Determination of provable claims

(1.1) The trustee shall determine whether any contingent claim or unliquidated claim is a provable claim, and, if a provable claim, the trustee shall value it, and the claim is thereafter, subject to this section, deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.

Disallowance by trustee

(2) The trustee may disallow, in whole or in part,

(a) any claim;

(b) any right to a priority under the applicable order of priority set out in this Act; or

(c) any security.

Notice of determination or disallowance

(3) Where the trustee makes a determination under subsection (1.1) or, pursuant to subsection (2), disallows, in whole or in part, any claim, any right to a priority or any security, the trustee shall forthwith provide, in the prescribed manner, to the person whose claim was subject to a determination under subsection (1.1) or whose claim, right to a priority or security was disallowed under subsection (2), a notice in the prescribed form setting out the reasons for the determination or disallowance.

Determination or disallowance final and conclusive

(4) A determination under subsection (1.1) or a disallowance referred to in subsection (2) is final and conclusive unless, within a thirty day period after the service of the notice referred to in subsection (3) or such further time as the court may on application made within that period allow, the person to whom the notice was provided appeals from the trustee's decision to the court in accordance with the General Rules.

Expunge or reduce a proof

(5) The court may expunge or reduce a proof of claim or a proof of security on the application of a creditor or of the debtor if the trustee declines to interfere in the matter.

R.S., 1985, c. B-3, s. 135; 1992, c. 1, s. 20, c. 27, s. 53; 1997, c. 12, s. 89.

Scheme of Distribution

Priority of claims

136 (1) Subject to the rights of secured creditors, the proceeds realized from the property of a bankrupt shall be applied in priority of payment as follows:

(a) in the case of a deceased bankrupt, the reasonable funeral and testamentary expenses incurred by the

Réclamations éventuelles et non liquidées

(1.1) Le syndic décide si une réclamation éventuelle ou non liquidée est une réclamation prouvable et, le cas échéant, il l'évalue; sous réserve des autres dispositions du présent article, la réclamation est dès lors réputée prouvée pour le montant de l'évaluation.

Rejet par le syndic

(2) Le syndic peut rejeter, en tout ou en partie, toute réclamation, tout droit à un rang prioritaire dans l'ordre de collocation applicable prévu par la présente loi ou toute garantie.

Avis de la décision

(3) S'il décide qu'une réclamation est prouvable ou s'il rejette, en tout ou en partie, une réclamation, un droit à un rang prioritaire ou une garantie, le syndic en donne sans délai, de la manière prescrite, un avis motivé, en la forme prescrite, à l'intéressé.

Effet de la décision

(4) La décision et le rejet sont définitifs et péremptoires, à moins que, dans les trente jours suivant la signification de l'avis, ou dans tel autre délai que le tribunal peut accorder, sur demande présentée dans les mêmes trente jours, le destinataire de l'avis n'interjette appel devant le tribunal, conformément aux Règles générales, de la décision du syndic.

Rejet total ou partiel d'une preuve

L.R. (1985), ch. B-3, art. 135; 1992, ch. 1, art. 20, ch. 27, art. 53; 1997, ch. 12, art. 89.

Priorité des créances

136 (1) Sous réserve des droits des créanciers garantis, les montants réalisés provenant des biens d'un failli sont distribués d'après l'ordre de priorité de paiement suivant :

bankrupt shall, until the terms, conditions or judgment is satisfied,

(a) give the trustee such information as he may require with respect to his earnings and after-acquired property and income, and

(b) not less than once a year, file in the court and with the trustee a statement verified under oath showing the particulars of any property or income he may have acquired subsequent to the order for his discharge, and the trustee or any creditor may require the bankrupt to attend for examination under oath with respect to the facts contained in the statement or with respect to his earnings, income, after-acquired property or dealings.

Penalty for failure to comply

(2) Where the bankrupt fails to give information or to file a statement as required by subsection (1), to attend for examination when required to do so or to answer all questions fully and accurately with respect to his earnings, income, after-acquired property or dealings, the court may on the application of the trustee or of any creditor revoke the order of discharge.

Trustee to distribute funds payable under conditional discharge

(3) Where a conditional order of discharge of a bankrupt is made providing for payment of a further dividend or sum of money by the bankrupt, all payments on account thereof shall be made to the trustee for distribution to the creditors.

177 [Repealed, 2000, c. 12, s. 17]

Debts not released by order of discharge

178 (1) An order of discharge does not release the bankrupt from

(a) any fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature to a fine, penalty or restitution order, imposed by a court in respect of an offence, or any debt arising out of a recognizance or bail;

(a.1) any award of damages by a court in civil proceedings in respect of

(i) bodily harm intentionally inflicted, or sexual assault, or

(ii) wrongful death resulting therefrom;

à un jugement, le failli doit, jusqu'à ce qu'il ait rempli ces conditions ou satisfait à ce jugement :

a) fournir au syndic les renseignements que ce dernier peut exiger à l'égard de ses gains et de ses biens et revenus subséquemment acquis;

b) au moins une fois chaque année, produire au tribunal et au syndic une déclaration attestée sous serment indiquant les détails de tous biens ou revenus qu'il peut avoir acquis subséquemment à sa libération.

Le syndic ou tout créancier peut exiger que le failli se présente pour être interrogé sous serment relativement aux faits contenus dans la déclaration, ou à ses gains, son revenu, ses biens postérieurement acquis ou ses opérations.

Peine en cas de manquement

(2) Lorsque le failli ne fournit pas les renseignements ou ne produit pas la déclaration qu'exige le paragraphe (1), ne se présente pas à l'examen lorsqu'il en est requis ou ne répond pas pleinement et exactement à toutes les questions qui se rapportent à ses gains, son revenu, ses biens postérieurement acquis ou ses opérations, le tribunal peut, à la demande du syndic ou d'un créancier, annuler l'ordonnance de libération.

Le syndic doit distribuer les fonds payables aux termes d'une libération conditionnelle

(3) Lorsqu'une ordonnance conditionnelle de libération d'un failli est rendue prescrivant que ce dernier paie un dividende ou une somme d'argent supplémentaire, tout versement à valoir sur ce dividende ou cette somme est fait au syndic pour distribution aux créanciers.

177 [Abrogé, 2000, ch. 12, art. 17]

L'ordonnance de libération ne libère pas des dettes

178 (1) Une ordonnance de libération ne libère pas le failli :

a) de toute amende, pénalité, ordonnance de restitution ou toute ordonnance similaire infligée ou rendue par un tribunal, ou de toute autre dette provenant d'un engagement ou d'un cautionnement en matière pénale;

a.1) de toute indemnité accordée en justice dans une affaire civile :

(i) pour des lésions corporelles causées intentionnellement ou pour agression sexuelle,

(ii) pour décès découlant de celles-ci;

(b) any debt or liability for alimony or alimentary pension;

(c) any debt or liability arising under a judicial decision establishing affiliation or respecting support or maintenance, or under an agreement for maintenance and support of a spouse, former spouse, former common-law partner or child living apart from the bankrupt;

(d) any debt or liability arising out of fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity or, in the Province of Quebec, as a trustee or administrator of the property of others;

(e) any debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation, other than a debt or liability that arises from an equity claim;

(f) liability for the dividend that a creditor would have been entitled to receive on any provable claim not disclosed to the trustee, unless the creditor had notice or knowledge of the bankruptcy and failed to take reasonable action to prove his claim;

(g) any debt or obligation in respect of a loan made under the Canada Student Loans Act, the Canada Student Financial Assistance Act or any enactment of a province that provides for loans or guarantees of loans to students where the date of bankruptcy of the bankrupt occurred

(i) before the date on which the bankrupt ceased to be a full- or part-time student, as the case may be, under the applicable Act or enactment, or

(ii) within seven years after the date on which the bankrupt ceased to be a full- or part-time student;

(g.1) any debt or obligation in respect of a loan made under the Apprentice Loans Act where the date of bankruptcy of the bankrupt occurred

(i) before the date on which the bankrupt ceased, under that Act, to be an eligible apprentice within the meaning of that Act, or

(ii) within seven years after the date on which the bankrupt ceased to be an eligible apprentice; or

(h) any debt for interest owed in relation to an amount referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (g.1).

b) de toute dette ou obligation pour pension alimentaire;

c) de toute dette ou obligation aux termes de la décision d'un tribunal en matière de filiation ou d'aliments ou aux termes d'une entente alimentaire au profit d'un époux, d'un ex-époux ou ancien conjoint de fait ou d'un enfant vivant séparé du failli;

d) de toute dette ou obligation résultant de la fraude, du détournement, de la concussion ou de l'abus de confiance alors qu'il agissait, dans la province de Québec, à titre de fiduciaire ou d'administrateur du bien d'autrui ou, dans les autres provinces, à titre de fiduciaire;

e) de toute dette ou obligation résultant de l'obtention de biens ou de services par des faux-semblants ou la présentation erronée et frauduleuse des faits, autre qu'une dette ou obligation qui découle d'une réclamation relative à des capitaux propres;

f) de l'obligation visant le dividende qu'un créancier aurait eu droit de recevoir sur toute réclamation prouvable non révélée au syndic, à moins que ce créancier n'ait été averti ou n'ait eu connaissance de la faillite et n'ait omis de prendre les mesures raisonnables pour prouver sa réclamation;

g) de toute dette ou obligation découlant d'un prêt consenti ou garanti au titre de la Loi fédérale sur les prêts aux étudiants, de la Loi fédérale sur l'aide financière aux étudiants ou de toute loi provinciale relative aux prêts aux étudiants lorsque la faillite est survenue avant la date à laquelle le failli a cessé d'être un étudiant, à temps plein ou à temps partiel, au regard de la loi applicable, ou dans les sept ans suivant cette date;

g.1) de toute dette ou obligation découlant d'un prêt octroyé au titre de la Loi sur les prêts aux apprentis lorsque la faillite est survenue avant la date à laquelle le failli a cessé, au regard de cette loi, d'être un apprenti admissible, au sens de cette loi, ou dans les sept ans suivant cette date;

h) de toute dette relative aux intérêts dus à l'égard d'une somme visée à l'un des alinéas a) à g.1).

Court may order non-application of subsection (1)

(1.1) At any time after five years after the day on which a bankrupt who has a debt referred to in paragraph (1)(g)

Obligations des parties

Non-transfert de fonds

126 La lettre n'a pas pour effet de transférer des fonds au tiré pour son paiement, et le tiré qui ne consent pas à l'acceptation prévue par la présente loi n'est pas obligé par l'effet.

S.R., ch. B-5, art. 127.

Engagement par acceptation

127 L'accepteur d'une lettre s'engage à la payer suivant les termes de l'acceptation.

S.R., ch. B-5, art. 128.

Droits refusés à l'accepteur

128 L'accepteur d'une lettre ne peut opposer au détenteur régulier ce qui suit :

a) l'existence du tireur, l'authenticité de sa signature, sa capacité et son autorité de tirer la lettre;

b) dans le cas d'une lettre payable à l'ordre du tireur, la capacité de celui-ci, à ce moment-là, d'endosser, sauf l'authenticité ou la validité de son endossement;

c) dans le cas d'une lettre payable à l'ordre d'un tiers, l'existence du preneur et sa capacité, à ce moment-là, d'endosser, sauf l'authenticité ou la validité de son endossement.

S.R., ch. B-5, art. 129.

Obligations du tireur

129 La personne qui tire une lettre, ce faisant :

a) promet que, sur présentation en bonne et due forme, elle sera acceptée et payée à sa valeur, et s'engage, en cas de refus, à indemniser le détenteur ou tout endosseur forcé de l'acquitter, si les formalités obligatoires à la suite d'un refus ont été dûment remplies;

b) ne peut opposer au détenteur régulier l'existence du preneur et sa capacité, à ce moment-là, d'endosser.

S.R., ch. B-5, art. 130.

Effet de la signature

130 Nul n'est responsable comme tireur, endosseur ou accepteur d'une lettre s'il ne l'a pas signée à ce titre; mais signs a bill otherwise than as a drawer or acceptor, he thereby incurs the liabilities of an endorser to a holder in due course and is subject to all the provisions of this Act respecting endorsers.

R.S., c. B-5, s. 131.

le signataire d'une lettre à un titre autre que celui de tireur ou d'accepteur contracte les obligations d'un endosseur vis-à-vis d'un détenteur régulier et est considéré comme un endosseur pour l'application de la présente loi.

S.R., ch. B-5, art. 131.

Trade-name or assumed name

131 (1) Where a person signs a bill in a trade-name or assumed name, he is liable thereon as if he had signed it in his own name.

Firm name

(2) The signature of the name of a firm is equivalent to the signature, by the person so signing, of the names of all persons liable as partners in that firm.

R.S., c. B-5, s. 132.

Nom commercial ou d'emprunt

131 (1) La personne qui signe une lettre d'un nom commercial ou d'emprunt contracte les mêmes obligations que si elle l'avait signée de son propre nom.

Raison sociale

(2) La signature au moyen d'une raison sociale équivaut à la signature, par le signataire, des noms de toutes les personnes responsables à titre d'associés de la société de personnes.

S.R., ch. B-5, art. 132.

Endorser

132 The endorser of a bill by endorsing it, subject to the effect of any express stipulation authorized by this Act,

(a) engages that on due presentment it shall be accepted and paid according to its tenor, and that if it is dishonoured he will compensate the holder or a subsequent endorser who is compelled to pay it, if the requisite proceedings on dishonour are duly taken;

(b) is precluded from denying to a holder in due course the genuineness and regularity in all respects of the drawer's signature and all previous endorsements; and

(c) is precluded from denying to his immediate or a subsequent endorsee that the bill was, at the time of his endorsement, a valid and subsisting bill, and that he had then a good title thereto.

R.S., c. B-5, s. 133.

Obligations de l'endosseur

132 Sous réserve des stipulations expresses autorisées par la présente loi, la personne qui endosse une lettre :

a) promet que, sur présentation en bonne et due forme, elle sera acceptée et payée à sa valeur, et s'engage, en cas de refus, à indemniser le détenteur ou l'endosseur postérieur forcé de l'acquitter, si les formalités obligatoires à la suite d'un refus ont été dûment remplies;

b) ne peut opposer au détenteur régulier l'authenticité et la régularité, à tous égards, de la signature du tireur et de tous les endossements antérieurs;

c) ne peut opposer à son endossataire immédiat ou à un endossataire postérieur le fait que la lettre, au moment de son endossement, était valide et avait une existence légale, et qu'il avait alors un titre valable.

S.R., ch. B-5, art. 133.

Measure of damages

133 Where a bill is dishonoured, the measure of damages, which shall be deemed to be liquidated damages, are

(a) the amount of the bill;

(b) interest thereon from the time of presentment for payment, if the bill is payable on demand, and from the maturity of the bill in any other case; and

(c) the expenses of noting and protesting.

R.S., c. B-5, s. 134.

Montant des dommages-intérêts

133 En cas de refus d'une lettre, la somme des éléments suivants est réputée constituer le montant des dommages-intérêts :

a) le montant de la lettre;

b) les intérêts sur ce montant à compter du jour de la présentation au paiement, si la lettre est payable sur demande, ou du jour de l'échéance, dans tout autre cas;

c) les frais du protêt, y compris de la notation.

Effect of destruction

163.5 If an eligible bill is destroyed in accordance with by-laws, rules or standards made under the Canadian Payments Act and there is an official image of the bill,

(a) a person's rights and powers in relation to the eligible bill are not affected by reason only that the person does not possess it;

(b) the destruction does not affect any person's rights, powers, duties and liabilities in relation to the eligible bill; and

(c) the eligible bill is not considered to be lost or to have been materially altered or intentionally cancelled.

2007, c. 6, s. 398.

Effet de la destruction

163.5 Si la lettre admissible est détruite en conformité avec les règlements administratifs, règles ou normes pris sous le régime de la Loi canadienne sur les paiements et qu'il en existe une image officielle :

a) les droits et pouvoirs conférés à toute personne relativement à la lettre ne sont pas touchés du seul fait qu'elle n'est pas en possession de la lettre;

b) les droits et pouvoirs conférés et les obligations imposées à toute personne relativement à la lettre ne sont pas touchés du seul fait de sa destruction;

c) la lettre ne doit pas être considérée perdue, intentionnellement annulée ou altérée de façon substantielle.

Warranty

163.6 (1) A bank that creates or purports to create an official image of an eligible bill, or on whose behalf an official image of an eligible bill is created or purported to be created, warrants that the official image or the purported official image, as the case may be, was created in accordance with by-laws, rules or standards made under the Canadian Payments Act and that it accurately represents the eligible bill.

Garantie

163.6 (1) La banque qui a créé ou qui paraît avoir créé une image officielle d'une lettre admissible, ou au nom de laquelle l'image officielle est créée ou paraît avoir été créée, garantit qu'elle a été créée en conformité avec les règlements administratifs, règles ou normes pris sous le régime de la Loi canadienne sur les paiements et qu'elle représente avec exactitude la lettre admissible.

Damages

(2) Any person who has suffered damages as a result of a breach of the warranty has a cause of action for damages against the bank.

2007, c. 6, s. 398.

Dommages-intérêts

(2) Quiconque a subi des dommages causés par tout manquement de la banque à l'égard de la garantie est fondé à intenter une action en dommages-intérêts contre la banque.

2007, ch. 6, art. 398.

(2) A corporation has the capacity to carry on its business, conduct its affairs and exercise its powers in any jurisdiction outside Alberta to the extent that the laws of that jurisdiction permit.

Waiver of business interests

16.1(1) Subject to the regulations, a corporation may waive any interest or expectancy of the corporation in or to, or in being offered an opportunity to participate in, a specified business opportunity or specified classes or categories of business opportunities that are offered or presented to the corporation or one or more of its officers, directors or shareholders.

(2) Subject to the regulations, a waiver referred to in subsection (1) may only be made if the corporation's articles of incorporation or a unanimous shareholder agreement enables the ability to so waive, or in any other manner set out in the regulations.

(3) Subject to the regulations, a waiver may be modified or revoked.

Restriction on powers

17(1) It is not necessary for a bylaw to be passed in order to confer any particular power on the corporation or its directors.

(2) A corporation shall not carry on any business or exercise any power that it is restricted by its articles from carrying on or exercising, nor shall the corporation exercise any of its powers in a manner contrary to its articles.

(3) No act of a corporation, including any transfer of property to or by a corporation, is invalid by reason only that the act or transfer is contrary to its articles or this Act.

No constructive notice

18 No person is affected by or is deemed to have notice or knowledge of the contents of a document concerning a corporation by reason only that the document has been filed by the Registrar or is available for inspection at an office of the corporation.

Authority of directors, officers and agents

19 A corporation, a guarantor of an obligation of the corporation or a person claiming through the corporation may not assert against a person dealing with the corporation or dealing with any person who has acquired rights from the corporation

(a) that the articles, bylaws or any unanimous shareholder agreement have not been complied with,

(b) that the persons named in the most recent notice filed by the Registrar under section 106 or 113 are not the directors of the corporation,

(c) that the place named as the registered office in the most recent notice filed by the Registrar under section 20 is not the registered office of the corporation,

(d) that the post office box designated as the address for service by mail in the most recent notice filed by the Registrar under section 20 is not the address for service by mail of the corporation,

(e) that a person held out by the corporation as a director, an officer or an agent of the corporation

(i) has not been duly appointed, or

(ii) has no authority to exercise a power or perform a duty that the director, officer or agent might reasonably be expected to exercise or perform,

(f) that a document issued by any director, officer or agent of the corporation with actual or usual authority to issue the document is not valid or not genuine, or

(g) that financial assistance referred to in section 45 or a sale, lease or exchange of property referred to in section 190 was not authorized, unless the person has, or by virtue of the person's position with or relationship to the corporation ought to have, knowledge of those facts at the relevant time.

Part 4
Registered Office, Agent for Service, Records and Seal

Registered office, records office, address for service by mail

20(1) A corporation shall at all times have a registered office within Alberta.

(2) A notice of

(a) the registered office,

Officers

121 Subject to the articles, the bylaws or any unanimous shareholder agreement,

(a) the directors may designate the offices of the corporation, appoint as officers individuals of full capacity, specify their duties and delegate to them powers to manage the business and affairs of the corporation, except powers to do anything referred to in section 115(3),

(b) a director may be appointed to any office of the corporation, and

(c) 2 or more offices of the corporation may be held by the same person.

Duty of care of directors and officers

122(1) Every director and officer of a corporation in exercising the director's or officer's powers and discharging the director's or officer's duties to the corporation shall

(a) act honestly and in good faith with a view to the best interests of the corporation, and

(b) exercise the care, diligence and skill that a reasonably prudent person would exercise in comparable circumstances.

(2) Every director and officer of a corporation shall comply with this Act, the regulations, articles, bylaws and any unanimous shareholder agreement.

(3) Subject to section 146(7), no provision in a contract, the articles, the bylaws or a resolution relieves a director or officer from the duty to act in accordance with this Act or the regulations or relieves the director or officer from liability for a breach of that duty.

(4) In determining whether a particular transaction or course of action is in the best interests of the corporation, a director, if the director is elected or appointed by the holders of a class or series of shares or by employees or creditors or a class of employees or creditors, may give special, but not exclusive, consideration to the interests of those who elected or appointed the director.

(3) An inspector shall on request produce to an interested person a copy of any order made under section 231 or 232(1).

1981 cB-15 s225

Hearings by inspector

234(1) A hearing conducted by an inspector shall be heard in camera unless the Court otherwise orders.

(2) An individual who is being examined at a hearing conducted by an inspector under this Part has a right to be represented by counsel during the examination.

Compelling evidence

235 A person shall not be excused from attending and giving evidence and producing books, papers, documents or records to an inspector under this Part on the grounds that the oral evidence or documents required of the person may tend to incriminate the person or subject the person to any proceeding or penalty, but no oral evidence so required shall be used or is receivable against the person in any proceedings thereafter instituted against the person under any Act of Alberta.

Absolute privilege

236 Any oral or written statement or report made by an inspector or any other person in an investigation under this Part has absolute privilege.

Solicitor-client privilege

237 Nothing in this Part affects the privilege that exists in respect of a solicitor and the solicitor's client.

1981 cB-15 s229

Inspector's report as evidence

238 A copy of the report of an inspector under section 232, certified as a true copy by the inspector, is admissible as evidence of the facts stated in it without proof of the appointment or signature of the inspector.

Part 19
Remedies, Offences and Penalties

239 In this Part,

(a) "action" means an action under this Act or any other law;

(b) "complainant" means

(i) a registered holder or beneficial owner, or a former registered holder or beneficial owner, of a security of a corporation or any of its affiliates,

(ii) a director or an officer or a former director or officer of a corporation or of any of its affiliates,

(iii) a creditor

(A) in respect of an application under section 240, or

(B) in respect of an application under section 242, if the Court exercises its discretion under subclause (iv), or

(iv) any other person who, in the discretion of the Court, is a proper person to make an application under this Part.

1981 cB-15 s231;2000 c10 s3

Commencing derivative action

240(1) Subject to subsection (2), a complainant may apply to the Court for permission to

(a) bring an action in the name and on behalf of a corporation or any of its subsidiaries, or

(b) intervene in an action to which a corporation or any of its subsidiaries is a party, for the purpose of prosecuting, defending or discontinuing the action on behalf of the corporation or subsidiary.

(2) No permission may be granted under subsection (1) unless the Court is satisfied that

(a) the complainant has given reasonable notice to the directors of the corporation or its subsidiary of the complainant's intention to apply to the Court under subsection (1) if the directors of the corporation or its subsidiary do not bring, diligently prosecute, defend or discontinue the action,

(b) the complainant is acting in good faith, and

(c) it appears to be in the interests of the corporation or its subsidiary that the action be brought, prosecuted, defended or discontinued.

(3) Notwithstanding subsection (2), when all the directors of the corporation or its subsidiary have been named as defendants, notice to the directors under subsection (2)(a) of the complainant's intention to apply to the Court is not required.

Powers of the Court

241 In connection with an action brought or intervened in under section 240 or 242(3)(q), the Court may at any time make any order it thinks fit including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, any or all of the following:

(a) an order authorizing the complainant or any other person to control the conduct of the action;

(b) an order giving directions for the conduct of the action;

(c) an order directing that any amount adjudged payable by a defendant in the action shall be paid, in whole or in part, directly to former and present security holders of the corporation or its subsidiary instead of to the corporation or its subsidiary;

(d) an order requiring the corporation or its subsidiary to pay reasonable legal fees incurred by the complainant in connection with the action.

Relief by Court on the ground of oppression or unfairness

242(1) A complainant may apply to the Court for an order under this section.

(2) If, on an application under subsection (1), the Court is satisfied that in respect of a corporation or any of its affiliates

(a) any act or omission of the corporation or any of its affiliates effects a result,

(b) the business or affairs of the corporation or any of its affiliates are or have been carried on or conducted in a manner, or

(c) the powers of the directors of the corporation or any of its affiliates are or have been exercised in a manner that is oppressive or unfairly prejudicial to or that unfairly disregards the interests of any security holder, creditor, director or officer, the Court may make an order to rectify the matters complained of.

5 (1) Nul témoin n'est exempté de répondre à une question pour le motif que la réponse à cette question pourrait tendre à l'incriminer, ou pourrait tendre à établir sa responsabilité dans une procédure civile à l'instance de la Couronne ou de qui que ce soit.

Réponse non admissible contre le témoin

(2) Lorsque, relativement à une question, un témoin s'oppose à répondre pour le motif que sa réponse pourrait tendre à l'incriminer ou tendre à établir sa responsabilité dans une procédure civile à l'instance de la Couronne ou de qui que ce soit, et si, sans la présente loi ou toute loi provinciale, ce témoin eût été dispensé de répondre à cette question, alors, bien que ce témoin soit en vertu de la présente loi ou d'une loi provinciale forcé de répondre, sa réponse ne peut être invoquée et n'est pas admissible en preuve contre lui dans une instruction ou procédure pénale exercée contre lui par la suite, sauf dans le cas de poursuite pour parjure en rendant ce témoignage ou pour témoignage contradictoire.

6 (1) Le tribunal peut ordonner la mise à la disposition du témoin qui éprouve de la difficulté à communiquer en raison d'une déficience physique, des moyens de communication par lesquels il peut se faire comprendre.

Capacité mentale du témoin

(2) Le tribunal peut rendre la même ordonnance à l'égard du témoin qui, aux termes de l'article 16, a la capacité mentale pour témoigner mais qui éprouve de la difficulté à communiquer.

Good faith — powers of court

(2) If the court is satisfied that an interested person fails to act in good faith, on application by an interested person, the court may make any order that it considers appropriate in the circumstances.

1997, c. 12, s. 125; 2005, c. 47, s. 131; 2019, c. 29, s. 140.

Claims

Claims that may be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement

19 (1) Subject to subsection (2), the only claims that may be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement in respect of a debtor company are

(a) claims that relate to debts or liabilities, present or future, to which the company is subject on the earlier of

(i) the day on which proceedings commenced under this Act, and

(ii) if the company filed a notice of intention under section 50.4 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act or commenced proceedings under this Act with the consent of inspectors referred to in section 116 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the date of the initial bankruptcy event within the meaning of section 2 of that Act; and

(b) claims that relate to debts or liabilities, present or future, to which the company may become subject before the compromise or arrangement is sanctioned by reason of any obligation incurred by the company before the earlier of the days referred to in subparagraphs (a)(i) and (ii).

Exception

(2) A compromise or arrangement in respect of a debtor company may not deal with any claim that relates to any of the following debts or liabilities unless the compromise or arrangement explicitly provides for the claim's compromise and the creditor in relation to that debt has voted for the acceptance of the compromise or arrangement:

(a) any fine, penalty, restitution order or other order similar in nature to a fine, penalty or restitution order, imposed by a court in respect of an offence;

(b) any award of damages by a court in civil proceedings in respect of

Bonne foi — pouvoirs du tribunal

(2) S'il est convaincu que l'intéressé n'agit pas de bonne foi, le tribunal peut, à la demande de tout intéressé, rendre toute ordonnance qu'il estime indiquée.

1997, ch. 12, art. 125; 2005, ch. 47, art. 131; 2019, ch. 29, art. 140.

Réclamations

Réclamations considérées dans le cadre des transactions ou arrangements

19 (1) Les seules réclamations qui peuvent être considérées dans le cadre d'une transaction ou d'un arrangement visant une compagnie débitrice sont :

a) celles se rapportant aux dettes et obligations, présentes ou futures, auxquelles la compagnie est assujettie à celle des dates ci-après qui est antérieure à l'autre :

(i) la date à laquelle une procédure a été intentée sous le régime de la présente loi à l'égard de la compagnie,

(ii) la date d'ouverture de la faillite, au sens de l'article 2 de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, si elle a déposé un avis d'intention sous le régime de l'article 50.4 de cette loi ou qu'elle a intenté une procédure sous le régime de la présente loi avec le consentement des inspecteurs visés à l'article 116 de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité;

b) celles se rapportant aux dettes et obligations, présentes ou futures, auxquelles elle peut devenir assujettie avant l'acceptation de la transaction ou de l'arrangement, en raison d'une obligation contractée antérieurement à celle des dates mentionnées aux sous-alinéas a)(i) et (ii) qui est antérieure à l'autre.

Exception

(2) La réclamation se rapportant à l'une ou l'autre des dettes ou obligations ci-après ne peut toutefois être ainsi considérée, à moins que la transaction ou l'arrangement ne prévoie expressément la possibilité de transiger sur cette réclamation et que le créancier intéressé n'ait voté en faveur de la transaction ou de l'arrangement proposé :

a) toute ordonnance d'un tribunal imposant une amende, une pénalité, la restitution ou une autre peine semblable;

b) toute indemnité accordée en justice dans une affaire civile :

(i) bodily harm intentionally inflicted, or sexual assault, or

(ii) wrongful death resulting from an act referred to in subparagraph (i);

(c) any debt or liability arising out of fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity or, in Quebec, as a trustee or an administrator of the property of others;

(d) any debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation, other than a debt or liability of the company that arises from an equity claim; or

(e) any debt for interest owed in relation to an amount referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (d).

R.S., 1985, c. C-36, s. 19; 1996, c. 6, s. 167; 2005, c. 47, s. 131; 2007, c. 36, s. 69.

(i) pour des lésions corporelles causées intentionnellement ou pour agression sexuelle,

(ii) pour décès découlant d'un acte visé au sous-alinéa (i);

c) toute dette ou obligation résultant de la fraude, du détournement, de la concussion ou de l'abus de confiance alors que la compagnie agissait, au Québec, à titre de fiduciaire ou d'administrateur du bien d'autrui ou, dans les autres provinces, à titre de fiduciaire;

d) toute dette ou obligation résultant de l'obtention de biens ou de services par des faux-semblants ou la présentation erronée et frauduleuse des faits, autre qu'une dette ou obligation de la compagnie qui découle d'une réclamation relative à des capitaux propres;

e) toute dette relative aux intérêts dus à l'égard d'une somme visée à l'un des alinéas a) à d).

Determination of amount of claims

20 (1) For the purposes of this Act, the amount represented by a claim of any secured or unsecured creditor is to be determined as follows:

(a) the amount of an unsecured claim is the amount

(i) in the case of a company in the course of being wound up under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act, proof of which has been made in accordance with that Act,

(ii) in the case of a company that has made an authorized assignment or against which a bankruptcy order has been made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, proof of which has been made in accordance with that Act, or

(iii) in the case of any other company, proof of which might be made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, but if the amount so provable is not admitted by the company, the amount is to be determined by the court on summary application by the company or by the creditor; and

(b) the amount of a secured claim is the amount, proof of which might be made under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act if the claim were unsecured, but the amount if not admitted by the company is, in the case of a company subject to pending proceedings under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act or the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, to be established by proof in the same manner as an unsecured claim

Détermination du montant de la réclamation

20 (1) Pour l'application de la présente loi, le montant de la réclamation d'un créancier garanti ou chirographaire est déterminé de la façon suivante :

a) le montant d'une réclamation non garantie est celui :

(i) dans le cas d'une compagnie en voie de liquidation sous le régime de la Loi sur les liquidations et les restructurations, dont la preuve a été établie en conformité avec cette loi,

(ii) dans le cas d'une compagnie qui a fait une cession autorisée ou à l'encontre de laquelle une ordonnance de faillite a été rendue sous le régime de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, dont la preuve a été établie en conformité avec cette loi,

(iii) dans le cas de toute autre compagnie, dont la preuve peut être établie sous le régime de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, mais si le montant ainsi prouvable n'est pas admis par la compagnie, il est déterminé par le tribunal sur demande sommaire de celle-ci ou du créancier;

b) le montant d'une réclamation garantie est celui dont la preuve pourrait être établie sous le régime de la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité si la réclamation n'était pas garantie, mais ce montant, s'il n'est pas admis par la compagnie, est, dans le cas où celle-ci est assujettie à une procédure pendante sous le régime de la Loi sur les liquidations et les restructurations ou de under the Winding-up and Restructuring Act or the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, as the case may be, and, in the case of any other company, the amount is to be determined by the court on summary application by the company or the creditor.

la Loi sur la faillite et l'insolvabilité, établi par preuve de la même manière qu'une réclamation non garantie sous le régime de l'une ou l'autre de ces lois, selon le cas, et, s'il s'agit de toute autre compagnie, il est déterminé par le tribunal sur demande sommaire de celle-ci ou du créancier.

Admission of claims

(2) Despite subsection (1), the company may admit the amount of a claim for voting purposes under reserve of the right to contest liability on the claim for other purposes, and nothing in this Act, the Winding-up and Restructuring Act or the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act prevents a secured creditor from voting at a meeting of secured creditors or any class of them in respect of the total amount of a claim as admitted.

R.S., 1985, c. C-36, s. 20; 2005, c. 47, s. 131; 2007, c. 36, s. 70.

Admission des réclamations

Law of set-off or compensation to apply

21 The law of set-off or compensation applies to all claims made against a debtor company and to all actions instituted by it for the recovery of debts due to the company in the same manner and to the same extent as if the company were plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be.

1997, c. 12, s. 126; 2005, c. 47, s. 131.

Compensation

21 Les règles de compensation s'appliquent à toutes les réclamations produites contre la compagnie débitrice et à toutes les actions intentées par elle en vue du recouvrement de ses créances, comme si elle était demanderesse ou défenderesse, selon le cas.

1997, ch. 12, art. 126; 2005, ch. 47, art. 131.

Classes of Creditors

Company may establish classes

22 (1) A debtor company may divide its creditors into classes for the purpose of a meeting to be held under section 4 or 5 in respect of a compromise or arrangement relating to the company and, if it does so, it is to apply to the court for approval of the division before the meeting is held.

Factors

(2) For the purpose of subsection (1), creditors may be included in the same class if their interests or rights are sufficiently similar to give them a commonality of interest, taking into account

(a) the nature of the debts, liabilities or obligations giving rise to their claims;

(b) the nature and rank of any security in respect of their claims;

(c) the remedies available to the creditors in the absence of the compromise or arrangement being sanctioned, and the extent to which the creditors would recover their claims by exercising those remedies; and

Catégories de créanciers

Établissement des catégories de créanciers

22 (1) La compagnie débitrice peut établir des catégories de créanciers en vue des assemblées qui seront tenues au titre des articles 4 ou 5 relativement à une transaction ou un arrangement la visant; le cas échéant, elle demande au tribunal d'approuver ces catégories avant la tenue des assemblées.

Critères

(2) Pour l'application du paragraphe (1), peuvent faire partie de la même catégorie les créanciers ayant des droits ou intérêts à ce point semblables, compte tenu des critères énumérés ci-après, qu'on peut en conclure qu'ils ont un intérêt commun :

a) la nature des créances et obligations donnant lieu à leurs réclamations;

b) la nature et le rang de toute garantie qui s'y rattache;

c) les voies de droit ouvertes aux créanciers, abstraction faite de la transaction ou de l'arrangement, et la mesure dans laquelle il pourrait être satisfait à leurs réclamations s'ils s'en prévalaient;

2 Determination of degree of fault
3 Questions of fact
3.1 Last clear chance rule not applicable
6 Adding party defendant

HER MAJESTY, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta, enacts as follows:

Apportionment of liability

1(1) When by fault of 2 or more persons damage or loss is caused to one or more of them, the liability to make good the damage or loss is in proportion to the degree in which each person was at fault but if, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, it is not possible to establish different degrees of fault, the liability shall be apportioned equally.

(2) Nothing in this section operates to render a person liable for damage or loss to which the person's fault has not contributed.

RSA 1980 cC-23 s1

2(1) When damage or loss has been caused by the fault of 2 or more persons, the court shall determine the degree in which each person was at fault.

(2) When 2 or more persons are found at fault, they are jointly and severally liable to the person suffering the damage or loss, but as between themselves, in the absence of a contract express or implied, they are liable to make contribution to and indemnify each other in the degree in which they are respectively found to have been at fault.

RSA 1980 cC-23 s2

Questions of fact

3 In every action

(a) the amount of damage or loss,

(b) the fault, if any, and

(c) the degrees of fault,

are questions of fact.

RSA 1980 cC-23 s5

Last clear chance rule not applicable

3.1 This Act applies if damage is caused or contributed to by the act or omission of a person, whether or not another person had the opportunity of avoiding the consequences of that act or omission and failed to do so.

4, 5 Repealed RSA 2000 c16(Supp) s70.

Adding party defendant

6 When it appears that a person not already party to an action is or may be wholly or partly responsible for the damages claimed, that person may be added as a party defendant on such terms as are considered just.

Sentencing — aggravating circumstances

380.1 (1) Without limiting the generality of section 718.2, where a court imposes a sentence for an offence referred to in section 380, 382, 382.1 or 400, it shall consider the following as aggravating circumstances:

(a) the magnitude, complexity, duration or degree of planning of the fraud committed was significant;

(b) the offence adversely affected, or had the potential to adversely affect, the stability of the Canadian economy or financial system or any financial market in Canada or investor confidence in such a financial market;

(c) the offence involved a large number of victims;

(c.1) the offence had a significant impact on the victims given their personal circumstances including their age, health and financial situation;

(d) in committing the offence, the offender took advantage of the high regard in which the offender was held in the community;

(e) the offender did not comply with a licensing requirement, or professional standard, that is normally applicable to the activity or conduct that forms the subject-matter of the offence; and

(f) the offender concealed or destroyed records related to the fraud or to the disbursement of the proceeds of the fraud.

Peine minimale

(1.1) Le tribunal qui détermine la peine à infliger à une personne qui, après avoir été poursuivie par acte d'accusation, est déclarée coupable d'une ou de plusieurs infractions prévues au paragraphe (1) est tenu de lui infliger une peine minimale d'emprisonnement de deux ans si la valeur totale de l'objet des infractions en cause dépasse un million de dollars.

Influence sur le marché public

(2) Est coupable d'un acte criminel et passible d'un emprisonnement maximal de quatorze ans quiconque, par supercherie, mensonge ou autre moyen dolosif, constituant ou non un faux semblant au sens de la présente loi, avec l'intention de frauder, influe sur la cote publique des stocks, actions, marchandises ou toute chose offerte en vente au public.

Negligence Act

R.S.O. 1990, CHAPTER N.1

Consolidation Period: From January 1, 2004 to the e-Laws currency date.

Last amendment: 2002, c.24, Sched.B, s.25.

Extent of liability, remedy over

1. Where damages have been caused or contributed to by the fault or neglect of two or more persons, the court shall determine the degree in which each of such persons is at fault or negligent, and, where two or more persons are found at fault or negligent, they are jointly and severally liable to the person suffering loss or damage for such fault or negligence, but as between themselves, in the absence of any contract express or implied, each is liable to make contribution and indemnify each other in the degree in which they are respectively found to be at fault or negligent. R.S.O. 1990, c. N.1, s. 1.

Recovery as between tortfeasors

2. A tortfeasor may recover contribution or indemnity from any other tortfeasor who is, or would if sued have been, liable in respect of the damage to any person suffering damage as a result of a tort by settling with the person suffering such damage, and thereafter commencing or continuing action against such other tortfeasor, in which event the tortfeasor settling the damage shall satisfy the court that the amount of the settlement was reasonable, and in the event that the court finds the amount of the settlement was excessive it may fix the amount at which the claim should have been settled. R.S.O. 1990, c. N.1, s. 2.

Plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence

3. In any action for damages that is founded upon the fault or negligence of the defendant if fault or negligence is found on the part of the plaintiff that contributed to the damages, the court shall apportion the damages in proportion to the degree of fault or negligence found against the parties respectively. R.S.O. 1990, c. N.1, s. 3.

Where parties to be deemed equally at fault

4. If it is not practicable to determine the respective degree of fault or negligence as between any parties to an action, such parties shall be deemed to be equally at fault or negligent. R.S.O. 1990, c. N.1, s. 4.

Adding parties

5. Wherever it appears that a person not already a party to an action is or may be wholly or partly responsible for the damages claimed, such person may be added as a party defendant to the action upon such terms as are considered just or may be made a third party to the action in the manner prescribed by the rules of court for adding third parties. R.S.O. 1990, c. N.1, s. 5.

Jury to determine degrees of negligence of parties

6. In any action tried with a jury, the degree of fault or negligence of the respective parties is a question of fact for the jury. R.S.O. 1990, c. N.1, s. 6.

When plaintiff may be liable for costs

7. Where the damages are occasioned by the fault or negligence of more than one party, the court has power to direct that the plaintiff shall bear some portion of the costs if the circumstances render this just. R.S.O. 1990, c. N.1, s. 7.

8. REPEALED: 2002, c. 24, Sched. B, s. 25.

Damage suffered as result of tort

3(1) When damage is suffered by any person as a result of a tort, whether a crime or not,

(a) a judgment recovered against any tort-feasor liable in respect of that damage is not a bar to an action against any other person who would, if sued, have been liable as a joint tort-feasor in respect of the same damage,

(b) if more than one action is brought in respect of that damage

(i) by or on behalf of the person by whom it was suffered, or

(ii) for the benefit of the estate, or of the spouse or adult interdependent partner, parent or child of that person, against tort-feasors liable in respect of the damage, whether as joint tort-feasors or otherwise, the sums recoverable under the judgments given in those actions by way of damages shall not in the aggregate exceed the amount of the damages awarded by the judgment first given, and in any of those actions, other than that in which judgment is first given, the plaintiff is not entitled to costs unless the court is of the opinion that there was reasonable ground for bringing the action, and

(c) any tort-feasor liable in respect of that damage may recover contribution from any other tort-feasor who is or would, if sued, have been liable in respect of the same damage, whether as a joint tort-feasor or otherwise, but no person is entitled to recover contribution under this section from any person entitled to be indemnified by the person first mentioned in respect of the liability regarding which the contribution is sought.

(2) In any proceedings for contribution under this section, the amount of the contribution recoverable from any person shall be an amount that the court finds to be just and equitable having regard to the extent of that person's responsibility for the damage.

(3) The court has power

(a) to exempt any person from liability to make contribution, or

(b) to direct that the contribution to be recovered from any person shall amount to a complete indemnity.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE MADAM JUSTICE FRUMAN

2000 ABCA 307 (CanLII)

[1] Gainers was in deep financial trouble. Negotiations with the province of Alberta, its largest creditor, had collapsed. The day before Alberta called Gainers' loans and began to seize its assets, Peter Pocklington, the sole director and beneficial shareholder of Gainers, transferred a valuable asset from Gainers to a company he owned. The transfer, made without Alberta's knowledge or consent, placed the asset beyond Alberta's reach. Complaining that the transaction breached its loan agreement with Gainers, Alberta sued Pocklington for intentionally inducing Gainers to breach that contract. The trial judge decided that the transfer did not breach the loan agreement and dismissed the action. I would allow the appeal.

FACTS

[2] Pocklington purchased Gainers, a meat-packing company, in 1978. His personal corporate empire consisted of several companies, including Pocklington Financial Corporation, Pocklington Holdings Inc. and Pocklington Foods Inc. In September 1985, Pocklington Foods acquired the shares of Gainers, and was Gainers' sole shareholder until October 6, 1989, when Alberta seized the shares. Pocklington also owned Gainers Properties Inc., which owned all Gainers' land, plants, machinery and equipment. After September 1987, Pocklington was the sole director of both Gainers companies.

[3] Gainers' union began a long and bitter strike in 1986. Gainers then began to experience substantial losses: more than $10 million in 1986, $14 million in 1987 and $17 million in 1989. Pocklington and Alberta negotiated a $67 million bail-out consisting of a $55 million loan guarantee in favour of another Gainers' creditor, Lloyds Bank, and a $12 million term loan. In return, Alberta was granted a secured charge against all Gainers' and Gainers Properties' assets, both existing and after-acquired. In addition, all Gainers' shares were escrowed in favour of Alberta. The terms of this arrangement were documented in a lengthy Master Agreement and scheduled collateral security documents, effective September 25, 1987.

[4] By the end of May 1989, Gainers had defaulted on both the Master Agreement and its loan agreement with Lloyds Bank. After another round of negotiations, the parties hammered out a 90-day standstill arrangement. Under this agreement, Lloyds Bank and Alberta agreed not to realize on their security if a complicated chain of conditions were met. Essentially, Alberta agreed to give up $5 million of security it held on Gainers Properties' assets, in favour of Lloyds Bank. Pocklington would make up this $5 million by a guarantee to Alberta for that amount, secured by a $5 million first mortgage on lands in Calgary and Edmonton, known as the Carma Lands.

[5] It is the last step, the $5 million mortgage on the Carma Lands, that forms the backdrop for this action. At the time the deal was negotiated, the Carma Lands were owned by another Pocklington company, Hartford Properties Inc. That company would have had to guarantee

Gainers' loan and grant the mortgage to Alberta. However, s. 42 of the Alberta Business Corporations Act, S.A. 1981, c. B-15 ("ABCA") restricted the ability of companies to provide financial assistance to related companies, and the parties were concerned that Hartford Properties would be unable to meet the statutory requirements. The transaction was therefore structured using a shell company, 350151 Alberta Ltd. Gainers acquired the shares of 350151; 350151 acquired the Carma Lands from Hartford Properties for $1.9 million; 350151 issued a promissory note to Hartford Properties for that amount; 350151 then granted a guarantee to Alberta; and finally, 350151 secured the guarantee by a $5 million mortgage in Alberta's favour registered against the Carma Lands. These arrangements were documented in a Standstill Agreement and accompanying collateral security documents, effective August 8, 1989.

[6] Further defaults occurred; further attempts to negotiate proved fruitless. On October 4, 1989, one day before Alberta gave notice of its intention to exercise its rights under its various security agreements, Pocklington signed a Gainers director's resolution transferring the 350151 shares from Gainers to his own company, Pocklington Holdings, for $100. The $100 payment for the shares was not tendered until November 13, 1989, and was never accepted by Gainers. On October 6, 1989, Alberta exercised its rights under its various security documents, began to realize on Gainers' assets, and became the sole shareholder of Gainers. Because Pocklington Holdings had not guaranteed Gainers' debts, Pocklington Holdings' assets, including the newly acquired 350151 shares, could not be seized by Alberta.

[7] Alberta contends that the transfer of the 350151 shares from Gainers to Pocklington Holdings breached its original loan agreement with Gainers, the Master Agreement. Under s. 13.03(l), Gainers agreed not to sell or otherwise dispose of its assets without the prior written consent of Alberta, except in the ordinary course of business. Alberta was neither informed of the share transfer before it took place, nor was its written consent to the transfer requested. It sued Pocklington for intentionally inducing Gainers to breach the loan agreement, asking for the return of the 350151 shares to Gainers or, alternatively, for monetary damages.

TRIAL JUDGMENT

[8] The trial judge decided that the Master Agreement had not been breached. He began his analysis by considering the Standstill Agreement. Noting that Alberta was granted a mortgage and charge which it still had at the time of the trial, he concluded that Alberta "got what it was entitled to under the Agreement, it still has what it was entitled to under the Standstill Agreement and it is not entitled to the return of the lands or the shares of 350151" (AB I at 1269-70). Although he found the terms of the Standstill Agreement to be clear and unambiguous, he considered evidence concerning "the genesis of the transaction, the background and its context", which he determined supported his interpretation of the Master Agreement (AB I at 1271-72).

[9] The trial judge then turned to the specific provisions of the Master Agreement. In order to decide whether a breach had occurred, it was his view that he had to decide whether the "assets" which were subject to the disposition restriction in s. 13.03(l) included the 350151 shares. In order to do so, the trial judge also considered s. 12.02(r) of the Master Agreement, which required Gainers to advise Alberta of any change in the ownership of any subsidiary.

[10] Noting that "assets" was not a defined term in the Master Agreement, the trial judge decided that if "assets" in s. 13.03(l) were defined to include shares in a subsidiary, s. 12.02(r) would be meaningless: Alberta would not need to be given notice of a change in ownership of a subsidiary under s. 12.02(r) because its consent would already have been elicited under s. 13.03(l). Therefore, in order to give full force and effect to both sections, the 350151 shares could not be considered assets, and the 350151 share transfer should fall under s. 12.02(r) alone, requiring notice to Alberta, but not its consent (AB I at 1274-75). The trial judge decided there had been no breach of contract, but did not specifically address whether the notice requirement had been met.

[11] Finally, the trial judge determined that even if the 350151 shares were "assets", the share transfer fell within the "ordinary course of business" exception found in s. 13.03(l). He decided that in August of 1989, one of the normal activities being carried out by Gainers, through Pocklington, "was continuing attempts to secure the necessary financing to permit Gainers to continue to operate" (AB I at 1275). Because the trial judge found that obtaining financing was in the ordinary course of Gainers' business, and the acquisition of the 350151 shares and grant of the mortgage on the Carma Lands were necessary to obtain financing, he concluded that the movement of the shares out of Gainers was also in the ordinary course of its business (AB I at 1276).

[12] Having determined there was no breach, the trial judge did not consider the other elements required to prove the tort of inducing breach of contract, and dismissed Alberta's claim. Pocklington filed a counter-claim to the original action. The dismissal of his counter-claim was not appealed.

ELEMENTS OF INDUCING BREACH OF CONTRACT

[13] In order to find that a defendant intentionally induced a breach of contract, seven elements must be established:

i) the existence of a contract;
ii) knowledge or awareness by the defendant of the contract;
iii) a breach of the contract by a contracting party;
iv) the defendant induced the breach;
v) the defendant, by his conduct, intended to cause the breach;
vi) the defendant acted without justification; and
vii) the plaintiff suffered damages.

See Ed Miller Sales & Rentals Ltd. v. Caterpillar Tractor Co. (1996), 41 Alta. L.R. (3d) 217 (C.A.); and Jackson v. Trimac Industries Ltd. (1993), 6 Alta. L.R. (3d) 225 (Q.B.), varied on other grounds (1994), 20 Alta. L.R. (3d) 117.

[14] The first two elements were admitted. In fact, Pocklington was a party to the Master Agreement and had signed it both in his personal and corporate capacities. As Pocklington was the sole director of Gainers, and signed the director's resolution which transferred the shares, the fourth element was also not contentious. The other four elements were, and are, in issue.

BREACH OF THE MASTER AGREEMENT

Are the 350151 shares "assets"?

[15] Loan agreements are comprehensive documents designed to protect lenders. In addition to setting out the terms of advances, use of proceeds, security, and repayment, they frequently restrict the debtor company's operations. Typically this is done with positive covenants, which obligate a company to do things, and negative covenants, which prohibit a company from engaging in certain activities. Loan agreements are not noted for their brevity. Because the lender attempts to contemplate and deal with possible future situations, they are often "over-drafted". It is therefore not unusual to find broad, repetitive and overlapping positive and negative covenants, as well as clauses that tend to be somewhat generic. It is in this light that loan agreements must be interpreted.

[16] Article XII of the Master Agreement contained a long list of positive covenants, including s. 12.02(r) which required Gainers to advise Alberta "of any change in the ownership of any subsidiary, affiliate or related company of [Gainers ...], or of the change in the composition of any joint venture or partnership in which [Gainers ...] has been involved [...]" (AB XIII at 2590-91). Negative covenants were included in Article XIII, including s. 13.03(l) which provided that Gainers, without the prior written consent of Alberta, would not "sell or otherwise dispose of [its] assets [...] by conveyance, transfer [...] or otherwise, except in the ordinary course of business" (AB XIII at 2600).

[17] It is not correct to say that interpreting s. 13.03(l) to include shares of a subsidiary would make s. 12.02(r) meaningless. In fact, the two sections address different factual situations, which comfortably co-exist in the corporate world. Section 13.03(l) required Alberta's consent for the sale or disposition of any of Gainers' assets, which would cover the disposition of shares it actually owned in any company, whether or not it was a subsidiary. By contrast, s. 12.02(r) required Gainers to give notice of any change in the ownership structure of a subsidiary, affiliate or related company, which would primarily address ownership changes by shareholders other than Gainers.

[18] Under the ABCA, a subsidiary company is one that is "controlled by [an]other [body corporate ...]" (s. 2(4)). Control does not require ownership of 100% of the shares. In fact, all that is needed is enough voting shares to elect directors, 50% + 1 share (s. 2(2)(a)). Therefore, a company could be controlled by Gainers, and be its subsidiary, even though the other 50% - 1 share were owned by someone else. It is changes in the ownership of shares belonging to these other shareholders that s. 12.02(r) was primarily intended to address. This interpretation is reinforced by the words which followed, requiring notice of any "change in the composition of any joint venture or partnership in which [Gainers ...] has been involved".

[19] Although ss. 12.02(r) and 13.03(l) applied to different situations, the sections narrowly overlapped when Gainers disposed of shares it owned in a subsidiary company. A court must strive to harmonize apparently conflicting terms in a contract: Cotter* v. General Petroleums Ltd., [1951] S.C.R. 154 at 158. But whenever possible, effect is to be given to all the terms of contracts and none are to be rejected as having no meaning: Scanlon v. *Castlepoint Development Corp., [1993] 11 O.R. (3d) 744 at 770, 776 (C.A.); leave to appeal refused [1993] 2 S.C.R. x. In this case there is no direct or indirect conflict between the two sections which would permit a court to qualify their meaning; instead the sections complement each other. Dispositions of Gainers' own shares in its subsidiaries, like the disposition of any other asset, would be subject to the consent requirement in s. 13.03(l). By obtaining Alberta's consent under that section, Gainers would coincidentally satisfy the requirement for giving notice under s. 12.02(r).

[20] As the two sections apply to different situations and do not conflict, there is no reason to restrict the meaning of the word "assets" from its normal dictionary sense, "a thing [...] of use or value": The New Shorter Oxford English Dictionary, 4th ed., s.v. "asset". Accordingly, the 350151 shares were "assets" whose transfer was subject to the negative covenant in s. 13.03(l). Because Gainers did not obtain Alberta's consent to the transfer, as the section required, Gainers breached s. 13.03(l) unless the sale of the shares was in the ordinary course of its business.

"Ordinary Course of Business"

[21] Courts are required to undertake a broad and case-specific analysis of the ordinary course of a particular company's business, for it is considered unwise to attempt a comprehensive definition: Robitaille* v. American Biltrite (Canada), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 290 at 291. The analysis is to be achieved through an objective examination of the usual type of activity in which the business is engaged, followed by a comparison of that general activity to the specific activity in question. The transaction "must fall into place as part of the undistinguished common flow of business carried on, calling for no remark and arising out of no special or peculiar situation": Aubrett Holdings Ltd. v. *Canada [1998], G.S.T.C. 17 (T.C.C.).

[22] In order to determine whether a transaction was in the ordinary course of a company's business, a court must consider all the circumstances which were known, or ought reasonably to have been known, by the parties at the time: Ford Motor Credit Co. of Canada Ltd.* v. *Centre Motors of Brampton Ltd., [1983] 38 O.R. (2d) 516 (H.C.J.). Courts have identified a number of factors which may be taken into account:

(i) The nature and significance of the transaction: it ought to be one that a manager might reasonably be expected to carry out on the manager's own initiative without making prior reference back or subsequent report to superior authorities, such as the board of directors or the shareholders: Roynat Inc.* v. Ron Clark Motors Ltd. (1991), 1 P.P.S.A.C. (2d) 191 at 197 (Ont. Gen. Div.); and 85956 Holdings Ltd. v. *Fayerman Brothers Limited, [1986] 2 W.W.R. 754 (Sask. C.A.);

(ii) The value of any asset sold: the disposition should have been made with proper regard to its value: Estevan Credit Union Ltd.* v. *Dyer, [1997] 8 W.W.R. 49 (Sask. Q.B.); and Ford, supra;

(iii) The quantity of assets sold: the transaction ought not to resemble a liquidation of assets: Fayerman, supra;

(iv) The reason for the transaction: it ought not to have occurred as a response to financial difficulties or in suspicious circumstances: Ford, supra, and Countrywide Banking Corpn. Ltd.* v. *Dean, [1998] A.C. 338 (P.C.); and

(v) The intent of the transaction: neither its intent nor its effect should have been to undermine bank security: Ford, supra.

To this list I would add:

(vi) The frequency of the type of transaction: an unusual or isolated transaction might be viewed differently from a routine one; and

(vii) The arm's length nature of the transaction: a transaction between a company and a party with whom it is related should receive careful scrutiny.

[23] While a reviewing court will defer to a trial judge's fact findings, a determination that a transaction was in the ordinary course of a company's business is a mixed question of fact and law. A failure to consider the appropriate factors constitutes reviewable error. In this case a consideration of the evidence in the context of the relevant factors leads to the conclusion that the 350151 share transfer was not in the ordinary course of Gainers' business.

[24] The parties agreed that Gainers' ordinary business was "the slaughter of cattle and hogs, the processing and sale of beef and pork products, and other food products": Agreed Statement of Facts, para. 34 (AB XX at 4187). Pocklington also acknowledged that Gainers was not in the business of holding or developing land or trading in the shares of corporations that did so (AB 739:4-10). It follows that Gainers originally acquired the 350151 shares to permit it to continue to operate its livestock slaughtering and meat processing business, not because it was in the financing, land development or share trading business.

[25] The shares of 350151 were a significant asset. The transfer was a material transaction requiring authorization from the board of directors and was not one that a manager had the authority to conduct. The shares were sold for a nominal sum, $100, which not only was less than their market value, but was not tendered until more than a month later. Although characterized by the trial judge as part of a financing arrangement, the disposition appears to be quite the opposite.

[26] While money frequently flowed between Gainers and various Pocklington companies, a transfer of assets was rare. The 350151 share transfer was unusual. It was also a non-arm's length transaction because the assets were transferred to a company owned by Pocklington, Gainers' sole director and beneficial shareholder. Pocklington signed the transfer agreement, share certificates and the Gainers, Pocklington Holdings and 350151 board resolutions authorizing the transfer, in his capacity as sole director of all three companies.

[27] The disposition involved an asset transfer which was restricted by the Master Agreement. Although Alberta had previously been advised of and its prior consent sought for asset dispositions involving the sale of land (AB 1097:24-36; 860), the transfer of shares (AB XVI at 3187, para. 4) and the potential sale of assets of a division of Gainers (AB 810:6-9; 843:12-16), Alberta knew nothing about this transaction before it was completed. Even the possibility of such a transfer had never been discussed with Alberta (AB 1089:39-40).

[28] Finally, the transaction occurred when Gainers was in fatal financial difficulty. The timing of the transaction was suspicious and not a mere coincidence, as Pocklington originally implied (AB 1053:39-1054:2). Pocklington had notice in late September 1989 that Alberta intended to act on its security (AB 1087:44-1088:23; 740:6-13). He admitted that negotiations with Alberta actually collapsed on October 3 or 4, 1989, the same day the shares were transferred (AB 1092:29-1093:11).

[29] This leads to the irresistible conclusion that the transfer of the 350151 shares was not in the ordinary course of Gainers' livestock slaughtering and meat processing business. There is also a practical business reason for this conclusion. Lenders rely on covenants which restrict the disposition of assets outside the ordinary course of a company's business, to preserve the assets for the benefit of the creditors. That reliance is especially heavy when a debtor company teeters on the brink of insolvency and the temptation to divest looms large. Yet, according to the interpretation Pocklington advances, as a company's financial woes deepen and it redoubles its efforts to find financing, the ordinary course of its business magically expands to include financing transactions and everything connected to them. As a result, seriously troubled companies are permitted to shed significant assets without their creditor's consent, although solvent companies are not. This has a paradoxical effect: just when the creditor's reliance on the negative covenant is strongest, the restriction on the company's ability to dispose of its assets disappears. Such an interpretation of "ordinary course of business" makes little commercial sense.

The Standstill Agreement and Parol Evidence

[30] Pocklington contends that, regardless of the interpretation of s. 13.03(l), the transfer ought not to be considered a breach because all the parties knew Alberta was to obtain only a mortgage, the 350151 shares were to be transferred back and therefore, the transfer formed part of the overall agreement between the parties. Both Pocklington and Robert Lloyd testified on this point (AB 1051:29-43; 812:42-813:22; 813:38-41; 814:34-44; 815:23-24). Lloyd, a lawyer with 20 years' experience, originally practised with the Ogilvie and Company law firm, Pocklington's lawyers, but in 1984 began to work for Pocklington and had an office in the Pocklington Financial offices (AB 776:29-777:2).

[31] The Master Agreement was a lengthy and comprehensive document, containing 70 pages of finely-printed clauses and 23 schedules. Attempting to reduce the parties' deal to writing, the Master Agreement provided that "[t]his Agreement [...] constitutes the entire agreement amongst the parties hereto and cancels and supersedes all prior agreements, undertakings, declarations or representations, written or verbal, in respect thereof" (AB XIII at 2615, s. 21.09). It established a hierarchy in the case of conflicts, stating that "[i]n case of any conflict between the provisions of the Security or any other agreements made pursuant hereto and this Agreement, the provisions of this Agreement shall govern [...]" (AB XIII at 2614, s. 21.04). Anticipating possible amendments it stipulated that "[n]o amendment or modification of this Agreement shall be effective unless the same shall be in writing and signed by each of the parties hereto" (AB XIII at 2614, s. 21.06).

[32] Section 13.03(l) of the Master Agreement restricted dispositions of assets, requiring Alberta's consent. If Pocklington's contention is correct, one might have expected the Standstill Agreement to have expressly permitted the transfer of the 350151 shares to Pocklington after the mortgage was granted.

[33] The Standstill Agreement did nothing of the kind. While it clearly contemplated that 350151, a subsidiary of Gainers, would own the Carma Lands and grant a mortgage on them collateral to its guarantee of Gainers' obligations to Alberta (AB XVI at 3185), it made no provision for the transfer-back of the 350151 shares after the mortgage was granted. By contrast, the Standstill Agreement made express provision for Pocklington to transfer his shares in Gainers Property to Pocklington Foods and stated: "Alberta hereby consents, pursuant to the Master Agreement, to the transfer of shares [...]" (AB XVI at 3187, s. 4). The Standstill Agreement went on to confirm the applicability of the covenants contained in the Master Agreement, by acknowledging that "the Master Agreement is not amended, modified or altered in any manner except as expressly set forth herein" (AB XVI at 3190, s. 13).

[34] Given these clear provisions, in order to find that the transfer of the 350151 shares to Pocklington was permitted, the court would have to consider parol evidence. The trial judge partly based his interpretation of the Master Agreement on the genesis, background and context of the Standstill Agreement. He decided that interpreting "assets" to include the 350151 shares was "completely contrary to what was intended by the Standstill Agreement" (AB I at 1275). The trial judge also based his conclusion, in part, on his finding that Alberta was entitled to a mortgage under the Standstill Agreement, and that is what it received. The issue, however, is not whether Alberta received what it was entitled to under the Standstill Agreement, but whether the Master Agreement was breached. It was.

[35] In this case the Standstill Agreement, by its express terms, confirmed the Master Agreement. There was no ambiguity, absurdity, contradiction, or significant lack of clarity in the relevant parts of the written agreements, nor did the factual matrix indicate that the written documents did not embody all the terms of the agreement. The parol evidence rule therefore precluded the admission of evidence of intention to contradict the terms of the Master Agreement: Hawrish* v. Bank of Montreal, [1969] S.C.R. 515 at 518; Gainers Inc. v. Pocklington Holdings Inc. (2000), 255 A.R. 373 at 376-78 (C.A.); and Gallen et al. v. Allstate Grain Co. Ltd. (1984), 9 D.L.R. (4th) 496 at 506-507 (B.C. C.A.); leave to appeal refused: Allstate Grain Co. Ltd. v. *Guichon et al., [1984] 1 S.C.R. v.

[36] Even if parol evidence were admissible in this case, Pocklington faces an insurmountable obstacle: the evidence does not support his contention that the parties agreed that the shares would be transferred back. The so-called plan to transfer the shares was not a certainty:

Pocklington "presumed" (AB 1051:42) and Lloyd, "belie[ved]" (AB 812:46) that it was. Lloyd could not recall whether this "understanding" had ever been verbally communicated (AB 814:38-39). He was merely "under the impression" that this plan had been the "object of the exercise" (AB 814:39-41). Pocklington provided even clearer testimony when he admitted that Alberta had never known anything about this transfer: "[i]t was never discussed going in. It was never discussed going out" (AB 1089:39-40). As the planned transfer-back was never given voice, the so-called evidence is silent parol, and perhaps wishful parol at that.

[37] The transfer of the 350151 shares to Pocklington without Alberta's consent breached s. 13.03(l) of the Master Agreement.

INTENT

The Law

[38] In order to find liability, a plaintiff must demonstrate that the defendant had an "intent" to induce the breach of contract. The intent component of the tort is the most difficult to understand. Malicious motive, unlawful conduct, hatred or intention to harm are not required elements of intent: Allen* v. Flood, [1898] A.C. 1 (H.L.(E.)); Parks West Mall Ltd. v. Jennett (1996), 36 Alta. L.R. (3d) 44 at 49 (C.A.); and Atcheson v. *College of Physicians and Surgeons (Alberta), [1994] 6 W.W.R. 239 at 246 (Alta. Q.B.). However, what is required is less clear. The requisite intent has been described with "loose, vague and conflicting statements" that sometime appear to be irreconcilable: Ed Miller Sales, supra, at 230.

[39] Originally, the tort required the breach to be the result of wilful, deliberate and direct conduct which the defendant knew or hoped would result in a violation of the plaintiff's contractual rights. See for example, Lumley* v. Gye (1853), 118 E.R. 749; 2 El. & Bl. 216 (Q.B.); and Quinn v. *Leathem, [1901] A.C. 495 (H.L.(I.)).

[40] However, courts soon recognized that intent can also be inferred when the consequences of the conduct were a necessary or reasonably foreseeable result, because "people are presumed to intend the reasonable consequences of their acts": South Wales Miners' Federation* v. Glamorgan Coal Company, Limited, [1905] A.C. 239 at 244 (H.L.(E.)). In Posluns v. Toronto Stock Exchange and Gardiner (1965), 46 D.L.R. (2d) 210 at 267 (Ont. H.C.); affirmed (1966), 53 D.L.R. (2d) 193 (C.A.); affirmed [1968] S.C.R. 330, the court held that liability would attach if the defendant's conduct resulted in the breach of a contract "of which it was or ought to have been aware". The intention to bring about a breach of contract need not be the primary object; it is sufficient if the interference is necessarily incidental to attaining the defendant's primary objective: Fraser v. Board of Trustees of Central United Church, [1983] 38 O.R. (2d) 97 at 103 (H.C.J.); and Bank of Nova Scotia v. *Gaudreau, [1985] 48 O.R. (2d) 478 (H.C.J.).

[41] Intention can also be established when the defendant was reckless or wilfully blind to a breach. The defendant need not have actually known the precise terms of the contract or that his object only could be accomplished through breach of the contract. "If – turning a blind eye – he went about it regardless of whether it would involve a breach, he will be treated just as if he had knowingly procured it": J.G. Fleming, The Law of Torts, 8th ed. (Sydney: Law Book Co., 1992) at 694.

[42] Turning a blind eye may include situations in which the defendant failed to seek advice or employ the means available to obtain the necessary knowledge. For example, in Royal Bank of Canada* v. Wilton (1995), 165 A.R. 261 (C.A.), the defendant was uncertain about the enforceability of a contract, had the "means of knowledge" to determine if a legitimate contract existed, but made no efforts to seek advice. This court found the defendant liable because he deliberately chose not to acquire the information, but proceeded on the basis that the contract was unenforceable. Similarly, when there are competing legal interpretations and the defendant adopts an interpretation which will interfere with the plaintiff's rights, the defendant "must at least show that he was advised and honestly believed that he was legally entitled to take that course": Swiss Bank v. *Lloyds Bank, [1979] Ch. 548 at 580 (Ch.D.); reversed on other grounds [1982] A.C. 584 (C.A.); affirmed [1982] A.C. 604 (H.L.(E.)).

[43] If the defendant acted under a bona fide belief that contractual rights would not be infringed, liability will not be found even though the belief turned out to be mistaken. But for a mistaken belief to be bona fide, rather than the result of recklessness or wilful blindness, some basis for the belief must exist, and some reasonable effort must have been made by the defendant to learn the truth. In British Industrial Plastics Ltd.* v. Ferguson, [1940] 1 All E.R. 479 (H.L.(E.)), defendants who had made the effort to seek advice were not found liable even though their belief was described as "illogical". In Z-Mark International Inc. v. *Leng Novak Blais Inc. (1996), 12 O.T.C. 33 (Gen. Div.), appeal dismissed (1999), 122 O.A.C. 341, a defendant made enquiries and obtained assurances and a warranty. The court found that the defendant had no reason to doubt the assurance or the warranty and therefore the defendant was not knowingly or recklessly indifferent to a breach of contract.

[44] In some cases a distinction is drawn between direct interference, for which the breach must be a foreseeable or reasonable consequence of the conduct, and indirect interference, for which the breach must be a necessary or substantially certain consequence. See, for example, L.N. Klar, Tort Law, 2nd ed. (Scarborough: Carswell, 1996) at 498 and 507; Fleming, supra, at 694; D.C. Thomson & Co. Ltd.* v. *Deakin, [1952] Ch. 646 (C.A.); Bank of Nova Scotia, supra; Garry* v. *Sherritt Gordon Mines Ltd., [1988] 1 W.W.R. 289 (Sask. C.A.); and Atcheson, supra.

[45] As this case involves direct interference, this distinction does not arise. Pocklington, as the director of Gainers, executed the documents to complete the transfer of the 350151 shares to his own company. The transfer caused Gainers to breach s. 13.03(l) of the Master Agreement, which prohibited dispositions of assets without Alberta's consent. Therefore, if the breach was a reasonable or foreseeable consequence of that transfer, or alternatively, if Pocklington completed the transfer recklessly, was wilfully blind to its consequences, or was indifferent as to whether or not it caused a breach, the necessary intent element for the tort will be met.

The Evidence

[46] The trial judge did not consider the intent component of the tort and did not assess the trial evidence in that light. The parties were aware of the intent element, pleaded it, adduced evidence of intent at trial, and argued it, both before the trial judge and extensively at the appeal hearing. This court has the alternative of reviewing the evidence and making a determination whether the intent component is met, which was the parties' clear preference, or sending the case back to the trial court. An appellate court is in no position to weigh competing evidence, or assess credibility. However, in this case it is possible to make a determination about intent by considering and accepting the evidence adduced by Pocklington.

[47] Pocklington insisted that he continued to own the Carma Lands (AB 1051:19-23; 1093:17-20), that he was entitled to get back his mortgage at the end of the 90-day standstill period (AB 1089:31-33; 1094:6-11), and that the Master Agreement was irrelevant to the share transfer (AB 1089:40-41; 1097:43-46). Although he personally signed the Gainers' director's resolution transferring the shares, as well as the 350151 share certificates, he denied knowing whether he was getting the shares or the land back: " [...] the only thing I realized at the time was that I was getting back my mortgage that I had put up for the 90-day standstill" (AB 1095:4-6). It is clear from Pocklington's evidence that he entertained a flawed view of the financing arrangements with Alberta.

[48] Any businessman with Pocklington's experience should know that commercial lenders do not extend credit to companies in dire financial straits on the security of a mortgage, then, when the borrower defaults, hand back the mortgage and willingly accept any loss. Pocklington's assertions are plainly wrong. Further, his contention that the transaction was all part of the deal he negotiated with Alberta was contradicted by his own admission that he "never discussed taking back the shares in 350151 or the Carma Lands with anyone from the Crown" (AB 1089:43-45). Pocklington cannot sidestep the intent component of the tort by adopting an untenable and unrealistic view of the transaction, and an unreasonable interpretation of the agreements.

[49] Pocklington's evidence demonstrates he did not care whether his actions constituted a breach. He admitted that he was acting in his own interests and that he had no loyalty to Gainers (AB 742:17-37). His acknowledged that he was trying to defeat the entirety of the mortgage (AB 1094:5-11; 1095:4-6; 1052:46-1053:10; 1096:29-30). It is not much of a defence to a charge of intentionally breaching the Master Agreement to show that Pocklington intended to breach the Standstill Agreement instead.

[50] Nevertheless, intent to breach the Master Agreement must be proven. The Master Agreement is a lengthy and complicated document, bristling with covenants and replete with schedules. It is by no means an easy document to analyze or interpret. It would have been possible for the trial judge to conclude that a breach of s. 13.03(l) of the Master Agreement was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the transfer of the 350151 shares. Because of the manner in which the case was presented at trial, such a conclusion would involve findings of credibility. This court, however, is in no position to make those findings, and intent cannot be found on that basis.

[51] But that does not end the inquiry. Prudent business people, concerned about honouring contractual commitments, make appropriate inquiries before embarking on transactions that involve complex legal documents. Consulting legal counsel may not be necessary in every case, but the circumstances here cry out for legal advice: negotiations with Alberta had collapsed and Pocklington knew that realization of the loan was imminent; Gainers was insolvent with no equity left in the company; Gainers' assets and shares were secured and its business activities were restricted by binders full of loan and security agreements; and Gainers' sole beneficial shareholder proposed to transfer a valuable asset to himself for nominal consideration, signing the resolutions as sole director. Pocklington, both personally and in his capacity as a director of Gainers, had an obligation to obtain legal advice about the propriety of the transaction. If he failed to do so, or ignored the legal advice he received, he proceeded at his peril.

[52] The record contains statements by Pocklington that he would have relied on Lloyd (AB 1052:11-13), and by Lloyd that he never told Pocklington that the transaction could not be done (AB 875:3-5). But absent from the record is any evidence that Lloyd was asked by Pocklington or volunteered to give a solid legal opinion or obtain independent legal advice that the transfer of the 350151 shares would not violate the Master Agreement. Although at trial Lloyd testified to his view that the share transfer did not violate the agreement (AB 814:31-32; 875:23-28), there is no suggestion that, at the time of the transfer, he objectively assessed the risks of proceeding and fairly communicated his observations to Pocklington. Instead, the record shows that Pocklington demanded that Lloyd do what was necessary to get the land back (AB 1052:32-34; 1093:18-20), and that Lloyd did as he was directed (AB 874:39-875:1).

[53] The share transfer documents were prepared by Ogilvie and Company, "on instructions received from Gainers Inc. on the 3rd day of October, 1989" (AB XVIII at 3606), just as negotiations with Alberta collapsed. They were signed the next day. Lloyd was uncertain whether Ogilvie and Company brought s. 13.03(l) to Pocklington's attention. At first he acknowledged this had occurred:

> Q [...] And, sir, I take it that you're also aware that your firm drew Article 13.03(l) to Mr. Pocklington's attention at the time the shares were transferred from Gainers to Pocklington Holdings Inc.?

> A I think that's correct. I think that there was -- these -- these sections were -- now, I think that's correct.
> (AB 862:24-31)

Later, he changed his mind:

> A I think that there were discussions with respect to the people at Ogilvie about them and I'd -- I'm not certain -- I'm not that certain in fact -- I can't recall whether or not Mr. Pocklington was specifically directed to the sections or not.

[54] Correspondence from Ogilvie and Company provides some clarification. On November 15, 1989, after Alberta got wind that the shares had been transferred, its counsel wrote Ogilvie and Company asking for details. Alberta's counsel referred to a possible breach of s. 13.03(l) of the Master Agreement, noting that Alberta's consent had not been obtained, and that the transfer was not in the ordinary course of Gainers' business (AB XVIII at 3586-87).

[55] Ogilvie and Company responded by letter dated November 16, 1989, which stated:

> We are also able to advise you that our firm raised with our client the exact provision of the Master Agreement which your letter raises [s. 13.03(l)], however our client takes the view that the transaction is not off side the terms of the Master Agreement.
> (AB XVIII at 3606, para. 3) [Emphasis added.]

[56] The clear implication of Ogilvie and Company's carefully worded letter is that either the lawyers did not share their clients' views, or they were invited to keep their legal advice to themselves. Pocklington nevertheless signed the documents to give effect to the share transfer, and retained the shares despite Alberta's early protests and Ogilvie and Company's apparent reservations. He had the means of knowledge, but chose to act without legal advice. Pocklingon was wilfully blind to the consequences of his actions and showed clear indifference to the breach. The intent component of the tort is satisfied.

JUSTIFICATION

[57] In some situations, a defendant's plea of justification may avoid liability: South Wales Miners' Federation, supra, and Quinn, supra. The defence of justification is available when the defendant caused the breach while acting under a duty imposed by law. The issue in each case is whether, upon consideration of the relative significance of all the factors, the defendant's conduct should be tolerated despite its detrimental effect on the interests of others: Fleming, supra, at 657.

2000 ABCA 307 (CanLII)

[58] Directors of companies owe duties to the corporation; they are obliged both at common law and under statute to act in the best interests of the company: Re Cawley & Co. (1889), 42 Ch. 209 at 233 (C.A.). For example, s. 117(1)(a) of the ABCA provides: "Every director and officer of a corporation in exercising his powers and discharging his duties shall act honestly and in good faith with a view to the best interests of the corporation [...] ".

[59] Therefore, when the interests of the company are best served by breaking its contractual commitments, the director's act of inducement is justified because it is "taken as a duty": De Jetley Marks* v. Greenwood (Lord), [1936] 1 All E.R. 863 (K.B.) at 873; and Imperial Oil Ltd. v. *C & G Holdings Ltd. (1990), 62 D.L.R. (4th) 261 (Nfld. C.A.). The rationale for this defence is that a director acting in compliance with a duty imposed by law should not be personally liable because the director's act induced a breach of the company's contract.

[60] But if the director is not complying with that duty, the rationale for relieving personal liability disappears. Although the director may have acted in the name of the company, justification is not available as a defence. See W.A. Richardson, "Making an End Run Around the Corporate Veil: The Tort of Inducing Breach of Contract" (1984) 5 Advocates' Q. 103.

[61] For example, in McFadden* v. *481782 Ontario Ltd. et al., [1984] 47 O.R. (2d) 134 at 146-47 (H.C.J.), the court found that the defendant directors were liable when "[t]hey sought to feather their own nest, rather than that of the company they were under a duty to serve." In transferring corporate funds to themselves, they were acting with a view to their own best interests rather than the corporation's. Therefore, they were not acting "under a compulsion of a duty", justification was not available as a defence, and the directors were personally liable for inducing a breach of contract. Similarly, immunity did not extend to directors who took advantage of their office to commit a tort for their own ends: Jackson, supra.

[62] But who bears what burden of proof? The Newfoundland Court of Appeal cautioned against unduly limiting the justification defence available to directors in Imperial Oil, supra. Marshall J.A. observed that requiring directors to justify their corporate actions to third parties in order to obtain immunity from personal suit would open the corporate affairs of a company to third party scrutiny, erode established concepts of separate corporate status and impair the efficiency of the corporate entity. He stated that "[e]ven when a director has not acted bona fide, therefore, there must exist some factor additional to the knowledge upon which he or she acts to justify a finding of wrongful inducement." He went on to suggest that liability may depend on proof by the plaintiff "that the dominating purpose of the director's act was aimed at depriving the aggrieved party of the benefits of the contract": at 266.

[63] In order to succeed under the Imperial Oil test, a plaintiff must prove that the director knew the legal rights of others would be jeopardized by the director's actions, and intended to deprive the aggrieved party of contractual benefits. Although proof of malice is not required, the Imperial Oil test ratchets up the intent element, making it closer to the formulation of the tort that existed more than a century ago, at the time of Lumley, supra, and Quinn, supra. Rigorously applied in direct interference cases, proof that the breach was a necessary or foreseeable result of the director's conduct seems to be insufficient to establish liability. Similarly, the Imperial Oil test appears to preclude liability for a director who acted recklessly or was wilfully blind to a breach.

[64] The concerns expressed in Imperial Oil are not misplaced. In order to protect the fine fabric of the corporate veil, courts should refrain from requiring directors to prove the legitimate corporate purpose motivating their actions. However, courts also should not condone inappropriate conduct by automatically placing a difficult onus on a plaintiff, by reason only that the defendant director owed legal duties to the company whose contract he had a hand in breaching. Some balance is required.

[65] Although justification is a defence to the tort, the burden is fairly placed on the plaintiff to prove the director was not acting in the best interest of the corporation, and therefore stepped out from under the protective umbrella of the director's corporate duties. If a director wishes the plaintiff to prove more, in my view the director must at least demonstrate that some legitimate interest of the corporation could have been served by the conduct. This information is well within the director's knowledge and a requirement to demonstrate it on a prima facie basis, rather than to prove it on a balance of probabilities, does not unduly open the company's business to third party scrutiny.

[66] If the court concludes the director's conduct is capable both of serving the interests of the corporation and of achieving some less worthy purpose, the court should go on to consider whether the plaintiff has proven that the director's act was aimed at depriving the aggrieved party of the benefits of the contract. But where, as in McFadden, supra, it is readily apparent that the conduct could only be intended for the director's own benefit and not the company's, the court need not address the director's dominating concern. In such direct interference cases, proof of intent as it has developed through the case law, and proof that the director was not acting in the best interests of the corporation, will be sufficient to ground liability.

[67] In this case Pocklington acquired a valuable asset for nominal consideration at the expense of Gainers' creditors. Since Gainers was insolvent at that time, its creditors' interests were the interests of the company: L.C.B. Gower, Gower's Principles of Modern Company Law, 6th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1997) at 603; and Levy-Russell Ltd.* v. *Tecmotiv Inc. (1994), 13 B.L.R. (2d) 1 (Ont. Gen. Div.) at 189-90. Promoting the interests of one shareholder at the expense of the creditors is not in the best interests of the company: Levy-Russell at 169. A director who pursues these objectives is not acting in furtherance of his corporate duty, and there is no justification for his deeds.

[68] Pocklington has not demonstrated any legitimate business interest of Gainers that could have been served by the 350151 share transfer. In fact, he candidly admitted he was acting only in his own interests, with no benefit to Gainers (AB 742:16-37):

> Q I am talking about on October the 4th when Gainers sold the shares --
> A To me?
>
> Q -- in the numbered company to Pocklington Holdings Inc.?
> A Right.
> Q Was there any benefit to Gainers in that transaction?
> A I guess I was more interested in my own personal well-being than Gainers' well-being at that particular date. I felt, as I said, by that time a lot of my trust had left my partners called the government.
>
> Q All right, so you were acting --
> A In short, I realized that I was getting screwed by them.
>
> Q You were acting to further the interests of PHI and yourself and you weren't too concerned with Gainers at that time?
> A My loyalty to Gainers had been squeezed at that time.

[69] By transferring the 350151 shares to his own company, Pocklington was not discharging his legal duty to act honestly and in good faith with a view to the best interests of Gainers; he was acting solely in his own interests. As no legitimate interest of Gainers could possibly be served by the transaction, the court need not go on to consider whether Pocklington's act was aimed at depriving Alberta of the benefits of its contract. Pocklington's position as director cannot provide justification for his actions.

DAMAGES

The Damage Element

[70] In order to find liability for the tort of inducing breach of contract, Alberta must show that it suffered damages. Proof of damages is an element of the tort. Once all the elements have been found, and liability has been established, the court goes on to calculate the quantum of damages.

[71] Pocklington contends that Alberta suffered no damages, because at the time the shares were transferred, 350151's liabilities exceeded the value of its assets, making the shares worthless. Pocklington's argument ignores the fact that most of 350151's debt was owed to Alberta or to Lloyds Bank, whose interest Alberta acquired. But even if there had been no equity in the 350151 shares, Gainers' ownership of the shares would have been of considerable value to Alberta. Since Alberta came to own all Gainers' shares, it also would have controlled 350151, Gainers' subsidiary. Alberta could therefore have consented to the foreclosure against the Carma Lands on behalf of 350151, saving considerable time and litigation expense. These damages are not theoretical. At the appeal hearing, Alberta indicated that it had not realized on the Carma Lands mortgage and the litigation is ongoing.

[72] The damage element of the tort is met.

Quantum of Damages

[73] Having established liability, the quantum of damages must be assessed.

[74] Pocklington contends that damages must be confined to losses which existed on the date of the breach. In fact, damages are to be assessed "at large": Exchange Telegraph Co. Ltd.* v. Gregory & Co., [1896] 1 Q.B. 147 at 153 (C.A.). A court can award the damages it deems appropriate, which are a matter of impression, not addition, and can be inferred from the circumstances: Goldsoll v. Goldman, [1914] 2 Ch. 603 (Ch.D.); affirmed [1915] 1 Ch. 292 (C.A.); and Vale v. International Longshoremen's & Warehousemen's Union, Local 508 (1979), 9 C.C.L.T. 262 at 271 (B.C. C.A.). The court must assess a global figure approximating the harm it thinks the plaintiff has suffered: Simpson v. *Consumers' Assn. of Canada (1999), 41 C.C.E.L. (2d) 179 at 260 (Ont. Gen. Div.).

[75] Given this broad latitude, it is not surprising that the date for establishing damages remains flexible. While a court may choose to assess damages that existed on the date of the breach, it instead may elect to compensate the plaintiff for losses that occurred in the years following the breach: Unilux Manufacturing Co.* v. Prime Boilers Inc., [1990] 74 O.R. (2d) 270 (H.C.J.); and Clarke v. *Rossburger (2000), 50 B.L.R. (2d) 73 (Alta. Q.B.).

[76] When Alberta started this action it sought the return of the 350151 shares to Gainers or, alternatively, monetary damages. Returning the shares would have been simplest and would have undone the breach of contract. That remedy was possible at the time of the trial, but the parties indicated at the appeal hearing that this was no longer the case. Damages equivalent to the value of the shares must therefore be awarded.

[77] Establishing the date for the calculation of damages involves judicial discretion, based on the facts and circumstances. Pocklington has wrongfully withheld and had the benefit of the 350151 shares since 1989. In the last decade, the value of 350151's primary asset, the Carma Lands, has increased. It would be inequitable to value the damages at the date of the breach, allowing all the post-breach gain to accrue to Pocklington. The quantum of damages must therefore be calculated as the value of the 350151 shares at the time of the trial.

[78] Because 350151 had only one asset, the Carma Lands, assessment of the value of the 350151 shares is relatively simple. The calculation begins with the fair market value of the Carma Lands, from which are deducted any liabilities owed by 350151 in respect of the Carma Lands. The starting point is the trial judge's finding that the Carma Lands were worth $6.6 million (AB I at 1264).

[79] At the time of the trial, a number of encumbrances were registered against the Carma Lands. Alberta Treasury Branches had registered a mortgage in the face amount of $1.6 million to secure a personal obligation of Pocklington. The agreement by which 350151 acquired the Carma Lands from Hartford Properties provided that 350151 "has not assumed any liability under or with respect to the ATB Mortgage [...]" and that if 350151 were required to make payment, any amounts paid would be set off against the balance owing to Hartford Properties for the purchase price of the Carma Lands (AB XVIII at 3604, s. 2). Since 350151 is not responsible for paying the ATB mortgage, it may be ignored.

[80] The other mortgages registered against the Carma Lands consisted of a financial guarantee in favour of Lloyds Bank for $1.5 million, which Alberta has acquired, and the $5 million mortgage in favour of Alberta. Alberta indicated at the appeal hearing that to date nothing has been realized on the mortgages registered against the Carma Lands, and provided an undertaking that it would not pursue Pocklington personally for any amounts realized on the mortgages. While Alberta's ability to collect against Pocklington must be restricted to avoid double recovery, for the purpose of calculating damages the amount of these mortgages may also be ignored.

[81] The remaining liability is the amount owing to Hartford Properties for the purchase of the Carma Lands. 350151 acquired the Carma Lands from Hartford Properties on August 10, 1989 for $1.9 million, payable by a promissory note (AB XVIII 3604, s. 1) which, at the time of trial, had not been paid. On September 27, 1989, Pocklington, in his capacity as director of 350151 and Hartford Properties, signed a second agreement which added a price adjustment clause to the original purchase agreement (AB XVII 3469-70). The clause provided:

> 6. It is the intention of the parties that the Lands be transferred at their fair market value. Should, however, any competent taxing authority at any time issue or propose to issue any assessment or assessments that impose or would impose any liability for tax on the basis that the fair market value of the Lands is other than the amount set forth herein and if the directors of the parties or a competent court or tribunal agree with such a revaluation and all appeal rights have been exhausted or times for appeal have expired without appeals having been taken or should the directors of the parties otherwise determine that the fair market value is other than the amount set forth herein, the purchase price shall be adjusted nunc pro tunc pursuant to the provisions of this paragraph to reflect the agreed upon fair market value and all necessary adjustments, amendments to the Note, > payments and repayments as may be required shall forthwith be made between the parties.

[82] The purchase price of the Carma Lands was subsequently adjusted to $3.2 million by a price adjustment agreement between Hartford Properties and 350151 dated February 23, 1993, which Pocklington signed as director of both companies. The preamble to the agreement read: "The Directors of the parties hereto have determined that the fair market value of the lands sold thereunder is other than the amount set forth in the Agreement": (AB XVIII 3684-85, clause C). There was no reference in the agreement to a tax assessment, nor was any evidence of an actual or proposed assessment adduced at trial.

[83] Pocklington contends that the emphasized words in clause 6 gave him authority to change the purchase price if he, as a director of 350151, agreed with himself, as a director of Hartford Properties, that the fair market value of the Carma Lands was something other than $1.9 million. Clause 6 does not support this interpretation. It provided that the actual or proposed issuance of a tax assessment was the precondition for a price adjustment. If this clause had given the companies an unrestricted license to change the purchase price, it would not have been prefaced by the requirement of a tax authority assessment. Alternatively, the blanket provision would have appeared in a separate clause, or at least been separated by a comma. As Pocklington led no evidence to show that any tax authority issued or proposed to issue an assessment with respect to the Carma Lands, the threshold requirement for a readjustment of the purchase price was not met, and the price adjustment was invalid.

[84] Even if the price adjustment clause could be interpreted to give the directors free reign to adjust the purchase price, as Pocklington argues, the second sentence of clause 6 must nevertheless be read with the first. The directors' ability to adjust the purchase price was circumscribed by the requirement that the Carma Lands be transferred at their fair market value. "Fair market value" is usually defined as "the highest price that would be obtainable (a) in an open and unrestricted market, (b) in a transaction between informed, prudent parties acting at arm's length from one another, and under no compulsion to act [...]": MacKenzie Financial Corp.* v. *McRae (1998), 81 O.T.C. 321 (Gen. Div.). Pocklington bore the burden of establishing that the fair market value of the Carma Lands on August 10, 1989, the date of the transfer, was $3.2 million rather than the sale price of $1.9 million. He did not present evidence at trial, such as an arm's length offer to purchase or an independent appraisal, which would meet the requirements of the fair market value definition and support the higher value. When asked about the price change, Pocklington stated he knew little about it (AB 1053:35-37). Lloyd mentioned an appraisal showing a higher value (AB 815:4-10), but no such appraisal was entered in evidence. Alberta, however, called an expert assessor as a witness, who testified that the fair market value of the Carma Lands on October 4, 1989, approximately two months after the transfer, was $2.2 million (AB 615-24). As the weight of evidence does not support a finding that the fair market value of the Carma Lands was $3.2 million, the alleged price adjustment is invalid, and the balance owing in respect of the purchase price is $1.9 million.

[85] Other factors must be considered in assessing damages. These also involve the exercise of judicial discretion. Although the August 10, 1989 promissory note issued by 350151 to Hartford Properties provided for interest at a rate of 12% per annum to be payable on the principal amount of the note after August 10, 1991 (AB XVIII 3604, s. 1), no interest was paid. It is not appropriate that the accrued interest be calculated and treated as a liability, to be deducted from the damages payable by Pocklington. Pocklington has had the use and control of the Carma Lands; Alberta has not. Pocklington was in a position to repay the note when it came due and avoid the interest; Alberta was not. It would be inequitable to charge Alberta for the accrued interest. However, equity also dictates that Pocklington should be given credit for any amounts spent between 1989 and the time of trial to improve the Carma Lands, thereby contributing to their increase in value. No evidence of any such expenditures was adduced at trial.

[86] Damages therefore are assessed at the $6.6 million value of the Carma Lands, less the $1.9 million balance owing, for a total of $4.7 million. Because the 350151 shares were valued at the date of the trial, it is not appropriate to order prejudgment interest on this amount.

SUMMARY

[87] The appeal is allowed.

[88] Pocklington intentionally induced Gainers to breach s. 13.03(l) of the Master Agreement. He is personally liable to pay $4.7 million to Alberta as damages. To avoid double recovery, and in accordance with representations made by Alberta at the appeal hearing, any amount Alberta recovers by successfully realizing on the mortgages registered against the Carma Lands must be deducted from the amount owed by Pocklington in respect of damages. Similarly, any amounts recovered against Pocklington in respect of this damage award will reduce the amount that Alberta may realize on the mortgages registered against the Carma Lands.

[89] Alberta is entitled to its costs, both for the trial and the appeal.

Defendants / Respondents

Reasons for Judgment of the
Honourable Mr. Justice J.T. McCarthy

I. Introduction

[1] The Plaintiffs seek contribution and indemnity from the Defendants for tax liability and expenses they incurred in October 2010 in the amount of $1.75 million. The Plaintiffs allege this tax liability arose as a result of a negligent legal opinion provided by the Defendants in late 1989 relating to a share purchase agreement. The Defendants deny liability and argue that the Plaintiffs' claim is statute-barred, as the limitation period has expired.

[2] This is an application brought by the Plaintiffs for the determination of the following question of law:

> Is the Plaintiffs' claim barred by the operation of the 10-year limitation period in the Limitations Act, RSA 2000, c L-12 (the "Limitations Act"), s 3(1)(b)?

II. Facts

[3] The application proceeded on the basis of an Agreed Statement of Facts, agreed to for the limited purpose of this application (Exhibit #1). The facts, briefly stated, are as follows.

[4] The Plaintiff, Addison & Leyen Ltd. ("Addison"), is an Alberta corporation. At all relevant times, the Plaintiff, John Joseph Dietrich, was a director and 40% shareholder of Addison. The Plaintiff, Jeannette Dietrich, was a 10% shareholder of Addison and is Mr. Dietrich's spouse. The Plaintiff, Wilfrid Daniel Roach, was also a director and 40% shareholder of Addison at all relevant times. The Plaintiff, Helen Roach, was a 10% shareholder of Addison and is Mr. Roach's spouse. Mr. Dietrich, Mrs. Dietrich, Mr. Roach and Mrs. Roach are together referred to as the "Individual Plaintiffs".

[5] The Defendant, Fraser Milner Casgrain LLP ("FMC"), is a law firm with offices in numerous Canadian cities, including Calgary. FMC is a successor of Fenerty, Robertson, Fraser & Hatch ("Fenerty"), a former Calgary-based law firm where, at the relevant time, the Defendant, Wallace Y. Shaw, practiced as a tax lawyer. Mr. Shaw is now retired.

