée antérieurement à la faillite » (par. 40 (je souligne)). Deuxièmement, le par. 97(3) précise que bankrupt were a plaintiff or a defendant in a lawsuit and, exceptionally, makes it possible to proceed "as if the bankrupt's patrimony had not vested in the trustee as a result of the bankruptcy" (para. 41).

[120] Deschamps J. concluded that there are three possible scenarios in Quebec civil law, depending on when an employer pays an assessment due from a contractor: (1) the payment is made by the employer before the bankruptcy, and the debts become certain, liquid and exigible before the bankruptcy; (2) the payment is made before the bankruptcy and the employer is in debt to the bankrupt contractor, but one of the conditions for legal compensation is not met; and (3) the payment is made after the bankruptcy (para. 42). Regarding the third scenario — one that also brings into play art. 1651 of the Civil Code of Québec, which provides that a person subrogated to the rights of another (the employer in that case) does not have more rights than the subrogating creditor — Deschamps J. concluded that when the employer pays after the contractor's bankruptcy, "[t]he dual status of creditor and debtor", and therefore the mutuality of the debts, does not arise until after the bankruptcy (para. 51). It must therefore be inferred that s. 97(3) of the BIA, read in conjunction with ss. 121, 136(3) and 141 of the BIA, requires that "the mutual debts come into existence before the bankruptcy" in order for compensation to be effected (para. 55 (emphasis added)). Deschamps J. added at para. 56 that, according to the rules specific to the bankruptcy scheme under the BIA, the trustee may object to the substitution of a creditor (the employer in that case) if this has the effect of giving the creditor a security that did not exist at the time of the bankruptcy:

> What distinguishes a pre-bankruptcy payment from a post-bankruptcy payment is that, in the former case, the substitution of creditors takes place before the moment when the trustee acquires the bankrupt's property. In the case of a post-bankruptcy payment, the substitution occurs after the bankruptcy, and the trustee can object to it. The general principles of the BIA preclude any transaction that would have the effect of granting a security that did not exist before the bankruptcy. [Emphasis added.]

la compensation s'opère de la même manière que si le failli était demandeur ou défendeur d'une action en justice, et elle permet exceptionnellement de faire « comme si le patrimoine du failli n'avait pas, par la faillite, été dévolu au syndic » (par. 41).

[120] La juge Deschamps conclut que trois scénarios sont possibles en droit civil québécois en fonction du moment où l'employeur paie la cotisation due par l'entrepreneur : (1) le paiement est fait par l'employeur avant la faillite et les dettes sont devenues certaines, liquides et exigibles avant la faillite, (2) le paiement est fait avant la faillite, l'employeur est endetté envers l'entrepreneur failli, mais l'une des conditions de la compensation légale n'est pas satisfaite et (3) le paiement est fait après la faillite (par. 42). Relativement au troisième scénario, lequel fait également interagir l'art. 1651 du Code civil du Québec, qui prévoit qu'une personne subrogée dans les droits d'une autre (ici, l'employeur) n'a pas plus de droits que le subrogeant, la juge Deschamps conclut que lorsque l'employeur paie après la faillite de l'entrepreneur, « [l]a double qualité de créancier et de débiteur » et donc la réciprocité des dettes ne survient qu'après la faillite (par. 51). Par conséquent, il faut en déduire que, lorsque lu en conjonction avec les art. 121, 136(3) et 141 de la LFI, le par. 97(3) de la LFI prévoit que « les créances mutuelles doivent avoir pris naissance avant la faillite » pour qu'il y ait compensation (par. 55 (je souligne)). La juge Deschamps ajoute, au par. 56, qu'en vertu des règles propres au régime de la faillite sous la LFI, le syndic peut s'opposer à la substitution du créancier (ici, l'employeur), si cela a pour effet de conférer à ce dernier une garantie qui n'existait pas au moment de la faillite :

> Ce qui distingue le paiement avant la faillite du paiement après la faillite est le fait que, dans le premier cas, la substitution de créancier a lieu avant le moment où le syndic acquiert les biens du failli. Lorsque le paiement est fait après la faillite, la substitution est postérieure à la faillite et le syndic est en mesure de s'y opposer. Les principes généraux de la LFI s'opposent à toute opération qui aurait pour effet d'accorder une garantie qui n'existait pas avant la faillite. [Je souligne.]

[121] The argument is a simple one. For legal compensation to be effected, in addition to the fact that a claim must be shown to be certain, liquid and exigible, [TRANSLATION] "two persons must be reciprocally debtor and creditor of each other" (Code civil du Québec: Annotations — Commentaires 2020-2021 (5th ed. 2020), by B. Moore, ed., et al., at p. 1558). This is one of the four essential conditions for compensation to be possible. This mutuality of claims is severed when an insolvent company becomes bankrupt, because a trustee in bankruptcy is appointed and the company's property is vested in the trustee (s. 71 of the BIA). On the date of the initial bankruptcy event, the bankrupt company loses its status as creditor or debtor in favour of the trustee. As well, the bankrupt company ceases its business activities and normally does not incur any obligations after the bankruptcy. This is why claims provable under the BIA must be established on the date of the initial bankruptcy event and why, logically, compensation cannot be effected between pre- and post-bankruptcy debts (ss. 97(3) and 121(1)). However, as the intervener Union des municipalités du Québec rightly noted at the hearing, the situation is very different when an insolvent company applies for an initial order under the CCAA, since the company continues its business activities while at the same time seeking a stay of its creditors' remedies (transcript, at pp. 48-49). Under the CCAA, the property of the company applying for an initial order is not vested in a monitor. The mutuality of debts remains intact, as the company continues to be the debtor or creditor of a claim (see, on this point, L. Morin and G.-P. Michaud, "Set-Off and Compensation in Insolvency Restructuring under the BIA/CCAA: After the Kitco and Beyond the Rack Decisions", in Sarra and Romaine, Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2016, 311, at pp. 343-44; see also A. R. Anderson, T. Gelbman and B. Pullen, "Recent Developments in the Law of Set-off", in J. P. Sarra, ed., Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2009 (2010), 1, at pp. 23-25 (these authors acknowledge that an insolvent company's property is not vested in a monitor under the CCAA and that the mutuality of debts is not severed, but they advocate having the courts interpret the CCAA in such a way as to put an end to this mutuality)).

[121] L'argument est simple. Pour qu'il y ait compensation légale, en sus du fait que le caractère certain, liquide et exigible de la créance doit être démontré, « deux personnes doivent être réciproquement débitrices et créancières l'une de l'autre » (Code civil du Québec : Annotations — Commentaires 2020-2021 (5e éd. 2020), par B. Moore, dir., et autres, p. 1558). Il s'agit là d'une des quatre conditions essentielles pour qu'il soit possible d'opérer compensation. Cette réciprocité des créances cesse d'exister lorsqu'une entreprise insolvable devient faillie, puisqu'un syndic à la faillite est nommé et obtient la saisine de ses biens (art. 71 de la LFI). La qualité de créancière ou de débitrice de l'entreprise qui devient faillie s'éteint au profit du syndic le jour de l'ouverture de la faillite. De plus, l'entreprise faillie cesse ses opérations commerciales et n'encourt normalement pas d'obligations post-faillite. C'est pourquoi les réclamations prouvables visées par la LFI doivent être établies le jour de l'ouverture de la faillite, et il ne peut logiquement y avoir compensation entre des dettes pré et post-faillite (par. 97(3) et 121(1)). Or, comme l'a fait remarquer avec justesse l'intervenante l'Union des municipalités du Québec à l'audience, la situation est tout autre lorsqu'une entreprise insolvable demande la délivrance d'une ordonnance initiale en vertu de la LACC, puisqu'elle continue ses activités commerciales, tout en demandant la suspension des recours de ses créanciers (transcription, p. 48-49). Sous le régime de la LACC, le contrôleur n'obtient pas la saisine des biens de l'entreprise ayant demandé une ordonnance initiale. La réciprocité des dettes subsiste, l'entreprise demeurant débitrice ou créancière d'une réclamation (voir à ce sujet L. Morin et G.-P. Michaud, « Set-Off and Compensation in Insolvency Restructuring under the BIA/CCAA : After the Kitco and Beyond the Rack Decisions », dans Sarra et Romaine, Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2016, 311, p. 343-344; voir aussi A. R. Anderson, T. Gelbman et B. Pullen, « Recent Developments in the Law of Set-off », dans J. P. Sarra, dir., Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2009 (2010), 1, p. 23-25 (ces auteurs reconnaissent que la saisine des biens de l'entreprise insolvable n'est pas dévolue au contrôleur dans le cadre de la LACC, et que la réciprocité des dettes n'est pas éteinte, mais prêchent pour que la LACC soit interprétée par les tribunaux de manière à mettre fin à cette réciprocité)).

[122] These two fundamental differences between the CCAA scheme and the BIA scheme suffice to explain why this Court should reject the approach proposed in Kitco. As we will see below, courts of other Canadian provinces have relied in part on these differences between the two schemes to find that s. 21 of the CCAA, unlike the equivalent provisions in the BIA (s. 97(3)) and the WURA (s. 73(1)), does not prohibit pre-post set-off.

B. Courts of Other Canadian Provinces Have Recognized the Possibility of Effecting Pre-post Set-off

[123] For two reasons, the right to effect set-off under the CCAA has been a subject of debate among Canadian courts. First, before the legislative reform of 1997 (An Act to amend the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act and the Income Tax Act, S.C. 1997, c. 12) and the addition of s. 21 (formerly s. 18.1), this right was not formally recognized in the CCAA. Secondly, questions relating to the framework for the right to effect set-off have arisen in recent decades, particularly with regard to the possibility of staying this right temporarily after an initial order has been made (CCAA, s. 11.02(1); see Quintette Coal Ltd. v. Nippon Steel Corp. (1990), 51 B.C.L.R. (2d) 105 (C.A.); Cam-Net Communications v. Vancouver Telephone Co., 1999 BCCA 751, 71 B.C.L.R. (3d) 226; North American Tungsten Corp., Re, 2015 BCCA 390, 377 B.C.A.C. 6 ("Tungsten No. 1") (decision on application for leave to appeal), aff'd 2015 BCCA 426, 378 B.C.A.C. 116 ("Tungsten No. 2"); Re Just Energy Corp., 2021 ONSC 1793); or of directly restricting the right in the language of an initial order under the CCAA (Crystallex International Corp., Re, 2012 ONSC 6812, 100 C.B.R. (5th) 132).

[124] More specifically, the question now before this Court is whether s. 21 of the CCAA allows pre-post compensation. This question is all the more relevant in the context of a restructuring process under

B. Les tribunaux d'autres provinces canadiennes ont reconnu la possibilité d'opérer compensation pré-post

[123] Le droit d'opérer compensation en vertu de la LACC a fait l'objet de débats dans la jurisprudence canadienne, et ce, pour deux raisons. D'abord, avant la réforme législative de 1997 (Loi modifiant la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, la Loi sur les arrangements avec les créanciers des compagnies et la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu, L.C. 1997, c. 12) et l'ajout de l'art. 21 (autrefois l'art. 18.1), le droit d'opérer compensation n'était pas formellement reconnu dans la LACC. Ensuite, des questions portant sur l'encadrement du droit d'opérer compensation se sont soulevées dans les dernières décennies, notamment en ce qui a trait à la possibilité de suspendre temporairement le droit d'opérer compensation à la suite de la délivrance d'une ordonnance initiale (LACC, par. 11.02(1); voir Quintette Coal Ltd. c. Nippon Steel Corp. (1990), 51 B.C.L.R. (2d) 105 (C.A.); Cam-Net Communications c. Vancouver Telephone Co., 1999 BCCA 751, 71 B.C.L.R. (3d) 226; North American Tungsten Corp., Re, 2015 BCCA 390, 377 B.C.A.C. 6 (« Tungsten n^o 1 ») (décision sur la demande d'autorisation d'appel), conf. par 2015 BCCA 426, 378 B.C.A.C. 116 (« Tungsten n^o 2 »); Re Just Energy Corp., 2021 ONSC 1793); ou de restreindre ce droit directement dans le texte d'une ordonnance initiale fondée sur la LACC (Crystallex International Corp., Re, 2012 ONSC 6812, 100 C.B.R. (5th) 132).

[124] Plus particulièrement, la question qui nous occupe ici est celle de savoir si l'art. 21 de la LACC permet d'opérer compensation pré-post. Cette question se pose avec une plus grande acuité dans le the CCAA because the insolvent company continues its business activities.

[125] One of the first cases in which this question was considered after the 1997 legislative reform was Air Canada, Re (2003), 45 C.B.R. (4th) 13, a judgment of Farley J. of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice. There, Farley J. had to decide whether a paragraph included in an initial order whose purpose was to limit the right of Air Canada's creditors to effect set-off should be varied.[2] Air Canada essentially argued that under the CCAA, as under the BIA, legal set-off cannot be permitted between pre- and post-order debts (paras. 10-11). Because the BIA provides, in s. 71 (formerly s. 71(2)), that the bankrupt's property vests in the trustee on the date of the initial bankruptcy event, Farley J. concluded that there is no longer any mutuality between a creditor and a bankrupt debtor following a bankruptcy, despite such mutuality being a necessary condition for set-off:

> In a bankruptcy, the trustee is inserted into the proceedings. Post-bankruptcy dealings of a creditor with the trustee in bankruptcy do not involve the same party, namely the debtor before the condition of bankruptcy. . . . Thus, creditors who incur post-bankruptcy obligations to trustees in bankruptcy cannot claim legal set-off to avoid paying such obligations by setting-off such obligations against their proven (pre-bankruptcy) claims against the bankrupt. The same parties are not involved so there cannot be mutual cross-obligations. [Emphasis in original; para. 14.]

[126] Farley J. next considered Air Canada's second argument, that s. 21 (then s. 18.1) of the CCAA must be interpreted similarly to s. 73(1) of the WURA (at paras. 16-17), which provides that the

[2] The paragraph in question read as follows: "THIS COURT ORDERS that persons may exercise only such rights of set off as are permitted under Section 18.1 of the CCAA as of the date of this order. For greater certainty, no person may set off any obligations of an Applicant to such person which arose prior to such date" (para. 2). The last sentence was particularly problematic.

cadre d'un processus de restructuration mené sous le régime de la LACC, puisque l'entreprise insolvable continue ses opérations commerciales.

[125] L'une des premières affaires dans lesquelles cette question a été examinée, après la réforme législative de 1997, est la décision Air Canada, Re (2003), 45 C.B.R. (4th) 13, rendue par le juge Farley de la Cour supérieure de justice de l'Ontario. Dans cette décision, le juge Farley devait déterminer si un paragraphe inséré dans l'ordonnance initiale et qui visait à limiter le droit pour les créanciers d'Air Canada d'opérer compensation devait être modifié[2]. Essentiellement, Air Canada plaidait que la compensation légale prévue par la LACC ne pouvait être autorisée entre des dettes pré et post-ordonnance, comme c'est le cas en vertu de la LFI (par. 10-11). Puisque la LFI prévoit que, à l'ouverture de la faillite, les biens du failli sont dévolus au syndic en vertu de l'art. 71 (autrefois le par. 71(2)), le juge Farley a conclu qu'il n'y a alors plus de réciprocité entre un créancier et un débiteur failli post-faillite, condition pourtant nécessaire pour qu'il soit possible d'opérer compensation :

> [TRADUCTION] Lors d'une faillite, le syndic est ajouté à l'instance. Lorsqu'un créancier effectue des opérations post-faillite avec le syndic de faillite, il ne traite pas avec la même partie, c'est-à-dire avec le débiteur avant la faillite. [. . .] Par conséquent, le créancier qui contracte des obligations post-faillite envers un syndic de faillite ne peut invoquer la compensation légale pour éviter d'acquitter de telles obligations en opérant compensation entre celles-ci et ses réclamations (pré-faillite) contre le failli dont il a fait la preuve. Comme ce ne sont pas les mêmes parties qui sont concernées, il ne saurait y avoir d'obligations réciproques. [En italique dans l'original; par. 14.]

[126] Ensuite, le juge Farley a analysé le second argument d'Air Canada qui prétendait que l'art. 21 de la LACC (alors l'art. 18.1), devait être interprété de façon similaire au par. 73(1) de la LLR (par. 16-17),

[2] Le paragraphe en question était rédigé ainsi : [TRADUCTION] « LA COUR ORDONNE que seuls peuvent être exercés par les personnes concernées les droits d'opérer compensation qui sont autorisés par l'article 18.1 de la LACC à compter de la date de la présente ordonnance. Il est entendu que nul ne peut opérer compensation sur des obligations d'un Demandeur envers une telle personne nées avant la date de la présente ordonnance. » (par. 2). La dernière phrase posait particulièrement problème.

law of set-off applies to "all claims on the estate of a company, and to all proceedings for the recovery of debts due or accruing due to a company at the commencement of the winding-up of the company". He rejected this argument for several reasons, emphasizing in particular the differences between the words of s. 73(1) of the WURA and those of s. 21 of the CCAA. For example, s. 21 does not provide that set-off must be between claims accruing due as of the date an initial order is made. Farley J. noted that these differences in wording reflect a choice made by Parliament, which did not intend to enact identical set-off provisions in Canada's three insolvency statutes (para. 23). For these reasons, he ordered that the paragraph of the order restricting the right to effect set-off be varied (para. 24).

[127] Although he struck out the part of the initial order that precluded pre-post set-off, Farley J. nonetheless stayed set-off until Air Canada's situation was more stable in order to avoid the disruptive consequences that would result from allowing set-off during the status quo period. He suggested that the best time to effect set-off would be in conjunction with the formation of a plan of arrangement (para. 25).

[128] My colleagues argue (at para. 77) that "Air Canada and Tungsten [which I will discuss below] did not determine whether pre-post compensation is consistent with the interpretation and objectives of the CCAA, let alone establish a framework for the exercise of this right by creditors." This, however, ignores that Air Canada is widely recognized as being authoritative and as standing for the proposition that mutuality is not severed by an initial order made under the CCAA, which means that pre-post set-off or compensation is possible but is subject to a supervising judge's power to stay it (see R. Thornton, "Air Canada and Stelco: Legal Developments and Practical Lessons", in J. P. Sarra, ed., Annual Review of Insolvency Law 2006 (2007), 73; North American Tungsten Corp., Re, 2015 BCSC 1382, 28 C.B.R.

lequel prévoit que la compensation s'applique à « toutes les réclamations sur l'actif d'une compagnie et à toutes les procédures en recouvrement de créances d'une compagnie, échues ou devenues exigibles à l'ouverture de la liquidation de la compagnie ». Le juge Farley a rejeté cet argument pour plusieurs raisons, insistant notamment sur les différences entre le texte du par. 73(1) de la LLR et celui de l'art. 21 de la LACC. Par exemple, ce dernier article ne prévoit pas que la compensation doit s'effectuer entre des réclamations devenues exigibles à la date de la délivrance de l'ordonnance initiale. Le juge Farley a souligné que ces différences rédactionnelles reflètent le choix du législateur, lequel n'a pas voulu adopter des dispositions législatives identiques en matière de compensation dans les trois lois canadiennes en matière d'insolvabilité (par. 23). Pour ces raisons, il a ordonné la modification du paragraphe de l'ordonnance qui limitait le droit d'opérer compensation (par. 24).

[127] Bien qu'il ait radié la partie de l'ordonnance initiale qui empêchait la compensation pré-post, le juge Farley a néanmoins suspendu la mise en œuvre de la compensation jusqu'à ce que la situation d'Air Canada se soit davantage stabilisée, afin d'éviter les conséquences perturbatrices qu'entraînerait le fait de permettre la compensation pendant la période de statu quo. Il a suggéré que le meilleur moment pour opérer compensation serait lors de la formulation d'un plan d'arrangement (par. 25).

[128] Mes collègues prétendent (au par. 77) que « les affaires Air Canada et Tungsten [que je décris ci-dessous] n'ont pas tranché la question de savoir si la compensation pré-post est conforme à l'interprétation et aux objectifs de la LACC, et encore moins établi les balises entourant l'exercice de ce droit par des créanciers ». Cette prétention ne tient toutefois pas compte du fait que la décision Air Canada est largement reconnue comme faisant autorité et appuyant la proposition selon laquelle la réciprocité n'est pas rompue par une ordonnance initiale rendue en vertu de la LACC, de sorte que la compensation pré-post est possible mais assujettie au pouvoir du juge surveillant d'en suspendre l'exécution (voir R. Thornton, « Air Canada and Stelco : Legal Developments and Practical Lessons », dans J.

(6th) 147 ("Tungsten No. 3"), at para. 15). For example, Robert Thornton writes:

> Air Canada was indebted to certain parties as at the date of the Initial Order. Subsequent to the date of the Initial Order, those parties became indebted to Air Canada. They wished to set-off their post-CCAA debts against Air Canada's pre-CCAA debts owing to them. . . .

Farley J. was correct in so doing.

[129] In Tungsten, the British Columbia Court of Appeal also considered set-off under s. 21 of the CCAA — first in an application for leave to appeal two orders of the British Columbia Supreme Court (Tungsten No. 1, per Savage J.A.) and then in an appeal from that decision denying leave to appeal (Tungsten No. 2). The insolvent company had obtained an initial order under the CCAA effective June 9, 2015, at which time it owed approximately $4.4 million to Global Tungsten and Powders Corp. ("GTP") under a loan agreement. It subsequently continued selling tungsten to GTP, which gave notice

> [TRADUCTION] Air Canada était endettée envers certaines parties à la date de l'Ordonnance initiale. Après cette date, ces parties sont devenues débitrices d'Air Canada. Le juge Farley était fondé à conclure ainsi.

[129] Dans l'affaire Tungsten, la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique s'est également penchée sur la compensation prévue par l'art. 21 de la LACC, d'abord dans le cadre d'une demande de permission d'appeler de deux ordonnances de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique (Tungsten n^o 1, le juge Savage), puis en appel de cette décision refusant la permission d'appeler (Tungsten n^o 2). L'entreprise insolvable avait obtenu, en vertu de la LACC, une ordonnance initiale prenant effet à compter du 9 juin 2015, date à laquelle elle devait approximativement 4,4 millions de dollars à Global Tungsten and that it wished to set off its claim (the pre-order debt) against the amounts due or accruing due for the tungsten sold to it (the post-order debt) (Tungsten No. 1, at paras. 2 and 6). The chambers judge had held that GTP had a valid right of set-off (Tungsten No. 2, at para. 7).

[130] In these two decisions, the main question before the Court of Appeal was whether the chambers judge had erred in concluding that the right to effect set-off could be stayed, like the other creditors' remedies, once the initial order had been made. The question of whether pre-post set-off could be effected was never raised by the parties, which by implication showed that it was permitted under the CCAA. Relying on s. 21 of the CCAA as well as on s. 11 of that statute, which confers a broad discretion on a supervising judge, the Court of Appeal explained that nothing in the words of s. 21 prohibits a supervising judge from making the right of set-off subject to a stay of remedies (Tungsten No. 1, at paras. 12-13 and 16; Tungsten No. 2, at paras. 31 and 34-35).

[131] Contrary to what my colleagues say at para. 79, in that case both the chambers judge and the Court of Appeal considered the arguments relating to the effects of pre-post set-off on the status quo period and on the underlying objectives of this period, but they did so from the perspective of a stay of the right to effect set-off rather than by questioning the very possibility of pre-post set-off. This shows that my colleagues' concerns about the disruptive potential of pre-post set-off were given adequate consideration by the supervising judge in exercising his discretion to permit or to stay set-off.

[132] In particular, the chambers judge wrote the following: ". . . a temporal stay of rights can be

Powders Corp. (« GTP ») aux termes d'un contrat de prêt. Par la suite, l'entreprise insolvable continuait de vendre du tungstène à GTP, laquelle a envoyé un avis indiquant qu'elle souhaitait opérer compensation entre sa créance (soit la dette pré-ordonnance) et les sommes échues ou à échoir pour la vente de tungstène (soit la dette post-ordonnance) (Tungsten n^o^ 1, par. 2 et 6). Le juge de première instance avait reconnu que GTP possédait un droit valide d'opérer compensation (Tungsten n^o^ 2, par. 7).

[130] Dans ces deux décisions, la principale question dont la Cour d'appel était saisie consistait à déterminer si le juge de première instance avait fait erreur en concluant que le droit d'opérer compensation pouvait être suspendu, au même titre que les recours des autres créanciers, à partir de la délivrance de l'ordonnance initiale. La question de savoir si compensation pré-post pouvait être opérée n'a jamais été soulevée par les parties, ce qui démontrait implicitement que cette compensation était permise sous le régime de la LACC. S'appuyant sur l'art. 21 de la LACC ainsi que sur l'art. 11 de celle-ci, qui confère un large pouvoir discrétionnaire au juge surveillant, la Cour d'appel a expliqué que rien dans le texte de l'art. 21 n'interdit au juge surveillant d'assujettir le droit d'opérer compensation à la suspension des recours (Tungsten n^o^ 1, par. 12-13 et 16; Tungsten n^o^ 2, par. 31 et 34-35).

[131] Contrairement à ce qu'avancent mes collègues au par. 79, dans cette affaire, tant le tribunal de première instance que la Cour d'appel ont considéré les arguments relatifs aux incidences de la compensation pré-post sur la période de statu quo et sur les objectifs sous-jacents de cette dernière, mais dans l'optique de la suspension du droit d'opérer compensation plutôt qu'en s'interrogeant sur la possibilité même de la compensation pré-post. Cela démontre que les inquiétudes de mes collègues quant au potentiel perturbateur de la compensation pré-post sont adéquatement prises en compte par le juge surveillant dans l'exercice de son pouvoir discrétionnaire d'autoriser la compensation ou d'en suspendre l'application.

[132] Le juge de première instance a notamment écrit ce qui suit : [TRADUCTION] « . . . une suspension granted to further the purpose of the initial order and the purposes of the Act" (Tungsten No. 3, at para. 25). While conceding that there was some merit to the arguments on the effects of pre-post set-off, he was not prepared to reverse the decision in Air Canada (paras. 17-18). Moreover, he stayed the right to effect set-off on the basis that, "[i]n order to preserve the status quo to effect a restructuring, a stay of the set-off is, and was, absolutely essential", and he added, among other things, that if the stay of set-off were not continued, the restructuring efforts "would be thrown into disarray" and "[t]he status quo would be significantly altered and the restructuring would effectively be at an end" (para. 32). The judge who considered the application for leave to appeal noted in turn that, "[c]learly, if an attempt at compromise or arrangement is to have any prospect of success there must be a means of holding creditors at bay" (Tungsten No. 1, at para. 16). He added that not staying the right to effect set-off would favour GTP to the detriment of the other creditors (paras. 18 and 25). Groberman J.A., who wrote the judgment of the Court of Appeal, stressed the principle that a creditor should not be able to exercise a right of set-off to circumvent a compromise or arrangement under the CCAA (Tungsten No. 2, at paras. 37-39).

[133] Despite my colleagues' protestations to the contrary, the state of the law elsewhere in Canada is clear: pre-post set-off is possible under the CCAA, subject to a supervising judge's discretion to stay such set-off having regard to its effects on the status quo period, the underlying objectives of this period, the advancement of efforts to reach an arrangement, and the remedial objectives of the CCAA.

[134] It must be concluded that the approach proposed by the Quebec Court of Appeal in Kitco has created an asymmetry between the interpretation given to s. 21 of the CCAA by the Quebec courts and the interpretation given to it by the courts of other Canadian provinces. This asymmetry is contrary to temporaire des droits peut être accordée pour appuyer l'application de l'ordonnance initiale et la réalisation des objectifs de la Loi » (Tungsten n^o^ 3, par. 25). Il a reconnu que les arguments relatifs aux incidences de la compensation pré-post ont du mérite, mais il n'était pas prêt à renverser la décision Air Canada (par. 17-18). Il a en outre suspendu le droit d'opérer compensation parce que, [TRADUCTION] « [a]fin de préserver le statu quo en vue d'effectuer la restructuration, la suspension du droit d'opérer compensation est, et était, absolument essentielle », ajoutant entre autres que, si la suspension de la compensation n'était pas reconduite, les efforts de restructuration « seraient désorganisés » et « [l]e statu quo serait considérablement affecté et cela mettrait effectivement un terme à la restructuration » (par. 32). Le juge saisi de la demande d'autorisation d'appel a quant à lui souligné que, [TRADUCTION] « [d]e toute évidence, pour qu'une tentative de transaction ou d'arrangement ait quelque chance de succès, il faut un moyen de tenir les créanciers à distance » (Tungsten n^o^ 1, par. 16). Il a ajouté que l'absence de suspension du droit d'opérer compensation aurait pour effet de favoriser GTP au détriment des autres créanciers (par. 18 et 25). Rédigeant l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel, le juge Groberman a insisté sur le principe selon lequel un créancier ne devrait pas pouvoir se prévaloir du droit d'opérer compensation afin de contourner une transaction ou un arrangement fondé sur la LACC (Tungsten n^o^ 2, par. 37-39).

[134] Force est de constater que l'approche avancée par la Cour d'appel du Québec dans l'arrêt Kitco crée une asymétrie entre l'interprétation de l'art. 21 de la LACC par les tribunaux du Québec et par les tribunaux d'autres provinces canadiennes. Cette asymétrie va à l'encontre du principe de l'interprétation the principle of homogenous interpretation of federal statutes (Morin and Michaud, at p. 344).

C. Restructuring an Insolvent Company Versus Liquidating Its Assets

[135] Finally, in Kitco, Vézina J.A. noted that his conclusions were based on the fact that the insolvent company was engaged in a genuine restructuring process and that staying its creditors' remedies was crucial to bringing this process to a successful conclusion. He stressed that Kitco's restructuring plan was in jeopardy because the Agency was effecting compensation with the amounts it was supposed to pay Kitco. Kitco was required to carry on its activities while paying 15 percent in taxes on its gold inputs without receiving the refund to which it was entitled in this regard. It was thus in an [TRANSLATION] "untenable" position relative to competitors in its field (paras. 47-48).

[136] Staying the remedies of an insolvent company's creditors under the CCAA to allow the company to develop a plan of arrangement is of critical importance, particularly where the exercise of a creditor's right to effect pre-post compensation might sabotage the company's efforts to regain financial health.

[137] In this case, however, and in the opinion of the monitor and the interveners themselves, there has never been any question of SM Group proposing a plan of arrangement. Once SM Group's principal creditors filed an application for an initial order under the CCAA, it was clear that they wished to opt for a liquidation process — that is, the sale of the insolvent company to a new buyer. In this particular situation, where a plan of arrangement cannot be contemplated and the insolvent company will be liquidated or sold in any event, to conclude that pre-post compensation is never allowed could be unfair to the company's creditors with claims that are certain, liquid and exigible. In such cases, the creditors' remedies will be stayed indefinitely and they will never be able to uniforme des lois fédérales (Morin et Michaud, p. 344).

C. La restructuration d'une entreprise insolvable versus la liquidation des actifs de cette entreprise

[135] Enfin, dans l'arrêt Kitco, le juge Vézina a souligné que ses conclusions étaient fondées sur le fait que l'entreprise insolvable était engagée dans un véritable processus de restructuration et que la suspension des recours de ses créanciers était essentielle pour lui permettre de mener à bien ce processus. Il a insisté sur le fait que le plan de restructuration de Kitco était mis en péril parce que l'Agence opérait compensation sur les sommes qu'elle devait verser à Kitco. En effet, Kitco était obligée de poursuivre ses activités tout en payant des taxes de l'ordre de 15 p. 100 sur ses intrants d'or sans recevoir le remboursement auquel elle avait droit à cet égard. Elle se trouvait ainsi dans une position « insoutenable » comparativement aux entreprises concurrentes dans son domaine (par. 47-48).

[136] La suspension, en vertu de la LACC, des recours des créanciers d'une entreprise insolvable afin de permettre à celle-ci d'élaborer un plan d'arrangement revêt une importance cruciale, en particulier lorsque l'exercice du droit d'un créancier d'opérer compensation pré-post risque de saboter les efforts déployés par l'entreprise pour retrouver sa santé financière.

[137] En l'espèce, toutefois, et de l'avis même du contrôleur et des intervenants, il n'a jamais été question pour Groupe SM de proposer un plan d'arrangement. Dès le dépôt d'une demande d'ordonnance initiale en vertu de la LACC par les principaux créanciers de Groupe SM, il était clair que ces derniers souhaitaient opter pour un processus de liquidation, soit la vente de l'entreprise insolvable à un nouvel acquéreur. Dans ce cas particulier, alors qu'un plan d'arrangement n'est pas envisageable et que l'entreprise insolvable sera de toute manière liquidée ou vendue, conclure que la compensation pré-post n'est jamais permise pourrait être injuste pour les créanciers de cette entreprise ayant une créance certaine, liquide et exigible. En effet, dans ces cas, les recours effect pre-post compensation, since the insolvent company will become an "empty shell" after the sale. Moreover, because a plan of arrangement cannot be contemplated, allowing pre-post compensation will not have the effect of derailing the company's restructuring process, as there is no such process.

II. Discretion Not Exercised by the Supervising Judge in This Case

[138] In my view, pre-post compensation is permitted under s. 21 of the CCAA, but it must be subject to the exercise of a supervising judge's discretion. In Callidus, this Court clarified the framework for the exercise of this discretion under s. 11 of the CCAA. The first two criteria are found in s. 11, which provides that a supervising judge may make any order that is "appropriate" in the circumstances of the case and consistent with the restrictions set out in the CCAA. The Court added that the exercise of the discretion must also further the remedial objectives of the CCAA and be focused in particular on the criteria of appropriateness, good faith and due diligence (para. 70).

[139] My colleagues make a series of arguments against compensation in general and pre-post compensation in particular: the high disruptive potential of compensation; respect for the status quo period; the loss of incentive for the debtor to provide goods and services during the stay period because it would fear not being paid for them, which would deprive it of the funds needed to continue operating; the fact that an interim lender would most likely refuse to continue to finance the debtor's operations if the loaned funds were destined to enrich another creditor; the fact that the rampart set up by a stay to protect against attacks by creditors would crumble; the fact that compensation deviates from the principle of equality among ordinary creditors and that pre-post compensation amounts to giving certain creditors an additional "type of security interest" in respect of new assets acquired by the debtor after des créanciers seront suspendus indéfiniment et ils ne pourront jamais exercer compensation pré-post, l'entreprise insolvable étant devenue après la vente une « coquille vide ». Par ailleurs, puisqu'un plan d'arrangement n'est pas envisageable, permettre la compensation pré-post n'aura pas comme effet de faire dérailler le processus de restructuration de l'entreprise, ce processus étant inexistant.

II. L'absence d'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire par la juge surveillante en l'espèce

[139] Mes collègues avancent une série d'arguments à l'encontre de la compensation en général et de la compensation pré-post en particulier : le fort potentiel perturbateur d'une compensation; le respect de la période de statu quo; la perte d'incitatifs pour la débitrice de fournir des biens et services durant la période de suspension, de crainte de ne pas être payée en retour, ce qui aurait pour effet de la priver des fonds nécessaires pour poursuivre ses opérations; le fait que le prêteur intérimaire refuserait fort probablement de continuer à financer les opérations de la débitrice si les sommes prêtées sont destinées à enrichir un autre créancier; le fait que le rempart érigé par la suspension contre les attaques des créanciers s'effriterait; le fait que la compensation déroge au principe de l'égalité entre les créanciers ordinaires et le fait que la compensation pré-post équivaut à attribuer à certains créanciers une « sorte

the commencement of proceedings; etc. (paras. 59, 61 and 73).

[140] Most of these arguments presuppose that pre-post compensation will be systematically allowed without regard for the circumstances of each case and without considering whether it is "appropriate" — hence my colleagues' position that pre-post compensation should never be authorized unless there are exceptional circumstances. Although these arguments are legitimate, they must be left to the supervising judge, who will weigh them — along with the other relevant considerations and circumstances — in exercising the discretion to permit or to deny pre-post compensation in a particular case, having regard to the remedial objectives of the CCAA.

[141] Believing herself to be bound by the conclusions of the Quebec Court of Appeal in Kitco, the supervising judge in this case did not exercise her discretion under s. 11 of the CCAA. Given that this discretion was not exercised by the supervising judge, it is not for this Court to exercise it to determine whether to permit compensation between the amounts owed by the City to SM Group and the claim held by the City against SM Group. The Court has made it clear that supervising judges are in the best position to decide whether to exercise their discretion in a particular case based on "a circumstance-specific inquiry that must balance the various objectives of the CCAA" (Callidus, at para. 76).

[142] My colleagues are of the view that remanding the case to the court of original jurisdiction would be unhelpful and not in the interests of justice (paras. 84 and 98). I respectfully disagree. In fact, this Court recently noted in Canadian Broadcasting Corp. v. Manitoba, 2021 SCC 33, [2021] 2 S.C.R. 704, that in cases involving an exercise of discretion by a court of first instance, "it is not in the interests of justice for this Court to step into [that court's] shoes and decide these matters at first instance", and that this de garantie » additionnelle sur de nouveaux éléments d'actif acquis par la débitrice après l'ouverture des procédures; etc. (par. 59, 61 et 73).

[140] La plupart de ces arguments présument que la compensation pré-post sera systématiquement accordée sans égards aux circonstances propres à chaque affaire, et nonobstant la question de savoir si celle-ci est « indiquée » — d'où la position de mes collègues selon laquelle la compensation pré-post ne devrait jamais être autorisée, sauf circonstances exceptionnelles. Bien que légitimes, ces arguments doivent être laissés à l'appréciation du juge surveillant qui, dans l'exercice de son pouvoir discrétionnaire d'accorder ou non la compensation pré-post dans une affaire donnée, les soupèsera avec les autres considérations et circonstances pertinentes, le tout à la lumière des objectifs réparateurs de la LACC.

[141] Estimant être liée par les conclusions de la Cour d'appel du Québec dans l'arrêt Kitco, la juge surveillante n'a pas exercé le pouvoir discrétionnaire que lui confère l'art. 11 de la LACC. Vu l'absence d'exercice de ce pouvoir par la juge surveillante, il ne revient pas à la Cour de l'exercer afin de décider s'il y a lieu d'autoriser ou non la compensation entre les sommes dues par la Ville de Montréal à Groupe SM et la créance de cette dernière à l'encontre de Groupe SM. La Cour a précisé que les juges surveillants sont les mieux placés pour décider s'ils doivent exercer leur pouvoir discrétionnaire dans une situation donnée en s'appuyant sur « une analyse fondée sur les circonstances propres à chaque situation qui doit mettre en balance les divers objectifs de la LACC » (Callidus, par. 76).

[142] Mes collègues sont d'avis que le renvoi du dossier en première instance serait inutile et contraire aux intérêts de la justice (par. 84 et 98). Avec égards, je ne suis pas d'accord. En effet, la Cour a récemment rappelé dans l'arrêt Société Radio-Canada c. Manitoba, 2021 CSC 33, [2021] 2 R.C.S. 704, que dans les affaires qui reposent sur l'exercice d'un pouvoir discrétionnaire par un tribunal de première instance, « il n'est pas dans l'intérêt de la justice que notre Cour se mette à la place de [ce tribunal] et

Court's role is limited to reviewing the exercise of the discretion "through [a] deferential lens" (para. 88).

III. Conclusion

[143] For these reasons, I would allow the appeal solely for the purpose of remanding the case to the Superior Court to have it determine whether the City may effect compensation between SM Group's pre-initial order debts and the post-initial order amounts owed by the City to SM Group. I would also allow the appeal so that it can be determined whether the City may effect compensation in respect of its water meter claim.

Memorandum of Judgment

The Court:

I. Overview

[1] James Metcalfe appeals a judgment finding him jointly and severally liable in tort along with Tru-Square Homes Ltd, in which he owns 99% of the shares. The trial judge found a breach of the standard of care owed to the respondents Craig and Georgina Swanby in the construction of their residence by Tru-Square. The claim advanced is a pure economic loss claim; there is no allegation of personal injury or actual property damage sustained by the Swanbys.

[2] There is no contest over the trial judge's findings that the contracts or the amendment or amendments to the contracts were between Tru-Square and the Swanbys, and that "no contractual remedy is available as against Metcalfe". There is also no contest over the trial judge's findings that Mr Metcalfe's actions throughout the construction project were not "sufficient to constitute fraud", nor whether Mr Metcalfe induced a breach of contract.

[3] The only substantive issue on appeal is whether the trial judge erred in finding Mr Metcalfe jointly and severally liable for the wrongful acts of Tru-Square.

[4] For the reasons below, the appeal is allowed.

II. Facts

[5] The Swanbys purchased land west of Carstairs in 2009 or 2010 for the purpose of constructing a family home. They initially retained a designer of large custom-built homes and an architectural draftsperson. Drawings were complete by mid to late 2010.

[6] The Swanbys had seen Tru-Square signs on homes in the Carstairs area and Mr Metcalfe was the next-door neighbour of Ms Swanby's brother.

[7] The Swanbys contacted Mr Metcalfe to see whether Tru-Square would be interested in acting as general contractor for the construction of the house. Mr Metcalfe initially turned down the prospect of this contract on behalf of Tru-Square, indicating that he was "looking to wind-up his construction business and was not really interested in taking on the project".

[8] In the spring of 2011, the Swanbys contacted Mr Metcalfe again and he indicated Tru-Square was "possibly interested, but only in terms of construction to the lock-up stage", including pouring the foundation, framing, and installation of doors and windows.

2023 ABCA 224 (CanLII)

[9] In July and August 2011, Mr Metcalfe provided the Swanbys with several quotes on the project. The initial quote was for $500,000 to complete construction to the lock-up stage. The second quote, dated July 6, 2011, was for $578,875.40, adding interior drywall and exterior stucco to the original lock-up quote. The Swanbys advised that for financing purposes their bank required a quote for the entire cost of building the home, including all interior finishing. So a third quote was provided, dated August 4, 2011, totalling $1,064,348 for the entire construction project. A fourth quote was provided on August 21, 2011, listing a number of items totalling $352,251 with an addition of $659,510 for a total of $1,011,761.

[10] On August 22, 2011 the Swanbys entered into one or more contracts with Tru-Square. The contracts were always only with Tru-Square, not Mr Metcalfe, and Mr Metcalfe signed the contracts only as the principal of Tru-Square, and not in a personal capacity. Despite the signing of multiple contracts, the parties agreed on August 22, 2011 that Tru-Square would build the house "to the lock-up stage only, with framing to start in late September 2011 and completion to lock-up stage by early 2012".

[11] Construction work began in September 2011, with Tru-Square acting as general contractor and all actual work being completed by subcontractors. Mr Metcalfe was not present during construction over significant periods of time from 2011 to 2013.

[12] In May 2013, an issue arose with respect to leaking windows and water leaking through the soffits. Tru-Square took the position that fixing windows was not its responsibility, and shortly thereafter left the construction site and never returned.

[13] On or about July 17, 2013, Ms Swanby served Mr Metcalfe with a letter listing extensive alleged deficiencies. The Swanbys hired a different general contracting firm to begin investigative and demolition work, and a building envelope engineer and structural engineer to identify construction and building code deficiencies. Remediation work began in July or August 2014 and the Swanbys took possession of a fully remediated house in late August or early September 2015, more than two years after the initial occupancy date.

[14] On September 13, 2013, the Swanbys filed a statement of claim against Tru-Square, Mr Metcalfe, and his spouse Joyce Metcalfe. The claim was amended on March 12, 2014. They alleged 49 separate deficiencies which they said were "the result of a deliberate plan to cut corners, deviate from the Building Contract requirements, the Plans, and the Code, and to obtain the Plaintiffs' funds without providing the value or quality that the Plaintiffs paid for". They alleged the house was unsafe and not fit for habitation and pleaded that "Tru-Square is liable to the Plaintiffs for breach of contract".

[15] The Swanbys additionally alleged that both Tru-Square and Mr Metcalfe were "liable to the Plaintiffs in negligence", had "engaged from the outset in a fraudulent scheme", had "committed a fraud on the County and the building approval process", engaged in a "fraudulent effort to cover up the Deficiencies", and deliberately mispresented the state of the project. They pleaded that Mr Metcalfe was "personally liable for such fraudulent conduct", and asked for aggravated damages, punitive damages, and injunctive relief. They sought a tracing of funds, an accounting, a declaration that they had an interest in a property owned by the Metcalfes, to which they said funds had been diverted, and damages of $1,000,000 for "breach of contract, negligence, conspiracy, unjust enrichment, breach of trust, breach of fiduciary duty, and fraud".

[16] A statement of defence was filed on September 17, 2014, a counterclaim was filed on April 23, 2014, and a trial was conducted over 26 days, commencing April 8 and completed on November 28, 2019.

[17] Reasons for Decision were issued March 18, 2022 (2022 ABQB 215) and the notice of appeal was filed April 14, 2022.

III. Trial Judge's Decision

[18] In his 772-paragraph decision, the trial judge comprehensively reviewed the facts and the allegations of deficiencies in the Swanby home. He concluded that the initial agreement reached between Tru-Square and the Swanbys on August 22, 2011 was to complete the house only to lock-up. He said Mr Metcalfe was "on site only occasionally during the framing process" and the "project did not proceed as rapidly as expected". He found that Tru-Square and Mr Metcalfe left the construction site in May or June 2013 and never returned. As a result, the Swanbys hired other parties to find and repair deficiencies and complete construction of the house.

[19] As to the Swanbys' allegation that Tru-Square and Mr Metcalfe should be held concurrently liable in contract and tort, he said it "makes no practical difference whether a case is assessed as a tort claim or a contract claim" as the "measure of damages is the same", but that contractual liability is limited to the specific contracting parties, except in cases of lifting the corporate veil.

[20] On this point he concluded:

> . . . Tru-Square breached its contract with the Plaintiffs. Contrary to their agreement, numerous aspects of the construction failed to meet Code standards, let alone the higher standard advocated by the Plaintiffs and their experts. Further, Tru-Square failed to provide proper supervision of the subcontractors.

However, as noted, he found that whatever its terms, the contract "was with Tru-Square only, not with Metcalfe", and that "no contractual remedy is available as against Metcalfe".

[21] As to liability in tort, the trial judge repeated three times that Mr Metcalfe acted in a negligent manner. He said Mr Metcalfe "was certainly negligent in his oversight of the project and in his dealings with the Plaintiffs" and he and Tru-Square together were "careless, even negligent" in billing for work not completed. He concluded by finding "the Defendants jointly and severally liable in tort for breach of the duty of care owed to the Plaintiffs in the construction of the Plaintiffs' residence". What he meant, of course, was that assuming a duty of care, they were in breach of the established standard of care. However, all three references involve Mr Metcalfe, sometimes collectively with Tru-Square, acting in his corporate capacity in the contractual relationship between Tru-Square and the Swanbys. None of those instances point to individual, independent liability on the part of Mr Metcalfe.

[22] The trial judge said the Swanbys sought to establish liability for Mr Metcalfe's "negligent performance of [his] contractual obligations", "via a number of different routes": inherently dangerous work, fraud, piercing the corporate veil, or inducing breach of contract. He did not say they sought to prove concurrent liability in tort as a separate route to liability, a claim different than piercing the corporate veil or these other allegations.

[23] In first addressing inherently dangerous work, he found the as-built condition of the deck "posed a significant risk to users of the deck and the outdoor space accessed from the basement directly beneath the deck", such that the "deck construction was inherently dangerous". He found "the as-built condition of the Bonus Room staircase posed a significant risk to the various trades who may have had occasion to use it during the course of construction" and to others who may have used the staircase in the future had it not been repaired.

[24] The trial judge said that in considering inherently dangerous work as one possible means to liability, he was "satisfied that [his] findings do not require proof of actual injury to persons or of actual collapse", relying upon Vargo v Hughes, 2013 ABCA 96, paras 26, 27, 43, 544 AR 99. However, he acknowledged it was "not clear . . . that Vargo permits the Plaintiffs to recover from Metcalfe personally, as opposed to from Tru-Square". It appears the trial judge did not find inherently dangerous work by itself as a means of finding liability in negligence for Mr Metcalfe. The Swanbys agree that the trial judge "left open Metcalfe's personal liability for dangerous defects".

[25] On the question of fraud, as indicated, the trial judge was "not satisfied that Metcalfe's failure to disclose the construction deficiencies is sufficient to constitute fraud", and he was "not prepared to find that his conduct [in his oversight of the project and dealings with the Swanbys] amounted to fraud". He also found the Swanbys had not established fraud with respect to invoices alleged to be "for work not completed" and "goods and services that were not provided". He concluded: "I am not prepared to find that Metcalfe's conduct was fraudulent, though I will say that I consider this case very close to the line".

[26] The trial judge reviewed numerous cases on piercing the corporate veil, although he blurred this analysis with that for concurrent liability in tort. He found that "Tru-Square was not a mere shell incorporated for the purpose of carrying out a wrongful act" and that it had operated as a successful, legitimate home-building business for some time prior to the events in question. On the other hand, he found that "Metcalfe treated himself and Tru-Square interchangeably and intermingled the corporation's affairs with his own" including mingling his and his wife's "personal money with Tru-Square's", thereby treating Tru-Square as his "alter ego". He concluded:

> . . . the combination of the sheer number of construction deficiencies, their pervasive nature affecting many aspects of the residence, the physical danger posed by some of these deficiencies, [and] Metcalfe's ultimate abandonment of the project rises to a level that warrants looking through the corporate shield.

[27] As a result, he found that "personal liability should attach to Metcalfe in these circumstances". This was reinforced by a finding that Mr Metcalfe had cancelled a general commercial insurance policy in the name of "Tru-Square Homes, o/b Jim Metcalfe", "as soon as the windows leaked and a substantial amount of water leaked into the interior of the residence" and also cancelled his Workers' Compensation Board coverage, such that "Metcalfe's failure to maintain insurance coverage should be visited upon him rather than the Plaintiffs".

[28] Finally, the trial judge rejected the Swanbys' claim against Mr Metcalfe for inducing breach of contract.

[29] In sum, the trial judge's decision rested on piercing the corporate veil, along with an apparent determination, without substantive analysis, that Mr Metcalfe and Tru-Square were jointly liable in tort.

IV. Grounds of Appeal

[30] Mr Metcalfe submits the trial judge erred in law in determining that the corporate veil should be pierced, and made errors of fact in accepting the evidence of the Swanbys and their witnesses over his evidence and that of his witnesses.

V. Standard of Review

[31] The standard of review on questions of law is correctness, on questions of fact is palpable and overriding error, and on questions of mixed law and fact is palpable and overriding error unless there is an extricable error of law: Housen v Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, paras 7-37, [2002] 2 SCR 235.

VI. Analysis

[32] The concept of separate legal personality was established in Salomon v Salomon & Co, [1897] AC 22, 22-32, 51-54 (HL), in which the court said: "either the limited company [is] a legal entity or it [is] not. If it [is], the business belong[s] to it and not to Mr. Salomon"; and further, "the company is at law a different person altogether from subscribers to the memorandum". That distinction is the "corporate veil" between the company and its owner.

[33] The Alberta Business Corporations Act, RSA 2000, c B-9, ss 16(1), 46(1), provides for a corporation establishing a separate corporate personality from its shareholders, with no exception for single shareholder corporations. Additionally, the Interpretation Act, RSA 2000, c I-8, s 16, provides that the establishment of a corporation vests in the corporation the right to contract and be contracted with in its corporate name, makes the corporation liable to be sued in its corporate name, and exempts from personal liability individual members of the corporation.

[34] Courts are generally unwilling to lift or pierce the corporate veil unless required to do so by statute or in the face of extraordinary circumstances: Kevin P McGuinness, Canadian Business Corporations Law, 3rd ed (Toronto: LexisNexis, 2017), vol 1, 7.47. It requires a court to disregard the fundamental principle of separate identity and view the corporation as an "agent" or "puppet" of its controlling shareholder.

[35] However, this is not truly a case of piercing the corporate veil. It is a case of alleged concurrent liability in tort. The analysis is completely different. The fundamental flaw in the trial judge's reasoning is his failure to distinguish between these two distinct doctrines, an error in principle.

[36] The two separate concepts are discussed in Driving Force Inc v I Spy-Eagle Eyes Safety Inc, 2022 ABCA 25, paras 48-49, 466 DLR (4th) 292:

> Liability in tort is primarily personal; a tort arises when the tortfeasor breaches a duty imposed on him or her by the law of tort. Corporations are considered to be separate legal persons, with their own rights and obligations; their shareholders and directors are not personally liable for the corporation's obligations. Corporations, however, can only act through human agents, and any corporate tort generally involves concurrent human actions. There is thus a conflict between these two basic principles: personal liability in tort, and the separate legal personality of corporations.
>
> This engages two separate but overlapping concepts. There are some occasions where the law will "lift the corporate veil", and find the directing minds behind the corporation responsible for the liabilities and obligations of the corporation. These situations are, however, an exception to the general rule that there is no personal liability for corporate obligations. The related concept is when the corporation and its human agents are concurrently liable in tort. When an individual is found to be concurrently liable for a tort committed in the name of a corporation, this is not truly an instance of "lifting the corporate veil". The liability of the individual is > based on his or her breach of an individual duty owed in tort, not by lifting the corporate veil to impose the corporation's duty or liability on the individual.

[37] As set out in Hogarth v Rocky Mountain Slate Inc, 2013 ABCA 57, para 110, 542 AR 289 and Hall v Stewart, 2019 ABCA 98, para 18, 82 Alta LR (6th) 233, there are a number of factors to be considered in determining whether concurrent personal liability should be imposed for corporate torts:

> (a) Whether the negligent act was committed while engaged in the business of the corporation, and whether the negligence of the employee was contemporaneous with that of the corporation;
>
> (b) Whether the individual was pursuing any personal interest beyond the corporate interest;
>
> (c) Whether the director or corporate representative owed a separate and distinct duty of care towards the injured party;
>
> (d) Whether the conduct was "in the best interests of the company";
>
> (e) Whether the plaintiff voluntarily dealt with the limited liability corporation, or had the corporate relationship "imposed" on it;
>
> (f) The expectations of the parties;
>
> (g) Whether the tort was "independent";
>
> (h) The exception in Said v Butt, [1920] 3 KB 497 [where the director or servant actually takes part in or authorizes such torts as assault, trespass to property, nuisance, or inducing breach of contract];
>
> (i) The nature of the tort, and particularly whether it was an intentional tort;
>
> (j) Whether the damage was physical or economic.

See also Driving Force, paras 64-66; Parks v McAvoy, 2023 ABCA 211, paras 45, 51; and Blacklaws v Morrow, 2000 ABCA 175, paras 48, 50, 51, 66, 81, 187 DLR (4th) 614, leave ref'd [2001] 1 SCR vii.

[38] The trial judge found that Mr Metcalfe acted in a negligent manner in his oversight of the project and dealings with the plaintiffs, and acted with carelessness in billing for work not properly completed. The finding of "negligence" means that the standard of care was breached. Personal liability on Mr Metcalf, however, depends on him owing a separate, personal duty of care in tort.

2023 ABCA 224 (CanLII)

[39] Applying the criteria in Hogarth, Hall, and Driving Force, any negligent act committed was while Mr Metcalfe was engaged in the business of the corporation, and contemporaneous with that of the corporation. There was no finding by the trial judge that Mr Metcalfe was pursuing any personal interest beyond the corporate interest, despite the allegations of fraud. There was no finding by the trial judge that Mr Metcalfe owed a separate and distinct duty of care towards the Swanbys, separate and apart from that owed by Tru-Square. Mr Metcalfe acted in the interests of Tru-Square, and not for some individual and distinct interest of his own. The Swanbys voluntarily dealt with Tru-Square; they did not have the corporate relationship imposed on them. The expectations of the parties were that Tru-Square would act as a general contractor supervising subcontractors in the construction of the Swanbys' home. Mr Metcalfe was personally out of the country for much of that contract period, and the Swanbys were aware for the most part of his proposed extended absences.

[40] There is no evidence that any allegations of tort against Mr Metcalfe were independent from allegations of tort or breach of contract against Tru-Square. The alleged torts against Mr Metcalfe were in pure economic loss, a non-intentional tort, not the type of tort in which concurrent liability has been employed: assault, trespass, nuisance, or personal injury.

[41] All of these factors point to the conclusion that there is no independent tort liability on the part of Mr Metcalfe, separate and apart from the liability found in Tru-Square. The only available remedy for the Swanbys is against Tru-Square. Personal liability cannot be imposed on human agents of the corporation just based on "the circumstances of the case", as the trial judge implied.

[42] The trial judge erred in specifically determining not to follow binding precedent, Hall and Hogarth, when he said he found those cases "difficult to reconcile" with earlier cases, and that "each case will be specific to its own context and circumstances". The trial judge was bound by those decisions. The reason the trial judge found these cases "difficult to reconcile" is because he conflated the concepts of concurrent liability in tort and piercing the corporate veil. Hall and Hogarth address concurrent liability in tort; the trial judge dismissed these cases in the context of piercing the corporate veil.

[43] Additionally, the trial judge placed too much reliance on this Court's decision in Aubin v Petrone, 2020 ABCA 13, paras 21-24, 33-36, 40, 59, 68, 100 Alta LR (6th) 10. Aubin is a post-judgment decision about how a family property judgment can be executed when family wealth is tied up in a corporation, and one spouse, the directing will and mind of the corporation, is purposely blocking payment. Aubin is not a case of piercing the corporate veil in order to make the shareholder liable for the obligations of the corporation. If anything, it is the opposite: an attempt to make the corporation liable for the family law obligation of the shareholder. Nor is it a case of concurrent liability by the shareholder and the corporation in tort. It involves a sui generis situation, and has little application outside family law. However, before judgment is obtained, the principles of piercing the corporate veil and the concurrent liability in tort apply equally in family law. As indicated in Driving Force, para 54, Aubin has "little to offer outside that context", as it was coloured by considerations of corporate oppression.

[44] As a result, the trial judge's conclusion that "personal liability should attach to Metcalfe in these circumstances" was unprincipled and unjustified, as the route to that conclusion was in error.

VII. Conclusion

[45] The appeal is allowed. Mr Metcalfe is not jointly liable for the negligence of Tru-Square.