[6] York Beverages (1968) Ltd. was a Saskatchewan corporation that carried on a soft drink bottling business in Regina, Saskatchewan until around October 1988. On September 26, 1989, it changed its name to 309093 Saskatchewan Ltd. It continued into Alberta and changed its name to 475320 Alberta Ltd. on November 19, 1990. This entity is referred to as "York".

[7] The Individual Plaintiffs each held an ownership interest in York, either directly as shareholders or indirectly through their ownership of Addison. Until September 1989, all of the Individual Plaintiffs were directors of York.

[8] York's taxation year was October 1 to September 30. On October 1, 1988, York sold the assets of its bottling business for approximately $10 million cash and $3 million in assumed indebtedness. York intended to cease carrying on business and distribute the proceeds of the asset sale by the end of its taxation year, namely September 30, 1989. Approximately $6.2 million was distributed to the shareholders in dividends. After other payments were made, York's sole remaining asset was $2.8 million cash, which was retained to pay York's estimated income tax liability for the 1989 tax year.

[9] In September 1989, the Plaintiffs agreed to sell their shares in York to 388777 Alberta Ltd. (the "Purchaser") for $1,115,000 (the "Share Purchase Transaction"). Fenerty acted for the Purchaser in connection with the Share Purchase Transaction. Mr. Shaw was one of the lawyers with carriage of the matter at Fenerty.

[10] The Purchaser intended to use York's available cash to purchase seismic data, which would enable it to claim a tax deduction of approximately $6.5 million. The Purchaser valued the seismic data at $6,295,000, based on three independent appraisals. The Purchaser expected that, as a result of the seismic data purchase, York would have no income tax liability for the 1989 tax year. The Plaintiffs did not have knowledge of, or involvement in, the seismic data purchase until years after the transactions were completed. They resigned as directors of York on September 26, 1989, and the Share Purchase Transaction closed on September 28, 1989. It was the Purchaser's representatives on York's Board of Directors, not the Plaintiffs, who entered into the transactions involving the seismic data purchase.

[11] One of the conditions of closing the Share Purchase Transaction was that the Purchaser would provide a legal opinion to the Plaintiffs regarding their potential tax liability. Mr. Shaw delivered a tax opinion stating, among other things, that it was reasonable to conclude that York would be able to pay its income tax liabilities for the 1989 tax year, and that the Plaintiffs would not be liable for any income tax liability in respect of York for matters arising after the Plaintiffs resigned as directors of York (the "Tax Opinion").

[12] On December 29, 1992, the Minister of National Revenue (the "Minister") reassessed York for the 1989 tax year on the basis of the valuation of the seismic data. The Minister determined it was worth only $1,696,500, and that, as a result, York owed $3,247,074 in taxes, penalties and interest. York was not able to pay this tax liability.

[13] In around February 2001, the Minister issued notices of assessment to the Plaintiffs and others for York's income tax liability for the 1989 tax year (the "Assessments"). At that time, York's tax liability was $6.7 million as a result of interest accruing. The Minister took the position that the Plaintiffs were statutorily liable for York's income tax debt, and that the Plaintiffs were each liable for this debt up to the amount they received from York. The Plaintiffs' exposure to this income tax liability was not due to any fault, wrongful act or misconduct on their part.

[14] The Plaintiffs opposed the Minister's Assessments: they filed notices of objection, sought judicial review, and actively litigated their notices of objection. In October 2010, the Plaintiffs entered into a settlement with the Minister whereby the Minister agreed to increase the valuation of the seismic data from approximately $1.7 million to approximately $5.15 million. This left York with a tax liability from the 1989 tax year of $492,676 (the "Tax Liability"). As part of the settlement, the parties were responsible for their own costs.

[15] Addison paid the Tax Liability due of $492,676. In addition, the Plaintiffs incurred approximately $1.25 million in legal fees, disbursements and other expenses in their opposition and settlement of the Assessments ("Assessment Expenses").

[16] The Statement of Claim was filed in this action on September 21, 2011. The Plaintiffs bring this action for contribution and indemnity from the Defendants, based on the common law implied right to indemnity. They seek payment of the Tax Liability and their Assessment Expenses in the amount of $1.75 million. There is an agreement in place between the parties to suspend the running of any applicable unexpired limitation period between February 2003 and September 2011 (the "Standstill Agreement").

2013 ABQB 473 (CanLII)

III. Issues and Analysis

[17] For the purpose of this application, the parties have agreed to the above facts. They have also agreed that the terms of settlement of the Assessments were reasonable, and that the Plaintiffs would not have incurred the Tax Liability or the Assessment Expenses but for their reliance on the Defendants' Tax Opinion.

[18] The parties have agreed, by way of Consent Order filed January 23, 2013, that the question of law to be determined is as follows:

> Is the Plaintiffs' claim barred by the operation of the 10-year limitation period in the Limitations Act, s 3(1)(b)?

[19] The Plaintiffs' position is that their cause of action against the Defendants only arose once they incurred liability through the settlement of the Minister's tax claim in October 2010, or alternatively, when they first learned of the Assessments in February 2001. Because of the Standstill Agreement in place, the limitation period had not expired in either case by the time the Statement of Claim was filed and, as a result, the Plaintiffs' claim is not statute-barred.

[20] The Defendants take the position that the Plaintiffs' claim is improperly characterized as a claim for contribution based on a common law implied right to indemnity; rather, it is a straightforward negligence claim. The Plaintiffs' cause of action arose when the Defendants' alleged act or omission occurred in providing the Tax Opinion in the Share Purchase Transaction in September 1989. Accordingly, it is statute-barred because the Plaintiffs did not commence the action within 10 years after their claim arose, as required by section 3(1)(b) of the Limitations Act.

[21] In order to answer the above question of law, it is necessary to determine whether the Plaintiffs' action is properly framed as a breach of an implied contract of indemnity at common law. For the reasons that follow, I conclude that the Plaintiffs' cause of action against the Defendants is properly a negligence claim, not a claim for contribution based on an implied right to indemnity. As a result of this conclusion, the Plaintiffs' claim is barred by the operation of the 10-year limitation period in section 3(1)(b) of the Limitations Act.

A. Policy Considerations and the Limitations Act

[22] The Plaintiffs obtained a Tax Opinion from the Defendants as a condition of closing for the Share Purchase Transaction in 1989, wherein the Defendants opined that it was reasonable to conclude that York would be able to pay its income tax liabilities for the 1989 tax year, and that the Plaintiffs would not be liable for any income tax liability in respect of York for matters arising after the Plaintiffs resigned as directors of York. The Plaintiffs relied on the Tax Opinion in order to complete the Share Purchase Transaction and would not have proceeded without it. The Plaintiffs plead that the Defendants were negligent in providing the Tax Opinion. As a result, they suffered loss through no fault of their own. For the purpose of this application, the parties agree that the Defendants are liable to the Plaintiffs for the Tax Opinion, subject to the operation of any limitation period.

[23] I have some sympathy for the Plaintiffs' position in this case. The Defendants provided them with a Tax Opinion in September 1989, and they relied upon it in completing the Share Purchase Transaction to sell their ownership interests in York. York was reassessed by the Minister in December 1992, and the Plaintiffs received Assessments in February 2001. They were not aware of any tax consequences impacting them for nearly 11.5 years after the Tax Opinion was given.

>
> (a) 2 years after the date on which the claimant first knew, or in the circumstances ought to have known,
>
> (i) that the injury for which the claimant seeks a remedial order had occurred,
>
> (ii) that the injury was attributable to conduct of the defendant, and
>
> (iii) that the injury, assuming liability on the part of the defendant, warrants bringing a proceeding,
>
> (b) 10 years after the claim arose,
> whichever period expires first, the defendant, on pleading this Act as a defence, is entitled to immunity from liability in respect of the claim.

[25] The 10-year period in section 3(1)(b) is often referred to as the "ultimate limitation period", and imposes a limit on indeterminate liability. The section is clear that the absolute limitation period starts to run from the negligent or wrongful act or omission itself, and does not depend on when the claimant first knew, or ought to have known, about the claim: Bowes v Edmonton (City), 2007 ABCA 347, 425 AR 123 at para 151. As a result, the Plaintiffs' cause of action against the Defendants in negligence was statute-barred before they were even aware it existed.

[26] The present situation is similar to Bowes, where Côté J.A. noted at para 116:

> Now the big complaint of the plaintiffs is that the time for them to sue expired before they knew that they had a claim, indeed maybe even before they had a claim which the law would act upon. They say that is unjust. Their statement is correct in fact. And if one looks only at the plaintiffs, it is unfair.

[27] In Bowes, Côté J.A. analyzed the law regarding the ultimate limitation period, and outlined the conflicting policy considerations. Although Côté J.A. dissented, the majority agreed with his analysis, disagreeing with his conclusion based on the facts of the case: para 208. He discussed the important purpose served by limitation periods, noting at paras 118-122:

> 118 We must start by recalling the main purpose of limitations legislation. It is enacted to prevent certain plaintiffs from suing on good causes of action. If pressed to trial, poor causes of action will not likely succeed on the merits; they will be dismissed.
> 119 What is the policy reason for barring such suits? To eliminate the harm to defendants of very belated litigation. Most of that harm divides into two categories.
> 120 First, people and businesses have to get on with their lives. They should not have to store bulky or fragile records forever, even for decades. Their savings and futures should not be founded on fading memories, or the hazard of whose witness first dies or disappears. The social cost of all that is high. People and businesses must be able to plan their affairs without keeping idle huge reserves against the possibility of ancient claims arising. No one would buy a construction business or a professional practice if it might drag with it claims over 30 years old. Indeed, Canadians daily use buildings, bridges, dams, roads, and railways a century or more old. Companies depend on constituting documents drafted by long-forgotten solicitors. Wills and trusts generations old govern pensions plans and other vast sums. Many Canadians were delivered by obstetricians over 65 years ago; and got medical advice over 60 years ago.
> 121 With no limitation periods, much of the country's assets, infrastructure, and capital would be sterilized by the dead hand of history. See Alberta Law Reform Institute, Limitations 1-2, 70 (Report #55, December 1989).
>
> ...
>
> 122 The second aspect of the harm is that trying to find and test evidence about events decades old is usually roulette, not a serious exploration of the truth. After > some years, a defendant cannot prove a proper defence, or even disprove the plaintiff's allegations.

[28] It is difficult to balance these competing policy concerns. However, the Legislature was clear in enacting the ultimate limitation period in section 3(1)(b) of the Limitations Act. The conclusion reached by Justice Côté in Bowes is applicable to the present case (at paras 156-157):

> 156 I appreciate two of the plaintiffs' arguments. First, that they should not be deemed to have lost their right to sue before they learned of it. And second that even if that were wrong, they should not lose a right to sue before it arose, i.e. if the harm occurred more than 10 years after the wrongful act or omission. From their point of view alone, that can seem unfair, even capricious.
> 157 But this is not constitutional legislation, and no constitutional argument was put to us. The Legislature is sovereign on this topic, and in my view, it has spoken deliberately and clearly in this area. We cannot amend the Act, nor can we ignore its history or its scheme. See Zaidan Group Ltd. v. London (City) (1990), 36 O.A.C. 384, 71 O.R. (2d) 65 (Ont. C.A.) (para. 11), affd., [1991] 3 S.C.R. 593, 129 N.R. 227 (S.C.C.). Furthermore, when one considers the policy dilemma set out in Part I above, the unfairness largely disappears. The danger of long-hidden losses must land on someone's shoulders. We cannot legislate it away.

[29] Unfair though it may seem, the 10-year ultimate limitation period applies to a right to sue for negligence before the Plaintiffs have even learned of their cause of action.

[30] I will now consider whether the Plaintiffs can advance a cause of action for contribution for breach of a common law implied contract of indemnity. Because of the Standstill Agreement between the parties, that cause of action is not statute-barred by operation of the Limitations Act.

B. Common law implied contract of indemnity

[31] The Plaintiffs have a claim against the Defendants in negligence, but acknowledge that the limitation period has passed and that the negligence claim is statute-barred. The Plaintiffs instead seek to advance a claim for contribution for breach of a common law implied contract of indemnity, and argue that this claim and a claim for negligence are not mutually exclusive; one or both claims can be advanced independently of each other.

[32] I accept that a claim for contribution and indemnity may be advanced on its own, or as an additional or alternative cause of action. I agree with the Plaintiffs that having a cause of action in negligence does not detract from their ability to advance a claim for contribution and indemnity. However, it must be a valid claim for contribution and indemnity, and not a claim improperly characterized as such for another purpose, such as to avoid the operation of a statutory limitation period. I must determine whether the Plaintiffs in this case have a proper cause of action for breach of an implied contract of indemnity.

[33] The Limitations Act, section 3(3)(e) provides:

> a claim for contribution arises when the claimant for contribution is made a defendant in respect of, or incurs a liability through the settlement of, a claim seeking to impose a liability on which the claim for contribution can be based, whichever first occurs...

[34] A claim for contribution may be established by statute, such as under the Tort-Feasors Act, RSA 2000, c T-5, where a defendant may seek contribution from a third party in any amount that the plaintiff could have sought from the third party: Tort-Feasors Act, s 3(1); Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. v Prisco (1996), 181 AR 161 (CA) at para 10. Claims under the Tort-Feasors Act are derivative in nature, in that the defendant's claim against a third party is derivative of the plaintiff's claim against that third party: Dean v Kociniak, 2001 ABQB 412, 289 AR 201 at para 19.

[35] A claim for contribution may also be established under the common law in "circumstances where one of the potential defendants owes a duty recognized by the common law to identify [sic] or contribute to the other potential defendants": Dean at para 18. For example, such a duty may arise in a contract situation where one party expressly or impliedly agrees to indemnify another party, or may arise in an agency relationship where the principal seeks contribution for liability from its agent. Circumstances giving rise to a right to indemnity were summarized by the Privy Counsel in Eastern Shipping Company, Limited v Quah Beng Kee, [1924] AC 177 (PC) at 182-183:

> A right to indemnity generally arises from contract express or implied, but it is not confined to cases of contract. A right to indemnity exists where the relation between the parties is such that either in law or in equity there is an obligation upon one party to indemnify the other. There are, for instance, cases in which the state of circumstances is such that the law attaches a legal or equitable duty to indemnify arising from an assumed promise by a person to do that which, under the circumstances, he ought to do. The right to indemnity need not arise by contract; it may (to give other instances) arise by statute; it may arise upon the notion of a request made under circumstances from which the law implies that the common intention is that the party requested shall be indemnified by the party requesting him; it may arise (to use Lord Eldon's words in Waring v. Ward 9; a case of vendor and purchaser) in cases in which the Court will "independent of contract raise upon his (the purchaser's) conscience an obligation to indemnify the vendor against the personal obligation" of the vendor. ...

[36] In this case, the Plaintiffs do not rely on a statutory right or an express contract. Rather, the Plaintiffs allege that there was an implied contract of indemnity between them and the Defendants entitling them to contribution for the Tax Liability and their Assessment Expenses. The Plaintiffs state that an implied contract arose because the Defendants owed a duty of care to the Plaintiffs in preparing the Tax Opinion, the Defendants were negligent in its preparation, and it was foreseeable to the Defendants that the Plaintiffs could incur liability if the Defendants were negligent in preparing the Tax Opinion. The Defendants respond that this is not an implied contract of indemnity, but a straightforward negligence claim.

[37] The parties both refer to McFee v Joss, [1925] 2 D.L.R. 1059 (Ont SC (AD)), a 1925 decision of the Ontario Supreme Court – Appellate Division involving a motor vehicle accident. One of the defendants leased an automobile from the plaintiff for the purpose of the other defendant's business and, while driving, was in a motor vehicle accident with a non-party, Watson. Watson successfully sought damages from the plaintiff, as owner of the motor vehicle. The plaintiff then commenced a separate action for indemnity from the defendants for the amount paid to Watson as a result of the motor vehicle accident. The Court held that the plaintiff was entitled to indemnity from the defendants, and set out the requirements for an implied contract of indemnity at para 24:

> ...an implied contract of indemnity arises in favour of a person who, without fault on his part, is exposed to liability and compelled to pay damages on account of the negligence or tortious act of another, provided the parties were not joint tort-feasors in such a sense as to prevent recovery; that is, where the act done is not clearly illegal in itself. This right of indemnity is based upon the principle that every one is responsible for his own negligence, and if another is, by a judgment of a court, compelled to pay damages which ought to have been paid by the wrongdoer, such damages may be recovered from the wrongdoer.

[38] Based on McFee, the Plaintiffs argue that it is not necessary for the Canada Revenue Agency or the Minister to have a claim against the Defendants in order for there to be a common law right to indemnification. What matters is that the Plaintiffs were not personally at fault for the tax liability they incurred, and that they were exposed to this liability as a result of the Defendants' negligence.

[39] The Defendants dispute the Plaintiffs' interpretation of McFee on the basis that the Plaintiffs' position fails to recognize the specific requirements for a common law right to indemnification. In particular, the Defendants submit that McFee allows for indemnity at common law only where the Plaintiffs, without fault, are compelled to pay damages which ought to have been paid by the Defendants. In McFee, a claim for indemnity was asserted against another who could independently be liable to the plaintiff in the first instance.

[40] McFee was referred to by this Court in the decision of Edmonton (City) v Lovat Tunnel Equipment Inc., 2000 ABQB 882, 279 AR 1 at paras 382-386. The City of Edmonton purchased from Lovat Tunnel Equipment Inc. ("Lovat") a tunnel boring machine in 1976 and spare bearing part for the machine in 1978. In 1986, the spare bearing was installed and failed. Edmonton commenced an action against Lovat and the manufacturer, Rotek Incorporated ("Rotek"). A partial settlement was reached between Lovat and Edmonton during trial. Lovat pursued a third party claim against Rotek for indemnity at common law.

[41] In Lovat Tunnel, this Court held that Edmonton's claim against Lovat was statute-barred, as the limitation period had expired. The limitation period began to run when the cause of action arose (at delivery of the spare bearing), not on discovery of the breach. Further, Edmonton's claim against Rotek for damages for pure economic loss arising from Rotek's negligence also failed. While Rotek owed Edmonton a prima facie duty of care in the manufacture of the bearing, this duty was negated for public policy reasons:

> 249 In Blacklaws v. 470433 Alberta Ltd., supra the Court of Appeal appears to have accepted that there are valid policy reasons for excluding liability for the manufacture of shoddy but non-dangerous articles. Given the conclusion of the majority in Blacklaws v. 470433 Alberta Ltd., ibid. and the lack of any allegation or evidence that a defect in the Replacement Bearing posed a danger to persons or property, I am unable to find that Rotek was under a duty of care in the present case to manufacture the Replacement Bearing in such a fashion so as to avoid pure economic loss on the part of the City of Edmonton.
> 250 With the greatest of respect, in the absence of a duty of care, there is no negligence: paras 249-250.

[42] Justice Lee concluded that, had he held that there was a duty of care, he "would have found Rotek negligent in its manufacture of the Replacement Bearing": para 544. There was no liability finding against Lovat. Notwithstanding that Rotek did not owe a duty of care to Edmonton, Lee J. concluded that Lovat would have a common law right of indemnity against Rotek for any damages for which Lovat may be held liable, had Edmonton's claim against Lovat not been statute-barred: para 385.

[43] In Lovat Tunnel, a common law right of indemnity would have been found if a party who is not at fault (Lovat) had been held liable for the acts of another party (Rotek). Rotek manufactured a defective bearing that Lovat sold to Edmonton. This is distinguishable from the present case, where the Plaintiffs were not held liable for the negligent acts of the Defendants in providing the Tax Opinion; rather, they incurred the Tax Liability and their Assessment Expenses as a result of their receipt of funds in the Share Purchase Transaction and the position taken by the Minister that the Plaintiffs were statutorily liable for York's unpaid Tax Liability. While it is accepted for the purpose of this application that they would not have entered into the Share Purchase Transaction but for the Defendants' negligent Tax Opinion, that is not the basis for the Tax Liability.

[44] Relying on Dean, the Plaintiffs submit that the factual basis upon which a party seeks indemnification does not have to be the same as the factual basis upon which that party incurred liability. That may be true, but there must be a connection between the actions of the party from whom indemnity is sought and the cause of liability in the first place. In Dean, the plaintiff was injured while entering a taxi cab owned by one of the defendants. That defendant sought leave to issue a Third Party Notice against the designer of the taxi cab after the expiry of a limitation period. Justice Slatter of this Court (as he then was) discussed claims for contribution and the operation of the Limitations Act. He concluded the Third Party Notice should issue. While the factual basis upon which indemnification is claimed (design of the taxi cab) differs from the facts underlying the main action (injury while entering the taxi cab), it is noteworthy that the plaintiff in Dean could have asserted a claim directly against the designer of the taxi cab, as a negligent design could arguably have caused her injury. In the present case, the Tax Opinion did not cause the Tax Liability; rather, it admittedly (for the purpose of this application) caused the Plaintiffs to take certain actions (complete the Share Purchase Transaction) that led to the Tax Liability.

[45] Common in the McFee, Lovat Tunnel and Dean cases is that a claim for contribution and indemnity was permitted, or would have been permitted, only where the party against whom indemnification was sought could independently be found liable for the damages suffered by the plaintiff. The requirement is summarized by Langston J. in Doucette v Hasegawa and Associates Ltd., 2009 ABQB 502, 486 AR 124 at para 27:

> A claim is one for contribution when one tort-feasor has the right to claim against another, or an entity has a duty to indemnify one of the defendants. If the defendant in a Third Party Notice is one, or one of many, that may be found ultimately liable for the damages suffered by the plaintiff, then the claim against that third party defendant is one for contribution.

[46] Although the Plaintiffs claim (and it is accepted as a fact for the purpose of this application) that they would not have entered into the Share Purchase Transaction or consequently incurred the Tax Liability or the Assessment Expenses but for the actions of the Defendants, the Defendants could never have been found liable to the Minister for the Tax Liability or the Assessment Expenses. This is not a claim for contribution and indemnity from a party who caused a plaintiff to suffer loss. In this case, the Plaintiffs were pursued by the Minister for the Tax Liability pursuant to statute for funds they received from York in the Share Purchase Transaction because York could not pay its Tax Liability. While they may have suffered a loss as a result of their reliance on a negligent Tax Opinion, the Plaintiffs' claim against the Defendants is for negligence, and is not properly a claim for contribution and indemnity.

IV. Conclusion

[47] The Plaintiffs' claim against the Defendants is properly a negligence claim, not a claim for contribution based on an implied contract of indemnity. In the result, the Plaintiffs' claim is barred by the operation of the 10-year limitation period in the Limitations Act.

Memorandum of Judgment

The Court:

I. Introduction

[1] The narrow issue on appeal is whether the appellants' claim is one of contribution and indemnity, rather than a claim in negligence. If the former, the limitation period has not expired. If the latter, the claim is out of time.

[2] In 1989, the respondents prepared a legal opinion advising that the appellants, as shareholders and directors, would not incur income tax liability as a result of the sale of shares in a company. Twelve years later, the appellants were reassessed for the company's outstanding income tax liability for the 1989 tax year. The appellants ultimately incurred approximately $490,000 in tax liability and $1.25 million in additional expenses. The appellants commenced this action in September 2011.

[3] For the purposes of this appeal only, the respondents acknowledge that the opinion was negligently prepared and that the appellants relied upon the opinion. However, the ultimate limitation period for an action in negligence expired in 1999, before the appellants were even aware that they had incurred any tax liability from the 1989 sale. The appellants now seek compensation from the respondents pursuant to a claim of implied indemnity.

[4] On summary application, the trial judge concluded that the action could not be characterized as a claim for contribution and indemnity. It was a claim in negligence and was time-barred. For the reasons which follow, the appeal is dismissed.

II. Background

[5] The appellant Addison & Leyen Ltd. ("Addison") is an Alberta corporation. The other individual appellants are former directors and/or shareholders of Addison. Until September 1989, the appellants were all owners and/or directors of a Saskatchewan company called York Beverages (1968) Ltd. ("York"). In 1988, York sold the assets of its bottling business for about $10 million cash and $3 million in assumed indebtedness. After dividends were distributed and other payments made, York's only remaining asset was $2.8 million cash, which was retained to pay York's estimated income tax liability for the 1989 taxation year ending September 30, 1989.

[6] In September 1989, the appellants sold their shares in York for $1,115,000.00 and resigned positions on the Board of Directors. Unbeknownst to the appellants, the purchaser wanted to acquire these shares because it intended to use York's available cash to buy seismic data, which it believed would enable it to claim a tax deduction of approximately $6.5 million, sufficient to offset the company's remaining income tax liability for the 1989 tax year.

[7] As a condition of closing the share purchase transaction, the purchaser was required to provide a legal opinion to the appellants concerning their potential tax liability as former directors and/or shareholders of York. The purchaser retained the law firm Fenerty, Robertson, Fraser & Hatch, a predecessor to the respondent Fraser Milner Casgrain LLP, and Mr. Wallace Shaw to provide this legal opinion. The retainer agreement did not provide any express indemnity. The tax opinion stated:

> It is reasonable to conclude, having regard to the Sellers Warranties and the Transactions that the Corporation will be able to pay its liabilities, if any, for income tax under the Income Tax Act (Canada) and any provincial income tax statute in respect of the taxation year ending immediately prior to the Closing Date [that is, the 1989 Tax Year].
> Neither the Sellers nor the Old Directors [that is, all of the Plaintiffs] will be liable for any income, sales or other tax, withholdings, remittances, interest, penalties or fines under the Income Tax Act (Canada), any provincial taxing statute (whether of an income, sales or other nature), […] arising out of the Transactions or (except as a direct result of any gains of the Sellers arising on the sale of their shares) arising in respect of the Corporation and which are attributable to any act or omission occurring or omitted after the Financial Statement Date [that is, 11:00 pm on September 26, 1989] other than any liability which may arise by reason of a breach of a Seller Warranty.

[9] Unknown to the appellants, in December 1992, the Minister of National Revenue reassessed York for the 1989 tax year in the amount of $3,247,074, including penalties and interest, based on the purchaser's over-valuation of the seismic data it had acquired. Contrary to the purchaser's estimate, the Minister found that the seismic data was worth only $1,696,500 and, as a result, did not offset York's remaining tax liability during that period.

[10] By 1998, the purchaser remained unable to pay the reassessed taxes on behalf of York, and the Minister began to look for others to satisfy this liability. Finally, in February 2001, the Minister issued notices of assessment to the appellants and others regarding York's outstanding tax liability, pursuant to section 160 of the Income Tax Act, RSC 1985, c 1 (5th Supp). By this time, with the accrual of interest and penalties, York's tax liability had increased to $6.7 million.

[11] The Minister took the position that the appellants were statutorily liable for York's income tax debt, up to the amount that each of the appellants had received from York. The appellants opposed the Minister's assessments and commenced litigation. In February 2003, in light of the Minister's assessments and the appellants' objections, the appellants and the respondents agreed to suspend the running of any applicable unexpired limitation period in the event of a further claim regarding the tax opinion.

[12] In October 2010, the appellants and the Minister entered into a settlement agreement whereby the Minister agreed to increase the valuation of the seismic data to about $5.15 million. York was left with a reduced tax liability of $492,676, which was paid by the appellant Addison.

The costs and legal expenses incurred during the litigation and negotiation with the Minister amounted to approximately $1.25 million.

[13] In September 2011, the appellants commenced this action against the respondents seeking $1.75 million for recovery of the amount of the settlement and the costs they had incurred. The material facts alleged by the appellants support a claim in negligence against the respondents in their preparation of the tax opinion. However, by this time, even with the benefit of the 2003 agreement to suspend any unexpired limitation period, the 10-year ultimate limitations period had expired. As a result, the appellants frame their action based on a common law implied contract of indemnity.

[14] Under their theory of liability, the appellants argue that the claim is one for indemnity and contribution within the meaning of section 3(3)(b) of the Limitations Act, RSA 2000, c L-12. As a result, the 10-year ultimate limitation period in section 3(1)(b) is extended because time did not begin to run until the appellants incurred liability through their settlement agreement with the Minister in October 2010, or alternatively, when they learned of the Minister's assessments in February 2001.

[15] The respondents argue that the appellants have improperly characterized their claim as a claim for indemnity when their cause of action is only in negligence. For the purposes of the Limitations Act, the respondents submit that the appellants' cause of action arose when the respondents' alleged act or omission occurred, in providing the tax opinion in September 1989. The 10-year limitation period having long expired on this allegedly negligent act, the appellants' action is statute-barred.

[16] The parties agreed to have the matter determined by summary application on a single question of law: Is the Plaintiffs' claim barred by the operation of the 10-year limitation period in section 3(1)(b) of the Limitations Act? The application proceeded on the basis of an Agreed Statement of Facts and with the admission that the appellants would not have incurred the tax liability or the additional expenses, but for their reliance on the respondents' negligent tax opinion.

III. Decision Below Addison & Leyen Ltd v Fraser Milner Casgrain LLP, 2013 ABQB 473

[17] The trial judge recognized that a claim for contribution and indemnity may be established under the common law in circumstances where one of the potential defendants owes a duty recognized by the common law to indemnify or contribute to other potential defendants. However, based on his reading of the jurisprudence, the trial judge found that a claim for implied indemnity at common law can exist only where the party against whom indemnification was sought could independently be found liable for the damages suffered by the third party. As the respondents could have never been found liable to the Minister for the tax liability or for the appellants' subsequent expenses, the respondents could have no common law obligation to contribute to or indemnify the appellants.

[18] Moreover, the trial judge noted that the respondents did not cause the appellants' liability to the Minister. For the purposes of an implied indemnity, the trial judge held that there must be some connection between the actions of the party from whom the indemnity is sought and the cause of the liability to the third party. While the appellants admittedly relied on the tax opinion in taking steps that led to the tax liability, the allegedly negligent opinion did not cause the liability pursued by the Minister. Therefore, while the appellants did suffer a significant loss, their action was one in negligence for damages and was time-barred by operation of the 10-year limitation period.

IV. Grounds of Appeal

[19] The appellants submit that the trial judge erred in law by incorrectly concluding that the common law doctrine of implied indemnity required that (1) the party against whom indemnity is sought caused the liability of the party seeking the indemnity; and (2) the party against whom indemnity is sought must be independently liable for the amounts sought by the complainant in the first instance.

V. Standard of Review

[20] The grounds of appeal raise both questions of law and fact relating to the recognition of a common law right of implied indemnity in favour of the appellants.

[21] Extricable questions of law are reviewed on a standard of correctness, meaning the appellate court can replace the trial judge's view with its own: Housen v Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 SCR 235 at para 8. In applying a legal test or standard to a set of facts, the applicable standard of review is palpable and overriding error: Housen at para 36. Finding palpable and overriding error is equivalent to finding that factual findings or inferences are "clearly wrong", "unreasonable", or "unsupported by the evidence": HL v Canada (A-G), 2005 SCC 25, [2005] 1 SCR 401, 333 NR 1 at paras 55-56.

VI. Analysis

[22] The leading authority on the common law of contribution and indemnity is Birmingham and District Land Co v London and Northwestern Railway Co (1886), 34 Ch D 261 (CA). In that early decision, the English Court of Appeal broadly defined the right to indemnity under the common law as a direct right to reimbursement which may arise: (1) by express contract, if provided in the terms of a contract between the parties; (2) by implied contract, if the parties intended such indemnity; or (3) by implication, if the circumstances demand a legal or equitable duty to indemnify, by which the law recognizes an assumed promise by a person to do what, under the circumstances, he ought to do (at 274). The court identified certain circumstances where the law may imply a contract to indemnify, such as relationships of principal and agent and of co- trustees.

[23] However, a right to indemnity, recognized at law or in equity, must be distinguished from the common law right to "damages" for breach of contract or tort. Bowen L.J. explained (at 274-275):

> But it is quite clear to my mind that a right to damages, which is all that the Defendants have here if they are entitled to anything, is not a right to indemnity as > such. It is the converse of such a right. A right to indemnity as such is given by the original bargain between the parties. The right to damages is given in consequence of the breach of the original contract between the parties. It is an incident which the law attaches to the breach of a contract, and is not a provision of the contract itself.

> In the same manner with regard to tort, the right to damages for tort does not arise from any implied contract that if I do a wrong I will indemnify the person wronged for the wrong I have done. It is the common law right which everybody has to damages for a wrong which has been done to him.

[25] In Eastern Shipping Company Limited v Quah Beng Kee, [1924] AC 177 (PC), the Privy Council adopted these principles and held that a common law indemnity may be implied "where the relation between the parties is such that either in law or in equity, [express or implied], there is an obligation on one party to indemnify the other" (at 182).

[26] The common law right of indemnity has long been recognized in Alberta and across Canada (see: R v Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd, 2011 SCC 42, [2011] 3 SCR 45; Trans-Canada Forest Products Ltd v Heaps, Waterous Ltd, [1954] SCR 240, [1954] 2 DLR 545; McFee v Joss (1925), 56 OLR 578, [1925] 2 DLR 1059 (Ont CA); Ryan v Dew Enterprises Ltd, 2014 NLCA 11, 28 CLR (4th) 1; Dilcon Constructors Ltd v ANC Developments Inc (1994), 155 AR 314, 117 DLR (4th) 156 (CA); Fidelity Trust Company v 98956 Investments Ltd, 1988 ABCA 267, 89 AR 151; Dean v Kociniak, 2001 ABQB 412, 289 AR 201; Doucette v Hasegawa and Associates Ltd, 2009 ABQB 502, 486 AR 124).

[27] Both parties highlight McFee v Joss, a decision of the Court of Appeal for Ontario, as an early statement of the law in Canada (at para 24):

> …[A]n implied contract of indemnity arises in favour of a person who, without fault on his part, is exposed to liability and compelled to pay damages on account of the negligence or tortious act of another, provided the parties were not joint tort-feasors in such a sense as to prevent recover; that is where the act is not clearly illegal itself. This right of indemnity is based upon the principle that everyone is responsible for his own negligence, and if another is by a judgment of a Court, compelled to pay damages which ought to have been paid by the wrongdoer, such damages may be recovered from the wrongdoer. I am also of the opinion that such right of indemnity exists independently of the statute, and whether or not contractual relations exist between the parties, and whether or not the negligent person owed the other a special or particular duty not to be negligent.

[28] More recently, in Ryan v Dew Enterprises Ltd, the Newfoundland Court of Appeal summarized the applicable legal principles in implying a right of indemnity at common law (at para 54):

> A claim for indemnity is a claim that another party save the indemnity-claimant harmless against loss or damage which the indemnity-claimant has incurred or suffered or will incur or suffer at the hands of another, and to reimburse the claimant in respect of such loss or damage. The claim may arise from an express contract, by implication of law or from statute. An example of a claim to indemnity arising from implication of law is where an act is done at the request of another, the act turns out to be injurious to a third party and in consequence of doing the act the doer incurs liability to the third party (Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North Western Railway Co. (1886), 34 Ch. D. 261 (C.A.)). Other diverse examples include: (i) where an agent incurs loss while lawfully carrying out the mandate of his or her principal; (ii) where a principal suffers loss by incurring liability to a third party as a result of the wrongful actions of his or her agent or employee; (iii) where a trustee causes a co-trustee to incur costs through the trustee's negligent management of the trust; and (iv) where an obligation arises in equity from the relationship between the parties, such as between trustee and beneficiary.

[29] While these cases provide diverse factual examples giving rise to a right of implied indemnity, courts have cautioned against the unprincipled expansion of these claims. In R v Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd, the Supreme Court of Canada stated (at para 147):

> Equitable indemnity is a narrow doctrine, confined to situations of an express or implied understanding that a principal will indemnify its agent for acting on the directions given. As stated in Parmley v. Parmley, [1945] S.C.R. 635, claims of equitable indemnity "proceed upon the notion of a request which one person makes under circumstances from which the law implies that both parties understand that the person who acts upon the request is to be indemnified if he does so" (p. 648, quoting Bowen L.J. in Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North Western Railway Co. (1886), 34 Ch. D. 261, at p. 275.)

[30] A narrow approach was also encouraged in Ryan v Dew Enterprises Ltd, where the court noted (at para 54):

> While the circumstances where an obligation to indemnify arises by implication of law are diverse, they are not open-ended. The obligation cannot be imposed simply by the exercise of ad hoc discretion. As noted by Goodridge J. in Collavino, at paragraphs 18-21, just because a party may have a claim for damages over against a third party does not entitle him or her to a claim in indemnity or contribution. This was the traditional English position as enunciated in Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North Western Railway Co, supra., at pages 272 and 274-275, which was cited and relied on by Goodridge J. in Collavino at paragraphs 15-16 and Lundrigan at paragraphs 18-19.

[31] The trial judge reviewed these cases and concluded that the appellants' claim did not fall within the circumstances necessary to imply a promise to indemnify, principally because the party against whom the indemnification was sought, (the respondents), could not have been responsible in law to the Minister for the appellant's tax liability. Rather, given that the respondents' alleged negligence had only caused damage to the appellants, and not the Minister, the appropriate cause of action was in negligence alone, and was time-barred.

[32] The appellants submit that the case law supports the recognition of a common law right of indemnity in any case where a party, without fault of its own, is exposed to liability or loss for the wrongful act of another. They propose a three-part test:

a) An act done by B at the request of A;
b) Without any fault of A, A is exposed to liability to a third party, C; and
c) The liability of A to C arises in connection with the negligence of B.

[33] According to the appellants, their claim satisfied this test: (a) there was a request made by Addison to the respondents to prepare the tax opinion; (b) Addison, without any fault of its own, was exposed to liability to the Minister; and (c) the liability of Addison to the Minister arose in connection with its reliance on the negligent opinion.

[34] There are several problems with the appellants' approach. First, the common law of implied indemnity is rooted in the principles of restitution and unjust enrichment. An indemnity permits the reimbursement of damages paid by an innocent party to a third party on behalf of the true wrongdoer, where that wrongdoer should otherwise have been liable to pay. A right to reimbursement through an implied indemnity does not arise in every situation in which A becomes liable to C in connection with the negligence of B. That connection must be supported by a theory of legal or equitable liability between the third party and the party against whom the indemnity is sought (Ryan v Dew Enterprises Ltd at para 54).

[35] A simple statement of this requirement is provided by Professor Charles Mitchell in his text, The Law of Contribution and Reimbursement (New York: Oxford University Press, 2003) at 5: "Claims for contribution and reimbursement lie between two parties who both initially owe legal liabilities to a third party" (emphasis added). Put another way, the circumstances must be such that the putative party against whom the indemnity was sought could have been liable to the third party for all or part of the claim against the party seeking the indemnity.

[36] The point is best illustrated by the circumstances which led to recognition of an implied indemnity in McFee. The defendant leased the plaintiff's car and negligently crashed into another vehicle owned and driven by a third party. By operation of the relevant statute, the plaintiff owner was liable to pay damages to the third party. The court applied Eastern Shipping and held that the plaintiff was entitled to claim an indemnity from the defendant for the damages paid to the injured third party.

[37] If, by contrast, the defendant in McFee had borrowed the plaintiff's car and negligently injured the plaintiff in an accident, the plaintiff could not generally rely on a common law right of implied indemnity against the defendant for reimbursement of his out-of-pocket expenses. Although those expenses may have been incurred by the plaintiff as a liability to a third party (for example, payment to a health care provider) and were as a result of the defendant's negligence, without more, the defendant is not initially liable to the third party for that cost. Rather, the basis for the plaintiff's claim for compensation is a claim in negligence for damages.

[38] The circumstances of the appellants' claim are analogous to the latter example. The amounts paid by the appellants to the Minister, and their associated expenses, were never amounts paid by the appellants on behalf of the respondents as the negligent party. Under no circumstances could the respondents have been liable to the Minister for any part of York's tax liability. Therefore, there is no basis on which to require restitution of the appellants' loss through an implied indemnity.

[39] Secondly, the appellants' approach does not distinguish between the availability of a claim for implied indemnity and a claim for damages in tort or contract. A common law right to damages for a wrong is not an implied contract that the defendant will indemnify the plaintiff in connection with the wrongdoing (Birmingham at 276; Ryan v Dew Enterprises Ltd at para 54). The trial judge recognized this issue as a question of causation and the relationships among the parties.

[40] An implied indemnity may arise where the wrongdoer's negligence causes damage to a third party for which the party seeking the indemnity is held liable. However, there must be a connection between the wrongdoer, the third party, and the damage.

[41] For example, in Edmonton (City) v Lovat Tunnel Equipment Inc, 2000 ABQB 882, 279 AR 1, the court concluded that a right of indemnity could have been implied had the party who was not at fault (the seller of defective equipment) been held liable for damage suffered by the City of Edmonton as a result of using the defective equipment manufactured by the negligent party (at para 385). By contrast, where a plaintiff is liable for damages or expenses to a third party, and that liability is, at law, independent of the wrongdoer and his negligent act, no implied indemnity can follow. The plaintiff's common law right is only in damages.

[42] In this case, the appellants have admittedly suffered losses as a result of relying on the respondents' tax opinion. The respondents' negligent act, however, had no impact on the Minister as the third party to which the tax liability was owed. That liability flowed from the Minister's assessment of the appellants for York's outstanding tax liability and the appellants' obligations under the Income Tax Act.

[43] Finally, the policy implications of such an extension of the common law are significant. Anyone who gives advice could be considered to provide an implied indemnity to their clients, covering any loss incurred in relying on that advice. Under the Limitations Act, those professionals would be subject to indeterminate litigation under a never-ending limitations period. It is, of course, open to the parties to negotiate for and include a specific promise of indemnity in a retainer agreement. The agreement at issue in this case did not include a specific indemnity clause.

[44] We acknowledge the unfortunate position in which the appellants find themselves in this case. The Minister was not precluded from assessing the appellants years after the transaction; yet the appellants have no claim against the respondents due to the expiration of the ultimate limitation period. However, in our view, for the reasons we have expressed, the implied right to indemnity does not arise in this case.

VII. Conclusion

[45] The trial judge identified the appropriate concerns and correctly applied the law in finding that the appellants were not entitled to claim a right of implied indemnity against the respondents. Their claim is solely in negligence and the limitation period has expired. The appeal is dismissed.

2011 ONCA 460

Court of Appeal for Ontario, Goudge, Gillese and Juriansz JJ.A.
June 20, 2011

Civil procedure -- Prejudgment interest -- Action commenced in last quarter of 1992 -- Trial judge erring in awarding prejudgment interest based on average rate applicable for entire 1992 calendar year rather than applying rate specified by Rules of Civil Procedure for proceedings commenced in last quarter of 1992.

Contracts -- Damages -- Where contract sets out several modes of performance, damages for breach of contract generally assessed on basis of mode that is least profitable to plaintiff and least burdensome to defendant -- Trial judge erring in finding that that principle applies only where parties acted honestly and in good faith -- Agreement giving either party unconditional right to cancel contract at any time on 60 days' notice -- Trial judge erring in not calculating damages on that basis -- Trial judge erring in finding that defendant could not rely on 60-day notice clause as it had breached implied duty of good faith and in basing quantification on finding that contract would have continued indefinitely had defendant not breached its contractual obligation.

Damages -- Punitive damages -- Defendant entering into feed dealership agreement with plaintiffs and then undermining plaintiffs' business by surreptitiously supplying another dealer in plaintiffs' territory -- Plaintiffs' business failing -- Trial judge finding that defendant breached dealership agreement and breached implied duty of good faith toward plaintiffs -- Trial judge not erring in awarding punitive damages -- Breach of implied duty of good faith constituting separate actionable wrong -- Defendant's conduct constituting marked departure from ordinary standards of decency.

Torts -- Conspiracy -- Unlawful conduct conspiracy -- "Unlawful conduct" element of unlawful conduct conspiracy not encompassing conduct that defendant is "not at liberty" or "not authorized" to engage in as result of convention or understanding -- Conduct "unlawful" only if it is wrong in law.

The appellant Purina terminated the appellant Ren's feed dealership in July 1990 and entered into a dealership agreement for Ren's former territory with the respondent Raywalt in February 1991. Ren's arranged to have the appellant M, the Purina dealer in a neighbouring territory, supply it with Purina feed at dealer prices, which enabled Ren's to continue to sell Purina feed in Raywalt's territory. Purina approved of that arrangement and provided M with feed for resale to Ren's. As a result, Raywalt's business was not as profitable as projected and it ceased business at the end of January 1992. The trial judge found the appellants liable to the respondents for the tort of unlawful conduct conspiracy and found Purina liable for breach of its contract with Raywalt. The dealership agreement was for two years, with automatic renewal if neither party gave notice of cancellation. Either party had the right to cancel the contract at any time by giving [page428] 60 days' notice. The trial judge found that, had it not been for Purina's breach, the contract would have continued indefinitely and based his quantification of damages for breach of contract on that finding. He awarded general damages and prejudgment interest in the amount of $2,096,406 and punitive damages against Purina in the amount of $30,000. The appellants appealed the finding of unlawful conduct conspiracy. Purina appealed the method used to calculate damages for breach of contract and the award of punitive damages.

Held, the appeal should be allowed in part.

The trial judge erred in finding that "unlawful conduct" includes conduct that the defendants were "not at liberty" or "not authorized" to engage in, not only as a result of law or a contract, but also as a result of a convention or an understanding. What is required is that the defendants engage, in concert, in acts that are wrong in law, whether actionable at private law or not. In the commercial world, even highly competitive activity, provided it is otherwise lawful, does not qualify as "unlawful conduct" for the purposes of this tort. While Purina's breach of its contract with Raywalt was sufficient to qualify as "unlawful conduct", neither Ren's nor M did anything that would do so. The finding of unlawful conduct conspiracy and the damages flowing from it should be set aside.

Where there are several ways in which a contract might be performed, for the purposes of assessing damages, the mode that is the least profitable to the plaintiff and the least burdensome to the defendant should be adopted. The trial judge erred in finding that that principle applies only where the parties acted honestly and in good faith and that Purina had not done so. The contract provided that Purina had the unconditional right to cancel the contract at any time on 60 days' notice. That was the least burdensome mode of performance for Purina and should have been used as the basis for calculating the damages for breach of contract. Moreover, by finding an implied duty of good faith on Purina not to act in a way that defeated the very purpose of the contract and then finding that Purina could not rely on the 60-day notice clause because it breached that implied duty, the trial judge erred by using the implied duty of good faith to alter the express terms of the contract, including the right to terminate on notice. Finally, the trial judge erred in suggesting that it would be unconscionable to allow Purina to rely on the 60-day notice clause in calculating damages for breach of contract. The doctrine of unconscionability is applicable to determine whether the contract itself is unconscionable, and is not applicable to determine how damages should be assessed in light of the circumstances of a particular breach.

The action was commenced in the last quarter of 1992. The trial judge erred in applying a prejudgment interest rate of 6.65 per cent, the average rate applicable for the entire 1992 calendar year, to his assessment of damages for breach of contract and unlawful conduct conspiracy. The prejudgment rate specified in the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194 for proceedings commenced in the last quarter of 1992 was 5.1 per cent. The trial judge offered no special circumstances for exercising his discretion to deviate from that rate.

Purina's breach of the implied duty of good faith amounted to an independent actionable wrong, one of the requirements for an award of punitive damages for breach of contract. The trial judge erred in awarding punitive damages solely on that basis without considering the other requirement, that the impugned conduct must depart markedly from ordinary standards of decency. However, in the circumstances of this case, that requirement was also met. Purina's conduct was reprehensible and deserving of sanction. The punitive damages award was affirmed. [page429]

The judgment of the court was delivered by

GOUDGE J.A.: --

Introduction

[1] After an 11-day trial, the respondents, Walter Kasamekas ("Kasamekas"), Raymond Jackson ("Jackson") and Raywalt Feed Sales Ltd. ("Raywalt"), recovered judgment for general damages and prejudgment interest in the amount of $2,096,406 against the appellants Agribrands Purina Canada Inc. ("Purina"), Ren's Feed and Supplies Ltd. ("Ren's"), Walter Rendell Job ("Job") and the estate of Edwards James McGrath ("McGrath"). The respondents also recovered punitive damages of $30,000 against Purina. Finally, they were awarded costs of $175,000.

[2] The trial judge found the appellants liable to the respondents for the tort of unlawful conduct conspiracy. He also found Purina in breach of its contract with Raywalt. He assessed damages on the same basis for both causes of action.

[3] The appellants appeal the finding of unlawful conduct conspiracy. They also say that the trial judge made errors in calculating damages for that tort and in the rate he applied for prejudgment interest. While Purina does not contest the breach of contract finding against it, it does contest the method the trial judge used to calculate the damages for that breach. Finally, Purina appeals the finding of punitive damages against it.

[4] For the reasons that follow, I would allow the appeal on each of these issues except punitive damages and the alleged errors in calculating the tort damages. I would therefore amend the trial judgment to provide that Raywalt recover damages for breach of contract by Purina on the basis described below, with prejudgment interest calculated on the basis described below. The respondents' claims for conspiracy must be dismissed.

The Trial Judgment

[5] The basic facts are not in dispute. Ren's was a well-established dealer of Purina livestock feed and pet food. However, in 1990 Purina discovered that Ren's was also purchasing feed from one of its competitors and selling it as feed for laboratory animals in breach of its dealership agreement with Purina. As a consequence, Purina terminated Ren's dealership in July 1990.

[6] Walter Kasamekas, who was a Purina employee, and his brother Raymond Jackson saw an opportunity to set up Raywalt [page431] as a Purina dealership to take over Ren's territory. Raywalt and Purina concluded a dealership agreement in February 1991, pursuant to which Purina agreed not to appoint any other dealer in Raywalt's territory, previously Ren's territory.

[7] Raywalt opened for business in mid-March 1991. However, despite giving Raywalt territorial exclusivity, Purina continued to supply feed to Ren's until the end of April 1991. This enabled Ren's to sell to its former customers in what was now Raywalt's territory. When Purina finally ended this practice, Ren's got McGrath, who was a friend and the Purina dealer in a neighbouring territory, to supply Ren's with Purina feed at dealer prices. This allowed Ren's to continue to sell Purina feed in Raywalt's territory. Purina knew of, condoned and indeed approved of this arrangement. Purina provided McGrath with feed for resale to Ren's. As a result, Raywalt's business was not nearly as profitable as projected and its cash flow problems caused it to cease business at the end of January 1992.

[8] After setting this factual scene, the trial judge turned first to Purina's liability for breach of its contract with Raywalt. He concluded that, by supplying McGrath with feed knowing that McGrath would sell it to Ren's at dealer prices for sale in Raywalt's territory and by approving this arrangement, Purina breached its contract with Raywalt. Purina does not appeal this finding.

[9] He then addressed the method of calculating damages for that breach, in particular whether the damages were time limited by the terms of the contract. Two of its provisions were relevant. The first provided that the dealership agreement was for two years but would automatically renew unless either party gave notice of cancellation. The second allowed either party to cancel the contract at any time by giving 60 days' notice.

[10] The trial judge concluded that there was an implied duty of good faith on Purina in its contract with Raywalt, that Purina had acted in bad faith and that it could therefore not rely on the provision allowing it to terminate the contract on 60 days' notice. On this basis, the trial judge distinguished Hamilton v. Open Window Bakery Ltd., [2004] 1 S.C.R. 303, [2003] S.C.J. No. 72. In considering Hamilton, he said, at para. 100, "[T]he trial judge specifically found that the defendant had acted in good faith at all material times" (emphasis in original). At para. 108, he concluded, "The case has no application here because the foundation of good faith that was present in that case is evidently absent in this case."

[11] Instead of applying Hamilton, the trial judge engaged in an inquiry into what would have happened if Purina had not [page432] breached its contractual obligation. He found that the only reasonable conclusion available on the evidence was that the contract would have continued indefinitely. He found that Purina dealerships were typically of long duration. In this case, it would have been because no steps would have been taken to terminate it. By its terms, the dealership agreement would therefore have continued automatically.

[12] In addition, he concluded that, because of Purina's conduct, the doctrine of unconscionability applied to prevent Purina from relying on the time limiting provisions in the dealership agreement.

[13] For these reasons, the trial judge based his quantification of damages for breach of contract on the premise that Purina's contract with Raywalt would have continued indefinitely.

[14] He then moved to the civil conspiracy issue. The respondents did not advance the branch of this tort that requires the plaintiff to demonstrate that the defendants' primary purpose was to cause injury to the plaintiff, whether by lawful or unlawful means. Rather, the respondents' argument was that the appellants engaged in the tort of unlawful conduct conspiracy, that is, their conduct, done in concert, was unlawful and they knew or should have known that injury to the respondents was likely to result.

[15] The trial judge found that the appellants acted in concert, and while their predominant purpose was not to injure the respondents, their conduct was directed at the respondents, and it was reasonably foreseeable that serious economic injury to the respondents would and did result.

[16] The central issue was whether their conduct was "unlawful". The trial judge found that the appellants did not appear to have committed a crime, or any other tort than unlawful conduct conspiracy. Nor had they infringed a guaranteed constitutional right. Relying primarily on Reach M.D. Inc. v. Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada (2003), 65 O.R. (3d) 30, [2003] O.J. No. 2062 (C.A.), he found that the ambit of unlawful conduct required by this tort extends beyond strict illegality. He put it this way, at para. 127:

> The newer decisions confirm that the ambit of "illegal conduct" extends beyond strict illegality for the purposes of proving the existence of tortious conduct. It includes conduct that the defendant "is not at liberty" or "not authorized" to engage in, whether as a result of law, a contract, a convention or an understanding.

[17] His assessment of the appellants' conduct against this standard was as follows, at paras. 132-34: [page433]

> It was unlawful and unauthorized conduct from Purina's perspective because Purina had a commercial obligation of good faith and was contractually bound to support Raywalt as its dealer. More importantly, Purina had no authority or entitlement to permit Purina feed products to continue to be sold by Ren's at dealer pricing just to ensure that its decision to terminate the Ren's dealership would not result in a reduction of its market share. It effectively licensed Ren's through McGrath to sell products in a geographic area that was reserved to another dealer, both as de facto dealers of Purina horse feeds.
> It was unlawful and unauthorized conduct from McGrath's perspective because he had no authority under his Dealership Agreement with Purina to establish a sub-dealership and to receive dealer rebates that reduced the product cost to dealer level "white list" pricing where his sub-dealer was selling Purina feed products in territory that had been assigned to another dealer.
> It was unlawful and unauthorized conduct from Walter Rendell Job's and Ren's Feeds perspective because Ren's was not entitled to be able to obtain Purina feed products for resale at the advantageous pricing available only to authorized Purina dealers. The illegality lies in Purina and McGrath effectively licensing Ren's to deal in the Raywalt territory.

[18] The next issue was the assessment of damages. The trial judge concluded that there was no material difference in the damages to which the respondents were entitled, whether assessed for Purina's breach of contract or for the tort of unlawful conduct conspiracy. He said this, at para. 158:

> To my mind, as will be evident from the foregoing, in the absence of effective contractual language limiting liability, the assessment of damages in both tort and contract in this case should be and is essentially the same. Any loss suffered by the plaintiffs that was reasonably foreseeable at the time of the breach is properly compensable.

[19] The trial judge found that the appellants' actions caused the respondents to lose their business. He determined that damages should reflect the going concern value of Raywalt at the time, which he calculated by assessing what the net profit of the business would have been in its second year of operation had it continued beyond January 1992. He then applied a three times earnings multiple. The result was a damage award of $954,213 for Purina's breach of contract and the appellants' conspiracy.

[20] The trial judge applied a prejudgment interest rate of 6.65 per cent to this amount. Because 18 years had passed since the cause of action arose in 1992, this added an additional $1,142,193. In supplementary reasons released on May 3, 2010 [[2010] O.J. No. 1796, 2010 ONSC 2597], the trial judge noted [at para. 8] that he selected that rate because it was "the average rate applicable for the entire 1992 calendar year". He declined to use the rate of 5.1 per cent, which was the bank rate [page434] at the start of the third quarter of 1992, the quarter in which the respondents filed their claim.

[21] Finally, the trial judge dealt with punitive damages. He reiterated that Purina's breach of its exclusivity contract with Raywalt was also answerable in the tort of conspiracy. He found that, if Purina's participation in that tort was not enough to justify the imposition of punitive damages, the breach of its implied duty of good faith to Raywalt was the second respect in which its conduct constituted an actionable wrong. Having found this precondition to be met, the trial judge based his justification for punitive damages on Purina's conduct. He found [at para. 237] it was "the very antithesis of acting in good faith".

[22] In the result, the trial judge ordered that the respondents recover $2,096,406 jointly and severally from the appellants, inclusive of prejudgment interest, that Purina pay punitive damages of $30,000 and that the respondents receive trial costs fixed at $175,000.

Analysis

[23] The appellants raise five issues. I will deal with each in turn.

First issue -- The unlawful conduct conspiracy

[24] The seminal case in Canada on the tort of civil conspiracy is Canada Cement Lafarge Ltd. v. British Columbia Lightweight Aggregate Ltd., [1983] 1 S.C.R. 452, [1983] S.C.J. No. 33. Speaking for the court, Estey J. described, at pp. 471-72 S.C.R., two categories of conspiracy recognized by Canadian law:

> Although the law concerning the scope of the tort of conspiracy is far from clear, I am of the opinion that whereas the law of tort does not permit an action against an individual defendant who has caused injury to the plaintiff, the law of torts does recognize a claim against them in combination as the tort of conspiracy if:
> (2) where the conduct of the defendants is unlawful, the conduct is directed towards the plaintiff (alone or together with others), and the defendants should know in the circumstances that injury to the plaintiff is likely to and does result.
> In situation (2) it is not necessary that the predominant purpose of the defendants' conduct be to cause injury to the plaintiff but, in the prevailing circumstances, it must be a constructive intent derived from the fact that the defendants should have known that injury to the plaintiff would ensue. In both situations, however, there must be actual damage suffered by the plaintiff. [page435]

[25] This case deals with the second category, namely, unlawful conduct conspiracy. The first does not apply because there was no finding that the predominant purpose of the appellants' conduct was to cause injury to the respondents. The respondents did not advance that proposition at trial.

[26] For the appellants to be liable for the tort of unlawful conduct conspiracy, the following elements must therefore be present:

(a) they act in combination, that is, in concert, by agreement or with a common design;

(b) their conduct is unlawful;

(c) their conduct is directed towards the respondents;

(d) the appellants should know that, in the circumstances, injury to the respondents is likely to result; and

(e) their conduct causes injury to the respondents.

[27] In this court, the appellants challenge only the finding that their conduct was unlawful. In particular, while they acknowledge that Purina's breach of its contract with Raywalt was unlawful, they say that the conduct of Ren's and McGrath was in no sense unlawful, and that therefore this element of the tort was not made out. Civil conspiracy cannot be established if only one conspirator acts unlawfully.

[28] What, then, are the requirements for unlawful conduct for the purposes of this tort? Most obviously, it must be unlawful conduct by each conspirator: see Bank of Montreal v. Tortora, [2010] B.C.J. No. 466, 3 B.C.L.R. (5th) 39 (C.A.). There is no basis for finding an individual liable for unlawful conduct conspiracy if his or her conduct is lawful or, alternatively, if he or she is the only one of those acting in concert to act unlawfully. The tort is designed to catch unlawful conduct done in concert, not to turn lawful conduct into tortious conduct. The trial judge applied this requirement and found that each of the appellants had committed an unlawful act.

[29] To determine what sort of conduct qualifies as "unlawful" the trial judge looked to the jurisprudence dealing with the tort of intentional interference with economic relations.

[30] The trial judge concluded from the intentional interference cases that "unlawful conduct" includes conduct that the defendant "is not at liberty" or "not authorized" to engage in, whether as a result of law, a contract, a convention or an understanding. [page436]

[31] With respect, I do not think the jurisprudence goes that far. In Reach, this court found the tort of intentional interference with economic relations to be made out because actions by the defendant, a voluntary association, that caused its members to stop advertising with the plaintiff, constituted unlawful means directed at third parties, which then caused them to injure the plaintiff. The court was clear that these actions were beyond the lawful authority that the defendant had under its constitution, and were therefore actions beyond the defendants powers and done without jurisdiction. They could be set aside by the court at the behest of the third parties, its members. While the court made reference to the judgment of Lord Denning in Torquay Hotel Co. Ltd. v. Cousins, [1969] 2 Ch. 106, [1969] 1 All E.R. 522 (C.A.), it explicitly declined to decide how far Lord Denning's concept of "unlawful conduct" as "an act which [the defendant] is not at liberty to commit" might extend. Reach was a case of conduct that was wrong in law. I do not think that it provides a basis for the expansive interpretation used by the trial judge [at para. 127] as any "conduct that the defendant 'is not at liberty' or 'not authorized' to engage in, whether as a result of law, a contract, a convention or an understanding".

[32] Since Reach, this court's jurisprudence on the tort of intentional interference with economic relations has, if anything, tightened the scope of conduct considered unlawful. In Drouillard v. Cogeco Cable Inc. (2007), 86 O.R. (3d) 431, [2007] O.J. No. 1664 (C.A.), the defendant's conduct in not following its internal corporate policy but instead acting in bad faith did not amount to unlawful means. In Correia v. Canac Kitchens, a division of Kohler Ltd. (2008), 91 O.R. (3d) 353, [2008] O.J. No. 2497 (C.A.), this court approved of Lord Hoffman's majority reasons in OBG Ltd. v. Allen; Douglas v. Hello! Ltd.; Mainstream Properties Ltd. v. Young, [2008] A.C. 1, [2007] UKHL 21 (H.L.), in which he required unlawful conduct against a third party to be conduct that is actionable by the third party for the purposes of the tort of intentional interference with economic relations. This court reiterated this principle in Alleslev-Krofchak v. Valcom Ltd., [2010] O.J. No. 3548, 2010 ONCA 557, while recognizing that the delineation of actionability remained to be fully defined. It was unnecessary to do so in that case because the unlawful conduct relied on was clearly actionable as a matter of private law.

[33] What is clear from this jurisprudence is that, to constitute unlawful conduct for the purposes of the tort of intentional interference, the conduct must be actionable. It must be wrong in law. Conduct that is merely not authorized by a convention or an [page437] understanding is not enough. On this standard, the approach used by the trial judge was simply too broad.

[34] Moreover, reliance on the tort of intentional interference to supply the definition of "unlawful conduct" for the tort of civil conspiracy does not recognize that these two economic torts have evolved separately, and thus each have developed their own concept of unlawful conduct.

[35] The court should therefore be cautious of turning away from the history of this separate evolution simply to achieve a unified theory for the economic torts. Indeed, in Revenue and Customs Commissioners v. Total Network S.L., [2008] 2 W.L.R. 711, [2008] UKHL 19 (H.L.), the House of Lords went further, and said explicitly that, as the torts of intentional interference with economic relations and unlawful conduct conspiracy have developed over time, the concept of unlawful conduct has a different meaning in one tort than in the other: see, for example, the speech of Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe, at para. 100.

[36] It is not necessary that we go that far in this case. However, rather than automatically adopting the meaning of unlawful conduct given in the intentional interference tort cases, I think the better course is to use those cases as a guide, but also consider the kind of conduct that the jurisprudence has found to be unlawful conduct for the purposes of the conspiracy tort.

> There are two distinct categories of conduct that can be described as comprising "unlawful means": conduct amounting to an independent tort or other actionable wrong, and conduct not actionable in itself.
>
> Examples of conspiracies involving tortious conduct include inducing breach of contract, wrongful interference with contractual rights, nuisance, intimidation, [page438] and defamation. Of course, a breach of contract itself will support an action in civil conspiracy and, as one Australian court has held, the categories of "unlawful means" are not closed.
>
> The second category of unlawful means is conduct comprising unlawful means not actionable in itself.
>
> . . . . .
>
> The first class of unlawful means not actionable in themselves, but which nevertheless supports a conspiracy action, is breach of a statute which does not grant a private right of action, the very instance rejected in Lonrho (1981)

by the House of Lords. A common case is a breach of labour relations legislation, and another is the breach of a criminal statute such as the Canadian Criminal Code.

[38] What is required, therefore, to meet the "unlawful conduct" element of the conspiracy tort is that the defendants engage, in concert, in acts that are wrong in law, whether actionable at private law or not. In the commercial world, even highly competitive activity, provided it is otherwise lawful, does not qualify as "unlawful conduct" for the purposes of this tort.

[39] The appellants submit that while Purina's breach of its contract with Raywalt was sufficient to qualify as "unlawful conduct", neither Ren's nor McGrath did anything that would do so. I agree. In my view, the trial judge used an approach that is too broad. Assessed against the correct test, their conduct was not unlawful.

[40] Dealing with Ren's conduct, at the time it purchased feed from McGrath, it had no contract with either Purina or Raywalt. Ren's was free to purchase Purina feed from McGrath at the best price it could obtain and sell it wherever it could. I disagree with the trial judge's conclusion that Ren's was not entitled to be able to obtain Purina feed for resale at advantageous pricing available only to Purina dealers. Ren's conduct in doing so breached no contract. Nor was this conduct tortious or in breach of any statute. Indeed, the trial judge explicitly found that Ren's committed no crime or tort apart from the conspiracy. Ren's required no authorization from Purina to act as it did.

[41] On appeal, the respondent advanced for the first time the proposition that Ren's induced Purina to breach its contract with Raywalt and induced McGrath to breach its contract with Purina. Neither of these allegations was advanced at trial. They are belied by the trial judge's finding that, other than conspiracy, Ren's committed no tort. Moreover, the trial judge's finding that Purina knew of, and approved of the arrangement between Ren's and McGrath, leaves little room for the conclusion required by the inducing breach of contract tort, namely, that Ren's caused Purina to breach its contract with Raywalt or induced McGrath [page439] to breach its contract with Purina, assuming such a breach could be found. There was nothing in Ren's conduct that was wrong in law. It was not "unlawful conduct" for the purposes of the tort of conspiracy.

[42] Turning to McGrath's conduct, the trial judge found it to be "unlawful" because McGrath had no authority to effectively establish a sub-dealership for Ren's to obtain Purina feed at advantageous prices and then sell it into Raywalt's territory. The trial judge characterized McGrath's conduct as a violation of Purina's standard operating procedures. He therefore did not find McGrath's conduct to constitute a breach of his contract with Purina. Indeed, the standard dealership agreement that Raywalt and Ren's had with Purina did not prohibit such an arrangement. Moreover, the trial judge could not have found McGrath to be in breach of his dealership contract with Purina. His finding that Purina knew and approved of what McGrath was doing precluded that possibility, even if such a prohibition had been a term of McGrath's contract. There is no suggestion that McGrath's actions were tortious or in violation of any statute or in other way wrong in law. In my opinion, McGrath's actions cannot be said to be "unlawful conduct" for the purposes of the tort of conspiracy.

[43] In summary, I conclude that only Purina engaged in any unlawful conduct. The other two appellants did not. As a consequence, the finding of unlawful conduct conspiracy and the damages flowing from it must be set aside. The respondents' claim based on civil conspiracy must be dismissed.

Second issue -- The method of calculating breach of contract damages

[44] In Hamilton, Ms. Hamilton entered into a contract with Open Window Bakery Ltd. ("Open Window") for a term of 36 months to serve as its exclusive agent in Japan. The contract gave Open Window the unconditional right to terminate the contract on three months' notice, effective after the commencement of the 19th month of the contract. In the 16th month, Open Window wrongfully terminated the contract. The trial judge determined Ms. Hamilton's damages by inquiring into how Open Window would likely have performed its obligations under the contract hypothetically, but for its repudiation. This resulted in an award reflecting the payments that would have been made over the full 36-month term less a 25 per cent reduction for contingencies.

[45] The Supreme Court held that this was the wrong approach and substituted a damage award based on early termination at [page440] the 19th month mark together with three months' notice, reflecting Open Window's maximum exposure to damages. The court based this on the principle articulated in Cockburn v. Alexander (1848), 6 C.B. 791 that, generally speaking, where there are several ways in which the contract might be performed, the mode that is adopted is the least profitable to the plaintiff and the least burdensome to the defendant, for the purposes of assessing damages. The court described the rationale for this principle and the error in the approach used by the trial judge in the following language [at paras. 15-18]:

> This tort-like analysis proposed by Hamilton is not an established part of Canadian law. There are compelling reasons for this. Contractual obligations are voluntarily assumed by parties and given effect to by the courts. The failure to perform certain promised positive contractual obligations in contract law is conceptually distinct from the breach of unpromised negative obligations to not harm another's interests in tort law: see G. H. L. Fridman, The Law of Torts in Canada (2nd ed. 2002), at p. 11.
> In a successful tort claim for damages, unliquidated damages are awarded to a plaintiff on the basis that the plaintiff has suffered a loss through some wrongful interference by the defendant. The plaintiff in such cases has legally protected interests that have been found by a court to be unduly compromised. In tort cases, it is widely recognized that the inquiry into what would have been but for the tort is appropriate, since the plaintiff's interest is in being restored to (or at least awarded compensation in respect of) the position the plaintiff would otherwise be in. See Fridman, supra, at p. 2; A. M. Linden, Canadian Tort Law (7th ed. 2001), at p. 4, ("[f]irst and foremost, tort law is a compensator"); J. G. Fleming, The Law of Torts (9th ed. 1998), at p. 5; and R. F. V. Heuston and R. A. Buckley, Salmond and Heuston on the Law of Torts (21st ed. 1996), at pp. 8-9.

However, under the general principle applicable in breach of contracts with alternative performances enunciated above, it is not necessary that the non-breaching party be restored to the position they would likely, as a matter of fact, have been in but for the repudiation. Rather, the non-breaching party is entitled to be restored to the position they would have been in had the contract been performed.

In this case, the relevant contractual duties have been expressly set out by the parties in the agreement. Hamilton is entitled to OWB's performance of these voluntarily assumed duties. Hamilton has no compensable interest in the advantages she might have expected under any particular performance of the contract, since the contract itself provided for alternative methods of performance at the election of the defendant. If Hamilton wanted to secure herself the benefits associated with a given particular method of performance, she should have contracted for only that method of performance.

[46] The trial judge distinguished Hamilton [at para. 106], finding that it applied only where the parties acted honestly and in good faith, and that Purina had not done so, having [page441] "conducted itself in a manner that 'defeated or eviscerated the very purpose and objective' of its agreement with Raywalt".

[47] With respect, I do not agree. The trial judge erred in finding Hamilton to be premised on good faith conduct by the breaching party. Contrary to his view, there was no finding by the trial judge in Hamilton that Open Window had acted in good faith at all material times. Nor is there any suggestion in the Supreme Court's decision that good faith conduct is a pre-requisite for the least burdensome principle to apply. Indeed, Open Window had wrongfully terminated Ms. Hamilton by repudiating the entire contract, thereby defeating its very purpose, yet the least burdensome principle of calculating damages was applicable.

[48] In my view, Hamilton cannot be distinguished as the trial judge did, and should have been followed in assessing the breach of contract damages in this case, even if Purina did not act in good faith in breaching the contract.

[49] Had that been done, the trial judge would not have embarked on a hypothetical inquiry into how Purina would likely have performed its obligations under the contract if it had not breached the contract. That is the very sort of inquiry that Hamilton says should not be done in approaching breach of contract damages where there are alternate modes of performing the contract.

[50] The contract provided that Purina had the unconditional right to cancel the contract at any time on 60 days' notice. Article V(B) of the contract reads, "Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this article, either of the parties may cancel this Agreement at any time by giving sixty (60) days advance notice to the other party." There is no doubt that this is the least burdensome mode of performance for Purina. It should have been used as the basis for calculating the damages for breach of contract.

[51] Moreover, by finding an implied duty of good faith on Purina not to act in a way that defeats the very purpose of the contract and then finding that Purina could not rely on Article V(B) because it breached that implied duty, the trial judge erred by using the implied duty of good faith to alter the express terms of the contract, including the right to terminate on notice. In Transamerica Life Canada Inc. v. ING Canada Inc. (2003), 68 O.R. (3d) 457, [2003] O.J. No. 4656 (C.A.), at para. 53, this court made clear that Canadian courts have not accorded this power to an implied duty of good faith.

[52] The trial judge also suggested that it would be unconscionable in these circumstances to allow Purina to rely on a [page442] clause like V(B) in the calculation of breach of contract damages. I do not agree that unconscionability can be used in this way. In my view, that doctrine is applicable to determine whether the contract itself is unconscionable, given, for example, the circumstances in which it was made. The doctrine is not applicable to determine how damages should be assessed in light of the circumstances of a particular breach.

[53] In summary, I conclude that the trial judge erred in failing to apply the approach in Hamilton to calculate the damages owed by Purina for its breach of contract. His task should have been to calculate the breach of contract damages needed to restore Raywalt to the position it would have been in had the contract been performed, adopting the mode of performance provided by the contract that is least burdensome to Purina.

[54] The trial judge found that had Purina performed the contract, there is no doubt that Raywalt would still have been in business at the end of January 1992, when it in fact closed its doors. At that point, the contract gave Purina the unconditional right of cancelling the agreement on 60 days' notice. This was the mode of performance least burdensome to Purina and therefore constituted its maximum exposure for damages for breach of the contract with Raywalt.

[55] Using this approach, the quantification of the damages owed by Purina for breach of contract requires the determination of the amount Raywalt lost because of Purina's breach from the time Raywalt opened for business in March 1991 until the end of March 1992, two months after it actually closed its doors.

[56] In my view, the trial judge made findings of fact sufficient for this court to do that calculation, recognizing that this exercise is more of an art than a science. He calculated that, had Purina performed its contractual obligations, Raywalt would have had a profit of $145,654 at the end of January 1992, instead of being insolvent.

[57] He arrived at this amount after considering the expert evidence, together with evidence of additional pet food sales that Raywalt would have been able to make in the last two months of that first year of operation. The appellants attack this figure on two bases.

[58] First, they say that the expert opinion relied on already included the additional pet food sales and that it was an error to count them a second time. I do not agree. The expert's evidence makes only cryptic reference to the pet food sales and it was entirely open to the trial judge to find that they were not included in the expert's opinion of Raywalt's first-year profits [page443] and could therefore properly be added to the expert's calculation of loss in the first year.

[59] Second, they say that the trial judge did not add to Raywalt's costs the additional costs that would have been required in achieving these additional sales. Again, I disagree. There was an ample evidentiary basis for the trial judge to reach the conclusion he did for both Raywalt's gross sales and its expenses had Purina honoured its contract.

[61] The trial judge also calculated the net profits that Raywalt would have achieved in its second year of operation had the appellants acted lawfully, as part of his calculation of tort damages. He quantified that loss at $318,071. The appellants raise a number of challenges to this calculation, all of which I reject, as explained in the next section of these reasons. I am therefore prepared to accept that figure as the profits Raywalt would have made in its second year of operation had Purina not breached its contract. This provides a good basis for determining the profits lost to Raywalt through February and March 1992, representing the 60 days' notice Purina was required to give, which I would assess at one-sixth of this number, namely, $53,011.83.

Raywalt is entitled for Purina's breach of contract at $145,654 plus $53,011.83, for a total of $198,665.83.

Third issue -- The calculation of damages

[63] As I have indicated, the trial judge concluded that damages for the unlawful conduct conspiracy should reflect the ongoing concern value of Raywalt at the time it was harmed. He calculated this by assessing what the net profit of the business would have been in its second year of operation and then applying a three times earnings multiple to that figure.

[64] The appellants raise a number of challenges to his assessment of Raywalt's net profit for that second year. Although I have found that the finding of unlawful conduct conspiracy cannot stand, it is necessary to address these challenges since I have used the calculation of Raywalt's net profits for the second year to calculate Raywalt's contract damages for February and March 1992.

[65] First, the appellants say that the trial judge made several errors, resulting in an overvaluation of the contribution that additional pet food sales would have made. They say that the trial judge double counted that contribution by adding it to the expert evidence he relied on. I disagree with this, as I have [page444] explained above. They also say that the trial judge impermissibly relied on hearsay evidence in making his finding. I disagree. In my view, it was open to him to rely on the evidence he did hear, which was completely unobjected to at trial by the appellants. Lastly, they say that the trial judge insufficiently discounted for the possibility that these additional sales might not take place. However, the discount to be applied was an assessment that the trial judge was entitled to make on the evidence before him. That is what he did. There is no basis for this court to interfere with it.

[66] Second, the appellants argue that the trial judge erred in the discount he applied in using Ren's earnings for the same period as input to calculate what Raywalt would have earned but for the harm inflicted on it. However, the trial judge was fully aware that some discount was appropriate because Ren's sold some products that Raywalt did not. He based the discount he selected on evidence of the percentage of Ren's business that these additional products represented, measured by tonnage. That was a conclusion he was entitled to draw. There is no basis for this court to second guess it and apply a higher discount rate.

[67] Third, the appellants quarrel with the trial judge's calculation of the value of Ren's feed sales that Raywalt would have taken over but for the conspiracy. They say that there was evidence of this value that the trial judge should have preferred to the evidence he accepted. In my opinion, that too was up to him. His calculation was based on evidence that he was entitled to act upon. There is no basis for this court to interfere.

[68] Fourth, the appellants say that the trial judge committed a palpable and overriding error in assessing the administrative expenses that Raywalt would have incurred in its second year of operation. Again, I disagree. His assessment was well founded on evidence of what those expenses would have been. The trial judge accepted this evidence and made no reversible error in doing so.

[69] In summary, I conclude that all of the appellant's challenges to the trial judge's calculation of the profit that Raywalt would have made in its second year of operation must fail.

Fourth issue -- Prejudgment interest

[70] In his original reasons for judgment, the trial judge applied a prejudgment interest rate of 6.65 per cent to his assessment of damages for breach of contract and unlawful conduct conspiracy. He did so without the parties having an opportunity to make submissions on the issue. He set out his basis for selecting this rate, at para. 219 of his original reasons: [page445]

> The average rate of interest established for pre-judgment interest by section 128 of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O.

1990, c. C.43, for 1992, the year in which I find that the cause of action of the plaintiffs arose, is 6.65%.

[71] Following the release of these reasons, the trial judge agreed to receive written submissions on the issue. In subsequent reasons, he declined to change the rate he had selected. He gave this explanation, at para. 8 of his supplementary reasons [[2010] O.J. No. 1796, 2010 ONSC 2597]:

> More importantly, section 128(1) of the Courts of Justice Act shows that the appropriate starting point for the calculation is not the date on which the claim was actually filed, but rather the date on which the cause of action arose: see also Sedigh v. Lange, [2000] O.J. No. 3606 (S.C.J.) at para. 11. I focused on when the cause of action arose as the relevant time and found as a fact that the plaintiffs' cause of action arose at some point in 1992 at or about the time that the business failed owing to the actions of the defendants, rather than focusing on the date upon which the plaintiffs filed their claim. As such, I continue to regard it as appropriate to average the quarterly rates for 1992 in the manner that I did at paragraph 219 of my Reasons for Judgment.

[72] The appellants also argued at trial that the trial judge ought to have adjusted the rate down to reflect the factors listed on s. 130(2) of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43. The trial judge concluded his supplementary reasons by rejecting that submission, at para. 11:

> Here, the defendants have advanced a range of reasons for their claim that a lower rate should be applicable, but I find that they have done nothing to discharge the onus that rests upon them of persuading me that it is appropriate that I should exercise discretion in this case to deviate from what would otherwise be the applicable interest rate specified by the Courts of Justice Act.

[74] I agree. The prejudgment rate specified in the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194 pursuant to the Courts of Justice Act for proceedings commenced in the last quarter of 1992, that is, when the respondents' claim was commenced, was 5.1 per cent. That is the applicable rate unless the court finds special circumstances to justify departing from it. In my view, the trial judge erred by taking as his starting point the average prejudgment interest rate for 1992, the year in which the respondents' cause of action arose, rather than the starting point as specified under the Courts of Justice Act. Moreover, he offered no special circumstances for exercising his discretion to deviate from the applicable rate specified by the Courts of Justice Act. His error was in using 6.65 per cent as the applicable rate. The proper applicable rate to be used is 5.1 per cent. [page446]

Fifth issue -- Punitive damages

[75] Finally, the appellant Purina attacks the award of punitive damages made against it. It argues that the trial judge's basis for doing so did not reach the threshold required by the jurisprudence.

[76] In Fidler v. Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 3, [2006] S.C.J. No. 30 ("Sun Life"), the Supreme Court of Canada made clear that, in breach of contract cases, conduct warranting punitive damages must be an independently actionable wrong in addition to a breach of contract. As well, it must also reach the threshold warranting punitive damages. The court described that threshold, at para. 62:

> By their nature, contract breaches will sometimes give rise to censure. But to attract punitive damages, the impugned conduct must depart markedly from ordinary standards of decency -- the exceptional case that can be described as malicious, oppressive or high-handed and that offends the court's sense of decency: Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1130, at para. 196; Whiten, at para. 36. The misconduct must be of a nature as to take it beyond the usual opprobrium that surrounds breaking a contract. As stated in Whiten, at para. 36, "punitive damages straddle the > frontier between civil law (compensation) and criminal law (punishment)". Criminal law and quasi-criminal regulatory schemes are recognized as the primary vehicles for punishment. It is important that punitive damages be resorted to only in exceptional cases, and with restraint.

[77] In coming to his conclusion, the trial judge was clearly influenced by his finding that Purina's conduct was both a breach of contract and part of the unlawful conduct conspiracy. Alternatively, he found that Purina's conduct constituted a second actionable wrong in that it was also a breach of its implied duty of good faith towards Raywalt. Beyond that, he justified the punitive damages award this way, at para. 238:

> Here, I find that an award of punitive damages ought to be made against Purina to serve the rational purpose of delivering the simple message that good faith, promises of good faith, and an underlying foundation of business efficacy continue to be what our law relies upon as the cornerstone of upholding and enforcing contractual promises.

[78] In my view, this sets too low a bar. It would make every breach of contract that is also a breach of an implied duty of good faith a sufficient basis for the award of punitive damages. I think that would pay insufficient regard to the caution in Sun Life that punitive damages are confined to exceptional cases in which the misconduct is of a nature that takes it beyond the usual opprobrium surrounding breaking a contract. It seems to me that breaches of an implied duty of good faith can come in so many possible different shapes and sizes that it cannot be said [page447] that generically, the breach of such a duty is per se enough to justify punitive damages. It falls, therefore, to this court to determine whether, on the facts as found below, such an award is warranted.

[79] In Sun Life, the Supreme Court of Canada affirmed that the principles set out in Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co., [2002] 1 S.C.R. 595, [2002] S.C.J. No. 19, at para. 63, continue to govern the award of punitive damages. It reiterated that in breach of contract cases, in addition to the requirement that the conduct constitute a marked departure from ordinary standards of decency, there is the requirement that the acts be "independently actionable". Breach of an implied duty of good faith can satisfy the requirement of an independent actionable wrong: see Whiten, at para. 79. The trial judge found that Purina had breached its implied duty of good faith. That was not contested before us and since we received no argument on it we must proceed on that basis. Coupled with breach of the exclusivity contract, the requirement of an independently actionable wrong is therefore met in this case.

[80] Thus, the question becomes: did Purina's conduct constitute such a marked departure from the ordinary standards of decency that it warrants censure through the imposition of an award of punitive damages? In answering this question, a careful analysis of Purina's conduct is warranted. In doing so, it is useful to call to mind the factors for consideration set out by the Supreme Court in Whiten, at para. 94:

> (1) Punitive damages are very much the exception rather than the rule, (2) imposed only if there has been high-handed, malicious, arbitrary or highly reprehensible misconduct that departs to a marked degree from ordinary standards of decent behaviour. (3) Where they are awarded, punitive damages should be assessed in an amount reasonably proportionate to such factors as the harm caused, the degree of the misconduct, the relative vulnerability of the plaintiff and any advantage or profit gained by the defendant, (4) having regard to any other fines or penalties suffered by the defendant for the misconduct in question. (5) Punitive damages are generally given only where the misconduct would otherwise be unpunished or where other penalties are or are likely to be inadequate to achieve the objectives of retribution, deterrence and denunciation. (6) Their purpose is not to compensate the plaintiff, but (7) to give a defendant his or her just desert (retribution), to deter the defendant and others from similar misconduct in the future (deterrence), and to mark the community's collective condemnation (denunciation) of what has happened. (8) Punitive damages are awarded only where compensatory damages, which to some extent are punitive, are insufficient to > accomplish these objectives, and (9) they are given in an amount that is no greater than necessary to rationally accomplish their purpose. (10) While normally the state would be the recipient of any fine or penalty for misconduct, the plaintiff will keep punitive damages as a "windfall" in addition to compensatory damages. (11) Judges and juries in our system have usually found that [page448] moderate awards of punitive damages, which inevitably carry a stigma in the broader community, are generally sufficient.

[81] From the outset, Purina knew that in order for Raywalt to succeed, it had to take over Ren's sales of Purina products. As the trial judge found, the volume of Purina sales to Raywalt taken from the Ren's dealership was "critically important" to the success of the new dealership. While the exclusive right to market and sell Purina feed products within defined geographical territories is an important feature of all distributorships, to Purina's knowledge, it was crucial to Raywalt. Further, Purina was aware of the financial risks and vulnerability of Kasamekas and Jackson. As part of the start-up financing, Kasamekas gave Purina a mortgage against his home and the company's credit line was secured by personal guarantees by Kasamekas, Jackson and their spouses. The personal guarantees were secured against their homes.

[82] It is within this context that Purina's actions must be considered. Within weeks of Raywalt starting up, it learned that Purina was permitting Ren's to continue to supply Ren with feed. When challenged, Purina assured Raywalt that it would stop supplying Ren with feed. While Purina did in fact stop supplying Ren directly, it then embarked on the arrangements with McGrath to ensure that Ren continued to receive feed and sell within the Raywalt territory. That is, in essence, Purina did precisely what it told Raywalt it would not do. It did so repeatedly, over a lengthy period of time and with a complete disregard for the consequences to Raywalt. At para. 49 of the reasons for decision, the trial judge quotes from correspondence authored by Tom Robinson, a manager at Purina, which shows that he had a "clear financial and business interest in McGrath succeeding over Raywalt" and at the relevant times, took an "aggressive stance" against Raywalt.

Because of the surreptitious way in which Purina supplied Ren, Raywalk had no knowledge of what was going on and therefore had no ability to take steps to address the problem or mitigate the financial harm that ensued.

[83] Purina's actions in supplying McGrath so that he, in turn, could supply Ren are deceitful. As such, they are reprehensible and deserving of sanction.

[84] As the preceding reasons explain, the damages award does not otherwise punish this behaviour. There is no "double recovery" aspect to making an award of punitive damages in this case. Moreover, the damages award is insufficient to accomplish the objectives of denunciation and deterrence of others from acting similarly. The amount of $30,000, set by the [page449] trial judge, is sufficient to do so. Accordingly, I would affirm the punitive damages award, albeit for different reasons than those of the trial judge.

Conclusion

[85] In summary, except for punitive damages, I would allow the appeal. I would dismiss the claim of unlawful conduct conspiracy. I would substitute for the damage award for breach of contract an award of $198,665.83, to which I would apply a prejudgment interest rate of 5.1 per cent. The trial judgment must be amended accordingly, in light of these reasons.

[86] This result may be of relevance to the costs awarded at trial and is as well the context for an award of costs of the appeal. The parties may file written submissions of no more than ten pages on both of these questions within 30 days of the release of these reasons.

Appeal allowed in part.

(CUPE Appeal)

[1] CUPE appealed the decision of July 30, 2004, rendered by Geoffrey Morawetz as Claims Officer ("CO") with respect to CUPE's pay equity claim. At the end of the hearing today I dismissed the appeal and promised written reasons. These are those written reasons.

[2] At paragraphs 36 and 37 of his reasons, the CO stated:

> (36) CUPE's pay equity claim is a contingent claim in that it has not been successful on its merits as of the date of the commencement of Air Canada's CCAA proceedings. The contingency in question is the resolution of the pay equity complaint process underway before the Tribunal (and possibly the courts via appeals of the Tribunal's decision). As with any contingent claim, there are two fundamental aspects to the determination of the claim; namely, (i) as assessment of the happening of the contingency in question; and (ii) the quantification of the claim. If CUPE successfully discharges its onus of establishing that there is some basis to presuppose the happening of the contingency, a reasonable value must then be established for the claim (and it is common in practice to discount the aggregate value of the claim in a "best case" scenario by some reasonable percentage that reflects the risk that a less optimistic scenario may in fact result). For the reasons that follow, I find that CUPE has failed to provide any evidence to substantiate the happening of the contingency in question and that the quantification of CUPE's contingent claim would in any event be negligible.
> (37) There is, in these proceedings, a Claims Procedure Order of Farley J. dated September 18, 2003, as amended by Order of Farley J. dated July 9, 2004, which provides that all creditors (including CUPE with respect to its pay equity claim for the Relevant Period) must prove their claims in accordance with the procedures set out therein. In short, CUPE has to prove its claim now, and not at some future date, and the failure to do so results in CUPE being barred from asserting such a claim at a future date. If CUPE fails to adduce sufficient evidence to substantiate its contingent pay equity claim at the present time, it is not open to CUPE to assert that some weight ought to be given to the likelihood or possibility that it may, in the future, be able to adduce sufficient evidence so as to prove its claim in respect of the Relevant Period. That is to say, I cannot conclude that there is a 50% chance (or 40%, or 30%, etc.) that CUPE will be able to substantiate its claim in the future if it has not already done so in these proceedings and that some percentage of the value of its pay equity claim ought to be allowed at this time. CUPE cannot on the one hand admit that it has no evidence to substantiate its claim at the present time and on the other hand seek to have a claim admitted by the Monitor nonetheless on the basis that it might at some date find evidence to substantiate its claim. The merits of CUPE's contingent pay equity claim must be established in these proceedings.

2004 CanLII 6674 (ON SC)

He went on to observe at paragraph 39:

> (39) To be clear, this is not a situation in which CUPE has a valid claim, the value of which is simply uncertain or difficult to compute; rather, I find that CUPE has not proved that it has any claim at all.

Further at paragraph 40, the CO stated:

> (40) … As noted by counsel to Air Canada, there are three pre-requisite elements of a human rights complaint, without which there is no claim: (i) difference in wages; (ii) within the same establishment; and (iii) the performance of work of equal value as between the groups in question. … But, with respect to the third criterion, I agree with Air Canada that there is no evidence before me to indicate that the work performed by Flight Attendants is of equal value to the work performed by the Comparative Groups, which is the very basis of CUPE's claim. It is entirely unclear that there is any principled basis of comparison between Flight Attendants and the Comparative Groups and, in any event, no evidence before me that the outcome of such comparison establishes that there is work of equal value being performed.

[3] CUPE submitted that notwithstanding my views in Re Olympia & York Developments Ltd., [1994] O.J. No. 1335 (Gen. Div.), that I should follow the Alberta practice as set out by Paperny, J. in Re Canadian Airlines Corp., [2001] A.J. No. 226 (Q.B.) of hearing this matter on a de novo basis as opposed to a true appeal. Even if I were to agree with that notwithstanding the difference in practice related to Alberta Masters, I would observe that on the basis of the record before me, I would have come up with the same conclusions as the CO save and except as to what I might describe as wholehearted acceptance of his views at paragraph 46 when he describes "the intuitive appeal of Air Canada's argument with respect to the manner in which wages are determined". It is clear from his reference later in that paragraph to "yet another reason" that this argument of Air Canada was not a determinative feature. Indeed it may well be that the CO merely intended paragraph 46 to be simply a point which could be characterized as a buttressing observation on a check of reasonability, not that there is an obligation to do so to provide a foundation for a pay equity claim. Collective bargaining is a process of give and take. Secondly I would not be of the view that as per his observation in paragraph 47 that CUPE had an obligation to lead evidence as to:

> (b) more importantly, that the wage gap cannot be explained, in full or in part, by factors other than system gender discrimination (such as consideration of the factors set out in section 11(2) of the CHRA).

While it would seem to me that CUPE was not under any positive obligation to provide such evidence (that seemingly being Air Canada's role if it wished to do so), again that observation by the CO is not in my view determinative of the wage gap question.

[4] See also my views in Re Air Canada (Corporate Travel Management CTM Inc.) and Re Air Canada (Always Travel Inc.) matters released August 3 and 5, 2004 respectively relying on the Court of Appeal decision in Shelson v. Gowling Lafleur Henderson LLP, [2004] O.J. No. 850 (C.A.) released March 9, 2004 at paragraph 20 relating to deference notwithstanding that a matter may be decided originally on a paper record.

[5] The onus is on a claimant to prove its claim. As discussed in paragraph 38 of his reasons, the CO required that "CUPE must demonstrate that its claim is not too speculative or remote, but it need not establish that success is probable". He went on to say at paragraph 39:

> (39) In the present case, I am satisfied for the reasons set out below that CUPE's claim has not been proven. The claim is remote and speculative as there is no evidence to substantiate that the claim has any merit. To be clear, this is not a situation in which CUPE has a valid claim, the value of which is simply uncertain or difficult to compute; rather, I find that CUPE has not proved that it has any claim at all.

It seems to me to be an unreasonable analysis of his reasoning that would allow CUPE to advance at paragraph 46 of its factum:

> (46) To require scientific certainty is to set up inappropriate roadblocks to the goal of the CHRA, namely to remedy discrimination…

The fact of the matter is that CUPE provided no evidence as to the particular case involving Air Canada (and the "merged Canadian Airlines" question) as to the third criterion.

[6] It is indeed troubling that a Canadian Human Rights Act / pay equity case could rattle around the Commission, the Tribunal and the courts for 14 years and for this Court to be advised that it is likely to take another decade before this matter can be adjudicated to the end under that legislation. However, that process is not the one which is required to be followed in the determination of a claim under the CCAA. Contingent unliquidated claims are determined under the CCAA claims process even in the most complicated of litigation and even though a claim may not have been actually initiated in a court or otherwise. I do not wish or intend to minimize the hurdles and hoops which may be involved in the payment equity litigation in the established "ordinary course", but I would observe that if CUPE had provided an acceptable expert report on job evaluation, even if in "simplified form" (as opposed to no evidence), then Air Canada would have had to respond to that evidence. Would that report have had to be precise (apparently to the degree envisaged by parties in pay equity disputes)? The simple answer to that is that is not necessary in a CCAA claims process.

[7] The appeal is dismissed. While that claim as agreed between Air Canada and CUPE only deals with the monetary aspect of the claim up to September 30, 2004, I would trust that with respect to the process otherwise continuing, that with respect to the determination of this as with any other human rights issue (which the Supreme Court of Canada has determined should be regarded as a quasi-constitutional right) such determination can be accomplished with cooperation in very significantly less time than a further decade. The resolution of such an important question demands nothing less.

Trusts — Directors of closely held corporation — Business of corporation a travel agency — Agreement between travel agency and airline for ticket sales — Receipts less commission to be forwarded to airline — Notwithstanding separate trust account for money from ticket sales, money placed in travel agency's general account — Business difficulties resulting in directors making independent and contradictory instructions to bank as to operating account — Bank withdrawing amount owing it on line of credit to travel agency pursuant to terms of credit agreement — Airline suing directors personally for monies owing it — Whether relationship between travel agency and airline one of trust or of debtor and creditor — If trust relationship, whether directors personally liable for breach of trust by corporation.

Appellant borrowed money on a personal loan, invested it in a travel agency and paid the interest from the agency's general banking account. He became one of the agency's two directors and its vice-president. While both directors had signing authority, the day-to-day operation of the business was left to the other director. The travel agency, on becoming a member of IATA, signed a passenger sales agency agreement with IATA (conferring the right to sell air carrier tickets and receive commissions) and a passenger sales agency agreement with Air Canada (authorizing the agency to receive blank airline ticket stock for Air Canada and to issue tickets directly to the public). Funds collected from the sale of Air Canada tickets were to be held in trust by the travel agency and were to be paid twice a month to Air Canada. These payments were regularly made until March 1979.