2008 SCC 61 (CanLII)

relevant in this case. A racemate is a substance containing equal amounts of two structurally different compounds, called the dextro-rotatory isomer and the levo-rotatory isomer. S also holds the subsequent '777 patent which discloses and claims clopidogrel bisulfate, marketed by S under the trade name of Plavix as an anti-coagulant that exhibits platelet aggregation inhibiting activity. Clopidogrel is the dextro-rotatory isomer of the racemate that was selected from and is encompassed by the compounds claimed in the '875 patent, and is less toxic and better tolerated than the levo-rotatory isomer and the racemate. In 2003, A, a generic manufacturer served a notice of allegation on S to obtain a notice of compliance from the Minister of Health in order to market its generic version of Plavix, claiming that it would not infringe S's patent for Plavix because the '777 patent was invalid on the grounds of anticipation, obviousness and double patenting. S successfully sought an order in the Federal Court prohibiting the Minister from issuing the notice of compliance to A on the ground that the generic version of Plavix did infringe the '777 patent. The Federal Court of Appeal upheld the decision. The issue is whether selection patents are invalid in principle or on the facts of this case, on the grounds of anticipation, obviousness and double patenting.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

In the field of chemical patents, originating or genus patents are based on the discovery of a new invention, namely, a reaction or compound, while selection patents are for compounds chosen from the compounds described in the originating patent. Selection patents do not differ in nature from any other patent, but in order to be valid, the selected compound must be novel and possess a substantial advantage to be secured or disadvantage to be avoided. [9-10]

A system of genus and selection patents is acceptable in principle and does not necessarily involve anticipation and therefore invalidity. The real question is whether, on the facts of this case, the particular selection patent has been anticipated. This means that, having regard to s. 27(1) of the Patent Act, the claimed invention has already been made or publicly disclosed. Here, the applications judge set the bar for proving anticipation too high and overstated the stringency of the test by requiring that the "exact invention" must have already been made and publicly disclosed. Rather, for a successful anticipation claim, a two-step approach should be adopted whereby the requirements of "prior disclosure" and "enablement" should be considered separately and proven. For prior disclosure, est le racémate visé en l'espèce. Un racémate est une substance constituée à parts égales de deux composés aux structures différentes appelés isomère dextrogyre et isomère lévogyre. S est aussi titulaire du brevet 777, qui divulgue et revendique le bisulfate de clopidogrel, qu'elle commercialise sous l'appellation Plavix comme anticoagulant inhibiteur de l'agrégation plaquettaire. Le clopidogrel est l'isomère dextrogyre du racémate qui a été sélectionné à partir du brevet 875 et qui est visé par les revendications de ce dernier, et il est moins toxique et mieux toléré que l'isomère lévogyre et le racémate. En 2003, A, un fabricant de médicaments génériques, a signifié à S un avis d'allégation pour obtenir du ministre de la Santé un avis de conformité afin de commercialiser sa version générique du Plavix. Il alléguait que le générique ne contreferait pas le brevet de S pour le Plavix, car le brevet 777 était invalide pour cause d'antériorité, d'évidence et de double protection. S a obtenu de la Cour fédérale une ordonnance interdisant au ministre de la Santé de délivrer un avis de conformité à A au motif que la version générique du Plavix contrefaisait son brevet 777. La Cour d'appel fédérale a confirmé la décision. La question qui se pose est celle de savoir si le brevet de sélection est invalide en soi ou en l'espèce pour cause d'antériorité, d'évidence et de double protection.

Arrêt : Le pourvoi est rejeté.

Dans le domaine des produits chimiques, le brevet d'origine ou de genre se fonde sur la découverte d'une invention nouvelle, à savoir une réaction ou un composé, alors que le brevet de sélection a pour objet des composés choisis à partir de ceux décrits dans le brevet d'origine. Le brevet de sélection ne diffère pas en soi de tout autre brevet, mais sa validité exige que le composé sélectionné soit nouveau et permette d'obtenir un avantage important ou d'éviter un inconvénient important. [9-10]

L'existence d'un système de brevets de genre et de sélection est admise en soi et n'implique pas nécessairement l'antériorité et, partant, l'invalidité. La véritable question qui se pose est celle de savoir si, au vu des faits de l'espèce, le brevet de sélection en cause était antériorisé, c'est-à-dire, compte tenu du par. 27(1) de la Loi sur les brevets, que l'invention revendiquée avait déjà été réalisée ou rendue publique. Dans la présente affaire, le juge de première instance a rendu trop difficile la preuve de l'antériorité et il a exagéré la rigueur du critère de l'antériorité en considérant que l'« invention exacte » devait déjà avoir été faite et avoir été rendue publique. Pour établir l'antériorité, il faut plutôt appliquer un critère à deux volets exigeant la preuve des éléments distincts que sont la « divulgation antérieure »

the genus patent must disclose subject matter which, if performed, would necessarily result in infringement of that patent. At this stage, the person skilled in the art is reading the prior patent to understand whether it discloses the special advantages of the second invention. No trial and error is permitted. If in reading the genus patent, there is no discovery of the special advantages of the selection patent, the genus patent does not anticipate the selection patent and the disclosure requirement to prove anticipation, as in this case, fails. For "enablement", the person skilled in the art must have been able to perform the invention without undue burden. The question at this stage of the test is how much trial and error or experimentation is permitted. If an inventive step were required to get to the invention of the second patent, the specification of the first patent would not have provided enabling disclosure. The entire prior genus patent must provide enough information to allow a person skilled in the art to perform or make the selected subsequently claimed invention without "undue burden". The skilled person may use his or her common general knowledge of the relevant art at the relevant time to supplement information contained in the prior genus patent and may conduct routine trials without being considered an undue burden, but prolonged or arduous trial and error experiments would not be considered routine. In this case, the allegation that the '777 patent is invalid on the basis of anticipation must fail. Twenty-one examples from the '875 patent were made and tested, one of which was the relevant racemate. There was no evidence that a person skilled in the art would know, from reading the '875 patent, the specific beneficial properties associated with the more active dextro-rotatory isomer and that it would be less toxic than the racemate or levo-rotatory isomer or any of the other compounds made and tested. Since the '875 patent did not teach these special advantages, the invention of the '777 patent was not disclosed and was therefore not anticipated. Regarding enablement, the evidence with respect to trial and error and the methods of separating the racemate into its isomers, indicates that the identification of clopidogrel, its bisulfate salt and their advantageous properties required extensive investigation over a period of months. However, it was not necessary to determine the question of enablement in view of the finding that there was no disclosure of the '777 invention in the '875 patent. [18-20] [23-25] [31-33] [37-38] [40-42] [46-50] [116]

The allegation that the '777 patent is invalid on the basis of obviousness must also fail. Obviousness et le « caractère réalisable ». Pour les besoins de la divulgation antérieure, le brevet de genre doit divulguer ce qui, une fois réalisé, emporterait nécessairement sa contrefaçon. À cette étape, la personne versée dans l'art lit le mémoire descriptif du brevet antérieur pour déterminer s'il divulgue les avantages particuliers de l'invention subséquente. Les essais successifs ne sont pas admis. Lorsque la lecture du brevet de genre ne permet pas de connaître les avantages particuliers de l'invention visée par le brevet de sélection, comme c'est le cas en l'espèce, l'antériorité n'est pas établie. En ce qui concerne le « caractère réalisable », la personne versée dans l'art doit avoir été en mesure d'exécuter l'invention sans trop de difficultés. La question qui se pose dès lors est celle de savoir dans quelle mesure le caractère réalisable admet les essais successifs. Lorsqu'une étape inventive était nécessaire pour parvenir à l'invention du deuxième brevet, le mémoire descriptif du premier brevet ne rendait pas l'invention réalisable. Le brevet de genre antérieur, considéré dans son intégralité, doit renfermer suffisamment de renseignements pour permettre à la personne versée dans l'art d'exécuter ou de réaliser sans « trop de difficultés » l'invention revendiquée dans le brevet subséquent. La personne versée dans l'art peut faire appel à ses connaissances générales courantes dans le domaine en cause, au moment considéré, pour compléter les données du brevet antérieur. Elle peut effectuer des essais courants sans que l'on considère la difficulté excessive, mais les essais successifs longs et ardus ne sont pas tenus pour des essais courants. En l'espèce, l'allégation d'invalidité du brevet 777 pour cause d'antériorité doit être rejetée. Vingt et un composés visés par le brevet 875 ont été synthétisés et analysés, et l'un d'eux était le racémate en cause. Aucun élément n'établissait qu'en prenant connaissance du brevet 875, une personne versée dans l'art aurait su que l'isomère dextrogyre plus actif présentait des avantages particuliers et qu'il serait moins toxique que le racémate, l'isomère lévogyre ou n'importe lequel des autres composés synthétisés et analysés. Puisque le brevet 875 ne divulguait pas ces avantages particuliers, l'invention correspondant au brevet 777 n'avait pas été divulguée et, de ce fait, elle n'était pas antériorisée. Pour ce qui est du caractère réalisable, les éléments relatifs aux essais successifs et aux méthodes permettant d'isoler les isomères du racémate prouvent que la découverte du clopidogrel, de son bisulfate et de leurs avantages ont nécessité des mois de recherche approfondie. Étant donné la conclusion que le brevet 875 n'avait pas divulgué l'objet du brevet 777, il n'était cependant pas nécessaire de trancher la question du caractère réalisable. [18-20] [23-25] [31-33] [37-38] [40-42] [46-50] [116]

L'allégation selon laquelle le brevet 777 est invalide pour cause d'évidence doit elle aussi être rejetée.

is largely concerned with how a skilled worker would have acted in the light of the prior art. An obviousness inquiry should follow a four-step approach. First, the notional "person skilled in the art" and that person's relevant common general knowledge must be identified. Here, that person is a trained pharmachemist. Second, the inventive concept of the claim in question must be determined or construed. The inventive concept of the claims in the '777 patent is that it is a compound useful in inhibiting platelet aggregation which has greater therapeutic effect and less toxicity than the other compounds of the '875 patent. Third, the differences, if any, that exist between the matters cited as forming part of the "state of the art" and the inventive concept of the claim or the claim as construed must be identified. There is no disclosure in the '875 patent of the specific beneficial properties associated with the dextro-rotatory isomer of this racemate or its bisulfate salt, in contrast to the '777 patent, which claims the invention of the dextro-rotatory isomer of the racemate, clopidogrel, and its bisulfate salt, discloses their beneficial properties over the levo-rotatory isomer and the racemate, and expressly describes how to separate the racemate into its isomers. Fourth, a court must consider whether, viewed without any knowledge of the alleged invention as claimed, those differences constitute steps which would have been obvious to the person skilled in the art or whether they require any degree of inventiveness. It is at this final step that the issue of "obvious to try" will arise and the nature of the invention in this case is such as to warrant this test. For a finding that an invention was "obvious to try", there must be evidence to convince a judge on a balance of probabilities that it was more or less self-evident to try to obtain the invention. Mere possibility that something might turn up is not enough. Here, when the relevant factors are considered, the invention was not self-evident from the prior art and common general knowledge in order to satisfy the test. While there were five well-known methods to separate this racemate into its isomers, there was no evidence that a person skilled in the art would have known which of the five known separation techniques would work with this racemate. Further, S spent millions of dollars and several years developing the racemate up to the point of preliminary human clinic trials before it was discovered that the dextro-rotatory isomer was active and non-toxic. As the '875 patent did not differentiate on the basis of efficacy and toxicity, what to select or omit was not then self-evident to a person skilled in the art. It was also not self-evident from the '875 patent or common general knowledge what the beneficial properties of the dextro-rotatory isomer of this racemate or its bisulfate salt would be and therefore what was being tried ought to work. The course of L'évidence tient en grande partie à la manière dont l'homme du métier aurait agi à la lumière de l'antériorité. L'examen relatif à l'évidence comporte quatre étapes. Premièrement, il faut identifier la « personne versée dans l'art » et déterminer ses connaissances générales courantes pertinentes. En l'espèce, la personne versée dans l'art est le chimiste pharmaceutique de formation. Deuxièmement, il faut définir l'idée originale de la revendication en cause, au besoin par voie d'interprétation. L'idée originale à la base des revendications du brevet 777 est un antiplaquettaire à l'effet thérapeutique supérieur et à la toxicité moindre comparativement aux autres composés couverts par le brevet 875. Troisièmement, il faut recenser les différences, s'il en est, entre ce qui ferait partie de « l'état de la technique » et l'idée originale qui sous-tend la revendication ou son interprétation. Le brevet 875 ne divulgue aucun avantage particulier associé à l'isomère dextrogyre du racémate en cause, ou de son bisulfate, contrairement au brevet 777, qui revendique l'invention de l'isomère dextrogyre du racémate, le clopidogrel et de son bisulfate, divulgue leurs avantages par rapport à l'isomère lévogyre et au racémate, et énonce expressément le procédé de séparation des isomères du racémate. Quatrièmement, le tribunal doit se demander, abstraction faite de toute connaissance de l'invention revendiquée, si ces différences constituent des étapes évidentes pour la personne versée dans l'art ou si elles dénotent quelque inventivité. C'est à cette dernière étape qu'il faut se demander si le critère de l'« essai allant de soi » s'applique et, en l'espèce, la nature de l'invention en cause justifie son application. Pour conclure qu'une invention résulte d'un « essai allant de soi », le tribunal doit être convaincu selon la prépondérance des probabilités qu'il allait plus ou moins de soi de tenter d'arriver à l'invention. La seule possibilité d'obtenir quelque chose ne suffit pas. En l'occurrence, compte tenu de tous les éléments pertinents, l'invention n'était pas évidente au regard de l'antériorité et des connaissances générales courantes de manière à satisfaire au critère. Cinq techniques connues permettaient d'isoler les isomères du racémate, mais rien n'établissait qu'une personne versée dans l'art aurait su laquelle allait fonctionner pour le racémate en cause. De plus, S a consacré des millions de dollars et des années de travaux à la mise au point du racémate puis à la tenue d'essais cliniques préliminaires chez l'humain avant qu'on ne découvre l'activité et la non-toxicité de l'isomère dextrogyre. Le brevet 875 n'établissait pas de distinction en fonction de l'efficacité et de la toxicité, de sorte que ce qu'il y avait lieu de retenir ou d'omettre n'était alors pas évident pour la personne versée dans l'art. Ni le brevet 875 ni les connaissances générales courantes ne rendaient évidents les avantages de l'isomère dextrogyre conduct and the time involved throughout demonstrate that the advantage of the dextro-rotatory isomer was not quickly or easily predictable. [66-68] [70] [74] [78-81] [85-86] [90-93]

Finally, the challenge to selection patents based on the ground of double patenting is not well founded. Strategies that attempt to extend the time limit of exclusivity of a patent may be contrary to the objectives of the Patent Act, depending on the circumstances, but a generalized concern about evergreening is not a justification for an attack on the doctrine of selection patents. A selection patent may be sought by a party other than the inventor or owner of the original genus patent so that evergreening does not arise. In addition, selection patents encourage improvements over the subject matter of the original genus patent because that selection does something better than or different from what was claimed in the genus patent. There is no "same invention" double patenting because the claims of the '875 and '777 patents were not identical or coterminous and the former is broader than the latter. Further, as the claims in the '777 patent reflect a patentably distinct compound from the compounds in the '875 patent, it is not invalid for "obviousness" double patenting. du racémate ou de son bisulfate, de sorte qu'il n'était pas évident que l'essai serait fructueux. Les efforts et le temps consacrés tout du long démontrent qu'il n'était pas possible de prédire rapidement ou aisément l'avantage que présentait l'isomère dextrogyre. [66-68] [70] [74] [78-81] [85-86] [90-93]

Enfin, l'allégation selon laquelle les brevets de sélection sont invalides pour cause de double protection n'est pas fondée. Les stratégies visant à accroître la durée du monopole conféré par un brevet peuvent aller à l'encontre des objectifs de la Loi sur les brevets, selon les circonstances, mais cette préoccupation générale liée à la perpétuation des brevets ne justifie pas la remise en question des brevets de sélection comme tels. L'obtention d'un brevet de sélection peut intéresser une autre personne que l'inventeur ou le titulaire du brevet de genre d'origine, auquel cas la question de la perpétuation ne se pose pas. En outre, le brevet de sélection favorise le perfectionnement de l'objet du brevet de genre d'origine en ce que la sélection permet d'obtenir quelque chose de mieux ou de différent par rapport à ce qui est revendiqué dans le brevet initial. Il n'y a pas de double brevet relatif à la « même invention », car les revendications des brevets 875 et 777 ne sont pas identiques et les revendications du premier brevet ont une portée plus grande que celles du second. De plus, comme le brevet 777 revendique un composé brevetable distinct de celui visé par les revendications du brevet 875, il ne saurait être invalide pour cause de double brevet relatif à une « évidence ». I. Introduction

[1] This appeal raises questions relating to the validity of what are known as selection patents. In the context of chemical compounds, in general terms, a selection patent is one whose subject matter (compounds) is a fraction of a larger known class of compounds which was the subject matter of a prior patent.

[2] The appellant ("Apotex") challenges the validity of the selection patent in this case on the grounds of anticipation, obviousness and double patenting. I would dismiss the appeal.

II. Facts

[3] The parties have accepted that the Sanofi respondents ("Sanofi") are the relevant holders of patent 1,194,875 ('875 patent). This patent disclosed a genus or class of compounds useful in inhibiting platelet aggregation activity in the blood which is important in treating coronary artery, peripheral vascular and cerebral vascular diseases. This genus patent discloses over 250,000 possible different compounds useful for this purpose. One of the compounds is a racemate described as methyl alpha-5 (4,5,6,7-tetrahydro (3, 2-c)-thieno pyridyl) (2-chlorophenyl)-acetate (the "racemate").

[4] A racemate is a substance containing equal amounts of two structurally different compounds,

LE JUGE ROTHSTEIN —

I. Introduction

[1] Le présent pourvoi soulève des questions relatives à la validité de ce qu'on appelle un brevet de sélection. Dans le domaine des composés chimiques, l'objet d'un tel brevet s'entend généralement d'un composé faisant partie d'une catégorie plus grande visée par un brevet antérieur.

[2] L'appelante (« Apotex ») soutient que le brevet de sélection considéré en l'espèce est invalide pour cause d'antériorité, d'évidence et de double protection. Je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

II. Les faits

[3] Les parties reconnaissent que l'intimée (« Sanofi ») est titulaire du brevet 1,194,875 (« brevet 875 »), qui divulgue un genre ou une catégorie de composés inhibant l'agrégation des plaquettes dans le sang, ce qui joue un rôle important dans le traitement des coronaropathies, des artériopathies périphériques et des maladies vasculaires cérébrales. Ce brevet de genre divulgue plus de 250 000 composés possibles ayant cet effet antiplaquettaire, dont le racémate alpha-5 (4,5,6,7-tétrahydro (3,2-c) thiénopyridyl)(2-chlorophényl)-acétate de méthyle (« racémate »).

[4] Un racémate est une substance constituée à parts égales de deux composés aux structures called enantiomers or optical isomers. The two isomers, the dextro-rotatory isomer and the levo-rotatory isomer, are mirror images of each other and rotate plane-polarized light in opposite directions.

[5] The parties have accepted that Sanofi is also the relevant holder of subsequent Canadian patent 1,336,777 ('777 patent), the patent in suit. It discloses and claims clopidogrel bisulfate, which is marketed by Sanofi under the trade name of Plavix as an anti-coagulant that inhibits platelet aggregation activity in the blood.

[6] Clopidogrel bisulfate is encompassed within the scope of the claims in the '875 patent. Clopidogrel is the dextro-rotatory isomer of the racemate, having beneficial properties over both the racemate and the levo-rotatory isomer. The dextro-rotatory isomer exhibits a platelet aggregation inhibiting activity and is less toxic and better tolerated than the levo-rotatory isomer and racemate. The salts of the dextro-rotatory isomer, such as clopidogrel bisulfate, have a better therapeutic index than the salts of the racemic mixture and in fact, the levo-rotatory isomer exhibits almost no platelet aggregation inhibiting activity, and its toxicity is markedly higher than that of the dextro-rotatory isomer.

[7] On March 10, 2003, Apotex served a notice of allegation under the Patented Medicines (Notice of Compliance) Regulations, SOR/93-133 ("NOC Regulations"), on Sanofi for the purpose of obtaining a notice of compliance pursuant to s. C.08.004 of the Food and Drug Regulations, C.R.C. 1978, c. 870, from the Minister of Health for a generic version of Plavix. The basis of Apotex's notice of allegation was that it would not infringe Sanofi's '777 patent for Plavix because the '777 patent was invalid on account of anticipation, obviousness and double patenting. On April 28, 2003, Sanofi initiated proceedings under s. 6(1) of the NOC Regulations in the Federal Court seeking an order prohibiting the Minister of Health from issuing a notice of compliance to Apotex on the grounds that its generic version of Plavix would infringe the '777 patent. The Federal Court granted the order of différentes appelés énantiomères ou isomères optiques. Les deux isomères, le dextrogyre et le lévogyre, sont l'image l'un de l'autre dans un miroir et font dévier le plan de la lumière polarisée dans des directions opposées.

[5] Les parties reconnaissent que Sanofi est aussi titulaire du brevet canadien 1,336,777 (« brevet 777 ») — l'objet du litige — délivré subséquemment. Le brevet divulgue et revendique le bisulfate de clopidogrel, qui est commercialisé sous l'appellation Plavix comme anticoagulant inhibiteur de l'agrégation plaquettaire.

[6] Le bisulfate de clopidogrel, soit l'isomère dextrogyre du racémate, est visé par les revendications du brevet 875 et présente des avantages par rapport au racémate et à l'isomère lévogyre. Non seulement l'isomère dextrogyre inhibe l'agrégation plaquettaire, mais il est aussi moins toxique et mieux toléré que l'isomère lévogyre et le racémate. Comme le bisulfate de clopidogrel, ses sels sont associés à un meilleur indice thérapeutique que les sels du mélange racémique. En fait, l'isomère lévogyre n'inhibe presque pas l'agrégation des plaquettes et il est nettement plus toxique que l'isomère dextrogyre.

prohibition ((2005), 271 F.T.R. 159, 2005 FC 390). The Federal Court of Appeal dismissed Apotex's appeal ((2006), 282 D.L.R. (4th) 179, 2006 FCA 421).

III. Selection Patents

[8] This appeal requires the Court to determine whether selection patents are invalid in principle or on the facts of this case on the grounds of anticipation, obviousness and double patenting.

[9] The locus classicus describing selection patents is the decision of Maugham J. in In re I. G. Farbenindustrie A. G.'s Patents (1930), 47 R.P.C. 289 (Ch. D.). At p. 321, he explained that in the field of chemical patents (which would of course include pharmaceutical compounds), there are often two "sharply divided classes". The first class of patents, which he called originating patents, are based on an originating invention, namely, the discovery of a new reaction or a new compound. The second class comprises patents based on a selection of compounds from those described in general terms and claimed in the originating patent. Maugham J. cautioned that the selected compounds cannot have been made before, or the selection patent "would fail for want of novelty". But if the selected compound is "novel" and "possess[es] a special property of an unexpected character", the required "inventive" step would be satisfied (p. 321). At p. 322, Maugham J. stated that a selection patent "does not in its nature differ from any other patent".

[10] While not exhaustively defining a selection patent, he set out (at pp. 322-23) three conditions that must be satisfied for a selection patent to be valid.

1. There must be a substantial advantage to be secured or disadvantage to be avoided by the use of the selected members.

2. The whole of the selected members (subject to "a few exceptions here and there") possess the advantage in question.

([2005] A.C.F. nº 482 (QL), 2005 CF 390). La Cour d'appel fédérale a rejeté l'appel d'Apotex ([2006] A.C.F. nº 1945 (QL), 2006 CAF 421).

III. Les brevets de sélection

[8] Dans le présent pourvoi, notre Cour doit déterminer si le brevet de sélection est invalide en soi ou en l'espèce pour cause d'antériorité, d'évidence et de double protection.

[9] La description classique du brevet de sélection figure dans l'arrêt In re I. G. Farbenindustrie A. G.'s Patents (1930), 47 R.P.C. 289 (Ch. D.), où le juge Maugham explique à la p. 321 que les brevets portant sur des produits chimiques (dont bien sûr les composés pharmaceutiques) se divisent souvent en deux [TRADUCTION] « catégories nettement distinctes ». La première, celle des brevets d'origine, formée des brevets protégeant une invention source, à savoir la découverte d'une nouvelle réaction ou d'un nouveau composé. La seconde catégorie, celle des brevets visant une sélection des composés décrits en termes généraux et revendiqués dans le brevet d'origine. Le juge Maugham précise que les composés sélectionnés ne doivent pas avoir été réalisés auparavant, sinon le brevet de sélection [TRADUCTION] « ne satisfait pas à l'exigence de nouveauté ». Cependant, le composé sélectionné qui est « nouveau » et qui « possède une propriété particulière imprévue » remplit l'exigence de l'étape inventive. Le juge Maugham ajoute à la p. 322 que le brevet de sélection [TRADUCTION] « ne diffère pas en soi de tout autre brevet ».

[10] Le juge Maugham ne définit pas le brevet de sélection de manière exhaustive, mais il énonce trois conditions essentielles à sa validité (p. 322-323).

1. L'utilisation des éléments sélectionnés permet d'obtenir un avantage important ou d'éviter un inconvénient important.

2. Tous les éléments sélectionnés (« à quelques exceptions près ») présentent cet avantage.

2008 SCC 61 (CanLII)

3. The selection must be in respect of a quality of a special character peculiar to the selected group. If further research revealed a small number of unselected compounds possessing the same advantage, that would not invalidate the selection patent. However, if research showed that a larger number of unselected compounds possessed the same advantage, the quality of the compound claimed in the selection patent would not be of a special character.

[11] Although much has been written about selection patents since I. G. Farbenindustrie, Maugham J.'s analysis is consistently referred to and is well accepted. I find it is a useful starting point for the analysis to be conducted in this case.

IV. The Regulatory Scheme Under Which the Matter Proceeded

[12] At the outset, it is appropriate to refer to the words of Judson J. for this Court in Commissioner of Patents v. Farbwerke Hoechst Aktiengesellschaft Vormals Meister Lucius & Bruning, [1964] S.C.R. 49, at p. 57:

> There is no inherent common law right to a patent. An inventor gets his patent according to the terms of the Patent Act, no more and no less.

The most recent reference to the law of patents being wholly statutory are the words of Lord Walker in Synthon B.V. v. SmithKline Beecham plc, [2006] 1 All E.R. 685, [2005] UKHL 59, at paras. 57-58:

> The law of patents is wholly statutory, and has a surprisingly long history. . . . In the interpretation and application of patent statutes judge-made doctrine has over the years done much to clarify the abstract generalities of the statutes and to secure uniformity in their application.
> Nevertheless it is salutary to be reminded, from time to time, that the general concepts which are the common currency of patent lawyers are founded on a statutory text, and cannot have any other firm foundation.

3. La sélection vise une qualité particulière propre aux composés en cause. Une recherche plus poussée révélant qu'un petit nombre de composés non sélectionnés présentent le même avantage ne permettrait pas d'invalider le brevet de sélection. Toutefois, si la recherche démontrait qu'un grand nombre de composés non sélectionnés présentent le même avantage, la qualité du composé revendiqué dans le brevet de sélection ne serait pas particulière.

[11] Même si les brevets de sélection ont fait couler beaucoup d'encre depuis la décision I. G. Farbenindustrie, les principes dégagés par le juge Maugham sont régulièrement cités et reconnus. J'estime qu'ils offrent un bon point de départ pour l'analyse que requiert le présent pourvoi.

IV. Le cadre législatif applicable en l'espèce

[12] Il convient d'abord de citer le juge Judson s'exprimant au nom de notre Cour dans l'arrêt Commissioner of Patents c. Farbwerke Hoechst Artiengesellschaft Vormals Meister Lucius & Bruning, [1964] R.C.S. 49, p. 57 :

> [TRADUCTION] Il n'existe pas, en common law, de droit inhérent à un brevet. L'inventeur obtient son brevet conformément à la Loi sur les brevets. Un point c'est tout.

L'affirmation la plus récente voulant que le droit des brevets soit entièrement issu de la loi est celle de lord Walker dans l'arrêt Synthon B.V. c. SmithKline Beecham plc, [2006] 1 All E.R. 685, [2005] UKHL 59, par. 57-58 :

> [TRADUCTION] L'origine du droit des brevets est purement législative et étonnamment ancienne. [. . .] Eu égard à l'interprétation et à l'application des dispositions législatives sur les brevets, la doctrine jurisprudentielle a largement contribué au fil des ans à clarifier les notions abstraites des lois et à en assurer l'application uniforme.
>
> Il est tout de même salutaire de se faire rappeler de temps à autre que les concepts généraux auxquels se réfèrent les avocats spécialisés en droit des brevets prennent appui sur un texte législatif et ne sauraient avoir aucun autre véritable fondement.

2008 SCC 61 (CanLII)

I therefore turn to the regulatory scheme applicable in this case.

[13] The procedure under the NOC Regulations pursuant to which a manufacturer of drugs may apply to the Minister of Health for a notice of compliance is well known. A manufacturer, usually a generic manufacturer, wishes to compare its drug with that of a patent holder for which a patent list has been submitted to the Minister by the patent holder. The generic manufacturer's purpose is to establish the safety and efficacy of its drug for the purposes of securing marketing approval from the Minister. The process of comparison saves the generic competitor time and resources. However, the Minister will not issue a notice of compliance unless the patent on the comparator drug has expired, is invalid, or the generic's product will not otherwise infringe the patent. Thus the NOC Regulations create a connection between government approval to market a generic drug and the issue of patent validity and infringement.

[14] Section 5(1)(b) of the NOC Regulations states that the generic manufacturer, in its submission for a notice of compliance, may allege that the patent has expired, is not valid or will not be infringed. The patent holder may then apply to the Federal Court for an order prohibiting the Minister from issuing a notice of compliance to the generic manufacturer until after expiration of the patent that is the subject of the notice of allegation. The court will grant the prohibition order if it finds that the allegation of invalidity, expiry or non-infringement is not justified. If it finds the allegation justified, it will dismiss the application for prohibition and the Minister may then issue a notice of compliance to the generic manufacturer if all other requirements are met.

[15] The NOC Regulations do not provide guidance about how an allegation of "not valid" as stated in s. 5(1)(b)(iii) is to be considered and determined by the court. For this purpose, reference must be made to the relevant version of the Patent Act, which is R.S.C. 1985, c. P-4, applicable to patent applications filed prior to October 1, 1989.

Je passe donc au cadre législatif applicable en l'espèce.

[13] La procédure réglementaire permettant l'obtention — généralement par un fabricant de médicaments génériques — d'un avis de conformité délivré par le ministre de la Santé est bien connue. Le fabricant cherche à comparer son médicament avec celui d'un breveté pour lequel ce dernier a déposé une liste de brevets. L'objectif du fabricant est d'établir l'innocuité et l'efficacité de son produit et d'obtenir du ministre l'autorisation de le commercialiser. Ce processus de comparaison épargne temps et ressources au concurrent générique. Cependant, le ministre ne délivre un avis de conformité que si le brevet du produit de comparaison est expiré ou invalide ou que le produit générique ne le contrefait pas par ailleurs. Le Règlement AC lie donc l'autorisation de commercialiser un médicament générique à la validité d'un brevet et à sa contrefaçon.