Fiducies — Administrateurs d'une société à peu d'actionnaires — La société exploite une agence de voyages — Convention entre l'agence de voyages et la compagnie d'aviation pour la vente de billets — Les recettes moins les commissions devaient être remises à la compagnie d'aviation — Nonobstant les comptes en fiducie distincts pour l'argent provenant de la vente des billets, l'argent était déposé dans le compte général de l'agence de voyages — Des difficultés commerciales amènent des administrateurs à donner des instructions divergentes à la banque relativement au compte d'affaires — La banque a retiré les montants qui lui étaient dus sur la marge de crédit de l'agence de voyages aux termes de la convention de crédit — La compagnie d'aviation poursuit les administrateurs personnellement pour les montants qui lui sont dus — Le rapport établi entre l'agence de voyages et la compagnie d'aviation constituait-il une fiducie ou une obligation liant un débiteur et un créancier? — S'il s'agit d'une fiducie, les administrateurs sont-ils responsables personnellement pour la violation de l'obligation fiduciaire par la société?

L'appelant a emprunté de l'argent au moyen d'un prêt personnel, l'a investi dans une agence de voyages et a payé les intérêts sur le compte de banque général de l'agence. Il est devenu l'un des deux administrateurs de l'agence et son vice-président. Les deux administrateurs avaient le pouvoir de signature mais l'autre administrateur gérait l'entreprise au jour le jour. Lorsqu'elle est devenue membre de l'ATAI, l'agence de voyages a conclu un contrat d'agence de vente passages avec l'ATAI (conférant le droit de vendre des billets d'avion et de toucher des commissions) et un contrat d'agence de vente passages avec Air Canada (autorisant l'agence à recevoir une provision de formulaires de billets à remplir et à distribuer les billets directement au public).

The travel agency obtained an operating line of credit from a chartered bank in 1978. The monies advanced under the line of credit and interest thereon constituted a demand loan in favour of the Bank. Both directors personally guaranteed the loan and authorized the Bank to remove any monies owing on the loan at any time from the agency's general account. Although a trust account was set up by the managing director for the deposit of the airline funds held by the agency, these funds were maintained in the agency's general operating bank account.

A dispute arose between the directors in April 1979. The managing director discovered cancelled cheques for the instalment payments on appellant's personal loan. It was his understanding that appellant had agreed to cease making the payments for the time being and he stopped payment on the last instalment cheque. Appellant suspected the managing director of misappropriating funds and stopped payment on all cheques and withdrawals. At this time, the travel agency owed Air Canada $25,079.67 for ticket sales.

The travel agency was closed for 10 days. Both directors, through their solicitors, negotiated for the purchase by one of the other's interest and both, during this time, made efforts to pay Air Canada. Appellant testified that he opened a trust account, drew cheques for the monies that were still in the company account, withdrew the stop payment orders, and attempted to transfer the funds into the new trust account. The Bank refused to transfer the funds or to honour the cheques made out to Air Canada because of the conflicting instructions from the two directors. The Bank, after sending demand notices, withdrew the full amount owing it under the line of credit from the travel agency's general account.

Air Canada sued the travel agency and both directors personally for the money owed to it for ticket sales. Its claim against the travel agency was successful but the claim against the two directors was dismissed. Air Canada successfully appealed the judgment as it related to the two directors and judgment was entered against them as well. At issue here were: (1) whether the relationship between travel agency and respondent was one

L'agence de voyages a obtenu une marge de crédit d'exploitation d'une banque à charte en 1978. Les sommes avancées conformément à la marge de crédit et les intérêts dus constituaient un prêt remboursable sur demande de la banque. Les deux administrateurs ont garanti personnellement le prêt et autorisé la banque à retirer du compte général de l'agence toute somme due sur celui-ci. Bien que l'administrateur délégué ait ouvert un compte en fiducie afin d'y déposer les fonds de la compagnie d'aviation détenus par l'agence, ces fonds ont été gardés dans un compte d'affaires général de l'agence à la banque.

En avril 1979, un conflit est intervenu entre les administrateurs. L'administrateur délégué a découvert des chèques payés au titre des versements échelonnés sur le prêt personnel de l'appelant. Il était d'avis que l'appelant avait consenti à cesser les paiements pour le moment et a fait opposition au chèque tiré pour le dernier versement. L'appelant a soupçonné l'administrateur délégué de détourner des fonds et a fait opposition à tous les chèques et retraits. À ce moment-là, l'agence devait 25 079,67 $ à Air Canada pour des billets vendus.

L'agence de voyages a été fermée pendant 10 jours. Les deux administrateurs, par l'entremise de leurs avocats, ont négocié l'achat de leur participation respective et, durant ce temps, tous deux ont fait un effort pour payer Air Canada. L'appelant a témoigné avoir ouvert un compte en fiducie, tiré des chèques pour les sommes non utilisées dans le compte de la société, mis fin à l'opposition aux chèques et tenté de transférer les fonds dans le nouveau compte en fiducie. La banque a refusé de virer les fonds ou d'honorer les chèques tirés à l'ordre d'Air Canada à cause des instructions divergentes des deux administrateurs. Après avoir envoyé des avis relatifs au prêt remboursable sur demande, la banque a retiré le montant complet de la dette en vertu de la marge de crédit du compte d'affaires général de l'agence.

Air Canada a poursuivi l'agence et les deux administrateurs personnellement, au sujet de la somme due pour les billets vendus. Elle a eu gain de cause contre l'agence de voyages mais son action contre les administrateurs a été rejetée. Air Canada a interjeté appel avec succès contre les deux administrateurs et un jugement a également été inscrit contre eux. Les questions en l'espèce sont les suivantes: (1) le rapport établi entre of trust, or one of debtor and creditor; and (2) if the relationship was one of trust, under what circumstances could the directors of a corporation be held personally liable for breach of trust by the corporation, and were those circumstances present here. The legal issue raised by this second ground of appeal concerned the standards for the imposition of personal liability to be applied to strangers who participate in a breach of trust. Although involving a corporation, the case fell to be resolved on trust principles, and does not raise general questions of the personal liability of directors for the acts of the corporation.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Per La Forest, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, Iacobucci and Major JJ.: The relationship was conceded to be one of trust. The wording of the agreement evidenced an intention to create a trust. Respondent was the object of the trust and the money collected for ticket sales its subject matter. Given the intention to create a trust in the agreement between the travel agency and respondent, the absence of a prohibition on the commingling of funds could be considered but was not determinative of the type of relationship. The setting up of the trust account and the fact that the IATA agreement allowed the travel agency to affect Air Canada's legal responsibilities indicated a relationship consistent with a trust relationship. The travel agency breached the trust when it failed to account to the respondent for the monies collected through sales of Air Canada tickets.

The imposition of personal liability on a stranger to a trust depends on whether the stranger's conscience is sufficiently affected to justify the imposition of personal liability. A stranger to the trust can be held liable as a constructive trustee for breach of trust (trustee de son tort). The stranger, although not appointed a trustee, takes on him- or herself to act as trustee and to possess and administer trust property and becomes liable if he or she commits a breach of trust while acting as a trustee. This type of liability is inapplicable here because the directors did not personally take possession of trust property or assume the office or function of trustees.

l'agence et l'intimée constitue-t-il une fiducie ou une obligation entre débiteur et créancier? (2) s'il s'agit d'une fiducie, dans quelles circonstances les administrateurs d'une société peuvent-ils être tenus personnellement responsables de la violation de la fiducie par la société, et ces circonstances existaient-elles en l'espèce? La question de droit posée par ce second moyen d'appel fait entrer en jeu les normes qui régissent l'attribution d'une responsabilité personnelle aux tiers qui participent à la violation d'une fiducie. Bien qu'une société par actions soit en cause, l'affaire doit être tranchée selon les principes applicables à la fiducie et elle ne soulève pas de questions générales touchant la responsabilité personnelle des administrateurs pour les actes de la société.

Arrêt: Le pourvoi est rejeté.

Les juges La Forest, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, Iacobucci et Major: Il a été concédé que le rapport était une fiducie. L'intention de créer une fiducie ressort du texte du contrat. Le bénéficiaire est l'intimée et les biens assujettis à la fiducie sont les fonds encaissés par suite de la vente de billets. Comme l'intention de créer une fiducie est exprimée dans le contrat entre l'agence de voyages et l'intimée, on peut tenir compte de l'absence d'interdiction de regrouper les fonds mais elle n'est pas déterminante à l'égard du genre de rapport. L'ouverture du compte en fiducie et le fait que l'accord de l'ATAI permettait à l'agence de voyages d'influer sur les responsabilités juridiques d'Air Canada indiquaient un rapport compatible avec l'existence d'une fiducie. L'agence de voyages a violé l'obligation fiduciaire quand elle n'a pas rendu compte à l'intimée des sommes perçues par suite de la vente de ses billets.

L'attribution d'une responsabilité personnelle à un tiers à une fiducie est subordonnée à la question de savoir si la conscience du tiers est suffisamment en cause pour que soit justifiée l'attribution d'une responsabilité personnelle. La responsabilité pour la violation d'une fiducie peut être attribuée à un tiers en qualité de fiduciaire par interprétation (fiduciaire «de son tort»). Le tiers, bien qu'il n'ait pas été nommé fiduciaire, prend sur lui d'agir comme fiduciaire et de détenir et d'administrer les biens en fiducie, et devient responsable s'il manque à une de ses obligations pendant qu'il agit comme fiduciaire. Ce type de responsabilité est inapplicable en l'espèce parce que les administrateurs n'ont pas pris possession personnellement des biens en fiducie et ne se sont pas attribué la charge ou la fonction de fiduciaire.

Strangers to the trust can also be personally liable for breach of trust if they knowingly participate in a breach of trust. They either were acting as a trustee in receipt and chargeable with trust property (a constructive trusteeship termed "knowing receipt") or they knowingly assisted in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees (termed "knowing assistance"). Since the "knowing receipt" category did not apply here, the only basis upon which the directors could be held personally liable was as constructive trustees under the "knowing assistance" head of liability. This basis of liability raises two main issues: the nature of the breach of trust and the degree of knowledge required of the stranger.

The knowledge requirement for this "knowing assistance" type of liability is actual knowledge; recklessness or wilful blindness will suffice. A person will be deemed to have known of the trust if it was imposed by statute. If the trust was contractually created, then whether the stranger knew of the trust will depend on his or her familiarity or involvement with the contract.

The receipt of a benefit as a result of the breach of trust will be neither a sufficient nor a necessary condition for the drawing of an inference that a stranger knew of the breach. Constructive notice has been found to be insufficient to bind the stranger's conscience so as to give rise to personal liability. While cases involving recklessness or wilful blindness indicate a want of probity which justifies imposing a constructive trust, the carelessness involved in constructive knowledge cases will not normally amount to a want of probity, and will therefore be insufficient to bind the stranger's conscience.

Whether the breach of trust was fraudulent and dishonest must be considered, not whether the appellant's actions should be so characterized. The stranger will be liable if he or she knowingly assisted the trustee in a fraudulent and dishonest breach of trust. Therefore, it is the corporation's actions which must be examined. Where the trustee is a corporation, rather than an individual, the inquiry as to whether the breach of trust was dishonest and fraudulent may be more difficult to conceptualize, because the corporation can only act through human agents who are often the strangers to the trust whose liability is in issue. The appellant's actions were Une responsabilité personnelle peut incomber à des tiers en cas de manquement à une obligation fiduciaire s'ils participent sciemment à ce manquement. Ils agissaient soit à titre de fiduciaires parce qu'ils avaient reçu des biens en fiducie et devaient en rendre compte (fiducie par interprétation appelée «réception en connaissance de cause»), soit parce qu'ils avaient sciemment aidé les fiduciaires à réaliser un dessein malhonnête et frauduleux (appelée «aide apportée en connaissance de cause»). Étant donné que la catégorie de la «réception en connaissance de cause» ne s'applique pas en l'espèce, une responsabilité personnelle ne peut être attribuée aux administrateurs que s'ils ont apporté une «aide en connaissance de cause». La responsabilité qui repose sur ce fondement soulève deux questions principales: la nature de la violation de l'obligation fiduciaire, et le degré de connaissance exigé du tiers.

La connaissance requise pour la responsabilité fondée sur l'«aide en connaissance de cause» est la connaissance de fait; l'insouciance ou l'ignorance volontaire suffiront également. Une personne est réputée savoir qu'il y a une fiducie en cas de fiducie en vertu d'une loi. En cas de fiducie conventionnelle, la question de savoir si le tiers était au courant de la fiducie dépend de sa connaissance du contrat ou de sa participation à celui-ci.

Le fait de tirer avantage de la violation de l'obligation fiduciaire n'est ni une condition suffisante ni une condition nécessaire pour conclure que le tiers était au courant de la violation. Il a été décidé que la connaissance présumée était insuffisante pour que la conscience d'un tiers soit en cause au point qu'il puisse être tenu personnellement responsable. En cas d'insouciance ou d'ignorance volontaire, on peut déduire une absence de probité qui justifie l'attribution d'une fiducie par interprétation, mais le manque de diligence démontré dans les cas où il y a connaissance présumée n'équivaut normalement pas à un manque de probité et sera par conséquent insuffisant pour que la conscience du tiers puisse être mise en cause.

Il faut examiner si la violation de l'obligation fiduciaire a été frauduleuse et malhonnête, et non si les actions de l'appelant doivent être ainsi qualifiées. Le tiers sera tenu responsable s'il a sciemment aidé le fiduciaire à violer l'obligation fiduciaire frauduleusement et malhonnêtement. Par conséquent, ce sont les actions de la société qu'il faut examiner. Lorsque le fiduciaire est une société par actions, et non un particulier, il peut être plus difficile de trancher la question de savoir si la violation de l'obligation fiduciaire a été malhonnête et frauduleuse parce que la société ne peut agir que par l'intermédiaire de personnes physiques qui sont souvent les relevant to this examination, given the extent to which the travel agency was controlled by the defendant directors.

The breach of trust by the travel agency was dishonest and fraudulent from an equitable standpoint. The taking of a knowingly wrongful risk resulting in prejudice to the beneficiary is sufficient to ground personal liability. As a party to the contract between itself and the respondent, the travel agency knew that the Air Canada monies were held in trust for the respondent, and were not for the general use of the travel agency. It set up trust accounts, but never used them. It also knew that any positive balance in its general account was subject to the Bank's demand. By placing the trust monies in the general account which were then subject to seizure by the Bank, the travel agency took a risk to the prejudice of the rights of the respondent beneficiary, Air Canada. It had no right to take this risk.

Appellant participated or assisted in the breach of trust. He dealt with the funds in question — he stopped payment on all cheques, opened a trust account, and attempted to withdraw the stop payment orders and to transfer the funds into the new trust account in order to pay the respondent. The breach of trust was directly caused by the conduct of the defendant directors. Their actions in stopping payment on the cheques to protect their own interests not only prevented payment on cheques issued to Air Canada but also precipitated the seizure by the Bank of the only funds available in the unprotected general account. The directors are personally liable for the breach of trust as constructive trustees provided that the requisite knowledge on the part of the directors is proved.

The knowledge requirement will not generally be a difficult hurdle to overcome in cases involving directors of closely held corporations. Such directors, if active, usually have knowledge of all of the actions of the corporate trustee. Here, however, the appellant was not as closely involved with the day-to-day operations as was the other director. He nevertheless knew of the terms of the agreement between the travel agency and the respondent airline because he signed that agreement and he knew that the trust funds were being deposited in the general bank account, which was subject to the demand loan from the Bank. This constitutes actual knowledge tierces parties dont la responsabilité est en cause. Les actions de l'appelant étaient pertinentes dans cet examen, étant donné le degré de contrôle exercé sur l'agence de voyages par les administrateurs défendeurs.

La violation de l'obligation fiduciaire par l'agence de voyages était malhonnête et frauduleuse selon les principes de l'equity. Le fait de courir sciemment et de manière injustifiée un risque au détriment du bénéficiaire est suffisant pour légitimer l'attribution d'une responsabilité personnelle. En tant que partie au contrat conclu entre elle-même et l'intimée, l'agence de voyages savait que les sommes appartenant à Air Canada étaient détenues en fiducie au nom de celle-ci et ne devaient pas être affectées aux activités générales de l'agence de voyages. Elle a ouvert des comptes en fiducie, mais ne les a jamais utilisés. Elle savait également que tout solde positif dans son compte général pouvait être demandé par la banque. En plaçant les fonds en fiducie dans le compte général qui était susceptible d'être saisi par la banque, l'agence de voyages a couru un risque au détriment des droits d'Air Canada, bénéficiaire intimée. Elle n'avait pas le droit de courir ce risque.

L'appelant a participé ou aidé à la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire. Il a géré les fonds en question — il a fait opposition au paiement de tous les chèques, a ouvert un compte en fiducie et tenté de retirer l'opposition au paiement et de transférer les fonds dans le nouveau compte en fiducie afin de rembourser l'intimée. La violation de l'obligation fiduciaire a été causée directement par la conduite des administrateurs défendeurs. Leur action pour faire opposition à des chèques, non seulement a empêché le paiement de chèques tirés à l'ordre d'Air Canada, mais a hâté la saisie par la banque des seuls fonds se trouvant dans le compte général non protégé. Les administrateurs sont personnellement responsables de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire à titre de fiduciaires par interprétation, à la condition qu'il soit prouvé qu'ils avaient la connaissance voulue.

La connaissance exigée ne sera généralement pas un obstacle difficile à surmonter lorsqu'il s'agit d'administrateurs d'une société à peu d'actionnaires. Ces administrateurs, s'ils jouent un rôle actif, sont d'ordinaire au courant de toutes les actions de la société fiduciaire. En l'espèce, toutefois, l'appelant ne prenait pas une part aussi active aux activités quotidiennes que l'autre administrateur. Il connaissait néanmoins les conditions de l'accord entre l'agence de voyages et la compagnie d'aviation intimée, puisqu'il a signé le contrat et qu'il savait en outre que les fonds en fiducie étaient déposés dans le compte en banque général, qui était assujetti au of the breach of trust because even without subjective knowledge of the breach of trust, given the facts of which he did have subjective knowledge, he was wilfully blind to the breach, or reckless in his failure to realize that there was a breach. Furthermore, appellant received a benefit from the breach of trust, in that his personal liability to the Bank on the operating line of credit was extinguished. Therefore, he knowingly and directly participated in the breach of trust, and is personally liable to the respondent airline for that breach.

Per McLachlin J.: The relationship between the corporation and Air Canada was one of trust, not debtor and creditor. Appellant was clearly liable as a constructive trustee for the breach of trust which the corporation committed respecting Air Canada's account.

A number of issues should not be decided here but rather left for consideration in cases in which they might arise. A stranger to a trust must know of his or her participation in a breach of trust to be personally liable for it. It was not necessary, however, to decide whether subjective knowledge (actual knowledge of the breach or wilful blindness and recklessness) or objectively determined knowledge (what a reasonably diligent person would have known) is necessary. The evidence here met the higher standard of subjective knowledge. It was also unnecessary to decide whether any breach could give rise to liability or whether the breach had to be fraudulent or dishonest because the breach here was fraudulent and dishonest in the sense that it involved a risk to the property to the prejudice of the beneficiary. Lastly, a decision as to whether liability could be imposed in the absence of personal benefit did not need to be made because appellant benefitted personally from the breach.

prêt à demande de la banque. Cela équivaut à la connaissance de fait de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire parce que, même en l'absence de connaissance subjective de la violation de l'obligation fiduciaire, étant donné les faits dont il avait la connaissance subjective, il a fait preuve d'ignorance volontaire de la violation, ou d'insouciance en ne se rendant pas compte de la violation. Par surcroît, l'appelant a tiré avantage de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire, en ce sens que son engagement personnel envers la banque à l'égard de la marge de crédit d'exploitation a été éteint. Par conséquent, il a sciemment et directement participé à la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire et est personnellement responsable envers la compagnie d'aviation intimée de cette violation.

Le juge McLachlin: Il existait un rapport de fiduciaire entre la société et Air Canada et non un rapport de débiteur et créancier. L'appelant était clairement responsable à titre de fiduciaire par interprétation de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire que la société a commise relativement au compte d'Air Canada.

Un certain nombre de questions ne devraient pas être tranchées en l'espèce mais plutôt examinées dans des affaires où elles pourront être soulevées. Le tiers à une fiducie doit participer en connaissance de cause à la violation pour en être tenu personnellement responsable. Toutefois, il n'est pas nécessaire de décider si la connaissance requise doit être subjective (une connaissance de fait de la violation ou l'ignorance volontaire et l'insouciance) ou déterminée de façon objective (ce qu'une personne raisonnablement diligente aurait dû savoir). La preuve en l'espèce satisfait à la norme plus élevée de la connaissance subjective. De plus, il n'est pas nécessaire de déterminer si toute violation pourrait entraîner la responsabilité ou si la violation devait être frauduleuse et malhonnête car la violation en l'espèce était frauduleuse et malhonnête dans le sens qu'il y avait un risque pour les biens au détriment du bénéficiaire. Finalement, il n'est pas nécessaire de décider si la responsabilité pourrait être attribuée en l'absence d'avantage personnel parce que, en l'espèce, l'appelant a tiré un avantage personnel de la violation.

IACOBUCCI J. — This appeal concerns the personal liability of directors of a closely held corporation for breach of a trust by the corporation. The appellant was one of two directors of a small travel agency which contracted with the respondent airline to sell Air Canada tickets. Two main questions are raised on this appeal. First, was the relationship between the corporation and the respondent airline one of trust? Second, if so, is the appellant director personally liable for the breach of trust by the corporation? The legal issue raised by this second ground of appeal concerns the standards for the imposition of personal liability to be applied to strangers who participate in a breach of trust. Although involving a corporation, the case falls to be resolved on trust principles, and does not raise

LE JUGE IACOBUCCI — Le présent pourvoi porte sur la responsabilité personnelle des administrateurs d'une société à peu d'actionnaires pour la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire par la société. L'appelant était l'un des deux administrateurs d'une petite agence de voyages qui avait signé un contrat avec la compagnie d'aviation intimée relativement à la vente de billets d'Air Canada. Deux questions principales se posent dans le présent pourvoi. Premièrement, le rapport établi entre la société et la compagnie d'aviation intimée constituait-il une fiducie? Deuxièmement, dans l'affirmative, l'administrateur appelant est-il personnellement responsable de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire par la société? La question de droit posée par ce second moyen d'appel fait entrer en jeu les normes qui régissent l'attribution d'une responsabilité personnelle aux tiers qui participent à la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire. Bien qu'une société par actions soit en cause, l'affaire doit être tranchée selon les principes applicables à general questions of the personal liability of directors for the acts of the corporation.

I. Background

In 1973, the defendant Phil Martin and one Ross Linton incorporated M & L Travel Limited (M & L) to carry on the business of a travel agency in Ottawa. In 1975, Linton withdrew from the business and Martin continued by himself. In 1977, Martin wanted M & L to become a member of the International Air Transport Association (IATA) so that he could receive larger commissions and issue tickets directly to customers. To become a member, M & L had to fulfil certain requirements. These included having working capital of at least $20,000 and the sponsorship of a major airline. Therefore, in the fall of 1977, Martin invited the appellant Valliant to become a shareholder and invest in M & L. In January 1978, Valliant invested $25,550 in M & L and acquired 50 percent of the issued shares. Valliant obtained this money through a personal loan on which he was required to pay monthly instalments of $752. The trial judge found that Martin had agreed that Valliant could withdraw this amount from M & L's account on a monthly basis until the personal loan was paid in full.

Martin became President of M & L and Valliant its Vice-President, and they were its sole directors. Each had signing authority, but Martin ran the day-to-day business. Valliant, who had no experience with the travel agency business, dropped in occasionally and worked full time, for a salary, only when Martin was ill or on vacation. In November 1978, Valliant brought his wife into the travel agency to deal with problems with M & L's books. She was given signing authority and worked part time for the agency until April 1979.

The IATA accepted the membership application of M & L based on sponsorship by Air Canada. M & L entered into two written agreements. The first was a passenger sales agency agreement between IATA and M & L, executed on September 14, 1978 la fiducie et elle ne soulève pas de questions générales touchant la responsabilité personnelle des administrateurs pour les actes de la société.

I. Le contexte

En 1973, le défendeur Phil Martin et un nommé Ross Linton ont constitué la société M & L Travel Limited (M & L), agence de voyages devant exercer son activité à Ottawa. En 1975, Linton s'est retiré de l'affaire et Martin a continué seul. En 1977, Martin a voulu que M & L adhère à l'Association du transport aérien international (ATAI) afin de toucher des commissions plus importantes et de vendre des billets directement aux clients. Pour y adhérer, M & L devait satisfaire à certaines exigences. Parmi celles-ci, on compte un fonds de roulement d'au moins 20 000 $ et le parrainage d'une importante compagnie d'aviation. Par conséquent, à l'automne de 1977, Martin a invité l'appelant Valliant à devenir actionnaire et à investir dans M & L. En janvier 1978, Valliant a investi 25 550 $ et a acquis 50 pour 100 des actions émises. Il a obtenu cet argent au moyen d'un prêt personnel qui l'obligeait à rembourser 752 $ par mois. Le juge de première instance a conclu que Martin avait consenti à ce que Valliant retire cette somme du compte de M & L chaque mois jusqu'au remboursement complet du prêt personnel.

Martin est devenu président de M & L et Valliant, vice-président, et ils en étaient les seuls administrateurs. Chacun était signataire autorisé, mais Martin gérait l'entreprise au jour le jour. Valliant, qui n'avait aucune expérience dans une agence de voyages, passait de temps à autre et ne travaillait à plein temps, contre rémunération, que lorsque Martin était malade ou en vacances. En novembre 1978, Valliant a fait entrer son épouse à l'agence afin qu'elle s'occupe des problèmes posés par la tenue des livres de M & L. Elle est devenue signataire autorisée et a occupé un emploi à temps partiel à l'agence jusqu'en avril 1979.

L'ATAI a accepté la demande d'adhésion de M & L, parrainée par Air Canada. M & L a conclu deux accords écrits. Le premier était un contrat d'agence de vente passages conclu entre l'ATAI et M & L le 14 septembre 1978 et signé par Martin and signed by Martin as President. This agreement conferred on M & L the right to sell air carrier tickets and receive commissions. Valliant was familiar with the contents of this agreement. The second agreement, also called a passenger sales agency agreement, was entered into between M & L and Air Canada on March 15, 1979 and was signed by Valliant as Vice-President. This agreement authorized M & L to receive blank airline ticket stock from Air Canada and to issue tickets directly to the public. Funds collected from the sale of Air Canada tickets were to be held in trust by M & L and paid twice a month to Air Canada. Until March 1979, these payments were regularly made. The agreement contained the following clause:

All monies, less applicable commissions to which the Agent is entitled hereunder, collected by the Agent for air passenger transportation (and for which the Agent has issued tickets or exchange orders) shall be the property of the Airline, and shall be held in trust by the Agent until satisfactorily accounted for to the airline. All such monies, less applicable commissions to which the Agent is entitled hereunder, shall be remitted to the Airline by the Agent in accordance with the Airline's accounting procedures.

On August 30, 1978, M & L obtained an operating line of credit of $15,000 from the Provincial Bank of Canada in Ottawa (the Bank). Martin and Valliant personally guaranteed the loan and authorized the Bank to remove from the general account of M & L any monies at any time owing on the loan. The monies advanced under the line of credit and interest thereon constituted a demand loan in favour of the Bank.

Also in 1978, Martin set up trust accounts on behalf of M & L for the deposit of the airline funds. For unexplained reasons, these accounts were never used. Instead, M & L maintained a general operating account with the Bank. Funds from all sources, including the sale of Air Canada tickets, were placed in this account. General operating expenses, the interest on the line of credit, en qualité de président. Il accordait à M & L le droit de vendre des billets d'avion et de toucher des commissions. Valliant était au courant des clauses de ce contrat. Le second, aussi appelé contrat d'agence de vente passages, a été conclu entre M & L et Air Canada le 15 mars 1979 et a été signé par Valliant en qualité de vice-président. Ce contrat autorisait M & L à recevoir d'Air Canada une provision de formulaires de billets d'avion à remplir, et à vendre les billets directement au public. M & L devait détenir en fiducie les fonds provenant de la vente de billets d'Air Canada et les lui verser deux fois par mois. Jusqu'en mars 1979, ces paiements ont été faits régulièrement. Le contrat contenait la clause suivante:

Le 30 août 1978, M & L a obtenu une marge de crédit d'exploitation de 15 000 $ de la Banque Provinciale du Canada à Ottawa (la banque). Martin et Valliant ont garanti personnellement le prêt et ont autorisé la banque à retirer du compte général de M & L toute somme due sur celui-ci. Les sommes avancées conformément à la marge de crédit et les intérêts dus constituaient un prêt remboursable sur demande de la banque.

En 1978 également, Martin a ouvert des comptes en fiducie au nom de M & L afin d'y déposer les fonds de la compagnie d'aviation. Pour des raisons inexpliquées, ces comptes n'ont jamais servi. M & L a plutôt utilisé un compte d'affaires général à la banque. Ce compte a été crédité des fonds de toutes provenances, y compris la vente de billets d'Air Canada. Il a été débité des charges générales

Valliant's personal loan payments, and Martin's salary were all paid out of this account.

In April 1979, a dispute arose between Martin and Valliant. Martin, concerned about the poor cash flow position of the agency, went into the office on April 5, 1979. He found the cancelled cheques for the instalment payments on Valliant's personal loan. Martin thought that Valliant had agreed to cease making the payments for the time being, and therefore, Martin called the Bank and stopped payment on the last instalment cheque. He took the day's receipts and a number of cancelled cheques to his lawyer. On April 6, 1979, Valliant noticed the missing funds and documents, and suspected that Martin was misappropriating funds. He changed the locks on the doors and called the Bank and stopped payment on all cheques and withdrawals. At this time, M & L owed Air Canada $25,079.67 for ticket sales.

Between April 6 and April 16, 1979, the business of M & L was closed. Martin and Valliant, through their solicitors, negotiated for the purchase by one of the other's interest. During this time, both Valliant and Martin made efforts to pay Air Canada. Valliant, in particular, testified that he opened a trust account, drew cheques for the monies that were still in the company account, withdrew the stop payment orders, and attempted to transfer the funds into the new trust account. However, the Bank refused to transfer the funds or to honour the cheques made out to Air Canada because of the conflicting instructions from Martin and Valliant. The Bank, now aware of the financial and managerial difficulties facing M & L, sent a demand notice to Valliant, M & L, and probably Martin on April 23, 1979. On April 24, 1979, the Bank withdrew $15,184.11 from the operating account, satisfying in full the demand note relating to the line of credit personally guaranteed by both Martin and Valliant.

Air Canada sued M & L and Martin and Valliant personally for the $25,079.67 owed to it for ticket sales. At trial, Air Canada succeeded against M &

d'exploitation, des intérêts sur la marge de crédit, des versements sur le prêt personnel de Valliant et du salaire de Martin.

En avril 1979, un conflit est intervenu entre Martin et Valliant. Martin, inquiet de la situation de la trésorerie de l'agence, s'est rendu au bureau le 5 avril 1979. Il a trouvé les chèques payés au titre des versements échelonnés sur le prêt personnel de Valliant. Martin croyait que Valliant avait consenti à cesser les paiements pour le moment et, en conséquence, il a appelé la banque et a fait opposition au chèque tiré pour le dernier versement. Il a pris les recettes du jour et un certain nombre de chèques payés et s'est rendu chez son avocat. Le 6 avril 1979, Valliant a remarqué qu'il manquait des fonds et des documents et il a soupçonné Martin de détourner des fonds. Il a changé les serrures des portes et a appelé la banque pour faire opposition à tous les chèques et retraits. À ce moment-là, M & L devait 25 079,67 $ à Air Canada pour des billets vendus.

Entre le 6 et le 16 avril 1979, M & L a fermé ses portes. Martin et Valliant, par l'entremise de leurs avocats, ont négocié l'achat de leur participation respective. Durant ce temps, Valliant et Martin ont fait un effort pour payer Air Canada. Valliant, en particulier, a témoigné avoir ouvert un compte en fiducie, tiré des chèques pour les sommes non utilisées dans le compte de la société, mis fin à l'opposition aux chèques et tenté de transférer les fonds dans le nouveau compte en fiducie. Toutefois, la banque a refusé de virer les fonds ou d'honorer les chèques tirés à l'ordre d'Air Canada à cause des instructions divergentes de Martin et de Valliant. La banque, sachant maintenant que M & L éprouvait des difficultés financières et des problèmes de gestion, a envoyé un avis relatif au prêt remboursable sur demande à Valliant, à M & L et probablement à Martin le 23 avril 1979. Le 24 avril 1979, la banque a retiré 15 184,11 $ du compte d'affaires, en règlement complet du billet à demande relatif à la marge de crédit garantie personnellement par Martin et Valliant.

Air Canada a poursuivi M & L, ainsi que Martin et Valliant personnellement, au sujet de la somme de 25 079,67 $ due pour les billets vendus. Au pro-

II. Judgments Below

A. Ontario District Court (Flanigan Dist. Ct. J.)

The trial judge held that there was clearly a trust relationship between Air Canada and the travel agency, and that the travel agency had breached that trust by failing to protect Air Canada's interest. However, the more difficult question was whether Martin and Valliant were personally liable for breach of trust.

The trial judge stated that the only way in which liability could be imposed on the individual defendants is if they had taken it upon themselves to possess and administer trust property for the beneficiary as if they were trustees. Each individual would then be a trustee de son tort. However, the trial judge concluded:

> . . . in this case there is no assumption, in my view, by the individual defendants to assume this trust. It is true, in signing the bank documents they gave the bank the right to do as they did but right up until the last moment they were trying each in their own way effectively or not, to protect the interest of Air Canada to keep their own interest alive by preserving the business of the travel agency. . . . So, I see nothing mala fides in the actions of the individual defendants and I think they were inept in some of their actions but, they were in no way, in my view, trustees that breached a trust so far as Air Canada is concerned.

Therefore, the trial judge dismissed the claim against the individual defendants.

B. Ontario Court of Appeal (1991), 2 O.R. (3d) 184 (Griffiths J.A.)

Griffiths J.A. began by noting that it was not contested that there was a trust relationship cès, Air Canada a eu gain de cause contre M & L, mais le juge a rejeté l'action contre Martin et Valliant. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a fait droit à l'appel d'Air Canada et a inscrit un jugement contre Martin et Valliant également.

II. Les juridictions inférieures

A. La Cour de district de l'Ontario (le juge Flanigan)

Le juge de première instance a décidé que, de toute évidence, Air Canada et l'agence de voyages avaient établi une fiducie et que l'agence de voyages a violé son obligation fiduciaire en ne protégeant pas l'intérêt d'Air Canada. Toutefois, la question plus difficile était de savoir si Martin et Valliant étaient personnellement responsables de la violation.

Le juge a dit que le seul motif pour attribuer la responsabilité aux défendeurs à titre individuel serait pour avoir pris possession de biens en fiducie et les avoir administrés pour le compte du bénéficiaire comme s'ils avaient été des fiduciaires. Chacun d'eux serait alors un fiduciaire «de son tort». Toutefois, le juge a conclu:

Le juge de première instance a donc rejeté la demande engagée contre les défendeurs individuellement.

B. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario (1991), 2 O.R. (3d) 184 (le juge Griffiths)

Le juge Griffiths a d'abord fait remarquer que l'existence d'une fiducie entre Air Canada et M &

between Air Canada and M & L, and that M & L was liable for breach of that trust. He also agreed with the trial judge that the individual defendants in this case could not be classified as trustees de son tort. In Law of Trusts in Canada (2nd ed. 1984), Professor Donovan Waters states that to be held liable as a trustee de son tort, the trustee must have possession and control of the trust property. To have that possession and control, the trustee must have some legal right or title to the trust property. In this case, the trial judge properly found that neither Martin nor Valliant had assumed legal control or possession of the trust funds, since the funds were at all times administered in the name of M & L.

Griffiths J.A. held that M & L was clearly liable for breach of contract since it failed to remit the funds as required. However, as directors, Martin and Valliant could not be held personally liable for that breach of contract. It was therefore necessary, for Martin and Valliant to be potentially personally liable, that M & L also be found to have been in breach of trust. Griffiths J.A. concluded at p. 194:

> . . . on the authority of Canadian Pacific Airlines Ltd. v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (1987), 61 O.R. (2d) 233, . . . affd Ont. C.A., Robins, Krever and Carthy JJ.A., January 19, 1990 (. . . 71 O.R. (2d) 63 (note) . . .), that the agreement between Air Canada and the corporation clearly created a trust relationship between them with the result that any monies received by the corporation from the sale of Air Canada tickets were impressed with a trust.

Griffiths J.A. then went on to consider whether the directors could be personally liable for the breach by their corporation of a trust relationship created by contract. This issue, he noted, had not been considered in any reported Canadian or English cases. He reviewed several cases where the directors had been held personally liable for breaches of trust imposed by statute, including Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Co. v. J. A. (Fred) Chalmers & Co. (1969), 7 D.L.R. (3d) 283 (Sask. Q.B.); Henry Electric Ltd. v. Farwell (1986), 29

L n'était pas contestée et que M & L était responsable de la violation de cette obligation fiduciaire. Il a également convenu avec le juge de première instance que ni l'un ni l'autre des défendeurs individuels dans la présente espèce ne pouvait être tenu pour fiduciaire «de son tort». Dans son ouvrage Law of Trusts in Canada (2e éd. 1984), le professeur Donovan Waters dit que, pour encourir la responsabilité en qualité de fiduciaire «de son tort», le fiduciaire doit avoir la possession et le contrôle des biens en fiducie. La possession et le contrôle supposent un droit ou un titre sur les biens en fiducie. En l'espèce, le juge de première instance a conclu à bon droit que ni Martin ni Valliant ne s'était attribué le contrôle ou la possession, en droit, des biens en fiducie, car les fonds ont toujours été administrés au nom de M & L.

Le juge Griffiths a décidé que M & L était nettement responsable de l'inexécution du contrat car elle n'avait pas remis les sommes comme elle le devait. Toutefois, à titre d'administrateurs, Martin et Valliant ne pouvaient être tenus personnellement responsables de cette inexécution du contrat. Pour conclure à leur responsabilité personnelle, il fallait donc juger que M & L avait aussi violé une obligation fiduciaire. Le juge Griffiths conclut, à la p. 194:

> [TRADUCTION] . . . vu la décision Canadian Pacific Airlines Ltd. c. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (1987), 61 O.R. (2d) 233, [. . .] conf. par C.A. Ont., les juges Robins, Krever et Carthy, le 19 janvier 1990 ([. . .] 71 O.R. (2d) 63 (note) [. . .]), que le contrat conclu entre Air Canada et la société a créé de toute évidence une fiducie entre elles, de sorte que toute somme reçue par la société et produite par la vente de billets d'Air Canada portait la marque de la fiducie.

Il a ensuite étudié la question de savoir si les administrateurs pouvaient être tenu personnellement responsables de la violation par leur société d'une obligation fiduciaire créée par contrat. Cette question, a-t-il fait observer, n'a fait l'objet d'aucune décision publiée, au Canada ou en Grande-Bretagne. Il a examiné plusieurs précédents dans lesquels les administrateurs avaient été tenus personnellement responsables de manquements à une obligation fiduciaire imposée par une loi, y compris Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Co. c. J. A.

D.L.R. (4th) 481 (B.C.C.A.); and Andrea Schmidt Construction Ltd. v. Glatt (1979), 25 O.R. (2d) 567 (H.C.).

Griffiths J.A. also referred to Myrta Forastieri v. Eastern Air Lines, Inc., 18 Avi. 17,145 (D.P.R. 1983), a U.S. decision involving facts similar to the present case. In that case, the court held, at pp. 17,148-17,149 that:

> Irrespective of good faith or intent, in an instance wherein the corporation had a duty to pay out funds from designated proceeds but such proceeds were used for other purposes, the directors were held personally liable because they had a duty to see that the funds were used for the agreed-upon purpose and they could not excuse themselves on the grounds that they did not dissipate or misappropriate the funds nor were in other respects derelict in their duty. . . .
> We agree, therefore, that failure to remit funds collected by a corporate agent which belong to its principal airline gives rise to personal liability of those corporate employees who participate in the conversion. The imposition of such liability presumes, however, that the responsible persons actually had possession or control over the property such that it could be said that their conduct constitutes participation. Under the circumstances of the present case the joint control over the financial affairs and operations of this very closely held corporation by the two individual plaintiffs/counterdefendants supports a finding that if conversion occurred, it was a joint act of those two persons. They shared ownership of the corporation equally; they shared management of the business operations equally; they shared equally in the special compensation arrangements set up for themselves; and most important, they shared control over the corporate accounts since all checks issued required both their signatures. . . .

Griffiths J.A. concluded that Wawanesa v. Chalmers, Henry Electric Ltd. v. Farwell and Andrea Schmidt Construction Ltd. could not be distin-

Le juge Griffiths s'est aussi référé à l'affaire Myrta Forastieri c. Eastern Air Lines, Inc., 18 Avi. 17,145 (D.P.R. 1983), décision américaine portant sur des faits semblables à ceux de l'espèce. Dans cette affaire, la cour a décidé ce qui suit, aux pp. 17,148 et 17,149:

> Par conséquent, nous reconnaissons que cette omission par une société mandataire de verser les sommes perçues, qui appartiennent à la ligne aérienne mandante, fait jouer la responsabilité personnelle des employés de la société qui ont participé au détournement. L'attribution de cette responsabilité présuppose, cependant, que les responsables avaient effectivement la possession ou le contrôle des biens, de sorte qu'on pourrait dire que leur conduite constituait une participation. Dans les circonstances de l'espèce, le fait que les deux demandeurs/défendeurs reconventionnels exerçaient le contrôle conjoint des affaires financières et des activités de cette société à très peu d'actionnaires permet de conclure que s'il y a eu détournement, celui-ci a été une action conjointe de ces deux individus. Ils étaient propriétaires de la société à parts égales; ils partageaient également la gestion de l'entreprise; ils ont bénéficié également des arrangements spéciaux passés pour leur rémunération et, chose la plus importante, ils partageaient le contrôle des comptes de la société car tous les chèques tirés devaient porter la signature de chacun. . .

Le juge Griffiths a conclu qu'il n'y avait pas lieu d'opérer de distinction d'avec les décisions Wawanesa c. Chalmers, Henry Electric Ltd. c. Farwell et guished on the basis that the trust was created by statute. Instead, he held, at p. 203, that:

> What is significant in those cases is that the shareholders and directors that were held responsible were the sole owners and directors and were the sole directing and operating minds of the corporations. . . . For the purposes of this appeal, I adopt the reasoning of the United States District Court of Puerto Rico in Myrta Forastieri v. Eastern Air Lines, supra, that it is just and equitable to impose personal liability on directors who participate in the breach of trust by the corporation because, in effect, they have participated in a conversion of trust funds.

Griffiths J.A. then reviewed the facts which justified the imposition of personal liability in the case at bar. First, both Martin and Valliant had at least some control over the operation of the business, and both had signing authority. Second, it was Martin and Valliant as the operating minds of M & L who deposited the trust funds in the general operating account and paid operating expenses out of that account. Third, M & L had a duty to (at p. 204) "keep these monies separate, to earmark them as funds held for Air Canada and, at the very least, to advise the bank that such funds, separately maintained, were trust funds". Since this was not done, M & L committed a breach of trust. Finally, the Bank seized the funds from the account because Martin and Valliant had both stopped payment on cheques issued on the account: "The movement of these directors, acting solely in their own interest to stop payment on cheques, not only prevented payment on cheques issued to Air Canada, but precipitated the seizure by the bank of the only funds available in the unprotected general account" (p. 204). Therefore, Griffiths J.A. concluded at pp. 204-5:

> In my view, this is an appropriate case to impose personal liability on Martin and Valliant for the breach of trust. They were the sole owners and operating minds of the corporation. They directed and authorized the Andrea Schmidt Construction Ltd. parce que dans celles-ci, la fiducie avait été créée par une loi. Il a plutôt décidé ce qui suit, à la p. 203:

Le juge Griffiths a ensuite étudié les faits qui justifiaient l'attribution d'une responsabilité personnelle dans le cas qui nous occupe. Premièrement, Martin et Valliant exerçaient tous les deux un certain contrôle sur l'exploitation de l'entreprise et tous deux étaient signataires autorisés. Deuxièmement, ce sont Martin et Valliant, à titre d'âmes dirigeantes de M & L, qui déposaient les fonds en fiducie dans le compte d'affaires général et payaient les frais d'exploitation sur ce compte. Troisièmement, M & L avait l'obligation (à la p. 204) [TRADUCTION] «de garder ces sommes dans un compte distinct, d'indiquer que c'étaient des fonds détenus au nom d'Air Canada et, à tout le moins, d'aviser la banque que ces fonds, gardés séparément, étaient des fonds en fiducie». Comme cela n'a pas été fait, M & L a commis une violation de son obligation fiduciaire. Enfin, la banque a saisi les fonds dans le compte parce que Martin et Valliant avaient tous deux fait opposition aux chèques tirés sur ce compte: [TRADUCTION] «Le geste de ces administrateurs, agissant seulement dans leur propre intérêt pour faire opposition à des chèques, non seulement a empêché le paiement de chèques tirés à l'ordre d'Air Canada, mais a hâté la saisie par la banque des seuls fonds se trouvant dans le compte général non protégé» (p. 204). Par conséquent, le juge Griffiths a conclu, aux pp. 204 et 205:

deposit of funds from Air Canada sales in the general account without in any way designating these funds as trust funds. They permitted these funds to be intermingled with other funds and they drew cheques on these funds in complete disregard of the trust obligations imposed under the agreement with Air Canada, an agreement which conferred on the corporation of which they were the sole shareholders the important privilege of selling Air Canada tickets directly to the public. Martin and Valliant permitted Air Canada funds to be placed in a general account that was overdrawn without adequate controls and, in particular, without advising the bank that these funds were trust funds, with the result that these funds were exposed to appropriation by the bank to satisfy the corporation's loan guaranteed by Martin and Valliant. In failing to exercise proper control over the trust funds, both Martin and Valliant received a benefit in that their personal liability to the bank was extinguished.

The steps taken by Martin and Valliant to protect the interests of Air Canada were inept, and too little too late. In any event, these steps were taken to preserve the travel agency and not to protect Air Canada's interest. Griffiths J.A. therefore concluded that Martin and Valliant were both parties to the conversion of trust funds and should be held personally liable.

III. Issues

As mentioned at the outset, there are two main issues raised in this case. First, was the relationship between M & L and the respondent one of trust, or one of debtor and creditor? Second, if the relationship was one of trust, then under what circumstances can the directors of a corporation be held personally liable for breach of trust by the corporation, and are those circumstances present in this case?

IV. Analysis

1. The Nature of the Relationship between M & L and Air Canada

In this Court, the appellant initially argued that the relationship between M & L and the respon-la société. Ils ont dirigé et autorisé le dépôt des fonds produits par la vente de billets d'Air Canada dans le compte général sans indiquer d'aucune façon qu'il s'agissait de fonds en fiducie. Ils ont permis que ces fonds soient confondus avec d'autres et ils ont tiré des chèques sur ces fonds en passant outre aux obligations fiduciaires stipulées dans l'accord conclu avec Air Canada, qui accordait à la société, dont ils étaient les seuls actionnaires, le privilège important de vendre des billets d'Air Canada directement au public. Martin et Valliant ont permis que les fonds d'Air Canada soient placés dans un compte général qui a été mis à découvert sans contrôles suffisants et, en particulier, sans que la banque soit avisée que ces fonds étaient des fonds en fiducie, de telle sorte que la banque pouvait s'approprier ces fonds pour régler la dette de la société garantie par Martin et Valliant. En n'exerçant pas de contrôle adéquat sur les fonds en fiducie, Martin et Valliant ont reçu un avantage qui a consisté dans l'extinction de leur dette personnelle envers la banque.

Les moyens pris par Martin et Valliant pour protéger les intérêts d'Air Canada étaient ineptes et c'était trop peu trop tard. Quoi qu'il en soit, ils ont pris ces mesures pour préserver l'agence de voyages et non pour protéger l'intérêt d'Air Canada. Le juge Griffiths a donc conclu que Martin et Valliant avaient tous deux été parties au détournement des fonds en fiducie et devaient être tenus personnellement responsables.

III. Les questions en litige

Comme je l'ai dit au début, deux questions principales se posent dans le présent pourvoi. Premièrement, le rapport établi entre M & L et l'intimée constituait-il une fiducie ou une obligation entre débiteur et créancier? Deuxièmement, s'il s'agissait d'une fiducie, dans quelles circonstances les administrateurs d'une société peuvent-ils être tenus personnellement responsables de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire par la société, et ces circonstances existent-elles en l'espèce?

IV. Analyse

1. La nature du rapport entre M & L et Air Canada

Devant notre Cour, l'appelant a d'abord soutenu que le rapport entre M & L et la compagnie d'avia-

dent airline was one of debtor and creditor, rather than one of trust. However, at the hearing, the appellant properly conceded that the relationship was one of trust. Given this concession, I will consider this question only briefly.

The appellant relied on the fact that the agreement between the airline and M & L did not require it to keep the proceeds of Air Canada tickets in a separate account or trust fund, or to remit the funds forthwith. Rather, M & L was permitted to keep such funds for a period of up to 15 days, and then for a further 7-day grace period. Furthermore, M & L was liable for the total sale price of all tickets sold, less its commission, regardless of whether it had actually collected the full amount from its customers. That is, M & L was free to sell Air Canada tickets on credit to its customers. Prior to his concession on this point, the appellant submitted that, in these circumstances, M & L was not a trustee of the sale proceeds of the Air Canada tickets.

In concluding that the relationship between M & L and the airline was one of trust, the Court of Appeal relied on Canadian Pacific Air Lines, Ltd. v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (1987), 61 O.R. (2d) 233. Although the Court of Appeal's decision in that case (1990), 71 O.R. (2d) 63 (note), was brief, the reasons of the trial judge, at p. 237, went into greater depth:

> In order to constitute a trust, an arrangement must have three characteristics, known as the three certainties: certainty of intent, of subject-matter and of object. The agreement . . . is certain in its intent to create a trust. The subject-matter is to be the funds collected for ticket sales. The object, or beneficiary, of the trust is also clear; it is to be the airline. The necessary elements for the creation of a trust relationship are all present. I find that such a relationship did exist between CP and the two travel agencies.

This analysis is clearly applicable to the facts of the present case. That the intent of the agreement is to create a trust is evident from the following wording: "All monies, less applicable commistion intimée procédait d'une obligation entre débiteur et créancier et non d'une fiducie. Toutefois, à l'audience, l'appelant a concédé avec raison que c'était une fiducie. Étant donné cette concession, je ne vais dire que quelques mots sur cette question.

L'appelant a invoqué le fait que l'accord entre la ligne aérienne et M & L ne l'obligeait pas à garder le produit de la vente des billets d'Air Canada dans un compte distinct ou en fiducie, ou à remettre les fonds immédiatement. M & L pouvait, au lieu de cela, garder ces fonds pendant une période maximale de 15 jours, puis jouir d'un délai de grâce de sept jours. En outre, M & L était redevable du prix de vente total de tous les billets vendus, moins sa commission, peu importe qu'elle ait recouvré la somme complète de ses clients. C'est-à-dire qu'il était loisible à M & L de vendre des billets d'Air Canada à crédit à ses clients. Avant de faire sa concession sur ce point, l'appelant a soutenu que, vu ces circonstances, M & L n'était pas fiduciaire du produit de la vente des billets d'Air Canada.

Pour conclure à l'existence d'une fiducie entre M & L et la ligne aérienne, la Cour d'appel s'est appuyée sur l'arrêt Canadian Pacific Air Lines, Ltd. c. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (1987), 61 O.R. (2d) 233. Bien que la Cour d'appel ait rendu une décision brève dans cette affaire (1990), 71 O.R. (2d) 63 (note), les motifs du juge de première instance, à la p. 237, étaient plus détaillés:

Cette analyse s'applique clairement aux faits de la présente espèce. L'intention de créer une fiducie ressort à l'évidence du passage qui suit du contrat: «Toutes les sommes que l'Agent perçoit à l'égard sions to which the Agent is entitled hereunder, collected by the Agent for air passenger transportation (and for which the Agent has issued tickets or exchange orders) shall be the property of the Airline, and shall be held in trust by the Agent until satisfactorily accounted for to the airline." The object of the trust is the respondent airline, and its subject-matter is the funds collected for ticket sales.

While the presence or absence of a prohibition on the commingling of funds is a factor to be considered in favour of a debt relationship, it is not necessarily determinative. See R. v. Lowden (1981), 27 A.R. 91 (C.A.), at pp. 101-2; Bank of N.S. v. Soc. Gen. (Can.), [1984] 4 W.W.R. 232 (Alta. C.A.), at p. 238; McEachren v. Royal Bank (1990), 78 Alta. L.R. (2d) 158 (Q.B.), at p. 183; Stephens Travel Service International Pty. Ltd. v. Qantas Airways Ltd. (1988), 13 N.S.W.L.R. 331 (C.A.), at p. 341. In R. v. Lowden, supra, McGillivray C.J.A. stated as follows at pp. 101-2:

> Undoubtedly a direction that moneys are to be kept separate and apart is a strong indication of a trust relationship being created. It does not appear to me, however, that the converse is necessarily so. In the case of a travel agent, how he handled the funds handed to him for the purchase of a ticket would, as far as the public is concerned, be something that they would not have reason to think about. It would be a matter of internal management. The fact that there is no specific discussion about moneys being kept separate and apart from other moneys does not detract from the fact that the money is paid for a particular purpose, namely the obtaining of tickets for specific flights or reservations at named accommodation for a particular period.

The appellant relied on the decision of this Court in M. A. Hanna Co. v. Provincial Bank of Canada, [1935] S.C.R. 144. In that case, the Court dealt with the relationship between a supplier of coal and its sales agent. The Court concluded that the relationship was one of debtor-creditor, citing the fact that the parties had specifically cancelled a portion of their agreement requiring the separation of the funds collected by the sales agent. The sales du transport aérien de passagers (et pour lesquelles il a remis des billets ou des bons d'échange), moins les commissions applicables auxquelles il a droit conformément aux présentes, appartiennent à la Compagnie d'aviation, et l'Agent doit les détenir en fiducie, jusqu'à ce qu'il en ait rendu compte de façon satisfaisante à la compagnie d'aviation.» Le bénéficiaire est la compagnie d'aviation et les biens assujettis à la fiducie sont les fonds encaissés par suite de la vente de billets.

Certes, la présence ou l'absence d'une interdiction de regrouper les sommes est un facteur qui indique un lien de la nature d'une créance, mais il n'est pas nécessairement décisif. Voir R. c. Lowden (1981), 27 A.R. 91 (C.A.), aux pp. 101 et 102; Bank of N.S. c. Soc. Gen. (Can.), [1984] 4 W.W.R. 232 (C.A. Alb.), à la p. 238; McEachren c. Royal Bank (1990), 78 Alta. L.R. (2d) 158 (B.R.), à la p. 183; Stephens Travel Service International Pty. Ltd. c. Qantas Airways Ltd. (1988), 13 N.S.W.L.R. 331 (C.A.), à la p. 341. Dans l'arrêt R. c. Lowden, précité, le juge en chef McGillivray dit, aux pp. 101 et 102:

> [TRADUCTION] Sans aucun doute, s'il est stipulé que les fonds doivent être gardés dans des comptes distincts, il y a de fortes raisons d'inférer qu'une fiducie a été créée. Il ne me semble pas, cependant, que l'inverse soit nécessairement vrai. Dans le cas d'un agent de voyages, le public n'a aucune raison de se préoccuper de ce que l'agent fait de l'argent qui lui est versé à l'achat d'un billet. C'est une question de gestion interne. Le fait qu'on ne discute pas particulièrement de l'obligation de placer la somme dans un compte distinct n'enlève rien au fait que l'argent est versé à une fin précise, savoir l'obtention de billets en vue de vols déterminés ou de réservations dans des hôtels désignés pour une période donnée.

L'appelant s'est fondé sur l'arrêt de notre Cour M. A. Hanna Co. c. Provincial Bank of Canada, [1935] R.C.S. 144. Dans cet arrêt, la Cour a examiné le rapport entre un fournisseur de charbon et son représentant. Elle a conclu que leur lien était celui d'un débiteur et d'un créancier, citant le fait que les parties avaient expressément annulé une partie de leur convention qui stipulait la séparation des fonds encaissés par le représentant. Ce dernier agent paid the supplier by cheques drawn on its general account. The supplier's acquiescence to this practice, and the fact that the agent had use of the funds before payment came due, indicated to this Court that the parties viewed their relationship as one of debtor-creditor. The Court relied on the following passage from Henry v. Hammond, [1913] 2 K.B. 515, at p. 521:

> It is clear that if the terms upon which the person receives the money are that he is bound to keep it separate, either in a bank or elsewhere, and to hand that money so kept as a separate fund to the person entitled to it, then he is a trustee of that money and must hand it over to the person who is his cestui que trust. If on the other hand he is not bound to keep the money separate, but is entitled to mix it with his own money and deal with it as he pleases, and when called upon to hand over an equivalent sum of money, then, in my opinion, he is not a trustee of the money, but merely a debtor.

This decision was distinguished in Qantas, supra, at p. 348, by Hope J.A., dealing with facts similar to the present case:

> As it seems to me, . . . the decision . . . has no relevance to the circumstances of the present case where, on the proper construction of the agreement, a trust was expressly created, and where the distinction between an express and a constructive trust does not affect the resolution of the rights of the parties.

Since there was clear language in the agreement that the funds were to be held in trust, Hope J.A. remarked that there would have to be extremely strong indications to alter the plain meaning of those words. On the question of the commingling of funds, Hope J.A. stated at p. 341 that "I do not understand why the absence of an express separate account provision should cut down the effect of the express provision for a trust . . . ." This holding is consistent with the Canadian authorities. See R. v. Lowden, supra, at pp. 101-2; Bank of N.S. v. Soc. Gen. (Can.), supra, at p. 238; McEachren v. Royal Bank, supra, at p. 183.

payait le fournisseur par chèque tiré sur son compte général. L'acquiescement du fournisseur à cette pratique et le fait que le représentant avait l'usage des fonds avant l'échéance du versement indiquaient, de l'avis de la Cour, que les parties considéraient leur rapport comme celui d'un débiteur et d'un créancier. La Cour a invoqué le passage qui suit de l'arrêt Henry c. Hammond, [1913] 2 K.B. 515, à la p. 521:

Une distinction d'avec cet arrêt a été faite dans l'arrêt Qantas, précité, à la p. 348, par le juge Hope, qui traite de faits semblables à ceux de l'espèce:

Comme l'accord renfermait des termes clairs stipulant que les fonds devaient être détenus en fiducie, le juge Hope a fait remarquer qu'il faudrait de très fortes raisons pour modifier le sens évident de ces mots. Sur la question du regroupement des fonds, le juge Hope a dit, à la p. 341: [TRADUCTION] «Je ne comprends pas pourquoi l'absence d'une disposition explicite prévoyant un compte distinct devrait annihiler l'effet de la clause créant expressément une fiducie . . .» Cette conclusion est conforme à la jurisprudence canadienne. Voir R. c. Lowden, précité, aux pp. 101 et 102; Bank of N.S. c. Soc. Gen. (Can.), précité, à la p. 238, et McEachren c. Royal Bank, précité, à la p. 183.

The majority of U.S. cases have concluded that relationships similar to the one in the present case are trust relationships. See Air Traffic Conference v. Downtown Travel Center, Inc., 14 Avi. 17,172 (N.Y. 1976); Air Traffic Conference of America v. Worldmark Travel, Inc., 15 Avi. 18,483 (N.Y. 1980); Myrta Forastieri, supra.

However, a contrary finding was made in In re Morales Travel Agency, 667 F.2d 1069 (1st Cir. 1981), at pp. 1071-72, in which the court held that the terms of the IATA agreement between the airline and the travel agency were inadequate to give rise to a trust upon the proceeds from tickets sold by the agency to its customers:

To be sure, Resolution 820(a) recited, in general terms, that the agent was to hold whatever monies it collected in trust for the carrier until accounted for, and that these monies were the carrier's property until settlement occurred. However, talismanic language could not throw a protective mantle over these receipts in the absence of a genuine trust mechanism. Here the relationship remained in practical fact that of debtor-creditor. The contract nowhere required Morales to keep the proceeds of Eastern's ticket sales separate from any other funds, whether Morales' own funds or the proceeds of other airlines' ticket sales. Nor was any specific restriction placed upon Morales' use of the supposed trust funds. Morales was left free to use what it received for its own benefit rather than Eastern's, and to transform the receipts into assets with no apparent encumbrance, upon which potential creditors might rely. The use of the word "trust" and the designation of the airline as titleholder, in a contract which is not publicly filed, would not save potential creditors from relying on such assets as office equipment, accounts receivable, and a bank account solely in the name of the agency. In the absence of any provision requiring Morales to hold the funds in trust by keeping them separate, and otherwise restricting their use, the label "trust" could in these circumstances and for present purposes have no legal effect. See In re

Dans la majorité des précédents américains, les tribunaux ont conclu que les rapports semblables à celui analysé en l'espèce constituaient des fiducies: Air Traffic Conference c. Downtown Travel Center, Inc., 14 Avi. 17,172 (N.Y. 1976); Air Traffic Conference of America c. Worldmark Travel, Inc., 15 Avi. 18,483 (N.Y. 1980); Myrta Forastieri, précité.

Toutefois, la cour est arrivée à une conclusion contraire dans l'affaire In re Morales Travel Agency, 667 F.2d 1069 (1st Cir. 1981), aux pp. 1071 et 1072, dans laquelle elle a décidé que les termes employés dans la convention de l'ATAI entre la ligne aérienne et l'agence de voyages étaient insuffisants pour créer une fiducie à l'égard du produit de la vente de billets par l'agence à ses clients:

[TRADUCTION] Indiscutablement, la résolution 820*a*) stipulait, dans des termes généraux, que l'agent devait détenir toutes les sommes perçues en fiducie pour le transporteur jusqu'à ce qu'il en ait rendu compte et que ces sommes appartenaient au transporteur jusqu'au règlement de compte. Toutefois, aucun langage magique ne pouvait mettre les sommes encaissées à l'abri en l'absence d'un mécanisme fiduciaire véritable. En l'espèce, le rapport est resté en pratique celui d'un débiteur et d'un créancier. Le contrat ne comportait aucune clause obligeant Morales à garder dans un compte distinct le produit de la vente des billets d'Eastern et les autres fonds, qu'ils soient les siens propres ou ceux provenant de la vente de billets d'autres lignes aériennes. Et aucune disposition ne restreignait explicitement l'emploi que Morales pouvait faire des présumés fonds en fiducie. Morales avait toute latitude pour utiliser les sommes encaissées pour son propre bénéfice et non celui d'Eastern, et pour convertir les recettes en biens libres de toute charge apparente, sur lesquels des créanciers éventuels pourraient compter. L'emploi du mot «fiducie» et la désignation de la ligne aérienne comme titulaire du titre, dans un contrat qui n'est pas inscrit dans un registre public, n'empêcheraient pas les créanciers éventuels de compter sur les autres biens tels le matériel de bureau, les comptes débiteurs et un compte en banque ouvert au nom de l'agence seulement. Faute de disposition obligeant Morales à détenir les fonds en fiducie et à les déposer dans un compte distinct, et limitant leur utilisation, le terme «fiducie» ne peut, dans les circonstances et aux fins des présentes, avoir aucun effet en droit. Penn. Central Transportation Co., 328 F.Supp. 1278 (E.D.Pa. 1971); Scott on Trusts § 12.2 (3d ed.).

The Morales court relied on the District Court decision of In re Penn Central Transportation Co., 328 F.Supp. 1278 (Pa. 1971). This decision was subsequently reviewed by the U.S. Court of Appeals, 3rd Circuit, which concluded that a relationship of trust did exist, and that the commingling of funds was only one indication of a debtor-creditor relationship and was not necessarily conclusive (486 F.2d 519 (1973)). Rosenn J. held at p. 525 that the "[c]ommingling of monies has minimal significance in the extraordinary operations of interline railroads. . . . Normal operation conditions with innumerable daily collections of various categories preclude practically and economically any effective daily segregation [of funds]." The Morales decision and those which purport to follow it are therefore of questionable persuasion and contrary to other decisions.

In conclusion, it is well established that the nature of the relationship between the parties is a matter of intention. In the present case, the relationship of trust is further evidenced by the express prohibition restricting the use of the funds, and the supervision and control of the carrier over the financial dealings of M & L. Since there is clear evidence of intention to create a trust in the agreement between M & L and the respondent airline, the absence of a prohibition on the commingling of funds is not determinative, although it may be a factor to be taken into account by the trial judge, as it was here. Moreover, in the present case M & L acted in accordance with that intention and set up trust accounts, which, although never used, confirm that the relationship was viewed by the directors as a trust relationship. Finally, it must be noted that the nature of the relationship is consistent with trust as the IATA agreement allowed M & L to affect Air Canada's legal responsibilities.

Dans l'affaire Morales, la cour a invoqué la décision de la District Court In re Penn Central Transportation Co., 328 F.Supp. 1278 (Pa. 1971). Celle-ci a ensuite été révisée par la Court of Appeals des États-Unis, 3rd Circuit, qui a conclu à l'existence d'une fiducie et déclaré que le regroupement des fonds n'était qu'un facteur pouvant indiquer un rapport entre débiteur et créancier et qu'elle n'était pas nécessairement décisive (486 F.2d 519 (1973)). Le juge Rosenn a décidé, à la p. 525, que le [TRADUCTION] «. . . regroupement des sommes n'a qu'une importance minime dans les opérations extraordinaires des chemins de fer au chapitre du trafic interréseaux. [. . .] Les opérations ordinaires, qui comportent d'innombrables liaisons quotidiennes de diverses catégories, interdisent en pratique, et rendent non rentable, toute séparation réelle quotidienne [des fonds].» La décision Morales et celles qui sont censées la suivre ont donc un caractère persuasif discutable et sont contraires à d'autres décisions.

En conclusion, il est bien établi que la nature du rapport entre les parties dépend de leur intention. En l'espèce, l'existence d'une fiducie est étayée en outre par la limitation explicite de l'emploi des fonds et par la surveillance et le contrôle exercés par le transporteur sur les opérations financières de M & L. Comme l'intention de créer une fiducie est clairement exprimée dans le contrat entre M & L et la compagnie d'aviation intimée, l'absence d'interdiction de regrouper les fonds n'est pas déterminante, encore qu'elle puisse être un facteur dont le juge de première instance doit tenir compte, comme il l'a fait en l'espèce. Par surcroît, M & L a agi en l'espèce conformément à cette intention et a ouvert des comptes en fiducie qui, bien qu'ils n'aient pas été utilisés, confirment que le rapport était considéré par les administrateurs comme une fiducie. Enfin, il convient de faire remarquer que la nature du rapport est compatible avec l'existence d'une fiducie car l'accord de l'ATAI permettait à M & L d'influer sur les responsabilités juridiques d'Air Canada.

2. Personal Liability of the Directors as Constructive Trustees

(a) General Principles

Having found that the relationship between M & L and the respondent airline was a trust relationship, there is no question that M & L's actions were in breach of trust. M & L failed to account to the respondent for the monies collected through sales of Air Canada tickets. What remains to be decided is whether the directors of M & L should be held personally liable for the breach of trust on the basis that they were constructive trustees. Whether personal liability is imposed on a stranger to a trust depends on the basic question of whether the stranger's conscience is sufficiently affected to justify the imposition of personal liability. See In re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, [1987] Ch. 264, at p. 285. The authorities reflect distinct approaches to answer this question depending on the circumstances of the case, and it is to these that I shall now turn.

There are two general bases upon which a stranger to the trust can be held liable as a constructive trustee for breach of trust. First, although not directly relevant to this appeal, strangers to the trust can be liable as trustees de son tort. Such persons, although not appointed trustees, "take on themselves to act as such and to possess and administer trust property". See Selangor United Rubber Estates, Ltd. v. Cradock (No. 3), [1968] 2 All E.R. 1073, at p. 1095. In the Selangor case, Ungoed-Thomas J. went on to describe the distinguishing features of such constructive trustees:

> . . . (a) they do not claim to act in their own right but for the beneficiaries, and (b) their assumption to act is not of itself a ground of liability (save in the sense of course of liability to account and for any failure in the duty so assumed), and so their status as trustees precedes the

2. La responsabilité personnelle des administrateurs en qualité de fiduciaires par interprétation

a) Les principes généraux

Vu la conclusion que M & L et l'intimée étaient liées par une fiducie, il n'y a aucun doute que les actes de M & L constituaient une violation d'une obligation fiduciaire. M & L n'a pas rendu compte à l'intimée des sommes perçues par suite de la vente de ses billets. Il reste à décider si les administrateurs de M & L devraient être tenus personnellement responsables de violation d'une obligation fiduciaire à titre de fiduciaires par interprétation. La question de savoir si une responsabilité personnelle incombe à un tiers est subordonnée à la question fondamentale de savoir si la conscience du tiers est suffisamment en cause pour que soit justifiée l'attribution d'une responsabilité personnelle. Voir In re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, [1987] Ch. 264, à la p. 285. La jurisprudence et la doctrine apportent diverses solutions à ce problème selon les circonstances de chaque espèce. Ce sont ces solutions que j'étudierai maintenant.

Deux principes généraux régissent l'attribution à un tiers d'une responsabilité pour violation d'une obligation fiduciaire, en qualité de fiduciaire par interprétation. Premièrement, quoique cette situation ne soit pas directement pertinente en l'espèce, le tiers peut être tenu responsable à titre de fiduciaire «de son tort». En pareil cas, le tiers, bien qu'il n'ait pas été nommé fiduciaire [TRADUCTION] «prend sur lui d'agir comme fiduciaire et de détenir et d'administrer les biens en fiducie». Voir Selangor United Rubber Estates, Ltd. c. Cradock (No. 3), [1968] 2 All E.R. 1073, à la p. 1095. Dans cette affaire, le juge Ungoed-Thomas décrit les caractéristiques de ces fiduciaires par interprétation: occurrence which may be the subject of claim against them.

Thus a trustee de son tort will not be personally liable simply for the assumption of the duties of a trustee, but only if he or she commits a breach of trust while acting as a trustee. See Barnes v. Addy (1874), L.R. 9 Ch. App. 244; Underhill and Hayton, Law Relating to Trusts and Trustees (14th ed. 1987), at p. 351; Philip H. Pettit, Equity and the Law of Trusts (6th ed. 1989), at p. 152.

This type of liability is inapplicable to the present case because the directors of M & L did not personally take possession of trust property or assume the office or function of trustees. Both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal concluded that neither of the directors had assumed legal control or possession of the funds which were to be held in trust for the respondent airline. In the words of Griffiths J.A., at p. 193, "[s]uch funds were, at all material times, administered, at least, in the name of the corporation. Certainly, it cannot be said that either Martin or Valliant were administering the trust funds on behalf of the beneficiary Air Canada."

Second, strangers to the trust can also be personally liable for breach of trust if they knowingly participate in a breach of trust. The starting point for a review of the bases of this kind of personal liability is Barnes v. Addy, supra, which involved an estate, for which three trustees had been designated by the testator. The will allowed for the appointment of new trustees without the consent of any other party, but did not allow for a decrease in the number of trustees. Two of the trustees died and a rift developed between the family and the third trustee, who wished to retire. He instructed his solicitor to prepare an instrument appointing Barnes, who was the husband of one of the beneficiaries, as sole trustee. The solicitor advised him against having only one trustee, but prepared the instrument on the instructions of his client. Barnes' solicitor approved the appointment. Barnes invested the trust funds for his own purposes and que ne se produise le fait qui peut donner lieu à une demande dirigée contre eux.

Ainsi, un fiduciaire «de son tort» ne sera pas personnellement responsable simplement du fait qu'il s'est chargé des devoirs d'un fiduciaire, mais seulement s'il manque à une de ses obligations pendant qu'il agit comme fiduciaire. Voir Barnes c. Addy (1874), L.R. 9 Ch. App. 244; Underhill et Hayton, Law Relating to Trusts and Trustees (14e éd. 1987), à la p. 351; Philip H. Pettit, Equity and the Law of Trusts (6e éd. 1989), à la p. 152.

Ce type de responsabilité est inapplicable à la présente espèce parce que les administrateurs de M & L n'ont pas pris possession personnellement des biens en fiducie et ne se sont pas attribué la charge ou la fonction de fiduciaire. Le juge de première instance et la Cour d'appel ont conclu qu'aucun des administrateurs ne s'était attribué le contrôle ou la possession des fonds qui devaient être détenus en fiducie pour le bénéfice de la compagnie d'aviation intimée. Pour citer les propos du juge Griffiths, à la p. 193, [TRADUCTION] «[c]es fonds ont été, à toutes les époques en cause, administrés au moins, au nom de la société. On ne peut certainement pas dire que Martin ou Valliant ait administré les fonds en fiducie pour le compte de la bénéficiaire Air Canada».

Deuxièmement, une responsabilité personnelle peut incomber à un tiers en cas de manquement à une obligation fiduciaire s'il participe sciemment à ce manquement. Le point de départ de l'examen du fondement de ce type de responsabilité personnelle est l'arrêt Barnes c. Addy, précité, qui portait sur une succession à l'égard de laquelle le testateur avait désigné trois fiduciaires. Le testament permettait la nomination de nouveaux fiduciaires sans le consentement de qui que ce soit, mais ne permettait pas la réduction du nombre de fiduciaires. Deux des fiduciaires sont décédés et un désaccord a opposé la famille et le troisième fiduciaire, qui a voulu se démettre. Celui-ci a donné à son avocat le mandat de rédiger un acte nommant Barnes, qui était l'époux de l'une des bénéficiaires, seul fiduciaire. L'avocat lui a déconseillé de nommer un seul fiduciaire, mais il a rédigé l'acte suivant les instructions de son client. L'avocat de Barnes a went bankrupt. The beneficiaries sued the previous trustee, his solicitor and Barnes' solicitor for breach of trust. The action against the solicitors was dismissed on the basis that they had no knowledge of, or any reason to suspect, a dishonest design in the transaction, and that they did not receive any trust property.

Lord Selborne L.C., at pp. 251-52, set out the ways in which a non-trustee can become responsible for a trust:

> Those who create a trust clothe the trustee with a legal power and control over the trust property, imposing on him a corresponding responsibility. That responsibility may no doubt be extended in equity to others who are not properly trustees, if they are found either making themselves trustees de son tort, or actually participating in any fraudulent conduct of the trustee to the injury of the cestui que trust. But, on the other hand, strangers are not to be made constructive trustees merely because they act as the agents of trustees in transactions within their legal powers, transactions, perhaps of which a Court of Equity may disapprove, unless those agents receive and become chargeable with some part of the trust property, or unless they assist with knowledge in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees.

In addition to a trustee de son tort, there were traditionally therefore two ways in which a stranger to the trust could be held personally liable to the beneficiaries as a participant in a breach of trust: as one in receipt and chargeable with trust property and as one who knowingly assisted in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees. The former category of constructive trusteeship has been termed "knowing receipt" or "knowing receipt and dealing", while the latter category has been termed "knowing assistance".

The former category of "knowing receipt" of trust property is inapplicable to the present case because it requires the stranger to the trust to have approuvé la nomination. Barnes a placé les fonds en fiducie pour son propre bénéfice et a fait faillite. Les bénéficiaires ont poursuivi le fiduciaire précédent, son avocat et l'avocat de Barnes en violation d'une obligation fiduciaire. L'action contre les avocats a été rejetée parce qu'ils n'avaient pas eu connaissance, ou qu'ils n'avaient aucune raison de soupçonner, de dessein malhonnête et qu'ils ne s'étaient vu confier aucun bien en fiducie.

Le lord chancelier Selborne expose, aux pp. 251 et 252, les manières dont une responsabilité pour une fiducie peut incomber à une personne qui n'est pas fiduciaire:

Outre le cas du fiduciaire «de son tort», il y avait donc traditionnellement deux manières dont un tiers pouvait être tenu personnellement responsable envers les bénéficiaires à titre de participant à la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire: soit parce qu'il avait reçu des biens en fiducie et devait en rendre compte, soit parce qu'il avait sciemment aidé les fiduciaires à réaliser un dessein malhonnête et frauduleux. La première catégorie de fiducie par interprétation a été appelée «réception en connaissance de cause» ou «réception en connaissance de cause et gestion», tandis que la seconde a été appelée «aide apportée en connaissance de cause».

La première catégorie, savoir la «réception en connaissance de cause» de biens en fiducie, est inapplicable en l'espèce parce qu'elle exige que le received trust property in his or her personal capacity, rather than as an agent of the trustees. See Baden, Delvaux & Lecuit v. Société Générale pour Favoriser le Développement du Commerce et de l'Industrie en France S.A., [1983] B.C.L.C. 325 (Ch.), appeal dismissed, [1985] B.C.L.C. 258 (C.A.); International Sales and Agencies Ltd. v. Marcus, [1982] 3 All E.R. 551; Karak Rubber Co. v. Burden (No. 2), [1972] 1 All E.R. 1210 (Ch.), at pp. 1234-35; Belmont Finance Corp. v. Williams Furniture Ltd. (No. 1), [1979] 1 All E.R. 118 (C.A.), at pp. 129, 134; Underhill, supra, at p. 360; Pettit, supra, at pp. 159-60. See, contra, Lee v. Sankey (1873), L.R. 15 Eq. 204. As I have already noted, the courts below found that the directors of M & L did not personally control the trust funds in the present case, and this finding was not challenged before us.

Thus the only basis upon which the directors could be held personally liable as constructive trustees is under the "knowing assistance" head of liability. To repeat, in Barnes v. Addy, supra, at p. 252, Lord Selborne L.C. stated that persons who "assist with knowledge in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees" will be liable for the breach of trust as constructive trustees. See also, Soar v. Ashwell, [1893] 2 Q.B. 390 (C.A.). This basis of liability raises two main issues: the nature of the breach of trust and the degree of knowledge required of the stranger.

(b) Degree of Knowledge of the Stranger

The latter point may be quickly addressed. The knowledge requirement for this type of liability is actual knowledge; recklessness or wilful blindness will also suffice. See Belmont Finance, supra, at pp. 130, 136; In re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, supra, at pp. 271-72; 285; Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Herbert Smith & Co. (No. 2), [1969] 2 All E.R. 367 (C.A.), at p. 379. In the latter case, Sachs L.J. stated that to be held liable the stranger must have tiers ait reçu des biens en fiducie de son propre chef et non en qualité de mandataire des fiduciaires. Voir Baden, Delvaux & Lecuit c. Société Générale pour Favoriser le Développement du Commerce et de l'Industrie en France S.A., [1983] B.C.L.C. 325 (Ch.), appel rejeté [1985] B.C.L.C. 258 (C.A.); International Sales and Agencies Ltd. c. Marcus, [1982] 3 All E.R. 551; Karak Rubber Co. c. Burden (No. 2), [1972] 1 All E.R. 1210 (Ch.), aux pp. 1234 et 1235; Belmont Finance Corp. c. Williams Furniture Ltd. (No. 1), [1979] 1 All E.R. 118 (C.A.), aux pp. 129 et 134; Underhill, op. cit., à la p. 360; Pettit, op. cit., aux pp. 159 et 160. Voir, pour une opinion contraire, Lee c. Sankey (1873), L.R. 15 Eq. 204. Je le répète, les tribunaux d'instance inférieure ont conclu que les administrateurs de M & L ne contrôlaient pas personnellement les fonds en fiducie dans la présente espèce, et cette conclusion n'a pas été attaquée devant nous.

En conséquence, une responsabilité personnelle ne peut être attribuée aux administrateurs, en qualité de fiduciaires par interprétation, que s'ils ont apporté une aide «en connaissance de cause». Comme nous l'avons vu, le lord chancelier Selborne a dit, dans l'arrêt Barnes c. Addy, précité, à la p. 252, que les personnes qui «aident sciemment les fiduciaires à réaliser un dessein malhonnête et frauduleux» seront tenus responsables de violation d'une obligation fiduciaire, en qualité de fiduciaires par interprétation. Voir aussi l'arrêt Soar c. Ashwell, [1893] 2 Q.B. 390 (C.A.). La responsabilité qui repose sur ce fondement soulève deux questions principales: la nature de la violation de l'obligation fiduciaire, et le degré de connaissance exigé du tiers.

b) Le degré de connaissance du tiers

Je vais disposer brièvement de ce dernier point. La connaissance requise pour ce type de responsabilité est la connaissance de fait; l'insouciance ou l'ignorance volontaire suffiront également. Voir Belmont Finance, précité, aux pp. 130 et 136; In re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, précité, aux pp. 271, 272 et 285; Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung c. Herbert Smith & Co. (No. 2), [1969] 2 All E.R. 367 (C.A.), à la p. 379. Dans cette dernière affaire, le lord juge Sachs had "both actual knowledge of the trust's existence and actual knowledge that what is being done is improperly in breach of that trust — though, of course, in both cases a person wilfully shutting his eyes to the obvious is in no different position than if he had kept them open." Whether the trust is created by statute or by contract may have an impact on the question of the stranger's knowledge of the trust. If the trust was imposed by statute, then he or she will be deemed to have known of it. If the trust was contractually created, then whether the stranger knew of the trust will depend on his or her familiarity or involvement with the contract.

a dit que, pour être tenu responsable, le tiers doit avoir [TRADUCTION] «à la fois la connaissance de fait de l'existence de la fiducie et la connaissance de fait du caractère répréhensible du manquement à la fiducie — encore que, bien entendu, dans les deux cas, la situation de celui qui nie l'évidence et de celui qui l'admet ne soit pas différente». Selon que la fiducie a été créée par une loi ou par un contrat, on ne donnera pas la même réponse à la question de savoir si le tiers savait qu'il y avait une fiducie. En cas de fiducie en vertu d'une loi, il est réputé le savoir. En cas de fiducie conventionnelle, la question de savoir si le tiers était au courant de la fiducie dépend de sa connaissance du contrat ou de sa participation à celui-ci.

If the stranger received a benefit as a result of the breach of trust, this may ground an inference that the stranger knew of the breach. See Shields v. Bank of Ireland, [1901] 1 I.R. 222, at p. 228; Gray v. Johnston (1868), L.R. 3 H.L. 1, at p. 11, per Lord Cairns, L.C.; Selangor, supra, at p. 1101; Coleman v. Bucks and Oxon Union Bank, [1897] 2 Ch. 243, at p. 254; Waters, supra, at p. 401; Fonthill Lbr. Ltd. v. Bk. Montreal, [1959] O.R. 451 (C.A.), at p. 468; Groves-Raffin Construction Ltd. v. Bank of Nova Scotia (1975), 64 D.L.R. (3d) 78 (B.C.C.A.), at pp. 116-17. The receipt of a benefit will be neither a sufficient nor a necessary condition for the drawing of such an inference.

Si le tiers a tiré avantage de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire, on peut en inférer qu'il était au courant de la violation. Voir Shields c. Bank of Ireland, [1901] 1 I.R. 222, à la p. 228; Gray c. Johnston (1868), L.R. 3 H.L. 1, à la p. 11, le lord chancelier Cairns; Selangor, précité, à la p. 1101; *Coleman c. Le fait de tirer avantage n'est ni une condition suffisante ni une condition nécessaire pour qu'une telle inférence soit justifiée.

The reason for excluding constructive knowledge (that is, knowledge of circumstances which would indicate the facts to an honest person, or knowledge of facts which would put an honest person on inquiry) was discussed in In re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, supra, at pp. 271-73, 275-85. Megarry V.-C. held, at p. 285, that constructive notice was insufficient to bind the stranger's conscience so as to give rise to personal liability. While cases involving recklessness or wilful blindness indicate a "want of probity which justifies imposing a constructive trust", Megarry V.-C., at p. 285, held that the carelessness involved in constructive knowledge cases will not normally amount to a want of probity, and will therefore be insufficient to bind the stranger's conscience. See

La raison pour laquelle la connaissance présumée est exclue (c'est-à-dire la connaissance de circonstances dont une personne honnête déduirait les faits ou la connaissance de faits qui inciteraient une personne honnête à demander des renseignements) a été examinée dans l'affaire In re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, précité, aux pp. 271 à 273, et 275 à 285. Le vice-chancelier Megarry a décidé, à la p. 285, que la connaissance présumée était insuffisante pour que la conscience d'un tiers soit en cause au point qu'il puisse être tenu personnellement responsable. Certes, en cas d'insouciance ou d'ignorance volontaire, on peut déduire une [TRADUCTION] «absence de probité qui justifie l'attribution d'une fiducie par interprétation», mais le vice-chancelier Megarry a conclu, à la p. 285, que

(c) Nature of the Breach of Trust

With regard to the first issue, the nature of the breach of trust, the authorities can be divided into two lines. Most of the English authorities have followed the Barnes v. Addy standard which requires participation by the stranger in a dishonest and fraudulent design. See Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung, supra, at p. 379; Belmont Finance, supra, at p. 135; Pettit, supra, at pp. 154-56; Underhill, supra, at pp. 355-57. An extensive review of the authorities was undertaken by Ungoed-Thomas J. in the Selangor case. He concluded as follows at pp. 1104-5:

I come to the third element, "dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees". I have already indicated my view, for reasons already given, that this must be understood in accordance with equitable principles for equitable relief.

I therefore cannot accept the suggestion that, because an action is not of such a dishonest and fraudulent nature as to amount to some crime, that it is not fraudulent and dishonest in the eyes of equity — or that an intention eventually to restore or give value for property — which it was suggested might provide a good defence to a criminal charge — would of itself make its appropriation and use in the meantime, with its attendant risks and deprivation of the true owner, unobjectionable in equity, and thus make what would otherwise be dishonest and fraudulent free from such objection.

It was suggested for the plaintiff company that "fraudulent" imports the element of loss into what is dishonest, so that the phrase means dishonest resulting in loss to the claimant. It seems to me unnecessary and, indeed, undesirable to attempt to define "dishonest and le manque de diligence démontrée dans les cas où il y a connaissance présumée n'équivaut normalement pas à un manque de probité et sera, par conséquent, insuffisant pour que la conscience du tiers puisse être mise en cause. Karpnale Ltd.*, [1992] 4 All E.R. 331 (B.R.), aux pp. 341 à 349 et 351 à 357, inf. en partie par [1992] 4 All E.R. 409 (C.A.), aux pp. 416 à 418, inf. en partie pour d'autres motifs par [1992] 4 All E.R. 512 (H.L.).

c) La nature de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire

Pour ce qui est de la première question, la nature de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire, la jurisprudence et la doctrine peuvent être divisées en deux écoles. La plupart des arrêts et des ouvrages anglais ont suivi la norme de l'arrêt Barnes c. Addy qui exige la participation du tiers à la réalisation d'un dessein malhonnête et frauduleux. Voir Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung, précité, à la p. 379; Belmont Finance, précité, à la p. 135; Pettit, op. cit., aux pp. 154 à 156; Underhill, op. cit., aux pp. 355 à 357. Le juge Ungoed-Thomas a fait un examen approfondi de la jurisprudence et de la doctrine dans l'affaire Selangor. Il conclut, aux pp. 1104 et 1105:

Je ne peux donc pas accepter l'argument que, parce qu'une action n'est pas malhonnête et frauduleuse au point d'équivaloir à un crime, elle n'est pas malhonnête et frauduleuse au regard de l'equity — ou que l'intention de restituer les biens ou d'en rembourser le prix plus tard — qui, selon ce qu'on a prétendu, pourrait être une défense valable contre une accusation criminelle — rend en soi l'appropriation et l'utilisation dans l'intervalle, malgré les risques qu'elles comportent et la privation subie par le véritable propriétaire, acceptables au regard de l'equity, et rend par conséquent irréprochable ce qui serait par ailleurs malhonnête et frauduleux.

On a fait valoir au nom de la société demanderesse que le terme «frauduleux» ajoute à ce qui est malhonnête l'élément de perte, de sorte que l'expression signifie malhonnête et causant une perte au demandeur. Il ne me semble pas utile, et même il me semble peu souhaifraudulent design", since a definition in vacuo, without the advantage of all the circumstances that might occur in cases that might come before the court, might be to restrict their scope by definition without regard to, and in ignorance of, circumstances which should patently come within them. The words themselves are not terms of art and are not taken from a statute or other document demanding construction. They are used in a judgment as the expression and indication of an equitable principle and not in a document as constituting or demanding verbal application and, therefore, definition. They are to be understood "according to the plain principles of a court of equity" to which SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, V.-C., referred [in Bodenham v. Hoskins, (1852), 21 L.J.Ch. at p. 873; [1843-60] All E.R. Rep. at p. 697], and these principles, in this context at any rate, are just plain, ordinary commonsense. I accept that "dishonest and fraudulent", so understood, is certainly conduct which is morally reprehensible; but what is morally reprehensible is best left open to identification and not to be confined by definition.

table, de tenter de définir l'expression «dessein malhonnête et frauduleux», puisqu'en donnant une définition dans l'abstrait, sans référence à toutes les circonstances que les tribunaux pourraient avoir à apprécier dans les litiges dont ils seraient saisis, l'on pourrait restreindre la portée de ces termes sans prendre en considération et sans connaître les circonstances qui devraient manifestement être visées par ceux-ci. Ce ne sont pas des termes techniques et ils ne sont pas tirés de textes de loi ou d'autres documents qu'il faut interpréter. Ils sont employés dans un jugement qui traite d'un principe d'equity et non dans un document qui constitue ou qui nécessite une interprétation et, par conséquent, une définition. Ils doivent être interprétés «selon les principes ordinaires d'une cour d'equity» dont parlait SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, vice-chancelier [dans l'arrêt Bodenham c. Hoskins, (1852), 21 L.J.Ch. à la p. 873; [1843-60] All E.R. Rep., à la p. 697], et ces principes, dans le présent contexte en tout cas, représentent le simple bon sens. Je conviens que les mots «malhonnête et frauduleux», ainsi compris, désignent une conduite moralement répréhensible; mais il vaut mieux identifier dans chaque cas ce qui est moralement répréhensible que de le restreindre par une définition.

If and so far as Ungoed-Thomas J intended, as I think he did, to say that it is not necessary that the breach of trust in respect of which it is sought to make the defendant liable as a constructive trustee should be fraudulent or dishonest, I respectfully cannot accept that view. I agree that it would be dangerous and wrong to depart from the safe path of the principle as stated by Lord Selborne LC [in Barnes v. Addy, supra] to the uncharted sea of something not innocent (and counsel for the plaintiff conceded that mere innocence would not do) but still short of dishonesty.

In my judgment, therefore, it was necessary in this case . . . to prove, that the breach of trust by the directors [who were the trustees] was dishonest.

In the same case, Buckley L.J. stated at p. 130:

Dans l'arrêt Belmont Finance, précité, à la p. 135, le lord juge Goff analyse le point de vue du juge Ungoed-Thomas dans l'affaire Selangor, précitée:

[TRADUCTION] Si, et dans la mesure où, le juge Ungoed-Thomas a voulu, comme je crois qu'il l'a voulu, dire qu'il n'est pas nécessaire que la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire pour laquelle on veut attribuer au défendeur une responsabilité à titre de fiduciaire par interprétation, soit malhonnête et frauduleuse, je dois malheureusement exprimer mon désaccord. Je conviens qu'il serait dangereux et erroné de s'écarter du principe prudent qu'a énoncé le lord chancelier Selborne [dans l'arrêt Barnes c. Addy, précité] pour adopter le concept inexploré de ce qui n'est pas innocent (et l'avocat de la demanderesse a concédé que la simple innocence ne suffirait pas) mais n'équivaut pas à de la malhonnêteté.

À mon sens, par conséquent, il était nécessaire en l'espèce [. . .] de prouver que la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire par les administrateurs [qui étaient les fiduciaires] était malhonnête.

Dans le même arrêt, le lord juge Buckley dit, à la p. 130:

1993 CanLII 33 (SCC)

. . . I do not myself see that any distinction is to be drawn between the words 'fraudulent' and 'dishonest'; I think they mean the same thing, and to use the two of them together does not add to the extent of dishonesty required.

The plaintiff has contended that in every case the court should consider whether the conduct in question was so unsatisfactory, whether it can be strictly described as fraudulent or dishonest in law, as to make accountability on the footing of constructive trust equitably just. This, as I have said, is admitted to constitute an extension of the rule as formulated by Lord Selborne LC [in Barnes v. Addy, supra]. That formulation has stood for more than 100 years. To depart from it now would, I think, introduce an undesirable degree of uncertainty to the law, because if dishonesty is not to be the criterion, what degree of unethical conduct is to be sufficient? I think we should adhere to the formula used by Lord Selborne LC. So in my judgment the design must be shown to be a dishonest one, that is to say, a fraudulent one.

In the oft-cited case of Baden, Delvaux, supra, at p. 406, Peter Gibson J. reviewed the authorities on this point:

As to the second element the relevant design on the part of the trustee must be dishonest and fraudulent. In Selangor [1968] 2 All ER 1073 at 1098, 1104 Ungoed-Thomas J held that this element must be understood in accordance with equitable principles for equitable relief and that conduct which is morally reprehensible can properly be said to be dishonest and fraudulent for the purposes of that element. But in Belmont Finance Corp Ltd v Williams Furniture Ltd [1979] Ch 250 the Court of Appeal made clear that it is not sufficient that there should be misfeasance or a breach of trust falling short of dishonesty and fraud. For present purposes there is no distinction to be drawn between the two adjectives 'dishonest' and 'fraudulent' (see Belmont at 267). It is common ground between the parties that I can take as a relevant description of fraud 'the taking of a risk to the prejudice of another's rights, which risk is known to be one which there is no right to take' (R v Sinclair [1968] 3 All ER 241).

La société demanderesse a soutenu que le tribunal doit dans tous les cas décider si la conduite en cause a été tellement peu satisfaisante, qu'elle puisse ou non être qualifiée strictement de frauduleuse ou de malhonnête en droit, qu'il est juste selon l'equity d'attribuer la responsabilité sur la base de la fiducie par interprétation. On a reconnu, je le répète, que c'était là une extension de la règle énoncée par le lord chancelier Selborne [dans l'arrêt Barnes c. Addy, précité]. Or, cet énoncé a résisté pendant plus d'un siècle. S'en écarter aujourd'hui introduirait, à mon avis, un degré inacceptable d'incertitude dans le droit parce que, si la malhonnêteté n'est pas le critère, quel degré de conduite contraire à l'éthique sera suffisant? Je pense que nous devons nous en tenir à la formulation du lord chancelier Selborne. En conséquence, il faut prouver, à mon sens, que le dessein était malhonnête, c'est-à-dire frauduleux.

Dans l'affaire souvent citée Baden, Delvaux, précitée, le juge Peter Gibson passe en revue la jurisprudence sur ce point, à la p. 406:

[TRADUCTION] Quant au deuxième élément, le dessein en cause du fiduciaire doit être malhonnête et frauduleux. Dans l'affaire Selangor [1968] 2 All ER 1073, aux pp. 1098 et 1104, le juge Ungoed-Thomas a conclu que cet élément devait être interprété selon les principes de l'equity applicables à la réparation fondée sur l'equity et qu'une conduite moralement répréhensible pouvait à bon droit être tenue pour malhonnête et frauduleuse aux fins de cet élément. Mais dans l'arrêt Belmont Finance Corp Ltd c Williams Furniture Ltd [1979] Ch 250, la Cour d'appel a bien précisé que l'atteinte à un droit ou une violation d'une obligation fiduciaire qui n'équivaut pas à la malhonnêteté et à la fraude n'était pas suffisante. Aux fins des présentes, aucune distinction ne s'impose entre les deux adjectifs «malhonnête» et «frauduleux» (voir l'arrêt Belmont, à la p. 267). Les parties s'entendent pour dire que je peux considérer applicable la définition suivante de la fraude: «le fait de courir un risque au détriment des droits d'autrui, lorsque l'on court ce risque sciemment et sans droit» (R c Sinclair [1968] 3 All ER 241).

The English "fraudulent and dishonest design" analysis was adopted by the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in MacDonald v. Hauer (1976), 72 D.L.R. (3d) 110. In that case, one of the trustees opened a margin account in his own name for the purpose of securities trading. He pledged securities belonging to the estate for which he was trustee with a broker as security for the margin, and gave his business associate Hauer his power of attorney on the account. The profits on the account were to be shared equally between the trustee and Hauer. The estate's securities were eventually sold by Hauer. Bayda J.A. (as he then was) found Hauer liable in equity for breach of trust as a constructive trustee. Relying on Barnes v. Addy, supra, Bayda J.A. held at p. 121 that the three essential elements for finding a stranger to a trust to be a constructive trustee were: "(1) assistance by the stranger of a nominated trustee (2) with knowledge (3) in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the nominated trustee (or fraudulent or dishonest disposition of the trust property)", although it should be noted that Bayda J.A. appears later in his analysis also to rely on a passage from Selangor, supra, which is characteristic of the second approach, discussed below.

Barnes v. Addy was also followed in Scott v. Riehl (1958), 15 D.L.R. (2d) 67 (B.C.S.C.). In that case, the two defendants were the directors of a construction company. The directors had failed to comply with the provisions of the Mechanics' Lien Act, 1956, S.B.C. 1956, c. 27, requiring certain monies to be held in trust. All monies received were deposited into one bank account, which was always overdrawn. The director and president of the corporation, Riehl, "knew that monies deposited, such as those received from the plaintiffs, must [not] be used for the general purposes of the company in abuse of the trust created by s. 3 of the Act. He knowingly created, maintained and operated this unlawful system. The company was the instrument of its operation, but he was the direc-

Le point de vue anglais sur le «dessein malhonnête et frauduleux» a été repris par la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan dans l'arrêt MacDonald c. Hauer (1976), 72 D.L.R. (3d) 110. Dans cette affaire, l'un des fiduciaires avait ouvert un compte sur marge à son propre nom pour faire des opérations sur titres. Il a laissé en gage au courtier, pour garantir la marge, des titres appartenant à la succession dont il était le fiduciaire et il a donné à son associé Hauer une procuration à l'égard du compte. Le fiduciaire et Hauer devaient partager à parts égales les profits tirés du compte. Hauer a finalement vendu les titres de la succession. Le juge Bayda (maintenant Juge en chef de la Saskatchewan) a déclaré que Hauer était responsable en equity de violation d'une obligation fiduciaire en qualité de fiduciaire par interprétation. S'appuyant sur l'arrêt Barnes c. Addy, précité, le juge Bayda a conclu, à la p. 121, que les trois éléments essentiels pour conclure qu'un tiers était fiduciaire par interprétation étaient les suivants: [TRADUCTION] «(1) le tiers a apporté son aide à un fiduciaire désigné; (2) il a agi en connaissance de cause; (3) le fiduciaire désigné avait un dessein malhonnête et frauduleux (ou il a aliéné les biens en fiducie de façon frauduleuse ou malhonnête)», mais il y a lieu de noter que, plus loin dans son analyse, il semble aussi s'être appuyé sur un extrait de l'affaire Selangor, précitée, qui est caractéristique de la seconde démarche examinée ci-dessous.

L'arrêt Barnes c. Addy a aussi été suivi dans l'affaire Scott c. Riehl (1958), 15 D.L.R. (2d) 67 (C.S.C.-B.). Dans cette affaire, les deux défendeurs étaient les administrateurs d'une société de construction. Les administrateurs n'avaient pas respecté les dispositions de la Mechanics' Lien Act, 1956, S.B.C. 1956, ch. 27, qui prescrivaient que certaines sommes soient détenues en fiducie. Toutes les sommes perçues étaient déposées dans un compte en banque, qui était toujours à découvert. Riehl, administrateur et président de la société, [TRADUCTION] «savait que les sommes déposées, notamment celles reçues des demandeurs, [ne] devaient [pas] être affectées aux activités générales de la société, en contravention de la fiducie créée par l'art. 3 de la Loi. Il a sciemment tor" (p. 70). Wilson J. (as he then was) concluded at pp. 73-74 as follows:

> . . . on the facts here Riehl, as agent received and misdirected trust funds. The acts of reception and application of these particular monies may not physically have been his, but they were entirely directed by him, with the possible, although not proven, collusion of the defendant Schumak. Riehl received a benefit, through the payment of his salary out of the account into which these trust funds were paid. His complicity in the misappropriation of these funds is proven; it was not an act of negligence or a mistake of judgment but a wrongful act knowingly done. In these circumstances not only the principal but the agent is liable.
> I have not ignored the numerous cases cited to me by defence counsel in which it has been held that directors are not personally responsible to strangers for acts done by them on behalf of the company but are at most responsible to the company. I only say that none of these cases goes so far as to say that where a fraudulent breach of trust known by the director to be fraudulent, is done by the company at his direction, so that he is not only a party to but the instigator of the fraudulent breach of trust and benefits from the breach of trust he is not to be held liable.

In Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Co., supra, the defendant corporation Chalmers was the agent of the plaintiff insurance company, Wawanesa. The defendant Mislowski was the sole shareholder, president, general manager, and the only active director of Chalmers. There was no written agency agreement between Chalmers and Wawanesa, but a provision in The Saskatchewan Insurance Act, R.S.S. 1960, c. 77, provided that an agent who received monies as premiums for a contract of insurance was "deemed to hold the premium in trust for the insurer" and liable to pay out to the insurer such monies less commission within 15 days after demand. The insurance company sued both the corporation and Mislowski for unpaid insurance premiums collected by the corporation, créé, maintenu et fait fonctionner ce système illégal. C'est par l'entremise de la société qu'il l'a fait fonctionner, mais il en était l'administrateur» (p. 70). Le juge Wilson (plus tard Juge en chef de la Cour suprême de la C.-B.) a conclu, aux pp. 73 et 74:

> J'ai tenu compte des nombreux précédents cités par l'avocat de la défense dans lesquels les tribunaux ont décidé que les administrateurs ne sont pas personnellement responsables envers les tiers des actes qu'ils ont accomplis au nom de la société, mais que tout au plus, une responsabilité envers la société leur incombe. Je dis seulement qu'aucune de ces décisions ne va jusqu'à dire que, si une violation frauduleuse d'une obligation fiduciaire, dont l'administrateur connaît le caractère frauduleux, est commise par la société sous sa direction, de sorte qu'il est non seulement partie à la violation, mais encore l'instigateur de la violation frauduleuse d'une obligation fiduciaire et qu'il en tire avantage, il ne doit pas être tenu responsable.

Dans l'affaire Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Co., précitée, la société Chalmers, défenderesse, était un agent de la compagnie d'assurances demanderesse, Wawanesa. Le défendeur Mislowski était le seul actionnaire, président, directeur général et le seul administrateur actif de Chalmers. Aucun contrat d'agence écrit ne liait Chalmers et Wawanesa, mais une clause de The Saskatchewan Insurance Act, R.S.S. 1960, ch. 77, portait qu'un agent qui recevait des sommes au titre de primes d'assurance était [TRADUCTION] «réputé détenir la prime en fiducie pour le bénéfice de l'assureur» et était tenu de verser ces sommes à l'assureur, une fois les commissions soustraites, dans un délai de 15 jours après en avoir reçu la demande. La compagnie d'assurances a poursuivi la société et Mislowski which had been deposited into the corporation's general account from which office expenses and salaries had been paid. Mislowski also had a construction business with a separate general account, but he constantly transferred funds between the insurance and construction accounts. The trial judge held the corporation liable for breach of trust, and then proceeded to discuss the liability of Mislowski at p. 287:

> The conversion of the trust funds to other purposes was a wrongful and illegal act or series of acts. There can be no doubt that the breach was inspired and directed by Mislowski who made all the corporate decisions. See Underhill's Law Relating to Trusts & Trustees, 11th ed., p. 558:
> > . . . the liability for breach of trust is not confined to express trustees, but extends to all who are actually privy to the breach.

The trial judge therefore concluded that Mislowski was also liable for Wawanesa's loss.

There is, however, a second line of Canadian authority, holding that a person who is the controlling or directing mind of a corporate trustee can be liable for an innocent or negligent breach of trust if the person knowingly assisted in the breach of trust. That is, in these cases, proof of fraud and dishonesty has not been required. In Horsman Bros. Holdings Ltd. v. Panton & Panton, [1976] 3 W.W.R. 745 (B.C.S.C.), which involved similar facts to those in Scott v. Riehl, supra, counsel for the beneficiary of the statutory trust conceded that the breach of trust was "innocent", that is, that the defendant directors had no knowledge that they were committing a breach of trust by conducting the corporation's affairs in the way in which they did. However, he relied upon the decision in Scott v. Riehl in support of the contention that the defendant directors should nonetheless be personally liapour les primes non payées que la société avait perçues et qui avaient été déposées dans son compte général sur lequel les charges d'exploitation et les salaires avaient été payés. Mislowski avait aussi une entreprise de construction qui avait un compte général distinct, mais il transférait sans cesse des fonds du compte d'agent d'assurances au compte de l'entreprise de construction et vice versa. Le juge de première instance a conclu que la société était responsable de violation d'une obligation fiduciaire, puis s'est penché sur la responsabilité de Mislowski, à la p. 287:

> [TRADUCTION] L'emploi des fonds en fiducie à d'autres fins représentait un acte ou une série d'actes fautifs et illégaux. Il n'y a aucun doute que la violation a été inspirée et dirigée par Mislowski, qui a pris toutes les décisions pour la société. Voir Underhill, Law Relating to Trusts & Trustees, 11e éd., à la p. 558:
> > . . . la responsabilité pour violation d'une obligation fiduciaire n'est pas limitée aux fiduciaires expressément désignés, mais s'étend à toutes les parties qui sont effectivement au courant de la violation.

Le juge de première instance a donc conclu que Mislowski était également responsable de la perte subie par Wawanesa.

Il existe cependant un second courant jurisprudentiel au Canada, selon lequel, la responsabilité pour violation d'une obligation fiduciaire commise de bonne foi ou par négligence peut être attribuée à la personne qui est l'âme dirigeante d'une société fiduciaire, si elle a sciemment aidé à commettre la violation. C'est-à-dire que, dans ces causes, la preuve de la fraude et de la malhonnêteté n'a pas été exigée. Dans Horsman Bros. Holdings Ltd. c. Panton & Panton, [1976] 3 W.W.R. 745 (C.S.C.-B.), qui portait sur des faits semblables à ceux de l'affaire Scott c. Riehl, précitée, l'avocat de la bénéficiaire de la fiducie créée par la loi a concédé que la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire avait été commise «de bonne foi», c'est-à-dire que les administrateurs défendeurs ignoraient qu'ils commettaient une violation d'une obligation fiduciaire en dirigeant les affaires de la société comme ils l'ont fait. Toutefois, il a invoqué la décision Scott c. Riehl pour affirmer que les administrateurs défendeurs devraient néanmoins être ble for the corporate breach of trust. Craig J. held as follows at pp. 750-51:

> Counsel for the defendants seeks to distinguish the Riehl case on the ground that Wilson J. was dealing with a "fraudulent" breach of trust whereas in this case I am dealing with an "innocent" breach of trust. I am not sure that Wilson J. was dealing with a "fraudulent" breach of trust in the Riehl case, but, even if he were, I think that his remarks are equally applicable to an "innocent" breach of trust. If a person deals with the funds, which are within the meaning of s. 3, in a manner inconsistent with the trust, he breaches the trust, even though he may do so "innocently".
> Accordingly, I find that the defendants did breach the trust provisions of s. 3 and that they are liable to the plaintiff for this breach.

This analysis was adopted by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Trilec Installations Ltd. v. Bastion Construction Ltd. (1982), 135 D.L.R. (3d) 766. On facts similar to Horsman Bros., supra, the beneficiaries of a trust under the Builders Lien Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 40, sued the corporate trustee and its director for breach of trust. The defendant director argued, at p. 767, that "by simply depositing the trust moneys in the corporate appellant's general bank account from which it was taken by others than the beneficiaries of the trust", there was no breach of trust. Carrothers J.A. noted that the defendant director and corporate president, who had personally made the deposit of the funds in question, had conceded that he knew when he made the deposit that the funds probably would be taken, as in fact they were, by persons other than the trust beneficiaries. Carrothers J.A. concluded that the defendant director had committed a breach of trust by failing to preserve the trust monies for the trust beneficiaries, and instead depositing the monies for the general purposes of the trustee cor-tenus personnellement responsables de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire par la société. Le juge Craig a conclu, aux pp. 750 et 751:

> [TRADUCTION] L'avocat des défendeurs cherche à faire une distinction d'avec l'affaire Riehl parce que le juge Wilson examinait une violation «frauduleuse» d'une obligation fiduciaire, tandis qu'en l'espèce, je dois me prononcer sur une violation «de bonne foi» d'une obligation fiduciaire. Je ne suis pas certain que le juge Wilson examinait une violation «frauduleuse» d'une obligation fiduciaire dans l'affaire Riehl, mais, même si c'était le cas, je pense que ses remarques s'appliquent aussi à la violation «de bonne foi». Si une personne gère les fonds visés par l'art. 3 d'une manière incompatible avec la fiducie, elle viole l'obligation fiduciaire, même si elle agit «de bonne foi».
> Par conséquent, je conclus que les défendeurs ont violé les dispositions de l'art. 3 relatives à la fiducie et qu'ils sont responsables envers la demanderesse de cette violation.

Cette analyse a été adoptée par la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique dans l'arrêt Trilec Installations Ltd. c. Bastion Construction Ltd. (1982), 135 D.L.R. (3d) 766. Relativement à des faits semblables à ceux de l'affaire Horsman Bros., précitée, les bénéficiaires d'une fiducie en vertu de la Builders Lien Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, ch. 40, ont intenté une action en violation d'une obligation fiduciaire contre la société fiduciaire et son administrateur. L'administrateur défendeur a soutenu, à la p. 767, que [TRADUCTION] «le simple fait d'avoir déposé dans le compte en banque général de la société appelante les fonds en fiducie, que d'autres que les bénéficiaires ont retirés», ne constituait pas une violation d'une obligation fiduciaire. Le juge Carrothers a fait observer que le défendeur, administrateur et président de la société, qui avait lui-même fait le dépôt des fonds en question, avait admis qu'il savait, en faisant le dépôt, que ceux-ci seraient probablement retirés, comme ils l'ont été, par d'autres que les bénéficiaires de la fiducie. Il a conclu que l'administrateur défendeur avait commis une violation d'une obligation fiduciaire en ne préservant pas les sommes en fiducie pour les bénéficiaires et en déposant plutôt les sommes dans un compte général de la société fiduciaire.

poration. Therefore, he was personally liable for his breach of trust.

The Ontario Court of Appeal in the present case relied heavily on Henry Electric, supra, in which the British Columbia Court of Appeal dealt with facts very similar to the present case, although involving a statutory trust under the Builders Lien Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 40. Farwell was the owner and sole director of the corporation. Carrothers J.A. held, at pp. 485-86, that he was the single operating mind of the corporation and was personally liable for the corporate breach of trust:

> In my view Farwell, as the sole director and shareholder of the Farwell company, was the exclusive operating mind of that company and was correctly held liable for the breach of trust first by putting the general account of the Farwell company in jeopardy to satisfy its loan from its banker and subsequently by allowing the deposit of trust funds into the general account of the corporation for general purposes without adequate account controls thus exposing the trust funds to withdrawal unilaterally by the bank for purposes in breach of the trust. While the bank did not forewarn either the Farwell company or Farwell of this particular application of contract moneys against the Farwell company's indebtedness to the bank, this action was foreseeable and ought to have been foreseen and guarded against.

> Farwell was clearly a director of the Farwell company who knowingly assented to or acquiesced in the breach of trust and he is personally liable for breach of trust in addition to the corporation. I do not make the quasi-criminal finding that Farwell has committed an offence under the provisions of s. 2(2) of the Act, but rather that Farwell is civilly liable for the breach of trust contemplated by those provisions.

> It is also not to be overlooked that, in addition to foreseeability by Farwell of the breach of trust which occurred, Farwell personally benefited from the breach

Par conséquent, une responsabilité personnelle lui incombait pour la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire.

La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario dans la présente espèce a accordé beaucoup d'importance à l'arrêt Henry Electric, précité, dans lequel la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a examiné des faits très semblables à ceux de l'espèce, quoiqu'ils aient concerné une fiducie en vertu de la Builders Lien Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, ch. 40. Farwell était propriétaire et seul administrateur de la société. Le juge Carrothers a conclu, aux pp. 485 et 486, qu'il en était l'unique âme dirigeante et qu'il était personnellement responsable de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire par la société:

> Farwell était de toute évidence un administrateur de la société Farwell qui a sciemment consenti à la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire, et il est personnellement responsable de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire, en plus de la responsabilité de la société. Je ne conclus pas qu'une responsabilité quasi pénale incombe à Farwell pour l'infraction prévue au par. 2(2) de la Loi, mais plutôt que Farwell a une responsabilité civile pour la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire visée dans ces dispositions.

> Il ne faut pas oublier non plus que, non seulement la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire était prévisible pour Farwell, mais encore qu'il en a personnellement tiré by reduction of his personal liability on his guarantee to the bank in respect of the Farwell company loan.

Esson J.A. (as he then was) dissented, relying on Scott v. Riehl, supra. He distinguished that case on the grounds that the one bank account was always overdrawn, and Riehl knew that the trust monies deposited in that account should not have been used for the general purposes of the company in abuse of the trust. Nevertheless, he accepted "that a person in Mr. Farwell's position can be liable without proof of fraud." He relied on s. 2 of the statute which provided that the trustee "shall not appropriate or convert any part of (the trust moneys) to his own use, or to any use not authorized by the trust". Esson J.A. noted at p. 489 that under s. 2, "[t]he unauthorized use may not be fraudulent and yet the agent may be liable for his part in bringing about the breach if he be the instigator of the breach and benefit from it."

Nonetheless, Esson J.A. held that there had been no breach of trust by the company, as there had been no appropriation or conversion of trust funds to the use of the company or any use not authorized by the trust. Esson J.A. stated that the act in that case, as distinct from Scott v. Riehl, was not a wrongful act knowingly done, although it may have been an act of negligence. Esson J.A. found, contrary to the majority's finding, that the bank's unilateral act of withdrawal of the trust monies from the general account was not reasonably foreseeable by Farwell. Esson J.A. concluded as follows at p. 491:

To put the trust funds into a pot, without any other element of fault, does not, in my view, constitute appropriation or conversion of the fund to the trustee's own use or any use not authorized by the trust. Unless there was a breach of trust, the potential benefit to Mr. Farwell from the act of the bank, by reducing the company's indebtedness and thus his indebtedness on his guarantee, is not relevant. It may be that the statute which creates avantage car l'engagement personnel qu'il avait donné à la banque pour garantir le prêt de la société Farwell a été réduit.

Le juge Esson (maintenant Juge en chef de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique) a exprimé sa dissidence, en s'appuyant sur l'affaire Scott c. Riehl, précitée. Selon lui, la situation dans cette affaire était différente parce que le seul compte en banque y était toujours à découvert et que Riehl savait que les sommes en fiducie déposées dans ce compte n'auraient pas dû être affectées aux activités générales de la société en contravention de la fiducie. Néanmoins, il a convenu [TRADUCTION] «qu'une personne dans la situation de M. Farwell peut être tenue responsable sans que la fraude ait été prouvée». Il s'est fondé sur l'art. 2 de la loi qui disposait que le fiduciaire [TRADUCTION] «ne doit pas détourner les (fonds en fiducie) pour son propre bénéfice ni les employer à toute fin non autorisée par la fiducie». Le juge Esson a fait remarquer, à la p. 489, que, sous le régime de l'art. 2, [TRADUCTION] «[l]'emploi non autorisé peut ne pas être frauduleux et pourtant le mandataire peut être tenu responsable pour son rôle dans la violation s'il en est l'instigateur et s'il en retire un avantage».

Néanmoins, le juge Esson a décidé que la société n'avait pas violé l'obligation fiduciaire, car les fonds en fiducie n'avaient pas été détournés pour le bénéfice de la société ni employés à une autre fin non autorisée par la fiducie. Selon lui, l'acte en cause, par contraste avec l'affaire Scott c. Riehl, n'était pas un acte fautif commis sciemment, encore qu'il ait peut-être résulté de la négligence. Il a décidé, contrairement à la majorité, que l'acte unilatéral de la banque, qui avait retiré les fonds en fiducie du compte général, n'était pas raisonnablement prévisible pour Farwell. Il a conclu, à la p. 491:

the trust should impose liability upon persons who are the directing mind of corporate trustees and who fail to ensure that the trust funds are dealt with in the most prudent manner possible. But as the law stands there was on these facts no basis for imposing liability on the director.

The second line of authority, in which proof of fraud and dishonesty is not required, was also adopted in Ontario in Andrea Schmidt Construction Ltd., supra. That case involved a mortgage between Blendcraft Construction (the mortgagor) and a real estate investment corporation called Burnac (the mortgagee). The parties had agreed that a portion of monies advanced under the mortgage would be applied to reduce Blendcraft's indebtedness under an unrelated mortgage, known as the Thompson mortgage, also held by Burnac. The advance given by Blendcraft to Burnac for this purpose was subject to a trust under The Mechanics' Lien Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 267. Schmidt, an unpaid contractor, sued Blendcraft, its director, and Burnac for breach of trust. The trial judge imposed personal liability on Mr. Glatt, the sole shareholder, director and officer of Blendcraft for breach of trust by the corporation with respect to the monies held in trust under The Mechanics' Lien Act. The trial judge concluded as follows at pp. 575-76:

There remains to be considered the liability of Mr. Glatt. He was the sole officer, director and shareholder of Blendcraft. His evidence was that he had no personal dealings with or liability to Schmidt [the beneficiary of the trust] and that all his dealings were as an officer of Blendcraft as were all his dealings with Burnac. While that may be correct as far as it goes, every act of Blendcraft including its breach of trust was expressly directed by Glatt. Glatt was aware that Blendcraft was committing a breach of trust. It was Glatt, as agent of Blendcraft, who acquiesced in the misdirection of trust funds. He received a benefit from the diversion in that his liability as covenantor on the Thompson mortgage was reduced. The situation in this case is similar to the situations in the two cases in British Columbia cited by counsel: Scott et al. v. Riehl & Schumak (1958), 15 D.L.R. (2d) 67, 25 W.W.R. 525; and Horsman Bros.

nent. Il se peut que la loi qui crée la fiducie devrait attribuer une responsabilité aux personnes qui sont les âmes dirigeantes de sociétés fiduciaires et qui ne veillent pas à ce que les fonds en fiducie soient gérés de la manière la plus prudente possible. Mais, vu l'état actuel du droit et les faits de l'espèce, aucune raison ne justifiait l'attribution d'une responsabilité à l'administrateur.

Le second courant jurisprudentiel, selon lequel il n'est pas nécessaire de faire la preuve de la fraude et de la malhonnêteté, a également été suivi en Ontario dans l'arrêt Andrea Schmidt Construction Ltd., précité. Cette affaire portait sur une hypothèque accordée par Blendcraft Construction (débitrice) à une société d'investissement immobilier appelée Burnac (créancière). Les parties avaient convenu qu'une partie des sommes avancées, garanties par l'hypothèque, compenserait la dette de Blendcraft garantie par une autre hypothèque, appelée l'hypothèque de Thompson, aussi accordée par Burnac. L'avance donnée par Blendcraft à Burnac à cette fin était assujettie à une fiducie en vertu de The Mechanics' Lien Act, R.S.O. 1970, ch. 267. Schmidt, entrepreneur dont la créance était exigible, a poursuivi Blendcraft, son administrateur et Burnac pour violation d'une obligation fiduciaire. Le juge de première instance a attribué une responsabilité personnelle à M. Glatt, seul actionnaire, administrateur et dirigeant de Blendcraft, pour la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire par la société relativement aux sommes détenues en fiducie en vertu de la Mechanics' Lien Act. Le juge a conclu, aux pp. 575 et 576:

[TRADUCTION] Il reste à statuer sur la responsabilité de M. Glatt. Il était le seul dirigeant, administrateur et actionnaire de Blendcraft. Il a témoigné ne pas avoir fait affaire personnellement avec Schmidt [bénéficiaire de la fiducie] ni avoir d'obligation envers lui, et avoir traité avec lui seulement à titre de dirigeant de Blendcraft comme il l'a fait avec Burnac. Bien que ce soit peut-être exact pour autant que l'on sache, chaque acte qu'a accompli Blendcraft, y compris la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire, a été le résultat d'un ordre exprès de Glatt. Celui-ci savait que Blendcraft commettait une violation d'une obligation fiduciaire. C'est lui, en qualité de mandataire de Blendcraft, qui a donné son accord au détournement des fonds en fiducie. Il a tiré avantage du détournement, car sa responsabilité comme partie contractante de l'hypothèque de Thompson a été diminuée. La situation en l'espèce est semblable à celle de Holdings Ltd. et al. v. Panton & Panton, [1976] 3 W.W.R. 745. In both those cases, directors were held liable for breach of a mechanics' lien trust committed by their respective corporations. No reason was advanced to me as to why the principles in those cases should not be applied in Ontario. Therefore, Schmidt should also have judgment against Glatt.

In Austin v. Habitat Development Ltd. (1992), 94 D.L.R. (4th) 359 (N.S.C.A.), the signing officer of a management company improperly diverted monies from a trust account managed for the owners of an apartment building to his own use. The other signing officer stood by, did not inform the owners and misrepresented the state of the trust account. The Nova Scotia Court of Appeal held that the company and the signing officers were fiduciaries in breach of their duty and were liable to repay the monies. Hallett J.A., concurring in the result, relied upon Barnes v. Addy, supra, Selangor, supra, and the Court of Appeal decision in the present case. He concluded, at p. 363, that "[i]t is clear from these authorities that if a director with knowledge actively participates in the conversion of trust funds, he may be found personally liable to the beneficiaries of the trust." Hallett J.A. described a conversion of trust property as follows at pp. 363-64:

> A conversion is an act of wilful interference without justification with property, including money, in a manner inconsistent with the right of the owner whereby the owner is deprived of the use or possession of the property. The transfer of the trust funds to Eastland Group was a conversion of the [beneficiaries'] money.

For the majority, Freeman J.A. held that Robinson, the director who had diverted the funds, was liable for the breach of trust he committed as agent for the corporate trustee, which was also liable as principal. With regard to Whitewood, the signing

Dans l'arrêt Austin c. Habitat Development Ltd. (1992), 94 D.L.R. (4th) 359 (C.A.N.-É.), le dirigeant d'une société de gestion, signataire autorisé, avait détourné les fonds d'un compte en fiducie qu'il administrait au nom des propriétaires d'un immeuble d'habitation. L'autre signataire autorisé n'est pas intervenu, n'a pas informé les propriétaires et a fait une fausse déclaration quant à l'état financier du compte en fiducie. La Cour d'appel de la Nouvelle-Écosse a décidé que la société et les signataires autorisés étaient des fiduciaires qui avaient manqué à leur obligation et qui devaient rembourser les sommes. Le juge Hallett, qui a souscrit au résultat, s'est appuyé sur les décisions Barnes c. Addy et Selangor, précitées, et sur l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel dans la présente espèce. Il a conclu, à la p. 363, qu' [TRADUCTION] «[i]l ressort à l'évidence de ces jugements que, si un administrateur participe en connaissance de cause et activement au détournement des fonds en fiducie, il peut être tenu personnellement responsable envers les bénéficiaires de la fiducie». Le juge Hallett définit le détournement de biens en fiducie en ces termes, aux pp. 363 et 364:

Au nom de la majorité, le juge Freeman a conclu que Robinson, l'administrateur qui avait détourné les fonds, était responsable de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire qu'il avait commise en qualité de mandataire de la société fiduciaire, qui était officer who stood by, Freeman J.A. stated that he shared complicity with Robinson. Freeman J.A. noted, at pp. 372-73, that the difference between that case and the present case (referring to the Court of Appeal decision) was that "in the latter the converted funds were used for purposes of the company, which were incidentally beneficial to the shareholders, and were not flagrantly removed by a company officer acting for his own benefit." Because of the blatancy of the breaches of trust committed by the directors, Freeman J.A. held that they were both personally liable to the beneficiaries.

aussi responsable à titre de mandante. Quant à Whitewood, l'autre signataire autorisé qui n'est pas intervenu, le juge Freeman a dit qu'il était complice de Robinson. Il a fait observer, aux pp. 372 et 373, que la différence entre cette affaire et la présente (en parlant de l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel) résidait dans le fait que, [TRADUCTION] «dans cette dernière, les fonds détournés ont été affectés à des activités de la société, dont les actionnaires ont tiré avantage accessoirement, et n'ont pas été retirés de façon flagrante par un dirigeant de la société agissant pour son propre bénéfice». Comme les administrateurs avaient commis une violation criante d'une obligation fiduciaire, le juge Freeman a décidé qu'une responsabilité personnelle envers les bénéficiaires leur incombait à tous les deux.

The modified standard found in many of the Canadian cases involving directors of a closely held corporation reflects a difficulty with the application of the strict Barnes v. Addy standard to cases in which the corporate trustee is actually controlled by the stranger to the trust. In Barnes v. Addy, Lord Selborne L.C., at p. 252, expressed concerns regarding the imposition of liability on strangers to the trust in the absence of participation in a fraudulent and dishonest design: "those who create trusts do expressly intend, in the absence of fraud and dishonesty, to exonerate such agents of all classes from the responsibilities which are expressly incumbent, by reason of the fiduciary relation, upon the trustees." Later in his reasons, Lord Selborne L.C. reiterated this position at p. 253: "if we were to hold that [a solicitor] became a constructive trustee by the preparation of such a deed, . . . not having enabled any one, who otherwise might not have had the power, to commit a breach of trust, we should be acting . . . without authority. . . ."

La norme modifiée utilisée dans nombre d'affaires canadiennes mettant en cause des administrateurs de sociétés à peu d'actionnaires traduit la difficulté d'application de la norme stricte énoncée dans l'arrêt Barnes c. Addy à des situations dans lesquelles la société fiduciaire est contrôlée en fait par une personne qui n'est pas partie à la fiducie. Dans l'arrêt Barnes c. Addy, le lord chancelier Selborne a exprimé, à la p. 252, des inquiétudes au sujet de l'attribution d'une responsabilité à des tiers qui n'ont pas participé à un dessein frauduleux et malhonnête: [TRADUCTION] «ceux qui créent une fiducie ont l'intention explicite d'exonérer, en l'absence de fraude et de malhonnêteté, ces mandataires de toutes les catégories de responsabilités qui incombent explicitement aux fiduciaires en raison de la fiducie». Plus loin dans ses motifs, le lord chancelier Selborne réaffirme sa position, à la p. 253: [TRADUCTION] «si nous décidions que, [un avocat] devient un fiduciaire par interprétation en rédigeant un tel acte, [. . .] sans avoir habilité quiconque n'aurait, sans cela, été investi du pouvoir de commettre une violation d'une obligation fiduciaire, nous excéderions [. . .] notre compétence . . .»

Generally, there are good reasons for requiring participation in a fraudulent and dishonest breach of trust before imposing liability on agents of the trustees:

Unlike the stranger who takes title, an agent who disposes of trust property has no choice in the matter. He is contractually bound to act as directed by his principal the trustee. It is one thing to tell an agent that he must breach his contract rather than participate in a fraud on the part of his principal. It is quite another to tell him that he must breach his contract any time he believes his principal's instructions are contrary to the terms of the trust. This is to tell the agent that he must first of all master the terms of his principal's undertaking and, secondly, enforce his own understanding of what that undertaking entails. In effect, it burdens him with the duties of trusteeship upon the mere receipt of trust property as agent. As we have seen, however, properly understood, the role of agent is distinct from that of trustee. An agent is not to be made a trustee de son tort unless he voluntarily repudiates the role of agent and takes on the job of a trustee. So long as he chooses to remain an agent, his loyalties are to his principal, the trustee, and he should be free to follow the latter's instructions short of participating in a fraud.

Ruth Sullivan, "Strangers to the Trust", [1986] Est. & Tr. Q. 217, p. 246.

It must be remembered that it is the nature of the breach of trust that is under consideration at this point in the analysis, rather than the intent or knowledge of the stranger to the trust. That is, the issue here is whether the breach of trust was fraudulent and dishonest, not whether the appellant's actions should be so characterized. Barnes v. Addy clearly states that the stranger will be liable if he or she knowingly assisted the trustee in a fraudulent and dishonest breach of trust. Therefore, it is the corporation's actions which must be examined. The appellant's actions will also be relevant to this examination, given the extent to which M & L was controlled by the defendant directors. The appellant's conduct will be more directly scrutinized when the issue of knowledge is under considera-fiduciaires que s'ils ont participé à la violation frauduleuse et malhonnête d'une obligation fiduciaire:

[TRADUCTION] Contrairement au tiers qui s'attribue le titre, le mandataire qui aliène des biens en fiducie n'a pas le choix. Il est tenu, en vertu d'un contrat, d'agir conformément aux ordres de son mandant, le fiduciaire. C'est une chose que de dire au mandataire qu'il doit manquer à son contrat plutôt que de participer à une fraude commise par son mandant. C'est une tout autre chose que de lui dire qu'il doit manquer à son contrat chaque fois qu'il croit que les ordres de son mandant sont contraires aux conditions de la fiducie. C'est dire au mandataire qu'il doit tout d'abord posséder à fond les conditions de l'engagement de son mandant et, ensuite, donner suite à sa propre interprétation de ce que comporte cet engagement. En fait, c'est l'investir des fonctions du fiduciaire du simple fait qu'il reçoit les biens en fiducie en qualité de mandataire. Nous avons cependant vu que le rôle de mandataire, si on l'interprète correctement, est distinct de celui de fiduciaire. Le mandataire ne doit pas être tenu pour fiduciaire «de son tort», sauf s'il répudie volontairement le rôle de mandataire et accepte la fonction de fiduciaire. Tant qu'il choisit de rester mandataire, il doit être loyal envers son mandant, le fiduciaire, et il doit être libre de suivre les instructions de ce dernier, à la condition de ne pas participer à une fraude.

Ruth Sullivan, «Strangers to the Trust», [1986] Est. & Tr. Q. 217, p. 246.

Il ne faut pas oublier que c'est la nature de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire que nous étudions à ce point de notre analyse et non l'intention ou la connaissance du tiers. C'est-à-dire que la question est de savoir si la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire a été frauduleuse et malhonnête, et non de savoir si les actions de l'appelant doivent être ainsi qualifiées. Le tribunal précise bien dans l'arrêt Barnes c. Addy que le tiers sera tenu responsable s'il a sciemment aidé le fiduciaire à violer l'obligation fiduciaire frauduleusement et malhonnêtement. Par conséquent, ce sont les actions de la société qu'il faut examiner. Les actions de l'appelant seront aussi pertinentes dans cet examen, étant donné le degré de contrôle exercé sur M & L par les administrateurs défendeurs. La conduite de l'appelant fera plus directement l'objet de l'examen lorsque nous étudierons la question de la con-tion. It is unnecessary, therefore, to find that the appellant himself acted in bad faith or dishonestly.

Where the trustee is a corporation, rather than an individual, the inquiry as to whether the breach of trust was dishonest and fraudulent may be more difficult to conceptualize, because the corporation can only act through human agents who are often the strangers to the trust whose liability is in issue. Regardless of the type of trustee, in my view, the standard adopted by Peter Gibson J. in the Baden, Delvaux case, following the decision of the English Court of Appeal in Belmont Finance, supra, is a helpful one. I would therefore "take as a relevant description of fraud 'the taking of a risk to the prejudice of another's rights, which risk is known to be one which there is no right to take'." In my opinion, this standard best accords with the basic rationale for the imposition of personal liability on a stranger to a trust which was enunciated in In re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, supra, namely, whether the stranger's conscience is sufficiently affected to justify the imposition of personal liability. In that respect, the taking of a knowingly wrongful risk resulting in prejudice to the beneficiary is sufficient to ground personal liability. This approach is consistent with both lines of authority previously discussed.

In the instant case, as a party to the contract between itself and the respondent, M & L knew that the Air Canada monies were held in trust for the respondent, and were not for the general use of M & L. Trust accounts were set up by M & L in 1978, but never used. M & L also knew that any positive balance in its general account was subject to the Bank's demand. By placing the trust monies in the general account which were then subject to seizure by the Bank, M & L took a risk to the prejudice of the rights of the respondent beneficiary, Air Canada, which risk was known to be one which there was no right to take. See Baden, naissance. Il est donc inutile de conclure que l'appelant a lui-même agi de mauvaise foi ou malhonnêtement.

Lorsque le fiduciaire est une société par actions, et non un particulier, il peut être plus difficile de trancher la question de savoir si la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire a été malhonnête et frauduleuse parce que la société ne peut agir que par l'intermédiaire de personnes physiques qui sont souvent les tierces parties dont la responsabilité est en cause. Peu importe le type de fiduciaire, à mon avis, la norme adoptée par le juge Peter Gibson dans l'affaire Baden, Delvaux, précitée, décision rendue postérieurement à l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel anglaise Belmont Finance, précité, est utile. En conséquence, je [TRADUCTION] «consid[ère] applicable la définition suivante de la fraude: «le fait de courir un risque au détriment des droits d'autrui, lorsque l'on court ce risque sciemment et sans droit»». À mon avis, c'est la norme qui s'accorde le mieux avec la raison d'être fondamentale de l'attribution d'une responsabilité personnelle à une personne qui n'est pas partie à la fiducie, qui a été énoncée dans l'affaire In re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, précitée, c'est-à-dire la question de savoir si la conscience du tiers est suffisamment en cause pour que soit justifiée l'attribution d'une responsabilité personnelle. À cet égard, le fait de courir sciemment et de manière injustifiée un risque au détriment du bénéficiaire est suffisant pour légitimer l'attribution d'une responsabilité personnelle. Cette démarche est compatible avec les deux courants jurisprudentiels analysés plus haut.

En l'espèce, en tant que partie au contrat conclu entre elle-même et l'intimée, M & L savait que les sommes appartenant à Air Canada étaient détenues en fiducie au nom de celle-ci et ne devaient pas être affectées aux activités générales de M & L. Des comptes en fiducie ont été ouverts par M & L en 1978, mais jamais utilisés. M & L savait également que tout solde positif dans son compte général pouvait être demandé par la banque. En plaçant les fonds en fiducie dans le compte général qui était susceptible d'être saisi par la banque, M & L a couru un risque au détriment des droits d'Air Canada, bénéficiaire intimée, risque qu'elle a

Delvaux, supra,; Scott v. Riehl, supra. Therefore, the breach of trust by M & L was dishonest and fraudulent from an equitable standpoint.

It is clear that the appellant participated or assisted in the breach of trust. As was the case in Horsman Bros., supra, the appellant dealt with the funds in question: in particular, he stopped payment on all cheques, and then opened a trust account and attempted to withdraw the stop payment orders and to transfer the funds into the new trust account in order to pay the respondent. The breach of trust was directly caused by the conduct of the defendant directors. As Griffiths J.A. observed, at p. 204, "[t]he movement of these directors, acting solely in their own interest to stop payment on cheques, not only prevented payment on cheques issued to Air Canada, but precipitated the seizure by the bank of the only funds available in the unprotected general account." In such circumstances, the directors are personally liable for the breach of trust as constructive trustees provided that the requisite knowledge on the part of the directors is proved.

With respect to the knowledge requirement, this will not generally be a difficult hurdle to overcome in cases involving directors of closely held corporations. Such directors, if active, usually have knowledge of all of the actions of the corporate trustee. In the instant case, the analysis is somewhat more difficult to resolve, as the appellant was not as closely involved with the day-to-day operations as was the other director, Martin. However, the appellant knew of the terms of the agreement between M & L and the respondent airline, as he signed that agreement. The appellant also knew that the trust funds were being deposited in the general bank account, which was subject to the demand loan from the Bank. This constitutes actual knowledge of the breach of trust. That is, even if the appellant could argue that he had no subjective knowledge of the breach of trust, given couru sciemment et sans droit. Voir Baden, Delvaux, et Scott c. Riehl, précités. Par conséquent, la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire par M & L était malhonnête et frauduleuse selon les principes de l'equity.

De toute évidence, l'appelant a participé ou aidé à la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire. Comme dans l'affaire Horsman Bros., précitée, l'appelant a géré les fonds en question: en particulier, il a fait opposition au paiement de tous les chèques, puis a ouvert un compte en fiducie et tenté de retirer l'opposition au paiement et de transférer les fonds dans le nouveau compte en fiducie afin de rembourser l'intimée. La violation d'une obligation fiduciaire a été causée directement par la conduite des administrateurs défendeurs. Comme l'a fait observer le juge Griffiths, à la p. 204, [TRADUCTION] «[l]e geste de ces administrateurs, agissant seulement dans leur propre intérêt pour faire opposition à des chèques, non seulement a empêché le paiement de chèques tirés à l'ordre d'Air Canada, mais a hâté la saisie par la banque des seuls fonds se trouvant dans le compte général non protégé». Dans ces circonstances, les administrateurs sont personnellement responsables de violation d'une obligation fiduciaire à titre de fiduciaires par interprétation, à la condition qu'il soit prouvé qu'ils avaient la connaissance voulue.

Quant à la connaissance exigée, cet obstacle est généralement facile à surmonter lorsqu'il s'agit des administrateurs d'une société à peu d'actionnaires. Ces administrateurs, s'ils jouent un rôle actif, sont d'ordinaire au courant de toutes les actions de la société fiduciaire. En l'espèce, l'analyse est un peu plus difficile car l'appelant ne prenait pas une part aussi active aux activités quotidiennes que l'autre administrateur, Martin. Toutefois, l'appelant connaissait les conditions de l'accord entre M & L et la compagnie d'aviation intimée, puisqu'il a signé le contrat. L'appelant savait en outre que les fonds en fiducie étaient déposés dans le compte en banque général, qui était assujetti au prêt à demande de la banque. Cela équivaut donc à la connaissance de fait de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire. C'est-à-dire que, même si l'appelant pourrait soutenir qu'il n'avait the facts of which he did have subjective knowledge, he was wilfully blind to the breach, or reckless in his failure to realize that there was a breach. Furthermore, the appellant received a benefit from the breach of trust, in that his personal liability to the Bank on the operating line of credit was extinguished. Therefore, he knowingly and directly participated in the breach of trust, and is personally liable to the respondent airline for that breach.

V. Disposition

For the foregoing reasons, I would therefore dismiss the appeal with costs.

The following are the reasons delivered by

MCLACHLIN J. — I agree with Justice Iacobucci that the relationship between the corporation and Air Canada was one of trust, not debtor and creditor. I also agree with his proposed disposition of the appeal. In my view, whatever view one adopts on the difficult issues discussed by my colleague, the appellant is clearly liable as a constructive trustee for the breach of trust which the corporation committed respecting Air Canada's account.

There is no debate on the first requirement for imposition of personal liability on a stranger to a trust: knowing participation in the breach. The next question is whether the required knowledge is subjective knowledge (i.e., actual knowledge of the breach or wilful blindness and recklessness) or objectively determined knowledge (what a reasonably diligent person would have known). Courts have divided on this issue. The courts in England require subjective knowledge. However, certain appellate courts in Canada have suggested that a subjectively determined standard of knowledge is not appropriate in the trust context, even for a stranger to the trust, and that where a stranger should reasonably have known that the trust was pas la connaissance subjective de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire, étant donné les faits dont il avait la connaissance subjective, il a fait preuve d'ignorance volontaire de la violation, ou d'insouciance en ne se rendant pas compte de la violation. Par surcroît, l'appelant a tiré avantage de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire, en ce sens que son engagement personnel envers la banque à l'égard de la marge de crédit d'exploitation a été éteint. Par conséquent, il a sciemment et directement participé à la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire et est personnellement responsable envers la compagnie d'aviation intimée de cette violation.

V. Dispositif

Pour les motifs qui précèdent, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi avec dépens.

Version française des motifs rendus par

LE JUGE MCLACHLIN — Tout comme le juge Iacobucci, j'estime qu'il existait un rapport de fiduciaire entre la société et Air Canada et non un rapport de débiteur et créancier. Je souscris également à la manière dont il tranche le présent pourvoi. À mon avis, quelle que soit la position que l'on adopte à l'égard des questions difficiles qu'analyse mon collègue, l'appelant est clairement responsable à titre de fiduciaire par interprétation de la violation d'une obligation fiduciaire que la société a commise relativement au compte d'Air Canada.

La première exigence en matière d'attribution d'une responsabilité personnelle à un tiers en matière de fiducie — la participation en connaissance de cause à la violation — ne suscite pas de débat. La question suivante est de savoir si la connaissance requise doit être subjective (c.-à-d. une connaissance de fait de la violation ou l'ignorance volontaire et l'insouciance) ou déterminée de façon objective (ce qu'une personne raisonnablement diligente aurait dû savoir). Les tribunaux sont divisés sur cette question. En Angleterre, les tribunaux exigent la connaissance subjective. Toutefois, certaines cours d'appel au Canada ont dit qu'une norme de connaissance déterminée de façon subjective ne convient pas dans le contexte de la fidu-being breached by his or her actions, there may be circumstances where liability is appropriate. See MacDonald v. Hauer (1976), 72 D.L.R. (3d) 110 (Sask. C.A.), at p. 123; Henry Electric Ltd. v. Farwell (1986), 29 D.L.R. (4th) 481 (B.C.C.A.), at p. 485. In this case, as my colleague points out, the evidence meets the higher English standard of subjective knowledge, given that the appellant was wilfully blind. Accordingly, it is not necessary to decide whether in some cases, an objective test might suffice. That is a difficult and important question which I would prefer to leave to a case in which it squarely arises.

The second issue is the nature of the breach which can give rise to liability. Must it be fraudulent and dishonest, or does any breach suffice? Again, the authorities are divided; as Iacobucci J. discusses, a number of Canadian courts do not adopt the dominant English view that the breach must be fraudulent and dishonest: Horsman Bros. Holdings Ltd. v. Panton & Panton, [1976] 3 W.W.R. 745; Trilec Installations Ltd. v. Bastion Construction Ltd. (1982), 135 D.L.R. (3d) 766; Andrea Schmidt Construction Ltd. v. Glatt (1979), 25 O.R. (2d) 567 (H.C.). Again, it is not necessary to resolve the issue in this case, since here the breach was fraudulent and dishonest in the sense discussed by my colleague of involving a risk to the property to the prejudice of the beneficiary. Given the importance and difficulty of the question, I would prefer to leave it to a case where it squarely arises.

A final matter is the effect, if any, of the fact that the appellant benefitted personally from the breach. In some Canadian cases, this has been cited as a circumstance in favour of imposing liability on the stranger to the trust: see Scott v. Riehl (1958), 15 D.L.R. (2d) 67; Henry Electric Ltd., supra, and Andrea Schmidt Construction Ltd., supra. My colleague cites it as relevant to establ-cie, même pour un tiers à la fiducie, et que, lorsqu'un tiers aurait raisonnablement dû savoir qu'il y avait violation d'une obligation fiduciaire en raison de ses actions, il pourrait y avoir des circonstances dans lesquelles la responsabilité s'applique. Voir MacDonald c. Hauer (1976), 72 D.L.R. (3d) 110 (C.A. Sask.), à la p. 123; Henry Electric Ltd. c. Farwell (1986), 29 D.L.R. (4th) 481 (C.A.C.-B.), à la p. 485. En l'espèce, comme le souligne mon collègue, la preuve satisfait à la norme anglaise plus élevée de la connaissance subjective, étant donné l'ignorance volontaire de l'appelant. Par conséquent, il n'est pas nécessaire de décider si dans certains cas un critère objectif pourrait suffire. Il s'agit d'une question difficile et importante et je préfère qu'elle soit examinée dans une affaire où elle aura été directement soulevée.

La deuxième question porte sur la nature de la violation qui peut entraîner la responsabilité. Doit-elle être frauduleuse et malhonnête ou toute violation suffit-elle? Encore une fois, la doctrine et la jurisprudence sont divisées; comme le mentionne le juge Iacobucci, un certain nombre de tribunaux canadiens n'adoptent pas la position anglaise dominante que la violation doit être frauduleuse et malhonnête: Horsman Bros. Holdings Ltd. c. Panton & Panton, [1976] 3 W.W.R. 745; Trilec Installations Ltd. c. Bastion Construction Ltd. (1982), 135 D.L.R. (3d) 766; Andrea Schmidt Construction Ltd. c. Glatt (1979), 25 O.R. (2d) 567 (H.C.). De même, il n'est pas nécessaire de trancher la question en l'espèce car la violation y était frauduleuse et malhonnête dans le sens mentionné par mon collègue, savoir qu'il y avait un risque pour les biens au détriment du bénéficiaire. Compte tenu de l'importance et de la difficulté de la question, je préfère qu'elle soit examinée dans une affaire où elle aura été directement soulevée.

Enfin, il reste la question de l'effet, le cas échéant, de l'avantage personnel que tire l'appelant de la violation. Dans certains arrêts canadiens, cela a été mentionné comme un élément favorisant l'attribution de la responsabilité à un tiers à la fiducie: voir Scott c. Riehl (1958), 15 D.L.R. (2d) 67; Henry Electric Ltd. et Andrea Schmidt Construction Ltd., précités. Mon collègue dit que cette lishing actual knowledge of the breach, and refers to it as a factor in his conclusion that the appellant is liable. Given that this factor is present in this case, it is not necessary to decide whether liability could be imposed in the absence of personal benefit. My colleague, I hasten to add, does not himself venture on this question.

While I agree with Iacobucci J. that on the facts here, liability is clearly made out, I would prefer to leave consideration of the questions to which I have referred to future cases in which they directly arise.

I would dismiss the appeal.

question est pertinente pour établir la connaissance de fait de la violation et la mentionne comme un facteur dans sa conclusion que l'appelant est responsable. Étant donné que ce facteur est présent en l'espèce, il n'est pas nécessaire de décider si la responsabilité pourrait être attribuée en l'absence d'avantage personnel. Je m'empresse d'ajouter que mon collègue n'aborde pas cette question.

Bien que je convienne avec le juge Iacobucci que, d'après les faits de l'espèce, la responsabilité soit clairement établie, je préfère que les questions que j'ai mentionnées soient examinées dans des affaires où elles auront été directement soulevées.

Je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

Auctioneers' Association of Alberta v. Hunter, 2002 ABQB 0028

Date: 20020109
Action No. 0103 02121

IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH OF ALBERTA JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF EDMONTON

2002 ABQB 28 (CanLII)

BETWEEN:

AUCTIONEERS' ASSOCIATION OF ALBERTA

Plaintiff

- and -

RICHARD SCOTT HUNTER

Defendant

REASONS FOR DECISION of
M. FUNDUK, Master in Chambers

APPEARANCES:

K. G. Heintz
Venture Law Group
Counsel for the Plaintiff

Ms. J. V. Roy
Kobewka Stadnyk
Counsel for the Defendant

[1] These are competing applications for summary judgment.

[2] The Defendant was a member of the Plaintiff. He was also the sole principal of Scott Hunter Auction Service Ltd. ("company"). The company was a public auctioneer. At the relevant times the Public Auctions Act (later repealed and rolled into Part 12 of the Fair Trading Act S.A. 1998, c. F-1.05) applied.

[3] Section 5 requires a public auctioneer to be licensed by the Director. Section 6 requires the auctioneer to "deliver to" the Director a bond, which of course must be by someone other than the auctioneer.

[4] The Plaintiff agreed to be the bondsman for the company and it gave a bond for $25,000 to the Director. In May, 1994 the company entered into an indemnity agreement with the Plaintiff agreeing to hold the Plaintiff harmless for all loss that it might incur if the bond was called.

[5] In March 1998 the Defendant gave a guarantee to the Plaintiff. It recites that the Plaintiff is a surety for the company pursuant to the Public Auctions Act, that the company had entered into an indemnity agreement with the Plaintiff and that the Defendant was a shareholder of the company. The Defendant then:

> "... unconditionally guarantees payment to the [Plaintiff] of all debts and liabilities, present or future, direct or indirect, absolute or contingent, matured or not, at any time owing by the [company] to the [Plaintiff] now or hereafter incurred or arising from the said Agreement of Indemnity or any other agreement or obligation ... and ... agrees to indemnify and save harmless the [Plaintiff] from and in respect of any and all liability ... by reason of the said Bond ..."

[6] The guarantee is under seal and there is the mandatory compliance with the Guarantees Acknowledgment Act. The validity of the guarantee is not questioned.

[7] The Defendant assigned himself into bankruptcy on June 24, 1999. He did not list the Plaintiff as a contingent creditor. The Plaintiff was not aware of the bankruptcy. On May 12, 2000 the Defendant got an absolute order of discharge from his bankruptcy. The Plaintiff learned of the bankruptcy sometime after July, 2000 when it hired a lawyer to collect on the guarantee.

[8] The requirements of a license and a bond are for the public's protection, in particular the client of the auctioneer who gives it a chattel to sell and in limited situations the purchaser of a chattel at an auction.

[9] Section 6 Public Auctions Act deals with the forfeiture of a bond. It says:

> 6 (3) If

2002 ABQB 28 (CanLII)

(a) a judgment is obtained by any person against a licensee who is a principal under a bond referred to in subsection (1) or against an auctioneer acting for him.

(b) the judgment arises out of the failure of the licensee or his auctioneer to perform his obligations in accordance with the terms and conditions of the bond to the person who recovered the judgment, and

(c) the person who recovered the judgment delivers to the Director

(i) a certified copy of the judgment

(ii) notice that the judgment has become final by reason of lapse of time or of being confirmed by the highest court to which it may be appealed and has not been satisfied within 30 days after it became final, and

(iii) a statutory declaration setting out the particulars of the failure of the licensee or auctioneer to perform his obligations to the person who recovered the judgment.

the bond is forfeited on the Director notifying the surety in writing that the judgment remains unsatisfied 30 days after the date that it became final.

(4) If a bond is forfeited under subsection (3), the surety shall, within 30 days after receiving the notice from the Director under that subsection, pay to the Minister the principal sum of the bond.

(5) If the Minister receives money under subsection (4), he shall pay that money into the Court of Queen's Bench in trust for those persons who obtain judgments against the licensee or auctioneer and comply with this section, and the Court shall, not less than 1 year after the forfeiture of the bond, pay out that money to those persons.

(6) If the amount of money paid into Court under subsection (5) is insufficient to satisfy the judgments referred to in that subsection the Court shall pay out the money on a pro rata basis.

(7) If, after paying out all judgments under subsection (5), there is a surplus of money, the Court shall pay that surplus to the surety.

(8) A licence terminates if the bond provided by the licensee under this Act

(a) is forfeited, or

(b) terminates, unless prior to the termination of the bond the licensee provides a new bond in accordance with this Act.

[10] Section 10 gives a measure of protection to purchasers at an auction in limited circumstances. It says:

10(1) If a person causes any goods valued at more than $500 to be offered for sale by public auction, the auction sales business shall, before the sale is held, obtain from that person a statutory declaration in writing made or signed by him or by some other person authorized by him and who has knowledge of the facts, setting out whether or not the goods offered for sale are subject to a mortgage, charge, lien or encumbrance and, if so, full particulars of the mortgage, charge, lien or encumbrance.

(2) No auction sales business shall sell by public auction any goods in respect of which it must obtain a statutory declaration under subsection (1) without first obtaining the statutory declaration.

(3) If an auction sales business

(a) sells by public auction goods valued at more than $500 without first obtaining the statutory declaration required under subsection (1), or

(b) sells by public auction goods valued at $500 or less without first obtaining a statutory declaration that complies with subsection (1).

it is liable to the purchaser of the goods for the losses sustained by the purchaser resulting from any mortgage, charge, lien or encumbrance to which the goods were subject at the time of sale.

[11] If an auctioneer sells a chattel he is supposed to give the net sale proceeds to his client and if he does not sell the chattel he is supposed to return it to the client. The bond provides some protection to clients from the occasional unscrupulous auctioneer.

[12] By letter dated December 17, 1999 to the Plaintiff the Director "forfeited" the bond because a claim for $1,970.24 was filed with the Director. At that time the Defendant was in bankruptcy. The demand by the Director does not identify the claimantor or how the claim arose and when it arose.

[13] The Plaintiff paid the Director $25,000.

[14] On February 22, 2000 the Director told the Plaintiff of a second claim for $2,719.72. On March 24, 2000 the Director told the Plaintiff of a third claim for $440. On April 6, 2000 the Director told the Plaintiff of two more claims for $2,014.74 and $4,707. On April 17, 2000 the Director told the Plaintiff of a sixth claim for $12,584. During this time the Defendant was still in bankruptcy.

[15] On July 24, 2000 the Director told the Plaintiff of yet another claim for $726 and on January 2, 2001 he told the Plaintiff of a final claim for $14,468.12. These two claims were after the bankrupt got his discharge.

[16] The details of the claims are not before me. I conclude that all the claims are covered by the bond. There is no good reason for the Director to tell the Plaintiff of claims other than those covered by the bond. If it becomes necessary the details can be gotten either from the Director or the Court file of the Clerk to whom the Director paid the $25,000 pursuant to s. 6(5). There has to be a lawsuit by each claimant against the company and a judgment in favour of each claimant: s. 6(3) Public Auctions Act.

Issue

[17] The lawsuit was started January 31, 2001, which is after the date that the Defendant got his absolute discharge from bankruptcy.

[18] The sole issue is whether the Defendant's liability on the guarantee was released by the order of discharge: s. 178(2) BIA. The answer to that depends on whether the Plaintiff's claim is a claim "provable in bankruptcy". If it is not a claim provable in bankruptcy the BIA gives no protection to the Defendant.

[19] The relevant section is s. 121. It provides in part:

> 121.(1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

> (2) The determination whether a contingent or unliquidated claim is a provable claim and the valuation of such a claim shall be made in accordance with section 135.

[20] The Defendant's position is that because the guarantee was given before the date of bankruptcy his liability on it is a liability within the scope of s. 121(1).

[21] At the outset it must be emphasized that this is not the usual situation of a lender (creditor), a borrower (debtor) and a guarantor. In that situation the debtor must do a positive act, pay the debt, and if he does not do so the guarantor is obligated to do so.

[22] In the present lawsuit those are not the facts. The company's obligation is to reimburse the Plaintiff if the Director forfeits the bond and only to the extent that the Plaintiff suffers a loss, which is capped at $25,000.

[23] If the bond is not forfeited there is no loss by the Plaintiff. If the bond is forfeited but the total claims are less than $25,000 the Plaintiff's loss is just the total amount of the claims because what is left is paid by the Clerk to the Plaintiff.

[24] Whether the bond is forfeited depends on certain facts.

[25] In the usual guarantee situation there are three certain facts:

(a) there is a debt,

(b) the debt must be paid,

(c) the amount of the debt is certain.

The only uncertainty, for a guarantor, is whether the debtor will pay the debt.

[26] In the present lawsuit the uncertainties, for the Defendant as guarantor, are greater:

(a) will the company commit acts of default which would give claimants access to the bond,

(b) will claimants sue the company and get judgments against it,

(c) will claimants then give notice to the Director,

(d) will the Director forfeit the bond,

(e) what will the claims total,

2002 ABQB 28 (CanLII)

(f) will the company reimburse the Plaintiff.

[27] If facts (a) and (b) do exist fact (c) will probably exist and facts (d) and (e) will then certainly exist. But facts (a) to (c) are sequential. Facts (a) and (b) must exist before facts (c) exists. If facts (a) and (b) do exist fact (c) is a high probability and fact (d) is a certainty because the legislation requires the Director to forfeit the bond.

[28] The point of all this is that the uncertainties for the Defendant, as guarantor, are greater than in the usual situation. The contingencies are greater.

[29] Section 121(1) BIA refers to "claims provable". Farm Credit Corp. v. Holowach (Bankrupts), (1988) 86 A.R. 304 (C.A.) says that a provable claim must be one recoverable by legal process, para. 7. That is not to be taken as meaning that the creditor must have a cause of action at the date of bankruptcy. That was not the issue before the Court so of course the question remains whether a claim which is contingent at the date of bankruptcy is a claim provable in the bankruptcy.

[30] There is no evidence that anything happened prior to the date of bankruptcy that would have given the Plaintiff a cause of action at the date of bankruptcy. What is clear is that the bond was forfeited after the Defendant went into bankruptcy. Prior to the forfeiture the Plaintiff would not have had a cause of action against either the company or the Defendant.

[31] There is also no evidence before me of any facts prior to the date of bankruptcy to assist me in valuing the Plaintiff's claim if it is a provable claim. I refer here to the problem in applying s. 121(2).

[32] The Plaintiff's claim against the Defendant would be a contingent liability because of the six facts I have earlier identified.

[33] The indemnity agreement between the Plaintiff and the company provides that:

> ... the [company] does hereby agree to indemnify and save harmless the [Plaintiff] from and in respect of any and all liability, claims or demands to which the [Plaintiff] may be exposed or subject and all loss, costs, damages and expenses whatsoever or liability thereunder, which the [Plaintiff] may be called > upon to sustain or incur, or does sustain or incur by any reason of the said Bond ... and to immediately upon the demand of the [Plaintiff], pay to the [Plaintiff] a sufficient amount to meet the payment of any loss damage, costs, charges or expenses, that the [Plaintiff] may be called upon to sustain, or has sustained, by reason of the said Bond.

[34] The indemnity agreement also says:

> AND IT IS FURTHER AGREED THAT:
>
> (e) The [company's] liability to the [Plaintiff] hereunder shall arise immediately when the [Plaintiff] has made any payment or has undertaken to incur any loss or expense in connection with the said Bond, or has been served with notice by the Director requiring payment under the said Bond pursuant to provisions of the said Public Auction Act.

[35] In this case the Defendant's liability to the Plaintiff is co-extensive to the company's liability to the Plaintiff: Meridian Developments Ltd. v. Nu-West Group Ltd., (1984) 52 A.R. 248 (C.A.), para. 27:

> Prima facie a guarantor's obligations are co-extensive with those of the principal debtor but the starting point must always be to analyze the nature of the guarantor's undertaking. . . . It is also important to an analysis of the problem to remember that though the obligations of surety and principal debtor are often co-extensive they are, nevertheless, separate and distinct obligations.

[36] I have earlier identified the relevant provision in the guarantee. For convenience I set it out again. The Defendant:

> "... unconditionally guarantees payment to the [Plaintiff] of all debts and liabilities, present or future, direct or indirect, absolute or contingent, matured or not, at any time owing by the [company] to the [Plaintiff] now or hereafter incurred or arising from the said Agreement of Indemnity or any other agreement or obligation ... and ... agrees to indemnify and save harmless the [Plaintiff] from and in respect of any and all liability ... by reason of the said Bond ..."

[37] I am satisfied that the Defendant's liability is co-extensive to that of the company's liability.

[38] [At this point I will deal with a submission made by a prior counsel who appeared for the Plaintiff on the initial applications.] The guarantee also says in part:

> 10. No suit based on this guarantee and agreement shall be instituted until demand for payment has been made ...

The submission was that there is no liability by the Defendant until a demand is made.

[39] I do not agree. Clause 10 does not say that. The answer to that submission is found in Alberta Agricultural Development Corp. v. Smith, 13 Alta. L.R. (3d) 338 (C.A.), paras. 44-46.

[40] I do not know if Mr. Heinz, who now appears for the Plaintiff, also supports that submission.

[41] Although clause (e) of the indemnity agreement says that the company's liability to the Plaintiff "shall arise immediately" when the Plaintiff has paid to the Director or has been served with a demand for payment by the Director that does not mean that there is no liability until one of those facts happens. That would confuse formation of a contract with performance of obligations under a contract. There is a liability by the company but it must perform its obligation to the Plaintiff only on the happening of certain facts. Performance is contingent on the happening of certain facts.

[42] Those facts are:

(a) the company commits acts of default which give claimants access to the bond,

(b) claimants sue the company and get judgments against it,

(c) claimants give claims to the Director.

If those facts occur the Director will demand that the Plaintiff pay $25,000 under the bond. The company's obligation to pay the Plaintiff is contingent on those facts happening and, as the Defendant's obligation to pay the Plaintiff is co-extensive to the company's obligation to pay, the Defendant's obligation to pay the Plaintiff is also contingent on those facts happening.

[43] In deciding if the Defendant's liability on the guarantee is a claim provable in the bankruptcy the relevant point in time is the date of the bankruptcy. Section 121(1) BIA also encompasses claims that might arise before the Defendant gets his discharge. However, the later forfeiture of the bond does not change the fact that at the date of bankruptcy the

Plaintiff's claim would still be a contingent claim. That then brings s. 121(2) into play. I set out the sub-section again:

> (2) The determination whether a contingent or unliquidated claim is a provable claim and the valuation of such a claim shall be made in accordance with section 135.

[44] In this case that is little assistance. Section 135 deals with the case where a claimant submits a claim in the bankruptcy. The section says in part:

> 135.(1) The trustee shall examine every proof of claim or proof of security and the grounds therefor and may require further evidence in support of the claim or security.
> (1.1) The trustee shall determine whether any contingent claim or unliquidated claim is a provable claim, and, if a provable claim, the trustee shall value it, and the claim is thereafter, subject to this section, deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.

[45] Because s. 135 never came into play I am now asked to decide if the Plaintiff's claim on the guarantee is a contingent claim, which it is, and whether it can be valued, and if so what is its value. I must decide whether the claim can be valued because, it if cannot, it is not a provable claim in the bankruptcy and so the order of discharge is not a defence.

[46] Abacus Cities Ltd. (Trustee of) v. AMIC Mortgage Investment Corp., [1992] 4 W.W.R. 309 (Alta. C.A.) holds that facts occurring after the date of bankruptcy based on a pre-bankruptcy contract can give rise to a claim provable in the bankruptcy. The issue was whether mortgagees could claim in the bankruptcy for costs incurred after the date of bankruptcy, where the claims for costs were based on indemnities by the bankrupt found in pre-bankruptcy mortgages. The trustee's position was that these costs were not provable claims.

[47] The Court starts out:

> ... Also, no rule of law forbids simpliciter the enforcement, for costs incurred by the creditor after bankruptcy, of a pre-bankruptcy cost indemnity given by the bankrupt.
>
> . . . . .
>
> It is common ground that no term in the statute clearly and unequivocally resolves either dispute, and no authority has yet reached precisely these topics. In my view, I stated the correct rules for the case at the start, and for the reasons that follow.

(p. 312)

[48] In discussing the issue the Court says, pp. 316-319:

> In my view, the costs rule proposed by the trustee offers even greater difficulties.
>
> Again, the trustee relied upon s. 121(1) as prohibiting future claims. Again, it had to acknowledge that a demand for costs incurred after bankruptcy that invokes an agreement made before bankruptcy falls within the scope of entitlement under that section. The precise point came before Baron Pollock and Viscount Cave in 1886: see Re Smith; Ex parte Edwards (1886), 3 Morr. 179 (Div. Ct.), at pp. 183-85.
>
> In its factum, the trustee offered only an argument based upon the limit on future charges implied by operation of the valuation procedure in s. 121(2). In oral argument, Mr. Robinson expanded this by relying upon an analogy to the common law about post-bankruptcy interest.
>
> I will first deal with the argument based upon s. 121(2). It provides:
>
> (2) The court shall, on the application of the trustee, determine whether any contingent claim or any unliquidated claim is a provable claim, and, if a provable claim, it shall value the claim, and the claim shall after that valuation be deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.
>
> The trustee argued that this rule limits future exactions to those that can be valued before they arise. Future costs, unlike future interest, cannot readily be calculated in advance.
>
> I agree that this rule can limit future claims that otherwise fall within the scope of entitlement. In fact, some may not be provable when the trustee calls for proof. The trustee cities two examples: Re Carling Acceptance Ltd. (1976), 22 C.B.R. (N.S.) 258 (Ont. S.C.), and Re Stone (1980), 34 C.B.R. (N.S.) 87 (Ont. S.C.). Both offer difficulties. In Carling, the court first found that the challenged demand was, by its terms, conditional. It then found that the condition, in fact, would never be met during the bankruptcy. The condition required that the bankrupt have a large surplus! One might dismiss the decision as merely one where the claimant failed to prove its case. In Stone, the bankrupt had guaranteed a debt payable by instalment. The primary debtor had defaulted, but, on the date of bankruptcy, only a portion of the debt had become due and payable. The claim of the primary creditor against the estate of the guarantor bankrupt was limited to what was due. That decision might be doubted because some contingent future liability existed to be valued: See, contra, Re Froment, [1925] 2 W.W.R. 415, 5 C.B.R. 765, [1925] 3 D.L.R. 377 (Alta. T.D.), at p. 423 [W.W.R.]. Ironically, in that case the court did not discount the award for the contingency that the primary debtor might pay.

One must take care not to overstate the rule. It does not eliminate contingent or future claims. It merely subjects them to a valuation process: see Smith v. Elliot Lake Ready-Mix Ltd., [1961] O.W.N. 285, 2 C.B.R. (N.S.) 187 (H.C.), at p. 190 [C.B.R.] and Manitoba Public Insurance Corp. v. Wallace (1988), 69 C.B.R. (N.S.) 56 (Man, Q.B.), at p.59:

The trustee asserted that all must be valued as at the date of bankruptcy. As this case can be decided without challenge to this assertion, I accept it for that purpose. But I note that judicial valuation occurs only when the trustee asks for it. The valuing court can have regard to events after bankruptcy, and before the hearing, to help it decide. I see nothing in the cases, or in common sense, to the opposite effect. The learned chambers judge here accepted the impossibility of valuation of the date of bankruptcy. I see no evidence to support that finding.

Indeed, I doubt the fairness of reliance on s. 121(2) in this case because the trustee here has yet to make an application and the court has yet to hear the evidence. If we treat this motion for directions as such an application, then the mortgagees can fairly say that, today, they can prove the sums they claim. The situation might have been very different had the trustee brought an application years ago. Of course, the mortgagees did not file a specific claim until 1989, after all securities were realized and a final deficiency calculation available.

In the result, I do not accept that s. 121(2) necessarily defeats the mortgagees in this case.

. . . . .

In conclusion, no rule of law forbids simpliciter the enforcement of a pre-bankruptcy cost indemnity given by the bankrupt to a creditor for expenses incurred after bankruptcy. But a bankruptcy court may refuse to enforce that indemnity. It might refuse when enforcement would countenance abuse of the bankruptcy process; or where a creditor incurred costs other than in a "commercially reasonable fashion."

[49] Re Carling Acceptance Ltd., referred to in Abacus Cities Ltd. (Trustee of), was affirmed on appeal, 23 C.B.R. (N.S.) 245 (Ont. C.A.).

[50] The issue in In Re Froment, referred to in Abacus Cities Ltd. (Trustee of), was whether a surety who had not been called on to pay by the creditor could still prove in the bankruptcy of the debtor. The Court says, p. 423:

> . . . given by The Bankruptcy Act. That Act extends the rights of persons who are subject to a contingent liability.
> Under subsec. (2) of sec. 44 of that Act "all debts and liabilities present and future, to which the debtor is subject at the date of the receiving order or the making of an authorized assignment or to which he may become subject before his discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the date of the receiving order or the making of the authorized assignment, shall be deemed to be debts provable in bankruptcy or in proceedings under an authorized assignment, if the claim is based upon a contract or promise as provided for in subsec. (1) of the same section. The provisions of these subsections are similar to those contained in The Bankruptcy Acts (Imp.) 46 & 47 Vict. ch. 52, sec. 37, and 4 & 5 George V., ch. 59, sec. 30, under which sections the right of proof on the part of a surety has arisen in numerous cases as a result of which "it is now established, notwithstanding the doubts expressed in In re Parrott; ex parte Whittaker, 8 Morr. 49, 63 L.T. 777, that the contingent liability of a surety who has not been called upon to pay, or has not in fact paid, forms a debt provable in the bankruptcy of the principal debtor (In re Paine; Ex parte Read, [1897] 1 Q.B. 122, 66 L.J. Q.B. 71; In Herepath and Delamr; Ex parte Delmar, 7 Morr. 129; In re Blackpool Motor Car Co. Ltd. [1901] a Ch. 77, 70 L.J. Ch. 61) and that one surety can prove in the bankruptcy of a co-surety for contribution, although the proving surety has not paid the creditor anything (Wolmershausen v. Gullick [1893] 2 Ch. 514, 62 L.J. Ch. 773" [Williams on Bankruptcy, 10th ed., p. 161; 12th ed., p. 153.]

[51] As Re Abacus Cities Ltd. (Trustee of) points out, In re Froment did not discount the surety's claim.

[52] In re Froment was referred to and accepted as sound law in Cuchuran v. Dubitz [1945] 3 W.W.R. 541 (Alta. D.C.).

[53] Re Abacus Cities Ltd. (Trustee of) was referred to in Re Abacuas Cities Ltd. (Trustee of) v. Fidelity Trust Co., 63 Alta. L.R. (3d) 390 (Q.B.). It says, p. 392:

> I agree with an accept the obiter of Kerans J. in determining how to value these claims. The valuation in this case will be a two step process. First, pursuant to s. 121 the claim is to be fixed on the date of bankruptcy and , in this case, the measure will be the undischarged accumulated second mortgages at the date of bankruptcy. Secondly, the Court will take into consideration those > acts by the trustee which result in a decreased in the amounts owed to Fidelity which occur after the date of bankruptcy, and it will also take into consideration any acts by the claimant which would result in the mitigation of the claimant's own losses.

[54] Claude Resources Inc. (Trustee of) v. Dutton, 22 C.B.R. (3d) 56, (Sask. Q.B.) says that if there are too many "ifs" to a contingent claim the claim is not a provable claim. It also says that if valuation is "speculative in the extreme" the claim is not provable under s. 121(2).

[55] Re Wiebe, 30 C.B.R. (3d) 109 (Ont. S.C.) applies Claude Resources Inc. (Trustee of) and valued the contingent claim at 10% of its face value.

[56] Re Confederation Treasury Services Ltd. 43 C.B.R. (3d) 4 (Ont. C.A.) casts some doubt on Re Wiebe and Claude Resources Inc. (Trustee of). It says, pp. 6-7:

> We turn to the appeal itself. Section 121 of the BIA deems all debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt to be claims provable in proceedings under the Act. Section 121(2) makes specific reference to contingent claims and unliquidated claims. The claim of E&Y is, on its face, a contingent claim and, because E&Y is subject to a claim for treble damages in the Michigan proceedings, is not the same as the claim asserted against the trustee in Ontario by the Rebabilitator and exceeds that claim to the extent that any such damages may be awarded over and above the amount that may be awarded against the trustee.
> In so far as the case of Claude Resources Inc. (Trustee of) v. Dutton (1993), 22 C.B.R. (3d) 56 (Sask. Q.B.), and Re Wiebe (1995), 30 C.B.R. (3d) 109 (Ont. Bktcy.), relied upon by the trustee, articulate as a test for a valid contingent claim the need for probability of liability arising from the court proceedings in question, we believe that they impose too high a threshold for the establishment of such a claim. While there may be claims so remote and speculative in nature that they could not properly be considered contingent claims, the claim of E&Y in the present case for contribution and indemnity in respect of the relief sought against it in the Michigan proceedings does not fall into that category and, in our view, constitutes a valid contingent claim within the contemplation of sec. 121 of the BIA.

> Accordingly, the appeal from the order disallowing E&Y's proof of claim is allowed and, in its place, a declaration will issue that E&Y's contingent claim is a claim provable in the bankruptcy of Confederation Treasury Services Limited. Pursuant to s. 121(2) of the BIA, the matter is remitted to the Ontario Court (General Division) to value E&Y's claim upon such evidence as may be adduced by the parties in respect of such valuation and E& Y's claim shall be deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.

[57] Counsel referred to only one decision, Ontario New Home Warranty Program v. Jiordan Homes Limited, 43 O.R.(3d) 756 (S.C.J.). The facts are these.

[58] The bankrupt was a shareholder of a house building company. He gave a guarantee to the plaintiff to indemnify it if it had to make good any obligations of the company under the new home warranty program. Some time later the bankrupt assigned himself into bankruptcy. The bankrupt was later discharged. A day later a claimant made a claim against the plaintiff and the plaintiff paid the claim. It then sued the bankrupt on the guarantee.

[59] The Court says: p. 758:

> The plaintiff is claiming the $8,000 from the defendant under his personal guarantee.
>
> There are two issues: first, did the bankruptcy terminate the guarantee? Second, if not, is the claim barred because of the defendant's bankruptcy?
>
> Counsel advise me there are no cases on point.
>

[60] This is the Court's analysis and decision, pp. 758-59:

> Section 69 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended, states that a creditor has no remedy against an insolvent for a claim provable in bankruptcy.
> Section 121(1) states:
> 121(1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject at the date of the bankruptcy or to which he may become subject before his discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the date of the bankruptcy shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.

Subsection (2) provides that the court shall on application by the trustee determine whether any contingent claim is a provable claim. No such application was made.

It appears to me that when the defendant went bankrupt, the claim by the plaintiff against the defendant was a future liability to which the defendant might theoretically become subject before his discharge by reason of an obligation incurred before the date of the bankruptcy. The obligation was the indemnity agreement.

The theoretical risk was this: before the defendant's discharge, Jiordan had failed to close the sale, and if it did not repay the deposits, Ramos might claim the amount from the plaintiff, and the plaintiff might pay and claim the amount from the defendant. However, s. 121(1) makes the claim a provable claim only if the defendant "is subject" to a liability before his discharge; that is, it is a provable claim only if the defendant actually becomes liable before his discharge. While the section includes liabilities which may become due at a future time after discharge, it appears to me that it does not include liabilities which do not arise until after discharge.

Here, the defendant did not become subject to a liability until the plaintiff made the payment for which it claims indemnity and that payment was made after discharge.

Consequently, I conclude that the claim in this action was not a provable claim in the defendant's bankruptcy and this action is not barred by s. 69 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, as amended.

Did the Bankruptcy Terminate the Guarantee?

There appears to be no provision in the Act which governs this issue.

It may seem anomalous that where a person's wealth is erased by bankruptcy, and that wealth is the reason why he was asked for and gave a guarantee, that he should continue to be liable on the guarantee after bankruptcy for claims which were not provable in bankruptcy and therefore not erased by it. However, I can see no indication in the Act that the guarantee should somehow evaporate in the bankruptcy. If the bankrupt were a party to other kinds of contracts which imposes obligation on him then these would not evaporate because of the bankruptcy.

I conclude that the guarantee here survives the bankruptcy and that the Act does not bar this action.

[61] First, on the facts, those are not the facts before me. The Director made the demand on the Plaintiff while the Defendant was in bankruptcy and the Plaintiff paid the Director $25,000 while the Defendant was still in bankruptcy.

[62] Second, I question the statement that the bankrupt is not "subject to a liability" until and unless the plaintiff paid a claim. That overlooks the fact that the bankrupt's liability is a contingent liability and s. 121 recognizes contingent liabilities.

[63] Third, the statement that counsel did not provide any "cases on point" invites the comments of McCardie J. in Abrahams v. Buckley. [1924] 1 K.B. 903, p. 907:

> Half the bulk and much of the confusion of English case law springs from the fact that many decisions are given without adequate reference to the particular authorities which bear on the point at issue. If those authorities are before the Court then a decision, be it right or wrong, is, at all events, given with knowledge of the appropriate cases. If not before the Court, then obscurity and inconsistency take a new birth.

It is counsel's responsibility to research the law.

[64] Each party applies for summary judgment.

[65] On a summary judgment application the test is whether there is a genuine issue of material fact requiring a trial: Guarantee Co. of North America v. Gordon Capital Corp., (2000) 247 N.R. 97 (S.C.C.), para. 27; Kruetner v. Waterloo Oxford Co-operative Inc., 50 O.R. (3d) 140 (C.A.); Blackburn v. Lapkin, 28 O.R. (3d) 292 (Ont. C.J.). That also applies when there is a genuine issue of law.

[66] Where a defendant applies for summary judgment the test is set out in Huet v. Lynch, 184 D.L.R. (4th) 658 (Alta. C.A.), para. 20:

> The standard of proof applicable to a defendant under Rule 159 is high. It is not enough that the defendant shows a strong likelihood of success. There must be no reasonable prospect of success.

See Ghermezian v. Corey Developments Inc., Q.B. 9903 22832 and 0003 09356, Oct. 29, 2001 (Q.B.) for a more comprehensive analysis of the law on summary judgment applications.

[67] Each party adopts a position which ignores all the case law I have referred to except the one case cited by counsel, Ontario Home Warranty Program. That case has no precedential value.

[68] Where a surety (regardless of the form that the suretyship take) goes bankrupt before the protected party claims on the suretyship contract the case law does treat the bankrupt's liability on the suretyship contract as a contingent liability. Section 121 BIA does give recognition to contingent liabilities. The issues then are whether that contingent liability can be valued and if so what value should be given to that liability.

[69] In Re Froment did not "discount" the surety's liability. That is, the contingent liability was valued for its full face value. I do not read the case as saying that as a matter of law a surety's contingent liability must be valued at its full face value. That would be contrary to s. 121(2), which requires a valuation. The full face valuation in In Re Froment is just a decision on the facts on what value should be given to the surety's contingent liability.

Decision

[70] I consider the present applications can be properly disposed of based on Abacus Cities Ltd. (Trustee of) and Re Confederation Treasury Services Ltd.

[71] First, I conclude that the Defendant's liability is a contingent claim within s. 121 BIA.

[72] Second, I conclude that the only issue is the value of the liability. If the liability can be valued the amount of the value is caught by the order of discharge and the Defendant is released from liability to the extent of the valuation: s. 178(2) BIA. If the liability is valued at less than $25,000 the Defendant is not released from liability for the difference. If the liability cannot be valued the Defendant is not released from any liability based on the guarantee.

[73] I follow the thrust of Re Confederation Treasury Services Ltd. and direct that this lawsuit go to trial solely to determine amount: Rule 159(5).

[74] Costs of both applications will be in the cause.

HEARD on the 26th day of October, 2001.

Commercial law — Corporations — Plan of arrangement — Proposed plan of arrangement not arranging rights of security holders but affecting their economic interests — Whether plan of arrangement was fair and reasonable — Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-44, s. 192.

At issue is a plan of arrangement that contemplates the purchase of the shares of BCE Inc. ("BCE") by a consortium of purchasers (the "Purchaser") by way of a leveraged buyout. After BCE was put "in play", an auction process was held and offers were submitted by three groups. All three offers contemplated the addition of a substantial amount of new debt for which Bell Canada, a wholly owned subsidiary of BCE, would be liable. BCE's board of directors found that the Purchaser's offer was in the best interests of BCE and BCE's shareholders. Essentially, the arrangement provides for the compulsory acquisition of all of BCE's outstanding shares. The price to be paid by the Purchaser represents a premium of approximately 40 percent over the market price of BCE shares at the relevant time. The total capital required for the transaction is approximately $52 billion, $38.5 billion of which will be supported by BCE. Bell Canada will guarantee approximately $30 billion of BCE's debt. The Purchaser will invest nearly $8 billion of new equity capital in BCE.

The plan of arrangement was approved by 97.93 percent of BCE's shareholders, but was opposed by a group of financial and other institutions that hold debentures issued by Bell Canada. These debentureholders sought relief under the oppression remedy under s. 241 of the Canada Business Corporations Act ("CBCA"). They also alleged that the arrangement was not "fair and reasonable" and opposed court approval of the arrangement under s. 192 of the CBCA. The crux of their complaints is that, upon the completion of the arrangement, the short-term trading value of the debentures would decline by an average of 20 percent and could lose investment grade status.

détenteurs de valeurs mobilières — Les attentes raisonnables invoquées par les détenteurs de valeurs mobilières étaient-elles étayées par la preuve? — Une attente raisonnable a-t-elle été frustrée par un comportement constituant un abus, un préjudice injuste ou une omission injuste de tenir compte d'un intérêt pertinent? — Loi canadienne sur les sociétés par actions, L.R.C. 1985, ch. C-44, art. 122(1)a), 241.

Droit commercial — Sociétés par actions — Plan d'arrangement — Plan d'arrangement proposé ne visant pas les droits de détenteurs de valeurs mobilières, mais portant atteinte à leurs intérêts financiers — Le plan d'arrangement était-il équitable et raisonnable? — Loi canadienne sur les sociétés par actions, L.R.C. 1985, ch. C-44, art. 192.

Le litige porte sur un plan d'arrangement concernant l'achat des actions de BCE Inc. (« BCE ») par un consortium (l'« acquéreur ») au moyen d'une acquisition par emprunt. BCE ayant été « mise en jeu », un processus d'enchères a été lancé et trois groupes ont présenté des offres. Chaque offre prévoyait une hausse sensible du niveau d'endettement de Bell Canada, une filiale en propriété exclusive de BCE. Le conseil d'administration de BCE a conclu que l'offre d'achat de l'acquéreur servait les intérêts de BCE et des actionnaires de BCE. Essentiellement, l'entente prévoit l'acquisition forcée de toutes les actions en circulation de BCE. Le prix offert par l'acquéreur représente une prime d'environ 40 p. 100 par rapport au cours de clôture des actions de BCE à la date pertinente. Le capital requis pour l'opération s'élève au total à environ 52 milliards de dollars, dont 38,5 milliards de dollars sont à la charge de BCE. Bell Canada fournira une garantie d'emprunt d'environ 30 milliards de dollars pour la dette de BCE. L'acquéreur investira près de 8 milliards de dollars de nouveaux capitaux propres dans BCE.

Les actionnaires de BCE ont approuvé l'entente dans une proportion de 97,93 p. 100, mais des détenteurs de débentures de Bell Canada, notamment des institutions financières, s'y sont opposés. Ces détenteurs de débentures ont intenté un recours pour abus prévu à l'art. 241 de la Loi canadienne sur les sociétés par actions (« LCSA »). Ils ont aussi allégué que l'arrangement n'était pas « équitable et raisonnable » et contesté l'approbation de l'arrangement exigée par l'art. 192 LCSA. Leur principal argument est que, une fois la transaction achevée, la valeur marchande à court terme de leurs débentures fléchirait de 20 p. 100 en moyenne, et leurs débentures ne seraient plus cotées comme admissibles pour des placements.

The Quebec Superior Court approved the arrangement as fair and dismissed the claim for oppression. The Court of Appeal set aside that decision, finding the arrangement had not been shown to be fair and held that it should not have been approved. It held that the directors had not only the duty to ensure that the debentureholders' contractual rights would be respected, but also to consider their reasonable expectations which, in its view, required directors to consider whether the adverse impact on debentureholders' economic interests could be alleviated. Since the requirements of s. 192 of the CBCA were not met, the court found it unnecessary to consider the oppression claim. BCE and Bell Canada appealed the overturning of the trial judge's approval of the plan of arrangement, and the debentureholders cross-appealed the dismissal of the claims for oppression.

Held: The appeals should be allowed and the cross-appeals dismissed.

The s. 241 oppression action and the s. 192 requirement for court approval of a change to the corporate structure are different types of proceedings, engaging different inquiries. The Court of Appeal's decision rested on an approach that erroneously combined the substance of the s. 241 oppression remedy with the onus of the s. 192 arrangement approval process, resulting in a conclusion that could not have been sustained under either provision, read on its own terms. 1. The Section 241 Oppression Remedy

The oppression remedy focuses on harm to the legal and equitable interests of a wide range of stakeholders affected by oppressive acts of a corporation or its directors. This remedy gives a court a broad jurisdiction to enforce not just what is legal but what is fair. Oppression is also fact specific: what is just and equitable is judged by the reasonable expectations of the stakeholders in the context and in regard to the relationships at play. [45] [58-59]

In assessing a claim of oppression, a court must answer two questions: (1) Does the evidence support the reasonable expectation asserted by the claimant? and (2) Does the evidence establish that the reasonable expectation was violated by conduct falling within the terms "oppression", "unfair prejudice" or "unfair disregard"

La Cour supérieure du Québec a approuvé l'arrangement, le jugeant équitable, et elle a rejeté la demande de redressement pour abus. La Cour d'appel a annulé cette décision, jugeant que le caractère équitable de l'arrangement n'avait pas été démontré et qu'il n'aurait pas dû être approuvé. Elle a statué que les administrateurs avaient l'obligation non seulement de s'assurer du respect des droits contractuels des détenteurs de débentures, mais aussi de tenir compte de leurs attentes raisonnables, ce qui, selon elle, les obligeait à examiner s'il était possible d'atténuer l'effet préjudiciable de l'arrangement sur les intérêts financiers des détenteurs de débentures. Les conditions fixées par l'art. 192 n'étant pas remplies, la cour a jugé inutile d'examiner la demande de redressement pour abus. BCE et Bell Canada ont interjeté appel de l'annulation de l'approbation du plan d'arrangement par le juge de première instance, et les détenteurs de débentures ont formé un appel incident contre le rejet des demandes de redressement pour abus.

Arrêt : Les pourvois sont accueillis et les pourvois incidents sont rejetés.