[14] L'alinéa 5(1)b) du Règlement AC dispose que dans sa demande d'avis de conformité, le fabricant d'un générique peut alléguer que le brevet est expiré, qu'il n'est pas valide ou qu'il ne sera pas contrefait. Le breveté peut ensuite demander à la Cour fédérale de rendre une ordonnance interdisant au ministre de délivrer un avis de conformité au fabricant du générique avant l'expiration du brevet visé par l'avis d'allégation. La Cour fédérale fait droit à la demande lorsqu'elle conclut que l'allégation d'invalidité, d'expiration ou d'absence de contrefaçon n'est pas fondée. Lorsqu'elle conclut au fondement de l'allégation, elle rejette la demande, et le ministre peut alors délivrer un avis de conformité au fabricant du générique qui satisfait par ailleurs aux exigences.

[15] Le Règlement AC ne précise pas à l'issue de quelle démarche la Cour fédérale se prononce sur l'allégation d'invalidité du brevet formulée en application du sous-al. 5(1)b)(iii). Il faut donc s'en remettre à la version de la Loi sur les brevets applicable aux demandes de brevet présentées avant le 1er octobre 1989, soit celle figurant dans les L.R.C. 1985, ch. P-4.

[16] The application for the '875 patent was filed in 1983. The patent was issued in 1985 and expired in 2002. The application for the '777 patent was filed in 1988. The patent was issued in 1995 and unless found to be invalid, will expire in 2012.

[17] The use of the term "not valid" in s. 5 of the NOC Regulations parallels what would otherwise be a defence to an infringement action referred to in s. 59 of the Act:

> The defendant, in any action for infringement of a patent may plead as matter of defence any fact or default which by this Act or by law renders the patent void, and the court shall take cognizance of that pleading and of the relevant facts and decide accordingly.

The NOC Regulations are promulgated under s. 55.2(4) of the Act, and it seems apparent that the determination of the invalidity of a patent must be based on "any fact or default which by this Act or by law renders the patent void". In this case, Apotex relies on anticipation, obviousness and double patenting to allege that the '777 patent is invalid. These allegations implicate both the Act and the judge-made doctrine based on the Act.

V. Anticipation

(a) Relevant Legislation

[18] For purposes of anticipation, it is necessary to have regard to s. 27 of the Act which sets forth the basic conditions necessary for obtaining a patent. The invention must not have been previously known or used nor described in any patent or other publication printed in any country more than two years before the filing of the patent application and must not have been in public use or sale in Canada more than two years prior to the filing of the patent application. Section 27(1) provided:

> 27. (1) Subject to this section, any inventor or legal representative of an inventor of an invention that was
> (a) not known or used by any other person before he invented it,

[16] Dans le cas du brevet 875, la demande a été déposée en 1983. Le brevet a été délivré en 1985 et il a expiré en 2002. En ce qui concerne le brevet 777, la demande a été déposée en 1988, et le brevet a été délivré en 1995. À moins qu'il ne soit frappé de nullité, il expirera en 2012.

[17] L'invalidité visée à l'art. 5 du Règlement AC doit être mise en parallèle avec ce qui constitue par ailleurs un moyen de défense dans une action en contrefaçon suivant l'art. 59 de la Loi, dont voici le texte :

> Dans toute action en contrefaçon de brevet, le défendeur peut invoquer comme moyen de défense tout fait ou manquement qui, d'après la présente loi ou en droit, entraîne la nullité du brevet; le tribunal prend connaissance de cette défense et des faits pertinents et statue en conséquence.

Le Règlement AC a été pris en vertu du par. 55.2(4) de la Loi et il appert que la déclaration d'invalidité d'un brevet doit s'appuyer sur « tout fait ou manquement qui, d'après la présente loi ou en droit, entraîne la nullité du brevet ». Dans la présente affaire, Apotex allègue que le brevet 777 est invalide pour cause d'antériorité, d'évidence et de double protection. Ces allégations font jouer tant la Loi que la doctrine jurisprudentielle qui en est issue.

V. L'antériorité

a) Dispositions législatives pertinentes

[18] Se prononcer sur l'antériorité exige que l'on se penche sur l'art. 27 de la Loi, qui énonce les principales conditions d'obtention du brevet. L'invention ne doit avoir été ni connue ou utilisée par une autre personne, ni décrite dans un brevet ou une publication imprimée dans quelque pays plus de deux ans avant le dépôt de la demande de brevet, ni en usage public ou en vente au Canada plus de deux ans avant le dépôt de la demande de brevet. Le paragraphe 27(1) prévoyait :

> 27. (1) Sous réserve des autres dispositions du présent article, l'auteur de toute invention ou le représentant légal de l'auteur d'une invention peut, sur présentation au commissaire d'une pétition exposant les faits, appelée dans la présente loi le « dépôt de la demande », et

2008 SCC 61 (CanLII)

(b) not described in any patent or in any publication printed in Canada or in any other country more than two years before presentation of the petition hereunder mentioned, and

(c) not in public use or on sale in Canada for more than two years prior to his application in Canada, may, on presentation to the Commissioner of a petition setting out the facts, in this Act termed the filing in the application, and on compliance with all other requirements of this Act, obtain a patent granting to him an exclusive property in the invention.

[19] It is with s. 27 in mind that the law of anticipation must be considered. Apotex's arguments based on anticipation are not that the applications judge erred in his analysis of the law of anticipation or its application to the facts of this case. Rather, Apotex implies that the current understanding of the law sets the bar for proving anticipation too high and that the acceptance of a system of genus and selection patents necessarily, or at least on the facts of this case, involves anticipation and therefore invalidity. I would reject the broader objection. A system of genus and selection patents is acceptable in principle, on the line of authority stemming from I. G. Farbenindustrie. The real question is whether, on the facts of this case, the particular selection patent has been anticipated.

(b) Reasons of the Applications Judge

[20] In his reasons after referring to s. 27(1) of the Act, the applications judge defined anticipation as meaning "that the exact invention had already been made and publicly disclosed" (para. 55). Shore J. cited this Court's decision in Free World Trust v. Électro Santé Inc., [2000] 2 S.C.R. 1024, 2000 SCC 66, at para. 26, which approved of the test for anticipation described in Beloit Canada Ltd. v. Valmet OY (1986), 8 C.P.R. (3d) 289 (F.C.A.), at p. 297:

One must, in effect, be able to look at a prior, single publication and find in it all the information which, for practical purposes, is needed to produce the claimed invention without the exercise of any inventive skill. The prior publication must contain so clear a direction that a skilled person reading and following it would in every case and without possibility of error be led to en se conformant à toutes les autres prescriptions de la présente loi, obtenir un brevet qui lui accorde l'exclusive propriété d'une invention qui n'était pas :

a) connue ou utilisée par une autre personne avant que lui-même l'ait faite;

b) décrite dans un brevet ou dans une publication imprimée au Canada ou dans tout autre pays plus de deux ans avant la présentation de la pétition ci-après mentionnée;

c) en usage public ou en vente au Canada plus de deux ans avant le dépôt de sa demande au Canada.

[19] C'est en fonction de l'art. 27 qu'il convient de définir le critère de l'antériorité. Apotex ne soutient pas que le juge de première instance a commis une erreur dans l'interprétation du critère ou dans son application aux faits de l'espèce. Elle laisse plutôt entendre que l'interprétation actuelle du critère rend trop difficile la preuve de l'antériorité et que l'existence d'un système de brevets de genre et de sélection implique nécessairement l'antériorité, du moins dans la présente affaire, et partant, l'invalidité. Je rejette un argument aussi général. Le courant jurisprudentiel s'inscrivant dans la foulée de l'arrêt I. G. Farbenindustrie admet en principe le système des brevets de genre et de sélection. La véritable question qui se pose est celle de savoir si, au vu des faits de l'espèce, le brevet de sélection en cause était antériorisé.

b) Motifs du juge de première instance

[20] Après renvoi au par. 27(1) de la Loi, le juge de première instance opine qu'il y a antériorité « [lorsque] l'invention exacte a déjà été faite et a été divulguée au public » (par. 55). Il cite un extrait de l'arrêt Free World Trust c. Électro Santé Inc., [2000] 2 R.C.S. 1024, 2000 CSC 66, où notre Cour approuve le critère de l'antériorité énoncé dans l'arrêt Beloit Canada Ltée c. Valmet OY, [1986] A.C.F. nº 87 (QL) (C.A.), par. 30 :

Il faut en effet pouvoir s'en remettre à une seule publication antérieure et y trouver tous les renseignements nécessaires, en pratique, à la production de l'invention revendiquée sans l'exercice de quelque génie inventif. Les instructions contenues dans la publication antérieure doivent être d'une clarté telle qu'une personne au fait de l'art qui en prend connaissance et s'y

2008 SCC 61 (CanLII)

the claimed invention. [Emphasis added by the applications judge.]

[21] The applications judge noted that the English Court of Appeal stated in General Tire & Rubber Co. v. Firestone Tyre & Rubber Co., [1972] R.P.C. 457, at p. 486:

> If, on the other hand, the prior publication contains a direction which is capable of being carried out in a manner which would infringe the patentee's claim, but would be at least as likely to be carried out in a way which would not do so, the patentee's claim will not have been anticipated, although it may fail on the ground of obviousness. To anticipate the patentee's claim the prior publication must contain clear and unmistakable directions to do what the patentee claims to have invented . . . . [Emphasis added by the applications judge.]

He then noted that in Free World, at para. 26, this Court approved the following statement from General Tire:

> A signpost, however clear, upon the road to the patentee's invention will not suffice. The prior inventor must be clearly shown to have planted his flag at the precise destination before the patentee. [p. 486]

[22] The law of anticipation as explained in Beloit and General Tire has been accepted in Canada without reservation: see Free World, at para. 26. In his application of the law to the facts, there is no doubt that Shore J. was using the test as set out in Beloit when he stated, at para. 57:

> Based on the law, the question before the Court is whether a person skilled in the art was given such a clear direction that, by reading and following the '875 patent (or its U.S. or French equivalents) would in every case and without possibility of error make a compound or pharmaceutical composition within the claims of the '777 patent (e.g. the bisulfate salt of clopidogrel).

(c) Recent United Kingdom Jurisprudence

[23] For the reasons that follow, and in light of recent jurisprudence, I am of the respectful opinion that the applications judge overstated the stringency

conforme arrivera infailliblement à l'invention revendiquée. [Souligné par le juge de première instance.]

[21] Le juge signale que dans l'arrêt General Tire & Rubber Co. c. Firestone Tyre & Rubber Co., [1972] R.P.C. 457, la Cour d'appel d'Angleterre a dit ce qui suit à la p. 486 :

> [TRADUCTION] Si, par contre, la publication antérieure renferme des instructions qui sont susceptibles d'être exécutées de façon à contrevenir à la revendication du breveté, mais qui seraient à tout le moins aussi susceptibles d'être exécutées de façon à ne pas y contrevenir, la revendication du breveté ne se heurterait pas à une antériorité, bien qu'elle puisse être jugée non valide pour cause d'évidence. Pour constituer une antériorité opposable à la revendication du breveté, la publication antérieure doit contenir des instructions claires et non équivoques permettant d'obtenir ce que le breveté prétend avoir inventé . . . [Souligné par le juge de première instance.]

Il précise ensuite qu'au par. 26 de l'arrêt Free World, notre Cour a approuvé l'extrait suivant de l'arrêt General Tire :

> [TRADUCTION] Aussi clair qu'il soit, un poteau indicateur placé sur la voie menant à l'invention du breveté ne suffit pas. Il faut prouver clairement que l'inventeur préalable a pris possession de la destination précise en y laissant sa marque avant le breveté. [p. 486]

[22] Les tribunaux canadiens ont adhéré sans réserve au critère de l'antériorité défini dans les arrêts Beloit et General Tire : Free World, par. 26. Lorsqu'il affirme ce qui suit au par. 57, il est clair que le juge Shore s'appuie sur le critère énoncé dans l'arrêt Beloit pour appliquer le droit aux faits de l'espèce :

> La Cour doit, en se fondant sur le droit applicable, décider si une personne versée dans l'art a reçu des instructions d'une clarté telle que, lorsqu'elle prend connaissance du brevet '875 (ou de ses équivalents américains ou français) et s'y conforme, elle arrivera infailliblement à un composé ou à une composition pharmaceutique visé par les revendications du brevet '777 (c.-à-d. le bisulfate de clopidogrel).

c) Jurisprudence britannique récente

[23] Pour les motifs qui suivent et au vu de la jurisprudence récente, j'estime respectueusement que le juge de première instance a exagéré la rigueur du of the test for anticipation that the "exact invention" has already been made and publicly disclosed.

[24] In the 2005 decision of the House of Lords in Synthon, Lord Hoffmann has brought some further clarity to the law of anticipation as understood since General Tire. His reference at para. 20 to the "unquestionable authority" of Lord Westbury in Hills v. Evans (1862), 31 L.J. Ch. (N.S.) 457, at p. 463, makes it plain that his analysis does not depend on any change on English law flowing from the enactment of the Patents Act 1977 (U.K.), 1977, c. 37, or the U.K.'s adoption of the Convention on the Grant of European Patents, 1065 U.N.T.S. 199 (entered into force October 7, 1977). He distinguishes between two requirements for anticipation that were not theretofore expressly considered separately, prior disclosure and enablement.

[25] He explains that the requirement of prior disclosure means that the prior patent must disclose subject matter which, if performed, would necessarily result in infringement of that patent, and states, at para. 22:

> If I may summarise the effect of these two well-known statements [from General Tire and Hills v. Evans], the matter relied upon as prior art must disclose subject matter which, if performed, would necessarily result in an infringement of the patent. . . . It follows that, whether or not it would be apparent to anyone at the time, whenever subject matter described in the prior disclosure is capable of being performed and is such that, if performed, it must result in the patent being infringed, the disclosure condition is satisfied.

When considering the role of the person skilled in the art in respect of disclosure, the skilled person is "taken to be trying to understand what the author of the description [in the prior patent] meant" (para. 32). At this stage, there is no room for trial and error or experimentation by the skilled person. He is simply reading the prior patent for the purposes of understanding it.

[26] If the disclosure requirement is satisfied, the second requirement to prove anticipation is critère de l'antériorité en considérant que l'« invention exacte » devait déjà avoir été faite et avoir été rendue publique.

[24] En 2005, dans l'arrêt Synthon de la Chambre des lords, lord Hoffmann a apporté quelques précisions supplémentaires sur le critère de l'antériorité et sur son interprétation depuis l'arrêt General Tire. Le fait qu'il a qualifié d'inattaquable le passage cité des motifs de lord Westbury dans Hills c. Evans (1862), 31 L.J. Ch. (N.S.) 457, p. 463, indique clairement que son analyse ne tient pas à quelque modification du droit anglais découlant de l'adoption de la Patents Act 1977 (R.-U.), 1977, ch. 37, non plus qu'à la ratification de la Convention sur la délivrance de brevets européens, 1065 R.T.N.U. 199 (entrée en vigueur le 7 octobre 1977) par le Royaume-Uni. Il établit une distinction entre deux exigences en la matière qui, jusqu'alors, ne faisaient pas expressément l'objet d'un examen distinct, à savoir la divulgation antérieure et le caractère réalisable.

[25] Lord Hoffmann explique que suivant l'exigence de la divulgation antérieure, le brevet antérieur doit divulguer ce qui, une fois réalisé, contrefera nécessairement le brevet (par. 22) :

> [TRADUCTION] Si je puis me permettre de résumer ce qui découle de ces deux énoncés fort connus [tirés de General Tire et de Hills c. Evans], l'objet de l'antériorité alléguée doit divulguer ce qui, une fois réalisé, contrefera le brevet. [. . .] Il s'ensuit que, peu importe que cela aurait sauté ou non aux yeux de quiconque au moment considéré, lorsque ce qui est décrit dans la divulgation antérieure est réalisable et une fois réalisé, contrefera nécessairement le brevet, la condition de la divulgation antérieure est remplie.

En ce qui concerne la divulgation, la personne versée dans l'art [TRADUCTION] « est censée tenter de comprendre ce que l'auteur de la description [dans le brevet antérieur] a voulu dire » (par. 32). À cette étape, les essais successifs sont exclus. La personne versée dans l'art se contente de lire le brevet antérieur pour en comprendre la teneur.

[26] Lorsque l'exigence de la divulgation est remplie, le second élément établissant l'antériorité

"enablement" which means that the person skilled in the art would have been able to perform the invention (para. 26). Lord Hoffmann held that the test for enablement for purposes of anticipation was the same as the test for sufficiency under the relevant United Kingdom legislation. (Enablement for the purposes of sufficiency of the patent specification under the Canadian Patent Act, s. 34(1)(b) of the pre-October 1, 1989 Act, now s. 27(3)(b), is not an issue to be decided in this case and my analysis of enablement is solely related to the test for anticipation. The question of whether enablement for purposes of sufficiency is identical in Canada is better left to another day.)

[27] Once the subject matter of the invention is disclosed by the prior patent, the person skilled in the art is assumed to be willing to make trial and error experiments to get it to work. While trial and error experimentation is permitted at the enablement stage, it is not at the disclosure stage. For purposes of enablement, the question is no longer what the skilled person would think the disclosure of the prior patent meant, but whether he or she would be able to work the invention.

[28] The Beloit decision by which the applications judge rightly felt bound dealt with only one aspect of anticipation, that is, whether or not the invention in a patent had been disclosed in a single prior publication or patent. In that decision, Hugessen J.A. held that it had not. He had no need to consider the further point whether or not, had there been such a clear disclosure, the working of the invention was also enabled by that disclosure. That point was not in issue in Beloit. Explicitly separating disclosure and enablement is a refinement of the approach set out in Beloit. It explains the process a person skilled in the art would follow if the original patent anticipated the invention of the subsequent patent. I would adopt this approach.

est le « caractère réalisable », à savoir la possibilité qu'une personne versée dans l'art ait pu réaliser l'invention (par. 26). Lord Hoffmann conclut que le volet du critère de l'antériorité correspondant au caractère réalisable équivaut au critère du caractère suffisant suivant les dispositions législatives pertinentes du Royaume-Uni. (Notre Cour n'a pas à statuer en l'espèce sur l'incidence du caractère réalisable de l'invention sur le caractère suffisant du mémoire descriptif du brevet pour les besoins de l'al. 34(1)b) de la Loi sur les brevets du Canada dans sa version antérieure au 1er octobre 1989, devenu l'actuel al. 27(3)b), et mon analyse du caractère réalisable ne vaut que pour le critère de l'antériorité. La question de savoir si, au Canada, le caractère réalisable de l'invention et le caractère suffisant du mémoire descriptif se confondent l'un et l'autre devra être tranchée une autre fois.)

[27] Dès lors que l'objet de l'invention est divulgué dans un brevet antérieur, on suppose que la personne versée dans l'art est disposée à procéder par essais successifs pour arriver à l'invention. Bien que de tels essais soient exclus à l'étape de la divulgation, ils ne le sont pas pour les besoins du caractère réalisable, car la question n'est plus de savoir si la personne versée dans l'art saisit la teneur de la divulgation du brevet antérieur, mais bien si elle est en mesure de réaliser l'invention.

[28] Le juge de première instance a conclu à juste titre qu'il était lié par l'arrêt Beloit, lequel ne portait que sur un volet de l'antériorité : l'invention visée par le brevet en cause avait-elle déjà été divulguée en totalité dans une même publication ou un même brevet. Le juge Hugessen y a conclu qu'elle ne l'avait pas été. Dès lors, il ne lui incombait pas de se demander en outre si, à supposer que la divulgation ait été claire, elle aurait en outre permis la réalisation de l'invention. Cette question ne faisait pas l'objet du litige. L'analyse consistant à isoler expressément le volet de la divulgation et celui du caractère réalisable apporte une nuance au raisonnement sous-tendant l'arrêt Beloit. Elle explique la démarche qu'une personne versée dans l'art adopterait si le brevet d'origine antériorisait l'invention visée par le brevet subséquent. Je suis enclin à la faire mienne.

[29] Subject to any limitations expressed in the Patent Act, I see no reason why the discussion of anticipation should not apply to other prior art than merely genus patents. Again, subject to limitations in the Patent Act, the discussion of anticipation and obviousness would seem applicable to patents generally.

[30] Two questions now must be answered: (1) what constitutes disclosure at the first stage of the test for anticipation, and (2) how much trial and error or experimentation is permitted at the enablement stage?

i. Disclosure

[31] Section 27(1) of the Act requires as a condition for obtaining a patent that the invention was not "known or used" and was not "described" in any patent or any publication more than two years before the patent application was filed. In the context of genus and selection patents, in E. I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co. (Witsiepe's) Application, [1982] F.S.R. 303 (H.L.), Lord Wilberforce stated, at p. 311:

> It is the absence of the discovery of the special advantages, as well as the fact of non-making, that makes it possible for such persons to make an invention related to a member of the class.

The compound made for the selection patent was only soundly predicted at the time of the genus patent. It was not made and its special advantages were not known. It is for those reasons that a patent should not be denied to the inventor who made and discovered the special advantages of the selection compound for the first time.

[32] In the context of disclosure as explained in Synthon, "the absence of the discovery of the special advantages" to which Lord Wilberforce was referring in Witsiepe's means that the genus patent does not disclose the special advantages of the invention covered by the selection patent. Where there is no such disclosure, there is no discovery of the special advantages of the selection patent as compared to the genus patent, and the disclosure requirement to prove anticipation fails. At [29] Sous réserve de toute restriction prévue dans la Loi sur les brevets, je ne vois pas pourquoi l'analyse relative à l'antériorité ne s'appliquerait qu'aux brevets de genre. Toujours sous réserve de la Loi sur les brevets, l'analyse de l'antériorité et de l'évidence paraît valoir pour les brevets en général.

[30] Deux questions se posent dès lors en ce qui concerne le critère de l'antériorité : (1) en quoi consiste la divulgation antérieure et (2) dans quelle mesure le caractère réalisable admet-il les essais successifs?

i. Divulgation

[31] Le paragraphe 27(1) de la Loi dispose qu'un brevet ne peut être délivré que pour une invention qui n'était pas « connue ou utilisée » ni « décrite » dans un brevet ou une publication plus de deux ans avant la demande. Se prononçant dans le contexte des brevets de genre et de sélection, lord Wilberforce a dit ce qui suit dans l'arrêt E. I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co. (Witsiepe's) Application, [1982] F.S.R. 303 (H.L.), p. 311 :

> [TRADUCTION] C'est l'absence de découverte des avantages particuliers, ainsi que la non-réalisation, qui permettent à ces personnes de faire une invention liée à un élément de la catégorie.

Le composé réalisé pour les besoins du brevet de sélection n'a été que valablement prédit lors de l'obtention du brevet de genre. Il n'avait pas été réalisé et ses avantages particuliers n'étaient pas connus. C'est pourquoi on ne saurait refuser un brevet à celui qui, le premier, réalise le composé et découvre ses avantages particuliers.

[32] Pour ce qui est de la divulgation au sens de l'arrêt Synthon, « l'absence de découverte des avantages particuliers » dont fait mention lord Wilberforce dans l'arrêt Witsiepe's s'entend de la non-divulgation dans le brevet de genre des avantages particuliers de l'invention visée par le brevet de sélection. Dès lors, les avantages particuliers de l'objet du brevet de sélection par rapport à l'objet du brevet de genre n'ont pas été découverts, de sorte qu'il n'y a pas d'antériorité. À cette étape, la this stage, the person skilled in the art is reading the prior patent to understand whether it discloses the special advantages of the second invention. No trial and error is permitted. If in reading the genus patent the special advantages of the invention of the selection patent are not disclosed, the genus patent does not anticipate the selection patent.

ii. Enablement

[33] What amount of trial and error or experimentation is permitted before a prior disclosure will not constitute enabling disclosure? Certainly, if the applications judge finds that an inventive step was required to get to the invention of the second patent, the specification of the first patent will not have provided enabling disclosure. But even if no inventive step is required, the skilled person must still be able to perform or make the invention of the second patent without undue burden.

[34] Two recent United Kingdom decisions are of assistance. In Halliburton Energy Services Inc. v. Smith International (North Sea) Ltd., [2006] EWCA Civ 1715 (BAILII), Jacob L.J., a highly experienced patent judge, states at para. 18:

> Patents are meant to teach people how to do things. If what is "taught" involves just too much [work] to be reasonable allowing for all the circumstances including the nature of the art, then the patent cannot be regarded as an "enabling disclosure." . . . The setting of a gigantic project, even if merely routine, will not do.

[35] Jacob L.J. characterizes the problem at para. 20 as: "[H]ow is one to say when the work involved to perform the invention is too much?" The determination of how much work is too much is inevitably a line-drawing exercise. His answer to the problem is at para. 21:

> The answer is that the line is one to be drawn by an exercise of judgment, taking into account all of the relevant factors, one of which is of course the nature of the invention itself and its field of technology. But personne versée dans l'art lit le mémoire descriptif du brevet antérieur pour déterminer s'il divulgue les avantages particuliers de l'invention subséquente. Les essais successifs ne sont pas admis. Lorsque la lecture du brevet de genre ne permet pas de connaître les avantages particuliers de l'invention visée par le brevet de sélection, celui-ci n'est pas antériorisé par le brevet de genre.

ii. Le caractère réalisable

[33] Après combien d'essais successifs conclut-on au caractère non réalisable de l'invention déjà divulguée? Lorsque le juge de première instance conclut qu'une étape inventive était nécessaire pour parvenir à l'invention du deuxième brevet, le mémoire descriptif du premier brevet ne rend assurément pas l'invention réalisable. Cependant, même lorsque aucune étape inventive n'est nécessaire, la personne versée dans l'art doit tout de même être capable d'exécuter ou de réaliser l'invention du deuxième brevet sans trop de difficultés.

[34] Deux décisions britanniques récentes valent d'être citées. Dans Halliburton Energy Services Inc. c. Smith International (North Sea) Ltd., [2006] EWCA Civ 1715 (BAILII), le lord juge Jacob, très expérimenté dans le domaine des brevets, dit au par. 18 :

> [TRADUCTION] Le brevet a pour but d'enseigner aux gens comment faire quelque chose. Lorsque l'« enseignement » exige trop [d'efforts] eu égard à l'ensemble des circonstances, y compris la nature de l'art, le brevet ne peut être considéré comme une « divulgation permettant la réalisation ». [. . .] Une entreprise colossale, même constituée d'opérations usuelles, n'est pas acceptable.

[35] Pour lui, la question est de savoir [TRADUCTION] « à quel moment les efforts requis pour parvenir à l'invention deviennent excessifs » (par. 20), d'où la nécessité d'une ligne de démarcation. Il avance une piste de solution au par. 21 :

> [TRADUCTION] La solution consiste à exercer son jugement au regard de l'ensemble des facteurs pertinents, dont bien sûr la nature de l'invention et le domaine technique. Mais il y en a d'autres, comme la

there are other factors too — for instance, the width of the patent claim or whether it has functional limitations which require too much work to explore.

[36] A more extensive review of the law of enablement as defined in Synthon is contained in a decision of Kitchin J. in Wobben v. Vestas-Celtic Wind Technology Ltd., [2007] EWHC 2636 (Pat.) (BAILII), at paras. 196-97. Although Wobben was a case in which the alleged infringer raised as one of its defences insufficiency under the United Kingdom legislation, I think guidance is provided as to what will or will not constitute enablement for purposes of anticipation.

[37] Drawing from this jurisprudence, I am of the opinion that the following factors should normally be considered. The list is not exhaustive. The factors will apply in accordance with the evidence in each case.

1. Enablement is to be assessed having regard to the prior patent as a whole including the specification and the claims. There is no reason to limit what the skilled person may consider in the prior patent in order to discover how to perform or make the invention of the subsequent patent. The entire prior patent constitutes prior art.

2. The skilled person may use his or her common general knowledge to supplement information contained in the prior patent. Common general knowledge means knowledge generally known by persons skilled in the relevant art at the relevant time.

3. The prior patent must provide enough information to allow the subsequently claimed invention to be performed without undue burden. When considering whether there is undue burden, the nature of the invention must be taken into account. For example, if the invention takes place in a field of technology in which trials and experiments are generally carried out, the threshold for undue burden will tend to be higher than in circumstances portée de la revendication du brevet ou l'existence de limites fonctionnelles dont l'exploration exige trop de travail.

[36] Dans Wobben c. Vestas-Celtic Wind Technology Ltd., [2007] EWHC 2636 (Pat.) (BAILII), par. 196-197, le juge Kitchin analyse plus avant le critère du caractère réalisable défini dans l'arrêt Synthon. Même si, dans cette affaire britannique, l'insuffisance était l'un des moyens de défense invoqués dans une action en contrefaçon, je suis d'avis que la décision permet de circonscrire le caractère réalisable pour les besoins de l'antériorité.

[37] Au vu de cette jurisprudence, j'estime que les facteurs suivants — dont l'énumération n'est pas exhaustive et l'applicabilité dépend de la preuve — doivent normalement être considérés.

1. Le caractère réalisable est apprécié au regard du brevet antérieur dans son ensemble, mémoire descriptif et revendications compris. Il n'y a aucune raison de limiter les éléments du brevet antérieur dont tient compte la personne versée dans l'art pour découvrir comment exécuter ou réaliser l'invention que vise le brevet subséquent. L'antériorité est constituée de la totalité du brevet antérieur.

2. La personne versée dans l'art peut faire appel à ses connaissances générales courantes pour compléter les données du brevet antérieur. Les connaissances générales courantes s'entendent des connaissances que possède généralement une personne versée dans l'art en cause au moment considéré.

3. Le brevet antérieur doit renfermer suffisamment de renseignements pour permettre l'exécution du brevet subséquent sans trop de difficultés. Le caractère excessif des difficultés dépend de la nature de l'invention. Par exemple, lorsque celle-ci relève d'un domaine technique où les essais sont monnaie courante, le seuil de ce qui constitue une difficulté excessive tend à être plus élevé que lorsque des efforts moindres sont la norme. Lorsqu'il est nécessaire de franchir in which less effort is normal. If inventive steps are required, the prior art will not be considered as enabling. However, routine trials are acceptable and would not be considered undue burden. But experiments or trials and errors are not to be prolonged even in fields of technology in which trials and experiments are generally carried out. No time limits on exercises of energy can be laid down; however, prolonged or arduous trial and error would not be considered routine.