La demande de redressement pour abus prévue à l'art. 241 et l'approbation judiciaire d'une modification de structure exigée par l'art. 192 sont des recours différents qui soulèvent des questions différentes. La décision de la Cour d'appel s'appuie sur un raisonnement qui combine à tort les éléments substantiels de la demande de redressement pour abus de l'art. 241 et le fardeau de la preuve applicable à l'approbation d'un arrangement exigée par l'art. 192, ce qui l'a menée à une conclusion qu'aucune de ces dispositions, isolément, n'aurait pu justifier. [47] [165]

1. La demande de redressement pour abus prévue à l'art. 241

La demande de redressement pour abus vise la réparation d'une atteinte aux intérêts en law ou en equity d'un vaste éventail de parties intéressées touchées par le comportement abusif d'une société ou de ses administrateurs. Ce recours confère au tribunal un vaste pouvoir d'imposer le respect non seulement du droit, mais de l'équité. Le sort d'une demande de redressement pour abus dépend en outre des faits : ce qui est juste et équitable est fonction des attentes raisonnables des parties intéressées compte tenu du contexte et des rapports entre les parties. [45] [58-59]

Le tribunal saisi d'une demande de redressement pour abus doit répondre à deux questions : (1) La preuve étaye-t-elle l'attente raisonnable invoquée par le plaignant? (2) La preuve établit-elle que cette attente raisonnable a été frustrée par un comportement pouvant être qualifié d'« abus », de « préjudice injuste » ou d'« omission injuste

of a relevant interest? For the first question, useful factors from the case law in determining whether a reasonable expectation exists include: general commercial practice; the nature of the corporation; the relationship between the parties; past practice; steps the claimant could have taken to protect itself; representations and agreements; and the fair resolution of conflicting interests between corporate stakeholders. For the second question, a claimant must show that the failure to meet the reasonable expectation involved unfair conduct and prejudicial consequences under s. 241. [68] [72] [89] [95]

Where conflicting interests arise, it falls to the directors of the corporation to resolve them in accordance with their fiduciary duty to act in the best interests of the corporation. The cases on oppression, taken as a whole, confirm that this duty comprehends a duty to treat individual stakeholders affected by corporate actions equitably and fairly. There are no absolute rules and no principle that one set of interests should prevail over another. In each case, the question is whether, in all the circumstances, the directors acted in the best interests of the corporation, having regard to all relevant considerations, including — but not confined to — the need to treat affected stakeholders in a fair manner, commensurate with the corporation's duties as a responsible corporate citizen. Where it is impossible to please all stakeholders, it will be irrelevant that the directors rejected alternative transactions that were no more beneficial than the chosen one. [81-83]

Here, the debentureholders did not establish that they had a reasonable expectation that the directors of BCE would protect their economic interests by putting forth a plan of arrangement that would maintain the investment grade trading value of their debentures. The trial judge concluded that this expectation was not made out on the evidence, given the overall context of the relationship, the nature of the corporation, its situation as the target of a bidding war, the fact that the claimants could have protected themselves against reductions in market value by negotiating appropriate contractual terms, and that any statements by Bell Canada suggesting a commitment to retain investment grade ratings for the debentures were accompanied by warnings precluding such expectations. The trial judge recognized that the content of the directors' fiduciary duty to act in the best interests of the corporation was affected by the various interests at stake in the context of the auction process, and that they might have to approve transactions that were in the best interests of the corporation de tenir compte » d'un intérêt pertinent? En ce qui a trait à la première question, les facteurs utiles d'appréciation d'une attente raisonnable qui ressortent de la jurisprudence incluent : les pratiques commerciales courantes, la nature de la société, les rapports entre les parties, les pratiques antérieures, les mesures préventives qui auraient pu être prises, les déclarations et conventions, ainsi que la conciliation équitable des intérêts opposés de parties intéressées. En ce qui concerne la deuxième question, le plaignant doit prouver que le défaut de répondre à son attente raisonnable est imputable à une conduite injuste et qu'il en a résulté des conséquences préjudiciables au sens de l'art. 241. [68] [72] [89] [95]

Lorsque surgit un conflit d'intérêts, les administrateurs doivent le résoudre conformément à leur obligation fiduciaire d'agir au mieux des intérêts de la société. Dans son ensemble, la jurisprudence en matière d'abus confirme que cette obligation inclut le devoir de traiter de façon juste et équitable chaque partie intéressée touchée par les actes de la société. Il n'existe pas de règles absolues ni de principe voulant que les intérêts d'un groupe doivent prévaloir sur ceux d'un autre groupe. Il faut se demander chaque fois si, dans les circonstances, les administrateurs ont agi au mieux des intérêts de la société, en prenant en considération tous les facteurs pertinents, ce qui inclut, sans s'y limiter, la nécessité de traiter les parties intéressées touchées de façon équitable, conformément aux obligations de la société en tant qu'entreprise socialement responsable. Lorsqu'il est impossible de satisfaire toutes les parties intéressées, il importe peu que les administrateurs aient écarté d'autres transactions qui n'étaient pas plus avantageuses que celle qui a été choisie. [81-83]

En l'espèce, les détenteurs de débentures n'ont pas démontré qu'ils s'attendaient raisonnablement à ce que les administrateurs de BCE protègent leurs intérêts financiers en proposant un plan d'arrangement qui maintiendrait la valeur marchande de leurs débentures cotées comme admissibles pour des placements. Le juge de première instance a conclu que la preuve de cette attente n'avait pas été établie compte tenu du contexte global de la relation, de la nature de la société, de sa situation en tant que cible de plusieurs offres d'achat, du fait que les plaignants auraient pu se protéger eux-mêmes contre le fléchissement de la valeur marchande en négociant des clauses contractuelles appropriées et que les déclarations de Bell Canada concernant son engagement à conserver aux débentures une cote de placements admissibles s'accompagnaient de mises en garde excluant pareilles attentes. Le juge de première instance a reconnu que le contenu de l'obligation fiduciaire des administrateurs d'agir au mieux des intérêts de la société dépendait des divers intérêts en jeu dans le contexte du processus

but which benefited some groups at the expense of others. All three competing bids required Bell Canada to assume additional debt. Under the business judgment rule, deference should be accorded to the business decisions of directors acting in good faith in performing the functions they were elected to perform. In this case, there was no error in the principles applied by the trial judge nor in his findings of fact. [96-100]

The debentureholders had also argued that they had a reasonable expectation that the directors would consider their economic interests in maintaining the trading value of the debentures. While the evidence, objectively viewed, supports a reasonable expectation that the directors would consider the position of the debentureholders in making their decisions on the various offers under consideration, it is apparent that the directors considered the interests of debentureholders, and concluded that while the contractual terms of the debentures would be honoured, no further commitments could be made. This fulfilled the duty of the directors to consider the debentureholders' interests and did not amount to "unfair disregard" of the interests of debentureholders. What the claimants contend is, in reality, an expectation that the directors would take positive steps to restructure the purchase in a way that would provide a satisfactory price to shareholders and preserve the high market value of the debentures. There was no evidence that it was reasonable to suppose this could be achieved, since all three bids involved a substantial increase in Bell Canada's debt. Commercial practice and reality also undermine their claim. Leveraged buyouts are not unusual or unforeseeable, and the debentureholders could have negotiated protections in their contracts. Given the nature and the corporate history of Bell Canada, it should not have been outside the contemplation of debentureholders that plans of arrangements could occur in the future. While the debentureholders rely on the past practice of maintaining the investment grade rating of the debentures, the events precipitating the leveraged buyout transaction were market realities affecting what were reasonable practices. No representations had been made to debentureholders upon which they could reasonably rely. [96] [102] [104-106] [108-110] d'enchères et qu'ils pouvaient n'avoir d'autre choix que d'approuver des transactions qui, bien qu'elles servent au mieux les intérêts de la société, privilégieraient certains groupes au détriment d'autres groupes. Les trois offres concurrentes comportaient toutes un endettement supplémentaire de Bell Canada. La règle de l'appréciation commerciale commande la retenue à l'égard des décisions commerciales prises de bonne foi par les administrateurs dans l'exécution des fonctions pour lesquelles ils ont été élus. En l'espèce, le juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur dans son application des principes ni dans ses conclusions de fait. [96-100]

Les détenteurs de débentures avaient aussi fait valoir qu'ils s'attendaient raisonnablement à ce que les administrateurs tiennent compte de leurs intérêts financiers en préservant la valeur marchande des débentures. La preuve, considérée objectivement, permet de conclure qu'il était raisonnable de s'attendre à ce que les administrateurs tiennent compte de la position des détenteurs de débentures dans leurs décisions sur les diverses offres à l'étude, mais ils ont manifestement pris en considération les intérêts des détenteurs de débentures et conclu qu'ils ne pouvaient prendre aucun autre engagement que celui de respecter les dispositions contractuelles rattachées aux débentures. Cela répondait à l'obligation des administrateurs de tenir compte des intérêts des détenteurs de débentures et ne constituait pas une « omission injuste de tenir compte » de leurs intérêts. Ce que les plaignants font valoir en réalité, c'est qu'ils comptaient que les administrateurs adoptent des mesures concrètes pour restructurer l'acquisition de manière à assurer un prix d'achat satisfaisant pour les actionnaires et à préserver la valeur marchande élevée des débentures. Rien dans la preuve n'indique qu'il était raisonnable de supposer que ce résultat pouvait être atteint, puisque les trois offres comportaient toutes un accroissement substantiel de l'endettement de Bell Canada. Le réalité et les pratiques commerciales affaiblissent aussi leur prétention. Les acquisitions par emprunt n'ont rien d'inhabituel ou d'imprévisible, et les détenteurs de débentures auraient pu négocier des mesures de protection contractuelles. Compte tenu de la nature et de l'historique de Bell Canada, les détenteurs de débentures devaient savoir que des arrangements pouvaient être conclus dans l'avenir. Bien que les détenteurs de débentures invoquent les pratiques antérieures selon lesquelles la cote des débentures comme admissibles pour des placements avait toujours été maintenue, les événements qui ont conduit à la transaction d'acquisition par emprunt faisaient partie des conditions du marché au gré desquelles les pratiques raisonnables peuvent changer. Aucune déclaration à laquelle les détenteurs de débentures auraient pu raisonnablement se fier ne leur avait été faite. [96] [102] [104-106] [108-110]

With respect to the duty on directors to resolve the conflicting interests of stakeholders in a fair manner that reflected the best interests of the corporation, the corporation's best interests arguably favoured acceptance of the offer at the time. The trial judge accepted the evidence that Bell Canada needed to undertake significant changes to be successful, and the momentum of the market made a buyout inevitable. Considering all the relevant factors, the debentureholders failed to establish a reasonable expectation that could give rise to a claim for oppression. [111-113]

2. The Section 192 Approval Process

The s. 192 approval process is generally applicable to change of control transactions where the arrangement is sponsored by the directors of the target company and the goal is to require some or all shareholders to surrender their shares. The approval process focuses on whether the arrangement, viewed objectively, is fair and reasonable. Its purpose is to permit major changes in corporate structure to be made while ensuring that individuals whose rights may be affected are treated fairly, and its spirit is to achieve a fair balance between conflicting interests. In seeking court approval of an arrangement, the onus is on the corporation to establish that (1) the statutory procedures have been met; (2) the application has been put forth in good faith; and (3) the arrangement is "fair and reasonable". [119] [126] [128] [137]

To approve a plan of arrangement as fair and reasonable, courts must be satisfied that (a) the arrangement has a valid business purpose, and (b) the objections of those whose legal rights are being arranged are being resolved in a fair and balanced way. Whether these requirements are met is determined by taking into account a variety of relevant factors, including the necessity of the arrangement to the corporation's continued existence, the approval, if any, of a majority of shareholders and other security holders entitled to vote, and the proportionality of the impact on affected groups. Where there has been no vote, courts may consider whether an intelligent and honest business person, as a member of the class concerned and acting in his or her own interest, might reasonably approve of the plan. Courts must focus on the terms and impact of the arrangement itself, rather than the process by which it was reached, and must be satisfied that the burden imposed by the arrangement on security holders is justified by the interests of the corporation. Courts on a

En ce qui a trait à l'obligation des administrateurs de résoudre les conflits entre parties intéressées de façon équitable conformément aux intérêts de la société, il est possible de soutenir que les intérêts de la société favorisaient à l'époque l'acceptation de l'offre. Le juge de première instance a retenu la preuve tendant à démontrer que Bell Canada devait procéder à des changements substantiels pour continuer à prospérer et la dynamique du marché rendait l'acquisition inévitable. Compte tenu de tous les facteurs pertinents, les détenteurs de débentures n'ont pas démontré qu'ils avaient une attente raisonnable pouvant donner ouverture à une demande de redressement pour abus. [111-113]

2. Le processus d'approbation prévu à l'art. 192

Le processus d'approbation prévu à l'art. 192 s'applique en général aux changements de contrôle lorsque l'arrangement est appuyé par les administrateurs de la société ciblée et vise la remise d'une partie ou de la totalité des actions. Le processus d'approbation est axé sur la question de savoir si l'arrangement est équitable et raisonnable, d'un point de vue objectif. Il a pour but de permettre la réalisation de changements importants dans la structure d'une société tout en assurant un traitement équitable aux personnes dont les droits peuvent être touchés, et l'esprit du processus consiste à établir un juste équilibre entre des intérêts opposés. La société qui demande l'approbation d'un arrangement doit convaincre le tribunal que : (1) la procédure prévue par la loi a été suivie, (2) la demande a été soumise de bonne foi et (3) l'arrangement est « équitable et raisonnable ». [119] [126] [128] [137]

Pour approuver un plan d'arrangement, parce qu'il le juge équitable et raisonnable, un tribunal doit être convaincu que l'arrangement a) poursuit un objectif commercial légitime et b) répond de façon équitable et équilibrée aux objections de ceux dont les droits sont visés. Pour décider si un arrangement répond à ces critères, on tient compte de divers facteurs pertinents, dont la nécessité de l'arrangement pour la continuité de la société, l'approbation du plan par la majorité des actionnaires et des autres détenteurs de valeurs mobilières ayant droit de vote, le cas échéant, et la proportionnalité des effets du plan sur les groupes touchés. En l'absence de vote, les tribunaux peuvent se demander si une femme ou un homme d'affaires intelligent et honnête, en tant que membre de la catégorie en cause et agissant dans son propre intérêt, approuverait raisonnablement le plan. Le tribunal doit s'attacher aux modalités et aux effets de l'arrangement lui-même plutôt qu'au processus suivi pour y parvenir, et être convaincu que l'intérêt de la société justifie le fardeau imposé par

s. 192 application should refrain from substituting their views of the "best" arrangement, but should not surrender their duty to scrutinize the arrangement. [136] [138] [145] [151] [154-155]

The purpose of s. 192 suggests that only security holders whose legal rights stand to be affected by the proposal are envisioned. It is the fact that the corporation is permitted to alter individual rights that places the matter beyond the power of the directors and creates the need for shareholder and court approval. However, in some circumstances, interests that are not strictly legal could be considered. The fact that a group whose legal rights are left intact faces a reduction in the trading value of its securities generally does not, without more, constitute a circumstance where non-legal interests should be considered on a s. 192 application. [133-135]

Here, the debentureholders no longer argue that the arrangement lacks a valid business purpose. The debate focuses on whether the objections of those whose rights are being arranged were resolved in a fair and balanced way. Since only their economic interests were affected by the proposed transaction, not their legal rights, and since they did not fall within an exceptional situation where non-legal interests should be considered under s. 192, the debentureholders did not constitute an affected class under s. 192, and the trial judge was correct in concluding that they should not be permitted to veto almost 98 percent of the shareholders simply because the trading value of their securities would be affected. Although not required, it remained open to the trial judge to consider the debentureholders' economic interests, and he did not err in concluding that the arrangement addressed the debentureholders' interests in a fair and balanced way. The arrangement did not fundamentally alter the debentureholders' rights, as the investment and return they contracted for remained intact. It was well known that alteration in debt load could cause fluctuations in the trading value of the debentures, and yet the debentureholders had not contracted against this contingency. It was clear to the judge that the continuance of the corporation required acceptance of an arrangement that would entail increased debt and debt guarantees by Bell Canada. No superior arrangement had been put forward and BCE had been assisted throughout by expert legal and financial advisors. Recognizing that there is no such thing as a perfect arrangement, the trial judge correctly concluded that the arrangement l'arrangement aux détenteurs de valeurs mobilières. Les tribunaux appelés à approuver un plan en vertu de l'art. 192 doivent s'abstenir d'y substituer leur propre conception du « meilleur » arrangement, mais ne doivent pas renoncer pour autant à s'acquitter de leur obligation d'examiner l'arrangement. [136] [138] [145] [151] [154-155]

L'objet de l'art. 192 laisse croire qu'il ne vise que les détenteurs de valeurs mobilières dont les droits sont touchés par la proposition. C'est le fait que la société puisse modifier les droits des parties qui place la transaction hors du ressort des administrateurs et engendre la nécessité d'obtenir l'approbation des actionnaires et du tribunal. Toutefois, dans certaines circonstances, des intérêts qui ne constituent pas des droits à strictement parler peuvent être pris en considération. Une diminution possible de la valeur marchande des valeurs mobilières d'un groupe dont les droits demeurent par ailleurs intacts ne constitue généralement pas, à elle seule, une situation où de simples intérêts doivent être pris en compte pour l'examen d'une demande sous le régime de l'art. 192. [133-135]

En l'espèce, les détenteurs de débentures ne contestent plus que l'arrangement poursuive un objectif commercial légitime. Le débat porte sur la question de savoir si les objections de ceux dont les droits sont visés par l'arrangement ont été résolues de façon équitable et équilibrée. Puisque la transaction proposée touchait uniquement les intérêts financiers des détenteurs de débentures, et non leurs droits, et puisqu'ils ne se trouvaient pas dans des circonstances particulières commandant la prise en compte de simples intérêts sous le régime de l'art. 192, les détenteurs de débentures ne constituaient pas une catégorie touchée pour l'application de cette disposition et le juge de première instance était fondé à conclure qu'ils ne pouvaient être autorisés à opposer un veto à près de 98 p. 100 des actionnaires simplement parce que la transaction pouvait avoir des répercussions négatives sur la valeur de leurs titres. Même s'il n'en avait pas l'obligation, le juge de première instance avait le droit de tenir compte des intérêts financiers des détenteurs de débentures et il n'a pas commis d'erreur en concluant que l'arrangement répondait de façon équitable et équilibrée aux intérêts des détenteurs de débentures. L'arrangement ne modifiait pas fondamentalement les droits des détenteurs de débentures, l'investissement et le rendement prévus par leur contrat demeurant inchangés. Il était bien connu qu'une variation de l'endettement pouvait faire fluctuer la valeur marchande des débentures et les détenteurs de débentures ne se sont malgré tout pas prémunis contractuellement contre cette éventualité. Il était clair pour le juge que, pour la continuité de la société, l'approbation had been shown to be fair and reasonable. [157] [161] [163-164]

d'un arrangement comportant un accroissement de l'endettement et des garanties à la charge de Bell Canada était nécessaire. Aucun arrangement supérieur n'avait été soumis et BCE avait bénéficié, pendant tout le processus, des conseils de spécialistes du droit et de la finance. Reconnaissant qu'il n'existe pas d'arrangement parfait, le juge de première instance a conclu à bon droit que le caractère équitable et raisonnable de l'arrangement avait été démontré. The following is the judgment delivered by

THE COURT —

I. Introduction

[1] These appeals arise out of an offer to purchase all shares of BCE Inc. ("BCE"), a large telecommunications corporation, by a group headed by the Ontario Teachers Pension Plan Board ("Teachers"), financed in part by the assumption by Bell Canada, a wholly owned subsidiary of BCE, of a $30 billion debt. The leveraged buyout was opposed by debentureholders of Bell Canada on the ground that the increased debt contemplated by the purchase agreement would reduce the value of their bonds. Upon request for court approval of an arrangement under s. 192 of the Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-44 ("CBCA"), the debentureholders argued that it should not be found to be fair. They also opposed the arrangement under s. 241 of the CBCA on the ground that it was oppressive to them.

[2] The Quebec Superior Court, per Silcoff J., approved the arrangement as fair under the CBCA and dismissed the claims for oppression. The Quebec Court of Appeal found that the arrangement had not been shown to be fair and held that it should not have been approved. Thus, it found it unnecessary to consider the oppression claim.

[3] On June 20, 2008, this Court allowed the appeals from the Court of Appeal's disapproval of the arrangement and dismissed two cross-appeals from the dismissal of the claims for oppression, with reasons to follow. These are those reasons.

Raynold Langlois, c.r., et Gerald Apostolatos, pour l'intervenant Matthew Stewart.

Version française du jugement rendu par

LA COUR —

I. Introduction

II. Facts

[4] At issue is a plan of arrangement valued at approximately $52 billion, for the purchase of the shares of BCE by way of a leveraged buyout. The arrangement was opposed by a group, comprised mainly of financial institutions, that hold debentures issued by Bell Canada. The crux of their complaints is that the arrangement would diminish the trading value of their debentures by an average of 20 percent, while conferring a premium of approximately 40 percent on the market price of BCE shares.

[5] Bell Canada was incorporated in 1880 by a special Act of the Parliament of Canada. The corporation was subsequently continued under the CBCA. BCE, a management holding company, was incorporated in 1970 and continued under the CBCA in 1979. Bell Canada became a wholly owned subsidiary of BCE in 1983 pursuant to a plan of arrangement under which Bell Canada's shareholders surrendered their shares in exchange for shares of BCE. BCE and Bell Canada are separate legal entities with separate charters, articles and bylaws. Since January 2003, however, they have shared a common set of directors and some senior officers.

[6] At the time relevant to these proceedings, Bell Canada had $7.2 billion in outstanding long-term debt comprised of debentures issued pursuant to three trust indentures: the 1976, the 1996 and the 1997 trust indentures. The trust indentures contain neither change of control nor credit rating covenants, and specifically allow Bell Canada to incur or guarantee additional debt subject to certain limitations.

[7] Bell Canada's debentures were perceived by investors to be safe investments and, up to the time of the proposed leveraged buyout, had maintained an investment grade rating. The debentureholders are some of Canada's largest and most reputable financial institutions, pension funds and insurance

II. Les faits

companies. They are major participants in the debt markets and possess an intimate and historic knowledge of the financial markets.

[8] A number of technological, regulatory and competitive changes have significantly altered the industry in which BCE operates. Traditionally highly regulated and focused on circuit-switch line telephone service, the telecommunication industry is now guided primarily by market forces and characterized by an ever-expanding group of market participants, substantial new competition and increasing expectations regarding customer service. In response to these changes, BCE developed a new business plan by which it would focus on its core business, telecommunications, and divest its interest in unrelated businesses. This new business plan, however, was not as successful as anticipated. As a result, the shareholder returns generated by BCE remained significantly less than the ones generated by its competitors.

[9] Meanwhile, by the end of 2006, BCE had large cash flows and strong financial indicators, characteristics perceived by market analysts to make it a suitable target for a buyout. In November 2006, BCE was made aware that Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. ("KKR"), a United States private equity firm, might be interested in a transaction involving BCE. Mr. Michael Sabia, President and Chief Executive Officer of BCE, contacted KKR to inform them that BCE was not interested in pursuing such a transaction at that time.

[10] In February 2007, new rumours surfaced that KKR and the Canada Pension Plan Investment Board were arranging financing to initiate a bid for BCE. Shortly thereafter, additional rumours began to circulate that an investment banking firm was assisting Teachers with a potential transaction involving BCE. Mr. Sabia, after meeting with des sociétés d'assurance comptant parmi les plus importantes et les plus renommées du Canada. Ce sont des participants d'envergure dans les marchés de la dette, qui ont une expérience approfondie et une connaissance historique des marchés financiers.

[8] Le secteur d'activité de BCE a connu des changements d'ordre technologique, réglementaire et concurrentiel qui en ont profondément modifié le cadre. Auparavant très réglementée et axée sur la téléphonie classique par ligne téléphonique, l'industrie des télécommunications obéit aujourd'hui principalement aux forces du marché et se caractérise par l'augmentation continue des participants, l'arrivée de nouveaux concurrents et des attentes croissantes en matière de services aux consommateurs. Pour s'ajuster à ces changements, BCE a établi un nouveau plan d'entreprise mettant l'accent sur son activité centrale, les télécommunications, et prévoyant l'abandon de sa participation dans des entreprises non liées à ce secteur. Ce plan, toutefois, n'a pas donné les résultats escomptés, de sorte que les gains des actionnaires de BCE sont demeurés beaucoup moindres que ceux des actionnaires de ses concurrents.

BCE's board of directors ("Board"), contacted the representatives of both KKR and Teachers to reiterate that BCE was not interested in pursuing a "going-private" transaction at the time because it was set on creating shareholder value through the execution of its 2007 business plan.

[11] On March 29, 2007, after an article appeared on the front page of the Globe and Mail that inaccurately described BCE as being in discussions with a consortium comprised of KKR and Teachers, BCE issued a press release confirming that there were no ongoing discussions being held with private equity investors with respect to a "going-private" transaction for BCE.

[12] On April 9, 2007, Teachers filed a report (Schedule 13D) with the United States Securities and Exchange Commission reflecting a change from a passive to an active holding of BCE shares. This filing heightened press speculation concerning a potential privatization of BCE.

[13] Faced with renewed speculation and BCE having been put "in play" by the filing by Teachers of the Schedule 13D report, the Board met with its legal and financial advisors to assess strategic alternatives. It decided that it would be in the best interests of BCE and its shareholders to have competing bidding groups and to guard against the risk of a single bidding group assembling such a significant portion of available debt and equity that the group could preclude potential competing bidding groups from participating effectively in an auction process.

[14] In a press release dated April 17, 2007, BCE announced that it was reviewing its strategic alternatives with a view to further enhancing shareholder value. On the same day, a Strategic Oversight Committee ("SOC") was created. None of its members had ever been part of management at BCE. Its transaction visant BCE. Après avoir rencontré le conseil d'administration de BCE (« Conseil d'administration »), M. Sabia a communiqué avec les représentants de KKR et avec ceux du RREO et leur a réitéré que BCE n'était pas intéressée à une « opération de fermeture » parce que BCE avait pour objectif de créer une valeur actionnariale par la réalisation de son plan d'entreprise de 2007.

[11] Le 29 mars 2007, à la suite de la parution à la une du Globe and Mail d'un article faisant incorrectement état de discussions entre BCE et un consortium constitué de KKR et du RREO, BCE a publié un communiqué de presse dans lequel elle affirmait qu'aucune discussion n'était en cours avec des fonds privés d'investissement au sujet d'une « opération de fermeture » de BCE.

[12] Le 9 avril 2007, le RREO a déposé un formulaire 13D auprès de la Securities and Exchange Commission des États-Unis, dans lequel il indiquait que, de passive, sa participation comme actionnaire de BCE devenait active. Le dépôt de ce formulaire est venu renforcer l'hypothèse, véhiculée par les médias, de la transformation possible de BCE en société fermée.

[14] Dans un communiqué de presse daté du 17 avril 2007, BCE a annoncé qu'elle examinait les options stratégiques qui s'offraient à elle en vue d'améliorer davantage la valeur actionnariale. Le même jour, elle a mis sur pied un comité de surveillance stratégique (« CSS »), dont aucun des mandate was, notably, to set up and supervise the auction process.

[15] Following the April 17 press release, several debentureholders sent letters to the Board voicing their concerns about a potential leveraged buyout transaction. They sought assurance that their interests would be considered by the Board. BCE replied in writing that it intended to honour the contractual terms of the trust indentures.

[16] On June 13, 2007, BCE provided the potential participants in the auction process with bidding rules and the general form of a definitive transaction agreement. The bidders were advised that, in evaluating the competitiveness of proposed bids, BCE would consider the impact that their proposed financing arrangements would have on BCE and on Bell Canada's debentureholders and, in particular, whether their bids respected the debentureholders' contractual rights under the trust indentures.

[17] Offers were submitted by three groups. All three offers contemplated the addition of a substantial amount of new debt for which Bell Canada would be liable. All would have likely resulted in a downgrade of the debentures below investment grade. The initial offer submitted by the appellant 6796508 Canada Inc. (the "Purchaser"), a corporation formed by Teachers and affiliates of Providence Equity Partners Inc. and Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, contemplated an amalgamation of Bell Canada that would have triggered the voting rights of the debentureholders under the trust indentures. The Board informed the Purchaser that such an amalgamation made its offer less competitive. The Purchaser submitted a revised offer with an alternative structure for the transaction that did not involve an amalgamation of Bell Canada. Also, the Purchaser's revised offer increased the initial price per share from $42.25 to $42.75.

membres n'avait déjà fait partie de la direction de BCE. Le mandat du CSS consistait notamment à mettre en marche et à surveiller le processus d'enchères.

[18] The Board, after a review of the three offers and based on the recommendation of the SOC, found that the Purchaser's revised offer was in the best interests of BCE and BCE's shareholders. In evaluating the fairness of the consideration to be paid to the shareholders under the Purchaser's offer, the Board and the SOC received opinions from several reputable financial advisors. In the meantime, the Purchaser agreed to cooperate with the Board in obtaining a solvency certificate stating that BCE would still be solvent (and hence in a position to meet its obligations after completion of the transaction). The Board did not seek a fairness opinion in respect of the debentureholders, taking the view that their rights were not being arranged.

[19] On June 30, 2007, the Purchaser and BCE entered into a definitive agreement. On September 21, 2007, BCE's shareholders approved the arrangement by a majority of 97.93 percent.

[20] Essentially, the arrangement provides for the compulsory acquisition of all of BCE's outstanding shares. The price to be paid by the Purchaser is $42.75 per common share, which represents a premium of approximately 40 percent to the closing price of the shares as of March 28, 2007. The total capital required for the transaction is approximately $52 billion, $38.5 billion of which will be supported by BCE. Bell Canada will guarantee approximately $30 billion of BCE's debt. The Purchaser will invest nearly $8 billion of new equity capital in BCE.

[21] As a result of the announcement of the arrangement, the credit ratings of the debentures by the time of trial had been downgraded from investment grade to below investment grade. From the perspective of the debentureholders, this downgrade was problematic for two reasons. First, it caused the debentures to decrease in value by an average of approximately 20 percent. Second, the downgrade could oblige debentureholders with credit-rating restrictions on their holdings to sell their debentures at a loss.

[22] The debentureholders at trial opposed the arrangement on a number of grounds. First, the debentureholders sought relief under the oppression provision in s. 241 of the CBCA. Second, they opposed court approval of the arrangement, as required by s. 192 of the CBCA, alleging that the arrangement was not "fair and reasonable" because of the adverse effect on their economic interests. Finally, the debentureholders brought motions for declaratory relief under the terms of the trust indentures, which are not before us: (2008), 43 B.L.R. (4th) 39, 2008 QCCS 898; (2008), 43 B.L.R. (4th) 69, 2008 QCCS 899.

III. Judicial History

[23] The trial judge reviewed the s. 241 oppression claim as lying against both BCE and Bell Canada, since s. 241 refers to actions by the "corporation or any of its affiliates". He dismissed the claims for oppression on the grounds that the debt guarantee to be assumed by Bell Canada had a valid business purpose; that the transaction did not breach the reasonable expectations of the debentureholders; that the transaction was not oppressive by reason of rendering the debentureholders vulnerable; and that BCE and its directors had not unfairly disregarded the interests of the debentureholders: (2008), 43 B.L.R. (4th) 79, 2008 QCCS 907; (2008), 43 B.L.R. (4th) 135, 2008 QCCS 906.

[24] In arriving at these conclusions, the trial judge proceeded on the basis that the BCE directors had a fiduciary duty under s. 122 of the CBCA to act in the best interests of the corporation. He held that while the best interests of the corporation are not to be confused with the interests of the shareholders or other stakeholders, corporate law recognizes fundamental differences between shareholders and debt security holders. He held that these differences affect the content of the directors' fiduciary duty. As a result, the directors' duty to act in the best interests of the corporation might require them to approve transactions that, while in the interests

[22] En première instance, les détenteurs de débentures ont invoqué plusieurs motifs d'opposition à l'arrangement. Ils ont d'abord invoqué la disposition de la LCSA applicable en cas d'abus, l'art. 241. Ils ont ensuite contesté la demande d'approbation de l'arrangement exigée par l'art. 192 de la LCSA en alléguant que l'arrangement n'était pas « équitable et raisonnable » en raison de ses effets préjudiciables sur leurs intérêts financiers. Enfin, ils ont présenté des demandes de jugement déclaratoire fondées sur les actes de fiducie, sur lesquelles la Cour n'est pas appelée à se prononcer : (2008), 43 B.L.R. (4th) 39, 2008 QCCS 898; (2008), 43 B.L.R. (4th) 69, 2008 QCCS 899.

III. Historique judiciaire

of the corporation, might also benefit some or all shareholders at the expense of other stakeholders. He also noted that in accordance with the business judgment rule, Canadian courts tend to accord deference to business decisions of directors taken in good faith and in the performance of the functions they were elected to perform by shareholders.

[25] The trial judge held that the debentureholders' reasonable expectations must be assessed on an objective basis and, absent compelling reasons, must derive from the trust indentures and the relevant prospectuses issued in connection with the debt offerings. Statements by Bell Canada indicating a commitment to retaining investment grade ratings did not assist the debentureholders, since these statements were accompanied by warnings, repeated in the prospectuses pursuant to which the debentures were issued, that negated any expectation that this policy would be maintained indefinitely. The reasonableness of the alleged expectation was further negated by the fact that the debentureholders could have guarded against the business risks arising from a change of control by negotiating protective contract terms. The fact that the shareholders stood to benefit from the transaction and that the debentureholders were prejudiced did not in itself give rise to a conclusion that the directors had breached their fiduciary duty to the corporation. All three competing bids required Bell Canada to assume additional debt, and there was no evidence that the bidders were prepared to treat the debentureholders any differently. The materialization of certain risks as a result of decisions taken by the directors in accordance with their fiduciary duty to the corporation did not constitute oppression against the debentureholders or unfair disregard of their interests.

[26] Having dismissed the claim for oppression, the trial judge went on to consider BCE's application for approval of the transaction under s. 192 of the CBCA: (2008), 43 B.L.R. (4th) 1, 2008 QCCS

approuver des transactions qui, tout en servant les intérêts de la société, privilégient une partie ou la totalité des actionnaires au détriment d'autres parties intéressées. Le juge a aussi indiqué que, suivant la règle de l'appréciation commerciale, les tribunaux canadiens ont tendance à faire preuve de retenue à l'égard des décisions commerciales que les administrateurs prennent de bonne foi et dans l'exécution des fonctions que les actionnaires leur ont confiées en les élisant.

905. He dismissed the debentureholders' claim for voting rights on the arrangement on the ground that their legal interests were not compromised by the arrangement and that it would be unfair to allow them in effect to veto the shareholder vote. However, in determining whether the arrangement was fair and reasonable — the main issue on the application for approval — he considered the fairness of the transaction with respect to both the shareholders and the debentureholders, and concluded that the arrangement was fair and reasonable. He considered the necessity of the arrangement for Bell Canada's continued operations; that the Board, comprised almost entirely of independent directors, had determined the arrangement was fair and reasonable and in the best interests of BCE and the shareholders; that the arrangement had been approved by over 97 percent of the shareholders; that the arrangement was the culmination of a robust strategic review and auction process; the assistance the Board received throughout from leading legal and financial advisors; the absence of a superior proposal; and the fact that the proposal did not alter or arrange the debentureholders' legal rights. While the proposal stood to alter the debentureholders' economic interests, in the sense that the trading value of their securities would be reduced by the added debt load, their contractual rights remained intact. The trial judge noted that the debentureholders could have protected themselves against this eventuality through contract terms, but had not. Overall, he concluded that taking all relevant matters into account, the arrangement was fair and reasonable and should be approved.

(4th) 1, 2008 QCCS 905. Il a refusé aux détenteurs de débentures le droit de voter sur l'arrangement, estimant que celui-ci ne compromettait pas leurs droits et qu'il serait injuste de leur permettre en fait d'opposer leur veto au vote des actionnaires. Toutefois, pour déterminer si l'arrangement était équitable et raisonnable — la question déterminante pour l'octroi de l'approbation — le juge a examiné le caractère équitable de la transaction à l'égard à la fois des actionnaires et des détenteurs de débentures, et il a conclu que l'arrangement était équitable et raisonnable. Il a pris en compte la nécessité de l'arrangement pour la continuité des activités de Bell Canada; le fait que le Conseil d'administration — constitué presque entièrement d'administrateurs indépendants — avait déterminé que l'arrangement était équitable et raisonnable et qu'il servait au mieux les intérêts de BCE et des actionnaires; l'approbation de l'arrangement par plus de 97 p. 100 des actionnaires; le fait que l'arrangement était l'aboutissement d'un processus rigoureux d'analyse stratégique et d'enchères; l'aide de conseillers juridiques et financiers renommés reçue par le Conseil d'administration pendant tout le processus; l'absence d'offre supérieure; et le fait que l'offre ne modifiait ni ne visait les droits contractuels des détenteurs de débentures. Bien que l'offre modifie les intérêts financiers des détenteurs de débentures, au sens où l'accroissement de l'endettement ferait fléchir la valeur marchande de leurs titres, leurs droits contractuels demeuraient intacts. Le juge de première instance a souligné que les détenteurs de débentures auraient pu se protéger contractuellement contre ce risque, mais qu'ils ne l'avaient pas fait. Il a conclu dans l'ensemble que, compte tenu de tous les facteurs pertinents, l'arrangement était équitable et raisonnable et devait être approuvé.

[27] The Court of Appeal allowed the appeals on the ground that BCE had failed to meet its onus on the test for approval of an arrangement under s. 192, by failing to show that the transaction was fair and reasonable to the debentureholders. Basing its analysis on this Court's decision in Peoples Department Stores Inc. (Trustee of) v. Wise, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 461, 2004 SCC 68, the Court of Appeal found that the directors were required to consider the non-contractual interests of the debentureholders. It held that representations made by Bell Canada over the years could have created reasonable expectations above and beyond the contractual rights of the debentureholders. In these circumstances, the directors were under a duty, not simply to accept the best offer, but to consider whether the arrangement could be restructured in a way that provided a satisfactory price to the shareholders while avoiding an adverse effect on the debentureholders. In the absence of such efforts, BCE had not discharged its onus under s. 192 of showing that the arrangement was fair and reasonable. The Court of Appeal therefore overturned the trial judge's order approving the plan of arrangement: (2008), 43 B.L.R. (4th) 157, 2008 QCCA 930, 2008 QCCA 931, 2008 QCCA 932, 2008 QCCA 933, 2008 QCCA 934, 2008 QCCA 935.

[28] The Court of Appeal found it unnecessary to consider the s. 241 oppression claim, holding that its rejection of the s. 192 approval application effectively disposed of the oppression claim. In its view, where approval is sought under s. 192 and opposed, there is generally no need for an affected security holder to assert an oppression remedy under s. 241.

[29] BCE and Bell Canada appeal to this Court arguing that the Court of Appeal erred in overturning the trial judge's approval of the plan of arrangement. While formally cross-appealing on s. 241, the debentureholders argue that the Court of Appeal was correct to consider their complaints under s. 192, such that their appeals under s. 241 became moot.

IV. Issues

[30] The issues, briefly stated, are whether the Court of Appeal erred in dismissing the debentureholders' s. 241 oppression claim and in overturning the Superior Court's s. 192 approval of the plan d'examiner les intérêts non contractuels des détenteurs de débentures. À son avis, les déclarations que Bell Canada avaient faites au cours des années pouvaient avoir créé des attentes raisonnables qui s'ajoutaient aux droits contractuels des détenteurs de débentures. Les administrateurs n'avaient donc pas simplement l'obligation d'accepter la meilleure offre, mais aussi celle de déterminer si l'arrangement pouvait être restructuré de façon à assurer un prix satisfaisant aux actionnaires tout en évitant de causer un préjudice aux détenteurs de débentures. Comme cet examen n'avait pas été fait, BCE ne s'était pas acquittée de son obligation d'établir le caractère équitable et raisonnable de l'arrangement pour l'application de l'art. 192. La Cour d'appel a donc infirmé l'ordonnance d'approbation rendue par le juge de première instance : (2008), 43 B.L.R. (4th) 157, 2008 QCCA 930, 2008 QCCA 931, 2008 QCCA 932, 2008 QCCA 933, 2008 QCCA 934, 2008 QCCA 935.

IV. Les questions en litige

[30] En résumé, la Cour doit décider si la Cour d'appel a commis une erreur en rejetant les demandes de redressement pour abus des détenteurs de débentures fondée sur l'art. 241 et en infirmant of arrangement. These questions raise the issue of what is required to establish oppression of debentureholders in a situation where a corporation is facing a change of control, and how a judge on an application for approval of an arrangement under s. 192 of the CBCA should treat claims such as those of the debentureholders in these actions. These reasons will consider both issues.

[31] In order to situate these issues in the context of Canadian corporate law, it may be useful to offer a preliminary description of the remedies provided by the CBCA to shareholders and stakeholders in a corporation facing a change of control.

[32] Accordingly, these reasons will consider:

(1) the rights, obligations and remedies under the CBCA in overview;

(2) the debentureholders' entitlement to relief under the s. 241 oppression remedy;

(3) the debentureholders' entitlement to relief under the requirement for court approval of an arrangement under s. 192.

[33] We note that it is unnecessary for the purposes of these appeals to distinguish between the conduct of the directors of BCE, the holding company, and the conduct of the directors of Bell Canada. The same directors served on the boards of both corporations. While the oppression remedy was directed at both BCE and Bell Canada, the courts below considered the entire context in which the directors of BCE made their decisions, which included the obligations of Bell Canada in relation to its debentureholders. It was not found by the lower courts that the directors of BCE and Bell Canada should have made different decisions with respect to the two corporations. Accordingly, the l'ordonnance d'approbation du plan d'arrangement prononcée par la Cour supérieure en vertu de l'art. 192. Pour ce faire, la Cour doit déterminer quelle preuve doit être faite pour établir l'existence d'un abus des droits des détenteurs de débentures dans le contexte du changement de contrôle d'une société et comment le juge saisi d'une demande d'approbation d'un arrangement en vertu de l'art. 192 de la LCSA doit traiter des prétentions de la nature de celles formulées en l'espèce par les détenteurs de débentures. Les présents motifs traitent de ces deux questions.

[32] Par conséquent, les présents motifs comportent :

(1) un aperçu des droits, obligations et recours prévus par la LCSA;

(2) un examen du droit des détenteurs de débentures à un redressement en cas d'abus en application de l'art. 241;

(3) une analyse du droit des détenteurs de débentures à un redressement dans le contexte de l'approbation d'un arrangement exigée par l'art. 192.

[33] Il n'est pas nécessaire pour trancher les pourvois de faire une distinction entre le comportement des administrateurs de BCE, la société de portefeuille, et celui des administrateurs de Bell Canada. Les mêmes administrateurs siégeaient aux conseils d'administration de l'une et l'autre de ces sociétés. Bien que la demande de redressement pour abus ait été dirigée à la fois contre Bell Canada et contre BCE, les juridictions inférieures ont tenu compte de toutes les circonstances dans lesquelles les administrateurs ont été appelés à prendre leurs décisions, ce qui incluait les obligations de Bell Canada envers ses détenteurs de débentures. Elles n'ont pas conclu que les administrateurs de BCE et de Bell distinct corporate character of the two entities does not figure in our analysis.

V. Analysis

A. Overview of Rights, Obligations and Remedies Under the CBCA

[35] A share "is not an isolated piece of property . . . [but] a 'bundle' of interrelated rights and liabilities": Sparling v. Quebec (Caisse de dépôt et placement du Québec), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 1015, at p. 1025, per La Forest J. These rights include the right to a proportionate part of the assets of the corporation upon winding-up and the right to oversee the management of the corporation by its board of directors by way of votes at shareholder meetings.

[36] The directors are responsible for the governance of the corporation. In the performance of this role, the directors are subject to two duties: a fiduciary duty to the corporation under s. 122(1)(a) (the fiduciary duty); and a duty to exercise the care, diligence and skill of a reasonably prudent person in comparable circumstances under s. 122(1)(b) (the duty of care). The second duty is not at issue in these proceedings as this is not a claim against the directors of the corporation for failing to meet their duty of care. However, this case does involve the fiduciary duty of the directors to the corporation, and particularly the "fair treatment" component of this duty, which, as will be seen, is fundamental to the reasonable expectations of stakeholders claiming an oppression remedy.

Canada auraient dû prendre des décisions différentes relativement aux deux sociétés. Par conséquent, le caractère distinct des deux entités ne sera pas pris en considération dans notre analyse.

V. Analyse

A. Aperçu des droits, obligations et recours prévus par la LCSA

[37] The fiduciary duty of the directors to the corporation originated in the common law. It is a duty to act in the best interests of the corporation. Often the interests of shareholders and stakeholders are co-extensive with the interests of the corporation. But if they conflict, the directors' duty is clear — it is to the corporation: Peoples Department Stores.

[38] The fiduciary duty of the directors to the corporation is a broad, contextual concept. It is not confined to short-term profit or share value. Where the corporation is an ongoing concern, it looks to the long-term interests of the corporation. The content of this duty varies with the situation at hand. At a minimum, it requires the directors to ensure that the corporation meets its statutory obligations. But, depending on the context, there may also be other requirements. In any event, the fiduciary duty owed by directors is mandatory; directors must look to what is in the best interests of the corporation.

[39] In Peoples Department Stores, this Court found that although directors must consider the best interests of the corporation, it may also be appropriate, although not mandatory, to consider the impact of corporate decisions on shareholders or particular groups of stakeholders. As stated by Major and Deschamps JJ., at para. 42:

> We accept as an accurate statement of law that in determining whether they are acting with a view to the best interests of the corporation it may be legitimate, given all the circumstances of a given case, for the board of directors to consider, inter alia, the interests of shareholders, employees, suppliers, creditors, consumers, governments and the environment.

As will be discussed, cases dealing with claims of oppression have further clarified the content of the fiduciary duty of directors with respect to the range of interests that should be considered in determining what is in the best interests of the corporation, acting fairly and responsibly.

[37] L'obligation fiduciaire des administrateurs envers la société tire son origine de la common law. Elle leur impose d'agir au mieux des intérêts de la société. Souvent les intérêts des actionnaires et des parties intéressées concordent avec ceux de la société. Toutefois, lorsque ce n'est pas le cas, l'obligation des administrateurs est claire : elle est envers la société (Magasins à rayons Peoples).

> Nous considérons qu'il est juste d'affirmer en droit que, pour déterminer s'il agit au mieux des intérêts de la société, il peut être légitime pour le conseil d'administration, vu l'ensemble des circonstances dans un cas donné, de tenir compte notamment des intérêts des actionnaires, des employés, des fournisseurs, des créanciers, des consommateurs, des gouvernements et de l'environnement.

On verra plus loin que la jurisprudence sur les recours en cas d'abus a clarifié davantage le contenu de l'obligation fiduciaire des administrateurs quant à l'éventail des intérêts qu'ils doivent prendre en compte pour déterminer ce qui est au mieux des intérêts de la société, en agissant de façon équitable et responsable.

[40] In considering what is in the best interests of the corporation, directors may look to the interests of, inter alia, shareholders, employees, creditors, consumers, governments and the environment to inform their decisions. Courts should give appropriate deference to the business judgment of directors who take into account these ancillary interests, as reflected by the business judgment rule. The "business judgment rule" accords deference to a business decision, so long as it lies within a range of reasonable alternatives: see Maple Leaf Foods Inc. v. Schneider Corp. (1998), 42 O.R. (3d) 177 (C.A.); Kerr v. Danier Leather Inc., [2007] 3 S.C.R. 331, 2007 SCC 44. It reflects the reality that directors, who are mandated under s. 102(1) of the CBCA to manage the corporation's business and affairs, are often better suited to determine what is in the best interests of the corporation. This applies to decisions on stakeholders' interests, as much as other directorial decisions.

[41] Normally only the beneficiary of a fiduciary duty can enforce the duty. In the corporate context, however, this may offer little comfort. The directors who control the corporation are unlikely to bring an action against themselves for breach of their own fiduciary duty. The shareholders cannot act in the stead of the corporation; their only power is the right to oversee the conduct of the directors by way of votes at shareholder assemblies. Other stakeholders may not even have that.

[42] To meet these difficulties, the common law developed a number of special remedies to protect the interests of shareholders and stakeholders of the corporation. These remedies have been affirmed, modified and supplemented by the CBCA.

[43] The first remedy provided by the CBCA is the s. 239 derivative action, which allows stakeholders to enforce the directors' duty to the corporation when the directors are themselves unwilling

[43] Le premier recours prévu par la LCSA est l'action oblique, décrite à l'art. 239, qui permet aux parties intéressées de forcer les administrateurs récalcitrants à s'acquitter de leurs obligations to do so. With leave of the court, a complainant may bring (or intervene in) a derivative action in the name and on behalf of the corporation or one of its subsidiaries to enforce a right of the corporation, including the rights correlative with the directors' duties to the corporation. (The requirement of leave serves to prevent frivolous and vexatious actions, and other actions which, while possibly brought in good faith, are not in the interest of the corporation to litigate.)

[44] A second remedy lies against the directors in a civil action for breach of duty of care. As noted, s. 122(1)(b) of the CBCA requires directors and officers of a corporation to "exercise the care, diligence and skill that a reasonably prudent person would exercise in comparable circumstances". This duty, unlike the s. 122(1)(a) fiduciary duty, is not owed solely to the corporation, and thus may be the basis for liability to other stakeholders in accordance with principles governing the law of tort and extracontractual liability: Peoples Department Stores. Section 122(1)(b) does not provide an independent foundation for claims. However, applying the principles of The Queen in right of Canada v. Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 205, courts may take this statutory provision into account as to the standard of behaviour that should reasonably be expected.

[45] A third remedy, grounded in the common law and endorsed by the CBCA, is a s. 241 action for oppression. Unlike the derivative action, which is aimed at enforcing a right of the corporation itself, the oppression remedy focuses on harm to the legal and equitable interests of stakeholders affected by oppressive acts of a corporation or its directors. This remedy is available to a wide range of stakeholders — security holders, creditors, directors and officers.

envers la société. Le plaignant peut, avec l'autorisation du tribunal, intenter une action oblique au nom et pour le compte de la société ou de l'une de ses filiales (ou y intervenir) pour faire respecter un droit de la société, et notamment un droit corrélatif à une obligation des administrateurs envers la société. (L'obligation d'obtenir une autorisation vise à prévenir les actions frivoles ou vexatoires ainsi que les actions qui, même intentées de bonne foi, ne servent pas les intérêts de la société.)

[44] Deuxièmement, les administrateurs peuvent faire l'objet d'une action civile pour manquement à leur obligation de diligence. Comme il en a été fait mention, l'al. 122(1)b) de la LCSA oblige les administrateurs et les dirigeants d'une société à agir « avec le soin, la diligence et la compétence dont ferait preuve, en pareilles circonstances, une personne prudente ». Cette obligation, à la différence de l'obligation fiduciaire énoncée à l'al. 122(1)a), n'est pas uniquement envers la société. Elle peut donc engager la responsabilité des administrateurs envers les autres parties intéressées, conformément aux principes régissant la responsabilité délictuelle et extracontractuelle : Magasins à rayons Peoples. L'alinéa 122(1)b) ne peut servir de fondement indépendant à un recours, mais les tribunaux peuvent s'en inspirer, conformément aux principes énoncés dans La Reine du chef du Canada c. Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, [1983] 1 R.C.S. 205, pour définir la norme de conduite à laquelle on peut raisonnablement s'attendre.

[45] Un troisième recours de common law codifié par la LCSA est la demande de redressement pour abus prévue à l'art. 241. Contrairement à l'action oblique, qui a pour objet le respect d'un droit de la société proprement dite, la demande de redressement pour abus vise la réparation d'une atteinte aux intérêts en law ou en equity des parties intéressées touchées par le comportement abusif d'une société ou de ses administrateurs. Ce recours est ouvert à un large éventail de parties intéressées — détenteurs de valeurs mobilières, créanciers, administrateurs et dirigeants.

approval in certain cases. An arrangement under s. 192 of the CBCA is one of these. While s. 192 cannot be described as a remedy per se, it has remedial-like aspects. It is directed at the situation of corporations seeking to effect fundamental changes to the corporation that affects stakeholder rights. The Act provides that such arrangements require the approval of the court. Unlike the civil action and oppression, which focus on the conduct of the directors, a s. 192 review requires a court approving a plan of arrangement to be satisfied that: (1) the statutory procedures have been met; (2) the application has been put forth in good faith; and (3) the arrangement is fair and reasonable. If the corporation fails to discharge its burden of establishing these elements, approval will be withheld and the proposed change will not take place. In assessing whether the arrangement should be approved, the court will hear arguments from opposing security holders whose rights are being arranged. This provides an opportunity for security holders to argue against the proposed change.

dans certains cas ont aussi une vocation réparatrice. L'article 192, relatif aux arrangements, en est un exemple. Bien que cet article ne puisse pas être décrit comme une disposition qui établit un recours à proprement parler, il comporte des aspects qui s'y apparentent. Il vise les situations où une société envisage des changements fondamentaux qui modifient les droits d'une partie intéressée. La LCSA prévoit que de tels arrangements doivent être approuvés par le tribunal. Contrairement à l'action civile et à la demande de redressement pour abus, qui mettent l'accent sur le comportement des administrateurs, l'examen prévu à l'art. 192 exige simplement que le tribunal qui approuve un plan d'arrangement soit convaincu que : (1) la procédure prévue par la loi a été suivie, (2) la demande a été soumise de bonne foi et (3) l'arrangement est équitable et raisonnable. Si la société ne s'acquitte pas de son fardeau de prouver ces éléments, sa demande d'approbation sera rejetée et elle ne pourra procéder au changement proposé. Pour décider s'il approuvera l'arrangement, le tribunal entend les détenteurs de valeurs mobilières dont les droits sont visés par l'arrangement et qui s'y opposent, ce qui leur donne la possibilité de faire valoir leurs objections au changement proposé.

[47] Two of these remedies are in issue in these actions: the action for oppression and approval of an arrangement under s. 192. The trial judge treated these remedies as involving distinct considerations and concluded that the debentureholders had failed to establish entitlement to either remedy. The Court of Appeal, by contrast, viewed the two remedies as substantially overlapping, holding that both turned on whether the directors had properly considered the debentureholders' expectations. Having found on this basis that the requirements of s. 192 were not met, the Court of Appeal concluded that the action for oppression was moot. As will become apparent, we do not endorse this approach. In our view, the s. 241 oppression action and the s. 192 requirement for court approval of a change to the corporate structure are different types of proceedings, engaging different inquiries. Accordingly, we find it necessary to consider both the claims for oppression and the s. 192 application for approval.

[48] The debentureholders have formally cross-appealed on the oppression remedy. However, due to the Court of Appeal's failure to consider this issue, the debentureholders did not advance separate arguments before this Court. As certain aspects of their position are properly addressed within the context of an analysis of oppression under s. 241, we have considered them here.

[49] Against this background, we turn to a more detailed consideration of the claims.

B. The Section 241 Oppression Remedy

[50] The debentureholders in these appeals claim that the directors acted in an oppressive manner in approving the sale of BCE, contrary to s. 241 of the CBCA.

[51] Security holders of a corporation or its affiliates fall within the class of persons who may be permitted to bring a claim for oppression under s. 241 of the CBCA. The trial judge permitted the debentureholders to do so, although in the end he found the claim had not been established. The question is whether the trial judge erred in dismissing the claim.

[52] We will first set out what must be shown to establish the right to a remedy under s. 241, and then review the conduct complained of in the light of those requirements.

de structure exigée par l'art. 192 sont des recours différents qui soulèvent des questions différentes. Par conséquent, la Cour estime nécessaire d'examiner tant les demandes de redressement pour abus que la demande d'approbation fondée sur l'art. 192.

[49] À la lumière de ce qui précède, la Cour passe maintenant à l'examen plus approfondi des demandes.

B. La demande de redressement pour abus prévue à l'art. 241

[51] Les détenteurs de valeurs mobilières d'une société ou de l'une des personnes morales de son groupe appartiennent à la catégorie des personnes qui peuvent être autorisées à demander un redressement pour abus en vertu de l'art. 241 de la LCSA. Le juge de première instance a autorisé les détenteurs de débentures à présenter une telle demande, mais il a conclu en bout de ligne qu'ils n'en avaient pas établi le bien-fondé. Il faut maintenant déterminer si le juge de première instance a commis une erreur en rejetant cette demande.

[52] La Cour décrira d'abord la preuve exigée pour que soit établi le droit à un redressement en vertu de l'art. 241, puis elle examinera le comportement visé à la lumière de ces exigences.

(1) The Law

[53] Section 241(2) provides that a court may make an order to rectify the matters complained of where

> (a) any act or omission of the corporation or any of its affiliates effects a result,
>
> (b) the business or affairs of the corporation or any of its affiliates are or have been carried on or conducted in a manner, or

that is oppressive or unfairly prejudicial to or that unfairly disregards the interests of any security holder, creditor, director or officer . . . .

[54] Section 241 jurisprudence reveals two possible approaches to the interpretation of the oppression provisions of the CBCA: M. Koehnen, Oppression and Related Remedies (2004), at pp. 79-80 and 84. One approach emphasizes a strict reading of the three types of conduct enumerated in s. 241 (oppression, unfair prejudice and unfair disregard): see Scottish Co-operative Wholesale Society Ltd. v. Meyer, [1959] A.C. 324 (H.L.); Diligenti v. RWMD Operations Kelowna Ltd. (1976), 1 B.C.L.R. 36 (S.C.); Stech v. Davies, [1987] 5 W.W.R. 563 (Alta. Q.B.). Cases following this approach focus on the precise content of the categories "oppression", "unfair prejudice" and "unfair disregard". While these cases may provide valuable insight into what constitutes oppression in particular circumstances, a categorical approach to oppression is problematic because the terms used cannot be put into watertight compartments or conclusively defined. As Koehnen puts it (at p. 84), "[t]he three statutory components of oppression are really adjectives that try to describe inappropriate conduct. . . . The difficulty with adjectives is they provide no assistance in formulating principles that should underlie court intervention."

(1) L'état du droit

[53] Le paragraphe 241(2) permet au tribunal de redresser la situation provoquée par la société ou l'une des personnes morales de son groupe qui, à son avis, abuse des droits des détenteurs de valeurs mobilières, créanciers, administrateurs ou dirigeants, ou, se montre injuste à leur égard en leur portant préjudice ou en ne tenant pas compte de leurs intérêts :

> a) soit en raison de son comportement;
> b) soit par la façon dont elle conduit ses activités commerciales ou ses affaires internes;
> c) soit par la façon dont ses administrateurs exercent ou ont exercé leurs pouvoirs.

[54] Deux façons différentes d'aborder les dispositions de la LCSA applicables en cas d'abus se dégagent de la jurisprudence relative à l'art. 241 : M. Koehnen, Oppression and Related Remedies (2004), p. 79-80 et 84. L'une d'elles appelle à une interprétation stricte des trois types de comportement énumérés à l'art. 241 (abus, préjudice injuste et omission injuste de tenir compte des intérêts) : voir Scottish Co-operative Wholesale Society Ltd. c. Meyer, [1959] A.C. 324 (H.L.); Diligenti c. RWMD Operations Kelowna Ltd. (1976), 1 B.C.L.R. 36 (C.S.); Stech c. Davies, [1987] 5 W.W.R. 563 (B.R. Alb.). Les arrêts guidés par cette interprétation s'intéressent à la teneur exacte d'un « abus », d'un « préjudice injuste » ou d'une « omission injuste de tenir compte » des intérêts en cause. Bien que ces décisions puissent fournir des indications valables sur ce qui constitue un abus dans une situation donnée, envisager la notion d'abus à partir de catégories définies pose problème parce que les termes utilisés ne peuvent être classés dans des compartiments étanches ni définis une fois pour toutes. Comme le dit Koehnen (p. 84) : [TRADUCTION] « Les trois composantes légales de l'abus sont en fait des qualificatifs destinés à décrire un comportement incorrect. [. . .] Le problème lié aux qualificatifs tient à ce qu'ils ne sont d'aucun secours pour la formulation des principes qui doivent fonder l'intervention du tribunal. »

[56] In our view, the best approach to the interpretation of s. 241(2) is one that combines the two approaches developed in the cases. One should look first to the principles underlying the oppression remedy, and in particular the concept of reasonable expectations. If a breach of a reasonable expectation is established, one must go on to consider whether the conduct complained of amounts to "oppression", "unfair prejudice" or "unfair disregard" as set out in s. 241(2) of the CBCA.

[57] We preface our discussion of the twin prongs of the oppression inquiry by two preliminary observations that run throughout all the jurisprudence.

[58] First, oppression is an equitable remedy. It seeks to ensure fairness — what is "just and equitable". It gives a court broad, equitable jurisdiction to enforce not just what is legal but what is fair: Wright v. Donald S. Montgomery Holdings Ltd. (1998), 39 B.L.R. (2d) 266 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.)), at p. 273; Re Keho Holdings Ltd. and Noble (1987), 38 D.L.R. (4th) 368 (Alta. C.A.), at p. 374; see, more generally, Koehnen, at pp. 78-79. It follows that courts considering claims for oppression should look at business realities, not merely narrow legalities: Scottish Co-operative Wholesale Society, at p. 343.

[59] Second, like many equitable remedies, oppression is fact-specific. What is just and equitable is judged by the reasonable expectations of the stakeholders in the context and in regard to the

[56] À notre avis, la meilleure façon d'interpréter le par. 241(2) est de combiner les deux approches exposées dans la jurisprudence. Il faut d'abord considérer les principes sur lesquels repose la demande de redressement pour abus et, en particulier, le concept des attentes raisonnables. S'il est établi qu'une attente raisonnable a été frustrée, il faut déterminer si le comportement reproché constitue un « abus », un « préjudice injuste » ou une « omission injuste de tenir compte » des intérêts en cause au sens du par. 241(2) de la LCSA.

[58] Premièrement, la demande de redressement pour abus est un recours en equity. Elle vise à rétablir la justice — ce qui est « juste et équitable ». Elle confère au tribunal un vaste pouvoir, en equity, d'imposer le respect non seulement du droit, mais de l'équité : Wright c. Donald S. Montgomery Holdings Ltd. (1998), 39 B.L.R. (2d) 266 (C. Ont. (Div. gén.)), p. 273; Re Keho Holdings Ltd. and Noble (1987), 38 D.L.R. (4th) 368 (C.A. Alb.), p. 374; voir, de façon plus générale, Koehnen, p. 78-79. Par conséquent, les tribunaux saisis d'une demande de redressement pour abus doivent tenir compte de la réalité commerciale, et pas seulement de considérations strictement juridiques : Scottish Co-operative Wholesale Society, p. 343.

[59] Deuxièmement, comme beaucoup de recours en equity, le sort d'une demande de redressement pour abus dépend des faits en cause. On détermine ce qui est juste et équitable selon les relationships at play. Conduct that may be oppressive in one situation may not be in another.

attentes raisonnables des parties intéressées en tenant compte du contexte et des rapports en jeu. Un comportement abusif dans une situation donnée ne sera pas nécessairement abusif dans une situation différente.

The words ["just and equitable"] are a recognition of the fact that a limited company is more than a mere legal entity, with a personality in law of its own: that there is room in company law for recognition of the fact that behind it, or amongst it, there are individuals, with rights, expectations and obligations inter se which are not necessarily submerged in the company structure.

[61] Lord Wilberforce spoke of the equitable remedy in terms of the "rights, expectations and obligations" of individuals. "Rights" and "obligations" connote interests enforceable at law without recourse to special remedies, for example, through a contractual suit or a derivative action under s. 239 of the CBCA. It is left for the oppression remedy to deal with the "expectations" of affected stakeholders. The reasonable expectations of these stakeholders is the cornerstone of the oppression remedy.

[61] Lord Wilberforce a présenté le recours en equity en faisant référence aux « droits », « attentes » et « obligations » des individus. Les mots « droits » et « obligations » renvoient à des intérêts dont on peut exiger le respect en droit sans faire appel à des recours spéciaux, par exemple, au moyen d'un recours contractuel ou de l'action oblique prévue à l'art. 239 de la LCSA. Restent donc les « attentes » des parties intéressées comme objet de la demande de redressement pour abus. Les attentes raisonnables de ces parties intéressées constituent la pierre angulaire de la demande de redressement pour abus.

[62] As denoted by "reasonable", the concept of reasonable expectations is objective and contextual. The actual expectation of a particular stakeholder is not conclusive. In the context of whether it would be "just and equitable" to grant a remedy, the question is whether the expectation is reasonable having regard to the facts of the specific case, the relationships at issue, and the entire context, including the fact that there may be conflicting claims and expectations.

[63] Particular circumstances give rise to particular expectations. Stakeholders enter into relationships, with and within corporations, on the basis of understandings and expectations, upon which they are entitled to rely, provided they are reasonable in the context: see 820099 Ontario; Main v. Delcan Group Inc. (1999), 47 B.L.R. (2d) 200 (Ont. S.C.J.). These expectations are what the remedy of oppression seeks to uphold.

[64] Determining whether a particular expectation is reasonable is complicated by the fact that the interests and expectations of different stakeholders may conflict. The oppression remedy recognizes that a corporation is an entity that encompasses and affects various individuals and groups, some of whose interests may conflict with others. Directors or other corporate actors may make corporate decisions or seek to resolve conflicts in a way that abusively or unfairly maximizes a particular group's interest at the expense of other stakeholders. The corporation and shareholders are entitled to maximize profit and share value, to be sure, but not by treating individual stakeholders unfairly. Fair treatment — the central theme running through the oppression jurisprudence — is most fundamentally what stakeholders are entitled to "reasonably expect".

[65] Section 241(2) speaks of the "act or omission" of the corporation or any of its affiliates, the conduct of "business or affairs" of the corporation and the "powers of the directors of the corporation or any of its affiliates". Often, the conduct complained of is the conduct of the corporation or of its directors, who are responsible for the governance of the corporation. However, the conduct of other actors, such as shareholders, may also support a claim for oppression: see Koehnen, at pp. 109-10; GATX Corp. v. Hawker Siddeley Canada Inc. (1996), 27 B.L.R. (2d) 251 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.)). In the appeals before us, the claims for oppression are based on allegations that the directors of BCE and Bell Canada failed to comply with the reasonable

[65] Le paragraphe 241(2) parle du « comportement » de la société ou de l'une des personnes morales de son groupe, de la conduite de « ses activités commerciales ou ses affaires internes » et de l'exercice par « ses administrateurs » de leurs « pouvoirs ». La situation dont on se plaint est souvent provoquée par le comportement de la société ou de ses administrateurs, qui sont responsables de la gouvernance de la société. Une demande de redressement pour abus peut toutefois découler du comportement d'autres parties impliquées dans les affaires de la société, comme des actionnaires : voir Koehnen, p. 109-110; GATX Corp. c. Hawker Siddeley Canada Inc. (1996), 27 B.L.R. (2d) 251 (C. Ont. (Div. gén.)). Dans les présents pourvois, expectations of the debentureholders, and it is unnecessary to go beyond this.

les demandes de redressement pour abus sont fondées sur des allégations selon lesquelles les administrateurs de BCE et de Bell Canada ont frustré les attentes raisonnables des détenteurs de débentures et il est inutile d'étendre notre examen au-delà de ces allégations.

[66] The fact that the conduct of the directors is often at the centre of oppression actions might seem to suggest that directors are under a direct duty to individual stakeholders who may be affected by a corporate decision. Directors, acting in the best interests of the corporation, may be obliged to consider the impact of their decisions on corporate stakeholders, such as the debentureholders in these appeals. This is what we mean when we speak of a director being required to act in the best interests of the corporation viewed as a good corporate citizen. However, the directors owe a fiduciary duty to the corporation, and only to the corporation. People sometimes speak in terms of directors owing a duty to both the corporation and to stakeholders. Usually this is harmless, since the reasonable expectations of the stakeholder in a particular outcome often coincide with what is in the best interests of the corporation. However, cases (such as these appeals) may arise where these interests do not coincide. In such cases, it is important to be clear that the directors owe their duty to the corporation, not to stakeholders, and that the reasonable expectation of stakeholders is simply that the directors act in the best interests of the corporation.

[67] Having discussed the concept of reasonable expectations that underlies the oppression remedy, we arrive at the second prong of the s. 241 oppression remedy. Even if reasonable, not every unmet expectation gives rise to claim under s. 241. The section requires that the conduct complained of amount to "oppression", "unfair prejudice" or "unfair disregard" of relevant interests. "Oppression" carries the sense of conduct that is coercive and abusive, and suggests bad faith. "Unfair prejudice" may admit of a less culpable state of mind, that nevertheless has unfair consequences. Finally, "unfair disregard" of interests extends the remedy to ignoring an interest as being of no importance, contrary to the stakeholders' reasonable expectations: see Koehnen, at pp. 81-88. The phrases describe, in adjectival terms, ways in which corporate actors may fail to meet the reasonable expectations of stakeholders.

[67] Après avoir examiné le concept des attentes raisonnables qui sous-tend la demande de redressement pour abus, la Cour passe au second volet du recours prévu à l'art. 241. Toutes les attentes déçues, même lorsqu'elles sont raisonnables, ne donnent pas ouverture à une demande sous le régime de l'art. 241. Cette disposition exige que le comportement visé constitue un « abus », un « préjudice injuste » ou une « omission injuste de tenir compte » des intérêts en cause. Le terme « abus » désigne un comportement coercitif et excessif et évoque la mauvaise foi. Le « préjudice injuste »

peut impliquer un état d'esprit moins coupable, mais dont les conséquences sont néanmoins injustes. Enfin, l'« omission injuste de tenir compte » d'intérêts donnés étend l'application de ce recours à une situation où un intérêt n'est pas pris en compte parce qu'il est perçu comme sans importance, contrairement aux attentes raisonnables des parties intéressées : voir Koehnen, p. 81-88. Ces expressions décrivent, à l'aide de qualificatifs, des façons dont les parties impliquées dans les affaires d'une société peuvent frustrer les attentes raisonnables des parties intéressées.

[68] In summary, the foregoing discussion suggests conducting two related inquiries in a claim for oppression: (1) Does the evidence support the reasonable expectation asserted by the claimant? and (2) Does the evidence establish that the reasonable expectation was violated by conduct falling within the terms "oppression", "unfair prejudice" or "unfair disregard" of a relevant interest?

[69] Against the background of this overview, we turn to a more detailed discussion of these inquiries.

[69] C'est sur cette toile de fond que la Cour examinera maintenant ces questions de façon plus approfondie.

(a) Proof of a Claimant's Reasonable Expectations

a) La preuve de l'attente raisonnable

[70] At the outset, the claimant must identify the expectations that he or she claims have been violated by the conduct at issue and establish that the expectations were reasonably held. As stated above, it may be readily inferred that a stakeholder has a reasonable expectation of fair treatment. However, oppression, as discussed, generally turns on particular expectations arising in particular situations. The question becomes whether the claimant stakeholder reasonably held the particular expectation. Evidence of an expectation may take many forms depending on the facts of the case.

[71] It is impossible to catalogue exhaustively situations where a reasonable expectation may arise due to their fact-specific nature. A few generalizations, however, may be ventured. Actual unlawfulness is not required to invoke s. 241; the provision applies "where the impugned conduct is wrongful, even if it is not actually unlawful": Dickerson Committee (R. W. V. Dickerson, J. L. Howard and L. Getz), Proposals for a New Business Corporations Law for Canada (1971), vol. I, at p. 163. The remedy is focused on concepts of fairness and equity rather than on legal rights. In determining whether there is a reasonable expectation or interest to be considered, the court looks beyond legality to what is fair, given all of the interests at play: Re Keho Holdings Ltd. and Noble. It follows that not all conduct that is harmful to a stakeholder will give rise to a remedy for oppression as against the corporation.

principes généraux. Le recours prévu par l'art. 241 n'exige pas qu'il y ait illégalité; cet article entre en jeu « lorsque la conduite attaquée est [fautive], même si elle n'est pas en fait illégale » : Comité Dickerson (R. W. V. Dickerson, J. L. Howard et L. Getz), Propositions pour un nouveau droit des corporations commerciales canadiennes (1971), vol. I, p. 188. Ce recours est axé sur les notions de justice et d'équité plutôt que sur les droits. Pour déterminer si des intérêts ou attentes raisonnables doivent être pris en considération, les tribunaux vont au-delà de la légalité et se demandent ce qui est équitable compte tenu de tous les intérêts en jeu : Re Keho Holdings Ltd. and Noble. Il s'ensuit que toute conduite préjudiciable pour une partie intéressée ne donnera pas nécessairement ouverture à une demande de redressement pour abus contre la société.

[72] Factors that emerge from the case law that are useful in determining whether a reasonable expectation exists include: general commercial practice; the nature of the corporation; the relationship between the parties; past practice; steps the claimant could have taken to protect itself; representations and agreements; and the fair resolution of conflicting interests between corporate stakeholders.

(i) Commercial Practice

(i) Les pratiques commerciales

[73] Commercial practice plays a significant role in forming the reasonable expectations of the parties. A departure from normal business practices that has the effect of undermining or frustrating the complainant's exercise of his or her legal rights will generally (although not inevitably) give rise to a remedy: Adecco Canada Inc. v. J. Ward Broome Ltd. (2001), 12 B.L.R. (3d) 275 (Ont. S.C.J.); SCI Systems Inc. v. Gornitzki Thompson & Little Co. (1997), 147 D.L.R. (4th) 300 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.)), var'd (1998), 110 O.A.C. 160 (Div. Ct.); Downtown Eatery (1993) Ltd. v. Ontario (2001), 200 D.L.R. (4th) 289 (Ont. C.A.), leave to appeal refused, [2002] 1 S.C.R. vi.

[73] Les pratiques commerciales jouent un rôle important dans la formation des attentes raisonnables des parties. Une dérogation aux pratiques commerciales habituelles qui entrave ou rend impossible l'exercice de ses droits par le plaignant donnera généralement (mais pas inévitablement) ouverture à un recours : Adecco Canada Inc. c. J. Ward Broome Ltd. (2001), 12 B.L.R. (3d) 275 (C.S.J. Ont.); SCI Systems Inc. c. Gornitzki Thompson & Little Co. (1997), 147 D.L.R. (4th) 300 (C. Ont. (Div. gén.)), mod. par (1998), 110 O.A.C. 160 (C. div.); Downtown Eatery (1993) Ltd. c. Ontario (2001), 200 D.L.R. (4th) 289 (C.A. Ont.), autorisation d'appel refusée, [2002] 1 R.C.S. vi.

(ii) The Nature of the Corporation

(ii) La nature de la société

[74] The size, nature and structure of the corporation are relevant factors in assessing reasonable

[74] La taille, la nature et la structure de la société constituent également des facteurs pertinents expectations: First Edmonton Place; G. Shapira, "Minority Shareholders' Protection — Recent Developments" (1982), 10 N.Z. Univ. L. Rev. 134, at pp. 138 and 145-46. Courts may accord more latitude to the directors of a small, closely held corporation to deviate from strict formalities than to the directors of a larger public company.

(iii) Relationships

[75] Reasonable expectations may emerge from the personal relationships between the claimant and other corporate actors. Relationships between shareholders based on ties of family or friendship may be governed by different standards than relationships between arm's length shareholders in a widely held corporation. As noted in Re Ferguson and Imax Systems Corp. (1983), 150 D.L.R. (3d) 718 (Ont. C.A.), "when dealing with a close corporation, the court may consider the relationship between the shareholders and not simply legal rights as such" (p. 727).

(iv) Past Practice

[76] Past practice may create reasonable expectations, especially among shareholders of a closely held corporation on matters relating to participation of shareholders in the corporation's profits and governance: Gibbons v. Medical Carriers Ltd. (2001), 17 B.L.R. (3d) 280, 2001 MBQB 229; 820099 Ontario. For instance, in Gibbons, the court found that the shareholders had a legitimate expectation that all monies paid out of the corporation would be paid to shareholders in proportion to the percentage of shares they held. The authorization by the new directors to pay fees to themselves, for which the shareholders would not receive any comparable payments, was in breach of those expectations.

[77] It is important to note that practices and expectations can change over time. Where valid commercial reasons exist for the change and the dans l'appréciation d'une attente raisonnable : First Edmonton Place; G. Shapira, « Minority Shareholders' Protection — Recent Developments » (1982), 10 N.Z. Univ. L. Rev. 134, p. 138 et 145-146. Il est possible que les tribunaux accordent une plus grande latitude pour déroger à des formalités strictes aux administrateurs d'une petite société fermée qu'à ceux d'une société ouverte de plus grande taille.

(iii) Les rapports existants

(iv) Les pratiques antérieures

[77] Il importe de souligner que les pratiques et les attentes peuvent changer avec le temps. Lorsqu'un changement est motivé par des raisons change does not undermine the complainant's rights, there can be no reasonable expectation that directors will resist a departure from past practice: Alberta Treasury Branches v. SevenWay Capital Corp. (1999), 50 B.L.R. (2d) 294 (Alta. Q.B.), aff'd (2000), 8 B.L.R. (3d) 1, 2000 ABCA 194.

(v) Preventive Steps

[78] In determining whether a stakeholder expectation is reasonable, the court may consider whether the claimant could have taken steps to protect itself against the prejudice it claims to have suffered. Thus it may be relevant to inquire whether a secured creditor claiming oppressive conduct could have negotiated protections against the prejudice suffered: First Edmonton Place; SCI Systems.

(vi) Representations and Agreements

[79] Shareholder agreements may be viewed as reflecting the reasonable expectations of the parties: Main; Lyall v. 147250 Canada Ltd. (1993), 106 D.L.R. (4th) 304 (B.C.C.A.).

[80] Reasonable expectations may also be affected by representations made to stakeholders or to the public in promotional material, prospectuses, offering circulars and other communications: Tsui v. International Capital Corp., [1993] 4 W.W.R. 613 (Sask. Q.B.), aff'd (1993), 113 Sask. R. 3 (C.A.); Deutsche Bank Canada v. Oxford Properties Group Inc. (1998), 40 B.L.R. (2d) 302 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.)); Themadel Foundation v. Third Canadian Investment Trust Ltd. (1995), 23 O.R. (3d) 7 (Gen. Div.), var'd (1998), 38 O.R. (3d) 749 (C.A.).

(vii) Fair Resolution of Conflicting Interests

[81] As discussed, conflicts may arise between the interests of corporate stakeholders inter se and between stakeholders and the corporation. Where the conflict involves the interests of the corporation, it falls to the directors of the corporation to resolve them in accordance with their fiduciary commerciales valides et qu'il ne porte pas atteinte aux droits du plaignant, il ne saurait exister d'attente raisonnable que les administrateurs s'abstiendront de déroger aux pratiques antérieures : Alberta Treasury Branches c. SevenWay Capital Corp. (1999), 50 B.L.R. (2d) 294 (B.R. Alb.), conf. par (2000), 8 B.L.R. (3d) 1, 2000 ABCA 194.

(v) Les mesures préventives

[78] Lorsqu'il apprécie le caractère raisonnable d'une attente d'une partie intéressée, le tribunal peut se demander si le plaignant aurait pu prendre des mesures pour se protéger contre le préjudice qu'il allègue avoir subi. Ainsi, il peut être pertinent de déterminer si un créancier garanti qui se plaint d'un abus aurait pu négocier des mesures de protection contre le préjudice en cause : First Edmonton Place; SCI Systems.

(vi) Les déclarations et conventions

[80] Les déclarations faites à des parties intéressées ou au public dans des documents promotionnels, des prospectus, des circulaires d'offre et d'autres communications peuvent également influer sur les attentes raisonnables : Tsui c. International Capital Corp., [1993] 4 W.W.R. 613 (B.R. Sask.), conf. par (1993), 113 Sask. R. 3 (C.A.); Deutsche Bank Canada c. Oxford Properties Group Inc. (1998), 40 B.L.R. (2d) 302 (C. Ont. (Div. gén.)); Themadel Foundation c. Third Canadian Investment Trust Ltd. (1995), 23 O.R. (3d) 7 (Div. gén.), mod. par (1998), 38 O.R. (3d) 749 (C.A.).

(vii) La conciliation équitable d'intérêts opposés

[81] Comme cela a été souligné, des conflits peuvent surgir soit entre les intérêts de différentes parties intéressées, soit entre les intérêts des parties intéressées et ceux de la société. Lorsque le conflit touche les intérêts de la société, il revient aux administrateurs de la société de le résoudre duty to act in the best interests of the corporation, viewed as a good corporate citizen.

[82] The cases on oppression, taken as a whole, confirm that the duty of the directors to act in the best interests of the corporation comprehends a duty to treat individual stakeholders affected by corporate actions equitably and fairly. There are no absolute rules. In each case, the question is whether, in all the circumstances, the directors acted in the best interests of the corporation, having regard to all relevant considerations, including, but not confined to, the need to treat affected stakeholders in a fair manner, commensurate with the corporation's duties as a responsible corporate citizen.

[83] Directors may find themselves in a situation where it is impossible to please all stakeholders. The "fact that alternative transactions were rejected by the directors is irrelevant unless it can be shown that a particular alternative was definitely available and clearly more beneficial to the company than the chosen transaction": Maple Leaf Foods, per Weiler J.A., at p. 192.

[84] There is no principle that one set of interests — for example the interests of shareholders — should prevail over another set of interests. Everything depends on the particular situation faced by the directors and whether, having regard to that situation, they exercised business judgment in a responsible way.

[85] On these appeals, it was suggested on behalf of the corporations that the "Revlon line" of cases from Delaware support the principle that where the interests of shareholders conflict with the interests of creditors, the interests of shareholders should prevail.

[86] The "Revlon line" refers to a series of Delaware corporate takeover cases, the two most important of which are Revlon, Inc. v. MacAndrews conformément à leur obligation fiduciaire d'agir au mieux des intérêts de la société en tant qu'entreprise socialement responsable.

[82] Dans son ensemble, la jurisprudence en matière d'abus confirme que l'obligation des administrateurs d'agir au mieux des intérêts de la société inclut le devoir de traiter de façon juste et équitable chaque partie intéressée touchée par les actes de la société. Il n'existe pas de règles absolues. Il faut se demander chaque fois si, dans les circonstances, les administrateurs ont agi au mieux des intérêts de la société, en prenant en considération tous les facteurs pertinents, ce qui inclut, sans s'y limiter, la nécessité de traiter les parties intéressées qui sont touchées de façon équitable, conformément aux obligations de la société en tant qu'entreprise socialement responsable.

[85] En l'espèce, les appelantes ont fait valoir que le courant jurisprudentiel émanant du Delaware et représenté par l'arrêt Revlon appuie le principe voulant qu'un conflit entre les intérêts des actionnaires et ceux des créanciers doive être résolu en faveur des actionnaires.

[86] Le courant jurisprudentiel dit Revlon regroupe une série de décisions rendues au Delaware dans le contexte d'offres publiques d'achat (« OPA ») et dont les deux plus importantes sont Revlon, Inc. c. MacAndrews & Forbes Holdings, Inc., 506 A.2d 173 (Del. 1986), et Unocal Corp. c. Mesa Petroleum Co., 493 A.2d 946 (Del. 1985). Dans ces deux décisions, il s'agissait de déterminer comment les administrateurs devaient réagir à une OPA hostile. L'arrêt Revlon donne à croire que, dans ce contexte, les intérêts des actionnaires doivent l'emporter sur ceux des autres parties intéressées, comme les créanciers. L'arrêt Unocal a appliqué cette approche aux situations dans lesquelles la société ne poursuivra pas ses activités et précisé que, bien que le conseil d'administration d'une société visée par une OPA hostile [TRADUCTION] « puisse tenir compte de diverses parties intéressées lorsqu'il s'acquitte de ses fonctions [. . .] il n'est pas approprié de prendre ainsi en compte les intérêts des non-actionnaires lorsque [. . .] l'objectif n'est plus de protéger la société ou d'en poursuivre les activités, mais de la vendre au plus offrant » (p. 182).

& Forbes Holdings, Inc., 506 A.2d 173 (Del. 1986), and Unocal Corp. v. Mesa Petroleum Co., 493 A.2d 946 (Del. 1985). In both cases, the issue was how directors should react to a hostile takeover bid. Revlon suggests that in such circumstances, shareholder interests should prevail over those of other stakeholders, such as creditors. Unocal tied this approach to situations where the corporation will not continue as a going concern, holding that although a board facing a hostile takeover "may have regard for various constituencies in discharging its responsibilities, . . . such concern for non-stockholder interests is inappropriate when . . . the object no longer is to protect or maintain the corporate enterprise but to sell it to the highest bidder" (p. 182).

[87] What is clear is that the Revlon line of cases has not displaced the fundamental rule that the duty of the directors cannot be confined to particular priority rules, but is rather a function of business judgment of what is in the best interests of the corporation, in the particular situation it faces. In a review of trends in Delaware corporate jurisprudence, former Delaware Supreme Court Chief Justice E. Norman Veasey put it this way:

> [I]t is important to keep in mind the precise content of this "best interests" concept — that is, to whom this duty is owed and when. Naturally, one often thinks that directors owe this duty to both the corporation and the stockholders. That formulation is harmless in most instances because of the confluence of interests, in that what is good for the corporate entity is usually derivatively good for the stockholders. There are times, of course, when the focus is directly on the interests of stockholders [i.e., as in Revlon]. But, in general, the directors owe fiduciary duties to the corporation, not to the stockholders. [Emphasis in original.]

[88] Nor does this Court's decision in Peoples Department Stores suggest a fixed rule that the interests of creditors must prevail. In Peoples Department Stores, the Court had to consider whether, in the case of a corporation under threat of bankruptcy, creditors deserved special consideration (para. 46). The Court held that the fiduciary duty to the corporation did not change in the period preceding the bankruptcy, but that if the directors breach their duty of care to a stakeholder under s. 122(1)(b) of the CBCA, such a stakeholder may act upon it (para. 66).

(b) Conduct Which Is Oppressive, Is Unfairly Prejudicial or Unfairly Disregards the Claimant's Relevant Interests

[89] Thus far we have discussed how a claimant establishes the first element of an action for oppression — a reasonable expectation that he or she would be treated in a certain way. However, to complete a claim for oppression, the claimant must show that the failure to meet this expectation involved unfair conduct and prejudicial consequences within s. 241 of the CBCA. Not every failure to meet a reasonable expectation will give rise to the equitable considerations that ground actions for oppression. The court must be satisfied that the conduct falls within the concepts of "oppression", "unfair prejudice" or "unfair disregard" of the claimant's interest, within the meaning of s. 241 of the CBCA. Viewed in this way, the reasonable expectations analysis that is the theoretical foundation of the oppression remedy, and the particular types of conduct described in s. 241, may be seen as complementary, rather than representing alternative approaches to the oppression remedy, as has sometimes been supposed. Together, they offer a complete picture of conduct that is unjust and inequitable, to return to the language of Ebrahimi.

A Retrospective on Some Key Developments » (2005), 153 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1399, p. 1431)

b) La conduite abusive ou injuste à l'égard des intérêts du plaignant en ce qu'elle lui porte préjudice ou ne tient pas compte de ses intérêts

[89] Jusqu'à maintenant, la Cour a examiné la façon dont le plaignant doit établir la preuve du premier élément de la demande de redressement pour abus — à savoir qu'il s'attendait raisonnablement à être traité d'une certaine manière. Or, pour parfaire sa demande de redressement pour abus, le plaignant doit prouver que le défaut de répondre à cette attente est imputable à une conduite injuste et qu'il en a résulté des conséquences préjudiciables au sens de l'art. 241 de la LCSA. Ce ne sont pas, en effet, tous les cas où une attente raisonnable a été frustrée qui commandent la prise en compte des considérations en equity sur lesquelles repose la demande de redressement pour abus. Le tribunal doit être convaincu que la conduite en cause relève des notions d'« abus », de « préjudice injuste » ou d'« omission injuste de tenir compte » des intérêts du plaignant, au sens de l'art. 241 de la LCSA. Dans cette perspective, l'analyse des attentes raisonnables qui constitue l'assise théorique de la demande de redressement pour abus et les types particuliers de comportement décrits à l'art. 241 apparaissent comme des approches complémentaires, et non des approches distinctes, comme on l'a parfois supposé. Ensemble, ces approches offrent un tableau complet de ce qui constitue une conduite injuste et inéquitable, pour reprendre les termes de l'arrêt Ebrahimi.

[90] In most cases, proof of a reasonable expectation will be tied up with one or more of the concepts of oppression, unfair prejudice, or unfair disregard of interests set out in s. 241, and the two prongs will in fact merge. Nevertheless, it is worth stating that as in any action in equity, wrongful conduct, causation and compensable injury must be established in a claim for oppression.

[91] The concepts of oppression, unfair prejudice and unfairly disregarding relevant interests are adjectival. They indicate the type of wrong or conduct that the oppression remedy of s. 241 of the CBCA is aimed at. However, they do not represent watertight compartments, and often overlap and intermingle.

[92] The original wrong recognized in the cases was described simply as oppression, and was generally associated with conduct that has variously been described as "burdensome, harsh and wrongful", "a visible departure from standards of fair dealing", and an "abuse of power" going to the probity of how the corporation's affairs are being conducted: see Koehnen, at p. 81. It is this wrong that gave the remedy its name, which now is generally used to cover all s. 241 claims. However, the term also operates to connote a particular type of injury within the modern rubric of oppression generally — a wrong of the most serious sort.

[93] The CBCA has added "unfair prejudice" and "unfair disregard" of interests to the original common law concept, making it clear that wrongs falling short of the harsh and abusive conduct connoted by "oppression" may fall within s. 241. "Unfair prejudice" is generally seen as involving conduct less offensive than "oppression". Examples include squeezing out a minority shareholder, failing to disclose related party transactions, changing corporate structure to drastically alter debt ratios, adopting a "poison pill" to prevent a takeover bid, paying dividends without a formal declaration, preferring some shareholders with management fees

empoisonnée » pour éviter une OPA, le versement de dividendes sans déclaration formelle, le fait de privilégier certains actionnaires par le paiement d'honoraires de gestion et le paiement aux administrateurs d'honoraires plus élevés que la norme appliquée dans le secteur d'activité en cause : voir Koehnen, p. 82-83.

[94] "Unfair disregard" is viewed as the least serious of the three injuries, or wrongs, mentioned in s. 241. Examples include favouring a director by failing to properly prosecute claims, improperly reducing a shareholder's dividend, or failing to deliver property belonging to the claimant: see Koehnen, at pp. 83-84.

(2) Application to These Appeals

(2) Application aux présents pourvois

[95] As discussed above (at para. 68), in assessing a claim for oppression a court must answer two questions: (1) Does the evidence support the reasonable expectation the claimant asserts? and (2) Does the evidence establish that the reasonable expectation was violated by conduct falling within the terms "oppression", "unfair prejudice" or "unfair disregard" of a relevant interest?

[96] The debentureholders in this case assert two alternative expectations. Their highest position is that they had a reasonable expectation that the directors of BCE would protect their economic interests as debentureholders in Bell Canada by putting forward a plan of arrangement that would maintain the investment grade trading value of their debentures. Before this Court, however, they argued a softer alternative — a reasonable expectation that the directors would consider their economic interests in maintaining the trading value of the debentures.

[96] En l'espèce, les détenteurs de débentures soutiennent avoir eu deux attentes distinctes. Leur position première est qu'ils avaient des motifs raisonnables de s'attendre à ce que les administrateurs de BCE protègent leurs intérêts financiers comme détenteurs de débentures de Bell Canada en proposant un plan d'arrangement qui maintiendrait la cote de leurs débentures comme admissibles pour des placements. Devant notre Cour, cependant, ils ont plaidé subsidiairement avoir eu une attente plus limitée — l'attente raisonnable que les administrateurs tiendraient compte de leurs intérêts financiers en préservant la valeur marchande des débentures.

[97] As summarized above (at para. 25), the trial judge proceeded on the debentureholders' alleged expectation that the directors would act in a way that would preserve the investment grade status of their debentures. He concluded that this expectation

[97] Ainsi que la Cour l'a exposé brièvement plus haut (au par. 25), le juge de première instance a étudié la prétention des détenteurs de débentures qu'ils s'attendaient à ce que les administrateurs agissent de façon à préserver la cote de placements was not made out on the evidence, since the statements by Bell Canada suggesting a commitment to retaining investment grade ratings were accompanied by warnings that explicitly precluded investors from reasonably forming such expectations, and the warnings were included in the prospectuses pursuant to which the debentures were issued.

[98] The absence of a reasonable expectation that the investment grade of the debentures would be maintained was confirmed, in the trial judge's view, by the overall context of the relationship, the nature of the corporation, its situation as the target of a bidding war, as well as by the fact that the claimants could have protected themselves against reduction in market value by negotiating appropriate contractual terms.

[99] The trial judge situated his consideration of the relevant factors in the appropriate legal context. He recognized that the directors had a fiduciary duty to act in the best interests of the corporation and that the content of this duty was affected by the various interests at stake in the context of the auction process that BCE was undergoing. He emphasized that the directors, faced with conflicting interests, might have no choice but to approve transactions that, while in the best interests of the corporation, would benefit some groups at the expense of others. He held that the fact that the shareholders stood to benefit from the transaction and that the debentureholders were prejudiced did not in itself give rise to a conclusion that the directors had breached their fiduciary duty to the corporation. All three competing bids required Bell Canada to assume additional debt, and there was no evidence that bidders were prepared to accept less leveraged debt. Under the business judgment rule, deference should be accorded to business decisions of directors taken in good faith and in the performance of the functions they were elected to perform by the shareholders.

admissibles de leurs débentures. Il a conclu que la preuve de cette attente n'avait pas été établie étant donné que les déclarations de Bell Canada concernant son engagement à conserver une cote de placements admissibles s'accompagnaient de mises en garde faisant explicitement en sorte que les investisseurs ne pourraient former de telles attentes, mises en garde qui figuraient aussi dans les prospectus d'émission des débentures.

[99] Le juge de première instance a procédé à l'examen des facteurs pertinents en utilisant le cadre juridique approprié. Il a reconnu que les administrateurs avaient l'obligation fiduciaire d'agir au mieux des intérêts de la société et que le contenu de cette obligation dépendait des divers intérêts en jeu dans le contexte du processus d'enchères dont BCE faisait l'objet. Il a souligné que, face à des intérêts opposés, les administrateurs pouvaient n'avoir d'autre choix que d'approuver des transactions qui, bien qu'elles servent au mieux les intérêts de la société, privilégieraient certains groupes au détriment d'autres groupes. Il a conclu que le fait que les actionnaires puissent réaliser un gain alors que les détenteurs de débentures subiraient un préjudice ne permettait pas en soi de conclure à un manquement à l'obligation fiduciaire des administrateurs envers la société. Les trois offres concurrentes comportaient toutes un endettement supplémentaire de Bell Canada, et rien dans la preuve n'indiquait que les soumissionnaires étaient disposés à accepter un endettement moindre. Selon la règle de l'appréciation commerciale, il faut faire preuve de retenue à l'égard des décisions commerciales que les administrateurs prennent de bonne foi dans l'exécution des fonctions pour lesquelles ils ont été élus par les actionnaires.

[100] We see no error in the principles applied by the trial judge nor in his findings of fact, which were amply supported by the evidence. We accordingly agree that the first expectation advanced in this case — that the investment grade status of the debentures would be maintained — was not established.

[101] The alternative, softer, expectation advanced is that the directors would consider the interests of the bondholders in maintaining the trading value of the debentures. The Court of Appeal, albeit in the context of its reasons on the s. 192 application, accepted this as a reasonable expectation. It held that the representations made over the years, while not legally binding, created expectations beyond contractual rights. It went on to state that in these circumstances, the directors were under a duty, not simply to accept the best offer, but to consider whether the arrangement could be restructured in a way that provided a satisfactory price to the shareholders while avoiding an adverse effect on debentureholders.

[102] The evidence, objectively viewed, supports a reasonable expectation that the directors would consider the position of the debentureholders in making their decisions on the various offers under consideration. As discussed above, reasonable expectations for the purpose of a claim of oppression are not confined to legal interests. Given the potential impact on the debentureholders of the transactions under consideration, one would expect the directors, acting in the best interests of the corporation, to consider their short and long-term interests in the course of making their ultimate decision.

[103] Indeed, the evidence shows that the directors did consider the interests of the debentureholders. A number of debentureholders sent letters to the Board, expressing concern about the proposed leveraged buyout and seeking assurances that their interests would be considered. One of the directors, Mr. Pattison, met with Phillips, Hager & North,

representatives of the debentureholders. The directors' response to these overtures was that the contractual terms of the debentures would be met, but no additional assurances were given.

[104] It is apparent that the directors considered the interests of the debentureholders and, having done so, concluded that while the contractual terms of the debentures would be honoured, no further commitments could be made. This fulfilled the duty of the directors to consider the debentureholders' interests. It did not amount to "unfair disregard" of the interests of the debentureholders. As discussed above, it may be impossible to satisfy all stakeholders in a given situation. In this case, the Board considered the interests of the claimant stakeholders. Having done so, and having considered its options in the difficult circumstances it faced, it made its decision, acting in what it perceived to be the best interests of the corporation.

[105] What the claimants contend for on this appeal, in reality, is not merely an expectation that their interests be considered, but an expectation that the Board would take further positive steps to restructure the purchase in a way that would provide a satisfactory purchase price to the shareholders and preserve the high market value of the debentures. At this point, the second, softer expectation asserted approaches the first alleged expectation of maintaining the investment grade rating of the debentures.

[106] The difficulty with this proposition is that there is no evidence that it was reasonable to suppose it could have been achieved. BCE, facing certain takeover, acted reasonably to create a competitive bidding process. The process attracted three bids. All of the bids were leveraged, involving a substantial increase in Bell Canada's debt. It was this factor that posed the risk to the trading value compte. L'un des administrateurs, M. Pattison, a rencontré les représentants des détenteurs de débentures, Phillips, Hager & North. Les administrateurs ont répondu à l'expression de ces inquiétudes en affirmant qu'ils respecteraient les dispositions contractuelles rattachées aux débentures, mais aucune autre assurance n'a été donnée.

of the debentures. There is no evidence that BCE could have done anything to avoid that risk. Indeed, the evidence is to the contrary.

[107] We earlier discussed the factors to consider in determining whether an expectation is reasonable on a s. 241 oppression claim. These include commercial practice; the size, nature and structure of the corporation; the relationship between the parties; past practice; the failure to negotiate protections; agreements and representations; and the fair resolution of conflicting interests. In our view, all these factors weigh against finding an expectation beyond honouring the contractual obligations of the debentures in this particular case.

[108] Commercial practice — indeed commercial reality — undermines the claim that a way could have been found to preserve the trading position of the debentures in the context of the leveraged buyout. This reality must have been appreciated by reasonable debentureholders. More broadly, two considerations are germane to the influence of general commercial practice on the reasonableness of the debentureholders' expectations. First, leveraged buyouts of this kind are not unusual or unforeseeable, although the transaction at issue in this case is noteworthy for its magnitude. Second, trust indentures can include change of control and credit rating covenants where those protections have been negotiated. Protections of that type would have assured debentureholders a right to vote, potentially through their trustee, on the leveraged buyout, as the trial judge pointed out. This failure to negotiate protections was significant where the debentureholders, it may be noted, generally represent some of Canada's largest and most reputable financial institutions, pension funds and insurance companies.

l'endettement de Bell Canada. C'est ce facteur qui mettait à risque la valeur des débentures. Rien dans la preuve n'indique que BCE aurait pu faire quoi que ce soit pour écarter ce risque. En fait, la preuve démontrait le contraire.

[108] Les pratiques commerciales — en fait la réalité commerciale — affaiblissent la prétention qu'il aurait été possible de trouver une façon de préserver la valeur marchande des débentures dans le cadre d'une acquisition par emprunt. Des détenteurs de débentures raisonnables auraient eu conscience de cette réalité. Plus généralement, deux considérations sont pertinentes en ce qui concerne l'influence des pratiques commerciales générales sur le caractère raisonnable des attentes des détenteurs de débentures. Premièrement, les acquisitions par emprunt de ce type n'ont rien d'inhabituel ou d'imprévisible, bien que la transaction en cause en l'espèce se démarque par son ampleur. Deuxièmement, les actes de fiducie peuvent inclure des dispositions concernant un changement de contrôle et la cote financière dans les cas où ces protections ont été négociées. Des protections de ce type auraient assuré aux détenteurs de débentures un droit de vote, peut-être par l'intermédiaire de leur fiduciaire, sur l'acquisition par emprunt, comme l'a souligné le juge de première instance. Le défaut de négocier des mesures de protection revêtait de l'importance dans un cas où, soulignons-le, les détenteurs de débentures étaient en règle générale des institutions financières, des caisses de retraite et des sociétés d'assurance comptant parmi les plus importantes et les plus renommées du Canada.

[109] The nature and size of the corporation also undermine the reasonableness of any expectation that the directors would reject the offers that had been presented and seek an arrangement that preserved the investment grade rating of the debentures. As discussed above (at para. 74), courts may accord greater latitude to the reasonableness of expectations formed in the context of a small, closely held corporation, rather than those relating to interests in a large, public corporation. Bell Canada had become a wholly owned subsidiary of BCE in 1983, pursuant to a plan of arrangement which saw the shareholders of Bell Canada surrender their shares in exchange for shares of BCE. Based upon the history of the relationship, it should not have been outside the contemplation of debentureholders acquiring debentures of Bell Canada under the 1996 and 1997 trust indentures, that arrangements of this type had occurred and could occur in the future.

[110] The debentureholders rely on past practice, suggesting that investment grade ratings had always been maintained. However, as noted, reasonable practices may reflect changing economic and market realities. The events that precipitated the leveraged buyout transaction were such realities. Nor did the trial judge find in this case that representations had been made to debentureholders upon which they could have reasonably relied.

[111] Finally, the claim must be considered from the perspective of the duty on the directors to resolve conflicts between the interests of corporate stakeholders in a fair manner that reflected the best interests of the corporation.

[112] The best interests of the corporation arguably favoured acceptance of the offer at the time. BCE had been put in play, and the momentum of the market made a buyout inevitable. The evidence, accepted by the trial judge, was that Bell Canada needed to undertake significant changes to continue to be successful, and that privatization

would provide greater freedom to achieve its long-term goals by removing the pressure on short-term public financial reporting, and bringing in equity from sophisticated investors motivated to improve the corporation's performance. Provided that, as here, the directors' decision is found to have been within the range of reasonable choices that they could have made in weighing conflicting interests, the court will not go on to determine whether their decision was the perfect one.

prospérer, et que la fermeture de la société élargirait la marge de manœuvre nécessaire à l'atteinte de ses objectifs à long terme en supprimant la pression à court terme créée par les obligations de communication de l'information financière au public et en permettant l'injection de capitaux propres par des investisseurs avisés soucieux d'améliorer le rendement de la société. Dans la mesure où il conclut que la décision des administrateurs se situe dans l'éventail des solutions raisonnables qu'ils auraient pu choisir en soupesant des intérêts opposés, le tribunal ne poursuivra pas son examen pour déterminer si cette décision est la solution parfaite.

[113] Considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that the debentureholders have failed to establish a reasonable expectation that could give rise to a claim for oppression. As found by the trial judge, the alleged expectation that the investment grade of the debentures would be maintained is not supported by the evidence. A reasonable expectation that the debentureholders' interests would be considered is established, but was fulfilled. The evidence does not support a further expectation that a better arrangement could be negotiated that would meet the exigencies that the corporation was facing, while better preserving the trading value of the debentures.

[114] Given that the debentureholders have failed to establish that the expectations they assert were reasonable, or that they were not fulfilled, it is unnecessary to consider in detail whether conduct complained of was oppressive, unfairly prejudicial, or unfairly disregarded the debentureholders' interests within the terms of s. 241 of the CBCA. Suffice it to say that "oppression" in the sense of bad faith and abuse was not alleged, much less proved. At best, the claim was for "unfair disregard" of the interests of the debentureholders. As discussed, the evidence does not support this claim.

C. The Section 192 Approval Process

[115] The second remedy relied on by the debentureholders is the approval process for complex corporate arrangements set out under s. 192 of the CBCA. BCE brought a petition for court approval of the plan under s. 192. At trial, the debentureholders were granted standing to contest such approval. The trial judge concluded that "[i]t seem[ed] only logical and 'fair' to conduct this analysis having regard to the interests of BCE and those of its shareholders and other stakeholders, if any, whose interests are being arranged or affected": (2008), 43 B.L.R. (4th) 1, 2008 QCCS 905, at para. 151. On the basis of Corporations Canada's Policy concerning Arrangements Under Section 192 of the CBCA, November 2003 ("Policy Statement 15.1"), the trial judge held that the s. 192 approval did not require the Board to afford the debentureholders the right to vote. He nonetheless considered their interests in assessing the fairness of the arrangement. After a full hearing, he approved the arrangement as "fair and reasonable", despite the debentureholders' objections that the arrangement would adversely affect the trading value of their securities.

[116] The Court of Appeal reversed this decision, essentially on the ground that the directors had not given adequate consideration to the debentureholders' reasonable expectations. These expectations, in its view, extended beyond the debentureholders' legal rights and required the directors to consider whether the adverse impact on the debentureholders' economic interests could be alleviated or attenuated. The court held that the corporation had failed to discharge the burden of showing that it was impossible to structure the sale in a manner that avoided the adverse economic effect on debentureholdings, and consequently had failed to establish that the proposed plan of arrangement was fair and reasonable.

C. Le processus d'approbation prévu à l'art. 192

[117] Before considering what must be shown to obtain approval of an arrangement under s. 192, it may be helpful to briefly return to the differences between an action for oppression under s. 241 of the CBCA and a motion for approval of an arrangement under s. 192 of the CBCA alluded to earlier.

[118] As we have discussed (at para. 47), the reasoning of the Court of Appeal effectively incorporated the s. 241 oppression claim into the s. 192 approval proceeding, converting it into an inquiry based on reasonable expectations.

[119] As we view the matter, the s. 241 oppression remedy and the s. 192 approval process are different proceedings, with different requirements. While a conclusion that the proposed arrangement has an oppressive result may support the conclusion that the arrangement is not fair and reasonable under s. 192, it is important to keep in mind the differences between the two remedies. The oppression remedy is a broad and equitable remedy that focuses on the reasonable expectations of stakeholders, while the s. 192 approval process focuses on whether the arrangement, objectively viewed, is fair and reasonable and looks primarily to the interests of the parties whose legal rights are being arranged. Moreover, in an oppression proceeding, the onus is on the claimant to establish oppression or unfairness, while in a s. 192 proceeding, the onus is on the corporation to establish that the arrangement is "fair and reasonable".

[120] These differences suggest that it is possible that a claimant might fail to show oppression under s. 241, but might succeed under s. 192 by establishing that the corporation has not discharged its onus of showing that the arrangement in question is fair and reasonable. For this reason, it is necessary to consider the debentureholders' s. 192 claim on these appeals, notwithstanding our earlier conclusion that the debentureholders have not established oppression.

[119] La Cour estime que la demande de redressement pour abus de l'art. 241 et le processus d'approbation de l'art. 192 constituent des recours différents comportant des exigences différentes. Bien que la conclusion que l'arrangement proposé a des conséquences abusives puisse étayer celle qu'il ne s'agit pas d'un arrangement équitable et raisonnable au sens de l'art. 192, il importe de garder à l'esprit les différences entre les deux recours. La demande de redressement pour abus est un recours en equity, d'une grande portée, qui met l'accent sur les attentes raisonnables des parties intéressées, alors que le processus d'approbation prévu à l'art. 192 est axé sur la question de savoir si l'arrangement est équitable et raisonnable, d'un point de vue objectif, et tient principalement compte des intérêts des parties dont les droits sont visés par l'arrangement. De plus, dans le cadre d'une demande de redressement pour abus, c'est au plaignant qu'il incombe de prouver l'abus ou l'injustice, tandis que c'est à la société qu'il appartient d'établir que l'arrangement est « équitable et raisonnable » dans le cadre de la procédure prévue à l'art. 192.

[121] Whether the converse is true is not at issue in these proceedings and need not detain us. It might be argued that in theory, a finding of s. 241 oppression could be coupled with approval of an arrangement as fair and reasonable under s. 192, given the different allocations of burden of proof in the two actions and the different perspectives from which the assessment is made. On the other hand, common sense suggests, as did the Court of Appeal, that a finding of oppression sits ill with the conclusion that the arrangement involved is fair and reasonable. We leave this interesting question to a case where it arises.

(1) The Requirements for Approval Under Section 192

[122] We will first describe the nature and purpose of the s. 192 approval process. We will then consider the philosophy that underlies s. 192 approval; the interests at play in the process; and the criteria to be applied by the judge on a s. 192 proceeding.

(a) The Nature and Purpose of the Section 192 Procedure

[123] The s. 192 approval process has its genesis in 1923 legislation designed to permit corporations to modify their share capital: Companies Act Amending Act, 1923, S.C. 1923, c. 39, s. 4. The legislation's concern was to permit changes to shareholders' rights, while offering shareholders protection. In 1974, plans of arrangements were omitted from the CBCA because Parliament considered them superfluous and feared that they could be used to squeeze out minority shareholders. Upon realizing that arrangements were a practical and flexible way to effect complicated transactions, an arrangement provision was reintroduced in the CBCA in 1978: Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada, Detailed background paper for an Act to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act (1977), p. 5 ("Detailed Background Paper").

[121] La Cour n'a pas à se demander en l'espèce si l'inverse est vrai. Compte tenu des différences entre les deux recours en ce qui concerne le fardeau de la preuve et la perspective dans laquelle l'examen est effectué, on pourrait soutenir qu'il est possible, en théorie, de conclure à l'existence d'un abus au sens de l'art. 241 tout en approuvant l'arrangement en application de l'art. 192. Par contre, le bon sens donne à penser, comme l'a fait la Cour d'appel, qu'on peut difficilement conclure à la fois qu'il y a abus et que l'arrangement est équitable et raisonnable. Cette intéressante question devra toutefois être résolue dans le cadre d'une affaire où elle se posera.

(1) La preuve exigée pour l'approbation selon l'art. 192

a) La nature et l'objet de la procédure prévue par l'art. 192

[124] In light of the flexibility it affords, the provision has been broadened to deal not only with reorganization of share capital, but corporate reorganization more generally. Section 192(1) of the present legislation defines an arrangement under the provision as including amendments to articles, amalgamation of two or more corporations, division of the business carried on by a corporation, privatization or "squeeze-out" transactions, liquidation or dissolution, or any combination of these.

[125] This list of transactions is not exhaustive and has been interpreted broadly by courts. Increasingly, s. 192 has been used as a device for effecting changes of control because of advantages it offers the purchaser: C. C. Nicholls, Mergers, Acquisitions, and Other Changes of Corporate Control (2007), at p. 76. One of these advantages is that it permits the purchaser to buy shares of the target company without the need to comply with provincial takeover bid rules.

[126] The s. 192 process is generally applicable to change of control transactions that share two characteristics: the arrangement is sponsored by the directors of the target company; and the goal of the arrangement is to require some or all of the shareholders to surrender their shares to either the purchaser or the target company.

[127] Fundamentally, the s. 192 procedure rests on the proposition that where a corporate transaction will alter the rights of security holders, this impact takes the decision out of the scope of management of the corporation's affairs, which is the responsibility of the directors. Section 192 overcomes this impediment through two mechanisms. First, proposed arrangements generally can be submitted to security holders for approval. Although there is no explicit requirement for a security holder vote in s. 192, as will be discussed below, these votes are an important feature of the process for approval of plans of arrangement. Second, the plan of arrangement must receive court approval after a hearing in which parties whose rights are being affected may partake.

[124] La souplesse de cette disposition lui a valu d'être élargie pour s'appliquer, non seulement à la réorganisation du capital-actions, mais plus généralement aux réaménagements d'une société. Suivant le par. 192(1) de la loi actuelle, un arrangement s'entend de la modification des statuts d'une société, de la fusion de deux sociétés ou plus, du fractionnement de l'activité commerciale d'une société, d'une opération de fermeture ou d'éviction, de la liquidation ou de la dissolution d'une société ou de toute combinaison de ces transactions.

(b) The Philosophy Underlying Section 192

[128] The purpose of s. 192, as we have seen, is to permit major changes in corporate structure to be made, while ensuring that individuals and groups whose rights may be affected are treated fairly. In conducting the s. 192 inquiry, the judge must keep in mind the spirit of s. 192, which is to achieve a fair balance between conflicting interests. In discussing the objective of the arrangement provision introduced into the CBCA in 1978, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs stated:

> . . . the Bill seeks to achieve a fair balance between flexible management and equitable treatment of minority shareholders in a manner that is consonant with the other fundamental change institutions set out in Part XIV.
> (Detailed Background Paper, at p. 6)

[129] Although s. 192 was initially conceived as permitting and has principally been used to permit useful restructuring while protecting minority shareholders against adverse effects, the goal of ensuring a fair balance between different constituencies applies with equal force when considering the interests of non-shareholder security holders recognized under s. 192. Section 192 recognizes that major changes may be appropriate, even where they have an adverse impact on the rights of particular individuals or groups. It seeks to ensure that the interests of these rights holders are considered and treated fairly, and that in the end the arrangement is one that should proceed.

(c) Interests Protected by Section 192

[130] The s. 192 procedure originally was aimed at protecting shareholders affected by corporate restructuring. That remains a fundamental concern. However, this aim has been subsequently broadened to protect other security holders in some circumstances.

[131] Section 192 clearly contemplates the participation of security holders in certain situations.

b) La philosophie qui sous-tend l'art. 192

> . . . le projet de loi tente d'atteindre un juste équilibre entre une gestion souple et le traitement équitable des actionnaires minoritaires, d'une façon qui corresponde aux autres pratiques de modification de structure stipulées dans la Partie XIV.

c) Les intérêts protégés par l'art. 192

[130] La procédure prévue à l'art. 192 visait initialement à protéger les actionnaires touchés par la restructuration de la société. Bien que cet objet demeure fondamental, cette protection s'est par la suite étendue à d'autres détenteurs de valeurs mobilières, dans certaines circonstances.

[131] L'article 192 envisage clairement la participation des détenteurs de valeurs mobilières dans

Section 192(1)(f) specifies that an arrangement may include an exchange of securities for property. Section 192(4)(c) provides that a court can make an interim order "requiring a corporation to call, hold and conduct a meeting of holders of securities". The Director appointed under the CBCA takes the view that, at a minimum, all security holders whose legal rights stand to be affected by the transaction should be permitted to vote on the arrangement: Policy Statement 15.1, s. 3.08.

[132] A difficult question is whether s. 192 applies only to security holders whose legal rights stand to be affected by the proposal, or whether it applies to security holders whose legal rights remain intact but whose economic interests may be prejudiced.

[133] The purpose of s. 192, discussed above, suggests that only security holders whose legal rights stand to be affected by the proposal are envisioned. As we have seen, the s. 192 procedure was conceived and has traditionally been viewed as aimed at permitting a corporation to make changes that affect the rights of the parties. It is the fact that rights are being altered that places the matter beyond the power of the directors and creates the need for shareholder and court approval. The distinction between the focus on legal rights under arrangement approval and reasonable expectations under the oppression remedy is a crucial one. The oppression remedy is grounded in unfair treatment of stakeholders, rather than on legal rights in their strict sense.

[134] This general rule, however, does not preclude the possibility that in some circumstances, for example threat of insolvency or claims by certain minority shareholders, interests that are not strictly legal should be considered: see Policy Statement 15.1, s. 3.08, referring to "extraordinary circumstances".

[135] It is not necessary to decide on these appeals precisely what would amount to "extraordinary certaines situations. L'alinéa 192(1)f) précise qu'un arrangement peut inclure l'échange de valeurs mobilières contre des biens. L'alinéa 192(4)c) énonce que le tribunal peut rendre une ordonnance enjoignant à la société « de convoquer et de tenir une assemblée des détenteurs de valeurs mobilières ». Le directeur nommé en vertu de la LCSA est d'avis, au moins, que tous les détenteurs de valeurs mobilières dont les droits sont touchés par la transaction doivent être autorisés à voter sur l'arrangement : Énoncé de politique 15.1, par. 3.08.

[135] Il n'est pas nécessaire pour trancher les pourvois de statuer sur ce qui constituerait exactement circumstances" permitting consideration of non-legal interests on a s. 192 application. In our view, the fact that a group whose legal rights are left intact faces a reduction in the trading value of its securities would generally not, without more, constitute such a circumstance.

(d) Criteria for Court Approval

[136] Section 192(3) specifies that the corporation must obtain court approval of the plan. In determining whether a plan of arrangement should be approved, the court must focus on the terms and impact of the arrangement itself, rather than on the process by which it was reached. What is required is that the arrangement itself, viewed substantively and objectively, be suitable for approval.

[137] In seeking approval of an arrangement, the corporation bears the onus of satisfying the court that: (1) the statutory procedures have been met; (2) the application has been put forward in good faith; and (3) the arrangement is fair and reasonable: see Trizec Corp., Re (1994), 21 Alta. L.R. (3d) 435 (Q.B.), at p. 444. This may be contrasted with the s. 241 oppression action, where the onus is on the claimant to establish its case. On these appeals, it is conceded that the corporation satisfied the first two requirements. The only question is whether the arrangement is fair and reasonable.

[138] In reviewing the directors' decision on the proposed arrangement to determine if it is fair and reasonable under s. 192, courts must be satisfied that (a) the arrangement has a valid business purpose, and (b) the objections of those whose legal rights are being arranged are being resolved in a fair and balanced way. It is through this two-pronged framework that courts can determine whether a plan is fair and reasonable.

[139] In the past, some courts have answered the question of whether an arrangement is fair and reasonable by applying what is referred to as the des « circonstances particulières » autorisant la prise en compte de simples intérêts dans l'examen d'une demande fondée sur l'art. 192. La Cour est d'avis qu'une diminution possible de la valeur marchande des valeurs mobilières d'un groupe dont les droits demeurent par ailleurs intacts ne constitue généralement pas, à elle seule, ce type de circonstances.

d) Les critères d'approbation

[136] Le paragraphe 192(3) exige que la société fasse approuver le plan par un tribunal. Pour statuer sur la demande d'approbation, le tribunal doit s'attacher aux modalités et aux effets de l'arrangement lui-même plutôt qu'au processus suivi pour y parvenir. Il faut que l'arrangement lui-même, considéré substantiellement et objectivement, soit de nature à pouvoir être approuvé.

business judgment test, that is whether an intelligent and honest business person, as a member of the voting class concerned and acting in his or her own interest would reasonably approve the arrangement: see Trizec, at p. 444; Pacifica Papers Inc. v. Johnstone (2001), 15 B.L.R. (3d) 249, 2001 BCSC 1069. However, while this consideration may be important, it does not constitute a useful or complete statement of what must be considered on a s. 192 application.

[140] First, the fact that the business judgment test referred to here and the business judgment rule discussed above (at para. 40) are so similarly named leads to confusion. The business judgment rule expresses the need for deference to the business judgment of directors as to the best interests of the corporation. The business judgment test under s. 192, by contrast, is aimed at determining whether the proposed arrangement is fair and reasonable, having regard to the corporation and relevant stakeholders. The two inquiries are quite different. Yet the use of the same terminology has given rise to confusion. Thus, courts have on occasion cited the business judgment test while saying that it stands for the principle that arrangements do not have to be perfect, i.e. as a deference principle: see Abitibi-Consolidated Inc. (Arrangement relatif à), [2007] Q.J. No. 16158 (QL), 2007 QCCS 6830. To conflate the business judgment test and the business judgment rule leads to difficulties in understanding what "fair and reasonable" means and how an arrangement may satisfy this threshold.

[141] Second, in instances where affected security holders have voted on a plan of arrangement, it seems redundant to ask what an intelligent and honest business person, as a member of the voting class concerned and acting in his or her own interest, would do. As will be discussed below (at para. 150), votes on arrangements are an important indicator of whether a plan is fair and reasonable.

commerciale, qui consiste à déterminer si un homme ou une femme d'affaires intelligent et honnête, membre de la catégorie ayant droit de vote en cause et agissant dans son propre intérêt, approuverait raisonnablement l'arrangement : voir Trizec, p. 444; Pacifica Papers Inc. c. Johnstone (2001), 15 B.L.R. (3d) 249, 2001 BCSC 1069. Toutefois, bien que cette question puisse être importante, elle ne constitue pas un énoncé utile et complet des éléments à considérer pour l'examen d'une demande fondée sur l'art. 192.

[140] Premièrement, la similitude d'appellation du test de l'appréciation commerciale qui nous intéresse ici et de la règle de l'appréciation commerciale examinée précédemment (au par. 40) sème la confusion. La règle de l'appréciation commerciale exprime la nécessité de faire preuve de retenue à l'égard de l'appréciation par les administrateurs de ce qui sert le mieux les intérêts de la société. Le test de l'appréciation commerciale pour l'application de l'art. 192, quant à lui, vise à déterminer si l'arrangement proposé est équitable et raisonnable compte tenu des intérêts de la société et des parties intéressées. Ces deux analyses diffèrent passablement. Or, la similitude des termes employés pour les désigner sème la confusion. Ainsi, il est arrivé que des tribunaux citent le test de l'appréciation commerciale à l'appui du principe selon lequel il n'est pas nécessaire que les arrangements soient parfaits, c.-à-d. en tant que principe de retenue judiciaire : voir Abitibi-Consolidated Inc. (Arrangement relatif à), [2007] J.Q. n° 16158 (QL), 2007 QCCS 6830. Lorsqu'on confond le test de l'appréciation commerciale et la règle de l'appréciation commerciale, il devient plus difficile de comprendre le sens de l'expression « équitable et raisonnable » et la façon dont un arrangement peut satisfaire à cette condition.

[141] Deuxièmement, lorsque les détenteurs de valeurs mobilières dont les droits sont touchés ont voté en faveur d'un plan d'arrangement, il paraît redondant de se demander ce que ferait une femme ou un homme d'affaires intelligent et honnête, en tant que membre de la catégorie ayant droit de vote en cause et agissant dans son propre intérêt. Comme on le verra plus loin (au par. 150), les

However, the business judgment test does not provide any more information than does the outcome of a vote. Section 192 makes it clear that the reviewing judge must delve beyond whether a reasonable business person would approve of a plan to determine whether an arrangement is fair and reasonable. Insofar as the business judgment test suggests that the judge need only consider the perspective of the majority group, it is incomplete.

[142] In summary, we conclude that the business judgment test is not useful in the context of a s. 192 application, and indeed may lead to confusion.

[143] The framework proposed in these reasons reformulates the s. 192 test for what is fair and reasonable in a way that reflects the logic of s. 192 and the authorities. Determining what is fair and reasonable involves two inquiries: first, whether the arrangement has a valid business purpose; and second, whether it resolves the objections of those whose rights are being arranged in a fair and balanced way. In approving plans of arrangement, courts have frequently pointed to factors that answer these two questions as discussed more fully below: Canadian Pacific Ltd. (Re) (1990), 73 O.R. (2d) 212 (H.C.); Cinar Corp. v. Shareholders of Cinar Corp. (2004), 4 C.B.R. (5th) 163 (Que. Sup. Ct.); PetroKazakhstan Inc. v. Lukoil Overseas Kumkol B.V. (2005), 12 B.L.R. (4th) 128, 2005 ABQB 789.

[144] We now turn to a more detailed discussion of the two prongs.

[145] The valid business purpose prong of the fair and reasonable analysis recognizes the fact that there must be a positive value to the corporation to offset the fact that rights are being altered. In other words, courts must be satisfied that the burden imposed by the arrangement on security holders is justified by the interests of the corporation.

votes tenus au sujet d'arrangements constituent un indicateur important de leur caractère équitable et raisonnable. Toutefois, le critère de l'appréciation commerciale n'est pas plus éclairant que le résultat d'un vote. L'article 192 établit clairement que, pour se prononcer sur le caractère équitable et raisonnable de l'arrangement qui lui est soumis, le juge doit aller au-delà de la question de savoir si un homme ou une femme d'affaires raisonnable l'approuverait. Dans la mesure où le critère de l'appréciation commerciale donne à entendre qu'il suffit au juge d'adopter le point de vue du groupe majoritaire, il est incomplet.

The proposed plan of arrangement must further the interests of the corporation as an ongoing concern. In this sense, it may be narrower than the "best interests of the corporation" test that defines the fiduciary duty of directors under s. 122 of the CBCA (see paras. 38-40).

[146] The valid purpose inquiry is invariably fact-specific. Thus, the nature and extent of evidence needed to satisfy this requirement will depend on the circumstances. An important factor for courts to consider when determining if the plan of arrangement serves a valid business purpose is the necessity of the arrangement to the continued operations of the corporation. Necessity is driven by the market conditions that a corporation faces, including technological, regulatory and competitive conditions. Indicia of necessity include the existence of alternatives and market reaction to the plan. The degree of necessity of the arrangement has a direct impact on the court's level of scrutiny. Austin J. in Canadian Pacific concluded that > while courts are prepared to assume jurisdiction notwithstanding a lack of necessity on the part of the company, the lower the degree of necessity, the higher the degree of scrutiny that should be applied. [Emphasis added; p. 223.]

If the plan of arrangement is necessary for the corporation's continued existence, courts will more willingly approve it despite its prejudicial effect on some security holders. Conversely, if the arrangement is not mandated by the corporation's financial or commercial situation, courts are more cautious and will undertake a careful analysis to ensure that it was not in the sole interest of a particular stakeholder. Thus, the relative necessity of the arrangement may justify negative impact on the interests of affected security holders.

[147] The second prong of the fair and reasonable analysis focuses on whether the objections of those whose rights are being arranged are being resolved in a fair and balanced way.

valeurs mobilières. Le plan proposé doit en outre servir les intérêts de la société dans la perspective de la continuité de l'entreprise, critère qui peut avoir une portée plus réduite que le critère de ce qui est « au mieux des intérêts de la société » utilisé pour définir l'obligation fiduciaire imposée aux administrateurs par l'art. 122 de la LCSA (voir les par. 38-40).

[146] L'examen de l'objectif commercial légitime est invariablement lié aux faits. Par conséquent, la nature et l'étendue de la preuve requise pour répondre à ce critère variera suivant les circonstances. Un important facteur à considérer pour établir si un plan d'arrangement poursuit un objectif commercial légitime est celui de la nécessité de l'arrangement pour la poursuite des activités de la société. Cette nécessité est fonction des conditions du marché, notamment sur les plan de la technologie, de la réglementation et de la concurrence. L'existence de solutions de rechange et la réaction du marché au plan constituent des indices de la nécessité du plan. Le degré de nécessité de l'arrangement a une incidence directe sur la rigueur de l'examen. Dans Canadian Pacific, la juge Austin a conclu :

Si le plan d'arrangement est nécessaire pour que la société continue d'exister, les tribunaux seront plus enclins à l'approuver en dépit de ses effets préjudiciables sur certains détenteurs de valeurs mobilières. À l'inverse, si la situation financière ou commerciale de la société ne requiert pas l'arrangement, les tribunaux se montreront plus circonspects et procéderont à un examen minutieux pour s'assurer qu'il ne sert pas uniquement les intérêts d'une partie intéressée en particulier. Par conséquent, la nécessité relative de l'arrangement peut en justifier les effets négatifs sur les intérêts des détenteurs de valeurs mobilières touchés.

[148] An objection to a plan of arrangement may arise where there is tension between the interests of the corporation and those of a security holder, or there are conflicting interests between different groups of affected rights holders. The judge must be satisfied that the arrangement strikes a fair balance, having regard to the ongoing interests of the corporation and the circumstances of the case. Often this will involve complex balancing, whereby courts determine whether appropriate accommodations and protections have been afforded to the concerned parties. However, as noted by Forsyth J. in Trizec, at para. 36:

> [T]he court must be careful not to cater to the special needs of one particular group but must strive to be fair to all involved in the transaction depending on the circumstances that exist. The overall fairness of any arrangement must be considered as well as fairness to various individual stakeholders.

[149] The question is whether the plan, viewed in this light, is fair and reasonable. In answering this question, courts have considered a variety of factors, depending on the nature of the case at hand. None of these alone is conclusive, and the relevance of particular factors varies from case to case. Nevertheless, they offer guidance.

[150] An important factor is whether a majority of security holders has voted to approve the arrangement. Where the majority is absent or slim, doubts may arise as to whether the arrangement is fair and reasonable; however, a large majority suggests the converse. Although the outcome of a vote by security holders is not determinative of whether the plan should receive the approval of the court, courts have placed considerable weight on this factor. Voting results offer a key indication of whether those affected by the plan consider it to be fair and reasonable: St. Lawrence & Hudson Railway Co. (Re), [1998] O.J. No. 3934 (QL) (Gen. Div.).

[151] Where there has been no vote, courts may consider whether an intelligent and honest business person, as a member of the class concerned and

[149] Il faut se demander si le plan, considéré dans cette perspective, est équitable et raisonnable. Pour répondre à cette question, les tribunaux ont tenu compte de divers facteurs, selon la nature de l'affaire. Aucun de ces facteurs n'est déterminant à lui seul et la pertinence de chacun varie d'un cas à l'autre, mais ils fournissent des indications utiles.

[150] Le fait que la majorité des détenteurs de valeurs mobilières aient voté en faveur du plan constitue un facteur important. Le caractère équitable et raisonnable d'un plan qui ne recueille qu'une minorité ou une faible majorité des voix peut être mis en doute, tandis qu'une majorité substantielle a l'effet inverse. Bien que le résultat du vote des détenteurs de valeurs mobilières ne soit pas déterminant pour l'approbation judiciaire du plan, les tribunaux attribuent un poids considérable à ce facteur. Il s'agit d'un indice capital permettant de savoir si les parties touchées estiment que l'arrangement est équitable et raisonnable : St. Lawrence & Hudson Railway Co. (Re), [1998] O.J. No. 3934 (QL) (Div. gén.).

[151] En l'absence de vote, les tribunaux peuvent se demander si une femme ou un homme d'affaires intelligent et honnête, en tant que membre de acting in his or her own interest, might reasonably approve of the plan: Re Alabama, New Orleans, Texas and Pacific Junction Railway Co., [1891] 1 Ch. 213 (C.A.); Trizec.

[152] Other indicia of fairness are the proportionality of the compromise between various security holders, the security holders' position before and after the arrangement and the impact on various security holders' rights: see Canadian Pacific; Trizec. The court may also consider the repute of the directors and advisors who endorse the arrangement and the arrangement's terms. Thus, courts have considered whether the plan has been approved by a special committee of independent directors; the presence of a fairness opinion from a reputable expert; and the access of shareholders to dissent and appraisal remedies: see Stelco Inc., Re (2006), 18 C.B.R. (5th) 173 (Ont. S.C.J.); Cinar; St. Lawrence & Hudson Railway; Trizec; Pacifica Papers; Canadian Pacific.

[153] This review of factors represents considerations that have figured in s. 192 cases to date. It is not meant to be exhaustive, but simply to provide an overview of some factors considered by courts in determining if a plan has reasonably addressed the objections and conflicts between different constituencies. Many of these factors will also indicate whether the plan serves a valid business purpose. The overall determination of whether an arrangement is fair and reasonable is fact-specific and may require the assessment of different factors in different situations.

[154] We arrive then at this conclusion: in determining whether a plan of arrangement is fair and reasonable, the judge must be satisfied that the plan serves a valid business purpose and that it adequately responds to the objections and conflicts between different affected parties. Whether these requirements are met is determined by taking into account a variety of relevant factors, including the necessity of the arrangement to the corporation's la catégorie en cause et agissant dans son propre intérêt, approuverait raisonnablement le plan : Re Alabama, New Orleans, Texas & Pacific Junction Railway Co., [1891] 1 Ch. 213 (C.A.); Trizec.

continued existence, the approval, if any, of a majority of shareholders and other security holders entitled to vote, and the proportionality of the impact on affected groups.

[155] As has frequently been stated, there is no such thing as a perfect arrangement. What is required is a reasonable decision in light of the specific circumstances of each case, not a perfect decision: Trizec; Maple Leaf Foods. The court on a s. 192 application should refrain from substituting their views of what they consider the "best" arrangement. At the same time, the court should not surrender their duty to scrutinize the arrangement. Because s. 192 facilitates the alteration of legal rights, the Court must conduct a careful review of the proposed transactions. As Lax J. stated in UPM-Kymmene Corp. v. UPM-Kymmene Miramichi Inc. (2002), 214 D.L.R. (4th) 496 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 153: "Although Board decisions are not subject to microscopic examination with the perfect vision of hindsight, they are subject to examination."

(2) Application to These Appeals

[156] As discussed above (at paras. 137-38), the corporation on a s. 192 application must satisfy the court that: (1) the statutory procedures are met; (2) the application is put forward in good faith; and (3) the arrangement is fair and reasonable, in the sense that: (a) the arrangement has a valid business purpose; and (b) the objections of those whose rights are being arranged are resolved in a fair and balanced way.

[157] The first and second requirements are clearly satisfied in this case. On the third element, the debentureholders no longer argue that the arrangement lacks a valid business purpose. The debate before this Court focuses on whether the objections of those whose rights are being arranged were resolved in a fair and balanced way.

l'approbation du plan par la majorité des actionnaires et des autres détenteurs de valeurs mobilières ayant droit de vote, le cas échéant, et la proportionnalité des effets du plan sur les groupes touchés.

[155] Comme cela a souvent été dit, il n'existe pas d'arrangement parfait. Ce qui est requis, c'est que la décision soit raisonnable au regard des circonstances particulières de l'espèce, et non qu'elle soit parfaite : Trizec; Maple Leaf Foods. Les tribunaux appelés à approuver un plan en vertu de l'art. 192 doivent s'abstenir d'y substituer leur propre conception de ce qui constituerait le « meilleur » arrangement. Mais ils ne doivent pas pour autant renoncer à s'acquitter de leur obligation d'examiner l'arrangement. Étant donné que l'art. 192 facilite la modification de droits, le tribunal doit procéder à un examen attentif des transactions proposées. Comme la juge Lax l'a déclaré dans UPM-Kymmene Corp. c. UPM-Kymmene Miramichi Inc. (2002), 214 D.L.R. (4th) 496 (C.S.J. Ont.), par. 153 : [TRADUCTION] « Bien qu'il n'y ait pas lieu de scruter les décisions du conseil d'administration à la loupe dans la perspective idéale que permet le recul, il faut tout de même les examiner. »

(2) Application aux présents pourvois

[156] Comme il a déjà été mentionné (aux par. 137-138), la société qui soumet une demande en vertu de l'art. 192 doit convaincre le tribunal que : (1) la procédure prévue par la loi a été suivie, (2) la demande est soumise de bonne foi et (3) l'arrangement est équitable et raisonnable au sens où a) il poursuit un objectif commercial légitime et b) il répond de façon équitable et équilibrée aux objections de ceux dont les droits sont visés par l'arrangement.

[158] The debentureholders argue that the arrangement does not address their rights in a fair and balanced way. Their main contention is that the process adopted by the directors in negotiating and concluding the arrangement failed to consider their interests adequately, in particular the fact that the arrangement, while upholding their contractual rights, would reduce the trading value of their debentures and in some cases downgrade them to below investment grade rating.

[159] The first question that arises is whether the debentureholders' economic interest in preserving the trading value of their bonds was an interest that the directors were required to consider on the s. 192 application. We earlier concluded that authority and principle suggest that s. 192 is generally concerned with legal rights, absent exceptional circumstances. We further suggested that the fact that a group whose legal rights are left intact faces a reduction in the trading value of its securities would generally not constitute such a circumstance.

[160] Relying on Policy Statement 15.1, the trial judge in these proceedings concluded that the debentureholders were not entitled to vote on the plan of arrangement because their legal rights were not being arranged; "[t]o do so would unjustly give [them] a veto over a transaction with an aggregate common equity value of approximately $35 billion that was approved by over 97% of the shareholders" (para. 166). Nevertheless, the trial judge went on to consider the debentureholders' perspective.

[161] We find no error in the trial judge's conclusions on this point. Since only their economic interests were affected by the proposed transaction, not their legal rights, and since they did not fall within an exceptional situation where non-legal interests should be considered under s. 192, the debentureholders did not constitute an affected class under s. 192. The trial judge was thus correct in concluding

that they should not be permitted to veto almost 98 percent of the shareholders simply because the trading value of their securities would be affected. Although not required, it remained open to the trial judge to consider the debentureholders' economic interests in his assessment of whether the arrangement was fair and reasonable under s. 192, as he did.

[162] The next question is whether the trial judge erred in concluding that the arrangement addressed the debentureholders' interests in a fair and balanced way. The trial judge emphasized that the arrangement preserved the contractual rights of the debentureholders as negotiated. He noted that it was open to the debentureholders to negotiate protections against increased debt load or the risks of changes in corporate structure, had they wished to do so. He went on to state:

> . . . the evidence discloses that [the debentureholders'] rights were in fact considered and evaluated. The Board concluded, justly so, that the terms of the 1976, 1996 and 1997 Trust Indentures do not contain change of control provisions, that there was not a change of control of Bell Canada contemplated and that, accordingly, the Contesting Debentureholders could not reasonably expect BCE to reject a transaction that maximized shareholder value, on the basis of any negative impact [on] them.

[163] We find no error in these conclusions. The arrangement does not fundamentally alter the debentureholders' rights. The investment and the return contracted for remain intact. Fluctuation in the trading value of debentures with alteration in debt load is a well-known commercial phenomenon. The debentureholders had not contracted against this contingency. The fact that the trading value of ne constituaient pas une catégorie touchée pour l'application de cette disposition. Le juge de première instance était donc fondé à conclure qu'ils ne pouvaient être autorisés à opposer un veto à près de 98 p. 100 des actionnaires simplement parce que la transaction pouvait avoir des répercussions négatives sur la valeur de leurs titres. Même s'il n'en avait pas l'obligation, le juge de première instance avait le droit de tenir compte des intérêts financiers des détenteurs de débentures, comme il l'a fait, pour se prononcer sur le caractère équitable et raisonnable de l'arrangement en vertu de l'art. 192.

[162] Il faut ensuite se demander si le juge de première instance a conclu à tort que l'arrangement répondait de façon équitable et équilibrée aux intérêts des détenteurs de débentures. Le juge a souligné que l'arrangement préservait les droits contractuels des détenteurs de débentures tels que ces derniers les avaient négociés. Il a indiqué que les détenteurs de débentures, s'ils l'avaient désiré, auraient pu négocier des mesures de protection contre l'accroissement de la dette ou les risques de changement dans la structure de la société. Il a ajouté :

the debentures stood to diminish as a result of the arrangement involving new debt was a foreseeable risk, not an exceptional circumstance. It was clear to the judge that the continuance of the corporation required acceptance of an arrangement that would entail increased debt and debt guarantees by Bell Canada: necessity was established. No superior arrangement had been put forward, and BCE had been assisted throughout by expert legal and financial advisors, suggesting that the proposed arrangement had a valid business purpose.

ne se sont pas prémunis contractuellement contre une telle éventualité. La diminution éventuelle de la valeur marchande de leurs titres par suite de l'arrangement prévoyant l'accroissement de l'endettement constituait un risque prévisible, et non des circonstances particulières. Il était clair pour le juge que, pour la continuité de la société, l'approbation d'un arrangement comportant un accroissement de l'endettement et des garanties à la charge de Bell Canada était nécessaire. La nécessité était établie. Aucun arrangement supérieur n'avait été soumis et BCE avait bénéficié, pendant tout le processus, des conseils de spécialistes du droit et de la finance, ce qui donne à croire que l'arrangement poursuivait un objectif commercial légitime.

[164] Based on these considerations, and recognizing that there is no such thing as a perfect arrangement, the trial judge concluded that the arrangement had been shown to be fair and reasonable. We see no error in this conclusion.

[164] En s'appuyant sur ces considérations, et reconnaissant qu'il n'existe pas d'arrangement parfait, le juge de première instance a conclu que le caractère équitable et raisonnable de l'arrangement avait été démontré. Cette conclusion n'est à notre avis entachée d'aucune erreur.

[165] The Court of Appeal's contrary conclusion rested, as suggested above, on an approach that incorporated the s. 241 oppression remedy with its emphasis on reasonable expectations into the s. 192 arrangement approval process. Having found that the debentureholders' reasonable expectations (that their interests would be considered by the Board) were not met, the court went on to combine that finding with the s. 192 onus on the corporation. The result was to combine the substance of the oppression action with the onus of the s. 192 approval process. From this hybrid flowed the conclusion that the corporation had failed to discharge its burden of showing that it could not have met the alleged reasonable expectations of the debentureholders. This result could not have obtained under s. 241, which places the burden of establishing oppression on the claimant. By combining s. 241's substance with the reversed onus of s. 192, the Court of Appeal arrived at a conclusion that could not have been sustained under either provision, read on its own terms.

[165] Comme cela a déjà été précisé, l'opinion contraire de la Cour d'appel procédait d'un raisonnement qui amalgamait la demande de redressement pour abus de l'art. 241, axé sur les attentes raisonnables, et le processus d'approbation d'un arrangement établi à l'art. 192. Après avoir conclu que les attentes raisonnables des détenteurs de débentures (que le Conseil d'administration tienne compte de leurs intérêts) n'avaient pas été satisfaites, la cour a associé cette conclusion au fardeau de preuve imposé à la société par l'art. 192. Elle a ainsi combiné les éléments substantiels de la demande de redressement pour abus au fardeau de la preuve applicable dans le cadre d'une demande d'approbation sous le régime de l'art. 192. De ce croisement a découlé la conclusion que la société ne s'était pas acquittée de son obligation de démontrer qu'il n'était pas possible de répondre aux attentes raisonnables des détenteurs de débentures. L'application de l'art. 241, qui impose au plaignant l'obligation de prouver l'abus, n'aurait pas pu produire un tel résultat. En combinant les éléments substantiels de l'art. 241 au fardeau de preuve inversé prévu à l'art. 192, la Cour d'appel est parvenue à une conclusion qu'aucune de ces dispositions, isolément, n'aurait pu justifier.

VI. Conclusion

[166] We conclude that the debentureholders have failed to establish either oppression under s. 241 of the CBCA or that the trial judge erred in approving the arrangement under s. 192 of the CBCA.

[167] For these reasons, the appeals are allowed, the decision of the Court of Appeal set aside, and the trial judge's approval of the plan of arrangement is affirmed with costs throughout. The cross-appeals are dismissed with costs throughout.

Appeals allowed with costs. Cross-appeals dismissed with costs.

VI. Conclusion

[166] La Cour est d'avis que les détenteurs de débentures n'ont établi ni qu'il y avait eu abus au sens de l'art. 241 de la LCSA ni que le juge de première instance a commis une erreur en approuvant l'arrangement sous le régime de l'art. 192 de la LCSA.

1975 CarswellBC 151
British Columbia Court of Appeal

Bank of Nova Scotia v. Sharp,

1975 CarswellBC 151, [1975] 6 W.W.R. 97, [1975] B.C.J. No. 1148, 57 D.L.R. (3d) 260

Bank of Nova Scotia v. Sharp

Farris C.J.B.C., Bull and Robertson JJ.A.

Judgment: May 30, 1975

Counsel: R. C. Bledsoe, for appellant.
S. J. Shabbits, for respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by Robertson J.A.:

1 On 10th July 1972 the respondent Sharp opened a savings account at the Nanaimo branch of the appellant bank with a deposit of $10,000. Mr. Sharp was entitled to draw cheques on the account. No arrangement was made that, where cheques were credited to the account prior to the receipt of payment, Mr. Sharp would be entitled to draw on them before payment was received. He made two further substantial deposits in September and November 1972 and from time to time he made withdrawals from the account by cheque. On 15th September 1972 Mr. Tait, the manager of the branch, gave Mr. Sharp overdraft privileges up to an amount of $2,500 and by 20th September he had overdrawn. On 17th October 1972 Mr. Sharp endorsed and deposited in his account a cheque for $6,000, drawn in his favour by Mehan Lake Logging Limited ("Mehan") on the Langley branch of the bank. The bank did not give any valuable consideration for the cheque nor did it then do anything else that would make it the beneficial owner of the cheque. While the bank, in its own record of Mr. Sharp's account, showed the amount of the cheque as a credit, it is clear that Mr. Sharp deposited the cheque only for collection. In his evidence in chief Mr. Tait said:

> Q. What would you in the majority of occasions do when a cheque was returned back N.S.F.? A. We would charge it back to the customer's account.
> And Mr. Sharp, in his cross-examination, said:
>
> Q. And what conclusion did you draw in your own mind as to what the situation would be if he couldn't collect the cheque? A. I thought that I would have to collect by process of law from Mr. Sims (Mehan's president) and pay the bank if the bank couldn't collect it themselves.
>
> Q. You never at any time thought that it was the responsibility of the bank to collect that cheque and if they did not — I'm sorry — collect the proceeds — and if they did not collect the proceeds, that was no concern of yours? A. Yes, I thought it was the responsibility of the bank.
> Q. Well, let me put the question differently. Did you at any time think that if the bank failed to do so, that you were free and clear of any responsibility for repaying the bank — that you had no obligation to repay the bank? A. No, I never — that never passed through my mind.

2 The Nanaimo branch of the bank sent the cheque to the Langley branch of the bank but, there being insufficient funds in Mehan's account, the Langley branch returned the cheque to the Nanaimo branch N.S.F. on or about 19th October 1972. Upon receipt of the dishonoured cheque Mr. Tait telephoned the manager of the Langley branch asking information as to the likelihood of the cheque being honoured and, on being given a favourable reply, he sent the cheque to the Langley branch again, this time "on a collection basis", which meant that the Langley branch would hold the cheque against the event that sufficient funds were deposited in the account of the drawer, whereupon the cheque would be paid. Before doing this, Mr. Tait did not inform Mr. Sharp that the cheque had been dishonoured and so, of course, had no authorization from Mr. Sharp to sent the cheque to the Langley branch a second time. Ultimately Mr. Tait informed Mr. Sharp that the cheque had been dishonoured and the learned trial Judge found that this was on or after — perhaps substantially later than — 26th October 1972. The cheque was never honoured and on 23rd November 1972 the Nanaimo branch debited Mr. Sharp's account in the sum of $6,000. The effect of this was to put Mr. Sharp's account into an overdraft position of $2,331.66. As a result of further withdrawals, by 11th January 1973 the overdraft stood at $3,602.40. At some unspecified time before the trial of this action, Mr. Sharp brought against Mehan an action upon the cheque for $6,000.

3 The bank brought this action against Mr. Sharp to recover the sum of $3,602.40 owing on the overdrawn account and interest. Mr. Sharp counterclaimed for $6,000, alleging that the bank had failed to notify him promptly of the dishonour of the cheque, alleging that he thereby suffered damage and alleging that, as a result of the bank's failure to give him notice of dishonour, he was discharged of any liability under the cheque. (Nothing was said about notice of dishonour to Mehan.)

4 In the result the trial Judge both dismissed the bank's claim for $3,602.40 and gave Mr. Sharp judgment against the bank for $6,000; and a formal judgment was entered accordingly. Upon the hearing of the appeal it was conceded by counsel for Mr. Sharp that the dismissal of the bank's claim was a mistake, as it clearly was.

5 The applicable law is in my opinion correctly set out in 2 Hals (3d) in the following passages [pp. 176-78]:

> 334. As agent of customer. Collection, strictly speaking, is the conduct of a banker who acts as a mere agent or conduit pipe to receive payment of the cheque from the banker on whom it is drawn and holds the proceeds at the disposal of his customer.
>
> The character in which a banker receives a cheque is a matter of fact in each case.
>
> As agent for collection he is bound to exercise diligence in the presentation of the cheque for payment. He fulfils his duty if, when the cheque is drawn on a bank in the same place, he presents it the day after receipt, or, when on a bank in another place, he either presents it or forwards it on the day following receipt. The forwarding may be to another branch or to an agent of the bank, who has the same time after receipt in which to present ...
>
> If the banker fails to present the cheque within the allotted time after it reaches him, he is liable to his customer for loss arising from the delay. The endorsers, if any, are discharged, ...
>
> 335. Effect of notice of dishonour. If a cheque is dishonoured on presentment, the collecting banker can debit the customer's account with the amount. He must give due notice of dishonour either to the parties liable on the cheque, or to his customer. The latter is the usual course. Return of the cheque to the customer is deemed sufficient notice of dishonour, if the customer has endorsed it. Branches of the same bank are held to be separate persons for the transmission of notice of dishonour ...
> 336. When proceeds available. Where cheques are collected, the banker has a reasonable time, consistent with ordinary bookkeeping, in which to pass the proceeds to current account before they are available for drawing against. Where cheques are credited as cash prior to receipt of payment, the customer is only entitled to draw on them at once if there is an agreement, express or implied, to that effect. If the cheque is dishonoured, the banker is entitled to debit the customer's account.

6 In Falconbridge on Banking and Bills of Exchange, 7th ed. (1969), this appears at p. 269:

> If a cheque is deposited and presented with due diligence to the drawee bank and dishonoured, the mere fact that the collecting bank has credited the payee with the amount of the cheque is not sufficient proof that the cheque was intended to be discounted, and the entry in the books of the collecting bank may be reversed and the payee of the cheque charged with the amount: Regina v. Bank of Montreal (1886), 1 Exch. C.R. 154.

7 As to proof, at p. 163 in the case cited, Strong J. said

The question of the real relation between the bank and the Crown arising out of this particular transaction, is not a question of law, but one purely of fact ... and as a question of fact, it is not concluded by an entry in the books, — such entry being susceptible of explanation, and being, as I hold, in the present case sufficiently explained by the evidence of ... and by the attendant circumstances, and therefore to be construed in the way already indicated.

8 Merely for the purpose of illustrating how old in Canada is the practice of a customer being credited with the amount of a cheque that he has deposited in his bank account and then later being debited with the same amount after the cheque, presented by the bank for payment, has been dishonoured, I cite Owens v. Quebec Bank (1870), 30 U.C.Q.B. 382 (C.A.), to which the learned Judge referred.

9 Applying the law as I have outlined it, I am of the opinion that the bank, having credited Mr. Sharp's account with $6,000 when he deposited the cheque, was entitled to debit his account with the same amount after the cheque was dishonoured. On the other hand, the bank owed a duty to Mr. Sharp to give him prompt notice of the dishonour of the cheque at its Langley branch on 19th October 1972. Its failure to do so was a breach of its duty and Mr. Sharp is entitled to recover any damages that he can prove resulted from the breach of that duty. At the same time, the breach of duty did not change the relationship between the parties so as to convert the bank from an agent for collection into beneficial owner of the cheque. The only section of the Bills of Exchange Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-5, that may have direct application here is this one:

100. (1) Where a bill when dishonoured is in the hands of an agent he may himself give notice to the parties liable on the bill, or he may give notice to his principal, in which case the principal upon receipt of the notice has the same time for giving notice as if the agent had been an independent holder.

(2) Where the agent gives notice to his principal he must do so within the same time as if he were an independent holder.

10 The learned trial Judge took a different approach. After citing some authorities and referring to ss. 85, 86, 96, 97 and 165 of the Bills of Exchange Act, among which there are included these provisions:

85. (1) Subject to this Act, a bill must be duly presented for payment.

(2) If it is not so presented, the drawer and endorsers are discharged ...

96. (1) Subject to this Act, when a bill has been dishonoured by non-acceptance or by non-payment, notice of dishonour must be given to the drawer, and each endorser, and any drawer or endorser to whom such notice is not given is discharged.

11 The Judge said [[1974] 6 W.W.R. 481 at 487-89, 48 D.L.R. (3d) 382]:

The 'notice of the dishonour' provisions applicable are to be found in ss. 96 to 108 inclusive. I find, as a fact, that no such notice of dishonour as anticipated in those sections was given to the defendant Sharp within the time limited in s. 97(a), hereinbefore reproduced, and accordingly the defendant Sharp is discharged from liability as an endorser of the $6,000 cheque.

By virtue of s. 165(2), ss. 133 to 135 inclusive also have application to the issue I must decide which are reproduced herein in part:

133. The endorser of a bill by endorsing it, subject to the effect of any express stipulation hereinbefore authorized,

(a) engages that on due presentment it shall be accepted and paid according to its tenor, and that if it is dishonoured he will compensate the holder or a subsequent endorser who is compelled to pay it, if the requisite proceedings on dishonour are duly taken;

(b) is precluded from denying to a holder in due course the genuineness and regularity in all respects of the drawer's signature and all previous endorsements; ...

134. Where a bill is dishonoured, the measure of damages, which shall be deemed to be liquidated damages, are

(a) the amount of the bill; ...

135. In case of the dishonour of a bill the holder may recover from any party liable on the bill, the drawer who has been compelled to pay the bill may recover from the acceptor, and an endorser who has been compelled to pay the bill may recover from the acceptor or from the drawer, or from a prior endorser, the damages aforesaid. (The italics are mine.)

I find as a fact that the defendant Sharp endorsed the cheque on the reverse side in the appropriate place (see Ex. 4). In my opinion, it does not matter whether on or shortly after 19th October 1972 the plaintiff changed its status from a mere holder (i.e., an agent for collection) to a holder in due course because the reference in s. 133(a) is to a holder as distinguished from a holder in due course as referred to in s. 133(b).

Neither counsel relied or alluded to ss. 133 to 135 inclusive in their arguments, however, it is my view that pursuant to s. 133(a) the defendant Sharp would only become liable to compensate the holder, i.e., the plaintiff bank if 'requisite proceedings on dishonour' had been properly taken. If I am wrong in that conclusion, the law merchant should govern. Section 10 of the Act reads as follows:

10. The rules of the common law of England, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act, apply to bills of exchange, promissory notes and cheques.

12 (I interject here that the learned Judge did not refer to the aspects of the common law to which I have referred earlier.)

It is my considered opinion that the plaintiff bank was negligent on or about 19th October 1972 in failing to promptly notify the defendant Sharp of the dishonour of the $6,000 cheque. Accordingly, I find that the plaintiff was not entitled to reverse the $6,000 credited to the defendant Sharp's account as they purported to do on 23rd November 1972. The damages suffered by the defendant are in the amount of $6,000 and the plaintiff is, of course, entitled to continued possession of the original $6,000 cheque to take such steps, as it may be advised, against the drawer Mehan Lake Log Ltd.

13 In my respectful opinion the learned Judge went wrong in treating the bank's assertion of a right to reverse the credit in its accounts upon the basis that it was asserting the rights under ss. 133 and 134 above of the holder of the bill against an endorser thereof. This was not the basis of the bank's claim to reverse the credit. Its claim arose from the common law and its position as collection agent. When s. 85(2) says that, if a bill is not duly presented, the endorsers are discharged, it speaks of them being discharged in their capacity as endorsers, and not otherwise. When s. 96(1) says that "any ... endorser to whom such notice is not given is discharged" it means that he is discharged qua endorser. Paragraph (a) of s. 133 says what the endorser of a bill "engages" "by endorsing it", if the requisite proceedings on dishonour are duly taken, and it does not extend to engagements that flow from some source other than the endorsement of the bill. Section 134 has to do with the measure of damages against a person who is liable in damages because of the dishonour of a bill on which he is liable, and it does not apply to the damages payable by an agent for collection to his principal because the agent has failed to give due notice of dishonour to the principal.

14 As I have said, Mr. Sharp is entitled to recover such damages as he can prove resulted from the bank's breach of duty; but that is all he can recover. On the trial, as part of its case, counsel for the bank put in these portions of the examination of Mr. Sharp for discovery:

Q. 247. Now, in the next paragraph, paragraph 3, of your counter-claim, you allege and I am talking about half way down — that by reason of the failure of the bank to notify you that the cheque was not honoured by Mehan Lake Log that you have suffered damage. Now, can you tell me what is the damage that you consider you have suffered as a consequence of this failure on the part of the bank? In what way have you suffered? A. Yes. I had my bank account closed off. I had the embarrassment of going around redeeming cheques. I felt hurt by the bank's action — their negligence in informing me.

Q. 248. Are you out of pocket in any way due to this failure and if so, how? A. Well, I am out of pocket because they mishandled the cheque. They mishandled the whole affair.

Q. 249. You say that by his late notifying you of the fact that this cheque was N.S.F. that you are out of pocket and can you explain to me in what way you are out of pocket and how much? What have you lost as a result? A. Well, I think that my greatest or — I should say I think my loss is in being hurt by the bank.

Q. 250. Would you agree with me that you are not out of pocket? You have not lost any money which you might otherwise have had? A. It's hard to say.

Q. 251. Well, you are the one who is saying it in your counter-claim and I am entitled to understand your counter-claim. Would you explain to me if you can how you have lost $6,000? A. Well —

Q. 252. Which is what you are claiming? A. Yes. I've lost $6,000 because they were negligent in honouring that cheque.

15 At the trial only Mr. Sharp gave evidence on his behalf and he said nothing about any damage that he had suffered. The damages must then be assessed solely on the evidence afforded by his examination for discovery put in by the bank. Upon this evidence I think that no more than nominal damages can be awarded, and I would assess them at $100.

16 In the result I would allow the appeal, give the bank judgment for $3,602.40 with interest at 12 per cent per annum, and reduce the damages awarded Mr. Sharp on his counterclaim from $6,000 to $100. The $100 should be set off against the amount for which the bank is given judgment. The bank is entitled to the costs of the action and Mr. Sharp to the costs of the counter-claim, and the bank is entitled to the costs of the appeal.

The Government of Canada and the United Church of Canada operated an Indian residential school in British Columbia in the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s. Aboriginal children were taken from their families pursuant to the Indian Act and sent to the school. They were disciplined by corporal punishment. Some, like the appellant B, were repeatedly and brutally sexually assaulted. Four actions were commenced in 1996 by former residents of the school claiming damages for sexual abuse and other harm. The trial judge found that all claims other than those of a sexual nature were statute-barred. P, a dormitory supervisor, was held liable for sexual assault. Canada was held liable for the assaults on the basis of breach of non-delegable statutory duty, and also because Canada and the Church were jointly and vicariously liable for these wrongs. Fault was apportioned 75 percent to Canada and 25 percent to the Church. The trial judge awarded $125,000 general damages and $20,000 aggravated damages to B against the Church and Canada. A further $40,000 punitive damages, plus a future counselling fee of $5,000, was awarded to B against P. Other plaintiffs were awarded amounts commensurate with their situations. The Court of Appeal applied a doctrine of charitable immunity to exempt the Church from liability and placed all liability on Canada on the basis of vicarious liability, awarding B an additional $20,000 for loss of future earning opportunity. Otherwise, it maintained the differing awards for sexual abuse.

Held: B's appeal is dismissed. Canada's appeal is allowed in part. The judgment of the trial judge on the issues of joint vicarious liability against the Church and Canada, and assessment and apportionment of damages, is restored. The judgment of the Court of Appeal on the issue of charitable immunity is set aside. The Court of Appeal's award for loss of future earning opportunity is upheld.

The Church exerted sufficient control over the operations at the residential school that gave rise to the wrong to be found vicariously liable with Canada for the wrongful acts of P. The trial judge's factual findings clearly support a conclusion that the Church was one of P's employers in every sense of the word. None of the considerations relied on by the Court of Appeal —

Dans les années 40, 50 et 60, en Colombie-Britannique, le gouvernement du Canada et l'Église unie du Canada ont géré un pensionnat pour enfants indiens. Des enfants autochtones ont été retirés à leurs familles suivant la Loi sur les Indiens et envoyés au pensionnat. On leur a infligé des châtiments corporels pour les corriger. Certains, dont l'appelant B, ont subi à maintes reprises des agressions sexuelles brutales. En 1996, quatre actions ont été intentées par d'anciens pensionnaires en vue d'obtenir des dommages-intérêts pour le préjudice causé par des agressions sexuelles et d'autres actes de nature délictuelle. Le juge de première instance a statué que tous les recours étaient prescrits, sauf celui pour agression sexuelle. Un surveillant de dortoir, P, a été tenu responsable pour les agressions sexuelles. Le gouvernement du Canada a été tenu responsable de ces agressions à cause de son manquement à une obligation légale intransmissible, mais aussi parce que l'Église et lui étaient solidairement responsables du fait d'autrui à cet égard. La faute a été répartie à raison de 75 p. 100 au gouvernement du Canada et de 25 p. 100 à l'Église. Le juge de première instance les a condamnés à verser à B des dommages-intérêts généraux de 125 000 $ et des dommages-intérêts majorés de 20 000 $. P a en outre été condamné à lui verser des dommages-intérêts exemplaires de 40 000 $, plus 5 000 $ pour les frais de consultation futurs. D'autres demandeurs ont obtenu des montants proportionnés à leurs situations. La Cour d'appel a interprété la doctrine de l'exonération des organismes de bienfaisance de manière à écarter la responsabilité de l'Église et à attribuer l'entière responsabilité du fait d'autrui au gouvernement du Canada, accordant à B 20 000 $ supplémentaires pour la perte de capacité de gain ultérieure. Pour le reste, elle a confirmé les différents montants octroyés pour agression sexuelle.

Arrêt : Le pourvoi de B est rejeté. Le pourvoi du gouvernement du Canada est accueilli en partie. Le jugement de première instance est rétabli en ce qui concerne la responsabilité solidaire du fait d'autrui de l'Église et du gouvernement du Canada, ainsi que la détermination et la répartition des dommages-intérêts. Le jugement de la Cour d'appel est annulé quant à l'exonération à titre d'organisme de bienfaisance. Sa décision d'accorder une indemnité pour la perte de capacité de gain ultérieure est confirmée.

Canada's degree of control over the residential school, the Church's specific mandate of promoting Christian education, and the difficulty of holding two defendants vicariously liable for the same wrong — negate the imposition of vicarious liability on the Church. Similarly, the Court of Appeal erred in exempting the Church from liability on the ground of charitable immunity. A class-based exemption from vicarious liability finds support neither in principle nor in the jurisprudence. Exempting non-profit organizations when government is present would not motivate such organizations to take precautions to screen their employees and protect children from sexual abuse. The presence of the government does not guarantee the safety of children, particularly where, as in this case, the non-profit organization has day-to-day management of the institution. [19] [22] [31-32] [41] [44]

The trial judge erred in finding a non-delegable statutory duty to ensure the safety and welfare of the students at the school in the text of ss. 113 and 114 of the 1951 Indian Act. First, the language of the provisions uses the permissive term "may", as opposed to the directive term "shall", limiting the possibility of finding an obligation as strong as a duty. Second, the power of the government to enter into agreements with religious organizations for the care and education of Indian children suggests that the duty is eminently delegable and was contracted out of by the government. Arguments based on general obligations outside the strict language of the statute and the residential school setting, such as Parliament's control over definition and registration of Indians and jurisdiction over reserves, are not persuasive. They risk encroaching on other grounds of liability such as breach of fiduciary duty and negligence. Unless a non-delegable statutory duty is based on the language of the statute, the boundaries between the various grounds of liability become meaningless. [50-51] [98]

No basis has been established for finding negligence, breach of fiduciary duty, or for reassessing the damage awards. The trial judge correctly apportioned the damages unequally between Canada and the Church. Parties may be more or less vicariously liable for a wrong depending on their level of supervision and direct contact. Here, the trial judge found that Canada was in a better position than the Church to supervise the situation and prevent the loss. That finding, which was grounded in the evidence, should not be interfered

Aucune des considérations sur lesquelles s'est fondée la Cour d'appel — le degré de pouvoir du gouvernement du Canada sur le pensionnat, la mission de l'Église de promouvoir l'instruction chrétienne et la difficulté de tenir deux défendeurs responsables du fait d'autrui pour une seule et même faute — ne fait obstacle à la responsabilité du fait d'autrui de l'Église. De même, la Cour d'appel a eu tort d'écarter la responsabilité du fait d'autrui de l'Église au motif qu'il s'agissait d'un organisme de bienfaisance. Aucun principe ou arrêt de jurisprudence ne justifie cette exonération fondée sur la nature de l'organisme. Exonérer un organisme sans but lucratif lorsque l'État est partie prenante ne l'inciterait pas à recruter du personnel sûr et à protéger les enfants contre les agressions sexuelles. La participation de l'État ne garantit pas la sécurité des enfants, surtout lorsqu'il incombe à l'organisme sans but lucratif de veiller à l'administration quotidienne de l'établissement, comme c'était le cas en l'espèce. [19] [22] [31-32] [41] [44]

Le juge de première instance a eu tort de dégager des art. 113 et 114 de la Loi sur les Indiens de 1951 l'obligation intransmissible d'assurer la sécurité et le bien-être des élèves au pensionnat. Premièrement, le libellé de ces dispositions emploie le verbe « pouvoir », qui confère une faculté, plutôt que le verbe « devoir », qui impose une obligation, limitant ainsi la possibilité d'y voir une véritable obligation. Deuxièmement, le pouvoir de l'État de contracter avec des organisations religieuses pour le soin et l'éducation des enfants indiens donne à penser que l'obligation est tout à fait transmissible et qu'elle a été sous-traitée par l'État. Un argument fondé sur une obligation générale étrangère au strict libellé de la loi et au fonctionnement du pensionnat, comme le pouvoir accordé par le législateur relativement à la définition d'« Indien » et à l'enregistrement à ce titre, et la compétence sur les réserves, n'est pas convaincant. Il risque d'empiéter sur d'autres motifs de responsabilité, tels le manquement à l'obligation fiduciaire et la négligence. La frontière entre les différents chefs de responsabilité n'a de sens que si l'obligation intransmissible découle du libellé de la loi. [50-51] [98]

Aucun élément n'a été avancé pour justifier une conclusion de négligence ou de manquement à une obligation fiduciaire ou la modification du montant des dommages-intérêts. Le juge de première instance a eu raison de répartir les dommages-intérêts inégalement entre le gouvernement du Canada et l'Église. La responsabilité d'une partie pour l'acte fautif d'un tiers dépend de la surveillance plus ou moins grande qu'elle a exercée sur ce tiers et du lien plus ou moins direct qu'elle a entretenu avec lui. En l'espèce, le juge de première with. Since the basis for assigning greater responsibility to Canada was its greater control over the school operations, the assessment is not affected by the finding that there was no non-delegable duty under the Indian Act. Lastly, the trial judge did not err in not considering the traumas suffered by B in his home before coming to the residential school and the statute-barred wrongs at the school in assessing damages. First, in the absence of evidence that B's family difficulties prior to coming to the school had exacerbated the damage B suffered from the sexual assaults he sustained at the school, the trial judge had no choice but to attempt to isolate those traumas and to confine damages to only those arising from the actionable torts, the sexual assaults. Second, to permit damages to be awarded for wrongful acts that are subject to limitation periods that have expired would subvert the legislation and compensate for torts that have been alleged but not proven. It would be to override legislative intent, and fix liability in the absence of legal proof. [70-72] [75] [82] [85] [87] [98] instance a estimé que le gouvernement du Canada était plus en mesure que l'Église de surveiller la situation et de prévenir la perte. Cette conclusion fondée sur la preuve ne devrait pas être modifiée. Étant donné que le gouvernement du Canada s'est vu imputer une plus grande responsabilité parce qu'il avait exercé un plus grand pouvoir sur le fonctionnement du pensionnat, l'inexistence d'une obligation intransmissible découlant de la Loi sur les Indiens ne change rien. Enfin, le juge de première instance a eu raison de ne pas tenir compte, pour la fixation des dommages-intérêts, des traumatismes que B avait subis chez lui auparavant ni de ceux découlant de délits prescrits commis au pensionnat. Premièrement, vu l'absence de preuve que les problèmes familiaux antérieurs de B avaient exacerbé le préjudice découlant des agressions sexuelles subies au pensionnat, le juge de première instance n'a eu d'autre choix que de tenter d'isoler ces traumatismes et de n'accorder des dommages-intérêts que pour le préjudice causé par les délits conférant un droit d'action, les agressions sexuelles. Deuxièmement, permettre le dédommagement pour d'autres actes fautifs frappés de prescription priverait la loi de sa raison d'être et permettrait l'indemnisation à l'égard de délits allégués mais non prouvés. L'intention du législateur serait bafouée, et la responsabilité serait imputée en l'absence d'éléments de preuve légaux. [70-72] [75] [82] [85] [87] [98]

THE CHIEF JUSTICE —

1. Introduction

Are the Government of Canada and the United Church of Canada ("Church") liable to Aboriginal students who attended residential schools operated by them in British Columbia in the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s? If so, on what legal basis are they liable, and how should liability be apportioned between them? Finally, what damages should be awarded? These are the central questions on this appeal.

The appeal arises from four actions commenced in 1996 by 27 former residents of the Alberni Indian Residential School ("AIRS") claiming damages for sexual abuse and other harm. The children had been taken from their families pursuant to the Indian Act, S.C. 1951, c. 29, and sent to the school, which had been established by the Church's predecessor, the Presbyterian Church of Canada, in 1891 to provide elementary and high school education to Aboriginal children whose families resided in remote locations on the west coast of Vancouver Island. The children were cut off from their families and culture and made to speak English. They were disciplined by corporal punishment. Some, like the appellant Mr. Barney, were repeatedly and brutally sexually assaulted.

A number of former students, including Mr. Barney, brought an action for damages for the wrongs they had suffered. The trial proceeded in two stages; an inquiry into vicarious liability ((1998), 52 B.C.L.R. (3d) 18 ("1998 decision")) followed by a further liability and damages assessment three years later ((2001), 93 B.C.L.R. (3d) 228, 2001 BCSC 997 ("2001 decision")).

LA JUGE EN CHEF —

1. Introduction

1 Le gouvernement du Canada et l'Église unie du Canada (« Église ») ont-ils une responsabilité à l'égard des élèves autochtones qui ont fréquenté leurs pensionnats en Colombie-Britannique dans les années 40, 50 et 60? Dans l'affirmative, quel en est le fondement juridique et comment doit-elle être répartie entre eux? Enfin, quel montant y a-t-il lieu d'accorder à titre de dommages-intérêts? Telles sont les principales questions que notre Cour est appelée à trancher en l'espèce.

2 Le présent pourvoi découle de quatre actions en dommages-intérêts intentées en 1996 par 27 anciens pensionnaires de l'Alberni Indian Residential School (« Pensionnat ») relativement à des agressions sexuelles et à d'autres actes de nature délictuelle. Enfants, ils ont été retirés à leurs familles suivant la Loi sur les Indiens, S.C. 1951, ch. 29, puis envoyés au pensionnat créé en 1891 par l'Église presbytérienne du Canada, à laquelle a succédé l'Église, afin de dispenser un enseignement primaire et secondaire aux enfants autochtones habitant des endroits reculés sur la côte ouest de l'île de Vancouver. Les enfants ont perdu tout contact avec leurs familles et leur culture et ont été amenés à s'exprimer en anglais. On leur a infligé des châtiments corporels pour les corriger. Certains, dont l'appelant M. Barney, ont subi à maintes reprises des agressions sexuelles brutales.

3 Un certain nombre d'anciens pensionnaires, dont M. Barney, ont intenté une action en dommages-intérêts pour les préjudices subis. Le procès s'est déroulé en deux étapes : tout d'abord, l'examen de la responsabilité du fait d'autrui ((1998), 52 B.C.L.R. (3d) 18 (« décision de 1998)), puis, trois ans plus tard, le règlement d'autres questions relatives à la responsabilité, suivi de la détermination du montant des dommages-intérêts ((2001) 93 B.C.L.R. (3d) 228, 2001 BCSC 997 (« décision de 2001)).

4 The trial judge found that all claims other than those of a sexual nature were statute-barred. He held a dormitory supervisor, Plint, liable to six plaintiffs for sexual assault. He held Canada liable for the assaults on the basis of breach of non-delegable statutory duty, and also found that Canada and the Church were jointly and vicariously liable for these wrongs. He apportioned fault 75 percent to Canada and 25 percent to the Church. The trial judge awarded Mr. Barney $125,000 general damages and $20,000 aggravated damages, against the Church and Canada. In addition, the trial judge awarded Mr. Barney punitive damages against Plint in the sum of $40,000 plus a future counselling fee of $5,000. Other plaintiffs were awarded amounts commensurate with their situations.

Le juge de première instance a statué que tous les recours étaient prescrits, sauf celui pour agression sexuelle. Il a tenu le surveillant de dortoir, M. Plint, responsable pour l'agression sexuelle de six demandeurs. Il en a également tenu responsable le gouvernement du Canada à cause du manquement à une obligation légale intransmissible. Il a conclu que le gouvernement du Canada et l'Église étaient solidairement responsables du fait d'autrui à cet égard. Il a fixé à 75 p. 100 la part de responsabilité du gouvernement du Canada et à 25 p. 100 celle de l'Église. Il les a condamnés à verser à M. Barney des dommages-intérêts généraux de 125 000 $ et des dommages-intérêts majorés de 20 000 $. M. Plint devait en outre verser à M. Barney des dommages-intérêts exemplaires se montant à 40 000 $, plus 5 000 $ pour les frais de consultation futurs. D'autres demandeurs ont obtenu des montants proportionnés à leurs situations.

5 All the parties appealed to the B.C. Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal applied a doctrine of charitable immunity to exempt the Church from liability and to place all liability on Canada on the basis of vicarious liability ((2003), 21 B.C.L.R. (4th) 1, 2003 BCCA 671). It expressed the view that Canada was more responsible than the Church and in a better position to compensate for the damage, and concluded that vicarious liability should not be imposed on the Church. It also granted one of the plaintiffs, M.J., a new trial, and increased the damages of two others. The Court of Appeal awarded Mr. Barney an additional $20,000 for loss of future earning opportunity. Otherwise, it maintained the differing awards for sexual abuse.

Toutes les parties ont interjeté appel du jugement. La Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a interprété la règle de l'exonération des organismes de bienfaisance de manière à écarter la responsabilité de l'Église et à attribuer l'entière responsabilité du fait d'autrui au gouvernement du Canada ((2003), 21 B.C.L.R. (4th) 1, 2003 BCCA 671). Elle a estimé que le gouvernement du Canada avait une plus grande part de responsabilité que l'Église et qu'il était plus à même d'indemniser les victimes. Elle a aussi conclu que l'Église ne devait pas être tenue solidairement responsable du fait d'autrui. Elle a également ordonné un nouveau procès dans le cas d'un demandeur, M.J., et augmenté le montant des dommages-intérêts octroyés à deux autres. Elle a accordé à M. Barney 20 000 $ supplémentaires pour la perte de capacité de gain ultérieure. Pour le reste, elle a confirmé les différents montants octroyés pour l'agression sexuelle.

6 The plaintiff Mr. Barney and the defendant Canada now appeal to this Court. Mr. Barney alleges errors in the application of the principles of liability and the assessment of damages. More particularly, he raises the following issues:

Le demandeur Barney et le défendeur le gouvernement du Canada interjettent aujourd'hui appel devant notre Cour. M. Barney allègue que des erreurs entachent l'application des principes de responsabilité et la détermination des dommages-intérêts. Il soulève plus particulièrement les questions suivantes :

1. Did the courts below err in the application of the principles regarding liability for, and assessment of, damages in the circumstances of sexual abuse of Mr. Barney where the defendants who are liable for the sexual abuse are also responsible for other tortious, but time-barred, acts?

2. Did the courts below err in finding no breach of fiduciary duty by the defendants?

3. Did the courts below err in their application of the test for negligence and in finding that the defendants were not negligent?

4. Did the courts below err in the calculation of general and aggravated damages?

5. Did the courts below err in not awarding punitive damages against Canada?

6. Did the Court of Appeal err in awarding the appellant only a nominal award for loss of future earning opportunity?

Canada raises the following issues relating to liability and fault:

1. Whether in the circumstances of this case the Court of Appeal erred in granting the Church charitable immunity from vicarious liability;

2. Whether the trial judge erred in finding Canada owed and breached a non-delegable duty arising from the Indian Act such that Canada is liable for the abuse the plaintiffs suffered at the AIRS; and

3. Whether the trial judge erred in apportioning fault between Canada and the Church on

1. Les tribunaux inférieurs ont-ils commis une erreur dans l'application des principes de responsabilité aux agressions sexuelles dont il a été victime et dans l'évaluation du préjudice, dans la mesure où les défendeurs étaient responsables non seulement des agressions sexuelles, mais également d'autres actes délictuels pour lesquels tout recours était prescrit?

2. Ont-ils eu tort de ne pas conclure au manquement des défendeurs à une obligation fiduciaire?

3. Ont-ils mal appliqué le critère de la négligence et ont-ils eu tort de conclure que les défendeurs n'avaient pas été négligents?

4. Ont-ils commis une erreur dans le calcul des dommages-intérêts généraux et majorés?

5. Ont-ils eu tort de ne pas condamner le gouvernement du Canada à des dommages-intérêts exemplaires?

6. La Cour d'appel a-t-elle eu tort de n'accorder à l'appelant que des dommages-intérêts modestes pour la perte de capacité de gain ultérieure?

Le gouvernement du Canada soulève les questions suivantes sur le plan de la responsabilité et de la faute :

1. Vu les circonstances de l'espèce, la Cour d'appel a-t-elle eu tort d'exonérer l'Église de la responsabilité du fait d'autrui au motif qu'elle était un organisme de bienfaisance?

2. Le juge de première instance a-t-il eu tort de conclure à l'existence d'une obligation intransmissible incombant au gouvernement du Canada et découlant de la Loi sur les Indiens et au manquement à cette obligation, et de tenir le gouvernement responsable des sévices dont les demandeurs avaient été victimes au Pensionnat?

3. Le juge de première instance a-t-il eu tort de ne pas imputer la faute à parts égales au anything but an equal basis in circumstances where both defendants were liable solely on no-fault legal principles.

8 The two appeals, considered together, raise the following legal issues, which I propose to deal with in order:

1. Negligence
2. Vicarious liability
3. The doctrine of charitable immunity
4. Non-delegable statutory duty
5. Fiduciary duty
6. Apportionment of damages
7. Damages: the effect of prior harm
8. General and aggravated damages: quantum
9. Punitive damages
10. Loss of future opportunity

9 A more general issue lurks beneath the surface of a number of the specific legal issues. It concerns how claims such as this, which reach back many years, should be proved, and the role of historic and social science evidence in proving issues of liability and damages. For example, to what extent is evidence of generalized policies toward Aboriginal children relevant? Can such evidence lighten the burden of proving specific fault and damage in individual cases? I conclude that general policies and practices may provide relevant context for assessing claims for damages in cases such as this. However, government policy by itself does not create a legally actionable wrong. For that, the law requires specific wrongful acts causally connected to damage suffered. This appeal must be decided on the evidence gouvernement du Canada et à l'Église dans la mesure où les deux défendeurs ont été tenus responsables sur le seul fondement de principes de responsabilité sans égard à la faute?

J'aborderai dans l'ordre suivant les questions de droit que les appels soulèvent tous deux :

1. Négligence
2. Responsabilité du fait d'autrui
3. Doctrine de l'exonération des organismes de bienfaisance
4. Obligation légale intransmissible
5. Obligation fiduciaire
6. Répartition des dommages-intérêts
7. Dommages-intérêts : incidence de traumatismes antérieurs
8. Dommages-intérêts généraux et majorés : montants
9. Dommages-intérêts exemplaires
10. Perte de capacité de gain ultérieure

Une question plus générale se profile derrière certaines de ces questions : dans une affaire comme celle considérée en l'espèce, où les faits remontent à de nombreuses années, quelle preuve doit être présentée relativement à la responsabilité et au préjudice et quel est à cet égard le rôle des éléments de preuve relevant de l'histoire et des sciences sociales. Par exemple, dans quelle mesure la preuve de pratiques généralisées à l'endroit des enfants autochtones est-elle pertinente? Peut-elle atténuer l'obligation de prouver la faute et le préjudice dans un cas donné? Je conclus que les politiques et les pratiques générales peuvent constituer des éléments de contexte pertinents pour statuer sur une action en dommages-intérêts comme celle à l'origine du présent pourvoi. Cependant, l'existence d'une politique gouvernementale ne crée pas en soi une faute conférant un droit d'action. Un adduced at trial and considered by the Court of Appeal.

In the result, I conclude that the Court of Appeal erred in finding that the Church was protected by the doctrine of charitable immunity, and that the trial judge erred in finding a non-delegable statutory duty on Canada on the terms of the Indian Act. I would not interfere with the trial judge's conclusions on negligence, vicarious liability, breach of fiduciary duty or the assessment of damages.

2. Analysis

2.1 Negligence

Mr. Barney argues that the trial judge erred in dismissing the claims that the Church and Canada were negligent in employing and continuing to employ various employees when they knew or ought to have known that the employees were pedophiles, in failing to take reasonable steps to prevent or stop physical and sexual assaults, in failing to investigate abuse after it was reported by the students, and in failing to exercise reasonable supervision and direction over their employees.

The trial judge carefully considered the law and the evidence on the issue of negligence. He found that both Canada and the Church were sufficiently proximate to the claimants to give rise to a duty of care to them. He rejected the argument that Canada was exempt from negligence on the basis that its decisions arose from policy decisions: "Here Canada is being taken to task for not only its policy of having Indian residential schools such as AIRS, but also the steps that it took or failed to take to execute that policy" (2001 decision, at para. 79).

lien de causalité doit être établi entre l'acte fautif et le préjudice. Le présent pourvoi doit être réglé au vu de la preuve offerte au procès et soupesée par la Cour d'appel.

10 À mon sens, la Cour d'appel a eu tort de conclure que l'Église était exonérée en tant qu'organisme de bienfaisance et le juge de première instance a conclu à tort que la Loi sur les Indiens imposait une obligation intransmissible au gouvernement du Canada. J'estime qu'il n'y a pas lieu de modifier les conclusions du juge de première instance en ce qui concerne la négligence, la responsabilité du fait d'autrui, le manquement à l'obligation fiduciaire ou la détermination des dommages-intérêts.

2. Analyse

2.1 Négligence

11 M. Barney soutient que le juge de première instance a eu tort de rejeter les allégations selon lesquelles l'Église et le gouvernement du Canada avaient fait preuve de négligence en employant puis en gardant à leur service des personnes dont ils savaient ou auraient dû savoir qu'elles étaient pédophiles, en omettant de prendre des mesures raisonnables pour empêcher ou faire cesser les agressions physiques et sexuelles, en omettant de faire enquête sur les agressions une fois que les élèves les eurent dénoncées et en omettant de surveiller et d'encadrer convenablement leurs employés.

12 Le juge de première instance a examiné attentivement le droit et les éléments de preuve relatifs à la négligence. Il a estimé que le gouvernement du Canada et l'Église entretenaient tous deux des liens suffisamment étroits avec les demandeurs pour avoir envers eux une obligation de diligence. Il a rejeté la prétention selon laquelle le gouvernement du Canada n'avait pas fait preuve de négligence puisqu'il avait pris ses décisions sur le fondement de politiques générales : [TRADUCTION] « En l'occurrence, le gouvernement du Canada se voit reprocher non seulement sa politique de mise sur pied de pensionnats indiens, comme celui d'Alberni, mais également les mesures qu'il a prises ou qu'il a omis de prendre pour mettre cette politique en œuvre » (décision de 2001, par. 79).

13 Having concluded that both the Church and Canada owed a duty of care to the claimants, the trial judge examined the applicable standard of care to define the extent of that duty. The question was what Canada and the Church knew or ought to have known, judged by the standards applicable at the time of the acts — the 1940s to the 1960s. In other words, was the risk of sexual assault of the children reasonably foreseeable at the time?

Après avoir conclu que l'Église et le gouvernement du Canada avaient tous deux une obligation de diligence envers les demandeurs, le juge de première instance a déterminé l'étendue de cette obligation au regard de la norme de diligence applicable. La question était la suivante : qu'est-ce que le gouvernement du Canada et l'Église savaient ou auraient dû savoir, compte tenu de l'époque où se sont produits les actes — les années 40 à 60? Autrement dit, le risque que les enfants soient agressés sexuellement était-il alors raisonnablement prévisible?

14 The trial judge concluded that the harm was not foreseeable on the evidence before him. There was no evidence that the possibility of sexual assault was actually brought to the attention of the people in charge of AIRS. The trial judge found that the children had not been very clear in reporting the abuse and the adults to whom they reported did not realize the children were talking about sexual abuse, an almost unthinkable idea at the time. Former employees at AIRS testified that they were ignorant of any systemic or widespread abuse at the school and the doctor who cared for the children there never suspected abuse. On the two occasions that a sexual abuse was brought to the supervisor's attention, the perpetrator was immediately fired.

Au vu de la preuve, le juge de première instance s'est dit d'avis que le préjudice n'était pas prévisible. Aucun élément n'établissait que les responsables du Pensionnat avaient effectivement été mis au courant de la possibilité d'agressions sexuelles. Selon lui, les enfants n'avaient pas signalé les agressions très clairement, et les adultes auxquels ils s'étaient adressés n'avaient pas saisi qu'il s'agissait d'agressions sexuelles, une éventualité alors presque impensable. D'anciens employés du Pensionnat ont témoigné avoir ignoré l'existence d'agressions systématiques ou généralisées dans l'établissement, et le médecin qui s'occupait des enfants n'a jamais soupçonné qu'ils étaient maltraités. Les deux fois où il avait été informé d'une agression sexuelle, le surveillant avait congédié l'agresseur sur-le-champ.

15 Nor, given the standards and awareness of the time, could it be contended that they ought to have known of the risks; as the trial judge stated, ". . . when the evidence is examined closely, one is drawn to the conclusion that the unspeakable acts which were perpetrated on these young children were just that: at that time they were for the most part not spoken of" (2001 decision, at para. 135). By contemporary standards, the measures taken were clearly inadequate and the environment unsafe. But by the standards of the time, constructive knowledge of a foreseeable risk of sexual assault to the children was not established. As a result, the trial judge dismissed the claims of negligence against the Church and Canada.

Selon les normes de l'époque et la sensibilisation qui existait alors, l'on ne peut non plus affirmer qu'ils auraient dû connaître le risque. Le juge de première instance a dit : [TRADUCTION] « examinée de plus près, la preuve porte à conclure que les actes innommables dont ces jeunes enfants ont été victimes ne pouvaient tout simplement pas être nommés : à l'époque, le plus souvent, on n'en parlait pas » (décision de 2001, par. 135). Pour mes contemporains, les mesures prises étaient nettement insuffisantes et le milieu de vie, peu sûr. Toutefois, suivant les normes de l'époque, la connaissance présumée d'un risque prévisible que les enfants soient sexuellement agressés n'a pas été établie. Le juge de première instance a donc rejeté les allégations de négligence formulées contre l'Église et le gouvernement du Canada.

Mr. Barney does not point to specific errors in the trial judge's application of the test and conclusion on standard of care. Instead he focuses on the trial judge's factual findings. In particular, he argues that the Church and Canada should have investigated why so many children were running away from AIRS and clarified the complaints of the children. This goes to the actual and constructive knowledge of the defendants, and more particularly, what steps they should have taken if they had had knowledge of sexual abuse. The trial judge addressed these matters thoroughly and sensitively in his reasons, and the Court of Appeal correctly concluded that no error in his conclusions on negligence had been demonstrated.

Mr. Barney's appeal on this point must be dismissed.

2.2 Vicarious Liability

The trial judge accepted that the Church and Canada were vicariously liable for the wrongful acts of the dormitory supervisor, Plint. The Court of Appeal disagreed. While it upheld the trial judge's finding that Canada was vicariously liable because of its control over the principal and activities at AIRS, the court held that the Church's non-profit status exempted it from any liability.

I conclude that the trial judge was correct in concluding that both the Church and Canada are vicariously liable for the wrongful acts of Plint.

Vicarious liability may be imposed where there is a significant connection between the conduct authorized by the employer or controlling agent and the wrong. Having created or enhanced the risk of the wrongful conduct, it is appropriate that the employer or operator of the enterprise be held responsible, even though the wrongful act may be contrary to its desires: Bazley v. Curry, [1999] 2 S.C.R. 534. The fact that wrongful acts may occur is a cost of business. The imposition of vicarious liability in such circumstances serves the policy

16 M. Barney ne relève aucune erreur particulière dans l'application du critère et la conclusion sur la norme de diligence. Il s'en prend plutôt aux conclusions de fait du juge de première instance. Plus précisément, il fait valoir que l'Église et le gouvernement du Canada auraient dû chercher à savoir pourquoi tant d'enfants s'enfuyaient du Pensionnat et faire la lumière sur les plaintes des enfants. Cette prétention touche à la connaissance réelle et présumée des défendeurs et, surtout, aux mesures qu'ils auraient dû prendre s'ils avaient eu connaissance des agressions sexuelles. Dans ses motifs, le juge de première instance a abordé ces questions avec minutie et doigté, et la Cour d'appel a conclu à juste titre qu'aucune erreur n'entachait ses conclusions sur la négligence.

2.2 Responsabilité du fait d'autrui

18 Le juge de première instance a reconnu la responsabilité de l'Église et du gouvernement du Canada pour les actes fautifs du surveillant de dortoir, M. Plint. La Cour d'appel n'a pas partagé son avis. Elle a confirmé que le gouvernement du Canada était responsable du fait d'autrui à cause de son pouvoir sur le directeur et les activités du Pensionnat, mais elle a conclu que la qualité d'organisme de bienfaisance exonérait l'Église de toute responsabilité.

19 J'estime que le juge de première instance a eu raison de conclure à la responsabilité du fait d'autrui de l'Église et du gouvernement du Canada pour les actes fautifs de M. Plint.

20 La responsabilité du fait d'autrui peut être imputée dès lors qu'il existe un lien important entre la conduite autorisée par l'employeur, ou le surveillant, et la faute. L'employeur ou le dirigeant de l'entreprise qui a créé ou accru le risque de comportement fautif doit être tenu responsable même lorsque l'acte fautif peut aller à l'encontre de sa volonté : Bazley c. Curry, [1999] 2 R.C.S. 534. Le coût associé à la réalisation de ce risque incombe à l'entreprise. Lui imputer la responsabilité pour le fait d'autrui permet d'atteindre les objectifs de ends of providing an adequate remedy to people harmed by an employee and of promoting deterrence. When determining whether vicarious liability should be imposed, the court bases its decision on several factors, which include: (a) the opportunity afforded by the employer's enterprise for the employee to abuse his power; (b) the extent to which the wrongful act furthered the employer's interests; (c) the extent to which the employment situation created intimacy or other conditions conducive to the wrongful act; (d) the extent of power conferred on the employee in relation to the victim; and (e) the vulnerability of potential victims.

21 I turn first to the vicarious liability of the Church. On the documents, the Church was Plint's immediate employer. Plint was in charge of the dormitory in which Mr. Barney slept and was answerable to the Church. The trial judge considered the legal test for vicarious liability and concluded that the Church was one of Plint's employers. It employed him in furtherance of its interest in providing residential education to Aboriginal children, and gave him the control and opportunity that made it possible for him to prey on vulnerable victims. In these circumstances, the trial judge found the Church, together with Canada, to be vicariously liable for Plint's sexual assault of the children. However, the Court of Appeal concluded that because of management arrangements between the Church and Canada, the Church could not be considered Plint's employer for purposes of vicarious liability.

22 The trial judge made at least eight factual findings that support his conclusion that the Church was one of Plint's employers in every sense of the word and should be vicariously liable for the assaults.

23 First, the principal, who was responsible for hiring and supervising dormitory supervisors, was hired by the Church subject to Canada's approval as a matter of convention (Caldwell in 1944 and politique générale que sont l'indemnisation appropriée de la victime et la dissuasion. Pour déterminer si la responsabilité du fait d'autrui est fondée, le tribunal tient compte de plusieurs facteurs dont a) l'occasion que l'entreprise a donnée à l'employé d'abuser de son pouvoir, b) la mesure dans laquelle l'acte fautif a contribué à la réalisation des objectifs de l'employeur, c) la mesure dans laquelle le contexte de travail a créé un climat d'intimité ou d'autres conditions propices à la commission de l'acte fautif, d) l'étendue du pouvoir conféré à l'employé relativement à la victime et e) la vulnérabilité des victimes potentielles.

J'aborde tout d'abord la question de la responsabilité de l'Église pour le fait d'autrui. Suivant la preuve documentaire, l'Église était l'employeur immédiat de M. Plint, qui était chargé de la surveillance du dortoir où dormait M. Barney et relevait de l'Église. Le juge de première instance s'est penché sur le critère juridique applicable à la responsabilité du fait d'autrui et a conclu que l'Église était l'un des employeurs de M. Plint. L'Église avait retenu les services de M. Plint afin de réaliser son objectif — la scolarisation des enfants autochtones en pensionnat —, et elle lui avait donné le pouvoir de s'en prendre à des victimes vulnérables et fourni l'occasion de le faire. Le juge de première instance a donc tenu l'Église et le gouvernement du Canada responsables du fait d'autrui — l'agression sexuelle des enfants par M. Plint. Toutefois, étant donné les accords intervenus entre l'Église et le gouvernement du Canada relativement à l'administration du Pensionnat, la Cour d'appel a conclu que l'Église ne pouvait être considérée comme l'employeur de M. Plint ni, par conséquent, tenue responsable des actes de ce dernier.

Le juge de première instance a tiré au moins huit conclusions de fait à l'appui de sa thèse selon laquelle l'Église était l'un des employeurs de M. Plint, dans tous les sens du terme, et devait être tenue responsable des agressions.

Premièrement, chargé du recrutement et de l'encadrement des surveillants de dortoir, le directeur était engagé par l'Église sur l'approbation du gouvernement du Canada, suivant la convention établie Dennys in 1958) and as a matter of agreement (Andrews in 1962): 1998 decision, at paras. 54-55.

Second, it was Principal Andrews' understanding that the Church hired and fired him. In the course of his employment, the principal communicated with both Canada and the Church on a regular basis. The Church was his direct supervisor and controlled the principal's salary: 1998 decision, at para. 60. Andrews' vice-principal confirmed that he was hired by a representative of the Church: 1998 decision, at para. 61.

Third, the Church was involved in all aspects of the operation and management of AIRS, including the ongoing supervision of the principal, the periodic inspection of the school, the hiring of Church workers directly (although it was not responsible for hiring teaching staff after 1949) and the religious education of the students: 1998 decision, at para. 65. In its 1993 Brief to the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, the Church described that it was responsible for the "day-to-day atmosphere and activity" of the schools as "implementing agents": 1998 decision, at para. 66. The principal controlled Plint in the conduct of his duties as dormitory supervisor.

Fourth, the Church managed a pension plan for lay employees, though the employer's contributions were paid by Canada: 1998 decision, at para. 69.

Fifth, the principal's authority to dismiss employees was subject to review by the Church, and dismissed employees could appeal to the Church Advisory Committee: 1998 decision, at para. 69.

Sixth, the Church made periodic grants to the school's operation (although the budget was funded by Canada), guaranteed the AIRS overdraft and set a limit to the school's line of credit: 1998 decision, at paras. 70-71.

(M. Caldwell en 1944 et M. Dennys en 1958), puis suivant l'accord intervenu (M. Andrews en 1962) : décision de 1998, par. 54-55.

24 Deuxièmement, le directeur Andrews croyait que son engagement et son congédiement relevaient de l'Église. Dans l'exercice de ses fonctions, il communiquait régulièrement tant avec elle qu'avec le gouvernement du Canada. L'Église était son supérieur immédiat et décidait de son salaire : décision de 1998, par. 60. L'adjoint de M. Andrews a confirmé avoir été engagé par un représentant de l'Église : décision de 1998, par. 61.

26 Quatrièmement, l'Église gérait le régime de retraite des employés laïques, même si les cotisations de l'employeur étaient acquittées par le gouvernement du Canada : décision de 1998, par. 69.

27 Cinquièmement, le directeur pouvait congédier un employé, mais sa décision était soumise au contrôle de l'Église; l'employé pouvait contester son congédiement devant le comité consultatif de l'Église : décision de 1998, par. 69.

28 Sixièmement, l'Église faisait périodiquement don d'une somme au Pensionnat (même si le budget de fonctionnement de ce dernier était financé par le gouvernement du Canada), garantissait son découvert et fixait la limite de sa marge de crédit : décision de 1998, par. 70-71.

29 Seventh, the Church inspected the school annually and provided the Christian education at the school: 1998 decision, at paras. 70-71.

30 Finally, the Church appointed an advisory committee to ensure that Church policies were being carried out at the school: 1998 decision, at para. 64.

31 In summary, the trial judge adduced compelling reasons for his conclusion that the Church did in fact exert sufficient control to be found vicariously liable with Canada.

32 The Court of Appeal, in rejecting the Church's vicarious liability, relied on Canada's degree of control over AIRS, the Church's specific mandate to promote Christian education, and the difficulty of holding two defendants — Canada and the Church — vicariously liable for the same wrong. I conclude that none of these considerations negate the imposition of vicarious liability on the Church.