4. Obvious errors or omissions in the prior patent will not prevent enablement if reasonable skill and knowledge in the art could readily correct the error or find what was omitted.

(d) Application to the Facts of This Case

i. Disclosure for the Purposes of Anticipation

[38] The '875 genus patent covered over 250,000 possible different compounds. Obviously, every compound was not made or tested. The patent covering those compounds was based on sound prediction. From the specification, it is apparent that 21 examples were made and tested, one of which was the racemate relevant in this case. According to the applications judge, there was no disclosure in the '875 patent of the specific beneficial properties associated with the dextro-rotatory isomer of this racemate, nor was there disclosure of any advantages which flow from using the bisulfate salt in combination with the dextro-rotatory isomer (para. 71).

[39] It was open to Shore J. on the record before him to conclude that a person skilled in the art and reading the '875 patent would not be able to come up with the invention of the '777 patent. Nothing in the '875 patent distinguished this dextro-rotatory isomer as having beneficial properties different from the racemate or the levo-rotatory isomer or from any of the other compounds made and tested and referred to in the '875 patent, let alone the compounds based only on sound prediction. At para. 72 of his reasons, he found:

une étape inventive, la divulgation antérieure ne satisfait pas au critère du caractère réalisable. Les essais courants sont toutefois admis et il n'en résulte pas de difficultés excessives. L'expérimentation ou les essais successifs ne doivent cependant pas se prolonger, et ce, même dans un domaine technique où ils sont monnaie courante. Aucune limite n'est fixée quant à la durée des efforts consacrés; toutefois, les essais successifs prolongés ou ardus ne sont pas tenus pour courants.

4. Les erreurs ou omissions manifestes du brevet antérieur ne font pas obstacle au caractère réalisable lorsque des habiletés et des connaissances raisonnables permettaient d'y remédier.

d) Application aux faits de l'espèce

i. L'antériorité au regard de la divulgation

[38] Le brevet de genre 875 couvre plus de 250 000 composés qui n'ont évidemment pas tous été synthétisés ou analysés. Ce brevet s'appuyait sur une prédiction valable. Il appert de son mémoire descriptif que 21 composés ont été synthétisés et analysés, dont le racémate visé en l'espèce. Selon le juge de première instance, le brevet 875 ne divulgue aucun avantage particulier de l'isomère dextrogyre de ce racémate, ni quelque avantage de l'utilisation du bisulfate avec l'isomère dextrogyre (par. 71).

[39] Au vu du dossier, le juge Shore pouvait conclure qu'une personne versée dans l'art n'aurait pu, après avoir pris connaissance du brevet 875, arriver à l'invention visée par le brevet 777. Aucun élément du brevet 875 n'indique que l'isomère dextrogyre présente des avantages différents de ceux du racémate, de l'isomère lévogyre ou de l'un des autres composés synthétisés et analysés dont il est fait mention, et encore moins de l'un des composés faisant seulement l'objet d'une prédiction valable. Au paragraphe 72 de ses motifs, le juge conclut :

The Court also notes that, although Dr. Klibanov agreed with Apotex' experts that a skilled person could have ascertained the activity and characteristics of two isomers and of different salts using well-known methods at the time, they did not say that the beneficial properties of these isomers and of their salts — let alone of the dextro-rotatory isomer and of its bisulfate salt — would be known with certitude before conducting the tests designed to identify the respective properties of the isomers and of the salt.

[40] There was no evidence that the person skilled in the art would know from reading the '875 patent that the more active dextro-rotatory isomer would be less toxic than the racemate or levo-rotatory isomer or any of the other compounds made and tested. Indeed, Dr. McClelland's evidence was that while you "often" get more activity by separating isomers, the answer to the question whether this increased activity was to be found in the levo-rotatory isomer or the dextro-rotatory isomer was unknown. (Affidavit, at para. 42, and cross-examination, at pp. 928-30 and question 322).

[41] Since the '875 patent did not disclose the special advantages of the dextro-rotatory isomer and of its bisulfate salt, as compared to the levo-rotatory isomer or the racemate and their salts, or the other compounds made and tested or otherwise referred to in the '875 patent, the invention of the '777 patent cannot be said to have been disclosed and therefore it cannot be said to have been anticipated.

ii. Enablement for the Purposes of Anticipation

[42] It is not strictly necessary to discuss enablement since anticipation requires proof of both disclosure and enablement, and disclosure has not been proven. However, for future guidance, I would make the following few observations about enablement on the facts of this case.

[43] The applications judge was of the opinion that "the skilled reader following the prior art must be able to arrive at the invention claimed in La Cour fait en outre remarquer que, même si M. Klibanov était d'accord avec les experts d'Apotex pour dire qu'une personne versée dans l'art aurait pu constater l'activité et les caractéristiques des deux isomères et de divers bisulfates au moyen de méthodes qui étaient bien connues à l'époque, ces experts n'ont pas affirmé que les propriétés avantageuses de ces isomères et de leurs bisulfates — à plus forte raison celles de l'isomère dextrogyre et de son bisulfate — auraient été connues avec certitude avant la tenue des essais visant à déterminer les propriétés respectives des isomères et du bisulfate.

[40] Aucun élément n'établissait qu'en prenant connaissance du brevet 875, une personne versée dans l'art aurait su que l'isomère dextrogyre plus actif serait moins toxique que le racémate, l'isomère lévogyre ou n'importe lequel des autres composés synthétisés et analysés. Le D[r] McClelland a en effet témoigné que même si on obtient « souvent » plus d'activité après séparation des isomères, on ne savait pas lequel de l'isomère lévogyre ou de l'isomère dextrogyre serait le plus actif (affidavit, par. 42; contre-interrogatoire, p. 928-930; question 322).

[41] Puisque le brevet 875 ne divulgue pas les avantages particuliers de l'isomère dextrogyre et de son bisulfate par rapport à l'isomère lévogyre, au racémate et à ses sels, ou aux autres composés synthétisés et analysés ou par ailleurs mentionnés, l'invention correspondant au brevet 777 n'a pas été divulguée et, de ce fait, elle n'est pas antériorisée.

ii. L'antériorité au regard du caractère réalisable

[42] Il n'est pas absolument nécessaire de se pencher sur le caractère réalisable, car l'antériorité exige à la fois la divulgation et le caractère réalisable, et la première n'a pas été établie. Toutefois, afin d'offrir des repères pour l'avenir, je me permets quelques observations sur le caractère réalisable en l'espèce.

[43] Le juge de première instance a estimé que « la personne versée dans l'art qui se conforme au brevet constituant une antériorité doit être en the impugned patent the first time he or she tries and every time thereafter" (para. 65 (emphasis in original)). However, under the test for enablement as described in these reasons, some trial and error is permitted.

[44] For anticipation, the genus patent must provide enough information so as to allow the selected invention to be performed without undue burden. In this case, the applications judge concluded that the '875 patent did not specifically lead to the claimed invention. He noted, on the record before him, that if one were to follow the teachings of the prior art, one would obtain racemates, never their isomers.

[45] However, Apotex argues that the methods for separating the isomers were well known to persons skilled in the art at the time of the invention. According to Apotex, such a person could eventually obtain the isomer through what amounts to routine tests.

[46] In determining whether the enablement step for proving anticipation has been met, it is important to note that routine trials are acceptable but inventive steps are not permitted. Also, reasonable skill and knowledge of the art is expected in order to correct omissions in the original patent if a means of determining what is missing can readily be found. The skilled person may use his or her common general knowledge to supplement information contained in the patent.

[47] Even though Shore J. referred to the excessively stringent anticipation test "in every case", his findings are relevant to trial and error. He found that the evidence with respect to the methods of separation, including the evidence of the inventor, shows that the identification of clopidogrel, its bisulfate salt and their advantageous properties required extensive investigation over a period of months (paras. 68-70).

[48] One might infer that, had the applications judge been asked to decide if these investigations constituted an undue burden for the skilled person, mesure d'arriver à l'invention revendiquée dans le brevet contesté la première fois qu'elle tente d'y arriver et chaque fois par la suite » (par. 65 (souligné dans l'original)). Or, le caractère réalisable défini dans les présents motifs admet un certain nombre d'essais successifs.

[44] Pour constituer une antériorité, le brevet de genre doit être suffisamment détaillé pour permettre la réalisation de l'objet du brevet de sélection sans trop de difficultés. En l'espèce, le juge de première instance conclut que le brevet 875 ne mène pas explicitement à l'invention revendiquée. Il signale qu'au vu du dossier, les enseignements du brevet antérieur ne permettaient d'obtenir qu'un racémate, en aucun cas ses isomères.

[45] Apotex fait toutefois valoir que les méthodes de séparation des isomères étaient bien connues des personnes versées dans l'art au moment de l'invention. À son avis, de telles personnes auraient pu un jour obtenir l'isomère à l'issue de simples essais courants.

[46] Pour que soit respecté le volet du critère de l'antériorité correspondant au caractère réalisable, les essais courants sont admis, mais non les étapes inventives. Aussi, lorsqu'un moyen de déterminer les lacunes du brevet d'origine peut aisément être découvert, des compétences et des connaissances raisonnables dans le domaine devraient suffire à combler ces lacunes. La personne versée dans l'art peut faire appel à ses connaissances générales courantes pour compléter les données du brevet.

[47] Certes, le juge Shore mentionne la notion excessivement stricte d'« infaillibilité », mais ses conclusions sur le respect du critère de l'antériorité se fondent sur les essais successifs. Il conclut que les éléments relatifs aux méthodes de séparation, y compris le témoignage de l'inventeur, prouvent que la découverte du clopidogrel, de son bisulfate et de leurs avantages ont nécessité des mois de recherche approfondie (par. 68-70).

[48] Si le juge de première instance avait été appelé à déterminer si cette recherche constituait une difficulté excessive pour la personne versée he would have held that they did. However, in view of my earlier conclusion on disclosure, it is unnecessary for me to pursue this point further.

(e) Conclusion on Anticipation

[49] As indicated above, in the context of anticipation, the two-step approach, disclosure and enablement, is a refinement of the approach set out in Beloit and should be adopted.

[50] In the case at bar, the invention of the '777 patent was not disclosed by the '875 patent and was therefore not anticipated. The allegation of anticipation has not been justified.

VI. Obviousness

(a) Relevant Legislation

[51] The definition of invention in s. 2 of the Act is relevant because at the time the pre-October 1, 1989 version of the Act was in force, there was no statutory provision expressly providing that obvious inventions were unpatentable. As explained by Professor D. Vaver in Intellectual Property Law: Copyright, Patents, Trade-marks (1997), at p. 136:

> Until very recently, the Patent Act did not expressly say that obvious inventions were unpatentable. Courts implied this criterion from the notion of "invention". Inventions implied inventive ingenuity, without which an advance was obvious; and patents are not granted for the obvious.

The definition of invention in s. 2 of the Act provided:

> "invention" means any new and useful . . . composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement in any . . . composition of matter;

(b) Reasons of the Applications Judge

[52] Shore J. first correctly observed that at the relevant time obviousness was not mentioned expressly in the Act. He then cited the well-known test for obviousness in Beloit (at p. 294):

dans l'art, on peut penser qu'il aurait conclu par l'affirmative. Vu ma conclusion précédente sur la divulgation, il est cependant inutile d'examiner la question plus avant.

e) Conclusion relative à l'antériorité

[49] Je le répète, j'estime qu'il faut tenir compte des deux volets de l'antériorité — la divulgation et le caractère réalisable — et affiner ainsi la démarche préconisée dans l'arrêt Beloit.

[50] En l'espèce, l'invention revendiquée dans le brevet 777 n'a pas été divulguée dans le brevet 875, de sorte qu'elle n'est pas antériorisée. L'allégation d'antériorité n'est pas fondée.

VI. L'évidence

a) Dispositions législatives pertinentes

[51] La définition du mot « invention » figurant à l'art. 2 de la Loi est pertinente, car dans la version antérieure au 1er octobre 1989, aucune disposition n'écartait expressément la brevetabilité d'une invention évidente. Comme l'explique le professeur D. Vaver dans Intellectual Property Law : Copyright, Patents, Trade-marks (1997), p. 136 :

> [TRADUCTION] Jusqu'à tout récemment, la Loi sur les brevets n'écartait pas expressément la brevetabilité d'une invention évidente. Les tribunaux ont déduit le critère de la notion d'« invention ». Une invention était le fruit de l'ingéniosité, et sans celle-ci, une découverte constituait une évidence. Et nul brevet n'est délivré pour ce qui est évident.

Voici la définition du mot « invention » qui figurait à l'art. 2 de la Loi :

> Toute réalisation, tout[e] [. . .] composition de matières, ainsi que tout perfectionnement de l'un d'eux, présentant le caractère de la nouveauté et de l'utilité.

b) Motifs du juge de première instance

[52] Le juge Shore signale d'abord à juste titre qu'au moment considéré, l'évidence n'était pas expressément mentionnée dans la Loi. Il renvoie ensuite à l'arrêt Beloit, qui énonce le critère bien connu de l'évidence (par. 18) :

2008 SCC 61 (CanLII)

The test for obviousness is not to ask what competent inventors did or would have done to solve the problem. Inventors are by definition inventive. The classical touchstone for obviousness is the technician skilled in the art but having no scintilla of inventiveness or imagination; a paragon of deduction and dexterity, wholly devoid of intuition; a triumph of the left hemisphere over the right. The question to be asked is whether this mythical creature (the man in the Clapham omnibus of patent law) would, in the light of the state of the art and of common general knowledge as at the claimed date of invention, have come directly and without difficulty to the solution taught by the patent. It is a very difficult test to satisfy. [Emphasis added by the applications judge; para. 75.]

In the view of Shore J., the Beloit test would not accommodate a "worth a try" test by the skilled person.

[53] The applications judge accepted that there were five well-known separation techniques in order to obtain the dextro-rotatory isomer of the racemate. At para. 80, he stated:

. . . what the experts are really saying from a legal perspective is that separating the racemate was worth a try. Having to try different methods, though they be well-known, in order to discover which one will yield the desired result cannot mean that the desired result, in this case, the compounds in claims 1 and 3 and their pharmaceutical compositions, was obvious.

[54] He further held that the dextro-rotatory isomer and its salts had to be tested for their beneficial properties to be discovered and that the isomer and its beneficial properties were therefore not known before the racemate was separated into its isomers. He stated, at para. 81:

Here again, having to try different separation techniques with uncertainty as to whether each or some specific techniques would actually result in a successful separation and then having to perform tests to discover what the properties of the dextro-rotatory isomer of the racemate were, cannot mean that this compound and its beneficial properties were obvious.

Pour établir si une invention est évidente, il ne s'agit pas de se demander ce que des inventeurs compétents ont ou auraient fait pour solutionner le problème. Un inventeur est par définition inventif. La pierre de touche classique de l'évidence de l'invention est le technicien versé dans son art mais qui ne possède aucune étincelle d'esprit inventif ou d'imagination; un parangon de déduction et de dextérité complètement dépourvu d'intuition; un triomphe de l'hémisphère gauche sur le droit. Il s'agit de se demander si, compte tenu de l'état de la technique et des connaissances générales courantes qui existaient au moment où l'invention aurait été faite, cette créature mythique (monsieur tout-le-monde du domaine des brevets) serait directement et facilement arrivée à la solution que préconise le brevet. C'est un critère auquel il est très difficile de satisfaire. [Souligné par le juge de première instance; par. 75.]

De l'avis du juge Shore, le critère établi dans l'arrêt Beloit n'admet pas le critère de quelque chose « valant d'être tenté » du point de vue de la personne versée dans l'art.

[53] Le juge de première instance reconnaît qu'il existe cinq techniques bien connues de séparation du racémate permettant d'obtenir l'isomère dextrogyre :

Ce que les experts disent, en fait, du point de vue juridique, c'est qu'il vaut la peine de tenter de séparer les isomères constituant le racémate : voilà ce qui ressort de cette preuve. Le fait de devoir essayer différentes méthodes, bien qu'il s'agisse de méthodes bien connues, pour découvrir laquelle donnera le résultat souhaité, ne peut signifier que le résultat souhaité, dans ce cas l'obtention des composés décrits aux revendications 1 et 3 et leurs compositions pharmaceutiques, était évident. [par. 80]

[54] Il conclut en outre qu'il fallait analyser l'isomère dextrogyre et ses sels pour découvrir leurs avantages, de sorte qu'on ne pouvait connaître l'isomère et ses avantages avant que les isomères du racémate ne soient isolés. Voici ce qu'il dit au par. 81 :

Ici encore, le fait de devoir utiliser différentes techniques de séparation sans savoir avec certitude si chaque technique ou certaines techniques bien précises permettraient en fait de séparer efficacement les isomères, puis le fait de devoir procéder à des essais pour déterminer les propriétés de l'isomère dextrogyre du racémate, ne peuvent signifier que ce composé et ses propriétés avantageuses étaient évidents.

(c) United Kingdom and United States Approach to Obviousness

[55] Apotex says that the Beloit approach is excessively rigid and is out of step with the tests for obviousness in the United Kingdom and the United States, where "worth a try" has been accepted.

[56] Generally, in the United States, it appears that at the Court of Appeals level, the "obvious to try" test had not been accepted. In Application of Tomlinson, 363 F.2d 928 (C.C.P.A. 1966), Rich J. wrote, at p. 931:

> Slight reflection suggests, we think, that there is usually an element of "obviousness to try" in any research endeavor, that is not undertaken with complete blindness but rather with some semblance of a chance of success, and that patentability determinations based on that as the test would not only be contrary to statute but result in a marked deterioration of the entire patent system as an incentive to invest in those efforts and attempts which go by the name of "research".

See also In re O'Farrell, 853 F.2d 894 (Fed. Cir. 1988), at p. 903.

[57] However, in KSR International Co. v. Teleflex Inc., 127 S. Ct. 1727 (2007), Kennedy J., for a unanimous court, rejected the restrictive approach that the Court of Appeals had taken in that case. He stated, at p. 1739:

> Throughout this Court's engagement with the question of obviousness, our cases have set forth an expansive and flexible approach inconsistent with the way the Court of Appeals applied its TSM [Teaching-Suggestion-Motivation] test here. To be sure, Graham recognized the need for "uniformity and definiteness." Yet the principles laid down in Graham reaffirmed the "functional approach" of Hotchkiss. To this end, Graham set forth a broad inquiry and invited courts, where appropriate, to look at any secondary considerations that would prove instructive.

[58] At p. 1742, he was clear that "obvious to try" could be a relevant test in an obviousness inquiry:

c) Notion d'évidence au Royaume-Uni et aux États-Unis

[55] Apotex soutient que le critère de l'évidence énoncé dans l'arrêt Beloit est trop strict et qu'il est en décalage avec ceux appliqués au Royaume-Uni et aux États-Unis, où l'on admet l'idée de quelque chose « valant d'être tenté ».

[56] De façon générale, aux États-Unis, les cours d'appel paraissent ne pas avoir fait leur le critère de « l'essai allant de soi ». Dans Application of Tomlinson, 363 F.2d 928 (C.C.P.A. 1966), le juge Rich a dit ce qui suit à la p. 931 :

> [TRADUCTION] À notre avis, quand on y réfléchit un peu, il y a habituellement un élément d'« essai allant de soi » dans toute recherche qui n'est pas effectuée à l'aveuglette, mais bien avec certaines chances de réussite, et une décision sur la brevetabilité fondée sur ce critère serait non seulement contraire à la loi, mais entraînerait une détérioration marquée de l'ensemble du système de brevets, lequel est censé encourager l'investissement dans les efforts et les essais que l'on regroupe sous le vocable « recherche ».

Voir également In re O'Farrell, 853 F.2d 894 (Fed. Cir. 1988), p. 903.

[57] Toutefois, dans KSR International Co. c. Teleflex Inc., 127 S. Ct. 1727 (2007), le juge Kennedy a rejeté au nom des juges unanimes l'interprétation restrictive à laquelle s'était livrée la cour d'appel dans la même affaire (p. 1739) :

> [TRADUCTION] Au fil de ses décisions sur la question de l'évidence, la Cour a établi une démarche large et flexible incompatible avec la manière dont la Court of Appeals a appliqué en l'espèce le critère « TSM » [Teaching-Suggestion-Motivation] (enseignement, indice ou motivation). La décision Graham a assurément reconnu la nécessité de l'uniformité et de la certitude. Néanmoins, les principes qui y ont été établis ont confirmé l'« approche fonctionnelle » de la décision Hotchkiss. Graham préconise en effet un examen de large portée et invite les tribunaux, lorsque l'affaire s'y prête, à tenir compte de toute considération accessoire pouvant se révéler éclairante.

[58] À la p. 1742, il dit clairement que le critère de l'« essai allant de soi » peut être appliqué dans le cadre de l'examen portant sur l'évidence :

The same constricted analysis led the Court of Appeals to conclude, in error, that a patent claim cannot be proved obvious merely by showing that the combination of elements was "obvious to try." . . . When there is a design need or market pressure to solve a problem and there are a finite number of identified, predictable solutions, a person of ordinary skill has good reason to pursue the known options within his or her technical grasp. If this leads to the anticipated success, it is likely the product not of innovation but of ordinary skill and common sense. In that instance the fact that a combination was obvious to try might show that it was obvious under §103.

[59] In the United Kingdom the "obvious to try" test has been accepted since at least 1967: see Johns-Manville Corporation's Patent, [1967] R.P.C. 479 (C.A.). The current state of the law in the United Kingdom was summarized in H. Lundbeck A/S v. Generics (UK) Ltd., [2008] R.P.C. 19 (p. 437), [2008] EWCA Civ 311. Lord Hoffmann stated the following, at paras. 24-25, in response to the argument that the trial judge in that case, Kitchin J., had refused to consider the "obvious to try" test:

[The trial judge] cited from Angiotech Pharmaceuticals Inc. v. Conor Medsystems Inc. [2007] R.P.C. 20, which represents this [Court of Appeal's] last word on the extent to which the notion of some step being obvious to try is helpful in deciding whether an invention is obvious. The judge then summed up (at para. 72) the current state of the law:

> "The question of obviousness must be considered on the facts of each case. The court must consider the weight to be attached to any particular factor in the light of all the relevant circumstances. These may include such matters as the motive to find a solution to the problem the patent addresses, the number and extent of the possible avenues of research, the effort involved in pursuing them and the expectation of success."

No criticism has been made of this statement of principle . . . .

See also Angiotech Pharmaceuticals Inc. v. Conor Medsystems Inc., [2007] R.P.C. 20 (p. 487), [2007] EWCA Civ 5, at para. 45 (rev'd [2008] R.P.C. 28 (p. 716), [2008] UKHL 49). The passage at para. 45 in the decision of the Court of Appeal remains relevant and uncontested.

[TRADUCTION] La même interprétation étroite a amené la Court of Appeals à conclure erronément que l'évidence de la revendication d'un brevet ne peut être établie par le seul fait que la combinaison des éléments constituait un « essai allant de soi ». [. . .] Lorsqu'un besoin précis ou la pression du marché incite à résoudre un problème et qu'il existe un nombre limité de solutions connues et prévisibles, la personne dotée de compétences usuelles a une bonne raison d'opter pour celles qui, parmi ces solutions, sont techniquement à sa portée. Si le résultat escompté est obtenu, il est sans doute attribuable à des compétences usuelles et au bon sens, et non à l'innovation. Dans ce cas, le fait que la combinaison des éléments constituait un essai allant de soi en démontrerait peut-être le caractère évident au sens de l'art. 103.

[TRADUCTION] [Le juge de première instance] cite l'arrêt Angiotech Pharmaceuticals Inc. c. Conor Medsystems Inc., [2007] R.P.C. 20, qui énonce la position actuelle de [la Cour d'appel] sur la mesure dans laquelle l'idée qu'une étape donnée allait de soi joue dans la détermination du caractère évident ou non évident d'une invention. Il résume ensuite l'état actuel du droit (par. 72) :

Cet énoncé de principe n'a fait l'objet d'aucune critique . . .

Voir aussi Angiotech Pharmaceuticals Inc. c. Conor Medsystems Inc., [2007] R.P.C. 20 (p. 487), [2007] EWCA Civ 5, par. 45 (inf. par [2008] R.P.C. 28 (p. 716), [2008] UKHL 49). L'énoncé figurant au par. 45 de la décision de la Cour d'appel demeure pertinent et incontesté.

2008 SCC 61 (CanLII)

[60] There is a similarity between the current state of the law in the United Kingdom and the United States in respect of "obvious to try". It is now clear that both jurisdictions accept that an "obvious to try" test can be relevant in an obviousness inquiry. The United States Supreme Court has now stated so explicitly in KSR. The convergence of the United Kingdom and the United States law on this issue suggests that the restrictiveness with which the Beloit test has been interpreted in Canada should be re-examined.

(d) Approach to Obviousness in Canada

[61] I take as a starting point the words of Diplock L.J. in Johns-Manville, at pp. 493-94:

> Patent law can too easily be bedevilled by linguistics, and the citation of a plethora of cases about other inventions of different kinds. The correctness of a decision upon an issue of obviousness does not depend upon whether or not the decider has paraphrased the words of the Act in some particular verbal formula. I doubt whether there is any verbal formula which is appropriate to all classes of claims.

Although we are not here dealing with obviousness provided by an express statutory test, but rather by necessary implication based on the requirement for invention in the Patent Act, the words of Diplock L.J. are nonetheless apt because the courts have often tended to treat the word formulation of Beloit as if it were a statutory prescription that limits the obviousness inquiry.

[62] I do not think that Hugessen J.A. in Beloit intended that the rather colourful description of obviousness that he coined be applied in an acontextual manner applicable to all classes of claims. I note particularly that "obvious to try" is not a mandatory test in the United Kingdom or in the United States. It is one factor of a number that should be considered, having regard to the context and the nature of the invention.

[63] In KSR, Kennedy J. warns against an overly rigid rule that limits the obviousness inquiry. Rather, an expansive and flexible approach that

d) La notion d'évidence au Canada

[61] Je cite d'emblée les propos du lord juge Diplock dans l'arrêt Johns-Manville (p. 493-494) :

> [TRADUCTION] Le droit des brevets peut trop facilement être embrouillé par la terminologie employée et par le renvoi à une foule de décisions relatives à d'autres inventions de catégories différentes. Lorsque l'évidence est en cause, le bien-fondé de la décision ne dépend pas de ce que son auteur a paraphrasé ou non le texte de la loi d'une certaine manière. Je doute qu'il existe un libellé convenant à toutes les catégories de revendication.

Même si, en l'espèce, l'évidence ne s'apprécie pas au regard d'un critère expressément prévu dans la loi, mais bien par déduction nécessaire au vu des exigences de la Loi sur les brevets applicables à l'invention, les propos du lord juge Diplock sont néanmoins à-propos, car les tribunaux ont souvent vu dans le libellé de l'arrêt Beloit une prescription légale limitant l'examen de l'évidence.

[62] Je ne pense pas que dans cet arrêt, le juge Hugessen a voulu conférer un caractère universel à la définition plutôt colorée qu'il y donne de l'évidence, de façon qu'elle s'applique indépendamment du contexte à toute catégorie de revendication. Je remarque en particulier que le critère de l'« essai allant de soi » n'est obligatoire ni au Royaume-Uni ni aux États-Unis. Il s'agit d'un élément parmi d'autres selon le contexte et la nature de l'invention.

[63] Dans l'arrêt KSR, le juge Kennedy met en garde contre l'application d'une règle trop rigide qui restreint l'examen portant sur l'évidence. Une would include "any secondary considerations that [will] prove instructive" will be useful (p. 1739). I read KSR as teaching that as in most matters in which a judge or a jury is called upon to make a factual determination, rigid rules are inappropriate unless mandated by statute.

[64] While I do not think the list is exhaustive, the factors set forth by Kitchin J. and adopted by Lord Hoffmann in Lundbeck, referred to at para. 59 of these reasons, are useful guides in deciding whether a particular step was "obvious to try". However, the "obvious to try" test must be approached cautiously. It is only one factor to assist in the obviousness inquiry. It is not a panacea for alleged infringers. The patent system is intended to provide an economic encouragement for research and development. It is well known that this is particularly important in the field of pharmaceuticals and biotechnology.

[65] In Saint-Gobain PAM SA v. Fusion Provida Ltd., [2005] EWCA Civ 177 (BAILII), Jacob L.J. stated, at para. 35:

> Mere possible inclusion of something within a research programme on the basis you will find out more and something might turn up is not enough. If it were otherwise there would be few inventions that were patentable. The only research which would be worthwhile (because of the prospect of protection) would be into areas totally devoid of prospect. The "obvious to try" test really only works where it is more-or-less self-evident that what is being tested ought to work.

In General Tire, Sachs L.J. said, at p. 497:

> "Obvious" is, after all, a much-used word and it does not seem to us that there is any need to go beyond the primary dictionary meaning of "very plain".

In Intellectual Property Law, at p. 136, Professor Vaver also equates "obvious" to "very plain". I am of the opinion that the "obvious to try" test will work only where it is very plain or, to use the words of Jacob L.J., more or less self-evident that what is being tested ought to work.

[66] For a finding that an invention was "obvious to try", there must be evidence to convince a démarche large et flexible englobant [TRADUCTION] « toute considération accessoire pouvant se révéler éclairante » convient davantage (p. 1739). J'en déduis que dans la plupart des cas où il est appelé à statuer sur les faits, le juge ou le jury ne doit appliquer une règle rigide que si la loi l'y oblige.