33 The Court of Appeal's first reason for not imposing vicarious liability on the Church is that this would be inappropriate, given the degree of control over the operations exercised by the government. In making this finding, the Court of Appeal engaged in extensive re-evaluation of the evidence to negate the trial judge's conclusion that the Church had sufficient control to attract vicarious liability. Esson J.A. emphasized that the agreement between the government and the Church did not transfer all management responsibility to the Church, and that under the agreement the Minister retained detailed control over the operation. He pointed out that Canada had taken the position before the Canada Labour Relations Board that the employees of residential schools were employees of the Crown. As for the overwhelming evidence that the Church in fact had the daily management and control of the school, including the hiring, firing and supervision of staff, Esson J.A. concluded that this did not matter, since the Church official in charge, Reverend Joblin, was the agent of Canada in Septièmement, l'Église inspectait l'établissement chaque année et y dispensait l'enseignement chrétien : décision de 1998, par. 70-71.

Enfin, l'Église avait mis sur pied un comité consultatif chargé du respect de ses politiques à l'école : décision de 1998, par. 64.

En résumé, le juge de première instance a étayé de manière convaincante sa conclusion que l'Église exerçait un pouvoir suffisant pour être tenue, de pair avec le gouvernement du Canada, responsable du fait d'autrui.

Pour écarter la responsabilité du fait d'autrui de l'Église, la Cour d'appel a tenu compte du degré de pouvoir du gouvernement du Canada sur le Pensionnat, de la mission de l'Église de promouvoir l'instruction chrétienne, ainsi que de la difficulté de tenir deux défendeurs — le gouvernement du Canada et l'Église — responsables du fait d'autrui pour une seule et même faute. Je conclus qu'aucune de ces considérations ne fait obstacle à la responsabilité du fait d'autrui de l'Église.

La Cour d'appel a tout d'abord invoqué à l'encontre de celle-ci le pouvoir exercé par le gouvernement du Canada sur le fonctionnement du Pensionnat. Elle a donc réexaminé tous les éléments de preuve afin d'écarter la conclusion du juge de première instance selon laquelle l'Église exerçait un pouvoir suffisant pour être tenue responsable du fait d'autrui. Le juge Esson a rappelé que suivant l'accord liant le gouvernement du Canada et l'Église, l'entière responsabilité de l'administration n'était pas transmise à l'Église, le ministre conservant un droit de regard sur le fonctionnement de l'établissement. Il a relevé que, devant le Conseil canadien des relations du travail, le gouvernement du Canada avait soutenu que les employés des pensionnats étaient des employés de l'État. En ce qui concerne la preuve abondante selon laquelle l'Église s'occupait dans les faits de l'administration et de la direction quotidiennes du pensionnat, y compris l'engagement, le congédiement et la surveillance du personnel, le juge Esson a conclu qu'elle n'importait guère puisque le représentant de l'Église, le révérend Joblin, providing supervision and management of what were in fact the government's schools.

Despite these assertions, the incontrovertible reality is that the Church played a significant role in the running of the school. It hired, fired and supervised the employees. It did so for the government of Canada, but also for its own end of promoting Christian education to Aboriginal children. The trial judge's conclusion that the Church shared a degree of control of the situation that gave rise to the wrong is not negated by the argument that as a matter of law Canada retained residual control, nor by formalistic arguments that the Church was only the agent of Canada. Canada had an important role, to be sure, which the trial judge recognized in holding it vicariously liable for 75 percent of the loss. But that does not negate the Church's role and the vicarious liability it created.

The Court of Appeal's second reason for not holding the Church vicariously liable is that Plint's employment as dormitory supervisor fell outside the only area in which the Church was mandated to make decisions — the provision of a Christian education. Again, this argument flies in the face of reality. The Church in fact ran the dormitory, as well as other parts of the school. Whether or not that fell within some formal definition of its objects is irrelevant.

The third reason, and the one that seems to drive the decision of the Court of Appeal on the Church's vicarious liability, is discomfort with the idea that two defendants can be vicariously liable for the same conduct.

This concern, however, may be misplaced. There is much to support the view of P. S. Atiyah in Vicarious Liability in the Law of Torts (1967), that "[t]here is, of course, no reason why two employers should not jointly employ a servant, and this would normally be the case with the employees of a était mandataire du gouvernement du Canada pour la surveillance et l'administration de ce qui était en fait des écoles de l'État.

36 Le troisième motif — celui qui semble sous-tendre la décision de la Cour d'appel concernant la responsabilité du fait d'autrui de l'Église — repose sur la réticence à imposer la responsabilité du fait d'autrui à deux défendeurs pour une même conduite.

37 Or, cette réticence peut être injustifiée. Il y a de nombreuses raisons d'abonder dans le sens de P. S. Atiyah qui, dans son ouvrage intitulé Vicarious Liability in the Law of Torts (1967), dit que [TRADUCTION] « rien n'empêche évidemment deux employeurs de retenir de concert les services d'un partnership. Here the servant is the servant of each partner and of all jointly, and they are all jointly and severally liable for the servant's torts": p. 149. Thus, joint vicarious liability is acceptable where there is a partnership.

38 In this case, the trial judge specifically found a partnership between Canada and the Church, as opposed to finding that each acted independently of the other. No compelling jurisprudential reason has been adduced to justify limiting vicarious liability to only one employer, where an employee is employed by a partnership. Indeed, if an employer with de facto control over an employee is not liable because of an arbitrary rule requiring only one employer for vicarious liability, this would undermine the principles of fair compensation and deterrence. I conclude that the Church should be found jointly vicariously liable with Canada for the assaults, contrary to the conclusions of the Court of Appeal.

39 The Court of Appeal went on to find that in any event the Church would be exempted from any liability on the basis of the doctrine of charitable immunity. In effect, the Court of Appeal created a limited status-based exemption from liability for non-profit organizations. It stated that in a situation where "the government is liable and in which the non-profit charitable organization is not at fault and, if it can be said to have introduced the risk at all, did so to a lesser degree than government, no liability should be imposed upon the organization" (para. 48).

40 This conclusion rests on a misapprehension of the principles governing vicarious liability and more particularly, the decisions of this Court in Bazley and Jacobi v. Griffiths, [1999] 2 S.C.R. 570. It seeks to ground itself in the discussion in Bazley of risk allocation, namely the argument that employé, et que c'est ce que feraient normalement les membres d'un partenariat. En l'espèce, l'employé travaille pour deux employeurs, individuellement et collectivement, et ceux-ci sont solidairement responsables de ses délits » : p. 149. Il peut donc y avoir responsabilité solidaire du fait d'autrui dans le cas d'un partenariat.

Dans la présente affaire, le juge de première instance a précisément conclu à l'existence d'un partenariat entre le gouvernement du Canada et l'Église, plutôt qu'à un fonctionnement individuel indépendant. Aucun motif sérieux issu de la jurisprudence n'a été avancé pour justifier l'imposition de la responsabilité du fait d'autrui à un seul employeur dans le cas d'un partenariat. En effet, les principes de la juste indemnisation et de la dissuasion seraient compromis si la responsabilité d'un employeur exerçant de facto un pouvoir sur un employé n'était pas retenue en raison d'une règle arbitraire n'admettant la responsabilité que d'un seul employeur pour le fait d'autrui. Contrairement à la Cour d'appel, je conclus que l'Église doit être tenue responsable du fait d'autrui au même titre que le gouvernement du Canada pour les agressions commises.

La Cour d'appel a statué que, de toute manière, l'Église échappait à la responsabilité en raison de l'exonération des organismes de bienfaisance. En effet, elle a créé une exonération de responsabilité restreinte au bénéfice des organismes sans but lucratif. Selon elle, lorsque [TRADUCTION] « le gouvernement est responsable et que l'organisme de bienfaisance sans but lucratif n'a commis aucune faute, ou que, s'il est à l'origine du risque, il l'est dans une moindre mesure que le gouvernement, l'organisme sans but lucratif ne doit se voir imposer aucune responsabilité » (par. 48).

Il s'agit d'une méprise quant aux principes de la responsabilité du fait d'autrui et, en particulier, aux arrêts Bazley et Jacobi c. Griffiths, [1999] 2 R.C.S. 570. La Cour d'appel fonde l'exonération sur les propos concernant la répartition du risque tenus par notre Cour dans Bazley, savoir qu'il peut être as between the enterprise that introduces the risk which produces the harm and the victim, it may be fair to require the enterprise to bear the loss, provided there is a sufficient connection between the enterprise and the harm. The Court of Appeal then extends this observation to reason that it is the party best able to bear the loss that should be liable, provided it bears more responsibility than a party less able to pay. Reasoning that the government of Canada is more at fault and better able to bear the loss than the Church, a non-profit organization, it concludes that the Church should not be liable and that Canada alone should bear the loss. The result is to convert a policy observation in Bazley into a free-standing legal test that dictates that non-profit organizations should be free from liability for wrongs committed by their employees, provided they are less at fault than a party better able to bear the loss.

juste que l'entreprise qui a créé le risque à l'origine du préjudice, plutôt que la victime, soit contrainte à supporter la perte s'il existe un lien suffisant entre l'entreprise et le préjudice. Elle fait ensuite fond sur cette observation pour soutenir que c'est à la partie la plus à même de supporter la perte d'être tenue responsable, à condition que sa responsabilité soit plus grande que celle d'une partie moins bien nantie. Estimant que le gouvernement du Canada est davantage fautif et plus à même de supporter la perte que l'Église, un organisme sans but lucratif, elle conclut que cette dernière ne doit pas être tenue responsable et que la perte ne doit être supportée que par le gouvernement du Canada. La Cour d'appel fait ainsi de l'observation générale formulée dans l'arrêt Bazley un critère juridique indépendant dictant qu'un organisme sans but lucratif échappe à toute responsabilité pour la faute d'un employé lorsque sa part de responsabilité est moindre que celle d'une partie plus à même de supporter la perte.

This class-based exemption finds support neither in principle nor in the jurisprudence. It ignores the other concerns raised in Bazley that led the Court to reject a class-based exemption from vicarious liability. First, exempting non-profit organizations when government is present would not motivate such organizations to take precautions to screen their employees and protect children from sexual abuse. The presence of government does not guarantee the safety of children, particularly where, as in this case, the non-profit organization has day-to-day management of the institution.

41 Aucun principe ou arrêt de jurisprudence ne justifie cette exonération fondée sur la nature de l'organisme. La Cour d'appel a fait abstraction des autres considérations qui, dans l'arrêt Bazley, avaient amené notre Cour à refuser d'exonérer de la responsabilité du fait d'autrui une catégorie de défendeurs. Premièrement, exonérer un organisme sans but lucratif lorsque l'État est partie prenante ne l'inciterait pas à recruter du personnel sûr et à protéger les enfants contre les agressions sexuelles. La participation de l'État ne garantit pas la sécurité des enfants, surtout lorsqu'il incombe à l'organisme sans but lucratif de veiller à l'administration quotidienne de l'établissement, comme c'était le cas en l'espèce.

Second, the Church in this case was not working with volunteers and in fact was running a residential school with employees. Thus, arguments that it was less able to supervise its employees' actions are inapplicable; the Church clearly supervised its employees' work and actions and arguably was best placed to do so. The Church enhanced the risk it had introduced by placing Mr. Barney in the care of Plint, whose activities the Church managed.

42 Deuxièmement, l'Église ne faisait pas appel à des bénévoles pour diriger le Pensionnat, mais à des employés. L'on ne saurait donc prétendre qu'elle était moins en mesure de surveiller la conduite de ses employés. L'Église encadrait manifestement ses employés dans l'exécution de leurs fonctions et on peut affirmer qu'elle était la mieux placée pour le faire. Elle a accru le risque qu'elle avait créé en confiant M. Barney aux soins de M. Plint, dont elle dirigeait les activités.

43 The proposed charitable exemption is problematic on yet other grounds. It raises the difficulty that a host of organizations may claim to be non-profit, some of which the law might not wish to favour with an exemption. Indeed, the government itself may be considered a non-profit institution. And it suggests, contrary to legal principle, that lesser responsibility should be converted to no liability, violating the precept that the judge-made common law must proceed incrementally: R. v. Salituro, [1991] 3 S.C.R. 654, at p. 666.

44 One may sympathize with the situation of the Church, which generally acts with laudable motives and now finds itself facing large claims for wrongs committed in its institutions many years ago. However, sympathy does not permit courts to grant exemptions from liability imposed by settled legal principle. I conclude that the Court of Appeal erred in exempting the Church from liability on the ground of charitable immunity.

2.4 Non-Delegable Statutory Duty

45 The trial judge held that Canada was under a non-delegable statutory duty to ensure the safety and welfare of the students at the school, under ss. 113 and 114 of the Indian Act (see Appendix).

46 The trial judge found that Canada was bound by a non-delegable duty. The Court of Appeal did not discuss this issue, concluding that the trial judge's conclusions on vicarious liability made it moot. On this appeal, Canada asks us to set aside the finding of the trial judge on this point.

47 Two key questions surround the issue of non-delegable duty: first, is there a non-delegable statutory duty, and second, was it breached? I conclude that no non-delegable statutory duty can be L'exonération dont on propose de faire bénéficier un organisme de bienfaisance pose d'autres difficultés, dont le risque qu'un grand nombre d'entités prétendent être des organismes sans but lucratif, y compris certaines auxquelles l'on pourrait ne pas vouloir accorder d'exonération. En fait, le gouvernement lui-même peut être considéré comme un organisme sans but lucratif. Par ailleurs, contrairement aux préceptes du droit, une responsabilité moindre deviendrait nulle, ce qui irait à l'encontre du principe selon lequel les tribunaux doivent modifier peu à peu la common law : R. c. Salituro, [1991] 3 R.C.S. 654, p. 666.

On peut éprouver de la sympathie pour l'Église, dont les motifs sont généralement louables et qui se voit réclamer aujourd'hui des sommes importantes pour des délits commis dans ses établissements il y a bien des années. Cependant, cette sympathie ne saurait permettre à un tribunal de l'exonérer d'une responsabilité bien établie en droit. J'arrive à la conclusion que la Cour d'appel a eu tort d'écarter la responsabilité de l'Église au motif qu'il s'agissait d'un organisme de bienfaisance.

Le juge de première instance a statué que le gouvernement du Canada avait l'obligation légale intransmissible d'assurer la sécurité et le bien-être des pensionnaires suivant les art. 113 et 114 de la Loi sur les Indiens (voir l'annexe).

Le juge de première instance a conclu que le gouvernement du Canada était tenu au respect d'une obligation intransmissible. La Cour d'appel n'a pas examiné la question, estimant que les conclusions du juge de première instance sur la responsabilité du fait d'autrui l'avaient rendue théorique. Dans le présent pourvoi, le gouvernement du Canada nous demande d'écarter la conclusion du juge de première instance concernant l'existence d'une obligation intransmissible.

Cette dernière question comporte deux volets principaux. Premièrement, existe-t-il une obligation légale intransmissible et, deuxièmement, a-t-elle fait l'objet d'un manquement? Je conclus inferred from the language of the statute. This makes it unnecessary to consider issues related to how such a duty can be breached and whether it can be imposed where vicarious liability has been found.

The inquiry into whether a non-delegable statutory duty exists in a particular case begins with the words of the statute. The analysis must determine whether the statute clearly places Canada under a non-delegable duty to ensure that students are kept safe while at school: see E.D.G. v. Hammer, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 459, 2003 SCC 52.

Section 113 of the Indian Act states that the "Governor in Council may authorize the Minister . . . (a) to establish, operate and maintain schools for Indian children". Section 114 goes on to provide that "[t]he Minister may (a) provide for and make regulations with respect to standards for buildings, equipment, teaching, education, inspection and discipline in connection with schools . . . (c) enter into agreements with religious organizations for the support and maintenance of children who are being educated in schools operated by those organizations".

The text of ss. 113 and 114 does not support the inference of a mandatory non-delegable duty. First, it uses the permissive term "may", as opposed to the directive term "shall", limiting the possibility of finding an obligation as strong as a duty. Second, the power of the government to enter into agreements with religious organizations for the care and education of Indian children suggests that the duty is eminently delegable and was contracted out of by the government. There is no language in the statute that replicates the clear language found in Lewis (Guardian ad litem of) v. British Columbia, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1145, where a non-delegable duty was found. Here one may state, as the Court did in E.D.G., that none of "the general duties gives school boards full responsibility for students' welfare while on school premises, in the way that the statutes in Lewis gave the Ministry full responsibility for overseeing maintenance projects and for qu'on ne peut déduire du libellé de la loi l'existence d'une obligation intransmissible. Il n'est donc pas nécessaire de se pencher sur les questions relatives aux manières de manquer à celle-ci ni sur la possibilité de l'imposer lorsque la responsabilité du fait d'autrui est établie.

48 Pour savoir s'il existe une obligation légale intransmissible dans un cas donné, il faut d'abord examiner le libellé de la loi. L'analyse doit déterminer si la loi impose clairement au gouvernement du Canada l'obligation intransmissible d'assurer la sécurité des élèves à l'école : voir E.D.G. c. Hammer, [2003] 2 R.C.S. 459, 2003 CSC 52.

49 L'article 113 de la Loi sur les Indiens prévoit que « [l]e gouverneur en conseil peut [. . .] autoriser le Ministre a) à établir, diriger et entretenir des écoles pour les enfants indiens ». L'article 114 dispose que « [l]e Ministre peut a) [p]ourvoir à des normes de construction, d'installation, d'enseignement, d'éducation, d'inspection et de discipline relativement aux écoles, et établir des règlements à cet égard [et] c) [c]onclure des accords avec des institutions religieuses pour le soutien et l'entretien des enfants qui reçoivent leur instruction dans les écoles dirigées par ces institutions ».

50 Le libellé de ces articles n'étaye pas l'inférence d'une obligation intransmissible. Premièrement, on y emploie le verbe « pouvoir », qui confère une faculté, plutôt que le verbe « devoir », qui impose une obligation, limitant ainsi la possibilité d'y voir une véritable obligation. Deuxièmement, le pouvoir de l'État de contracter avec des organisations religieuses pour le soin et l'éducation des enfants indiens donne à penser que l'obligation est tout à fait transmissible et qu'elle a été sous-traitée par l'État. On ne retrouve pas dans la loi le libellé clair qui était en cause dans l'arrêt Lewis (Tutrice à l'instance) c. Colombie-Britannique, [1997] 3 R.C.S. 1145, où l'on a conclu à l'existence d'une obligation intransmissible. On peut dire en l'espèce, comme l'a affirmé notre Cour dans l'arrêt E.D.G., qu'« [a]ucune de ces fonctions générales ne fait peser sur les conseils scolaires l'entière responsabilité du bien-être des élèves à l'école, à ensuring that workers exercised reasonable care" (para. 20). Other provisions of the Act do not assist. The Indian Act falls far short of creating a mandatory duty to ensure the health and safety of children in residential schools.

la façon dont les lois dans l'affaire Lewis imposaient au ministère l'entière responsabilité de superviser les projets d'entretien et de s'assurer de la diligence raisonnable des entrepreneurs » (par. 20). Les autres dispositions de la loi ne sont guère éclairantes. La Loi sur les Indiens ne crée aucune obligation d'assurer la santé et la sécurité des enfants dans les pensionnats.

51 The Church raises a number of arguments in response. First, it argues that the pervasive control granted by Parliament over every aspect of Indians' lives, including their definition and registration, jurisdiction over reserves and jurisdiction over mentally incompetent Indians, justifies finding a non-delegable statutory duty. However, arguments based on general obligations outside the strict language of the statute and the residential school setting are not persuasive. They risk encroaching on other grounds of liability such as breach of fiduciary duty and negligence. Unless a non-delegable statutory duty is based on the language of the statute, the boundaries between the various grounds of liability become meaningless.

L'Église soulève un certain nombre d'arguments à l'appui de la thèse contraire. Premièrement, elle soutient que le vaste pouvoir accordé par le législateur sur tous les aspects de la vie des Indiens — notamment la définition d'« Indien » et l'enregistrement à ce titre, la compétence sur les réserves et sur les Indiens mentalement incapables — permet de conclure à l'existence d'une obligation légale intransmissible. Cependant, un argument fondé sur une obligation générale étrangère au strict libellé de la loi et au fonctionnement du Pensionnat n'est pas convaincant. Il risque d'empiéter sur d'autres motifs de responsabilité, comme le manquement à l'obligation fiduciaire et la négligence. La frontière entre les différents chefs de responsabilité n'a de sens que si l'obligation intransmissible découle du libellé de la loi.

52 Second, the Church argues that the regulations enacted by the government pursuant to s. 114(a) required the principal of AIRS to maintain standards acceptable to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs for Canada with respect to all aspects of the students' life at AIRS, including safety, counselling, guidance, and home and school relationships. In addition, the regulations mandated that "[e]very school shall be subject to inspection by such officials of the Government of Canada and by such other persons as the Superintendent may authorize": Indian Residential School Regulations, 1953, Reg. 14. These and other regulations granted Canada the power to set standards for the operation of the school and inspect to see that these standards were met. But they fall short of establishing a mandatory non-delegable duty to ensure the students' safety and welfare. Indeed, they seem to presuppose delegation of Canada's duties.

Deuxièmement, l'Église fait valoir que le règlement pris par le gouvernement en application de l'al. 114*a*) obligeait le directeur du Pensionnat à établir des normes convenant au surintendant des affaires indiennes du Canada pour tout ce qui avait trait à la vie des élèves au Pensionnat, y compris la sécurité, la conseillance, l'orientation et les relations à la maison et à l'école. En outre, le règlement prévoyait que [TRADUCTION] « [c]hacun des pensionnats est inspecté par le représentant du gouvernement du Canada et toute autre personne que désigne le surintendant » : Indian Residential School Regulations, 1953, art. 14. Ce règlement et d'autres accordaient au gouvernement du Canada le pouvoir d'établir les normes de fonctionnement et d'inspecter les lieux pour s'assurer de leur respect. Ils ne créent toutefois pas une obligation intransmissible d'assurer la sécurité et le bien-être des élèves. Ils semblent plutôt présupposer la transmission des obligations du gouvernement du Canada.

Third, the Church argues that by forcing Aboriginal children to attend designated residential schools that maintained total control over those children (ss. 115 and 117 of the Indian Act), Canada acquired a duty to protect the interests of those children. While emotionally compelling, this argument too falls short of establishing a non-delegable statutory duty at law.

Taken together, the statutory language of these provisions falls short of imposing the broad statutory duty of care to protect the safety and welfare of the children.

I conclude that the trial judge erred in finding a non-delegable statutory duty on Canada in this case.

2.5 Fiduciary Duty

Neither the trial judge nor the Court of Appeal found breach of fiduciary duty. The appellant, Mr. Barney, asks that we reverse this decision.

A fiduciary duty is a trust-like duty, involving duties of loyalty and an obligation to act in a disinterested manner that puts the recipient's interest ahead of all other interests: K.L.B. v. British Columbia, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 403, 2003 SCC 51, at para. 49.

The argument for breach of fiduciary duty is presented on two different bases: one individual, one collective.

The first argument, put on an individual basis, is that the government of Canada and the Church occupied a trust-like relationship with attendant trust-like duties with respect to Mr. Barney and other students at the school. As such, it was required to put their interests first and avoid disloyalty in its conduct toward them.

Assuming such a duty did exist, the trial judge found that it was not breached in this case. He specifically found that neither the Church nor Canada were dishonest or intentionally disloyal. These

54 Considéré dans son ensemble, le libellé des dispositions législatives n'impose pas une obligation générale de diligence dont l'objet est d'assurer la sécurité et le bien-être des enfants.

55 Je suis d'avis que le juge de première instance a eu tort de conclure que le gouvernement du Canada avait en l'espèce une obligation légale intransmissible.

2.5 Obligation fiduciaire

56 Ni le juge de première instance ni la Cour d'appel n'ont retenu la thèse du manquement à une obligation fiduciaire. L'appelant, M. Barney, nous demande d'infirmer leurs décisions.

57 Fondée sur la confiance, l'obligation fiduciaire exige de son débiteur qu'il soit loyal et qu'il agisse de manière désintéressée, faisant passer l'intérêt du créancier avant tout autre : K.L.B. c. Colombie-Britannique, [2003] 2 R.C.S. 403, 2003 CSC 51, par. 49.

58 L'argument relatif au manquement à l'obligation fiduciaire a deux fondements, l'un individuel, l'autre collectif.

59 D'un point de vue individuel, le gouvernement du Canada et l'Église auraient eu à l'égard de M. Barney et des autres pensionnaires une relation de nature fiduciaire, avec les obligations fiduciaires que cela suppose. De ce fait, ils auraient dû faire passer les intérêts des enfants avant les leurs et éviter toute conduite déloyale envers eux.

60 Selon le juge de première instance, à supposer que pareille obligation ait existé, elle n'avait pas été violée. Il a précisé que ni l'Église ni le gouvernement du Canada n'avaient fait preuve de findings of fact have not been negated. It follows that breach of fiduciary duty toward Mr. Barney and his schoolmates has not been established.

61 Beneath this specific argument, a second broader argument focussing on Aboriginal children collectively can be discerned. This is the argument that the system of residential schools robbed Indian children of their communities, culture and support and placed them in environments of abuse. This, it is argued, amounted to dishonest and disloyal conduct that violated the government's fiduciary duty to Canada's Aboriginal peoples.

62 This argument cannot be resolved on this appeal. It was not raised below, other than as contextual background to the circumstances and events at the school Mr. Barney attended, AIRS. It was pursued only at this level, and then mainly by interveners. In support of their argument, they submitted studies and writings, none of which were proved in evidence in the courts below and the historic and scientific validity of which the respondents have had no opportunity to challenge. In these circumstances, it would be unfair to rely on this material and inappropriate to deal with the larger argument.

63 We agree with the courts below that the argument on fiduciary duty presented in this case cannot succeed.

2.6 Apportionment of Damages

64 Having found the Church and Canada vicariously liable (and Canada liable for breach of non-delegable duty), the trial judge found Canada to have been 75 percent at fault and the Church 25 percent at fault. Since he found them jointly and severally liable, the parties may recover full damages against either or both of them. However, the issue remains whether either of the parties to the joint enterprise that led to the loss is entitled to be completely or partially indemnified by the other.

malhonnêteté ou de déloyauté intentionnelle. Ces conclusions de fait n'ont pas été contestées. Le manquement à l'obligation fiduciaire envers M. Barney et ses camarades de classe n'a donc pas été démontré.

Un second argument, plus général, vise les enfants autochtones collectivement. Cette thèse veut que le système des pensionnats ait soustrait les enfants autochtones à leurs communautés, à leur culture et à leurs réseaux d'entraide pour les placer dans des milieux abusifs. Il s'agirait d'une mesure malhonnête et déloyale par laquelle le gouvernement aurait manqué à son obligation fiduciaire envers les peuples autochtones du Canada.

Notre Cour ne peut statuer sur cet argument dans le cadre du présent pourvoi. Il n'a pas été formulé devant les tribunaux inférieurs, sauf en toile de fond aux événements qui se sont produits au Pensionnat fréquenté par M. Barney. C'est uniquement devant nous qu'il a été avancé, et principalement par les intervenants. Ces derniers ont déposé à l'appui études et documents qui n'avaient pas été mis en preuve devant les tribunaux inférieurs et dont les intimés n'ont pu contester la valeur historique et scientifique. Il serait donc injuste de s'y fier et inopportun de se pencher sur l'argument plus général.

Nous abondons dans le même sens que les tribunaux inférieurs, qui ont conclu que l'argument de l'obligation fiduciaire ne pouvait être retenu.

2.6 Répartition des dommages-intérêts

Après avoir conclu à la responsabilité du fait d'autrui de l'Église et du gouvernement du Canada (et à la responsabilité du gouvernement du Canada pour le manquement à une obligation intransmissible), le juge de première instance a établi la part de responsabilité du gouvernement du Canada à 75 p. 100 et celle de l'Église à 25 p. 100. Ceux-ci ayant été déclarés solidairement responsables, les parties peuvent réclamer la totalité des dommages-intérêts à l'un ou l'autre. Cependant, une question demeure : l'une des parties à la coentreprise à l'origine de la perte a-t-elle droit au dédommagement total ou partiel de la part de l'autre?

The trial judge examined the relationship between the parties and concluded that Canada had not agreed to generally indemnify the Church for loss incurred in running the school. He then considered the allocation of fault between the two. He apportioned the loss 75 percent to Canada and 25 percent to the Church. In doing so, he noted that Canada had the final decision regarding the employment of a principal and control of finances, thus effectively controlling the school. He concluded that as the "more senior of the two partners" in the joint enterprise, Canada should bear the major portion of the loss (2001 decision, at para. 324).

65 Le juge de première instance s'est penché sur la relation entre les parties pour conclure que le gouvernement du Canada n'avait jamais convenu de dédommager généralement l'Église des pertes subies dans l'exploitation du Pensionnat. Compte tenu de la répartition de la responsabilité, il a réparti la perte à raison de 75 p. 100 au gouvernement du Canada et de 25 p. 100 à l'Église. Ce faisant, il a signalé que le gouvernement du Canada avait le dernier mot concernant l'engagement du directeur et la gestion des finances, ce qui lui conférait de fait la mainmise sur l'école. Il a conclu qu'à titre de coentrepreneur [TRADUCTION] « principal », le gouvernement du Canada devait supporter la majeure partie de la perte (décision de 2001, par. 324).

Canada argues that this conclusion runs counter to the British Columbia Negligence Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 333, which provides that "if . . . it is not possible to establish different degrees of fault, the liability must be apportioned equally" (s. 1(2)). Canada argues that vicarious liability is not predicated on fault, and therefore liability and apportionment of damages must be divided equally, not 75-25 as the trial judge held.

66 Le gouvernement du Canada soutient que cette conclusion va à l'encontre de la Negligence Act de la Colombie-Britannique, R.S.B.C. 1996, ch. 333, qui prévoit que [TRADUCTION] « s'il n'est pas possible d'établir différentes parts de faute, la responsabilité doit être répartie à parts égales » (par. 1(2)). Il prétend que, la responsabilité du fait d'autrui n'étant pas fondée sur la faute, la responsabilité et les dommages-intérêts doivent être répartis à parts égales, et non selon un ratio 75 : 25 comme l'a fait le juge de première instance.

It remains an open question whether the term "fault" in the Negligence Act includes vicarious liability. Fault has been held not to include intentional torts and torts other than negligence: e.g., Chernesky v. Armadale Publishers Ltd., [1974] 6 W.W.R. 162 (Sask. C.A.); Funnell v. C.P.R., [1964] 2 O.R. 325 (H.C.). Other cases hold the contrary: Bell Canada v. Cope (Sarnia) Ltd. (1980), 11 C.C.L.T. 170 (Ont. H.C.); Gerling Global General Insurance Co. v. Siskind, Cromarty, Ivey & Dowler (2004), 12 C.C.L.I. (4th) 278 (Ont. S.C.J.). However, it is not necessary to resolve this dispute. If vicarious liability amounts to "fault" under the Negligence Act, the trial judge's conclusion that Canada was 75 percent at fault would amount to a finding that fault could be apportioned, with the result that s. 1(2) would not apply to impose an equal allocation. On the other hand, if vicarious liability is not "fault" under the Act, then the Act does not apply. In this case, liability

67 Reste à savoir si la « faute » (fault) au sens de la Negligence Act s'entend de la responsabilité du fait d'autrui. Des tribunaux ont statué qu'elle n'englobait ni les délits intentionnels ni les délits autres que la négligence : voir p. ex. Chernesky c. Armadale Publishers Ltd., [1974] 6 W.W.R. 162 (C.A. Sask.); Funnell c. C.P.R., [1964] 2 O.R. 325 (H.C.). D'autres ont retenu la thèse contraire : Bell Canada c. Cope (Sarnia) Ltd. (1980), 11 C.C.L.T. 170 (H.C. Ont.); Gerling Global General Insurance Co. c. Siskind, Cromarty, Ivey & Dowler (2004), 12 C.C.L.I. (4th) 278 (C.S.J. Ont.). Il n'est cependant pas nécessaire de trancher. Si la responsabilité du fait d'autrui est une « faute » au sens de la Negligence Act, fixer à 75 p. 100 la part de responsabilité du gouvernement du Canada comme l'a fait le juge de première instance revient à conclure que la faute peut être répartie, si bien que le par. 1(2) ne s'applique pas pour imposer un partage égal. Par contre, si la responsabilité du fait d'autrui n'est pas une « faute » au sens may be assigned at common law, with the same result.

68 In these circumstances, the Church argues that the common law of contribution should apply. This Court in Bow Valley Husky (Bermuda) Ltd. v. Saint John Shipbuilding Ltd., [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1210, questioned whether the common law rule against contribution was absolute. It held that a common law right of contribution between tortfeasors may exist, except for intentional torts or malicious motivation (para. 101). Vicarious liability is not founded on intent or maliciousness. The Church goes on to argue that this is an appropriate case for extending the doctrine of contribution to joint, faultless tortfeasors to prevent the unjust enrichment of Canada, due to the Church's limited control over the operation at AIRS.

69 This raises the question of whether unequal apportionment of responsibility is appropriate in cases of vicarious liability. The conflicting views on whether vicarious liability attributes any fault or blame on the wrongdoer are summarized in Bluebird Cabs Ltd. v. Guardian Insurance Co. of Canada (1999), 173 D.L.R. (4th) 318 (B.C.C.A.), at paras. 13-14. The most compelling view is that while vicarious liability is a no-fault offence in the sense that the employer need not have participated in or even have authorized the employee's particular act of wrongdoing, in another sense it implies fault. As D. N. Husak states, "no defendant who is held vicariously liable is selected randomly; the principles used to identify this defendant are not arbitrary. Vicarious liability is imposed on someone who was in a position to have supervised and thus to have prevented the occurrence of the harm": "Varieties of Strict Liability" (1995), 8 Can. J.L. & Jur. 189, at p. 215. It follows that the degree of fault may vary depending on the level of supervision. Parties may de la loi, celle-ci ne s'applique alors pas. En l'espèce, la common law permet d'attribuer la responsabilité avec le même résultat.

Dans ces circonstances, l'Église fait valoir que les principes de la common law en matière de contribution doivent s'appliquer. Dans l'arrêt Bow Valley Husky (Bermuda) Ltd. c. Saint John Shipbuilding Ltd., [1997] 3 R.C.S. 1210, notre Cour s'est interrogée sur le caractère absolu de la règle de la common law interdisant la contribution. Elle a conclu que, en common law, les coauteurs d'un délit pouvaient se réclamer mutuellement une contribution, sauf délit intentionnel ou motivation malveillante (par. 101). La responsabilité du fait d'autrui ne tient ni à l'intention ni à la motivation malveillante. L'Église ajoute que la présente affaire — où les coauteurs du délit n'ont commis aucune faute — se prête à l'application de la règle de la contribution afin d'empêcher l'enrichissement sans cause du gouvernement du Canada, vu le pouvoir limité qu'elle exerçait sur le fonctionnement du Pensionnat.

La question de l'opportunité de répartir inégalement la responsabilité du fait d'autrui se pose alors. Les divergences de vues quant à savoir si une faute ou un blâme est imputé à l'auteur du délit sont résumées dans l'arrêt Bluebird Cabs Ltd. c. Guardian Insurance Co. of Canada (1999), 173 D.L.R. (4th) 318 (C.A.C.-B.), par. 13-14. Suivant la thèse la plus convaincante, même si, d'un côté, la responsabilité du fait d'autrui ne tient pas à la commission d'une faute, c'est-à-dire qu'il n'est pas nécessaire que l'employeur ait participé à l'acte fautif de l'employé ni même qu'il l'ait autorisé, d'un autre côté, elle suppose une faute. Comme le dit D. N. Husak, [TRADUCTION] « le responsable du fait d'autrui n'est pas désigné au hasard, et les principes appliqués ne sont pas arbitraires. Une personne est tenue responsable du fait d'autrui si elle était en situation d'autorité et aurait pu, de ce fait, prévenir le préjudice » : « Varieties of Strict Liability » (1995), 8 Can. J.L. & Jur. 189, p. 215. Il s'ensuit que la part de responsabilité peut varier en fonction de be more or less vicariously liable for an offence, depending on their level of supervision and direct contact.

The trial judge's reasoning suggests that he applied this analysis to conclude that one of the parties, Canada, was "more senior" and had more control (2001 decision, at para. 324). He reasoned that when an employee has two or more employers, it is more likely than not that one exercises more control or plays a more important role than the other. The damage award, he concluded, should reflect that. It is true that at various places the trial judge referred to the "partnership" (1998 decision, at paras. 99 and 119), the "joint enterprise" (at para. 107), and "join[t] control" (at para. 114). However, I cannot accept Canada's argument that the trial judge found no hierarchical relationship between Church and Crown. He found the relationship between Canada and the Church was not that of principal-agent or employer-employee. This does not exclude one party to the joint enterprise being more senior or exercising more control. In these circumstances an unequal apportionment of responsibility is appropriate.

Here the trial judge found that Canada was in a better position than the Church to supervise the situation and prevent the loss. That finding was grounded in the evidence and I would not interfere with it.

A final question arises. The trial judge made the allocation on the basis that Canada was both vicariously liable and liable under a non-delegable statutory duty. I conclude that the latter basis of liability was not available. Should this change the allocation of loss as between Canada and the Church? Logic suggests it should not. The basis for assigning greater responsibility to Canada was its greater control over the enterprise. The l'autorité exercée. La responsabilité d'une partie pour l'infraction commise par un tiers dépend de la surveillance plus ou moins grande qu'elle a exercée sur ce tiers et du lien plus ou moins direct qu'elle a entretenu avec lui.

70 Le raisonnement du juge de première instance donne à penser qu'il s'est fondé sur cette analyse pour conclure que l'une des parties, le gouvernement du Canada, était le coentrepreneur « principal » et exerçait un plus grand pouvoir (décision de 2001, par. 324). À son avis, lorsqu'un employé a plus d'un employeur, l'un d'eux exerce vraisemblablement un plus grand pouvoir ou joue un rôle plus important que l'autre. Il a estimé que le montant des dommages-intérêts devait en tenir compte. Il est vrai qu'il a utilisé à plusieurs reprises les termes [TRADUCTION] « partenariat » (décision de 1998, par. 99 et 119), « coentreprise » (par. 107) et « surveillance conjointe » (par. 114). Je ne peux cependant pas retenir l'argument du gouvernement du Canada portant que le juge de première instance n'a vu aucune relation hiérarchique entre l'Église et la Couronne. Le juge a conclu que leur relation n'était pas celle d'un mandant et d'un mandataire ou d'un employeur et d'un employé. Ce qui n'empêche pas l'un des coentrepreneurs d'avoir plus d'ascendant ou d'exercer un plus grand pouvoir. Dans ces circonstances, il est opportun de répartir inégalement la responsabilité.

71 En l'espèce, le juge de première instance a estimé que le gouvernement du Canada était plus en mesure que l'Église de surveiller la situation et de prévenir la perte. Cette conclusion se fondait sur la preuve et je ne la modifierais pas.

72 Reste une dernière question. Le juge de première instance a réparti la responsabilité en considérant que le gouvernement du Canada était responsable à la fois pour le fait d'autrui et pour le manquement à une obligation légale intransmissible. J'estime qu'il ne lui était pas loisible de retenir ce deuxième élément. La répartition de la perte entre le gouvernement du Canada et l'Église devrait-elle en être modifiée? La réponse assessment is not affected by finding there was no non-delegable duty under the statute.

73 I would confirm that damages should be apportioned 75 percent to Canada and 25 percent to the Church.

2.7 Damages: The Effect of Prior Abuse

74 The calculation of damages for sexual assault to Mr. Barney is complicated by two other sources of trauma: (1) trauma suffered in his home before he came to AIRS; and (2) trauma for non-sexual abuse and deprivation at AIRS that was statute barred. In reality, all these sources of trauma fused with subsequent experiences to create the problems that have beset Mr. Barney all his life. Untangling the different sources of damage and loss may be nigh impossible. Yet the law requires that it be done, since at law a plaintiff is entitled only to be compensated for loss caused by the actionable wrong. It is the "essential purpose and most basic principle of tort law" that the plaintiff be placed in the position he or she would have been in had the tort not been committed: Athey v. Leonati, [1996] 3 S.C.R. 458, at para. 32.

75 The trial judge followed this principle and sought to exclude damages relating to trauma suffered by Mr. Barney before coming to AIRS and statute-barred wrongs. In his view, the plaintiff's family background, his institutionalization at AIRS and the non-sexual traumas he suffered, fell to be considered as factors inherent in his position, distinct from the sexual assaults. The trial judge clearly concluded that Mr. Barney's family life prior to AIRS, as well as other experiences at AIRS, made it likely that he would have suffered serious psychological difficulties even if the sexual abuse had never occurred.

dictée par la logique est négative. Le gouvernement du Canada s'est vu imputer une plus grande responsabilité parce qu'il avait exercé un plus grand pouvoir sur l'entreprise. L'inexistence d'une obligation légale intransmissible n'y change rien.

Je suis d'avis de confirmer que le gouvernement du Canada doit payer 75 p. 100 des dommages-intérêts, et l'Église 25 p. 100.

2.7 Dommages-intérêts : incidence de traumatismes antérieurs

Deux autres traumatismes compliquent le calcul du montant des dommages-intérêts auxquels M. Barney a droit pour l'agression sexuelle dont il a été victime : (1) celui subi chez lui avant son placement au Pensionnat et (2) l'autre découlant des privations et des sévices non sexuels subis au Pensionnat et pour lequel tout recours était prescrit. En réalité, ces traumatismes se sont confondus avec les expériences subséquentes pour donner naissance aux problèmes avec lesquels M. Barney a été aux prises toute sa vie. Il est pratiquement impossible de démêler les différentes sources de préjudice. Le droit l'exige pourtant puisque le demandeur ne peut être indemnisé que pour le préjudice causé par le délit lui conférant un droit d'action. Selon « [l]'objet essentiel, le principe le plus fondamental du droit de la responsabilité délictuelle », le demandeur doit être rétabli dans la situation où il aurait été n'eût été le délit : Athey c. Leonati, [1996] 3 R.C.S. 458, par. 32.

Adhérant à ce principe, le juge de première instance a entrepris d'exclure les préjudices issus des traumatismes dont M. Barney avait été victime avant son arrivée au Pensionnat et ceux liés aux délits prescrits. À son avis, les antécédents familiaux du demandeur, son placement au Pensionnat et les traumatismes d'ordre non sexuel qu'il avait subis devaient être considérés comme des facteurs inhérents à sa situation, distincts des agressions sexuelles. La conclusion du juge de première instance est claire : la vie familiale de M. Barney avant son arrivée au Pensionnat et les autres expériences qu'il y a vécues l'avaient prédisposé à des troubles psychologiques graves, indépendamment des agressions sexuelles.

Mr. Barney submits that his situation prior to entering the school and other traumas suffered while at the school must be considered in assessing damages, and that the trial judge erred in not doing so. He also argues that the principle of ex turpi causa non oritur actio (a person cannot profit from his own wrong) prevents the respondents from claiming that some of his problems stem not from the sexual assaults he suffered but from other statute-barred wrongs he suffered while at the school. These submissions indirectly raise some of the same generalized complaints against the residential school policy as a whole as are raised with respect to breach of fiduciary obligation.

76 M. Barney soutient que sa situation avant son placement au Pensionnat et les autres traumatismes qu'il y a subis sont pertinents pour l'évaluation du préjudice et que le juge de première instance a eu tort de ne pas en tenir compte. Il affirme également que suivant la maxime ex turpi causa non oritur actio (nul ne peut tirer profit de sa faute), les défendeurs ne peuvent alléguer que certains de ses problèmes ne découlent pas des agressions sexuelles, mais des autres délits, frappés de prescription, dont il a été victime au Pensionnat. Ces prétentions soulèvent indirectement, à certains égards, les mêmes doléances généralisées contre la politique des pensionnats dans son ensemble que le manquement allégué à l'obligation fiduciaire.

For the reasons that follow, I am not persuaded that the trial judge erred in proceeding as he did.

77 Pour les motifs qui suivent, je ne suis pas persuadée que le juge de première instance a commis une erreur.

It is important to distinguish between causation as the source of the loss and the rules of damage assessment in tort. The rules of causation consider generally whether "but for" the defendant's acts, the plaintiff's damages would have been incurred on a balance of probabilities. Even though there may be several tortious and non-tortious causes of injury, so long as the defendant's act is a cause of the plaintiff's damage, the defendant is fully liable for that damage. The rules of damages then consider what the original position of the plaintiff would have been. The governing principle is that the defendant need not put the plaintiff in a better position than his original position and should not compensate the plaintiff for any damages he would have suffered anyway: Athey. Mr. Barney's submissions that injury from traumas other than the sexual assault should not be excluded amount to the contention that once a tortious act has been found to be a material cause of injury, the defendant becomes liable for all damages complained of after, whether or not the defendant was responsible for those damages.

78 Il importe d'établir une distinction entre la cause de la perte et l'évaluation du préjudice en matière de responsabilité civile délictuelle. Pour ce qui concerne le lien de causalité, la règle veut généralement que l'on se demande si, selon la prépondérance des probabilités, n'eût été les actes du défendeur, le demandeur aurait subi le préjudice. Les causes, délictuelles ou non délictuelles, du préjudice subi par le demandeur peuvent être multiples, mais le défendeur en est pleinement responsable si l'acte qu'il a commis est l'une d'elles. Au chapitre de l'évaluation du préjudice, il faut déterminer la situation initiale du demandeur. Le principe fondamental est que le défendeur n'est pas tenu de rendre la situation du demandeur meilleure qu'elle ne l'était au départ et qu'il n'a pas à indemniser le demandeur d'un préjudice qu'il aurait subi de toute manière : Athey. La prétention de M. Barney selon laquelle le préjudice découlant d'autres traumatismes que l'agression sexuelle ne devrait pas être écarté revient à dire qu'une fois établi que l'acte délictuel est une cause réelle de préjudice, le défendeur devient responsable de tous les préjudices allégués par la suite, qu'il en soit responsable ou non.

At the same time, the defendant takes his victim as he finds him — the thin skull rule. Here the victim suffered trauma before coming to AIRS.

79 Par ailleurs, le défendeur prend sa victime comme elle est — c'est la règle de la vulnérabilité de la victime. En l'espèce, la victime a subi des

2005 SCC 58 (CanLII)

The question then becomes: What was the effect of the sexual assault on him, in his already damaged condition? The damages are damages caused by the sexual assaults, not the prior condition. However, it is necessary to consider the prior condition to determine what loss was caused by the assaults. Therefore, to the extent that the evidence shows that the effect of the sexual assaults would have been greater because of his pre-existing injury, that pre-existing condition can be taken into account in assessing damages.

80 Where a second wrongful act or contributory negligence of the plaintiff occurs after or along with the first wrongful act, yet another scenario, sometimes called the "crumbling skull" scenario, may arise. Each tortfeasor is entitled to have the consequences of the acts of the other tortfeasor taken into account. The defendant must compensate for the damages it actually caused but need not compensate for the debilitating effects of the other wrongful act that would have occurred anyway. This means that the damages of the tortfeasor may be reduced by reason of other contributing causes: Athey, at paras. 32-36.

81 All these scenarios flow from the basic principle that damages must seek to put the plaintiff in the position he or she would have been in but for the tort for which the defendant is liable.

82 The trial judge correctly apprehended the applicable legal principles. He recognized the "daunting task" of untangling multiple interlocking factors and confining damages to only those arising from the actionable torts, the sexual assaults (2001 decision, at para. 365). He tried his best to award fair damages, taking all this into account. He recognized the thin skull principle, but in the absence of evidence that Mr. Barney's family difficulties prior to coming to AIRS had exacerbated the damage he suffered from the sexual assaults he sustained at AIRS, the trial judge had no choice but to attempt to isolate those traumas. Similarly, there was no legal basis upon which he could allow damages suffered as a result of statute-barred wrongs traumatismes avant son placement au Pensionnat. Il faut donc se demander quel a été l'effet de l'agression sexuelle sur le demandeur, déjà marqué par la vie. Le préjudice est celui causé par les agressions sexuelles, et non par sa situation antérieure, qu'il importe toutefois d'examiner pour circonscrire la perte imputable aux agressions. Ainsi, dans la mesure où la preuve établit que les agressions sexuelles ont eu un effet plus dévastateur à cause du préjudice préexistant, on peut tenir compte de cet état préexistant pour fixer les dommages-intérêts.

Lorsqu'un deuxième acte fautif ou une négligence contributive du demandeur survient après l'acte fautif initial ou simultanément, on peut avoir affaire à ce qu'on appelle une « vulnérabilité déjà active ». Chaque auteur d'un délit peut obtenir que l'on tienne compte des conséquences des actes de l'autre. Le défendeur doit indemniser le demandeur du préjudice qu'il lui a effectivement causé, mais il n'est pas tenu de le dédommager des effets débilitants de l'autre acte fautif qui se seraient produits de toute manière. Ainsi, les dommages-intérêts exigibles de l'auteur du délit peuvent être réduits lorsque d'autres facteurs ont contribué au préjudice : Athey, par. 32-36.

Ces scénarios découlent tous du principe fondamental selon lequel les dommages-intérêts doivent rétablir le demandeur dans la situation où il se serait trouvé n'eût été le délit dont le défendeur est responsable.

Le juge de première instance a bien manié les principes juridiques applicables. Il a reconnu la [TRADUCTION] « grande difficulté » de démêler des facteurs imbriqués les uns dans les autres et de circonscrire le préjudice causé uniquement par le délit conférant le droit d'action, soit l'agression sexuelle (décision de 2001, par. 365). Tenant compte de tous ces éléments, il a fait de son mieux pour accorder au demandeur une juste indemnité. Il a reconnu le principe de la vulnérabilité de la victime, mais vu l'absence de preuve que les problèmes familiaux de M. Barney avant son arrivée au Pensionnat avaient exacerbé le préjudice infligé par les agressions sexuelles, il n'a eu d'autre choix que de tenter d'isoler ces traumatismes. De même, aucun committed at AIRS, like the beatings, to increase the award of damages.

More broadly, Mr. Barney relies on the maxim that none should profit from his own wrong, ex turpi causa non oritur actio, to argue that the respondents should not be enriched by their improper care of him. He argues that reducing his damages award because of the harm caused by placing Aboriginal children in residential schools allows the Church and Canada to profit from their own immoral and illegal conduct.

This argument cannot succeed, notwithstanding its instinctive appeal. First, it is not correct to view the respondents' case as an attempt to profit from immoral and illegal conduct by reducing damages. The amount of damages is limited by loss caused by the actionable torts, in this case sexual assault. Not awarding damages for loss caused by other factors does not "reduce" damages. On the contrary, to award damages for such loss would be to "increase" them beyond what the law allows. Thus it cannot be said that the respondents are profiting from their wrong.

Second, the maxim ex turpi causa non oritur actio cannot be applied to evade legal limits or undermine the legal system. Applying it to permit damages to be awarded for wrongful acts that are subject to limitation periods that have expired would subvert the legislation and compensate for torts that have been alleged but not proven. It would be to override legislative intent and fix liability in the absence of legal proof.

Third, even if these difficulties could be overcome, ex turpi causa non oritur actio should be applied cautiously, where it is clearly mandated: Hall v. Hebert, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 159. Compensation for the impact of attending residential schools is fraught with controversy and difficulty. Here, as for fondement juridique ne lui permettait d'indemniser le préjudice découlant de délits prescrits commis au Pensionnat, les coups par exemple, et d'accorder ainsi des dommages-intérêts plus élevés.

83 De manière plus générale, M. Barney se fonde sur la maxime ex turpi causa non oritur actio (nul ne peut tirer profit de sa faute) pour soutenir que le fait d'avoir mal pris soin de lui ne devrait pas permettre aux intimés de s'enrichir. Il prétend que réduire le montant des dommages-intérêts en fonction du préjudice causé par le placement des enfants autochtones dans des pensionnats permet à l'Église et au gouvernement du Canada de tirer profit de leur conduite immorale et illégale.

84 Cet argument ne saurait être retenu malgré l'attrait éprouvé spontanément. Tout d'abord, il est erroné de voir dans la réduction sollicitée par les intimés une tentative de tirer profit d'une conduite immorale ou illégale. Le montant des dommages-intérêts ne correspond qu'à la perte causée par le délit conférant un droit d'action, en l'occurrence l'agression sexuelle. Ne pas indemniser le demandeur pour la perte découlant d'autres facteurs n'équivaut pas à « réduire » les dommages-intérêts. Par contre, l'indemniser d'une telle perte reviendrait à accorder des dommages-intérêts « supérieurs » à ceux exigibles en droit. On ne saurait donc affirmer que les intimés tirent profit de leurs actes fautifs.

85 Deuxièmement, la maxime ex turpi causa non oritur actio ne peut être invoquée pour contourner une limite fixée par la loi ou pour saper le système juridique. L'appliquer de manière à permettre le dédommagement pour d'autres actes fautifs frappés de prescription priverait la loi de sa raison d'être et permettrait l'indemnisation à l'égard de délits allégués mais non prouvés. L'intention du législateur serait bafouée, et la responsabilité serait imputée en l'absence d'éléments de preuve légaux.

86 Troisièmement, à supposer que ces obstacles soient surmontables, lorsque les circonstances commandent clairement l'application de la maxime ex turpi causa non oritur actio, les tribunaux doivent faire preuve de circonspection en l'appliquant : Hall c. Hebert, [1993] 2 R.C.S. 159. L'indemnisation des the broad claim for collective breach of fiduciary duty, the necessary record to permit consideration of past policy wrongs is lacking.

87 I conclude that Mr. Barney's contention that the trial judge erred in failing to properly consider wrongs other than the actionable sexual assaults in assessing damages cannot succeed.

2.8 General and Aggravated Damages: Quantum

88 The trial judge awarded Mr. Barney $125,000 in general damages, plus $20,000 aggravated damages. Mr. Barney argues that these amounts should be increased to $300,000 having regard to the awards in other cases, exacerbating factors and non-sexual brutalization suffered by him while at AIRS.

89 This ground of appeal cannot succeed. The trial judge considered the correct factors in arriving at the damages award. He emphasized the nature and frequency of the assaults and their dreadful physiological and psychological effect on the victim. He referred to numerous decisions of a similar nature, in order to arrive at a fair figure. No basis for interfering with his award of general and aggravated damages has been made out.

2.9 Punitive Damages

90 The trial judge awarded punitive damages only against Plint. The appellant asks for $25,000 of punitive damages to be awarded against Canada as well.

91 No compelling reason exists to disturb the trial judge's award. Punitive damages are awarded against a defendant only in exceptional effets du placement dans les pensionnats est controversée et problématique. En l'espèce, comme pour l'allégation générale d'un manquement collectif à une obligation fiduciaire, la preuve requise pour l'examen d'actes fautifs découlant d'une politique antérieure fait défaut.

Je conclus que la prétention de M. Barney selon laquelle le juge de première instance a commis une erreur en ne tenant pas dûment compte, pour la fixation des dommages-intérêts, d'autres actes fautifs que ceux conférant le droit d'action — les agressions sexuelles — n'est pas fondée.

2.8 Dommages-intérêts généraux et majorés : montants

Le juge de première instance a accordé à M. Barney des dommages-intérêts généraux de 125 000 $, plus 20 000 $ à titre de dommages-intérêts majorés. M. Barney soutient que l'indemnité doit être portée à 300 000 $, eu égard aux sommes accordées dans d'autres affaires, aux facteurs aggravants et aux sévices à caractère non sexuel qui lui ont été infligés au Pensionnat.

Ce motif d'appel ne saurait être retenu. Le juge de première instance a tenu compte des bons facteurs pour fixer les dommages-intérêts. Il a souligné la nature et la fréquence des sévices, ainsi que leurs terribles répercussions physiologiques et psychologiques sur la victime. Il s'est référé à de nombreuses décisions rendues dans des affaires apparentées pour fixer un juste montant. Je ne vois aucune raison de modifier les dommages-intérêts généraux et majorés.

2. Dommages-intérêts exemplaires

Seul M. Plint a été condamné à des dommages-intérêts exemplaires. L'appelant demande que le gouvernement du Canada soit également condamné à lui verser 25 000 $ à titre de dommages-intérêts exemplaires.

Aucune raison valable ne justifie de modifier la décision du juge de première instance à cet égard. Les dommages-intérêts exemplaires ne sont circumstances for "high-handed, malicious, arbitrary or highly reprehensible misconduct that departs to a marked degree from ordinary standards of decent behaviour": Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co., [2002] 1 S.C.R. 595, 2002 SCC 18, at para. 94. The trial judge made no finding that Canada's behaviour in this case met any of those thresholds. He correctly stated that punitive damages cannot be awarded in the absence of reprehensible conduct specifically referable to the employer. While he found the Church liable on the basis of vicarious liability and Canada liable vicariously and on the basis of a non-delegable statutory duty, this was by virtue of the relationship between the parties and Plint, not because of any specific misconduct.

I conclude that the contention that the punitive damage award should include Canada should be rejected.

2.10 Loss of Future Earning Opportunity

The trial judge did not order any damages for loss of future earning ability. The Court of Appeal allowed an award of $20,000. The appellant is now asking this Court to raise the award to $240,000.

The Court of Appeal held that "the trial judge overlooked the reality that [Mr. Barney's] psychological injury would, at least for a period of time in the future, foreclose for him some occupations that might otherwise be available" (para. 221). The trial judge had found that Mr. Barney was likely to have become a logger in any event, as that was the occupation of both of his brothers. The trial judge had also found that Mr. Barney was disabled from working as a logger for reasons that had nothing to do with the sexual assaults (2001 decision, at para. 527). Finally, the trial judge had found that Mr. Barney did not have the intellectual capacity to pursue vocational or retraining programs "save for the briefest and most practically oriented" (para. 527).

accordés qu'exceptionnellement, en cas de « conduite malveillante, arbitraire ou extrêmement répréhensible, qui déroge nettement aux normes ordinaires de bonne conduite » : Whiten c. Pilot Insurance Co., [2002] 1 R.C.S. 595, 2002 CSC 18, par. 94. Le juge de première instance n'a pas conclu que la conduite du gouvernement du Canada satisfaisait en l'espèce à l'un ou l'autre de ces critères. Il a dit à juste titre que des dommages-intérêts exemplaires ne pouvaient être octroyés si l'employeur n'avait pas eu lui-même une conduite répréhensible. Il a tenu l'Église et le gouvernement du Canada responsables du fait d'autrui, ajoutant dans le cas du second défendeur le manquement à une obligation légale intransmissible, mais ce, en raison de leur lien avec M. Plint, et non d'une inconduite de leur part.

92 Il y a lieu de rejeter l'allégation selon laquelle le gouvernement du Canada devrait également être condamné à des dommages-intérêts exemplaires.

2.10 Perte de capacité de gain ultérieure

93 Le juge de première instance n'a pas indemnisé l'appelant de la perte de capacité de gain ultérieure. La Cour d'appel lui a accordé 20 000 $ à ce titre. L'appelant demande aujourd'hui à notre Cour de porter ce montant à 240 000 $.

94 Selon la Cour d'appel, [TRADUCTION] « le juge de première instance a fait abstraction de ce que le préjudice psychologique de M. Barney l'empêcherait, du moins un certain temps, d'exercer des métiers qui, autrement, auraient été à sa portée » (par. 221). Le juge avait estimé que, de toute façon, M. Barney serait vraisemblablement devenu bûcheron, comme ses deux frères. Il avait également conclu que M. Barney n'était pas apte à travailler comme bûcheron pour des motifs qui n'avaient rien à voir avec les agressions sexuelles (décision de 2001, par. 527). Enfin, à son avis, M. Barney n'avait pas la capacité intellectuelle requise pour suivre un programme de formation professionnelle ou de recyclage, [TRADUCTION] « à moins que celui-ci ne soit très court et axé sur la pratique » (par. 527).

95 Canada does not contest the award for future loss of earnings by the Court of Appeal. However, Canada argues that a detailed tabular approach is not appropriate on the evidence here.

96 I am satisfied that no evidentiary record exists to specifically quantify any future loss of earnings and that the Court of Appeal, noting the inadequacy of the evidentiary record on this point, was correct to award a conventional amount.

3. Conclusion

97 I conclude that the Court of Appeal erred in finding that the Church was not vicariously liable for the sexual abuse to Mr. Barney. The Court of Appeal also misapplied Bazley to find the Church immune from liability. The trial judge erred in finding a non-delegable statutory duty on the terms of the Indian Act. The trial judge correctly apportioned the damages unequally between the Church and Canada. No basis has been established for finding negligence, breach of fiduciary duty or for reassessing the damage awards in this case.

98 The appeal of Mr. Barney is dismissed. The appeal of Canada is allowed in part. The judgment of the trial judge on the issues of joint vicarious liability against the Church and Canada, and assessment and apportionment of damages, is restored. The judgment of the Court of Appeal on the issue of charitable immunity is set aside. The Court of Appeal's award to Mr. Barney for loss of future earning opportunity is upheld. In the circumstances, I would make no order as to costs, leaving each party to bear its own costs.

APPENDIX

Indian Act, S.C. 1951, c. 29

113. The Governor in Council may authorize the Minister, in accordance with this Act,

Le gouvernement du Canada ne conteste pas le montant accordé par la Cour d'appel au titre de la perte de capacité de gain ultérieure. Il fait cependant valoir que, vu la preuve, le calcul à partir de tables détaillées n'est pas opportun en l'espèce.

Je suis convaincue qu'aucun élément de la preuve ne permet précisément de quantifier une perte de capacité de gain ultérieure et que la Cour d'appel a eu raison, à défaut de la preuve voulue, d'accorder un montant fondé sur la jurisprudence.

3. Conclusion

Je conclus que la Cour d'appel a eu tort de ne pas tenir l'Église responsable du fait d'autrui pour l'agression sexuelle de M. Barney. De plus, elle a mal appliqué l'arrêt Bazley en exonérant l'Église de toute responsabilité. Le juge de première instance a commis une erreur en dégageant de la Loi sur les Indiens une obligation légale intransmissible. Il a eu raison de répartir les dommages-intérêts inégalement entre l'Église et le gouvernement du Canada. Aucun élément n'a été avancé pour justifier une conclusion de négligence ou de manquement à une obligation fiduciaire ou la modification du montant des dommages-intérêts.

Je suis d'avis de rejeter l'appel de M. Barney et d'accueillir en partie celui du gouvernement du Canada. Le jugement de première instance est rétabli en ce qui concerne la responsabilité solidaire du fait d'autrui de l'Église et du gouvernement du Canada, ainsi que la détermination et la répartition des dommages-intérêts. Le jugement de la Cour d'appel est annulé quant à l'exonération d'un organisme de bienfaisance. Sa décision d'accorder à M. Barney une indemnité pour la perte de capacité de gain ultérieure est confirmée. Aucun dépens ne seront adjugés dans les circonstances, chacune des parties assumant les siens.

BONNER AND ANOTHER v. TOTTENHAM AND EDMONTON PERMANENT INVESTMENT BUILDING SOCIETY.

Lease—Sub-lease by Assignee—Liability of Sub-lessee—Rent reserved by original Lease—Payment by Lessee—Indemnity—Money paid.

The lessees of premises having assigned the term, the assignee mortgaged the premises by way of sub-demise. The mortgage provided that, upon default by the mortgagor, the mortgagees might enter into possession, or receipt of the rents and profits of the premises, and demise or sell the same, and out of moneys so received by them, whether as rents and profits or purchase-money, should in the first place pay the rent reserved by the original lease. The mortgagees, having entered into possession, did not pay rent which accrued due under the lease while they were in possession. The lessees, having been compelled to pay it, sued the mortgagees to recover the amount so paid by them.

Held, that the action was not maintainable.

Moule v. Garrett, (1870) L. R. 5 Ex. 132; (1872) 7 Ex. 101, distinguished.

APPEAL from the judgment of Channell J. in an action tried by him without a jury.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, who were lessees of certain premises, to recover from the defendants, who were mortgagees of the premises by way of sub-demise from one Price, to whom the plaintiffs had assigned the term, the amount of rent which the plaintiffs had been compelled to pay to the lessor and which had accrued while the defendants had been in possession of the premises.

By indenture of lease dated April 3, 1882, the premises, numbered 12 and 14, Lordship Lane, Tottenham, were demised by one Moore to the plaintiffs at the yearly rent of 20*l.*, payable quarterly, for a term of ninety-nine years. The lease contained the usual covenants for payment of the rent reserved, repair, and insurance by the lessees, and a condition of re-entry for non-payment of rent or breach of covenant. By indenture dated April 5, 1889, the plaintiffs assigned the premises for the remainder of the term to Edward Price, who by the said indenture covenanted with the plaintiffs to pay the rent reserved by the lease, and indemnify the plaintiffs therefrom. By an indenture dated October 18, 1889, which recited that Price had applied to the defendants' society to lend him 400*l.* in respect of his forty advanced shares therein for the term of fifteen years, and had offered to pay a premium for that advance which, being calculated according to the rules of the society, amounted to 60*l.*, and was to be added to and treated as part of the principal sum advanced, it was witnessed that, in consideration of the sum of 400*l.* paid to Price by the defendants, he demised the above-mentioned premises to the defendants for the residue of the term granted by the lease, except the last day, by way of mortgage for securing to the defendants the payment by him of 180 advance instalments of 3*l.* 14*s.* each, one of such instalments to become due and be paid on the first Monday in every month, commencing with the month of December then next, and also the payment of all fines and other sums, if any, which, according to the rules of the society, might become payable by him to the defendants. The deed provided for the mortgagor's remaining in possession until default by him in payment of any instalment or fine, or in payment of the rent reserved by the lease under which he held the premises, and that, if such default should be made, the defendants might distrain for the amount of any monthly payments or fines in arrear, and of any payment made by the defendants under the powers by the deed conferred upon them, as for rent in arrear upon a common demise, or enter into possession of, or receipt of the rents and profits of, the premises, and might demise or sell the premises, and should out of the moneys so received by them, whether the same were rents and profits or purchase-money, in the first place pay the rent reserved by the lease under which the mortgagor held the premises, and certain other expenses thereby specified, and in the next place retain for the society all advance instalments, fines, and other moneys which under the deed or the rules of the society were then due to them from the mortgagor, and also such further sum of money as should be equivalent to the sum which, according to the rules of the society, would have to be paid by the mortgagor in case he were about to redeem, and should pay the surplus, if any, to the mortgagor. On November 13, 1891, Price was adjudicated bankrupt. The defendants entered into possession of the premises, and had continued in possession ever since. The defendants not having paid rent reserved by the original lease during the time they were so in possession to the amount of 97*l.* 0*s.* 5*d.* the plaintiffs were compelled to pay that rent to the lessor. The learned judge gave judgment for the defendants.

C. A. 1898

Aug. 2, 3. Bray, Q.C., and H. Tindal Atkinson, for the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs have been compelled to pay that which the defendants by the terms of the instrument under which they held the premises ought to have paid, and the defendants have had the benefit of that payment; for, in the absence of it, the term, upon which their interest in the premises depended, might have been forfeited. The defendants really took the premises subject to the charge of paying this rent, and it is by reason of their default that this burthen has fallen upon the plaintiffs. The case therefore falls within the proposition laid down by Cockburn C.J. in Moule v. Garrett (1) to the effect that, "where one person is compelled to pay damages by the legal default of another, he is entitled to recover from the person by whose default the damage was occasioned the sum so paid." It is not necessary in a case of this description that there should be between the parties either privity of contract or privity of estate in the sense that the defendants must have the same estate as the plaintiffs had. It is sufficient that the plaintiffs were compellable and have been compelled to pay a sum of money through the default of the defendants, which payment has enured for the defendants' benefit. In such a case the law, in order to do justice, implies a request by the defendants to the plaintiffs to make the payment, which was for the defendants' benefit, and a promise by the defendants to repay the plaintiffs. There was neither privity of contract nor privity of estate between the plaintiffs and the defendants in Moule v. Garrett. (2)

Jelf, Q.C., and Grimwood Mears (G. Spencer Bower with them), for the defendants. There must be some privity either by contract or estate between the plaintiffs and defendants in order to support such an action as this. It is essential to the right to indemnity in such a case that the defendants and the plaintiffs should have been both compellable by law to pay the same debt to the same person, and that the defendants should, as between themselves and the plaintiffs, be the parties primarily liable, the payment being thus for their benefit. In Moule v. Garrett (8) the defendants were assignees of the term, not sub-lessees, and therefore the plaintiff as lessee, and the defendants as assignees of the term, were both liable to pay the rent, the one by contract and the other by estate; and there was privity of estate in the sense that the defendants had the estate which had belonged to the lessee. Here the defendants have not the same estate as the plaintiffs had, and the plaintiffs are not parties to the contract by which the defendants undertook to pay rent. No request can be implied by the defendants to the plaintiffs to pay the rent due on the original lease, which the defendants were not liable to the lessor to pay.

have had to pay to their lessor under the covenant in their lease, which rent accrued during the time the defendants were in possession of the premises as mortgagees by way of demise from an assignee of the term. Between the plaintiffs and the defendants there exists neither contract nor privity of estate; the defendants were not liable to pay to the plaintiffs the rent in question, nor were they liable to pay it to the plaintiffs' lessor. In these circumstances my brother Channell gave judgment for the defendants, being of opinion that the action was not maintainable, and that the principle of the decision in Moule v. Garrett (1) did not apply, the defendants being underlessees and not assignees of the term as in the case cited. My brother Channell held, as I read his judgment, that no request by the defendants to the plaintiffs to pay their lessor the rent in question on their behalf could be implied whereon to maintain the action, and I am of opinion that he was right.

The facts are these. On April 3, 1882, the owner of the premises, Moore, demised them to the plaintiffs for a term of ninety-nine years at the rent of 20*l.* per annum, which the plaintiffs covenanted to pay. On April 5, 1889, the plaintiffs assigned to Price the residue of the term, Price covenanting with the plaintiffs to pay the covenanted rent and indemnify the plaintiffs therefrom. On October 18, 1889, Price demised by way of mortgage the term less one day to the defendants to secure advances made by them to him, and the defendants covenanted with Price that, if they should enter into possession of the premises and receive the rents and profits, they would pay the yearly rent of 20*l.* per annum reserved by the lease of April 3, 1882. In November, 1891, Price was adjudicated bankrupt. The defendants have entered into possession of the premises under their mortgage, and have received the rents and profits thereof in part satisfaction of their mortgage debt, and they have remained in possession ever since. The defendants have not paid the rent which accrued whilst they were in possession, and Moore, the landlord, has compelled the plaintiffs, his lessees, under the covenant in their lease with him to do so; they have done so, and they now sue the defendants to recover the amount they have thus had to pay to Moore.

It is clear that no contract or privity of estate exists between the plaintiffs and the defendants, or between the original lessor, Moore, and the defendants; and, unless there be circumstances from which a request to pay can be implied, or, in other words, a contract can be implied between the defendants and the plaintiffs that the defendants would indemnify the plaintiffs if they paid to their landlord the rent accruing whilst they, the defendants, were in possession, there are no circumstances which will support an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants to recover the amount so paid. It is true that Moore could sue the plaintiffs, his lessees, upon their covenant with him in the lease. It is also true that the plaintiffs, the lessees, could sue their assignee, Price, upon his covenant with them. It is also true that Price could sue the defendants, his underlessees, upon their covenant with him. But how can the plaintiffs sue the defendants? I omit Price's trustee in bankruptcy, for he, in my opinion, does not affect this case. It is said that the case of Moule v. Garrett (1) shews that the plaintiffs can sue the defendants to recover what they have been compelled to pay to their lessor, and that this case falls within the principle of that case. Now what was the case of Moule v. Garrett (1)? It was a case in which there had been two assignments of the term, the defendants being the second assignees thereof. First of all there was, as here, a lease from a lessor to the lessee, Moule, the plaintiff in the action, containing the usual covenants by a lessee. Moule afterwards assigned the term to Bartley, who afterwards assigned the term to the defendants, Garrett & Co., who then committed breaches of covenants in the lease. Moule, having been compelled under his covenant with his lessor to pay to him damages for these breaches committed by the defendants, Garrett & Co., the assignees of Bartley, sued Garrett & Co. to recover the amount so paid by him, Moule, to his lessor. It was held that, inasmuch as both the plaintiff and the defendants were compellable to pay to the original lessor the damages accruing to him for the breaches of covenant by the defendants whilst assignees of the term, the former by reason of his covenant with the original lessor and the latter by reason of their being assignees of the term and having committed the breaches whilst assignees, and inasmuch as the plaintiff had been compelled to pay damages to his lessor for these breaches of covenant by the defendants, for which the defendants were also compellable under privity of estate to pay to the lessor, they, the defendants, were liable to indemnify the plaintiff in respect of these payments of which the defendants had had the benefit. For, as Willes J. puts it in Roberts v. Crowe (1), the lessee is liable for breaches of covenant committed by the assignee, but being only secondarily liable he has his remedy over against the person primarily liable—that is, the assignee. The ratio decidendi of Moule v. Garrett (2) is this: If A. is compellable to pay B. damages which C. is also compellable to pay B., then A., having been compelled to pay B., can maintain an action against C. for money so paid, for the circumstances raise an implied request by C. to A. to make such payment in his ease. In other words, A. can call upon C. to indemnify him. See the notes to Lampleigh v. Brathwait (3), and cases there cited. To raise this implied request, both A. and C. must, in my judgment, be compellable to pay B.; otherwise, as it seems to me, the payment by A. to B. so far as regards C. is a voluntary payment, which raises no implication of a request by C. to A. to pay. If Cockburn C.J., in his alternative reason in Moule v. Garrett (4) for holding the defendants liable meant this by the expression "by the legal default of another," I agree; but, if it means by a default for which they were not compellable to pay in that case to the original lessor, I do not agree, and none of the other learned judges who decided that case adopted what Cockburn C.J. then said, and, indeed, Willes J. expressly points out that the obligation of the contract must be common to the plaintiff and the defendant, and that the whole benefit was taken by the defendants. In the present case the defendants are underlessees of an assignee of the term, and are not liable at all to the original lessor for rent whenever it accrued, there being between them and the original lessor neither contract nor privity of estate, and there is no suggestion that there were goods upon the demised premises available for distress other than the goods of the mortgagor Price, even if this would have sufficed to maintain the action, about which I say nothing, for it is not before me. The above, in my judgment, is what was decided in Moule v. Garrett (1), and the present case, as it appears to me, is an attempt to stretch the decision of that case, and to say that the principle therein laid down applies equally to the case of an underlessee of an assignee who is not compellable to pay the original lessor as to the case of an assignee who is compellable to pay the original lessor. It will be seen upon looking at the case of Penley v. Watts (2) that Parke B. deals with this exact point. He says: "The lessee and his assignee are liable to precisely the same extent, and the assignee is a surety for the lessee, but that is not the case in a sub-lease." And, again, in Moule v. Garrett (3), in the Exchequer Chamber, when it was suggested that the case of an underlessee of an assignee and an assignee of an assignee were the same, Blackburn J. said.: "No, because the underlessee has never come under any obligation to the lessor, but here the defendant, by taking the same estate which the plaintiff had, has become liable to the same obligation," and this is the foundation of the judgment of the Court of Exchequer delivered by Channell B., and the ground upon which the judgment was upheld in the Exchequer Chamber. The fact that in this case the defendants covenanted with Price, the assignee, that if they, the defendants, became mortgagees in possession they would pay the rent, gives Price a remedy against them subject to any set-off which may exist between him and them and does not give the present plaintiffs a right of action against them.

In my judgment, for the reasons above, this action is not maintainable. I agree in the judgment of my brother Channell and think that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY L.J. read the following judgment:—The only question in this case is as to the liability of the defendants, who are mortgagees by sub-lease of an assignee of a lease originally granted to the plaintiffs, to indemnify the plaintiffs in respect of rent recovered by the lessor against them on their covenant in the lease. The mortgagees entered into possession of the leasehold property by virtue of their sub-term in 1890, and the assignee became bankrupt in 1891.

Now primâ facie a sub-lessee of a lessee or assignee of a term comes under no liability to the original lessor either for payment of rent or performance of covenants in the original lease. This is true whether the sub-lease be by way of sale or by way of mortgage, and entry into possession of the sub-term does not make the sub-lessee liable to the lessor. But it is said that the present case is distinguishable from the ordinary case by the fact that the mortgagees expressly covenanted with their mortgagor (assignee of the lease) that, if they entered into possession, they would out of the rents and profits received by them (among other things) pay the rent, and that they have been, as they have, in possession during the whole time during which the rents recovered by the lessor against the plaintiffs, original lessees, have been accruing. The argument is that they are thus placed in the position of the defendants in Moule v. Garrett (1), who were held liable to repay to the plaintiff money which the latter had been compelled to pay to the original lessors for breach of covenant in the original lease. In that case the plaintiff, like the plaintiffs here, was an original lessee who had assigned the term before the breach on which he was sued; but the defendants were not, like the defendants here, holders of a sub-term, but were the actual holders at the time of the breach by puisne assignment of the whole of the original term, and in that capacity liable by privity of estate to the original lessors for the very damages which had been recovered by them against the original lessee, who in the action was seeking to recover them over. Both plaintiff and defendants were under a direct obligation to pay the rent to the lessors; but the defendants reaped all the benefit of the payment. It was treated as plain that, as between the plaintiff and defendants, the liability of the defendants to the original lessors by privity of estate was in the nature of a primary liability, that of the plaintiff by privity of contract being secondary; and on this ground the plaintiff was held entitled to recover over against the defendants, as though he were in a manner surety for them for payment of their debt. Here there is no privity either of estate or contract between the defendants and either the original lessor or the plaintiffs in this action, so that there can be nothing analogous to the relation of principal and surety between them. The reasoning in Moule v. Garrett (1), therefore, has no application.

If the assignee had been solvent, the plaintiffs would have had a sufficient remedy in recourse to him. The fact of his having become bankrupt can give no right of action against the defendants on the principle of Moule v. Garrett (1) which did not otherwise exist. The Legislature has made provision in the Bankruptcy Acts for the adjustment of rights of bankrupt holders of leases and other parties interested; and it is in Bankruptcy, if anywhere, that the plaintiffs must find their remedy.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS L.J. read the following judgment:— In this case Moore, by an indenture of lease dated April 3, 1882, let to the plaintiffs two houses numbered 12 and 14, Lordship Lane, Tottenham, at the yearly rent of 20*l.* The plaintiffs on April 5, 1889, assigned the term to Edward Price, who covenanted to pay the rent of 20*l.* a year reserved by the lease of April 3, 1882, and to indemnify the plaintiffs therefrom. By an indenture of mortgage dated October 18, 1889, Price, in consideration of the sum of 400*l.* lent him by the defendants, the Tottenham and Edmonton Permanent Investment Building Society, demised to the defendants the said houses for the remainder of the said term of ninety-nine years, except the last day of such term, by way of mortgage for securing to the society the payment by the mortgagor of one hundred and eighty advance instalments of 3*l.* 14*s.* each, payable monthly, and all fines and other sums which, according to the rules of the society, might become payable by him. The mortgage deed provided for the mortgagor remaining in possession until default by the mortgagor in the payment of the instalments and fines, or in the payment of the rent reserved by the lease under which the mortgagor held, and that, if such default should be made, the society might distrain for the amount of the monthly payments and fines, and the amount of any payments made by the society under the powers thereby conferred upon them, as for rent in arrear upon a common demise, and might enter into possession of the premises or the rents and profits thereof, and might demise or sell the premises, and should, out of moneys so received by them, whether the same were the rents and profits or purchase-money, pay in the first place the rent reserved by the lease under which the mortgagor held, and in the next place retain for the said society all advance instalments, fines, &c., and also such further sum of money as should be equivalent to the sum which, according to the rules of the society, would have to be paid by the mortgagor in case he were about to redeem, and pay the surplus, if any, to the mortgagor. Price has become bankrupt, and the defendants have gone into possession. There is no evidence what rents, profits, or proceeds they have actually received. The only remaining fact is that the plaintiffs have been called on to pay, and have paid, the principal rents since April, 1892.

The question raised in this case, namely, whether an underlessee, who is a mortgagee by way of demise from an assignee of the lessee, and who is in possession of the demised lands, can be sued for money paid by the lessee, who has been compelled according to his covenant to pay the rent reserved by the principal lease, has not, so far as I know, been directly determined until now. It is plain that, generally speaking, an underlessee, whether holding of the lessee or of the assignee of the lessee, cannot be under any obligation to indemnify the lessee against the claim of the lessor for the rent reserved by the lease, because the underlessor generally is presumed to indemnify the underlessee against the rent payable by the principal lease: see Jones v. Morris (1): and the payment of the rent would not therefore be for his relief. The case of Moule v. Garrett (2) does not determine the question, although it goes far to define the principles upon which the question must be decided. In Moule v. Garrett (2) the defendants were not underlessees, but assignees of the term, and the ground upon which they were held to be liable was that, the lessee and the defendants both being liable to the lessor upon all the covenants in the lease, which ran with the land, the former by contract and the latter by privity of estate, the defendants, having had the whole benefit for which the covenant was entered into by the plaintiff as lessee, were liable to recoup to the plaintiff the amount which he had been compelled to pay the lessor for breaches of covenant occurring during the defendants' possession. Channell B. in delivering the judgment of the majority of the Court says: "It is true that there is no express covenant between the parties, but they are each liable to the lessor for the performance of the covenants; they are each directly liable, and the lessor may sue either at his option; but the assignee having at the time the estate which has been the consideration for the covenants ought, as between himself and the lessee, to perform them"; and in Moule v. Garrett (3) in the Exchequer Chamber Blackburn J. says, "I express my entire concurrence in what fell from Channell B."; and Willes J. says: "I concur upon the ground that where two parties have become bound, the one by contract and the other by estate, to perform the same covenant, the former is entitled to indemnity against the latter to the extent of his interest, although there is no immediate privity of contract between them; and I think that the defendants are liable in this action by reason of their having had the whole benefit for which the covenant was entered into by the plaintiff as lessee. The principle of the decision in Deering v. Earl of Winchelsea (4) appears to govern the case." Cockburn C.J. bases his judgment on precisely the same ground, but adds: "there is another ground upon which the judgment of the Court below may be upheld, namely, that the premises, the subject-matter of this lease, being in the possession of the defendants, they were the parties whose duty it was to perform the covenants to be performed upon and in respect of those premises, and whose immediate duty it was to keep those premises in repair. By reason of their default the plaintiff, the original lessee, became liable (although he had parted with the estate) by the terms of his covenant to make good to his lessor the damage which had arisen from the default of the defendants; and I take it to be a general proposition applicable to such a case as this, that, where one man is compelled to pay damages by reason of the default of another, he is entitled to recover compensation from the person through whose default that damage is occasioned. The reason for this rule appears to be well stated in Mr. Leake's excellent work on Contracts." (1) The passage referred to runs thus: "Where the plaintiff has been compelled by law to pay, or, being compellable by law, has paid money which the defendant was ultimately liable to pay, so that the latter obtains the benefit of the payment by the discharge of his liability, under such circumstances the defendant is held indebted to the plaintiff in the amount." Now what (according to the judgments of Channell B., Blackburn J., and Willes J.) were the conditions upon which the liability of the defendants to the plaintiff was based? First, that the plaintiff and defendants were both liable to be sued by the lessor for the same breaches of the same covenant. Secondly, that the defendants had had at the date of those breaches the whole benefit of the land the subject of the lease containing that covenant.

BONNER v. TOTTENHAM AND EDMONTON PERMANENT INVESTMENT BUILDING SOCIETY.

Vaughan Williams L.J.

These being the conditions upon which the defendants in Moule v. Garrett (2), the sub-assignees of the lease, were held liable, it is necessary to consider whether one finds these conditions in principle present in a case in which lessees, who have been compelled to pay the rent reserved by the lease, are seeking to get recoupment from underlessees of an assignee of the lease, who are in possession as mortgagees. Now first, as to the common liability of the lessee and underlessee, they clearly are not both liable to be sued by the lessor for rent. The lessee alone can be sued, and the underlessee is only liable to the lessor in the sense that the lessor has a remedy in rem by distress on goods on the property demised and by the power of re-entry for non-payment of rent or breach of covenant. It is in this sense only that the underlessee can be said to be liable to the lessor for the rent, and, so far as distress is concerned, his direct liability is limited to cases in which he happens to have goods on the land, although he may have an indirect liability to indemnify against distress those who by his licence having goods on the land have been compelled to redeem their goods from distraint. Is this a common liability within the reason upon which the condition is based? I think it is not. I am now dealing only with the principle upon which the common law liability is based. There is a common law principle of liability, and also a principle of liability in equity, and these two principles differ. The common law principle requires a common liability to be sued for that which the plaintiff had to pay, and an interest of the defendant in the payment in the sense that he gets the benefit of the payment, either entirely, as in the case of the assignee of a lease, or pro tanto, as in the case of a surety who has paid, and has his action for contribution against his co-surety. The principle in equity seems wide enough to include cases in which there is community of interest in the subject-matter to which the burden is attached, which has been enforced against the plaintiff alone, coupled with benefit to the defendant, even though there is no common liability to be sued. In such a case it seems to me a plaintiff may recover in equity, although there is no common liability to be sued. The two principles are well illustrated by the case of Hunter v. Hunt (1) and the observations of Eyre C.B. in Deering v. Winchelsea. (2) The former was a case in which one underlessee of a separate portion of premises, the whole of which were held under one original lease at an entire rent, who had paid the whole rent under threat of distress, brought an action against an underlessee to recover from him a proportion of the money which he had so paid as money paid to his use, and it was held that at law he had no right of action. In the latter case, the Lord Chief Baron, in dealing with the principle in equity, takes as an illustration of the equitable principle a series of cases, in some of which the defendant seems to have been under no liability to be sued, but in which the goods of one had been legally taken or sacrificed for the benefit, not of himself alone, but of himself and others, and says, that "the reason is that they are all in æquali jure, and, as the law requires equality, they shall equally bear the burden. This is considered as founded in equity. The principle operates more clearly in a court of equity than at law. At law the party is driven to an audita querela or scire facias to defeat the execution and compel execution to be taken against all. There are more cases of contribution in equity than at law." The audita querela, which is a defendant's writ, and the scire facias both assume a legal liability to judgment or execution in some person other than him against whom judgment has been obtained. The case also of Leigh v. Dickeson (1), in which it was held that one tenant in common of a house who expends money upon the repairs of the house has no right of action against his co-tenant in common for contribution in respect of money so expended, is based upon the consideration that there is no common liability to repair, and seems further to shew that in equity as well as at law there must at least be a legal liability on the plaintiff to pay the sum or bear the burden in respect of which he seeks recoupment or contribution from the defendant. This seems to me to account for the common law condition that the defendant cannot be liable to be sued for money paid unless he is personally liable to be sued for the money which the plaintiff claims to have paid to his use. The common law condition may also be explained by reference to the form of action, "money paid to the use of the defendant at his request," for it seems that, unless the defendant is under a personal liability to pay the money which the plaintiff has assumed to pay for him, one cannot imply the authority from the defendant to the plaintiff to make the payment on his behalf. This proposition does not of course extend to cases where the contractual relation of the parties, whether by express contract or by contract to be implied from their dealings with one another, raises a request or authority to pay, but otherwise I believe it of universal application in an action for money paid: see Lewis v. Campbell. (1) For these reasons I think that the right of the lessor to distrain or re-enter does not constitute a liability in the underlessee to the lessor within the meaning of the condition of the common law principle. But the plaintiff may be entitled to recover within the equitable principle, if he has been compelled to pay or bear the burden, and can establish that the defendant has such an interest or benefit as to make the maxim apply "Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus"; but in my judgment an underlessee has no such interest in the lease or benefit from the payment of the rent as to make that maxim apply or to bring him within the equitable principle. The equitable principle seems to me based upon natural justice requiring that equity should neutralise "inter se" the accident that the burden has been borne by one for the benefit of others associated with him in interest, whether such incidence of burden is the result of election of a plaintiff who might have sued all those interested, or whether it is the result of the requirements of the law as to the parties to actions, or whether it is the result of what may be more properly called "accident" like the "jettison" of a part of a cargo severally owned, or the seizure of wines on behalf of the Crown in right of prisage. In each of these cases the application of the equitable principle depends on community of interest in something in respect of which one has borne a burden for the benefit of another or others. The covenant in accordance with which a lessee pays rent or expends money in repairs is a covenant in a lease in which the underlessee has no interest. He has no contractual interest, and no estate is vested in him; the only sense in which it can be said that he has an interest in the lease is that the lessee or assignee of the lease who has granted the underlease cannot defeat his own grant by a collusive surrender of the lease to the original lessor; and it does not seem to me that this fact constitutes such an interest in him that he can within the equitable principle be said to have an interest in the lease containing the covenant under which the lessee is compellable to do the act alleged to have been done for the benefit of the underlessee. The case of the assignee of a lease on the contrary does shew the necessary interest, as is well illustrated by the judgment of Popham C.J. and the whole Court in the Dean and Chapter of Windsor's case, quoted by Tindal C.J. in Tremeere v. Morison (1), "that the action of covenant did lie although the lessee had not covenanted for him and his assigns; for such covenant which extends to the support of the thing demised is quodammodo appurtenant to it and goes with it: And in respect the lessee hath taken upon him to bear the charges of the reparations the yearly rent was the less which goes to the benefit of the assignee and qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus." It may be remarked on this passage that the rent payable by the underlessee has no necessary relation to the rent reserved by the lease.

(1) (1845) 1 C. B. 300.

(2) 2 Bos. & P. 270.

BONNER v. TOTTENHAM AND EDMONTON PERMANENT INVESTMENT BUILDING SOCIETY.

Vaughan Williams L.J.

In conclusion, in my judgment the defendants have not, within either the equitable or common law principle, such an interest in the lease that it can be said that the payment by the lessees of the rent reserved by the lease was a payment for their benefit or relief, and I do not think that it makes any difference that the underlease was in fact a mortgage by demise.

The only other question with which I have to deal is the question whether there is anything in the provision in the underlease or mortgage by demise, for the application of the rents and profits to the payment of the rent reserved by the lease in case the mortgagees go into possession, which will enable the plaintiffs to maintain this action. I think not. It is plain that, apart from the provision for the application of rents and profits, an underlessee who has bought an interest by way of underlease from an assignee of the lease by the payment of a lump sum cannot, according to any principle, be called on to pay again for that for which he has already once paid, by indemnifying the lessee against the periodical rent as it accrues from time to time. Now, so far as the clause for the application of the rents and profits is concerned: first, it is plain that the lessee cannot at law take advantage of a contract to which he is not a party. It may be true that the trustee in Price's bankruptcy, who does not seem to have disclaimed, may be entitled to compel application of the rents, profits, and proceeds to the payment of the paramount rent, as being a fund held by the defendants in trust for that purpose, and the plaintiffs are, I think, entitled to insist upon the trustee in Price's bankruptcy on proper terms taking proceedings to enforce the application of the fund; but I do not think that the lessees can, at all events in this action, as framed and with these parties, enforce that trust. It is not as if the defendant society was in course of liquidation, and the lessees were attempting to carry in a proof to enforce the indemnity due from the estate to their debtor. It is sufficient, however, to say that the judgment of Channell J. in the action before him was quite right, and that the plaintiffs cannot in it recover any indemnity from the defendants.

With regard to the second ground upon which Cockburn C.J. based his judgment in Moule v. Garrett (1), I do not think that it is anything more than a statement of the principle of Deering v. Winchelsea (2), which principle is the foundation of all the cases in which the assignee has been held liable to recoup a lessee who has been compelled to pay rent as it were as surety for the assignee.

It seems to me that no injustice is done to the plaintiffs by holding that they must fail in this action, for I am of opinion that, if they take proper steps against the trustee in bankruptcy, they can in effect recover this rent from the defendants, provided the state of things is such that the trustee can compel the defendants to apply moneys received to the payment of these rents in arrear; and moreover, as the trustee has not disclaimed, they have, it seems, a remedy against the trustee personally as an assignee of the lease in respect of such rents as have accrued since the bankruptcy, unless and until the trustee assigns over. I have only to add with regard to the cases of Sapsford v. Fletcher (1), Taylor v. Zamira (2), Dawson v. Linton (3), and Exall v. Partridge (4), which were cited to us, that each of these cases turned really on the contractual relations of the parties.

THE LOWER RHINE AND WÜRTEMBERG INSURANCE ASSOCIATION v. SEDGWICK.

Insurance, Marine—Reinsurance—"Subject to same terms as Original Policy"—Policies in existence at Date of Reinsurance—Policies coming into existence subsequently—Limit of Liability of Reinsurer.

A time policy of insurance on a ship was expressed to be "a reinsurance of policy or policies" (here there was a blank space not filled in) "and subject to the same terms, conditions, and clauses as original policy or policies, and to pay as may be paid thereon." The assured had underwritten two time policies on the ship, and these were in force when the reinsurance was effected. Subsequently, during the currency of the reinsurance policy, the two other policies came to an end, and he underwrote a fresh time policy of insurance of the same subject-matter, differing as to the valuation of the ship and in other respects from the two earlier policies. A loss occurred and was paid under the fresh policy:—

Held, that the original policies referred to in the reinsurance policy were the policies then in existence, and that the liability of the reinsurer did not extend to losses which might be incurred by the assured under a policy not containing the same terms, conditions, and clauses as the original policies.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR NEWFOUNDLAND

Torts — Duty to warn — Manufacturer and supplier — Fire on oil drilling rig causing major damage requiring extensive repairs — Fire started by arcing in heat trace system — Whether shipbuilder and system manufacturer had duty to warn rig owner of inflammability of product used in system — Whether shipbuilder's duty to warn excluded by its contract with rig owner — Whether manufacturer entitled to rely on learned intermediary defence.

Torts — Causation — Fire on oil drilling rig causing major damage requiring extensive repairs — Fire started by arcing in heat trace system — Whether failure to warn rig owner of inflammability of product used in heat trace system caused loss.

Torts — Contractual relational economic loss — Fire on oil drilling rig causing major damage requiring extensive repairs — Whether companies leasing rig can recover economic loss resulting from shutdown of rig for repairs.

Torts — Contributory negligence — Fire on oil drilling rig causing major damage requiring extensive repairs — Fire started by arcing in heat trace system — Whether rig owner's contributory negligence in operating heat trace system without ground fault circuit breaker system bars its claims — Whether maritime contributory negligence bar should be eliminated.

Husky Oil Operations Ltd. ("HOOL") and Bow Valley Industries Ltd. ("BVI") made arrangements to have an oil drilling rig constructed by Saint John Shipbuilding Limited ("SJSL"). In order to take advantage of government financing, HOOL and BVI incorporated an offshore company, Bow Valley Husky (Bermuda) Ltd. ("BVHB"). Before construction began, ownership of the rig and the construction contract with SJSL were transferred to BVHB. HOOL and BVI entered into contracts with BVHB for the hire of the rig to conduct drilling operations at sites chosen by HOOL and BVI. These contracts provided that HOOL and BVI would continue to pay day rates to BVHB in the event that the rig was out of service. A heat trace system was required in order to prevent the rig's pipes from freezing during the winter. BVHB chose the Raychem system, which used Thermaclad wrap to keep moisture from the insulation and heat trace wire. The specifications for the Raychem heat trace system required the installation of a ground fault circuit breaker system to cut off the power in the event of an electrical fault, to prevent arcing of the heat trace wire. A functioning system was not installed until after a fire broke out on the rig, causing damage to a tray of electrical and communications cables. As a result of the damage, the rig had to be towed to port for repairs and was out of service for several months. BVHB, HOOL and BVI commenced an action against SJSL alleging breach of contract and negligence, and an action against Raychem for negligence. BVHB claimed both for the cost of the repairs to the rig and for the revenue lost as a result of the rig being out of service for several months. HOOL and BVI sought to recover the day rates that they were contractually required to pay to BVHB during the period the rig was out of service, as well as expenses they incurred for supplies to the rig, including food, drilling mud and additional equipment.