[64] À mon avis, les facteurs énoncés par le juge Kitchin, puis repris par lord Hoffmann dans l'arrêt Lundbeck (par. 59), ne sont pas exhaustifs, mais offrent des repères pour déterminer si une étape donnée « allait de soi ». Cependant, la notion d'« essai allant de soi » commande la prudence. Ce n'est qu'un des éléments à considérer pour statuer sur l'évidence. Elle ne saurait permettre de réfuter toute allégation de contrefaçon. Le régime des brevets vise à favoriser le financement de la recherche et du développement, ce qui est assurément d'une importance capitale dans le domaine pharmaceutique et celui de la biotechnologie.

[65] Dans l'arrêt Saint-Gobain PAM SA c. Fusion Provida Ltd., [2005] EWCA Civ 177 (BAILII), le lord juge Jacob a dit ce qui suit au par. 35 :

> [TRADUCTION] La seule inclusion possible de quelque chose dans un programme de recherche dans l'optique d'en apprendre davantage et de faire une découverte ne suffit pas. S'il en allait autrement, peu d'inventions seraient brevetables. L'éventualité d'une protection ne justifierait la recherche que dans des domaines n'offrant aucune chance de découverte. La notion d'« essai allant de soi » ne s'applique vraiment que lorsqu'il est plus ou moins évident que l'essai sera fructueux.

Dans l'arrêt General Tire, le lord juge Sachs dit à la p. 497 :

> [TRADUCTION] Après tout, la locution « aller de soi » est très usitée et il ne nous paraît pas nécessaire d'étoffer la principale définition du dictionnaire, à savoir quelque chose de « très clair ».

Dans Intellectual Property Law, le professeur Vaver convient de ce sens (p. 136). J'estime que la notion d'« essai allant de soi » n'est applicable que lorsqu'il est très clair ou, pour reprendre les termes employés par le lord juge Jacob, qu'il est plus ou moins évident, que l'essai sera fructueux.

[66] Pour conclure qu'une invention résulte d'un « essai allant de soi », le tribunal doit être convaincu judge on a balance of probabilities that it was more or less self-evident to try to obtain the invention. Mere possibility that something might turn up is not enough.

[67] It will be useful in an obviousness inquiry to follow the four-step approach first outlined by Oliver L.J. in Windsurfing International Inc. v. Tabur Marine (Great Britain) Ltd., [1985] R.P.C. 59 (C.A.). This approach should bring better structure to the obviousness inquiry and more objectivity and clarity to the analysis. The Windsurfing approach was recently updated by Jacob L.J. in Pozzoli SPA v. BDMO SA, [2007] F.S.R. 37 (p. 872), [2007] EWCA Civ 588, at para. 23:

> In the result I would restate the Windsurfing questions thus:
> (1) (a) Identify the notional "person skilled in the art";
>
> (b) Identify the relevant common general knowledge of that person;
>
> (2) Identify the inventive concept of the claim in question or if that cannot readily be done, construe it;
>
> (3) Identify what, if any, differences exist between the matter cited as forming part of the "state of the art" and the inventive concept of the claim or the claim as construed;
>
> (4) Viewed without any knowledge of the alleged invention as claimed, do those differences constitute steps which would have been obvious to the person skilled in the art or do they require any degree of invention? [Emphasis added.]

It will be at the fourth step of the Windsurfing/Pozzoli approach to obviousness that the issue of "obvious to try" will arise.

i. When Is the "Obvious to Try" Test Appropriate?

[68] In areas of endeavour where advances are often won by experimentation, an "obvious to try" test might be appropriate. In such areas, there may be numerous interrelated variables with which to experiment. For example, some inventions in the pharmaceutical industry might warrant an "obvious selon la prépondérance des probabilités qu'il allait plus ou moins de soi de tenter d'arriver à l'invention. La seule possibilité d'obtenir quelque chose ne suffit pas.

[67] Lors de l'examen relatif à l'évidence, il y a lieu de suivre la démarche à quatre volets d'abord énoncée par le lord juge Oliver dans l'arrêt Windsurfing International Inc. c. Tabur Marine (Great Britain) Ltd., [1985] R.P.C. 59 (C.A.). La démarche devrait assurer davantage de rationalité, d'objectivité et de clarté. Le lord juge Jacob l'a récemment reformulée dans l'arrêt Pozzoli SPA c. BDMO SA, [2007] F.S.R. 37 (p. 872), [2007] EWCA Civ 588, par. 23 :

> [TRADUCTION] Par conséquent, je reformulerais comme suit la démarche préconisée dans l'arrêt Windsurfing :
> (1) a) Identifier la « personne versée dans l'art ».
>
> b) Déterminer les connaissances générales courantes pertinentes de cette personne;
>
> (2) Définir l'idée originale de la revendication en cause, au besoin par voie d'interprétation;
>
> (3) Recenser les différences, s'il en est, entre ce qui ferait partie de « l'état de la technique » et l'idée originale qui sous-tend la revendication ou son interprétation;
>
> (4) Abstraction faite de toute connaissance de l'invention revendiquée, ces différences constituent-elles des étapes évidentes pour la personne versée dans l'art ou dénotent-elles quelque inventivité? [Je souligne.]

La question de l'« essai allant de soi » se pose à la quatrième étape de la démarche établie dans les arrêts Windsurfing et Pozzoli pour statuer sur l'évidence.

i. Dans quels cas la notion d'« essai allant de soi » est-elle pertinente?

[68] Dans les domaines d'activité où les progrès sont souvent le fruit de l'expérimentation, le recours à la notion d'« essai allant de soi » pourrait être indiqué. Dans ces domaines, de nombreuses variables interdépendantes peuvent se prêter à l'expérimentation. Par exemple, certaines inventions to try" test since there may be many chemically similar structures that can elicit different biological responses and offer the potential for significant therapeutic advances.

ii. "Obvious to Try" Considerations

[69] If an "obvious to try" test is warranted, the following factors should be taken into consideration at the fourth step of the obviousness inquiry. As with anticipation, this list is not exhaustive. The factors will apply in accordance with the evidence in each case.

1. Is it more or less self-evident that what is being tried ought to work? Are there a finite number of identified predictable solutions known to persons skilled in the art?

2. What is the extent, nature and amount of effort required to achieve the invention? Are routine trials carried out or is the experimentation prolonged and arduous, such that the trials would not be considered routine?

3. Is there a motive provided in the prior art to find the solution the patent addresses?

[70] Another important factor may arise from considering the actual course of conduct which culminated in the making of the invention. It is true that obviousness is largely concerned with how a skilled worker would have acted in the light of the prior art. But this is no reason to exclude evidence of the history of the invention, particularly where the knowledge of those involved in finding the invention is no lower than what would be expected of the skilled person.

[71] For example, if the inventor and his or her team reached the invention quickly, easily, directly and relatively inexpensively, in light of the prior art and common general knowledge, that may be evidence supporting a finding of obviousness, unless du secteur pharmaceutique pourraient justifier son application étant donné l'existence possible de nombreuses compositions chimiques semblables pouvant donner lieu à des réponses biologiques différentes et être porteuses de progrès thérapeutiques notables.

ii. « Essai allant de soi » : éléments à considérer

[69] Lorsque l'application du critère de l'« essai allant de soi » est justifiée, les éléments énumérés ci-après doivent être pris en compte à la quatrième étape de l'examen de l'évidence. Tout comme ceux pertinents pour l'antériorité, ils ne sont pas exhaustifs et s'appliquent selon la preuve offerte dans le cas considéré.

1. Est-il plus ou moins évident que l'essai sera fructueux? Existe-t-il un nombre déterminé de solutions prévisibles connues des personnes versées dans l'art?

2. Quels efforts — leur nature et leur ampleur — sont requis pour réaliser l'invention? Les essais sont-ils courants ou l'expérimentation est-elle longue et ardue de telle sorte que les essais ne peuvent être qualifiés de courants?

3. L'antériorité fournit-elle un motif de rechercher la solution au problème qui sous-tend le brevet?

[70] Les mesures concrètes ayant mené à l'invention peuvent constituer un autre facteur important. Il est vrai que l'évidence tient en grande partie à la manière dont l'homme du métier aurait agi à la lumière de l'antériorité. Mais on ne saurait pour autant écarter l'historique de l'invention, spécialement lorsque les connaissances des personnes qui sont à l'origine de la découverte sont au moins égales à celles de la personne versée dans l'art.

[71] Par exemple, le fait pour l'inventeur et les membres de son équipe de parvenir à l'invention rapidement, facilement, directement et à relativement peu de frais, compte tenu de l'antériorité et des connaissances générales courantes, pourrait étayer the level at which they worked and their knowledge base was above what should be attributed to the skilled person. Their course of conduct would suggest that a skilled person, using his/her common general knowledge and the prior art, would have acted similarly and come up with the same result. On the other hand, if time, money and effort was expended in research looking for the result the invention ultimately provided before the inventor turned or was instructed to turn to search for the invention, including what turned out to be fruitless "wild goose chases", that evidence may support a finding of non-obviousness. It would suggest that the skilled person, using his/her common general knowledge and the prior art, would have done no better. Indeed, where those involved including the inventor and his or her team were highly skilled in the particular technology involved, the evidence may suggest that the skilled person would have done a lot worse and would not likely have managed to find the invention. It would not have been obvious to him/her to try the course that led to the invention.

(e) Application to the Facts of This Case

[72] Applying the four steps of Windsurfing/Pozzoli, I accept the applications judge's findings of fact where they are unaffected by his rejection of the "obvious to try" test. Where application of the obvious to try test requires further consideration of the evidence, it will be necessary for this Court to make some findings of fact. In this case, I think it is preferable to remitting the matter to the trial judge for redetermination and subjecting his decision to further possible appeals.

[73] Apotex filed its notice of allegation in 2002. It is now some six years later. If the '777 patent is invalid, and provided all other requirements are met, Apotex should be entitled to a notice of compliance from the Minister without any further delay. Indeed, the NOC Regulations are intended to be a summary procedure. I think it is time that this matter finally be resolved. I would conduct the following analysis:

une conclusion d'évidence, sauf lorsque leurs efforts et leurs connaissances se sont révélés plus grands que ceux attribués à la personne versée dans l'art. Leur démarche tendrait à indiquer qu'une personne versée dans l'art, grâce à ses connaissances générales courantes et à l'antériorité, aurait agi de même et serait arrivée au même résultat. Par contre, lorsque temps, fonds et efforts ont été consacrés à la recherche ayant finalement mené à l'invention, et ce, avant que l'inventeur ne se mette à la recherche de l'invention ou qu'on ne lui enjoigne de le faire, y compris les démarches qui se sont révélées vaines et inutiles, une conclusion de non-évidence pourrait être fondée. On pourrait en déduire que la personne versée dans l'art n'aurait pas fait mieux en s'appuyant sur ses connaissances générales courantes et sur l'antériorité. En fait, lorsque les intéressés, y compris l'inventeur et les membres de son équipe, avaient de grandes compétences dans le domaine technique en cause, la preuve pourrait indiquer que la personne versée dans l'art aurait obtenu des résultats bien pires et ne serait vraisemblablement pas parvenue à l'invention. Il ne lui aurait pas paru évident d'emprunter le parcours ayant mené à l'invention.

e) Application aux faits de l'espèce

[72] Au vu des quatre étapes établies dans les arrêts Windsurfing et Pozzoli, je fais miennes les conclusions factuelles du juge de première instance dans la mesure où elles ne sont pas touchées par son rejet du critère de l'essai allant de soi. Lorsque l'application de ce critère commande un examen plus poussé de la preuve, notre Cour doit tirer certaines conclusions de fait. En l'espèce, j'estime cela préférable au renvoi du dossier au juge de première instance pour qu'il rende une nouvelle décision qui pourrait à nouveau donner lieu à des appels.

[73] Apotex a déposé son avis d'allégation en 2002. Six ans se sont écoulés depuis. Si le brevet 777 est invalide et que toutes les autres conditions sont remplies, le ministre devrait lui délivrer un avis de conformité sans délai. La procédure que prévoit le Règlement AC se veut en effet sommaire, et je crois qu'il est temps que l'affaire connaisse enfin un dénouement. Je passe maintenant à l'analyse.

2008 SCC 61 (CanLII)

i. Identify the Notional Person Skilled in the Art

[74] Both parties agreed that a trained pharmachemist is that person.

ii. Identify the Relevant Common General Knowledge of That Person

[75] Apotex reiterates its submissions made with respect to anticipation, insisting that, since the methods of separation were well known, the claimed invention and its advantages would have been obvious to the person skilled in the art. Shore J. found on the evidence before him that there were five well-known methods to separate this racemate into its isomers. However, he did not find that the relative advantage of the dextro-rotatory isomer would have been known by the skilled person.

iii. Identify the Inventive Concept of the Claim in Question or, if That Cannot Readily Be Done, Construe It

[76] The construction of the claims in the '777 patent is not an issue. It is agreed that they constitute the dextro-rotatory isomer of the racemate and its pharmaceutically acceptable salts and processes for obtaining them.

[77] The inventive concept of the claims is not readily discernable from the claims themselves. A bare chemical formula in a patent claim may not be sufficient to determine its inventiveness. In such cases, I think it must be acceptable to read the specification in the patent to determine the inventive concept of the claims. Of course, it is not permissible to read the specification in order to construe the claims more narrowly or widely than the text will allow.

[78] In the present case, it is apparent that the inventive concept of the claims in the '777 patent is a compound useful in inhibiting platelet aggregation which has greater therapeutic effect and less toxicity than the other compounds of the '875 patent and the methods for obtaining that compound.

i. Identifier la personne versée dans l'art

[74] Les deux parties conviennent que la personne versée dans l'art est le chimiste pharmaceutique de formation.

ii. Déterminer les connaissances générales courantes pertinentes de cette personne fictive

[75] Apotex présente les mêmes observations que pour l'antériorité en insistant sur le fait que, les méthodes de séparation étant bien connues, l'invention revendiquée et ses avantages auraient été évidents pour la personne versée dans l'art. Au vu du dossier, le juge de première instance a conclu que cinq méthodes bien connues permettaient d'isoler les isomères du racémate. Il n'a toutefois pas estimé que la personne versée dans l'art aurait connu l'avantage relatif de l'isomère dextrogyre.

iii. Définir l'idée originale de la revendication en cause, au besoin par voie d'interprétation [76] L'interprétation des revendications du brevet 777 n'est pas en cause. Il est entendu que celles-ci visent l'isomère dextrogyre du racémate, ses sels pharmaceutiquement acceptables et leurs procédés d'obtention.

[77] Il n'est pas facile de saisir l'idée originale à partir ses seules revendications. La seule présence d'une formule chimique ne permet pas de déterminer l'inventivité de la revendication. J'estime donc que l'on doit pouvoir se fonder sur le mémoire descriptif pour définir l'idée originale qui sous-tend les revendications. On ne saurait cependant s'appuyer sur le mémoire descriptif pour interpréter le texte des revendications de façon plus restrictive ou plus extensive.

[78] En l'espèce, il est clair que l'idée originale à la base des revendications du brevet 777 est un antiplaquettaire à l'effet thérapeutique supérieur et à la toxicité moindre comparativement aux autres composés couverts par le brevet 875, et les méthodes permettant de l'obtenir.

iv. Identify What if Any Differences Exist Between the '875 Patent and the '777 Patent [79] The '875 patent disclosed over 250,000 possible different compounds predicted to inhibit platelet aggregation. Twenty-one compounds were made and tested. Nothing distinguishes the racemate in this case from other compounds disclosed or tested in terms of therapeutic effect or toxicity. As stated above, there is no disclosure in the '875 patent of the specific beneficial properties associated with the dextro-rotatory isomer of this racemate in isolation; nor was there disclosure of any advantages which flow from using the bisulfate salt of the dextro-rotatory isomer. The '875 patent did not differentiate between the properties of the racemate, its dextro-rotatory isomer and levo-rotatory isomer or indeed the other compounds made and tested or predicted to work.

[80] On the other hand, the '777 patent claims that the invention of the dextro-rotatory isomer of the racemate, clopidogrel, and its bisulfate salt discloses their beneficial properties over the levo-rotatory isomer and the racemate and expressly describes how to separate the racemate into its isomers.

v. Viewed Without Any Knowledge of the '777 Patent, Do Those Differences Constitute Steps Which Would Have Been Obvious to the Person Skilled in the Art or Do They Require a Degree of Inventiveness?

[81] At this stage, it must be determined whether the nature of the invention in this case is such as to warrant an "obvious to try" test. The discovery of the dextro-rotary isomer and its bisulfate salt came after experimentation. There were interrelated variables with which Mr. Badorc had to experiment. An "obvious to try" test in this case would recognize the evidence of the expert witnesses as to the discovery of the beneficial properties of the dextro-rotary isomer and its bisulfate salt and the methods for finding them.

iv. Recenser les différences, s'il en est, entre les brevets 875 et 777

[79] Le brevet 875 divulgue plus de 250 000 composés possibles dont il prédit l'effet antiplaquettaire. Vingt et un ont été synthétisés et analysés. Rien ne distingue le racémate visé en l'espèce des autres composés divulgués ou analysés quant à leur effet thérapeutique ou à leur toxicité. Je rappelle que le brevet 875 ne divulgue aucun avantage particulier associé à l'isomère dextrogyre de ce racémate, une fois isolé, ni aucun avantage découlant de l'utilisation du bisulfate de l'isomère dextrogyre. Il n'établit aucune différence entre les propriétés du racémate, celles de l'isomère dextrogyre et celles de l'isomère lévogyre, non plus qu'entre les avantages des autres composés synthétisés, analysés ou dont il prédit l'efficacité.

[80] En revanche, le brevet 777 revendique l'invention de l'isomère dextrogyre du racémate, le clopidogrel et de son bisulfate, divulgue leurs avantages par rapport à l'isomère lévogyre et au racémate, et énonce expressément le procédé de séparation des isomères du racémate.

v. Abstraction faite de toute connaissance de l'invention revendiquée dans le brevet 777, ces différences constituent-elles des étapes évidentes pour la personne versée dans l'art ou dénotent-elles quelque inventivité?

[81] La question est maintenant de savoir si la nature de l'invention en cause justifie l'application du critère de l'« essai allant de soi ». La découverte de l'isomère dextrogyre et de son bisulfate est issue de l'expérimentation. Il y avait des variables interdépendantes avec lesquelles M. Badorc devait faire des expériences. L'application du critère de l'« essai allant de soi » en l'espèce rendrait recevable le témoignage des témoins experts sur la découverte des avantages de l'isomère dextrogyre et de son bisulfate ainsi que sur leurs procédés d'obtention.

2008 SCC 61 (CanLII)

[82] The applications judge cannot be faulted for the analysis he conducted as far as it went. However, he erred in not allowing for the application of the "obvious to try" test, which is warranted in this case.

[83] The following factors are therefore relevant at this fourth step of the obviousness inquiry:

(1) Is It More or Less Self-Evident That What Is Being Tried Ought to Work?

[84] As I have observed earlier, Shore J. found that the skilled person would not know, before separating this particular racemate into its isomers and then testing the separated isomers, that the properties of the dextro-rotatory isomer would be different from the properties of the racemate or the levo-rotatory isomer (para. 81). Similarly, he found that the person skilled in the art would not know before trying the different salts in combination with the dextro-rotatory isomer what the bisulfate salt's beneficial properties would be (para. 82).

[85] Just because there are known methods of separating a racemate into its isomers does not mean that a person skilled in the art would necessarily apply them. The fact that there are such known methods of separation will be of no account if the evidence does not prove that it was more or less self-evident to try them. It is true that at the relevant time there was evidence that a skilled person would know that the properties of a racemate and its isomers might be different. However, a possibility of finding the invention is not enough. The invention must be self-evident from the prior art and common general knowledge in order to satisfy the "obvious to try" test. That is not the evidence in this case.

(2) What Is the Extent, Nature and Amount of Effort Required to Achieve the Invention?

[86] As indicated, the applications judge found that there were five well-known techniques for separating this racemate into its isomers. He also found that there was no evidence that at the relevant time, a person skilled in the art would know

[82] On ne peut reprocher quoi que ce soit à l'analyse que le juge de première instance a cru bon d'effectuer. Cependant, il aurait dû en outre permettre l'application — justifiée en l'espèce — du critère de l'« essai allant de soi ».

[83] Les considérations suivantes sont donc pertinentes à cette quatrième étape de l'examen portant sur l'évidence.

(1) Est-il plus ou moins évident que l'essai sera fructueux?

[84] Comme je le fais remarquer précédemment, le juge Shore conclut que la personne versée dans l'art n'aurait pu savoir que l'isomère dextrogyre présentait des avantages différents de ceux du racémate et de l'isomère lévogyre avant d'isoler les isomères du racémate et d'analyser chacun d'eux (par. 81). Il ajoute que la personne versée dans l'art n'aurait pu connaître les avantages du bisulfate avant de combiner les différents sels avec l'isomère dextrogyre (par. 82).

[85] La seule existence de procédés connus permettant d'isoler les isomères d'un racémate ne signifie pas qu'une personne versée dans l'art y recourerait nécessairement. Il n'est d'ailleurs pas tenu compte de l'existence de tels procédés lorsque aucun élément n'établit qu'il allait plus ou moins de soi d'y recourir. Il est vrai que, selon la preuve, à l'époque considérée, une personne versée dans l'art aurait su que les avantages d'un racémate pouvaient différer de ceux de ses isomères. Toutefois, la possibilité de découvrir l'invention ne suffit pas. Pour satisfaire au critère de l'« essai allant de soi », l'invention doit être évidente au regard de l'antériorité et des connaissances générales courantes, ce que la preuve n'établit pas en l'espèce.

(2) Quels efforts — leur nature et leur ampleur — sont requis pour réaliser l'invention?

[86] Je le rappelle, le juge de première instance a conclu que cinq techniques connues permettaient d'isoler les isomères du racémate. Il a aussi estimé que rien n'établissait qu'à l'époque considérée, une personne versée dans l'art aurait su laquelle aurait which one would work with the racemate at issue in this case. The evidence was that a skilled person would eventually find the right technique.

[87] As earlier indicated, Shore J. also found that there was no evidence that at the relevant time a person skilled in the art would know before separating the racemate and testing the isomers what their properties would be, although the specific properties of the isomers could be discovered. There was evidence that, using known techniques, the properties of different pharmaceutically acceptable salts to be used with the dextro-rotatory isomer could be discovered.

[88] However, in considering whether it was "obvious to try" to find the invention, once it was decided to isolate the dextro-rotatory isomer, the methods for doing so were known, the methods for testing the properties of the isomers were known and the method for determining the beneficial properties of the salts to be used with the isomer would also have been known.

[89] According to Mr. Badorc's affidavit, it took from November 1985 to April 1986 to find the '777 invention, and he was already familiar with the '875 invention. Potentially five different methods to separate the racemate would have had to have been tried and tested before determining the properties of the dextro-rotatory isomer. As in the case of anticipation, one might infer that the applications judge, if asked to decide this question, would have held that the investigation here was not routine, but rather was prolonged and arduous. In any event, on the facts of this case, this factor would assume small significance in view of the finding I make with respect to the whole course of conduct discussed at para. 91 below.

(3) Is There a Motive From the Prior Art to Find the Solution That the '777 Patent Addresses?

[90] It is well known that the pharmaceutical industry is intensely competitive. Market participants are continuously in search of new and fonctionné pour le racémate en cause. Suivant la preuve, une personne versée dans l'art aurait fini par trouver la bonne.

[87] Comme je l'ai déjà signalé, le juge Shore a par ailleurs conclu qu'aucun élément n'établissait qu'à l'époque considérée, une personne versée dans l'art aurait connu les avantages des isomères avant de les séparer du racémate et de les analyser, même si ces avantages pouvaient être découverts. Suivant la preuve, en recourant à des techniques connues, il était possible de découvrir les avantages de différents sels pharmaceutiquement acceptables combinés avec l'isomère dextrogyre.

[88] Cependant, pour ce qui est de savoir s'il « allait de soi » de tenter de découvrir l'invention, une fois prise la décision d'isoler l'isomère dextrogyre, les méthodes pour y parvenir étaient connues, celles permettant d'analyser les avantages des isomères étaient également connues et le procédé pour déterminer les avantages des sels combinés avec l'isomère l'était lui aussi.

[89] Selon l'affidavit du D^r^ Badorc, les travaux entrepris en novembre 1985 pour découvrir l'invention visée par le brevet 777 se sont poursuivis jusqu'en avril 1986, et le témoin connaissait déjà l'invention protégée par le brevet 875. Il aurait pu être nécessaire de recourir à cinq méthodes de séparation du racémate avant de déterminer les avantages de l'isomère dextrogyre. Comme pour l'antériorité, on pourrait déduire que s'il avait été appelé à trancher cette question, le juge aurait conclu qu'il ne s'agissait pas d'essais courants, mais bien d'une expérimentation longue et ardue. Quoi qu'il en soit, dans la présente affaire, il s'agit d'une élément négligeable étant donné la conclusion que je tire concernant l'ensemble de la démarche analysée ci-après au par. 91.

(3) L'antériorité fournit-elle un motif de rechercher la solution au problème qui sous-tend le brevet 777?

[90] Le secteur pharmaceutique est sans conteste extrêmement concurrentiel. Les entreprises sont toujours à l'affût de médicaments nouveaux et improved medications and want to reach the market with them as soon as possible. So demand for an effective and non-toxic product to inhibit platelet aggregation might be assumed to exist. However, nothing in the '875 patent or common general knowledge provided a specific motivation for the skilled person to pursue the '777 invention. The prior patent was a genus patent, and selection might be expected. However, the prior patent did not differentiate between the efficacy and the toxicity of any of the compounds it covered. This suggests that what to select or omit was not then self-evident to the person skilled in the art.

(4) What Is the Course of Conduct Which Was Followed Which Culminated in the Making of the Invention?

[91] Mr. Badorc's affidavit reveals that for several years prior to November 1985, Sanofi was in the process of developing the racemate in its salified form. In November 1985, the racemate was being tested in preliminary human clinical trials. It was at that time that Mr. Badorc was asked to separate the racemate into its isomers. After he discovered that the dextro-rotatory isomer was active and non-toxic and that the levo-rotatory isomer was non-active and toxic, Sanofi decided to develop the dextro-rotatory isomer and abandon its work on the racemate. However, this was after it had "spent millions of dollars and several years developing [the racemate] up to the point of preliminary human clinical trials" without at least trying to see if the dextro-rotatory isomer had advantageous properties to those of the racemate (Affidavit of Mr. Badorc, at para. 25). This evidence was uncontradicted.

(5) Was the Invention of the '777 Patent "Obvious to Try"?

[92] The methods to obtain the invention of the '777 patent were common general knowledge. It can be assumed that there was a motive to find a non-toxic efficacious product to inhibit platelet aggregation in the blood. However, it was not self-evident from the '875 patent or common general knowledge what the properties of the dextro-rotatory isomer of améliorés qu'elles veulent commercialiser dès que possible. La demande d'un antiplaquettaire efficace et non-toxique peut donc être présumée. Toutefois, ni le brevet 875 ni ses connaissances générales courantes ne donnaient à la personne versée dans l'art un motif de rechercher l'objet du brevet 777. Le brevet antérieur était un brevet de genre, de sorte qu'une sélection était prévisible. Il n'établissait cependant pas de distinction entre les composés quant à leur efficacité et à leur toxicité, ce qui donne à penser que ce qu'il y avait lieu de retenir ou d'omettre n'était alors pas évident pour la personne versée dans l'art.

(4) Quelle démarche a mené à l'invention?

[91] L'affidavit du D^r^ Badorc révèle que plusieurs années avant novembre 1985, Sanofi était à mettre au point la forme salifiée du racémate. En novembre 1985, le racémate a fait l'objet d'essais cliniques préliminaires chez l'humain. C'est alors qu'on a demandé au D^r^ Badorc d'isoler les isomères du racémate. Après la découverte de l'activité et de la non-toxicité de l'isomère dextrogyre et de la non-activité et de la toxicité de l'isomère lévogyre, les travaux de Sanofi ont porté non plus sur le racémate, mais sur l'isomère dextrogyre. Cette décision a toutefois été prise après que Sanofi eut « consacré des millions de dollars et des années de travaux à la mise au point [du racémate] et à la tenue d'essais cliniques préliminaires chez l'humain » sans au moins tenter de déterminer si l'isomère dextrogyre avait des avantages par rapport au racémate (affidavit du D^r^ Badorc, par. 25). Ce témoignage n'a pas été contredit.

(5) L'invention visée par le brevet 777 « allait-elle de soi »?

[92] Les moyens de parvenir à l'objet du brevet 777 faisaient partie des connaissances générales courantes. On peut supposer qu'il existait un motif de chercher un produit efficace et non toxique inhibant l'agrégation des plaquettes dans le sang. Cependant, ni le brevet 875 ni les connaissances générales courantes ne rendaient évidents les this racemate would be or what the bisulfate salt's beneficial properties would be and therefore that what was being tried ought to work. The course of conduct and the time involved throughout demonstrate that the advantage of the dextro-rotatory isomer was not quickly or easily predictable. Had the dextro-rotatory isomer been "obvious to try", it is difficult to believe that Sanofi would not have opted for it before unnecessary time and investment were spent on the racemate. I conclude that the prior art and common general knowledge of persons skilled in the art at the relevant time were not sufficient for it to be more or less self-evident to try to find the dextro-rotatory isomer.

(f) Conclusion on Obviousness

[93] As I have earlier explained, there was a significant difference between the '875 genus patent and the '777 selection patent. The difference was not obvious. Having regard to the foregoing analysis, I conclude that the allegation of obviousness is not justified.

VII. Double Patenting

[94] Apotex also bases its challenge to the validity of the '777 patent on double patenting. Apotex also challenges the validity of the doctrine of selection patents itself on this basis.

[95] There may only be one patent covering an invention (Whirlpool Corp. v. Camco Inc., [2000] 2 S.C.R. 1067, 2000 SCC 67, at para. 63). Apotex says that a selection patent claims the same invention as the original class or genus patent and as a result, the selection patent cannot be valid.

[96] The concern expressed by Apotex is that the doctrine of selection patents allows a patent holder to "evergreen" an invention. The original genus patent is granted for a finite period of years. If a selection patent is later obtained by the owner of the genus patent covering the same invention as the genus patent, the number of years the owner is entitled to exclude others from making or using the invention is extended, contrary to the limited period of exclusivity provided by the original patent.

propriétés de l'isomère dextrogyre du racémate ou les avantages du bisulfate, de sorte qu'il n'était pas évident que l'essai serait fructueux. Les efforts et le temps consacrés démontrent qu'il n'était pas possible de prédire rapidement ou aisément l'avantage que présentait l'isomère dextrogyre. S'il était allé de soi d'isoler l'isomère dextrogyre, il est difficile de croire que Sanofi ne l'aurait pas fait au lieu de consacrer en vain temps et argent au racémate. Je conclus que l'antériorité et les connaissances générales courantes des personnes versées dans l'art à l'époque considérée n'étaient pas suffisantes pour qu'il aille plus ou moins de soi de tenter d'isoler l'isomère dextrogyre.

f) Conclusion sur le caractère évident

[93] Je le répète, le brevet de genre 875 se distinguait sensiblement du brevet de sélection 777. La différence n'était pas évidente. Eu égard à l'analyse qui précède, je conclus que l'allégation d'évidence n'est pas fondée.

VII. La double protection

[94] Apotex attaque la validité du brevet 777 en alléguant également la double protection. Elle conteste aussi le bien-fondé de la notion de brevet de sélection pour le même motif.

[95] Un seul brevet peut être accordé pour une invention (Whirlpool Corp. c. Camco Inc., [2000] 2 R.C.S. 1067, 2000 CSC 67, par. 63). Apotex soutient qu'un brevet de sélection revendique la même invention que le brevet initial ou brevet de genre, en sorte que le brevet de sélection ne peut être valide.

[96] Apotex déplore en fait que la notion de brevet de sélection permette la « perpétuation » d'un brevet. Le brevet de genre d'origine est délivré pour un nombre d'années déterminé. Si son titulaire obtient ultérieurement un brevet de sélection pour la même invention, le nombre d'années pendant lesquelles il jouit d'un monopole pour la fabrication ou l'utilisation de l'invention en est accru, ce qui est incompatible avec la durée limitée du monopole accordé initialement.

[97] Evergreening is a legitimate concern and, depending on the circumstances, strategies that attempt to extend the time limit of exclusivity of a patent may be contrary to the objectives of the Patent Act. The Act aims to promote inventiveness by conferring exclusivity for a limited period of time while providing for public disclosure of the invention to enable others to make or use it after expiry of the period of exclusivity.

[98] However, a generalized concern about evergreening is not a justification for an attack on the doctrine of selection patents for two reasons. First, a selection patent may be sought by a party other than the inventor or owner of the original genus patent. In such a case, anticipation or obviousness may be an issue, but evergreening does not arise.

[99] At the hearing, counsel for Apotex submitted that, in the pharmaceutical industry, the only party that would ever attempt to obtain a selection patent would be the genus patent holder. This is a highly competitive industry and a market participant who is able to develop a more effective product might be expected to be anxious to do so and seek patent protection through a selection patent even if it requires the making of an agreement with the holder of the genus patent to allow for the marketing of the selected product. However, even if counsel is correct, the doctrine of genus and selection patents is not restricted to the pharmaceutical industry. It is of general applicability.

[100] Second and more importantly, selection patents encourage improvements by selection. The inventor selects only a bit of the subject matter of the original genus patent because that bit does something better than and different from what was claimed in the genus patent.

[101] The applications judge found that the claims of the ‘777 and ‘875 patents were not identical or coterminous. I agree with him. Apotex’s factum compares claims 1, 8, 14 and 15 of the ‘875 patent with claims 1 and 3 of the ‘777 patent.

[97] La perpétuation du brevet est une préoccupation légitime. Selon les circonstances, les stratégies visant à accroître la durée du monopole peuvent aller à l’encontre de l’objectif de la Loi sur les brevets, qui est de favoriser l’inventivité par l’octroi d’une exclusivité pour un temps tout en assurant la divulgation de l’invention pour permettre sa réalisation et son utilisation par autrui une fois le brevet expiré.

[98] Cependant, cette préoccupation générale ne justifie pas la remise en question du brevet de sélection en soi, et ce, pour deux raisons. Premièrement, l’obtention d’un brevet de sélection peut intéresser une autre personne que l’inventeur ou le titulaire du brevet de genre d’origine, auquel cas la question de l’antériorité ou de l’évidence peut se poser, mais non celle de la perpétuation.

[99] À l’audience, les avocats d’Apotex ont fait valoir que dans le domaine pharmaceutique, la seule personne susceptible de demander un brevet de sélection est le titulaire du brevet de genre. Dans un secteur d’activité aussi concurrentiel, une entreprise qui est en mesure de mettre au point un produit plus efficace pourrait être impatiente de le faire et demander un brevet de sélection, même s’il lui fallait conclure un accord avec le titulaire du brevet de genre pour la commercialisation du produit en cause. Et même si Apotex a raison, des brevets de genre et de sélection sont accordés dans d’autres secteurs que celui de la pharmaceutique. Le principe qui les sous-tend a vocation générale.

[100] Deuxièmement et surtout, le brevet de sélection favorise le perfectionnement par voie de sélection. L’inventeur ne sélectionne qu’un élément de l’objet du brevet de genre d’origine parce qu’il obtient ainsi quelque chose de mieux et de différent par rapport à ce qui est revendiqué dans le brevet initial.

[101] Le juge de première instance a conclu que les revendications des brevets 777 et 875 n’étaient pas identiques. Je suis d’accord avec lui. Dans son mémoire, Apotex compare les revendications 1, 8, 14 et 15 du brevet 875 et les revendications 1 et 3 du brevet 777.

'875 Patent

Claim 1 "A process for the preparation of derivatives of general formula (I): . . . as well as the 2 enantiomers or their mixture [racemate] of these compounds of formula (I); wherein: . . . if desired, its enantiomers are separated and/or it is salified by mineral or organic acid action; . . ." [102] Although Apotex does not expressly state which of the '875 and '777 claims it is comparing, it is apparent, for double patenting purposes, that there is no identity between the product claims 1 and 3 of the '777 patent and claims 1, 8 and 15 of the '875 patent because claims 1 and 8 are process claims and claim 15 is a product by process claim. The only comparison that need be considered is between claim 14 of the '875 patent and claim 1 of the '777 patent. Claim 3 of the '777 patent reflects

[102] Bien qu'Apotex ne dise pas expressément quelles revendications des brevets 875 et 777 elle compare, il est évident qu'en ce qui concerne la question de la double protection, les revendications de produit 1 et 3 du brevet 777 et les revendications 1, 8 et 15 du brevet 875 ne sont pas identiques, car les revendications 1 et 8 visent des procédés, et la revendication 15, un produit obtenu grâce à l'un de ces procédés. La seule comparaison à considérer est celle de la revendication 14 du brevet 875 et de

the hydrogen sulfate of claim 1 of the '777 patent, so that if claim 1 is not invalid, claim 3 will not be invalid either.

[103] Claim 14 of the '875 patent claims all derivatives of general formula (I) as well as the two isomers and the racemic mixture. It is a broad claim for a class or genus. Claim 1 of the '777 patent is specific. It claims only the dextro-rotatory isomer of the racemate. This is a typical selection patent.

[104] Sound prediction was the basis for granting the original genus patent. That had to be the case when the genus involved over 250,000 possible compounds. Not every compound would itself have been tested. But there was, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Patents, sound prediction that what was included in the original genus patent was new, useful and not obvious. It was later determined that some of the subject matter of the original genus patent did not work or did not work as well as the subject matter of the selection patent. That information is valuable.

[105] The doctrine of "sound prediction", explicitly adopted by this Court in Monsanto Co. v. Commissioner of Patents, [1979] 2 S.C.R. 1108, balances the public interest in early disclosure of new and useful inventions even before their utility has been fully verified by tests, and the public interest in avoiding cluttering the public domain with useless patents and granting monopoly rights in exchange for misinformation: see Apotex Inc. v. Wellcome Foundation Ltd., [2002] 4 S.C.R. 153, 2002 SCC 77, at para. 66. In Monsanto, Pigeon J., writing for the majority, drew the following conclusion, at p. 1117:

I have quoted again the passage quoted by the [Patent Appeal] Board because I consider the last sentence of the paragraph of some importance as it does clearly indicate what is meant by a "sound prediction". It cannot mean a certainty since it does not exclude all la revendication 1 du brevet 777. La revendication 3 du brevet 777 correspond à l'hydrogénosulfate de l'objet de la revendication 1 du brevet 777, de sorte que si la revendication 1 n'est pas invalide, la revendication 3 ne l'est pas non plus.

[103] La revendication 14 du brevet 875 vise tous les dérivés de formule générale I, ainsi que les deux isomères et le mélange racémique. Elle est générale et vise une catégorie ou un genre. La revendication 1 du brevet 777 est spécifique et ne vise que l'isomère dextrogyre du racémate. C'est un brevet de sélection type.

[104] La délivrance du brevet de genre d'origine avait pour fondement la prédiction valable, ce qui est nécessairement le cas lorsque plus de 250 000 composés possibles sont en cause. Ces composés n'avaient pas tous été analysés. Cependant, le commissaire aux brevets a estimé qu'on pouvait raisonnablement conclure que l'objet du brevet de genre d'origine était nouveau, utile et non évident. On a ultérieurement déterminé que l'efficacité de certains éléments de l'objet du brevet de genre d'origine était nulle ou, du moins, inférieure à celle de l'objet du brevet de sélection. Il s'agit d'une donnée très utile.

[105] Retenu expressément par notre Cour dans l'arrêt Monsanto Co. c. Commissaire des brevets, [1979] 2 R.C.S. 1108, le critère de la « prédiction valable » met en balance le souci de divulguer rapidement, dans l'intérêt public, toute invention nouvelle et utile avant même que son utilité n'ait été confirmée sans réserve par des essais et le souci, toujours dans l'intérêt public, de ne pas encombrer le domaine public de brevets inutiles et de ne pas accorder un monopole pour une mésinformation : voir Apotex Inc. c. Wellcome Foundation Ltd., [2002] 4 R.C.S. 153, 2002 CSC 77, par. 66. Dans l'arrêt Monsanto, au nom des juges majoritaires, le juge Pigeon a tiré les conclusions suivantes (p. 1117) :

Si j'ai cité de nouveau le passage cité par la Commission [d'appel des brevets], c'est que je suis d'avis que la dernière phrase est importante parce qu'elle indique clairement ce que l'on entend par « prédiction valable ». Il ne peut s'agir d'une certitude puisqu'elle n'exclut risk that some of the area covered may prove devoid of utility. It thus appears to me that the test formulated by Graham J. [in Olin Mathieson Chemical Corp. v. Biorex Laboratories Ltd., [1970] R.P.C. 157 (Ch. D.)] involves just two possible reasons for rejecting claims such as those in issue.

> 1. There is evidence of lack of utility in respect of some of the area covered; [or]
>
> 2. It is not a sound prediction. [Emphasis added.]

This approach has been consistently accepted by courts in Canada (see for example Ciba-Geigy AG v. Commissioner of Patents (1982), 65 C.P.R. (2d) 73 (F.C.A.)).

[106] In the present case, it was found that the levo-rotatory isomer did not work at all and was toxic. The racemate did not work as well as the dextro-rotatory isomer. Isolating the dextro-rotatory isomer as being more effective and less toxic than other compounds of the genus patent is a valuable advance to be encouraged as a matter of patent policy.

[107] It is true that the sound prediction of the '875 patent that the racemate and the levo-rotatory isomer produced the same results as the dextro-rotatory isomer was not borne out. That may leave parts of the original genus patent open to challenge. But it does not affect the validity of the selection patent.

[108] Apotex argues that the focus in a double patenting challenge is on the claims of the two patents rather than on the disclosure. I agree. In Whirlpool, Binnie J. stated, at para. 63:

> It is clear that the prohibition against double patenting involves a comparison of the claims rather than the disclosure, because it is the claims that define the monopoly.

Whirlpool was not a selection patent case. However, because selection patents are to be subject to the same considerations as other patents, the clear statement of Binnie J. in Whirlpool must apply to selection patents.

pas tout risque qu'une partie du domaine visé puisse se révéler inutile. Le critère formulé par le juge Graham [dans la décision Olin Mathieson Chemical Corp. c. Biorex Laboratories Ltd., [1970] R.P.C. 157 (Ch. D.)] me paraît donc présenter seulement deux motifs possibles pour rejeter des revendications comme celles en litige.

> 1. Il y a preuve de l'inutilité d'une partie du domaine visé; [ou]
> 2. Ce n'est pas une prédiction valable. [Je souligne.]

Telle a toujours été la position des tribunaux canadiens (voir p. ex. Ciba-Geigy AG c. Canada (Commissaire des brevets), [1982] A.C.F. nº 425 (QL) (C.A.)).

[106] Dans la présente affaire, on a constaté que l'isomère lévogyre était inefficace et toxique. Le racémate n'était pas aussi efficace que l'isomère dextrogyre. La découverte que l'isomère dextrogyre était plus efficace et moins toxique que les autres composés du brevet de genre représente un progrès appréciable digne d'être encouragé par la politique en matière de brevet.

[107] Il est vrai que la prédiction valable du brevet 875 selon laquelle le racémate et l'isomère lévogyre produiraient les mêmes résultats que l'isomère dextrogyre ne s'est pas avérée. Certains éléments du brevet de genre d'origine pourraient de ce fait être contestés, mais le brevet de sélection demeure valide.

[108] Apotex fait valoir qu'une allégation de double protection s'attache aux revendications des deux brevets, et non à la divulgation. J'en conviens. Dans l'arrêt Whirlpool, le juge Binnie a dit ce qui suit au par. 63 :

> Il est clair que l'interdiction du double brevet implique une comparaison des revendications plutôt que des divulgations, car ce sont les revendications qui définissent le monopole.

Dans cette affaire, le litige ne portait pas sur un brevet de sélection. Mais puisque le brevet de sélection doit être considéré comme tout autre brevet, les propos sans équivoque du juge Binnie s'appliquent aussi à son égard.

2008 SCC 61 (CanLII)

[109] I agree with Apotex that a challenge to patent validity based on double patenting does not require the existence of identical language in the two patent claims. Even so, the wording of the claims, however different, must claim the same invention.

[110] The invention defined by claim 14 of the '875 patent is not the same as the invention claimed by claim 1 of the '777 patent because the former is broader than the latter. Although not a selection patent case, there is a striking passage in the judgment of Lord Simonds in May & Baker Ltd. v. Boots Pure Drug Co. (1950), 67 R.P.C. 23 (H.L.), at p. 32. It describes a scenario very much the same as in the case at bar:

> Is there then a difference in the inventions claimed in the original and amended specifications? On the one hand a vast range of possible compounds, a fragment no doubt in the whole sphere of organic chemistry yet so numerous that the number becomes meaningless, within which no one can say what hidden things might be brought to light, what benefits discovered for the relief of humanity. On the other hand two specific drugs. Are these inventions the same or different inventions? My Lords, I hesitate to appeal to common sense, lest others should take a different view of the case. Yet in the consensus of opinion of all the learned judges who have dealt with this matter I find justification for the view which I most emphatically hold that it is plain common sense to say that the inventions are not the same but different: and I think that, if they are different, the substantial difference could not be denied.

I think Lord Simonds' comments cover this case precisely.

[111] To this point, the issue has been what is sometimes called "same invention" double patenting. This is the main thrust of Apotex's double patenting argument. The applications judge found that the claims in the '777 and '875 patents were not identical or coterminous, requirements to prove same invention double patenting: see Whirlpool, at paras. 64-65.

[112] Apotex also relies on "obviousness" double patenting. Binnie J. explains in Whirlpool, at para. 66, that "obviousness" double patenting

[109] Je conviens avec Apotex que l'existence de la double protection n'exige pas que les revendications soient formulées de la même manière dans les deux brevets. Néanmoins, le libellé des revendications, même s'il est différent, doit décrire la même invention.

[110] L'invention correspondant à la revendication 14 du brevet 875 n'est pas la même que celle visée par la revendication 1 du brevet 777, car la première a une plus grande portée que la seconde. Dans l'arrêt May & Baker Ltd. c. Boots Pure Drug Co. (1950), 67 R.P.C. 23 (H.L.), qui ne porte pas sur un brevet de sélection, Lord Simonds décrit néanmoins de manière saisissante un scénario très semblable à celui de la présente espèce (p. 32) :

> [TRADUCTION] Y a-t-il alors une différence entre les inventions revendiquées dans le mémoire descriptif d'origine et le mémoire descriptif modifié? D'un côté, une vaste gamme de composés possibles, représentant sans doute une parcelle de la chimie organique considérée dans sa totalité, mais si nombreux que leur nombre ne veut plus rien dire, chacun étant susceptible de receler quelque secret ou de présenter des avantages pour le genre humain. De l'autre, deux médicaments spécifiques. Ces inventions sont-elles identiques ou différentes? J'hésite, chers collègues, à faire appel au sens commun de crainte que d'autres diffèrent d'opinion en l'espèce. Néanmoins, l'unanimité des juges saisis de la question me conforte dans l'opinion bien arrêtée qu'il tombe sous le sens que les inventions ne sont pas identiques, mais différentes. Et si elles sont différentes, je crois que leur différence essentielle ne peut être niée.

À mon avis, les remarques de lord Simonds s'appliquent en tous points à la présente espèce.

[111] À cet égard, le litige porte sur ce que l'on appelle parfois le double brevet relatif à la « même invention ». C'est l'essentiel de la thèse de la double protection d'Apotex. Le juge de première instance a conclu qu'il n'y avait pas « identité » des revendications des brevets 777 et 875, ce qu'exige la preuve du double brevet relatif à la même invention : voir Whirlpool, par. 64-65.

[112] Apotex invoque par ailleurs le double brevet relatif à une « évidence ». Dans l'arrêt Whirlpool, le juge Binnie explique au par. 66 :

is a more flexible and less literal test that prohibits the issuance of a second patent with claims that are not "patentably distinct" from those of the earlier patent.

In Commissioner of Patents v. Farbwerke Hoechst Aktiengesellschaft Vormals Meister Lucius & Bruning, it was held that even though the claims were not identical nor coterminous, the dilution of a new substance once its medical uses were established in the first patent did not result in a further invention justifying a second patent. Even though the claims were not identical or coterminous, the subsequent patent was found to be invalid.

[113] A selection patent that claims a compound that is patentably distinct from the genus patent will not be invalid for obviousness double patenting. Here, out of the many compounds predicted to be effective as exhibiting platelet aggregation inhibiting activity in the '875 patent, it was found that the dextro-rotatory isomer of the racemate relevant in this case had beneficial properties over both the racemate and the levo-rotatory isomer. As I have explained above, the claims in the '777 patent reflect a patentably distinct compound from the compounds in the '875 patent. As a result, there is no basis for a challenge based on "obviousness" double patenting.

[114] While double patenting requires a comparison of the claims of a genus and selection patent, it is necessary that the specification of the selection patent define in clear terms the nature of the characteristic which the patentee alleges to be possessed by the selection for which he claims a monopoly. See I. G. Farbenindustrie, at p. 323. Here the '777 specification satisfies this requirement by providing, at p. 1:

> In an unexpected manner only the dextro-rotatory enantiomer I_d exhibits a platelet aggregation inhibiting activity, the levo-rotatory enantiomer I_l being inactive. Moreover, the inactive levo-rotatory enantiomer I_l is the less well tolerated of the two enantiomers. [A.R., at p. 156]

[115] For these reasons, I do not find Apotex's challenge to selection patents on the grounds of

Il s'agit d'un critère plus souple et moins littéral qui interdit la délivrance d'un deuxième brevet dont les revendications ne visent pas un « élément brevetable distinct » de celui visé par les revendications du brevet antérieur.

Dans l'arrêt Commissioner of Patents c. Farbwerker Hoechst Aktiengesellschaft Vormals Meister Lucius & Bruning, notre Cour a statué que même s'il n'y avait pas « identité » des revendications, la dilution d'une nouvelle substance une fois ses usages médicaux déterminés dans le brevet initial ne donnait pas lieu à une nouvelle invention justifiant un deuxième brevet. Malgré l'absence d'« identité » des revendications, le brevet subséquent a été invalidé.

[113] Le brevet de sélection revendiquant un composé brevetable distinct de celui visé par les revendications du brevet de genre ne saurait être invalidé pour cause de double brevet relatif à une évidence. En l'espèce, parmi les nombreux composés dont le brevet 875 a prédit l'effet antiplaquettaire, l'isomère dextrogyre du racémate s'est révélé plus avantageux que le racémate et l'isomère lévogyre. Comme je l'ai déjà expliqué, les revendications du brevet 777 visent un composé brevetable distinct de ceux visés par les revendications du brevet 875. En conséquence, l'allégation du double brevet relatif à une « évidence » n'est pas fondée.

[114] Bien qu'une allégation de double protection exige la comparaison des revendications du brevet de genre et du brevet de sélection, le mémoire descriptif du brevet de sélection doit définir clairement la nature de la caractéristique du composé sélectionné pour lequel le breveté revendique un monopole. Voir l'arrêt I. G. Farbenindustrie, p. 323. En l'espèce, le mémoire descriptif du brevet 777 satisfait à cette exigence en ce qu'il précise à la p. 1 :

> [TRADUCTION] Contre toute attente, seul l'énantiomère dextrogyre I_d présente une activité inhibitrice de l'agrégation des plaquettes, l'énantiomère lévogyre I_l étant inactif à cet égard. De plus, l'énantiomère lévogyre I_l inactif est celui des deux énantiomères qui est le moins bien toléré. [d.a., p. 156]

[115] J'estime donc que l'allégation d'Apotex selon laquelle les brevets de sélection sont invalides double patenting, and in particular that Sanofi has engaged in double patenting in the case of the '777 and '875 patents, to be well founded.

VIII. Disposition

[116] It follows from the findings above that claims 1 and 3 of the '777 patent are neither anticipated nor obvious. The composition claims 10 and 11 of the '777 patent are therefore also neither anticipated nor obvious. Finally, I find that Apotex's arguments in respect of double patenting are not well founded. In the result, the allegations that the '777 patent is invalid for anticipation, obviousness and double patenting are not justified.

[117] I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

pour cause de double protection et, plus particulièrement, que les brevets 777 et 875 de Sanofi sont invalides pour le même motif, n'est pas fondée.

VIII. Dispositif

[116] Il s'ensuit que les revendications 1 et 3 du brevet 777 ne sont ni antériorisées ni évidentes, de sorte que les revendications 10 et 11 relatives à une composition ne le sont pas non plus. Enfin, je conclus que la thèse d'Apotex relative à la double protection n'est pas fondée. En conséquence, les allégations d'invalidité du brevet 777 pour cause d'antériorité, d'évidence et de double protection n'ont aucun fondement.

MEMORANDUM OF JUDGMENT

THE COURT:

[1] A purchaser interested in buying property owned and listed by a realtor told him he needed to consult with another realtor whom he had used in the past and trusted. The vendor-realtor said he did not want the other realtor involved and said he would set up a meeting with a friend who could give the purchaser help and advice about the property. The vendor-realtor did not tell the purchaser that the person was a fellow realtor working for the same company. The purchaser met with the fellow realtor, bought the property and later discovered he had paid far too much for it. The trial judge found the vendor liable for the tort of deceit and awarded damages. The vendor appeals that decision. The purchaser appeals the damage award.

The Facts

[2] Mr. Kelemen and his wife, the appellants, owned the property, a house situated on seven acres on a ravine in southwest Edmonton. There was a sign on it giving the name of the real estate company for whom he worked and his name. Mr. El-Homeira, one of the respondents, saw the sign and called Kelemen. El-Homeira was a restaurant owner who told Kelemen he did not read or write English. While the title to the property and the pleadings name the spouses of Kelemen and El-Homeira, it was the men who had discussions about the property, its price and potential for development.

[3] The trial judge examined the testimony of the parties carefully because there were significant differences in the evidence on important points and credibility was critical. She rejected Kelemen's evidence where it conflicted with that of El-Homeira.

[4] The trial judge found that during negotiations, El-Homeira made it clear to Keleman that he required advice about the merits of the purchase and specifically about the value of the property. She found that El-Homeira said that he wanted to involve Mr. Rudge, a realtor he knew and trusted. She also found that Kelemen refused to have Rudge involved. El-Homeira testifed to that effect both in chief and on cross-examination. Instead, Kelemen offered to take the El-Homeiras to see a friend of his who "was a good guy and he'll help you". Kelemen then set up a meeting for El-Homeira with Mr. Runka, a realtor who worked with him. At that meeting, Runka said the property was worth over a million dollars and had greater potential value. El-Homeira did not contact Rudge and entered into the contract to purchase the property. The purchase price of $710,000 was paid with some cash, the equity in the El-Homeira home and a mortgage back to the Kelemens. Approximately three years later, when the El-Homeiras confirmed by an appraisal that they had paid too much for the property, they ceased making mortgage payments and were sued by the Kelemens. There was evidence that, at the time of the sale, the property had a market value of between $450,000 and $500,000. The El-Homeiras counterclaimed on the basis of deceit and fraudulent misrepresentation.

The Law

[5] There are two bases upon which liability could be founded in this case, namely, on the tort of deceit or on the contract action of fraudulent misrepresentation inducing a contract. The causes of action are discrete, although they share some common features and, as the learned author Fleming says, one action tends to colour the other: J.G. Fleming, The Law of Torts, 9th ed. (New South Wales: LBC Information Services, 1998) at 695. The tort action is founded in law whereas the contract action is based in equity. The difference affects the remedies and defences. Either can be the basis for a claim for damages but it is only the contract action that allows rescission. The duty to mitigate is relevant to both.

[6] In this case, although misrepresentation (including innocent and negligent) was discussed, the trial judge said she was basing liability on "deceit" and her analysis is consistent with the tort action. It is important that this court not confuse the two and that it not critically analyze the trial decision on a different legal basis from that upon which it was made.

[7] The legal requirements for the tort of deceit come from the case of Pasley v. Freeman (1789), 3 T.R. 51. Salmond, in his text, Salmond and Heuston on The Law of Torts, 19th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1987) describes, at p. 434, four main elements of the tort:

> (1) there must be a false representation of fact;
> (2) the representation must be made with knowledge of its falsity;
> (3) it must be made with the intention that it should be acted on by the plaintiff...in a manner which resulted in damage to him;
> (4) it must be proved that the plaintiff has acted upon the false statement, and has sustained damage by doing so.

[8] The learned author also discusses materiality in the tort of deceit. He states at p. 439:

> "Materiality"
>
> If the statement is actually relied on, it is no defence that the plaintiff was negligent or foolish in doing so, or that he had a full opportunity of discovering the truth for himself. Consent is no defence. Every man has in law a right to believe and act on all lies told him by others with intent to deceive him. Nor is it any defence to say that the representation is not "material", or would not have induced a reasonable man. The true question is whether the statement was a real inducement to the plaintiff: a representation may be material as between the parties, though not to a normal man. (Footnotes not reproduced)

1999 ABCA 315 (CanLII)

[Emphasis added]

[9] In discussing reliance and materiality the learned authors of the text Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, 17th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1995) state at p. 732:

Reliance and materiality

Reliance is an essential ingredient of the tort. However, as contributory negligence is inapplicable, it is no defence that the plaintiff had a full opportunity of discovering the truth for himself. It is thus no defence to claim that the representation is not material in the sense that it would not have induced a reasonable person to so act. The question is simply whether the representation was relied upon by this plaintiff. (Footnotes not reproduced)
[Emphasis added]

[10] In other words, when dealing with the tort of deceit, the appropriate test to measure the materiality of the representation and reliance on it is a subjective not an objective test.

The Tort of Deceit and the Facts

[11] Applying the four elements of the tort of deceit to the facts as found by the trial judge, it is clear that she made no error in basing liability on this ground.

(1) False representation of fact

[12] The trial judge found that Kelemen represented that Runka was a reliable, independent expert without disclosing that he worked for the same employer.

(2) The representation was made with knowledge of its falsity

[13] The trial judge found that Kelemen made the representation knowingly. He well knew Runka was a co-employee and could not have believed he was independent. Further, she found that Kelemen knew that Runka was not an independent adviser.

(3) The representation was made with the intention it be acted on in the manner which resulted in the damage

[14] The trial judge found that Kelemen offered Runka only to forestall El-Homeira seeking an independent assessment from his trusted, usual realtor, Rudge. It was an intentional diversion of El-Homeira to someone who was not independent.

1999 ABCA 315 (CanLII)

(4) The person to whom the representation was made acted on it and sustained damage

[15] The trial judge found that El-Homeira did not understand that Runka was not an independent voice and relied on the representation that he would be. The action taken by El-Homeira that is the basis for the tort was that he did not seek the independent advice of Rudge. The consequence of failing to obtain independent advice was that the El-Homeiras were persuaded, by the non-independent advice, to make a decision from which they suffered a loss. That loss came as a consequence of entering into a contract to purchase the property.

[16] In the result, the trial judge concluded that there was liability on the basis of deceit.

The Basis for the Appeal

[17] The appellants allege a palpable and overriding error in the findings of fact by the trial judge. It is clear from the reasons that the trial judge had some difficulty with the evidence given by Kelemen and thus with his credibility. We see no basis for interference with her decision in this regard.

[18] The appellants challenge only one aspect of the application of the law of the tort of deceit to the facts. They allege that the trial judge misdirected herself with respect to the issue of materiality. However, the cases and authorities relied upon by the appellants all refer to the contract action where there is a test of materiality that does not exist in the tort action. See the memorandum of judgment of this court in TWT Enterprises Ltd. v. Westgreen Developments (1992), 3 Alta. L.R. (3d) 124 (C.A.); G.H.L. Fridman, The Law of Contract, 3rd ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1994) at p. 293, and Di Castri, Law of Vendor and Purchaser, (Calgary: Carswell, 1998) at p. 7-14.

[19] In the contract action, it is a requirement that the representation be relevant or material to the substance of the contract. There is authority that, generally, that test is an objective one. But in the tort action the test for materiality is, as Salmond described, a subjective one and asks the true question, namely, whether the statement was a true inducement to the plaintiff, in this case El-Homeira. As the learned author goes on to say: A representation may be material as between the parties, though not to a normal man: supra.

[20] A critical question is: What was the action taken? In a fraudulent misrepresentation action it must be entering into a contract. In a tort action, that may be, but need not be, the action. Here the intention of Kelemen was to divert El-Homeira from consulting Rudge. He succeeded because El-Homeira's action was to consult Runka, who was not an independent advisor, instead of the independent adviser he wanted and required, Rudge.

While it is true that he also entered into the contract, that fact is irrelevant in the tort action, although it would be critical in the contract action.

[21] Put briefly, the appellant challenges the analysis of the trial judge as if the basis for liability was contract, not tort.

[22] The trial judge made no error in using a subjective test to measure whether the representation that Runka was an independent adviser and whether the resultant diversion from the independent adviser was material and a real inducement to El-Homeira. The real question was not whether the representation would have caused a reasonable person to act but whether it was a real inducement to El-Homeira and whether he relied on it. The trial judge's analysis and conclusions on materiality and reliance are well supported by her findings of fact.

[23] Had liability been founded on the fraudulent representations by Runka as to value or development potential, then it would have been relevant to look at whether statements as to those topics would, to the reasonable person, be material to the substance of the contract.

[24] The appellant raised two other challenges. The first had to do with the timing of the misrepresentation; the second was an allegation that since El-Homeira was not actively prevented from contacting Rudge, he was precluded from recovery.

[25] As to the first, the trial judge found that El-Homeira's requirement for independent advice arose during negotiations and the diversion to Runka took place before the parties had reached an agreement. While it is not clear that timing is as relevant in the tort action as the contract action, the trial judge's finding is a complete answer.

[26] As to the second, the complete answer to the suggestion that El-Homeira should, and could, have consulted Rudge is contained in the quotation from Salmond set out above. Put shortly, he did not have to do so, and a failure to do so, does not preclude his recovery. Further, contributory negligence is not applicable in the deceit action.

[27] The appellants have raised a number of other grounds in this appeal, including improper pleadings, failure to apply a proper standard of proof and no basis upon which to find liability on the part of Kelemen's wife.

[28] A review of all the pleadings, including the statement of defence filed by the El-Homeiras and their counterclaim, supports a conclusion that they were adequate and that the appellants were certainly not unaware of the basis for the claim in deceit, nor taken by surprise.

1999 ABCA 315 (CanLII)

[29] While there is no third standard of proof and the civil standard of proof is applicable to this case, it is well-established that deceit or fraud must be supported by clear and convincing evidence. The thorough and careful analysis of the trial judge shows that she was aware of the seriousness of the finding of deceit. While concluding there was deceit because of the intentional diversion, she rejected a number of grounds as not meeting the standard of proof required. There is no error relative to the standard of proof.

[30] The record shows an accord between counsel that the failure of the spouses of Kelemen and El-Homeira to testify would not prejudice the position of either. It does not lie in the mouth of counsel to now seek to have an interpretation of the accord between counsel such that one of the appellants (for Mrs. Kelemen is on the record with Mr. Kelemen) is now declared immune from liability. In respect to both men, the wives apparently took no active role but were carried along on the record because they were parties whose names appeared on the title to the property. There is no merit in the appellants' argument on this ground.

[31] The last ground of challenge is the failure by the El-Homeiras to mitigate their loss. There is a duty to mitigate, and it is proper to assess whether losses suffered by the El-Homeiras could have been reasonably avoided: G.H.L. Fridman, The Law of Torts in Canada (Toronto: Carswell, 1989) at p. 405. It is elementary that the duty to mitigate arises only when the deceit or fraud is discovered.

[32] The trial judge found that by the time the El-Homeiras discovered the value of the land, it was too late to seek rescission in a contract action because properties involved in the trade-in had been sold to third parties. The appellants' suggestion that the lawyer hired by the El-Homeiras was a potential source of advice about the market value of the land is without merit. Thus there is no factual basis for concluding that the El-Homeiras did not act reasonably or that they failed to mitigate their loss.

[33] On their cross appeal, the El-Homeiras raise a number of issues. In view of our decision on the main appeal, we need deal only with one. The El-Homeiras say that the trial judge erred in her assessment of damages. On this issue, the trial judge had the evidence of two experts who did not agree; in addition, during the trial she heard evidence from the various parties on the value and potential of the property. It was within the discretion of the trial judge to evaluate the conflicting expert evidence and accept only portions of it. This court is not about to second-guess her decision. She made no reviewable error in assessing damages.

[34] In the result, we dismiss both the appeal and the cross-appeal.

[35] The respondents, the El-Homeiras, shall have costs of the appeal but not for their factum which was filed late. Rule 538(4) . Their costs need not be reduced because of their cross-appeal which did not extend the appeal significantly.

On appeal from the judgment of Justice Barbara A. Conway of the Superior Court of Justice, dated June 6, 2016, with reasons reported at 2016 ONSC 3718, 33 C.C.E.L. (4th) 26.

Pardu J.A.:

A. BACKGROUND

[1] The appellant, Michael Markicevic, misappropriated nearly a million dollars from York University ("York"). At the time, he was the Assistant Vice President of Campus Services and Building Operations.

[2] Between 2007 and 2009, he devised a scheme to falsely invoice the university for work that was not actually done at the university. York paid $374,983.50 for these invoices and the appellant and his co-conspirators pocketed the cash.

[3] In 2009 the appellant inflated a quote for drain repair. The excess was applied to personal home improvements for the appellant and cash was also distributed to the appellant and his co-conspirators. York lost $515,461 as a result of this scheme.

[4] The appellant also had York employees perform work at his personal residences in 2008 and 2009. York paid these employees $23,000 for their time on these jobs.

[5] Finally, the appellant charged York for $61,241 worth of materials that he purchased for his own use.

[6] On February 1, 2010, before York was aware of the extent of the appellant's dishonesty, it terminated the appellant's employment without cause and negotiated and finalized a severance agreement with him that contained mutual releases. During those negotiations, the appellant vehemently denied any wrongdoing. York agreed to pay him 36 months' gross salary, amounting to $696,166. The appellant's continued employment had become untenable because York had to conduct an investigation into the rumours circulating about his financial impropriety and because of the complaints concerning his bullying behavior.

[7] As a result of the investigations undertaken after the appellant's departure, York learned of the full extent of the appellant's misconduct and sued to set aside the releases, recover the money stolen and for repayment of the severance package.

[8] Following a 25-day trial, the trial judge found in favour of York and rescinded the severance agreement including the releases. She held that, as a fiduciary, the appellant had a positive obligation to disclose his fraudulent activity before he entered into the severance agreement. She also found that the releases and the severance agreement were obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation. The appellant had materially misrepresented his innocence to York and if York had known of the fraud, they would not have terminated him without cause, paid him, and given him a release. In addition, the trial judge made a factual finding that January 29, 2010 was the earliest date York could have discovered its potential claim and, accordingly, its claim was not barred by the provisions of the Limitations Act, 2002, S.O. 2002, c. 24, Schedule B.

2018 ONCA 893 (CanLII)

B. ARGUMENTS ON APPEAL

[9] The appellant argues that the trial judge erred in concluding that his misrepresentations of innocence induced York to enter into the severance agreement and to release the appellant from any claims York might have against him.

[10] The appellant also argues that York's claim was barred by the Limitations Act, 2002. York issued the statement of claim on January 26, 2012. The appellant argues that York knew of the allegations of theft and fraud by the appellant as of January 19, 2010 and that, accordingly, the claim was issued after the expiry of the two-year limitations period.

C. TRIAL JUDGE'S FINDINGS

(1) Fraudulent misrepresentation

[11] The trial judge found at paras. 145-147 that the appellant had intentionally misled York when, just before the severance agreement was signed, he said he was innocent of any wrongdoing:

> [W]hen one party has induced another party to enter into an agreement by making a material misrepresentation, the principal remedy is rescission. A misrepresentation, to be material, must relate to a matter that would be considered by a reasonable > person to be relevant to the decision to enter the agreement in question. It is not necessary for a plaintiff to establish that the misrepresentation was the sole inducement for acting and it does not matter if the misrepresentation was only one of several factors contributing to the plaintiff's decision.

>
> Mr. Markicevic made a material misrepresentation to both Mr. Brewer and Ms. Lewis when he denied any wrongdoing. There is no question that if Mr. Brewer had known of any [of] Mr. Markicevic's fraudulent activities, York would not have terminated him without cause, would not have paid him a large severance (or any severance at all), and would not have granted him the Release.
>
> The Severance Agreement, including the Release, must therefore be set aside.

(2) Limitations period

[12] The trial judge addressed the limitations issue in her reasons at paras. 148-151:

> Mr. Markicevic submits that York's action is barred pursuant to the Limitations Act, 2002, S.O. 2002, c. 24. The action was commenced on January 26, 2012. Mr. Markicevic argues that York cannot meet its burden of proving that it did not know, or could not have known with reasonable diligence, of the facts giving rise to the claim against Mr. Markicevic prior to January 26, 2010.
>
> Mr. Markicevic relies on the notes of Noel Badiou, York's Director of Human Resources. Those notes reveal that by mid-December 2009, various York employees had approached Mr. Badiou to complain about Mr. Markicevic's bullying management style. Some of those complaints also included allegations of financial impropriety. However, none of the potential witnesses were willing to come forward and go on the > record at that point. Mr. Badiou continued to speak to potential witnesses and gather information through the end of December and into the first three weeks of January.

>
> It was not until January 29, 2010 that the Whistleblower went on the record, met with Ms. Lewis and brought some documents to support the allegations of financial impropriety.
>
> In my view, that was the earliest date that York can be held to have "discovered" a potential claim against Mr. Markicevic, as defined in s. 5(1)(a) of the Limitations Act. Accordingly, the claim is not statute barred.

2018 ONCA 893 (CanLII)

D. ANALYSIS

(1) Fraudulent misrepresentation

[13] By January 27, 2010 the appellant had heard of the circulation of rumours that he was having work done on his personal residences by York employees. He attributed these suggestions to animus on the part of the union for York tradespersons and in a letter copied to Brewer, his supervisor, described the allegations as unfounded, libelous, slanderous and "completely in line with previous unfounded accusations" emanating from the union. The appellant met with Brewer on January 27, 2010 and reacted with an attitude of absolute denial and "almost outrage".

[14] On January 28, 2010, the appellant wrote to Brewer, York's counsel and York's President, responding vigorously to the rumours:

I will bring to your attention that it appears slander and libel seem to be common practice at York. General community sentiment is that the University is inclined to act upon such rumour and innuendo as it does not possess the courage to confront such issues in an open, objective and impartial manner.

While to date I do not share this view, I am left with being accused, my reputation and integrity questioned and my career jeopardized at all levels of both York's organizational structure and the community at large.

I would ask you to consider the organizational environment such unsubstantiated claims create and the negative impact they are having on myself on both a personal and occupational level.

As for the misallocation of University resources, I will remind you that one of my first management initiatives at York was to work with Procurement to vastly improve and tighten Procurement policy and procedures within CSBO.

The establishment of a separate and objective financial control process within CSBO has received numerous accolades from our Audit department.

My willingness to effectively steward and manage University resources in a consistent and prudent manner with the upmost of integrity, I suggest to you, is unquestionable.

While I understand, given the sense of entitlement that many members of the York community feel they may have relative to what they deem to be their rights, I am prepared to respectfully suggest to you that these rights do not include the systematic unsubstantiated assassination of both my character and livelihood.

2018 ONCA 893 (CanLII)

[15] The appellant does not argue that these were not fraudulent misrepresentations. Rather, he argues that York could not have reasonably relied on these to enter into the severance agreement.

[16] The allegations came to light when several employees spoke to Badiou, York's Director of Human Rights[1]. This was a position akin to an ombudsman. There was an expectation that confidentiality would be preserved unless the individual speaking to him agreed to waive that confidentiality.

[17] Badiou met with the President to discuss the allegations on December 17, 2009. He summarized them in his notes from that meeting:

> Dec 17/09
>
> Mtg w/ Pres re Internal/Informal investigation
>
> - Now met w/spoke to about dozen people
> - some union
> - some managers
> - some former employees
>
>
> 3) Allegation of Theft/Fraud
>
> - One person has indicated that Mike has had staff purchase security and other electronic equipment by the University to be installed at his house or other properties.

[1] The trial judge misdescribed the position as Director of Human Resources.

2018 ONCA 893 (CanLII)

- Another person has said that Mike has ordered pain [sic] and other supplies paid by the University that a staff member was sent to his home to paint entire house – the invoices were noted as work at Glendon.

- Three people allege that in March 08 a bill was approved by Mike for rekeying of Ross Bldng – say this never done – one says was for work done in his home – another says company at the address is a Kitchen Cabinetry place. One person was not prepared to sign off as it was single source because emergency. All say not done and suspicious that either this is Mike's con company or it was for work done in his home.

- Search reveals

    1) no registered company at that address.
    2) Physical address has a Kitchen Cabinet business and 411 reverse address lookup reveals owner as C Adam and V. Georgvou.

[18] Badiou left the meeting with a plan to see if further information or details could be provided to "better assess and determine … what might be going on". Badiou met again with York's President on January 17, 2010 and with both York's President and Brewer on January 19, 2010, but no additional details or additional substantiation were available by that time.

[19] On January 29, 2010, Lewis, counsel for York, met with one of the individuals, the "whistleblower" who had made allegations against the appellant. The whistleblower was now prepared to come forward with a signed statement and also provided documents to support the allegations of financial misfeasance by the appellant. Lewis reviewed the allegations with the appellant and he angrily denied them.

[20] On February 1, 2010, Brewer told the appellant he did not believe any of the allegations against him. He testified that as of February 1 he still "firmly believed in the integrity" of the appellant. He testified that he would not have approached the severance negotiations in the same way had he known of the dishonesty.

[21] A contracting party who is induced to enter into a contract as a result of a fraudulent misrepresentation is entitled to rescission, and restoration of the benefits conferred on the other party to the contract: S.M. Waddams, The Law of Contracts, 7th ed. (Toronto: Thomson Reuters, 2017), at para. 421. The question of whether a contracting party did in fact rely on the misrepresentation, at least in part, to enter into the contract is "a question of fact to be inferred from all the circumstances of the case and evidence at the trial": G.H.L. Fridman, The Law of Contract in Canada, 6th ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 2011), at p. 291.

[22] The trial judge's finding that York was induced to enter into the severance agreement by the appellant's fraudulent misrepresentation that he was innocent of any financial dishonesty is supported by the evidence and no palpable or overriding error has been shown. It is difficult to imagine circumstances in which an employer acting responsibly would pay three years severance pay to an employee it knew had misappropriated large sums of money from it.

2018 ONCA 893 (CanLII)

(2) Limitations period

[23] Section 5(1) of the Limitations Act, 2002 provides:

> A claim is discovered on the earlier of,
>
> (a) the day on which the person with the claim first knew,
>
> (i) that the injury, loss or damage had occurred,
>
> (ii) that the injury, loss or damage was caused by or contributed to by an act or omission,
>
> (iii) that the act or omission was that of the person against whom the claim is made, and
>
> (iv) that, having regard to the nature of the injury, loss or damage, a proceeding would be an appropriate means to seek to remedy it; and
> (b) the day on which a reasonable person with the abilities and in the circumstances of the person with the claim first ought to have known of the matters referred to in clause (a).

[24] The appellant argues that the trial judge focused only on the date on which York knew that the loss had occurred, and that she did not consider that s. 5(1) required her to consider the earliest of two dates: the date York knew the loss had occurred, and the date on which "a reasonable person with the abilities and in the circumstances of the person with the claim first ought to have known" of the loss.

[25] I do not agree. Consideration of both branches of this test is implicit in the trial judge's articulation of the appellant's argument at trial that "York cannot meet its burden of proving that it did not know, or could not have known with reasonable diligence, of the facts giving rise to the claim" (emphasis added).

[26] The appellant further argues that York knew it had a claim against the appellant as early as December 17, 2009 when Badiou informed York's President of the allegations by several employees, and at the latest when Badiou went to the President on January 19, 2010 to report in general terms the allegations reported to him about financial misfeasance by the appellant. However at that stage, neither Badiou nor the President knew York had suffered a loss or that the appellant was the person responsible. It had only allegations by persons unwilling to come forward publicly, which were firmly denied by the appellant. These allegations, as noted by the trial judge, were limited to "the use of door locks, hardwood flooring and paint in [the appellant's] house", valued at $23,320. The other fraudulent schemes were separate frauds only uncovered much later.

[27] The question of whether a claim was discovered and the limitations period triggered is a question of mixed fact and law entitled to deference absent palpable and overriding error: Longo v. MacLaren Art Centre, 2014 ONCA 526, 323 O.A.C. 246, at para. 38. As indicated in Longo, at para. 44, certainty of a potential defendant's responsibility for an act that caused the loss is not required.

2018 ONCA 893 (CanLII)

Rather, what is required are prima facie grounds to infer that the defendant did the act that caused the loss. I agree with the trial judge that York did not have those prima facie grounds before January 29, 2010. The trial judge's conclusion that the claim was not discovered before two years preceding the date the statement of claim was issued was reasonably available to her on the evidence and is not affected by palpable and overriding error.

2018 ONCA 893 (CanLII)

(3) Other arguments

[28] Given that these two bases are sufficient to sustain the trial judge's decision, it is not necessary to consider the appellant's other argument that the trial judge erred in concluding that a fiduciary, like the appellant, was bound to look after York's interests while negotiating the severance agreement and secondly, his argument that the language of the release was broad enough to release the appellant from responsibility for the misappropriations. Here, even if the release was broad enough to bar any claim by York for recovery of the money misappropriated, the release was an integral part of the agreement induced by the misrepresentations as to his honesty. Once that agreement and release were rescinded, York was no longer barred from recovery. This result does not depend on whether or not the appellant was a fiduciary.

[29] For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

E. COSTS

[30] The trial judge awarded costs of the trial to York on a full indemnity basis. In light of the appellant's dishonesty I would award costs of the appeal to York on the same basis. I would award costs of the appeal to York in the sum of $105,527.

LOGAN, J.

[1] The Plaintiffs bring this action against the Defendants for breach of contract and misappropriation of property. On February 1, 2000 the parties signed a contract of Purchase and Sale of land. The listing agreement for the land describes a lot of approximately 50 acres with a tree grove of "250+spruce trees", a ranch brick bungalow with garage attached, built in appliances and a pool.

[2] The legal description for the rural property in the County of Simcoe, Province of Ontario, is described in the Agreement of Purchase and Sale as the "East Part ¼ Lot 12, Concession 4, Township of Essa" with a frontage of 293 meters and a depth of 691 meters. In addition the agreement contains a number of provisions including:

"No trees to be removed from the property"
"Chattels included: all built-in kitchen appliances, excluding oven"

"The vendor represents and warrants, to the best of his knowledge and belief that the pool and the pool liner is in good working condition and that all pumps and equipment related to the pool will be in good working condition on closing"

[3] I find that:

1) The Defendants breached the contract by not exercising a proper duty of care to prevent trees from being removed from the property in the Spring of the year 2000 prior to the closing date of the Agreement of Sale on April 28, 2000. Seventeen spruce trees had been dug up, loaded on trucks and removed. The Defendants are entitled to be compensated for the loss of the trees. The value of the lost trees is $10,200.00,

2) The Plaintiffs are not entitled to be compensated for the value of a refrigerator not left in the house at the time of closing. The refrigerator does not fall within the meaning of the built-in kitchen appliances' provision contained in the Agreement of Purchase and Sale. The evidence of intention of both parties to include the refrigerator is not clear or persuasive.

3) The Defendants breached their duty to have the the pool chlorination equipment and pool cover in good working condition at the time of closing. Replacements were necessary at a cost with tax of $281.75 for the chlorination equipment and $271.45 for the pool cover.

Trees

[4] The transaction closed on April 28, 2000 and the Plaintiffs moved into the house the next day. They discovered "…gouges all around [the property] where there had been activity from heavy equipment. There was a… swath path made right through the middle of where the tree stand had been…There were large holes…We were devastated." When asked about the number of holes, Karen Chamberlain answered twenty-five. They were 60 to 90 inches in radius. In her view 25 spruce trees had been removed from the property after the date the parties had signed the agreement and before the closing date. Barbara Meierhans was not aware of any trees being removed from the property in this period of time .

[5] Karen Chamberlain said they had visited the property for the first time in the month of December 1999. There was some snow on the on the ground. When looking around the lot, they walked back to the tree grove. There they observed a big spade truck removing trees from the ground. It concerned them.

2003 CanLII 5515 (ON SC)

[6] The Plaintiffs returned to the house to discuss with the Defendants what they had seen. Barbara Meierhans advised the Plaintiffs "… they did have a contract for more, at that time, when we were looking at the property, five would be coming out." After some confusion about the number of trees, she mentioned five or six.

[7] Negotiations continued to progress and the parties signed the final Agreement of Purchase and Sale on February 1, 2000. The only tree provision that appears in the final agreement states: "No trees to be removed from the property." The five or six trees removal contract is not mentioned. It is important to make a distinction between this evidence and what occurred subsequent to the signing of the contract.

[8] There is no doubt that the discovery by the Plaintiffs immediately after the closing of the transaction of many large tree removal holes caused them to become very upset. The trees behind the house on the 50-acre lot had certainly attracted them to the property. The real estate information sheet indicated there was a grove on the lot of approximately 250 blue spruce trees.

[9] As much as they liked the trees, the plaintiffs did not count them. They were content with the beauty of the grove and with the information they had received. In addition to the beauty of the tree grove the Plaintiffs knew that it would provide a sound barrier from train noise. In her evidence Ms. Chamberlain pointed to the survey of the property and said, "…Right here was a grove of 250 plus planted …14 year old Colorado trees…beautiful." She also pointed out on the survey the location of the Canadian Pacific Railway line at the rear boundary of the lot.

[10] There were no expressed difficulties between the parties prior to and after the signing of the documents and the closing of the transaction at the end of April 2000. The Plaintiffs returned to the property mostly at night from time to time during this period to discuss various matters with the Defendants. It was winter and snow covered the ground. They did not go out to inspect the tree grove.

[11] The interest of the Defendants in the grove of spruce trees was different from those of the Plaintiffs. Generally speaking both parties appreciated them in different ways. The Defendants purchased the land in 1997. The family continued to live there until the lot was sold to the Plaintiffs in 2000. Potatoes had been grown on the back part of the 50-acre lot. Generally speaking the Defendants seemed to regard the trees more as a crop that could be sold than an item of beauty.

[12] In 1998 and 1999 the Defendants had agreed to the sale of trees to contractors. The Plaintiffs became interested in the property towards the end of December 1999 after it had been listed for sale. As mentioned the Plaintiffs expressed to the Defendants their anxiety about tree removal from the property when they discovered men using heavy equipment to remove trees from the grove.

[13] Unfortunately the Defendants did not appear to know how to deal with this type of business. They had not insisted upon any type of written document. The evidence about verbal agreements was sketchy at best. Trucks from the Clarkson Trees Company often arrived unannounced. They left loaded with trees without stopping. The drivers did not leave invoices; they did not tell the Defendants what they had done. The drivers just came and left at will.

[14] Even though the Defendants authorized the sale of trees, they did not keep accurate records. They did not double check information received from authorized purchasers. This led to an abuse of process. While walking around their property they often noticed holes left after trees with root balls had been dug up. They did not make a record of what they saw. The big trucks with spade lifting equipment often left tire marks on the land except when the ground was frozen.

[15] The machines or trucks came up or went down the Defendant's driveway and past their house at various times. In addition to the Clarkson Trees Company, Drysdale Tree Farms Limited also made arrangements with the Defendants to buy and remove trees from the property. The Defendants for no apparent reason trusted the companies and accepted their information. That remained their prerogative until they listed the property with a real estate company and signed an agreement. After that the Defendants owed a special duty of care to exercise greater control over their property. In not doing so they were unaware if unauthorized persons came to the property and removed trees.

[16] Their knowledge appeared to be limited to order/invoice forms received from Clarkson Trees and Drysdale Tree Farms Limited. One order/invoice form from Clarkson Trees, dated June/98, mentions the amount the company was prepared to pay for small, medium and large trees. A further form from Clarkson dated Nov/98 advised them of the amount to be paid for 24 small and large trees the company removed from the property. Invoice 011556 came from Drysdale Tree Farm Limited. It mentions payment for 5 trees in the amount of $1250.00. .

[17] The companies made a number of payments to the Defendants from time to time. Robert Meierhans said Clarkson Trees purchased 75 trees from the Defendants over a period from 1998 to December 1999. In the same period Drysdale Tree Farms Limited purchased and removed 55 trees. The evidence indicates that the vast majority of these trees were removed from the property before the Plaintiffs became interested in the lot. After the property was listed for sale in the month of November 1999, Mr. Higgins, the real estate agent, spoke to the Defendants about tree removal.

[18] The agent advised if trees were removed, it could affect the validity of the listing. Ms. Meierhans knew changes should not be made to the property once it had been listed for sale. The two hundred and fifty spruce trees were mentioned on the real estate information sheet. In December 1999 Ms Meierhans spoke to Angus Clarkson. She "told him that we have somebody interested in the property and I would like to ask [you] not to remove any trees until further notice."

[19] The evidence of Mrs. Meierhans is creditable, but at the same time, I find the lack of records and control over those who were removing trees from the property directly contributed to the tree removal issue in this action. Snow on the ground at this time of the year added to the difficulty.

2003 CanLII 5515 (ON SC)

[20] Tree removal experts, Mr. Clarkson of Clarkson Trees, Mr. Drysdale of Drysdale Tree Farms Limited and Mr. Burton of Four Seasons Tree Farms gave evidence. Mr. Drysdale and Mr. Burton sent reports to Ms. Chamberlain. All three did business with one or both of the parties.

[21] The Defendants called Mr. Clarkson and Mr. Drysdale as witnesses. The Plaintiffs called Mr. Burton. Their partiality was questioned. In this case the risk of potential partiality goes to weight and not to admissibility. On some matters all three gave similar evidence. Further, the evidence of two neighbors, Karen Elizabeth Tettmar and Doris Ann Gibson supports the opinions expressed by Mr. Drysdale and Mr. Burton. Ms. Tettmar and Ms. Gibson did not waiver in their observations under an intense cross-examination.

[22] Ms. Tettmar lives on the adjacent property to the lot purchased by the Plaintiffs. She told the court that in the spring of 2000, early in the month of April she saw "big spade trucks going in and out of the lot [then owned by the Defendants] to remove trees." When asked how often, she replied, "It was often…we were always wondering what they were doing…they would go up the driveway and then they'd come back down the driveway with a big tree…" She did not know who owned the trucks. On cross-examination she confirmed that she could see from her place both the front and backyards of the property owned at that time by the Meierhans. She did not pay attention to the colour or possible markings on the truck.

[23] Doris Ann Gibson lived on property further back from the Tettmar lot, but also adjacent to the land purchased by the Plaintiffs. The Gibson lane was approximately 800 feet long. She pointed out that the Chamberlain and the Gibson properties used to be a 100-acre parcel of land. Her evidence about the time and trucks was similar to the evidence of Ms. Tettmar. Mrs. Gibson saw the big tree removal trucks. She told the Court: "…I seen the tree removal trucks coming and going back and taking – and getting the trees and bring them back out."

[24] Counsel for the Plaintiff asked Ms. Gibson if she received "a telephone call last night". She replied Angus Clarkson called her. When asked about the content of the call, Counsel for the Defendant properly objected to her answering the question on the grounds of hearsay. When asked how she felt after she received the call Ms. Gibson answered, "I was a little bit upset to see things go that far, to have to get that phone call." In Cross-examination Ms. Gibson confirmed that she could not describe the trucks other than to say that they had tree spades. She could not see behind the house so she did not know where the equipment was used to remove the trees.

[25] The Plaintiffs took possession of their new property at the end of April 2000. Most of the winter snow had melted. There were huge tire marks on their lane. Mr. Chamberlain thought the transport moving truck must have had large heavy tires. They spoke to Ms. Meierhans about the size of the truck. She told them that their goods came in a cube van. Mr.Chamberlain was interested in the trees, but he was also interested in the possibility of constructing an airplane runway on the large section of flat land beyond the spruce tree grove behind the house.

[26] The next morning the Plaintiffs went to the back of the property. Ms. Meierhans said, "We were devastated. There were gouges all around where there had been activity from heavy equipment." It was at this time that they discovered large holes left after 25 trees had been removed. She said the stand of trees was not in that condition when they had inspected the property before putting in their offer to purchase. On May 9, 2000 they took the pictures and a video of the holes left after the trees and root balls had been removed. They clearly confirm her concerns.

[27] The morning after they discovered the holes, the Plaintiffs heard a vehicle approaching along the driveway. A large tree spade truck arrived unannounced and uninvited. It drove past their kitchen window heading behind the house towards the trees. They both went out and Mr. Chamberlain caused the driver to stop. They spoke to the driver and he identified himself as Angus Clarkson. At a later date Mr. Clarkson and the Plaintiffs met at the grove of trees behind the house. A discussion took place. When asked about the conversation Ms. Chamberlain said she felt "terrified." Mr. Clarkson mentioned when the Plaintiffs did not believe him he got sarcastic and left. Mr. Chamberlain said Angus Clarkson was ordered to leave the property.

[28] It is unclear why Angus Clarkson went to the property at the end of April 2000 or what was said to cause Ms. Chamberlain to become terrified. Angus Clarkson testified that he went to meet the new owners, but the way he did this remained unclear and difficult to understand. He did confirm receiving the December instructions from Ms. Meierhans. He denied taking any trees from the property after that time. He said he had been in the business for 14 years and he stressed that he was honest.