The trial judge held that the defendant SJSL was liable in contract and tort for failing to provide certificates of approval for the Thermaclad, and in tort for breach of duty to warn of the inflammability of Thermaclad. He also held that the defendant Raychem was liable in tort for breach of its duty to warn. The trial judge went on to hold that the major fault lay with BVHB for its operation of the heat trace system without a functioning ground fault circuit breaker system. Moreover, it kept the heat trace system on, even when it might not have been required, despite incidents of arcing on the heat trace wires. He apportioned the fault 60 percent to d'un organisme gouvernemental, HOOL et BVI ont constitué, à l'étranger, une société appelée Bow Valley Husky (Bermuda) Ltd. («BVHB»). Avant le début des travaux de construction, la propriété de la plate-forme et le contrat de construction passé avec SJSL ont été transférés à BVHB. HOOL et BVI ont conclu des contrats avec BVHB pour la location de la plate-forme en vue d'opérations de forage sur des sites choisis par les premières. Ces contrats stipulaient que HOOL et BVI continueraient de payer un taux journalier à BVHB dans le cas où la plate-forme serait hors-service. Il fallait installer un système de réchauffage des conduites pour empêcher les tuyaux de la plate-forme de geler durant l'hiver. BVHB a choisi le système de la société Raychem («Raychem») qui utilisait le revêtement Thermaclad pour protéger de l'humidité l'isolant et le câble de réchauffage des conduites. Les caractéristiques techniques du système de réchauffage des conduites de Raychem exigeaient l'installation d'un système de disjoncteur de fuite à la terre (DFT) pour couper le courant en cas de défectuosité du système électrique afin d'éviter que le câble de réchauffage des conduites ne provoque des arcs électriques. On a installé un système efficace seulement après qu'un incendie se fut déclaré à bord de la plate-forme et eut causé des dommages à un chemin de câbles électriques et de transmission. Par conséquent, la plate-forme a dû être remorquée jusqu'au port pour être réparée et elle a été hors-service durant plusieurs mois. BVHB, HOOL et BVI ont pris action contre SJSL pour négligence et rupture de contrat et contre Raychem pour négligence. BVHB a réclamé à la fois le coût des réparations effectuées sur la plate-forme et la perte de revenus découlant de la mise hors-service de la plate-forme durant plusieurs mois. HOOL et BVI ont demandé d'être indemnisées du taux journalier qu'elles avaient été tenues, en vertu du contrat, de payer à BVHB pendant que la plate-forme était hors-service, ainsi que des dépenses qu'elles avaient faites pour approvisionner la plate-forme, notamment en nourriture, en boue de forage et en matériel supplémentaire.

Le juge de première instance a retenu la responsabilité contractuelle et délictuelle de la défenderesse SJSL pour le motif qu'elle n'a pas fourni de certificats d'approbation concernant le Thermaclad, et il a reconnu sa responsabilité délictuelle parce qu'elle a manqué à l'obligation de prévenir les parties concernées de l'inflammabilité du Thermaclad. Il a également conclu à la responsabilité délictuelle de la défenderesse Raychem parce qu'elle a manqué à son obligation de mise en garde. Il a ensuite décidé qu'il fallait imputer la faute principale à BVHB, qui a fait fonctionner le système de réchauffage des conduites sans un système de disjonc-

BVHB and 40 percent to SJSL and Raychem. He did not award damages for breach of contract. The trial judge dismissed the plaintiffs' claim, however, on the ground that the case arose out of negligence at sea and was governed by Canadian maritime law, which precluded application of the Newfoundland Contributory Negligence Act and made contributory negligence a bar to recovery.

The Court of Appeal held that because the loss suffered by HOOL and BVI was economic in nature, it was not recoverable. It agreed with the trial judge that maritime law applied, but held that provincial negligence legislation applied to maritime cases in some situations, including this case. Alternatively, if the Newfoundland Contributory Negligence Act did not apply, the court held that maritime law no longer made contributory negligence a bar to recovery. In the result, BVHB was held entitled to recover 40 percent of its loss from SJSL and Raychem.

Held (La Forest and McLachlin JJ. dissenting on SJSL's cross-appeal): The appeal should be dismissed. The cross-appeal of SJSL with regard to the duty to warn should be allowed. The other cross-appeals should be dismissed.

Per Gonthier, Cory, Iacobucci and Major JJ.: BVHB was not entitled to claim against SJSL based on the tort duty to warn. In clause 907 of the contract between them, which states that "Builder's liability with respect to the Owner Directed Supply shall extend only to installation thereof", the parties have chosen to specify the only ground of builder liability related to the use of Thermaclad, namely, negligence in the installation thereof. By expressly limiting liability to only these circumstances, the parties have by necessary implication excluded all other grounds of builder liability, including the duty to warn. This reading of clause 907 is reinforced by the fact that Thermaclad is "owner directed supply". Where, as here, the owner specifies a particular product to be used, it is generally the owner and not the builder who, unless otherwise specified in the contract, should bear the losses that flow from the risk associated teur de fuite à la terre efficace. De plus, elle a laissé fonctionner le système de réchauffage des conduites, même lorsque cela n'était peut-être pas nécessaire, malgré le fait que des arcs électriques s'étaient produits sur les câbles de réchauffage des conduites. Il a réparti la faute dans une proportion de 60 pour 100 à BVHB et de 40 pour 100 à SJSL et à Raychem. Il n'a pas accordé de dommages-intérêts pour rupture de contrat. Toutefois, le juge de première instance a débouté les demanderesses pour le motif que l'affaire résultait d'une négligence commise en mer et était régie par le droit maritime canadien, ce qui excluait l'application de la Contributory Negligence Act et faisait de la négligence contributive une fin de non-recevoir à toute demande d'indemnisation.

La Cour d'appel a jugé que, comme la perte subie par HOOL et BVI était de nature économique, elle ne pouvait donner lieu à indemnisation. Elle a convenu avec le juge de première instance que le droit maritime s'appliquait, mais elle a conclu que la législation provinciale relative à la négligence s'appliquait aux affaires maritimes dans certaines situations, dont le présent cas. Subsidiairement, pour le cas où la Contributory Negligence Act de Terre-Neuve ne s'appliquerait pas, la cour a statué que la négligence contributive ne constituait plus une fin de non-recevoir à toute demande d'indemnisation en droit maritime. Par conséquent, elle a jugé que BVHB avait le droit d'être indemnisée par SJSL et Raychem de 40 pour 100 de sa perte.

Arrêt (les juges La Forest et McLachlin sont dissidents quant au pourvoi incident de SJSL): Le pourvoi est rejeté. Le pourvoi incident de SJSL au sujet de l'obligation de mise en garde est accueilli. Les autres pourvois incidents sont rejetés.

Les juges Gonthier, Cory, Iacobucci et Major: BVHB n'avait pas le droit de poursuivre SJSL en invoquant l'obligation de mise en garde en matière délictuelle. À la clause 907 du contrat qu'elles ont conclu, lequel stipule que «[l]a responsabilité du constructeur à l'égard du matériel imposé par le propriétaire s'étend seulement à son installation», les parties ont choisi de préciser le seul fondement permettant d'établir la responsabilité du constructeur relativement à l'utilisation du Thermaclad, à savoir la négligence commise dans son installation. En limitant expressément la responsabilité à ces seules circonstances, les parties ont écarté, par déduction nécessaire, tous les autres fondements de responsabilité en ce qui concerne le constructeur, dont l'obligation de mise en garde. Cette interprétation de la clause 907 est renforcée par le fait que le Thermaclad est du «matériel imposé par le propriétaire». Lorsque le propriétaire, with that product's use. The placement of clauses within a contract, while a factor to be considered, is not determinative. Rather, the contract as a whole should be examined with a view to searching for the intention of the parties by recognizing the natural meaning that flows from the language chosen. By the wording of clause 905, SJSL is relieved of any liability arising from defects. Clause 907 states that SJSL's liability shall extend only to installation of owner-directed supply and that in all other instances, BVHB bears the risk and responsibility for these products. The natural meaning of these clauses thus indicates that the only head of liability upon which these clauses can bite is negligence in installation. Based on the authority of Miida Electronics, SJSL should thus be relieved of any liability for failing to warn BVHB of the dangers associated with the use of Thermaclad. It is not open to Raychem to seek contribution from SJSL, as a contractor which has protected itself against liability cannot be said to have contributed to any actionable loss suffered by the plaintiff. Consequently, Raychem is liable for the entire 40 percent quantum found by the trial judge.

In all other respects, McLachlin J.'s analysis was agreed with.

Per La Forest and McLachlin JJ. (dissenting on SJSL's cross-appeal with regard to the duty to warn): Manufacturers and suppliers are required to warn all those who may reasonably be affected by potentially dangerous products. This duty extends even to those persons who are not party to the contract of sale. The potential user must be reasonably foreseeable to the manufacturer or supplier. BVHB was clearly within the class of persons that SJSL and Raychem ought to have known might reasonably be affected by the use of Thermaclad. SJSL was in a contractual relationship with BVHB, and Raychem had directly approached BVHB's predecessor (a subsidiary of BVI) to encourage the use of its products in the construction of the rig. The manufacturer or supplier remains liable unless the consumer's knowledge negates reasonable reliance. This occurs where the consumer has so much knowledge that a reasonable person would conclude that the consumer fully appreciated and willingly assumed the risk posed by use of the product. Here BVHB did not have the degree of knowledge necessary to negate reliance on SJSL and Raychem. SJSL and Raychem did not demonstrate that comme en l'espèce, spécifie le produit qu'il faut utiliser, à moins de stipulations contraires du contrat, c'est habituellement lui et non le constructeur qui devrait supporter les pertes découlant du risque lié à l'utilisation de ce produit. L'endroit où figurent les clauses dans un contrat, tout en constituant un facteur à prendre en considération, n'est pas décisif. On devrait plutôt examiner le contrat dans son ensemble afin de découvrir l'intention des parties en donnant aux termes qu'elles ont employés le sens qui s'en dégage naturellement. En vertu du libellé de la clause 905, SJSL est dégagée de toute responsabilité à l'égard des vices. La clause 907 stipule que la responsabilité de SJSL s'étend seulement à l'installation du matériel imposé par le propriétaire et que, dans tous les autres cas, BVHB assume les risques et la responsabilité pour ces produits. Par conséquent, selon le sens naturel de ces clauses, elles ne peuvent viser que la responsabilité due à une négligence dans l'installation. Compte tenu du poids de l'arrêt Miida Electronics, SJSL devrait donc être dégagée de toute responsabilité pour avoir omis d'informer BVHB des dangers liés à l'utilisation du Thermaclad. Raychem ne peut pas réclamer une contribution de SJSL car on ne peut pas dire que l'entrepreneur qui s'est protégé de toute responsabilité a contribué à une perte l'exposant aux poursuites du demandeur. Par conséquent, Raychem est seule responsable de la part de 40 pour 100 fixée par le juge de première instance.

L'analyse du juge McLachlin a été acceptée à tous les autres égards.

Les juges La Forest et McLachlin (dissidents quant au pourvoi incident de SJSL au sujet de l'obligation de mise en garde): Les fabricants et les fournisseurs ont l'obligation de mettre en garde tous ceux qui peuvent être raisonnablement concernés par des produits potentiellement dangereux. Cette obligation s'étend même aux personnes qui ne sont pas parties au contrat de vente. Le fabricant ou le fournisseur doit pouvoir raisonnablement prévoir qui sera l'utilisateur. BVHB faisait manifestement partie de la catégorie des personnes qui, comme SJSL et Raychem auraient dû le savoir, pouvaient raisonnablement être concernées par l'utilisation du Thermaclad. SJSL avait des rapports contractuels avec BVHB, et Raychem avait communiqué directement avec la société remplacée par BVHB (une filiale de BVI) pour l'inciter à utiliser ses produits durant la construction de la plate-forme. À moins que les connaissances du consommateur n'écartent la confiance qu'il accorde légitimement au fabricant ou au fournisseur, ces derniers restent responsables. C'est le cas lorsque le consommateur est à ce point renseigné qu'une personne raisonnable conclurait qu'il a pleinement apprécié et BVHB accepted the risk of using Thermaclad. It follows that both SJSL and Raychem owed BVHB a duty to warn, subject to the special defences raised.

SJSL's duty to warn was not excluded by its contract with BVHB. While BVHB's claim sounds in tort, the contract remains relevant to determining whether a tort duty arises, and if so, its scope, since parties are free to contract to limit or waive the duties which the common law would impose on them for negligence. In order to determine the extent to which the parties' planned obligations affect their tort liabilities, it is necessary to ascertain the intention of the parties with respect to the particular issue from the contract documents as a whole. In doing so, it must be kept in mind that generally limitation and exclusion clauses are strictly construed against the party seeking to invoke the clause. The provisions of the contract relied on by SJSL do not directly address responsibility for negligence or duty to warn. While the absence of a term expressly excluding tort liability is not determinative, the contract provisions, considered as a whole, relate to the finding of and responsibility for defects. They function, as the heading states, as a "warranty" of workmanship and materials. More specifically, clauses 702, 905 and 907, taken in combination, provide that in situations of "owner directed supply", SJSL bears the responsibility for installation while BVHB bears the responsibility for defects. Warranties usually relate to the quality of goods and workmanship and do not relate to warnings about the risks associated with the use of products. BVHB's claim against SJSL is not for negligence relating to the choice of, installation of, or defects in, the Thermaclad or other materials, but for failure to warn of the inflammability of Thermaclad. SJSL's duty to warn arose independently of the contract, through its greater knowledge of the inflammability characteristics of Thermaclad. Clause 907, which excludes liability for owner-directed supply, must be narrowly construed. It applies to defects in materials or volontairement accepté le risque que présentait l'utilisation du produit. En l'espèce, BVHB ne possédait pas suffisamment de connaissances pour exclure la confiance mise en SJSL et Raychem. SJSL et Raychem n'ont pas montré que BVHB avait accepté le risque que présentait l'utilisation du Thermaclad. Il s'ensuit que SJSL et Raychem étaient toutes deux tenues d'une obligation de mise en garde au profit de BVHB, sous réserve des moyens de défense particuliers soulevés.

L'obligation de mise en garde de SJSL n'était pas écartée en raison du contrat conclu avec BVHB. Bien que la réclamation de BVHB soit fondée sur les règles de la responsabilité délictuelle, le contrat reste pertinent pour déterminer s'il existe une obligation en matière délictuelle et, si oui, quelle est son étendue, puisque les parties peuvent passer un contrat pour limiter les obligations que la common law leur impose en matière de négligence, ou renoncer à celles-ci. Pour établir dans quelle mesure les obligations prévues par les parties influent sur leur responsabilité délictuelle, il faut dégager de l'ensemble des documents contractuels l'intention des parties en ce qui concerne la question particulière en jeu. Ce faisant, il ne faut pas oublier que, généralement, les clauses de limitation ou d'exclusion sont interprétées de façon stricte à l'encontre de la partie qui les invoque. Les clauses du contrat sur lesquelles s'appuie SJSL ne traitent pas directement de la responsabilité fondée sur la négligence ni de l'obligation de mise en garde. Bien que l'absence d'une condition excluant expressément la responsabilité délictuelle ne soit pas déterminante, prises dans leur ensemble, les clauses du contrat se rapportent à la constatation des vices et à la responsabilité engagée à ce titre. Elles jouent le rôle d'une «garantie» quant à la fabrication et aux matériaux, comme le mentionne le titre. Plus précisément, les clauses 702, 905 et 907, prises ensemble, prévoient que, dans le cas du «matériel imposé par le propriétaire», SJSL est responsable de l'installation tandis que BVHB est responsable des vices. Les garanties portent habituellement sur la qualité des marchandises et de leur fabrication et non sur les mises en garde concernant les risques liés à leur utilisation. La réclamation de BVHB contre SJSL n'est pas fondée sur la négligence dans le choix du Thermaclad ou d'autres matériaux, leur installation ou des vices dont ils seraient affectés, mais plutôt sur le défaut de mise en garde au sujet de l'inflammabilité du Thermaclad. L'obligation de mise en garde incombant à SJSL a pris naissance indépendamment du contrat et découlait du fait qu'elle était mieux informée des caractéristiques d'inflammabilité du Thermaclad. La clause 907, qui exclut toute responsabilité dans le cas du matériel imposé par le propriétaire, doit their installation and workmanship and does not exclude liability for breach of duty to warn.

Raychem is not entitled to rely on the learned intermediary defence, which is an exception to the general rule requiring manufacturers to provide a warning to the ultimate consumers of their product. The learned intermediary defence will generally only apply either where the product is highly technical and is to be used with expert supervision, or where the nature of the product is such that it is unrealistic for the consumer to receive a warning directly from the manufacturer. Thermaclad was not a highly technical product, and its use and application did not require expert supervision. Nor was it unrealistic to expect Raychem to have warned BVHB, the ultimate consumer, directly. Raychem had both the opportunity and the duty to warn BVHB directly and therefore its duty to warn the plaintiffs was not discharged through its communications with SJSL.

Causation is established, on either a subjective or an objective standard. A reasonable plaintiff or BVHB itself would have either declined to use Thermaclad or taken steps to deal with its inflammability had it been warned. The equal apportionment of fault between SJSL and Raychem should not be interfered with. While SJSL might have had less knowledge of the specific characteristics of Thermaclad, its knowledge of the general regulatory requirements was arguably greater, and it had greater contact with BVHB.

The contractual relational economic loss suffered by HOOL and BVI is not recoverable. The defendants owed a prima facie duty of care to BVI and HOOL. They knew of the existence of these plaintiffs and others like them and knew or ought to have known that they stood to lose money if the drilling rig was shut down. However, this prima facie duty of care is negatived by policy considerations. The most serious problem is that of indeterminate liability. If the defendants owed a duty to warn the plaintiffs, it is difficult to see why they would not owe a similar duty to a host of other persons who would foreseeably lose money if the rig was shut down as a result of being damaged. Moreover, the facts of this case do not support liability to BVI and HOOL as an additional deterrent against negligence. Since BVHB, the owner of the drilling rig, suffered a significant amount of property damage, it is not apparent that être interprétée de façon stricte. Elle s'applique aux vices affectant les matériaux ou leur installation et leur fabrication et n'écarte pas la responsabilité pour manquement à l'obligation de mise en garde.

Raychem n'a pas le droit d'invoquer le moyen de défense fondé sur l'intermédiaire compétent, qui constitue une exception à la règle générale voulant que les fabricants mettent le consommateur final en garde contre les dangers que présentent leurs produits. En général, ce moyen de défense s'appliquera seulement si le produit a une forte teneur technique et est destiné à être utilisé sous la surveillance d'un expert, ou si la nature du produit est telle qu'il n'est pas réaliste de penser que le consommateur recevra une mise en garde directe du fabricant. Le Thermaclad n'était pas un produit à forte teneur technique, et son utilisation et son application n'exigeaient pas la surveillance d'un expert. Il n'était pas non plus irréaliste de s'attendre à ce que Raychem prévienne directement BVHB, le consommateur final. Raychem avait à la fois la possibilité et l'obligation de mettre BVHB en garde directement et par conséquent, elle ne s'est pas acquittée de son obligation de mise en garde dans le cadre de ses communications avec SJSL.

Le lien de causalité est établi, selon une norme subjective ou une norme objective. Si un demandeur raisonnable ou BVHB elle-même avait été mis en garde, il aurait soit refusé d'utiliser le Thermaclad ou soit pris des mesures concernant l'inflammabilité de ce produit. La répartition de la faute en parts égales entre SJSL et Raychem ne doit pas être modifiée. Même si SJSL en savait peut-être moins sur les caractéristiques particulières du Thermaclad, elle avait plus de contacts avec BVHB et il est possible de prétendre qu'elle connaissait mieux les exigences réglementaires générales.

La perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat subie par HOOL et BVI ne donne pas lieu à indemnisation. Les défenderesses avaient une obligation de diligence prima facie envers BVI et HOOL. Elles connaissaient l'existence des demanderesses et d'autres personnes comme elles, et elles savaient ou auraient dû savoir que ces dernières risquaient de perdre de l'argent si la plate-forme de forage cessait de fonctionner. Cependant, cette obligation de diligence prima facie est annihilée par des considérations de principe. Le problème le plus sérieux est celui de la responsabilité indéterminée. Si les défenderesses avaient l'obligation de mettre en garde les demanderesses, il est difficile de voir pourquoi elles n'auraient pas la même obligation envers une foule d'autres personnes dont les pertes étaient prévisibles si la plate-forme cessait ses activités en raison des dommages subis. De plus, les faits de l'espèce ne increasing the defendants' potential liability would have led to different behaviour and avoidance of the loss. Nor was this a case where the plaintiff's ability to allocate the risk to the property owner by contract is slight, either because of the type of transaction or inequality of bargaining power. BVI and HOOL not only had the ability to allocate their risks, but did just that.

BVHB was contributorily negligent, as found by the courts below. The trial judge apportioned the majority of the fault to BVHB on the ground that its negligence in continuing to operate the heat trace system, even when unnecessary, outweighed the defendants' negligence. Since there was no demonstrable error in the trial judge's appreciation of the facts or applicable legal principles, his finding that the liability should be apportioned 60 percent to BVHB and 40 percent to the defendants Raychem and SJSL should not be disturbed.

BVHB's right to recover is not barred by its contributory negligence. The issues for resolution in this case are integrally connected with maritime matters, and fall to be resolved under Canadian maritime law. Policy considerations support the conclusion that maritime law governs the plaintiffs' tort claim, since the application of provincial laws to maritime torts would undercut the uniformity of maritime law. While the federal government has not passed contributory negligence legislation for maritime torts, the common law principles embodied in Canadian maritime law remain applicable in the absence of federal legislation. Although contributory negligence barred recovery at common law, the maritime contributory negligence bar should be removed. This is an appropriate case for this Court to make an incremental change to the common law in compliance with the requirements of justice and fairness. The proposed change falls within the test for judicial reform of the law which has been developed. First, the change is required to keep the maritime common law in step with the dynamic and evolving fabric of our society. Second, removal of the contributory negligence bar will not have unforeseeable or complex ramifications beyond the cognizance of the judiciary. The principle of apportionment justifient pas d'étendre la responsabilité en faveur de BVI et de HOOL à titre de moyen de dissuasion supplémentaire contre la négligence. Comme BVHB, le propriétaire de la plate-forme de forage, a subi des dommages matériels importants, il n'est pas évident que le fait d'accroître la responsabilité potentielle des défenderesses aurait amené un comportement différent et permis d'éviter la perte. Ce n'était pas non plus un cas où la capacité du demandeur de faire assumer le risque par le propriétaire du bien dans un contrat est faible, en raison soit du genre d'opération, soit de l'inégalité du pouvoir de négociation. Non seulement BVI et HOOL avaient-elles la capacité de répartir leurs risques; mais c'est exactement ce qu'elles ont fait.

Il y a eu négligence contributive de BVHB, ainsi que l'ont conclu les juridictions inférieures. Le juge de première instance a attribué la plus grande partie de la faute à BVHB pour le motif que la négligence dont celle-ci a fait montre en continuant de faire fonctionner le système de réchauffage des conduites, même lorsque ce n'était pas nécessaire, l'emportait sur la négligence des défenderesses. Comme le juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur démontrable dans l'appréciation des faits ou des principes juridiques applicables, il n'y a pas lieu de modifier sa conclusion selon laquelle la responsabilité devrait être attribuée dans une proportion de 60 pour 100 à BVHB et dans une proportion de 40 pour 100 aux défenderesses Raychem et SJSL.

La négligence contributive de BVHB ne fait pas obstacle au droit de celle-ci d'être indemnisée. Les questions qui se posent en l'espèce relèvent intégralement du domaine maritime et doivent être tranchées en vertu du droit maritime canadien. Des considérations de principe viennent étayer la conclusion selon laquelle le droit maritime régit la réclamation fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle excercée par les demanderesses, car l'application des lois provinciales aux délits en matière maritime nuirait à l'uniformité du droit maritime. Bien que le gouvernement fédéral n'ait pas adopté de loi concernant la négligence contributive en matière de délits maritimes, les principes de common law incorporés dans le droit maritime canadien restent applicables en l'absence de législation fédérale. Même si, en common law, la négligence contributive constituait une fin de non-recevoir à l'indemnisation, la fin de non-recevoir tirée de la négligence contributive en matière maritime devrait être abolie. Il s'agit d'un cas où il convient que notre Cour apporte un changement progressif à la common law conformément aux exigences de la justice et de l'équité. Le changement proposé satisfait au critère élaboré en ce qui concerne la réforme du droit par les tribunaux. Premièrement, le changement est nécessaire pour for non-maritime torts is universally accepted in every part of Canada and around the world. Contributory negligence may reduce recovery but does not bar the plaintiff's claim. The defendants SJSL and Raychem are jointly and severally liable to the plaintiff BVHB for 40 percent of its loss, subject to a right of contribution between defendants.

SJSL is not liable to BVHB in contract since the contractual issues have been settled and are no longer litigable.

que la common law en matière maritime suive l'évolution et le dynamisme de la société. Deuxièmement, l'abolition de la fin de non-recevoir tirée de la négligence contributive n'aura pas de conséquences imprévisibles ou complexes qui échappent aux tribunaux. Le principe de la répartition en matière de délits non maritimes est accepté universellement, partout au Canada et à travers le monde. La négligence contributive peut réduire l'indemnité, mais elle ne constitue pas une fin de non-recevoir à la réclamation présentée par la demanderesse. Les défenderesses SJSL et Raychem sont solidairement responsables envers la demanderesse BVHB de 40 pour 100 de la perte subie par cette dernière, sous réserve du droit de chacune des défenderesses de demander une contribution à l'autre.

SJSL n'est pas responsable envers BVHB en matière contractuelle puisque les questions d'ordre contractuel ont été réglées et ne sont plus litigieuses.

I. Introduction

1 On April 21, 1987, a fire broke out on the Bow Drill III, which was drilling for oil on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland. The Bow Drill III suffered major damage. Extensive repairs were required and the companies which had contracted for the lease of the rig suffered financial loss while it was out of commission. At issue in this appeal is the legal responsibility for the damages and the extent of the damages recoverable. Among the more interesting legal issues are the applicability of contributory negligence principles under Canadian maritime law and the recovery of damages for contractual relational economic loss.

II. Facts

2 In the early 1980s, Husky Oil Operations Ltd. ("HOOL") and Bow Valley Industries Ltd. ("BVI") decided to take advantage of a drilling opportunity off the east coast of Canada. They purchased one oil rig and made arrangements to have two others constructed. To this end, a subsidiary of BVI contracted with Saint John Shipbuilding Limited ("SJSL") for the construction of the drilling rig Bow Drill III.

LE JUGE MCLACHLIN (dissidente en partie) —

I. Introduction

Le 21 avril 1987, un incendie s'est déclaré à bord de la plate-forme de forage Bow Drill III, utilisée pour la recherche de pétrole sur les Grands Bancs de Terre-Neuve. La plate-forme a subi des dommages considérables, qui ont nécessité des réparations importantes, et les sociétés qui l'avaient louée par contrat ont subi une perte financière pendant qu'elle était hors-service. Le présent pourvoi consiste à déterminer qui est responsable en droit des dommages et quelle est l'étendue des dommages indemnisables. Parmi les points de droit soulevant le plus d'intérêt, mentionnons l'applicabilité des principes de la négligence contributive en droit maritime canadien et l'indemnisation des dommages en cas de perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat.

II. Les faits

Au début des années 1980, la société Husky Oil Operations Ltd. («HOOL») et la société Bow Valley Industries Ltd. («BVI») ont décidé de profiter des possibilités de forage qui s'offraient à elles au large de la côte est du Canada. Elles ont acheté une plate-forme pétrolière et pris des dispositions pour en faire construire deux autres. À cette fin, une filiale de BVI a passé un contrat avec la société Saint John Shipbuilding Limited («SJSL») pour la construction de la plate-forme de forage Bow Drill III.

1997 CanLII 307 (SCC)

In order to take advantage of Export Development Corporation financing, HOOL and BVI incorporated an offshore company, Bow Valley Husky (Bermuda) Ltd. ("BVHB"). Before construction of Bow Drill III began, ownership of the rig was transferred to BVHB, and the contract with SJSL for the construction of the rig was assigned to BVHB. HOOL and BVI entered into contracts with BVHB for the hire of Bow Drill III to conduct drilling operations at sites chosen by HOOL and BVI. These contracts were for four years (with an optional extension for a further year), and provided that HOOL and BVI would continue to pay day rates to BVHB in the event that the rig was out of service.

3 Dans le but de tirer avantage du financement de la Société pour l'expansion des exportations, HOOL et BVI ont constitué, à l'étranger, une société appelée Bow Valley Husky (Bermuda) Ltd. («BVHB»). Avant le début des travaux de construction de la plate-forme Bow Drill III, la propriété de celle-ci a été transférée à BVHB, et le contrat passé avec SJSL pour la construction de la plate-forme a été cédé à BVHB. HOOL et BVI ont conclu des contrats avec BVHB pour la location de la plate-forme Bow Drill III en vue d'opérations de forage sur des sites choisis par les premières. Il s'agissait de contrats d'une durée de quatre ans (assortis d'une possibilité de prolongation pour une année supplémentaire), qui stipulaient que HOOL et BVI continueraient de payer un taux journalier à BVHB dans le cas où la plate-forme serait hors-service.

A heat trace system was required in order to prepare the rig for winter operation. The purpose of a heat trace system is to prevent the rig's pipes or "mud lines" from freezing. The heat trace system SJSL originally started to install was changed to the Raychem system at the owner's request. BVHB chose the Raychem system after consultation with Raychem representatives because it had a self-regulating heater. Raychem's heat trace system used Thermaclad wrap to keep moisture from the insulation and heat trace wire. The specifications for the Raychem heat trace system required the installation of a ground fault circuit breaker ("GFCB") system. The purpose of the GFCB system was to cut off the power in the event of an electrical fault, to prevent arcing of the heat trace wire. The GFCB system initially installed by SJSL was unsuitable. A functioning GFCB system was not installed on the rig until after the incident that forms the basis of this case.

4 Il fallait installer un système de réchauffage des conduites afin de préparer la plate-forme pour l'hiver. Un tel système vise à empêcher les tuyaux de la plate-forme ou «conduites de boue» flexibles de geler. Celui que SJSL avait commencé à installer à l'origine a été remplacé par le système de la société Raychem («Raychem») à la demande du propriétaire. BVHB a choisi ce système après avoir consulté des représentants de Raychem parce qu'il était muni d'un réchauffeur autoréglable. Le système de réchauffage des conduites de Raychem utilisait le revêtement Thermaclad pour protéger de l'humidité l'isolant et le câble de réchauffage des conduites. Les caractéristiques techniques du système de réchauffage des conduites de Raychem exigeaient l'installation d'un système de disjoncteur de fuite à la terre «DFT». Ce système DFT avait pour but de couper le courant en cas de défectuosité du système électrique afin d'éviter que le câble de réchauffage des conduites ne provoque des arcs électriques. Le système DFT installé initialement par SJSL ne convenait pas. C'est seulement après l'incident à l'origine de la présente affaire qu'on a installé sur la plate-forme un système DFT efficace.

On April 21, 1987, during the drilling of an exploratory well on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, a fire broke out on Bow Drill III. The fire caused damage to a tray of cables that held in excess of 300 electrical and communications cables. As a result, the rig had to be towed to port for repairs and was out of service for several months.

6 BVHB, HOOL and BVI commenced an action against SJSL alleging breach of contract and negligence, and an action against Raychem for negligence. BVHB claimed both for the cost of the repairs to the rig and for the revenue lost as a result of the rig being out of service for several months. HOOL and BVI sought to recover the day rates that they were contractually required to pay to BVHB during the period the rig was out of service, as well as expenses they incurred for supplies to the rig, including food, drilling mud and additional equipment.

III. Judgments Below

A. Supreme Court of Newfoundland, Trial Division

7 At trial (1994), 118 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 271, Riche J. held that the fire started when an electrical fault occurred in the heat trace wire, causing an arc in the heat trace system. The arcing occurred because no GFCB system was being used at that time. Riche J. held that it was likely the Thermaclad caught fire, which then caused an oily residue on the cables to catch fire. He concluded that as the fire spread much more than would be expected with Thermaclad alone, the fire must have been assisted by residue in the cable tray. Riche J. determined that the plaintiffs had not proven that the heat tracing and wrap on the pipe had been installed by SJSL or Raychem.

forme de forage Bow Drill III. L'incendie a causé des dommages à un chemin de câbles qui portait plus de 300 câbles électriques et de transmission. Par conséquent, la plate-forme a dû être remorquée jusqu'au port pour être réparée et elle a été hors-service durant plusieurs mois.

BVHB, HOOL et BVI ont pris action contre SJSL pour négligence et rupture de contrat et contre Raychem pour négligence. BVHB a réclamé à la fois le coût des réparations effectuées sur la plate-forme et la perte de revenus découlant de la mise hors-service de la plate-forme durant plusieurs mois. HOOL et BVI ont demandé d'être indemnisées du taux journalier qu'elles avaient été tenues, en vertu du contrat, de payer à BVHB pendant que la plate-forme était hors-service, ainsi que des dépenses qu'elles avaient faites pour approvisionner la plate-forme, notamment en nourriture, en boue de forage et en matériel supplémentaire.

III. Les décisions des juridictions inférieures

A. La Section de première instance de la Cour suprême de Terre-Neuve

Au procès (1994), 118 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 271, le juge Riche a statué que l'incendie avait commencé lorsqu'une défectuosité du système électrique s'était produite dans le câble de réchauffage des conduites, causant un arc électrique dans le système de réchauffage des conduites. L'arc électrique s'était produit parce qu'aucun système DFT n'était utilisé à l'époque. Le juge Riche a conclu qu'il était probable que le Thermaclad avait pris feu, ce qui avait amené un résidu d'huile se trouvant sur les câbles à prendre feu à son tour. Comme la croissance du foyer était très supérieure à celle à laquelle on se serait attendu s'il avait été alimenté par le Thermaclad seulement, il a conclu que la présence du résidu dans le chemin de câbles avait dû contribuer à l'incendie. Le juge Riche a décidé que les demanderesses n'avaient pas prouvé que le système de réchauffage des conduites et le revêtement enveloppant les tuyaux avaient été installés par SJSL ou Raychem.

1997 CanLII 307 (SCC)

Riche J. found that BVHB had assumed responsibility for the installation of a functioning GFCB system, and that BVHB was negligent: in continuing to operate the heat tracing system without ground fault protection; in allowing the cables to accumulate the oily residue; and, in the absence of evidence that the fault for the arcing rested on someone else, for the defects in the wire or junction box that had caused the arc. Riche J. found that HOOL and BVI shared in the contributory negligence of BVHB as they were informed during construction of the need for ground fault protection. Alternatively, had HOOL and BVI not known of the need for ground fault protection, Riche J. would have found them negligent on the ground that BVHB, HOOL and BVI were involved in a joint venture.

8 Le juge Riche a dit que BVHB avait assumé la responsabilité de l'installation d'un système DFT efficace et qu'elle avait été négligente en continuant de faire fonctionner le système de réchauffage des conduites sans la protection d'un disjoncteur de fuite à la terre ainsi qu'en permettant l'accumulation d'un résidu d'huile sur les câbles, et en l'absence d'une preuve établissant que l'arc électrique était imputable à la faute de quelqu'un d'autre, relativement aux défectuosités du câble ou de la boîte de jonction qui avaient été à l'origine de l'arc électrique. Le juge Riche a statué que HOOL et BVI avaient participé à la négligence contributive de BVHB, car elles avaient été informées, au cours de la construction, de la nécessité de recourir à la protection d'un disjoncteur de fuite à la terre. Subsidiairement, si HOOL et BVI n'avaient pas été au courant de la nécessité de recourir à la protection d'un tel disjoncteur, le juge Riche aurait conclu à leur négligence pour le motif que BVHB, HOOL et BVI participaient à une entreprise conjointe.

Riche J. found that all parties were aware of the inflammability of the Thermaclad. He held that the defendant SJSL was liable in contract and tort for failing to provide certificates of approval for the Thermaclad, and in tort for breach of duty to warn of the inflammability of Thermaclad. He also held that the defendant Raychem was liable in tort for breach of its duty to warn. He found that the contract between SJSL and BVHB did not negate BVHB's right to sue for negligence or breach of contract for failure to provide certificates of approval for Thermaclad, or for negligent failure to warn. Riche J. went on to hold that the major fault lay with BVHB for its operation of the heat trace system without a functioning GFCB system. It knew that arcing could occur and that it could cause fires. Moreover, it kept the heat trace system on, even when it might not have been required, despite incidents of arcing on the heat trace wires. In the result, Riche J. apportioned the fault 60 percent to the plaintiffs and 40 percent to SJSL and 9 Le juge Riche a conclu que toutes les parties étaient au courant de l'inflammabilité du Thermaclad. Il a retenu la responsabilité contractuelle et délictuelle de la défenderesse SJSL pour le motif qu'elle n'a pas fourni de certificats d'approbation concernant le Thermaclad et, il a reconnu sa responsabilité délictuelle parce qu'elle a manqué à l'obligation de prévenir les parties concernées de l'inflammabilité du Thermaclad. Il a également conclu à la responsabilité délictuelle de la défenderesse Raychem parce qu'elle a manqué à son obligation de mise en garde. Il a jugé que le contrat entre SJSL et BVHB ne faisait pas échec au droit de BVHB d'intenter des poursuites pour négligence ou rupture de contrat en raison du défaut de fournir des certificats d'approbation à l'égard du Thermaclad ou pour défaut par négligence de faire une mise en garde. Le juge Riche a ensuite conclu qu'il fallait imputer la faute principale à BVHB qui a fait fonctionner le système de réchauffage des conduites sans un système DFT efficace. Elle savait qu'il pouvait se produire un arc électrique susceptible de causer un incendie. De plus, elle a laissé fonctionner le système de réchauffage des conduites, même lorsque cela n'était peut-être pas Raychem. He did not award damages for breach of contract.

10 However, Riche J. dismissed the plaintiffs' claim on the ground that the case arose out of negligence at sea and was governed by Canadian maritime law, which precluded application of the Newfoundland Contributory Negligence Act, R.S.N. 1990, c. C-33, and made contributory negligence a bar to recovery. In supplementary reasons, (1994), 120 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 228, Riche J. held that if the Newfoundland Contributory Negligence Act did apply, he would have apportioned the liability of Raychem and SJSL equally, making each 20 percent responsible.

B. Newfoundland Court of Appeal

11 The Newfoundland Court of Appeal, (1995), 130 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 92, per Cameron J.A., began by finding that the trial judge's conclusions with respect to the origins of the fire should not be disturbed. However, it rejected the trial judge's conclusion that there was a joint venture between HOOL and BVI with respect to the Bow Drill III, and held further there was no basis for lifting the corporate veil and denying the separate legal identities of the three corporations.

12 Cameron J.A. upheld the trial judge's finding that BVHB had been contributorily negligent, although she rejected Riche J.'s finding that BVHB was negligent with respect to the existence of the oily residue on the cables. She held that the damage suffered by BVHB was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of BVHB's failure to use a GFCB system.

13 With respect to SJSL's failure to provide certificates of approval, Cameron J.A. held that through nécessaire, malgré le fait que des arcs électriques s'étaient produits sur les câbles de réchauffage des conduites. Le juge Riche a donc réparti la faute dans une proportion de 60 pour 100 aux demanderesses et de 40 pour 100 à SJSL et à Raychem. Il n'a pas accordé de dommages-intérêts pour rupture de contrat.

Toutefois, le juge Riche a débouté les demanderesses pour le motif que l'affaire résultait d'une négligence commise en mer et était régie par le droit maritime canadien, ce qui excluait l'application de la Contributory Negligence Act, R.S.N. 1990, ch. C-33, de Terre-Neuve, et faisait de la négligence contributive une fin de non-recevoir à toute demande d'indemnisation. Dans des motifs supplémentaires, (1994), 120 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 228, le juge Riche a statué que, si la Contributory Negligence Act de Terre-Neuve s'était appliquée, il aurait réparti la responsabilité également entre Raychem et SJSL, c'est-à-dire en leur imputant chacune 20 pour 100.

B. La Cour d'appel de Terre-Neuve

La Cour d'appel de Terre-Neuve (1995), 130 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 92, sous la plume du juge Cameron, a d'abord statué que les conclusions du juge de première instance relativement à l'origine de l'incendie ne devraient pas être modifiées. Cependant, elle a rejeté sa conclusion qu'il existait une entreprise conjointe entre HOOL et BVI en ce qui concerne la plate-forme de forage Bow Drill III, et elle a en outre déclaré que rien ne justifiait de lever le voile de la personnalité morale et de nier l'identité juridique distincte des trois sociétés.

Le juge Cameron a confirmé la conclusion tirée par le juge de première instance, qui a reconnu la négligence contributive de BVHB, mais elle a rejeté sa conclusion voulant que BVHB ait fait preuve de négligence relativement à l'existence du résidu d'huile sur les câbles. Elle a statué que les dommages subis par BVHB étaient une conséquence raisonnablement prévisible de la non-utilisation par BVHB d'un système DFT.

Quant au défaut de SJSL de fournir des certificats d'approbation, le juge Cameron a conclu que, an exchange of letters and cheques in November 1985, the parties had reached an accord and satisfaction disposing of their respective rights under the contract. Therefore, BVHB had no basis for a claim of breach of contract. Cameron J.A. declined to disturb the trial judge's finding that BVHB's representatives made the decision to use the Raychem system, including the Thermaclad. It followed that Thermaclad was "owner directed supply" for which the contract excluded recovery. Cameron J.A. further held that SJSL's provision of Thermaclad was not a negligent act.

par un échange de lettres et de chèques en novembre 1985, il y avait eu accord et satisfaction entre les parties réglant la question de leurs droits respectifs en vertu du contrat. Par conséquent, BVHB n'était nullement justifiée de prétendre qu'il y avait eu rupture de contrat. Le juge Cameron a refusé de modifier la conclusion du juge de première instance selon laquelle les représentants de BVHB avaient décidé d'utiliser le système de Raychem, y compris le Thermaclad. En conséquence, le Thermaclad était du «matériel imposé par le propriétaire» pour lequel le contrat excluait toute indemnisation. Le juge Cameron a de plus statué que la fourniture du Thermaclad par SJSL n'était pas un acte négligent.

Cameron J.A. confirmed that both Raychem and SJSL had a duty to warn BVHB about the inflammability of Thermaclad, and that the duty had not been discharged. She rejected Raychem's argument that it could rely on the learned intermediary exception. Although Raychem and SJSL had no duty to warn HOOL or BVI, SJSL and Raychem owed HOOL and BVI a duty of care that was breached by their failure to warn BVHB. However, because the loss suffered by HOOL and BVI was economic in nature, it was not recoverable.

14 Le juge Cameron a confirmé que tant Raychem que SJSL avaient l'obligation de mettre BVHB en garde contre l'inflammabilité du Thermaclad et qu'elles ne s'étaient pas acquittées de cette obligation. Elle a rejeté l'argument de Raychem selon lequel cette dernière pouvait invoquer l'exception fondée sur l'intermédiaire compétent. Même si Raychem et SJSL n'étaient pas tenues de mettre en garde HOOL ni BVI, les premières avaient envers les secondes une obligation de diligence qui n'a pas été respectée en raison de leur omission de mettre BVHB en garde. Cependant, comme la perte subie par HOOL et BVI était de nature économique, elle ne pouvait donner lieu à indemnisation.

Despite reversing some of the trial judge's findings with respect to liability, the Court of Appeal did not consider it necessary to change his apportionment of liability.

15 Même si elle a infirmé certaines des conclusions du juge de première instance relativement à la responsabilité, la Cour d'appel n'a pas estimé nécessaire de modifier la façon dont il avait réparti la responsabilité.

The Court of Appeal agreed with Riche J. that maritime law applied. Nevertheless it held that provincial negligence legislation applied to maritime cases in some situations, including this case. Alternatively, if the Newfoundland Contributory Negligence Act did not apply, the court held that maritime law no longer made contributory negligence a bar to recovery. In the result, BVHB was held entitled to recover 40 percent of its loss from SJSL and Raychem.

16 La Cour d'appel a convenu avec le juge Riche que le droit maritime s'appliquait. Néanmoins, elle a conclu que la législation provinciale relative à la négligence s'appliquait aux affaires maritimes dans certaines situations, dont le présent cas. Subsidiairement, pour le cas où la Contributory Negligence Act de Terre-Neuve ne s'appliquerait pas, la cour a statué que la négligence contributive ne constituait plus une fin de non-recevoir à toute demande d'indemnisation en droit maritime. Par conséquent, elle a jugé que BVHB avait le droit d'être indem-

IV. Issues

17 (1) Are the defendants liable to the plaintiffs in tort?

(a) Did the circumstances impose on SJSL and Raychem a duty to warn BVHB of the risks associated with using Thermaclad?

(b) Was SJSL's duty to warn excluded by its contract with BVHB?

(c) Is Raychem entitled to rely on the "learned intermediary" defence?

(d) Is causation established?

(e) How should fault be allocated between SJSL and Raychem?

(f) Did SJSL and Raychem owe BVI and HOOL a duty to warn? (Recovery of contractual relational economic loss)

(g) Was BVHB contributorily negligent?

(h) Does BVHB's contributory negligence bar its claims?

(2) Is SJSL liable to BVHB in contract?

IV. Les questions en litige

(1) Les défenderesses sont-elles responsables envers les demanderesses en matière délictuelle?

a) Dans les circonstances, SJSL et Raychem avaient-elles l'obligation de mettre BVHB en garde contre les risques liés à l'utilisation du Thermaclad?

b) L'obligation de mise en garde de SJSL était-elle écartée en raison du contrat conclu avec BVHB?

c) Raychem a-t-elle le droit d'invoquer le moyen de défense fondé sur «l'intermédiaire compétent»?

d) A-t-on prouvé l'existence d'un lien de causalité?

e) Comment faudrait-il répartir la faute entre SJSL et Raychem?

f) SJSL et Raychem avaient-elles l'obligation de mettre en garde HOOL et BVI? (Indemnisation de la perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat)

g) Y a-t-il eu négligence contributive de BVHB?

h) La négligence contributive de BVHB constitue-t-elle une fin de non-recevoir à ses réclamations?

(2) SJSL est-elle responsable envers BVHB en matière contractuelle?

V. Les défenderesses sont-elles responsables envers les demanderesses en matière délictuelle?

A. Dans les circonstances, SJSL et Raychem avaient-elles l'obligation de mettre BVHB en garde contre les risques liés à l'utilisation du Thermaclad?

SJSL et Raychem soutiennent que la Cour d'appel a fait erreur en concluant qu'elles avaient l'obligation de mettre BVHB en garde contre les

SJSL argues that in order for a duty to warn to arise, there must be an "informational imbalance" between the manufacturer or supplier and the party who is owed the warning. SJSL submits that the plaintiff BVHB knew as much about the inflammability of the Thermaclad as it did.

dangers du Thermaclad. Selon SJSL, pour que cette obligation prenne naissance, il doit exister un «déséquilibre informationnel» entre le fabricant ou le fournisseur et la partie à laquelle doit être faite la mise en garde. SJSL affirme que la demanderesse BVHB en savait autant qu'elle sur l'inflammabilité du Thermaclad.

The law may be simply stated. Manufacturers and suppliers are required to warn all those who may reasonably be affected by potentially dangerous products: Lambert v. Lastoplex Chemicals Co., [1972] S.C.R. 569, and Hollis v. Dow Corning Corp., [1995] 4 S.C.R. 634. This duty extends even to those persons who are not party to the contract of sale: Rivtow Marine Ltd. v. Washington Iron Works, [1974] S.C.R. 1189. The potential user must be reasonably foreseeable to the manufacturer or supplier — manufacturers and suppliers (including a builder-supplier like SJSL) do not have the duty to warn the entire world about every danger that can result from improper use of their product.

19 Le droit peut être énoncé de façon simple sur ce point. Les fabricants et les fournisseurs ont l'obligation de mettre en garde tous ceux qui peuvent être raisonnablement concernés par des produits potentiellement dangereux: Lambert c. Lastoplex Chemicals Co., [1972] R.C.S. 569, et Hollis c. Dow Corning Corp., [1995] 4 R.C.S. 634. Cette obligation s'étend même aux personnes qui ne sont pas parties au contrat de vente: Rivtow Marine Ltd. c. Washington Iron Works, [1974] R.C.S. 1189. Le fabricant ou le fournisseur doit pouvoir raisonnablement prévoir qui sera l'utilisateur — les fabricants et les fournisseurs (y compris un constructeur-fournisseur comme SJSL) n'ont pas l'obligation de mettre en garde le monde entier contre tout danger susceptible de résulter d'un usage inapproprié de leur produit.

The plaintiff BVHB was clearly within the class of persons that SJSL and Raychem ought to have known might reasonably be affected by the use of Thermaclad. SJSL was in a contractual relationship with BVHB, and Raychem had directly approached BVHB's predecessor (a subsidiary of BVI) to encourage the use of its products in the construction of the rig.

20 La demanderesse BVHB faisait manifestement partie de la catégorie des personnes qui, comme SJSL et Raychem auraient dû le savoir, pouvaient raisonnablement être concernées par l'utilisation du Thermaclad. SJSL avait des rapports contractuels avec BVHB, et Raychem avait communiqué directement avec la société remplacée par BVHB (une filiale de BVI) pour l'inciter à utiliser ses produits durant la construction de la plate-forme.

The defendant SJSL submits that there is an additional requirement for a duty to warn: a knowledge imbalance between the manufacturer or supplier and the consumer. It goes on to argue that since BVHB knew about the inflammability of Thermaclad no duty to warn arose. The Court of Appeal held that knowledge may be a defence, but only where the plaintiff can be viewed as accepting the risk (volenti non fit injuria).

21 La défenderesse SJSL soutient qu'une autre condition doit être remplie pour faire naître l'obligation de mise en garde: il doit y avoir un déséquilibre informationnel entre le fabricant ou le fournisseur et le consommateur. Elle prétend également que, comme BVHB était au courant de l'inflammabilité du Thermaclad, aucune obligation de mise en garde n'a pris naissance. La Cour d'appel a jugé que la connaissance peut constituer un moyen de défense, mais seulement lorsqu'il est possible de considérer que le demandeur a accepté le risque (volenti non fit injuria).

22 I agree with the Court of Appeal that knowledge that there may be a risk in some circumstances does not negate a duty to warn. Liability for failure to warn is based not merely on a knowledge imbalance. If that were so every person with knowledge would be under a duty to warn. It is based primarily on the manufacture or supply of products intended for the use of others and the reliance that consumers reasonably place on the manufacturer and supplier. Unless the consumer's knowledge negates reasonable reliance, the manufacturer or supplier remains liable. This occurs where the consumer has so much knowledge that a reasonable person would conclude that the consumer fully appreciated and willingly assumed the risk posed by use of the product, making the maxim volenti non fit injuria applicable: Lambert, supra.

Je suis d'accord avec la Cour d'appel pour dire que le fait de savoir qu'il peut exister un risque dans certaines circonstances ne supprime pas l'obligation de mise en garde. La responsabilité pour manquement à l'obligation de mise en garde n'est pas fondée uniquement sur le déséquilibre informationnel. Si tel était le cas, toute personne possédant de l'information serait soumise à une obligation de mise en garde. Cette responsabilité prend appui principalement sur la fabrication ou la fourniture de produits destinés à l'usage d'autrui et sur la confiance légitimement accordée au fabricant et au fournisseur par le consommateur. À moins que les connaissances du consommateur n'écartent cette confiance, le fabricant ou le fournisseur reste responsable. C'est le cas lorsque le consommateur est à ce point renseigné qu'une personne raisonnable conclurait qu'il a pleinement apprécié et volontairement accepté le risque que présentait l'utilisation du produit, rendant ainsi applicable la maxime volenti non fit injuria: Lambert, précité.

23 The evidence establishes that the plaintiff BVHB knew that Thermaclad would burn under some circumstances. The defendants SJSL and Raychem, however, had much more detailed knowledge of the specific inflammability characteristics of the Thermaclad. Raychem gained this knowledge through its own testing as manufacturer. SJSL gained it through its request to Raychem for information on Thermaclad's inflammability. BVHB did not have the degree of knowledge necessary to negate reliance on SJSL and Raychem. SJSL and Raychem did not demonstrate that BVHB accepted the risk of using Thermaclad. It follows that both SJSL and Raychem owed BVHB a duty to warn, subject to the special defences raised by SJSL and Raychem, to which I now turn.

Il ressort de la preuve que la demanderesse BVHB savait que le Thermaclad brûle dans certaines circonstances. Cependant, les défenderesses SJSL et Raychem possédaient des connaissances beaucoup plus précises sur les caractéristiques d'inflammabilité du Thermaclad. Raychem les a acquises en effectuant ses propres essais en tant que fabricant. SJSL s'est renseignée en demandant à Raychem de lui fournir de l'information sur l'inflammabilité du Thermaclad. BVHB ne possédait pas suffisamment de connaissances pour exclure la confiance mise en SJSL et Raychem. SJSL et Raychem n'ont pas montré que BVHB avait accepté le risque que présentait l'utilisation du Thermaclad. Il s'ensuit que SJSL et Raychem étaient toutes deux tenues d'une obligation de mise en garde au profit de BVHB, sous réserve des moyens de défense particuliers soulevés par SJSL et Raychem, que je vais maintenant examiner.

B. Was SJSL's Duty to Warn Excluded by Its Contract With BVHB?

B. L'obligation de mise en garde de SJSL était-elle écartée en raison du contrat conclu avec BVHB?

les circonstances est annihilée par le contrat entre les parties. Le juge de première instance a rejeté cet argument, tout comme la Cour d'appel, pour le motif que les clauses du contrat ne traitaient pas de l'obligation de mise de garde de SJSL et n'avaient aucune incidence sur cette obligation. Je suis d'accord.

SJSL relies on clauses 702, 905 and 907 of its contract with BVHB. Clause 702, under Article VII (Inspection), stipulates that upon delivery SJSL's "sole obligation with respect to the Vessel shall be as specified in Article IX" (Warranties). Clause 905 excludes claims for defects except as provided in the warranty provision:

SJSL s'appuie sur les clauses 702, 905 et 907 de son contrat avec BVHB. La clause 702, qui figure à l'article VII (Inspection), stipule qu'au moment de livraison, la [TRADUCTION] «seule obligation de [SJSL] en ce qui concerne le bâtiment est celle précisée à l'article IX» (Garanties). While BVHB's claim sounds in tort, the contract remains relevant to determining whether a tort duty arises, and if so, its scope. As this Court stated in BG Checo International Ltd. v. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 12, per La Forest and McLachlin JJ., parties are free to contract "to limit or waive the duties which the common law would impose on them for negligence" (pp. 26-27). However, "[i]n so far as the tort duty is not contradicted by the contract, it remains intact and may be sued upon" (p. 27).

Bien que la réclamation de BVHB soit fondée sur les règles de la responsabilité délictuelle, le contrat reste pertinent pour déterminer s'il existe une obligation en matière délictuelle et, si oui, quelle est son étendue. Comme notre Cour l'a déclaré dans l'arrêt BG Checo International Ltd. c. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, [1993] 1 R.C.S. 12 (les juges La Forest et McLachlin), les parties peuvent passer un contrat pour «limiter les obligations que la common law leur impose en matière de négligence, ou renoncer à celles-ci» (p. 27). Cependant, «[d]ans la mesure où le contrat ne déroge pas à l'obligation en 26

27 To borrow the language of La Forest J. in London Drugs Ltd. v. Kuehne & Nagel International Ltd., [1992] 3 S.C.R. 299, at p. 327, tort liability in a case such as this falls to be assessed in a contractual matrix. The parties' planned obligations must be given appropriate pre-eminence. Where those planned obligations negate tort liability, contract "trumps" tort: see J. Fleming, "Tort in a Contractual Matrix" (1993), 5 Canterbury L. Rev. 269, at p. 270, citing P. Cane, Tort Law and Economic Interests (1991), at p. 293. It follows that a tort claim cannot be used to escape an otherwise applicable contractual exclusion or limitation clause: Central Trust Co. v. Rafuse, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 147.

28 In order to determine the extent to which the parties' planned obligations affect their tort liabilities, it is necessary to ascertain the intention of the parties with respect to the particular issue from the contract documents as a whole: BG Checo, supra. In doing so, it must be kept in mind that generally limitation and exclusion clauses are strictly construed against the party seeking to invoke the clause: see e.g. Hunter Engineering Co. v. Syncrude Canada Ltd., [1989] 1 S.C.R. 426, per Wilson J., at p. 497.

29 The provisions of the contract relied on by SJSL do not directly address responsibility for negligence or duty to warn. While the absence of a term expressly excluding tort liability is not determinative, the contract provisions, considered as a whole, relate to the finding of and responsibility for defects. They function, as the label of Article IX states, as a "warranty" of workmanship and materials. More specifically, clauses 702, 905 and 907, taken in combination, provide that in situations of "owner directed supply", SJSL bears the responsabilité délictuelle, celle-ci demeure intacte et elle ouvre droit à un recours» (p. 27).

Pour utiliser les termes du juge La Forest dans l'arrêt London Drugs Ltd. c. Kuehne & Nagel International Ltd., [1992] 3 R.C.S. 299, à la p. 327, dans une affaire comme celle dont nous sommes saisis, on tend à évaluer la responsabilité délictuelle dans un cadre contractuel. Il faut accorder la prééminence appropriée aux obligations prévues par les parties. Lorsque ces obligations écartent toute responsabilité délictuelle, le contrat [TRADUCTION] «l'emporte sur» le délit: voir J. Fleming, «Tort in a Contractual Matrix» (1993), 5 Canterbury L. Rev. 269, à la p. 270, qui cite P. Cane, Tort Law and Economic Interests (1991), à la p. 293. Il s'ensuit que la réclamation fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle ne peut pas être utilisée pour échapper à une clause contractuelle exclusive ou limitative de responsabilité par ailleurs applicable: Central Trust Co. c. Rafuse, [1986] 2 R.C.S. 147.

Pour établir dans quelle mesure les obligations prévues par les parties influent sur leur responsabilité délictuelle, il faut dégager de l'ensemble des documents contractuels l'intention des parties en ce qui concerne la question particulière en jeu: BG Checo, précité. Ce faisant, il ne faut pas oublier que, généralement, les clauses de limitation ou d'exclusion sont interprétées de façon stricte à l'encontre de la partie qui les invoque: voir, par ex., Hunter Engineering Co. c. Syncrude Canada Ltd., [1989] 1 R.C.S. 426, le juge Wilson, à la p. 497.

Les clauses du contrat sur lesquelles s'appuie SJSL ne traitent pas directement de la responsabilité fondée sur la négligence ni de l'obligation de mise en garde. Bien que l'absence d'une condition excluant expressément la responsabilité délictuelle ne soit pas déterminante, prises dans leur ensemble, les clauses du contrat se rapportent à la constatation des vices et à la responsabilité engagée à ce titre. Elles jouent le rôle d'une «garantie» quant à la fabrication et aux matériaux, comme le mentionne l'article IX. Plus précisément, les clauses 702, 905 et 907, prises ensemble, prévoient que, dans le cas du «matériel imposé par le propriéresponsibility for installation while BVHB bears the responsibility for defects.

Warranties usually relate to the quality of goods and workmanship and do not relate to warnings about the risks associated with the use of products. In University of Regina v. Pettick (1991), 45 C.L.R. 1, a majority of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal dismissed a contractor's argument that a one-year warranty it gave to the owner excluded any liability that it might have in tort. In concluding that a warranty does not necessarily exclude tort liability, Sherstobitoff J.A. stated (at pp. 52-53):

> There is nothing in a warranty by itself that suggests that further liability should be excluded. The warranty is a bargain that holds the contractor liable irrespective of negligence for a period of time. A tort claim requires proof of negligence. That it should continue beyond the warranty period does not interfere with the legitimate expectations of the parties as to their contractual relationship.

Without concluding decisively that warranty provisions could never negative a duty to warn, it may be noted that we have been referred to no case in which a warranty like that set out in Articles VII and IX was found to limit tort liability for duty to warn.

This case is distinguishable from Giffels Associates Ltd. v. Eastern Construction Co., [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1346, where a warranty coupled with a provision excluding liability for "all claims by the Owner" except those under the warranty (p. 1351) was held to exclude recovery for negligence in "the performance of the contract" (pp. 1354-55). First, the wording of clause 702 (obligations "with respect to the Vessel") is narrower than the wording of the contract in Giffels ("all claims by the Owner"). Second, the claim in Giffels was for damage due to faulty workmanship, which was specifically covered by the warranty clauses. The tort claim constituted an attempt to avoid express taire», SJSL est responsable de l'installation tandis que BVHB est responsable des vices.

30 Les garanties portent habituellement sur la qualité des marchandises et de leur fabrication et non sur les mises en garde concernant les risques liés à leur utilisation. Dans University of Regina c. Pettick (1991), 45 C.L.R. 1, la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan a rejeté, à la majorité, l'argument avancé par un entrepreneur selon lequel la garantie d'un an qu'il avait donnée au propriétaire excluait toute responsabilité qu'il pouvait avoir en matière délictuelle. Concluant que la garantie n'exclut pas nécessairement la responsabilité délictuelle, le juge Sherstobitoff a déclaré ce qui suit (aux pp. 52 et 53):

> [TRADUCTION] La garantie en elle-même n'implique nullement l'exclusion de toute responsabilité supplémentaire. La garantie est un marché par lequel l'entrepreneur engage sa responsabilité pendant une période donnée, sans égard à la négligence. Dans une action en responsabilité délictuelle il faut prouver la négligence. Que cela se poursuive au-delà de la période de garantie ne frustre pas les attentes légitimes des parties relativement à leurs rapports contractuels.

Sans conclure de façon décisive que les clauses relatives à la garantie ne peuvent jamais écarter l'obligation de mise en garde, il convient de souligner qu'on ne nous a cité aucune affaire dans laquelle on aurait statué qu'une garantie analogue à celle énoncée aux articles VII et IX limitait la responsabilité délictuelle fondée sur l'obligation de mise en garde.

31 La présente affaire se distingue de l'arrêt Giffels Associates Ltd. c. Eastern Construction Co., [1978] 2 R.C.S. 1346, où une garantie, conjuguée à une clause stipulant que «le propriétaire renonce à toute réclamation» autre que celles prévues par la garantie (p. 1351), a été considérée comme excluant l'indemnisation pour négligence dans «l'exécution du contrat» (pp. 1354 et 1355). Premièrement, le texte de la clause 702 (obligations «relatives au navire») est plus limitatif que celui du contrat dans l'arrêt Giffels («le propriétaire renonce à toute réclamation»). Deuxièmement, dans Giffels, la réclamation portait sur les dommages résultant de vices de construction, qui contractual exclusions, something that cannot be done: see Central Trust, supra. BVHB's claim against SJSL, by contrast, is not for negligence relating to the choice of, installation of, or defects in, the Thermaclad or other materials, but for failure to warn of the inflammability of Thermaclad. SJSL's duty to warn arose independently of the contract, through its greater knowledge of the inflammability characteristics of Thermaclad: see e.g. Rivtow, supra, at pp. 1207 and 1214, and, more generally, Queen v. Cognos Inc., [1993] 1 S.C.R. 87.

étaient expressément couverts par les clauses relatives à la garantie. La réclamation en matière délictuelle constituait une tentative en vue d'éluder les exclusions expressément prévues par le contrat, chose qu'il n'est pas possible de faire: voir Central Trust, précité. Par contraste, la réclamation de BVHB contre SJSL n'est pas fondée sur la négligence dans le choix du Thermaclad ou d'autres matériaux, leur installation ou des vices dont ils seraient affectés, mais plutôt sur le défaut de mise en garde au sujet de l'inflammabilité du Thermaclad. L'obligation de mise en garde incombant à SJSL a pris naissance indépendamment du contrat et découlait du fait qu'elle était mieux informée des caractéristiques d'inflammabilité du Thermaclad: voir, par ex., Rivtow, précité, aux pp. 1207 et 1214, et, plus généralement, Queen c. Cognos Inc., [1993] 1 R.C.S. 87.

32 SJSL places special emphasis on the fact that Thermaclad was "owner directed supply". Clause 907, it submits, excludes all liability for owner-directed supply, including liability for breach of duty to warn of the risks associated with the use of a product. I do not read clause 907 as extending to duty to warn. The starting point in construing clause 907 is that it functions to exclude or exempt from liability. As such, it must be narrowly construed. With this in mind, one turns to the wording and context of the clause 907 exemption. The first thing to note is that it falls under Article IX, entitled "Warranties". This suggests, as argued earlier, that the parties intended clause 907 to apply to defects in materials and workmanship. The words of clause 907 are consistent with this interpretation. The words "owner directed supply" connote goods supplied, not damages that might flow from the inappropriate use of a product. The purpose of owner-directed supply clauses in the context of construction contract warranties is to narrow the scope of the warranty for owner-directed materials or "supply". The builder is not responsible for defects in the materials chosen by the owner, only for defective installation. This is fair, since the owner has directed the use of the materials. In this sense, SJSL limited its liability "for the choice of Thermaclad": per Cameron J.A., at p. 114. Through its contract, it stated that it would not be SJSL insiste tout particulièrement sur le fait que le Thermaclad constituait du «matériel imposé par le propriétaire». La clause 907, soutient-elle, exclut toute responsabilité dans le cas du matériel imposé par le propriétaire, y compris la responsabilité en cas de manquement à l'obligation de mise en garde contre les risques liés à l'utilisation d'un produit. J'estime que la clause 907 ne s'étend pas à l'obligation de mise en garde. Le point de départ de l'interprétation de la clause 907 est qu'elle vise à exclure la responsabilité ou à mettre en œuvre une exemption. Elle doit donc être interprétée de façon stricte. Cela établi, on passe au libellé et au contexte de l'exemption de la clause 907. La première chose qu'il convient de noter est qu'elle figure à l'article IX, intitulé «Garanties». Cela laisse supposer, ainsi qu'il a été avancé précédemment, que les parties entendaient que la clause 907 s'applique aux vices affectant les matériaux et la fabrication. Le libellé de la clause 907 est compatible avec cette interprétation. Les mots «matériel imposé par le propriétaire» suggèrent l'idée de marchandises fournies, non pas de dommages susceptibles de résulter de l'utilisation inadéquate d'un produit. Dans le contexte des garanties prévues par les contrats de construction, les clauses relatives au matériel imposé par le propriétaire ont pour objectif de limiter la portée de la garantie de ces matériaux. Le constructeur n'est pas responsa-liable for defects in the product supplied. Clause 907, however, does not address the quite different problem of whether, in all the circumstances, SJSL was under a duty to warn BVHB of the fire risks associated with the use of Thermaclad. That duty arose independently of the contract. It is grounded not in the contract but in SJSL's particular knowledge of the inflammability of Thermaclad.

ble des vices des matériaux choisis par le propriétaire, il répond seulement de leur installation. C'est équitable, puisque c'est le propriétaire qui a ordonné l'utilisation des matériaux. En ce sens, SJSL a limité sa responsabilité [TRADUCTION] «quant au choix du Thermaclad»: le juge Cameron, à la p. 114. Par contrat, elle a stipulé qu'elle ne serait pas responsable des vices affectant le produit fourni. Cependant, la clause 907 n'aborde pas la question tout à fait différente de savoir si, dans les circonstances, SJSL avait l'obligation de mettre BVHB en garde contre les risques liés à l'utilisation du Thermaclad. Cette obligation a pris naissance indépendamment du contrat. Elle est fondée non pas sur le contrat mais sur les renseignements particuliers que possède SJSL sur l'inflammabilité du Thermaclad.

To put it another way, clause 907 addresses defects in products or their installation. If BVHB alleged that the Thermaclad supplied was defective, clause 907 would provide a complete defence. But BVHB does not allege that the Thermaclad supplied was defective. It makes the quite different claim that perfectly sound Thermaclad, properly installed, introduced a risk which SJSL was under a duty to warn it about. To that claim, clause 907 provides no defence.

33 Autrement dit, la clause 907 porte sur les vices des produits ou de leur installation. Si BVHB soutenait que le Thermaclad fourni était affecté d'un vice, la clause 907 fournirait un moyen de défense complet. Mais ce n'est pas ce qu'affirme BVHB. Elle prétend, ce qui est bien différent, que le Thermaclad, en parfait état et installé correctement, présentait un risque contre lequel SJSL avait l'obligation de la mettre en garde. La clause 907 ne fournit aucun moyen de défense contre cette prétention.

I conclude that the contractual matrix in which the duty to warn of the inflammability of Thermaclad arose does not negate or "contradict", to use the language of BG Checo, supra, that duty. It follows that BVHB was entitled to claim against SJSL based on the tort duty to warn.

34 Je conclus que le cadre contractuel dans lequel a pris naissance l'obligation de mise en garde au sujet de l'inflammabilité du Thermaclad ne supprime pas cette obligation et n'y «déroge» pas, pour reprendre les termes utilisés dans l'arrêt BG Checo, précité. Il s'ensuit que BVHB avait le droit de poursuivre SJSL en se fondant sur l'obligation de mise en garde en matière délictuelle.

C. Is Raychem Entitled to Rely on the "Learned Intermediary" Defence?

C. Raychem a-t-elle le droit d'invoquer le moyen de défense fondé sur l'«intermédiaire compétent»?

Raychem argues that if it owed the plaintiff BVHB a duty to warn, it fulfilled that duty by advising the rig builder, SJSL, that the cladding was inflammable and was not flame retardant. Additional testing by Raychem merely confirmed what it told SJSL. Raychem submits that it is enti-

35 Raychem soutient que, si elle avait l'obligation de mettre en garde la demanderesse BVHB, elle s'est acquittée de cette obligation en informant SJSL, le constructeur de la plate-forme, que le revêtement était inflammable et n'avait aucune propriété ignifugeante. D'autres essais effectués

tled to rely on the "learned intermediary" defence because SJSL, which was aware of the regulatory requirements, actually had greater knowledge than it about the suitability of Thermaclad, upon which Raychem was entitled to rely. It was up to SJSL, armed as it was with the knowledge of Thermaclad's inflammability, to take steps to accommodate its proper use or, alternatively, warn BVHB and obtain different instructions. Raychem argues that it is too onerous to expect every supplier of a product used in the construction of a large undertaking such as a drilling rig to advise the ultimate owner. A strict duty to warn should apply only when the product is intended for direct use by the public. Raychem submits that since the Thermaclad was sold to an experienced shipbuilder, not the public, and there was no knowledge imbalance between SJSL and Raychem with respect to the performance of the product, it discharged any duty that it had to warn BVHB by warning SJSL, which was in the position of "learned intermediary" vis-à-vis Raychem and BVHB.

par Raychem sont simplement venus confirmer ce qu'elle avait dit à SJSL. Raychem prétend qu'elle a le droit d'invoquer le moyen de défense fondé sur «l'intermédiaire compétent» parce que SJSL, au fait des exigences réglementaires, en connaissait davantage sur la convenance du Thermaclad et qu'elle était fondée à s'appuyer sur cette connaissance. C'est à SJSL, qui était au courant de l'inflammabilité du Thermaclad, qu'il appartenait soit de prendre les mesures nécessaires pour bien l'utiliser, soit de mettre BVHB en garde et d'obtenir des instructions différentes. Raychem affirme que c'est trop exiger du fournisseur d'un produit utilisé dans la construction d'un grand ouvrage comme une plate-forme de forage que de s'attendre à ce qu'il informe le propriétaire final. L'obligation de mise en garde ne devrait être appliquée de façon stricte que dans les cas où le produit est destiné à être utilisé directement par le public. Raychem soutient que, comme le Thermaclad était vendu à un constructeur naval expérimenté et non au public, et qu'il n'existait aucun déséquilibre informationnel entre SJSL et Raychem au sujet de la tenue du produit, elle s'est acquittée de toute obligation de mise en garde qu'elle avait envers BVHB en prévenant SJSL, qui était un «intermédiaire compétent» vis-à-vis de Raychem et de BVHB.

36 In my view, the facts of this case do not fall within the learned intermediary defence. This Court has left open the possibility that a manufacturer might discharge its duty to warn by warning an intermediary: Hollis, supra, at p. 659. However, La Forest J., for the majority, made it clear that the rule was an exception to the general rule requiring manufacturers to provide a warning to the ultimate consumers of their product. The exception will generally only apply either where the product is highly technical and is to be used with expert supervision, or where the nature of the product is such that it is unrealistic for the consumer to receive a warning directly from the manufacturer. La Forest J. stated that since the rule operates to discharge the manufacturer's duty to the ultimate consumer, the intermediary must be "learned" in the sense that its knowledge of the product and its

À mon avis, les faits de l'espèce ne permettent pas d'invoquer le moyen de défense fondé sur l'intermédiaire compétent. Notre Cour n'a pas écarté la possibilité qu'un fabricant s'acquitte de son obligation de mise en garde en prévenant un intermédiaire: Hollis, précité, à la p. 659. Cependant, s'exprimant au nom de la majorité, le juge La Forest a clairement indiqué que la règle constituait une exception à la règle générale voulant que les fabricants mettent le consommateur final en garde contre les dangers que présentent leurs produits. En général, cette exception s'appliquera seulement si le produit a une forte teneur technique et est destiné à être utilisé sous la surveillance d'un expert, ou si la nature du produit est telle qu'il n'est pas réaliste de penser que le consommateur recevra une mise en garde directe du fabricant. Le juge La Forest a dit que, comme la règle a pour risks is essentially the same as that of the manufacturer.

Thermaclad was not a highly technical product, nor did its use and application require expert supervision. Nor was it unrealistic to expect Raychem to have warned BVHB, the ultimate consumer, directly. There was direct contact between BVHB and Raychem, independent of SJSL. Raychem actively sought the business of BVHB, and the trial judge found that the Thermaclad was owner-directed supply. In these circumstances Raychem had both the opportunity and the duty to warn BVHB directly. I conclude that Raychem's duty to warn the plaintiffs was not discharged through its communications with SJSL.

D. Is Causation Established?

SJSL submits that if BVHB's knowledge did not negate SJSL's duty to warn, it establishes that the failure to warn did not cause the loss. BVHB, it argues, did not prove that it would have acted differently had it been aware of Thermaclad's true characteristics. BVHB continued to operate the rig without a functioning GFCB system, knowing that the Thermaclad could burn and that there was risk of explosion from arcing. In response, BVHB argues, first, that it is not required to prove that it would have behaved differently had it been warned, and second, that the evidence supports its claim that it would have taken steps to address the risk had it been properly warned.

I am satisfied that causation is established, on either a subjective or an objective standard. There is evidence that had BVHB been aware of Thermaclad's specific inflammability characteris-effet de permettre au fabricant de s'acquitter de son obligation de mise en garde envers le consommateur final, l'intermédiaire doit être «compétent» en ce sens que sa connaissance du produit et des risques que celui-ci présente doit être essentiellement la même que celle qu'a le fabricant.

37 Le Thermaclad n'était pas un produit à forte teneur technique, et son utilisation et son application n'exigeaient pas la surveillance d'un expert. Il n'était pas non plus irréaliste de s'attendre à ce que Raychem prévienne directement BVHB, le consommateur final. Il y a eu des contacts directs entre BVHB et Raychem, indépendants de SJSL. Raychem cherchait activement à faire affaires avec BVHB, et le juge de première instance a conclu que le Thermaclad était du matériel imposé par le propriétaire. Dans ces circonstances, Raychem avait à la fois la possibilité et l'obligation de mettre BVHB en garde directement. Je conclus que Raychem ne s'est pas acquittée de son obligation de mise en garde envers les demanderesses dans le cadre de ses communications avec SJSL.

D. A-t-on prouvé l'existence d'un lien de causalité?

38 SJSL prétend que, si les connaissances de BVHB ne l'ont pas déchargée de l'obligation de mettre en garde cette dernière, elles établissent que le non-respect de cette obligation n'a pas causé la perte. Selon elle, BVHB n'a pas prouvé qu'elle aurait agi différemment si elle avait connu les véritables caractéristiques du Thermaclad. BVHB a continué d'exploiter la plate-forme sans un système DFT efficace, tout en sachant que le Thermaclad pouvait brûler et qu'il y avait un risque d'explosion en cas d'arcs électriques. En réponse, BVHB soutient, premièrement, qu'elle n'a pas à prouver qu'elle se serait comportée différemment si elle avait été mise en garde et, deuxièmement, que la preuve étaye sa prétention selon laquelle elle aurait pris des mesures pour se protéger du risque si elle avait été mise en garde convenablement.

39 Je suis convaincue que le lien de causalité est établi selon une norme subjective ou une norme objective. Il ressort de la preuve que si BVHB avait été au courant des caractéristiques particu-

tics, it would not have been used, or alternatively, that BVHB would have taken additional steps to compensate for its inflammability. BVHB, in accordance with applicable standards, would not have permitted inflammable materials to be used without careful consideration and investigation into the availability of nonflammable alternatives. I conclude that a reasonable plaintiff or BVHB itself would have either declined to use Thermaclad or taken steps to deal with its inflammability had it been warned. This suffices to meet the argument that the loss was not caused by the defendants' breach of their duty to warn.

lières d'inflammabilité du Thermaclad, elle aurait pris des mesures supplémentaires pour neutraliser l'inflammabilité. Conformément aux normes applicables, BVHB n'aurait pas permis l'utilisation de matériaux inflammables sans enquêter soigneusement sur l'existence de matériaux de rechange ininflammables. Je conclus que si un demandeur raisonnable ou BVHB elle-même avait été mis en garde, il aurait soit refusé d'utiliser le Thermaclad ou soit pris des mesures concernant l'inflammabilité de ce produit. Cela suffit pour répondre à l'argument selon lequel la perte n'a pas été causée par le manquement des défenderesses à leur obligation de mise en garde.

E. How Should Fault Be Allocated Between SJSL and Raychem?

E. Comment faudrait-il répartir la responsabilité entre SJSL et Raychem?

40 The next question is how fault should be allocated between SJSL and Raychem. The trial judge, affirmed by the Court of Appeal, apportioned liability equally. SJSL submits that the relative fault of itself and Raychem should have been reapportioned in light of the Court of Appeal's finding that SJSL's failure to provide certificates of approval was not negligent. It argues that Raychem's knowledge of Thermaclad's characteristics was much higher and that Raychem should therefore bear a correspondingly higher degree of fault.

La question suivante est celle de savoir comment la faute devrait être répartie entre SJSL et Raychem. Le juge de première instance a partagé la responsabilité de façon égale, et sa décision a été confirmée en Cour d'appel. SJSL prétend que le partage de la faute entre elle-même et Raychem aurait dû être modifié à la lumière de la conclusion de la Cour d'appel selon laquelle l'omission de SJSL de fournir des certificats d'approbation ne constituait pas une négligence. Elle fait valoir que Raychem était davantage au fait des caractéristiques du Thermaclad et qu'elle devrait en conséquence supporter un degré plus élevé de faute.

41 There was ample evidence before the trial judge to support his conclusion that the relative fault of Raychem and SJSL was equivalent. Both defendants had a greater degree of knowledge of the risks inherent in the use of Thermaclad than did BVHB. Neither of the defendants communicated or attempted to communicate their knowledge to BVHB. Although SJSL might have had less knowledge of the specific characteristics of Thermaclad, its knowledge of the general regulatory requirements was arguably greater, and it had greater contact with BVHB. I would not interfere with the equal apportionment of fault.

Il y avait amplement d'éléments de preuve devant le juge de première instance pour étayer sa conclusion que les fautes relatives de Raychem et de SJSL étaient équivalentes. Les deux défenderesses en savaient plus sur les risques inhérents à l'utilisation du Thermaclad que BVHB. Ni l'une ni l'autre des défenderesses n'ont communiqué ni tenté de communiquer leurs connaissances à BVHB. Même si SJSL en savait peut-être moins sur les caractéristiques particulières du Thermaclad, elle avait plus de contacts avec BVHB et il est possible de prétendre qu'elle connaissait mieux les exigences réglementaires générales. Je suis d'avis de ne pas modifier la répartition de la faute en parts égales.

1997 CanLII 307 (SCC)

F. Did SJSL and Raychem Owe BVI and HOOL a Duty to Warn? (Recovery of Contractual Relational Economic Loss)

(1) The Law

The plaintiffs HOOL and BVI had contracts with BVHB for the use of the rig owned by BVHB. They seek damages for economic loss incurred as a result of the shutdown of the drilling rig during the period it was being repaired. In other words, the plaintiffs HOOL and BVI seek to recover the economic loss they suffered as a result of damage to the property of a third party. This sort of loss is often called "contractual relational economic loss". The issue is whether the loss suffered by HOOL and BVI is recoverable.

The issue arises because common law courts have traditionally regarded many types of contractual relational economic loss as irrecoverable. The reasons for this were summarized by this Court, per Major J., in D'Amato v. Badger, [1996] 2 S.C.R. 1071. First, economic interests have customarily been seen by the common law courts as less worthy of protection than either bodily security or property. Second, relational economic loss presents the spectre of "liability in an indeterminate amount for an indeterminate time to an indeterminate class": Ultramares Corp. v. Touche, 174 N.E. 441 (N.Y. 1931), at p. 444, per Cardozo C.J. Third, it may be more efficient to place the burden of economic loss on the victim, who may be better placed to anticipate and insure its risk. Fourth, confining economic claims to contract discourages a multiplicity of lawsuits.

F. SJSL et Raychem avaient-elles l'obligation de mettre en garde HOOL et BVI? (Indemnisation de la perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat)

(1) Le droit

42 Les demanderesses HOOL et BVI avaient passé des contrats avec BVHB pour l'utilisation de la plate-forme lui appartenant. Elles réclament des dommages-intérêts pour la perte économique subie à la suite de l'arrêt d'exploitation de la plate-forme de forage pendant les réparations. Autrement dit, les demanderesses HOOL et BVI demandent à être indemnisées de la perte économique qu'elles ont subie à la suite des dommages causés au bien d'un tiers. Cette sorte de perte est souvent désignée sous le nom de «perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat». Il s'agit de savoir si la perte subie par HOOL et BVI peut donner lieu à indemnisation.

43 La question se pose parce que les tribunaux de common law ont traditionnellement considéré que plusieurs types de perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat ne donnaient pas lieu à indemnisation. Les raisons invoquées ont été résumées par le juge Major, au nom de la Cour, dans l'arrêt D'Amato c. Badger, [1996] 2 R.C.S. 1071. Premièrement, les tribunaux de common law ont généralement considéré que les intérêts économiques ne méritaient pas la même protection que l'intégrité du corps humain ou les biens. Deuxièmement, la perte économique relationnelle fait apparaître le spectre d'une [TRADUCTION] «responsabilité pour un montant indéterminé, pendant un temps indéterminé à l'égard d'une catégorie indéterminée»: Ultramares Corp. c. Touche, 174 N.E. 441 (N.Y. 1931), à la p. 444, le juge en chef Cardozo. Troisièmement, il est peut-être plus efficace de faire assumer le fardeau d'une perte économique par la victime, qui est peut-être mieux placée pour prévoir ce risque et se prémunir contre lui en souscrivant une assurance. Quatrièmement, le fait de limiter les réclamations de nature économique au domaine contractuel décourage la multiplication des poursuites.

44 In England the situation is clear — no relational economic loss can ever be recovered: Murphy v. Brentwood District Council, [1991] 1 A.C. 398 (H.L.). Although Murphy concerned the liability of a public authority for approval of a negligently constructed building, not relational economic loss, the House of Lords stipulated that pure economic loss is recoverable only where there is actual physical damage to property of the plaintiff, thus excluding recovery for relational economic loss. In the civil law jurisdictions of Quebec and France, by contrast, the law does not distinguish between loss arising from damage of one's own property and loss arising from damage to the property of another. If civil law judges restrict recovery, it is not as a matter of law, but on the basis of the facts and causal connection. The law in the common law provinces of Canada falls somewhere between these two extremes. While treating recovery in tort of contractual relational economic loss as exceptional, it is accepted in Canadian jurisprudence that there may be cases where it may be recovered.

En Angleterre, la situation est claire — la perte économique relationnelle ne peut jamais donner lieu à indemnisation: Murphy c. Brentwood District Council, [1991] 1 A.C. 398 (H.L.). Même si l'arrêt Murphy concernait la responsabilité d'un organisme public relativement à l'approbation d'un édifice construit avec négligence, et non une perte économique relationnelle, la Chambre des lords a jugé qu'une perte purement économique ne donnait lieu à indemnisation que dans les cas où des dommages matériels avaient été causés aux biens du demandeur, ce qui a pour effet d'exclure l'indemnisation de la perte économique relationnelle. Dans les systèmes de droit civil du Québec et de la France, par contraste, le droit ne fait pas de distinction entre la perte découlant des dommages causés aux biens d'une personne et la perte découlant des dommages causés aux biens d'autrui. Si les juges appliquant le droit civil restreignent l'indemnisation, ce n'est pas parce que le droit les y oblige mais parce que les faits et le lien de causalité le justifient. Dans les provinces de common law du Canada, le droit se situe entre ces deux extrêmes. Quoique l'indemnisation de la perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat soit exceptionnelle en matière délictuelle, il est accepté, dans la jurisprudence canadienne, qu'il peut y avoir des cas où cette perte donne lieu à indemnisation.

45 The foregoing suggests the need for a rule to distinguish between cases where contractual relational economic loss can be recovered and cases where it cannot be recovered. Such a rule, as I wrote in Canadian National Railway Co. v. Norsk Pacific Steamship Co., [1992] 1 S.C.R. 1021, should be morally and economically defensible and provide a logical basis upon which individuals can predicate their conduct and courts can decide future cases (p. 1147). Although this Court attempted to formulate such a rule in Norsk, a split decision prevented the emergence of a clear rule. Given the commercial importance of the issue, it is important that the rule be settled. It is therefore necessary for this Court to revisit the issue.

Ce qui précède fait ressortir la nécessité d'énoncer une règle permettant de faire la distinction entre les cas où la perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat peut donner lieu à indemnisation et les cas où elle ne le peut pas. Une telle règle, ainsi que je l'ai dit dans Cie des chemins de fer nationaux du Canada c. Norsk Pacific Steamship Co., [1992] 1 R.C.S. 1021, devrait être défendable sur les plans moral et économique et fournir un principe logique sur lequel les individus pourraient fonder leur conduite et à partir duquel les tribunaux pourraient trancher les affaires subséquentes (p. 1147). Bien que notre Cour ait essayé d'énoncer une telle règle dans l'arrêt Norsk, une décision partagée a empêché l'émergence d'une règle claire. Vu l'importance de la question sur le plan commercial, il est important d'établir cette

The differences between the reasons of La Forest J. and myself in Norsk are of two orders: difference in result and difference in methodology. The difference in result, taken at its narrowest, is a difference in the definition of what constitutes a "joint venture" for the purposes of determining whether recovery for contractual relational economic loss should be allowed. We both agreed that if the plaintiff is in a joint venture with the person whose property is damaged, the plaintiff may claim consequential economic loss related to that property. We parted company because La Forest J. took a stricter view of what constituted a joint venture than I did.

The difference in methodology is not, on close analysis, as great as might be supposed. Broadly put, La Forest J. started from a general exclusionary rule and proceeded to articulate exceptions to that rule where recovery would be permitted. I, by contrast, stressed the two-step test for when recovery would be available, based on the general principles of recovery in tort as set out in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council, [1978] A.C. 728 (H.L.), and Kamloops (City of) v. Nielsen, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 2: (1) whether the relationship between the plaintiff and defendant was sufficiently proximate to give rise to a prima facie duty of care; and (2) whether, if such a prima facie duty existed, it was negated for policy reasons and recovery should be denied.

Despite this difference in approach, La Forest J. and I agreed on several important propositions: (1) relational economic loss is recoverable only in special circumstances where the appropriate conditions are met; (2) these circumstances can be defined by reference to categories, which will make the law generally predictable; (3) the categories are not closed. La Forest J. identified the catego-règle. Il y a donc lieu pour notre Cour de revoir la question.

46 Les différences entre les motifs du juge La Forest et les miens dans l'arrêt Norsk sont de deux ordres: une différence quant au résultat et une différence quant à la méthodologie. La différence quant au résultat, prise au sens le plus strict, tient à la définition de l'expression «entreprise conjointe» aux fins de déterminer s'il y a lieu d'accorder une indemnisation pour la perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat. Nous étions tous deux d'accord pour dire que, si le demandeur participe à une entreprise conjointe avec la personne dont le bien a été endommagé, il peut réclamer la perte économique indirecte qui se rapporte à ce bien. Cependant, nous nous sommes trouvés en désaccord parce que le juge La Forest a adopté une conception de l'entreprise conjointe plus stricte que la mienne.

47 Quand on y regarde de près, la différence quant à la méthodologie n'est pas aussi grande qu'on pourrait le supposer. Généralement parlant, le juge La Forest a posé au départ une règle générale d'exclusion et a ensuite énoncé des cas d'exceptions dans lesquels l'indemnisation est permise. Par contraste, pour déterminer les cas d'ouverture à indemnisation, j'ai mis l'accent sur un critère à deux volets fondé sur les principes généraux d'indemnisation en matière délictuelle qui ont été énoncés dans les arrêts Anns c. Merton London Borough Council, [1978] A.C. 728 (H.L.), et Kamloops (Ville de) c. Nielsen, [1984] 2 R.C.S. 2: (1) Le lien entre le demandeur et le défendeur était-il suffisamment étroit pour donner naissance à une obligation de diligence prima facie? (2) Si cette obligation existait, était-elle écartée pour des raisons de principe et fallait-il refuser l'indemnisation?

48 Malgré cette différence d'approche, le juge La Forest et moi-même étions d'accord sur plusieurs points importants: (1) la perte économique relationnelle ne donne lieu à indemnisation que dans des circonstances spéciales lorsque sont réunies les conditions requises; (2) ces circonstances peuvent être définies par référence à des catégories, qui rendront le droit généralement prévisible; gories of recovery of relational economic loss defined to date as: (1) cases where the claimant has a possessory or proprietary interest in the damaged property; (2) general average cases; and (3) cases where the relationship between the claimant and property owner constitutes a joint venture.

(3) ces catégories ne sont pas limitatives. Le juge La Forest a désigné les catégories d'indemnisation de perte économique relationnelle qui ont été définies à ce jour comme étant: (1) les cas où le demandeur a un droit de possession ou de propriété sur le bien endommagé; (2) les cas d'avarie commune; (3) les cas où le lien entre le demandeur et le propriétaire du bien est une entreprise conjointe.

49 The case at bar does not fall into any of the above three categories. The plaintiffs here had no possessory or proprietary interest in the rig and the case is not one of general averaging. While related contractually, the Court of Appeal correctly held that the plaintiff and the property owner cannot, on any view of the term, be viewed as joint venturers.

Le présent cas n'entre dans aucune des trois catégories susmentionnées. En l'espèce, les demanderesses n'avaient aucun droit de possession ou de propriété sur la plate-forme et il ne s'agit pas d'une affaire d'avarie commune. La Cour d'appel a conclu à juste titre que, même s'il existait un lien contractuel entre la demanderesse et le propriétaire du bien, il ne pouvait en aucun sens du terme être considéré comme une entreprise conjointe à laquelle ils auraient participé.

50 However, that is not the end of the matter. The categories of recoverable contractual relational economic loss in tort are not closed. Where a case does not fall within a recognized category the court may go on to consider whether the situation is one where the right to recover contractual relational economic loss should nevertheless be recognized. This is in accordance with Norsk, per La Forest J., at p. 1134:

Cependant, cela ne clôt pas la question. Les catégories de pertes économiques relationnelles découlant d'un contrat susceptibles d'indemnisation en matière délictuelle ne sont pas limitatives. Lorsqu'une affaire n'entre pas dans une catégorie reconnue, le tribunal peut se demander s'il s'agit d'une situation où le droit d'être indemnisé d'une perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat devrait néanmoins être reconnu. Cela concorde avec les propos suivants du juge La Forest, dans l'arrêt Norsk, à la p. 1134:

> Thus I do not say that the right to recovery in all cases of contractual relational economic loss depends exclusively on the terms of the contract. Rather, I note that such is the tenor of the exclusionary rule and that departures from that rule should be justified on defensible policy grounds. [Emphasis added.]

> Ainsi, je ne dis pas que le droit à l'indemnisation, dans tous les cas de perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat, dépend exclusivement des modalités du contrat. Je ferai plutôt remarquer que tel est le sens de la règle d'exclusion et que les dérogations à cette règle devraient se justifier par des raisons de principe défendables. [Je souligne.]

More particularly, La Forest J. suggested that the general rule against recovery for policy-based reasons might be relaxed where the deterrent effect of potential liability to the property owner is low, or, despite a degree of indeterminate liability, where the claimant's opportunity to allocate the risk by contract is slight, either because of the type of transaction or an inequality of bargaining power. I agreed with La Forest J. that policy considerations relating to increased costs of processing claims

De façon plus particulière, le juge La Forest a suggéré l'assouplissement de la règle générale faisant obstacle à l'indemnisation pour des raisons de principe lorsque l'effet dissuasif d'une responsabilité potentielle envers le propriétaire du bien est faible ou, malgré l'existence d'un degré de responsabilité indéterminée, lorsque la possibilité pour le demandeur de répartir contractuellement le risque est réduite, en raison soit du type d'opération en cause soit de l'inégalité du pouvoir de négociation.

and contractual allocation of the risk are important (p. 1164). I concluded that the test for recovery "should be flexible enough to meet the complexities of commercial reality and to permit the recognition of new situations in which liability ought, in justice, to lie as such situations arise" (p. 1166). It thus appears that new categories of recoverable contractual relational economic loss may be recognized where justified by policy considerations and required by justice. At the same time, courts should not assiduously seek new categories; what is required is a clear rule predicting when recovery is available.

J'ai convenu avec le juge La Forest de l'importance des considérations de principe relatives à l'accroissement des coûts de règlement des demandes et à la répartition contractuelle du risque (p. 1164). J'ai conclu que le critère applicable à l'indemnisation «devrait être suffisamment souple pour tenir compte de la complexité des affaires et permettre la reconnaissance de nouvelles situations où, en toute justice, une responsabilité devrait être imposée, quand de telles situations se présentent» (p. 1166). Il paraît donc possible de reconnaître de nouvelles catégories de pertes économiques relationnelles découlant d'un contrat susceptibles d'indemnisation lorsqu'elles s'appuient sur des considérations de principe et que la justice commande de le faire. Toutefois, les tribunaux ne devraient pas chercher assidûment de nouvelles catégories; ce qu'il faut, c'est une règle claire, permettant de prédire les cas donnant ouverture à indemnisation.

1997 CanLII 307 (SCC)

More recently, in Hercules Managements Ltd. v. Ernst & Young, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 165, this Court described the general approach that should be followed in determining when tort recovery for economic loss is appropriate. The plaintiffs in that case were shareholders in a company, Hercules Managements Ltd. The auditors for the company allegedly failed to disclose in their annual audits matters detrimental to the company. The company failed and the plaintiffs suffered financial loss. The plaintiff shareholders sued the auditors. The first issue was whether the plaintiffs' action against the auditors could be maintained in law. Although styled as an action for negligent misrepresentation, the plaintiffs' claim was treated as a case of relational economic loss owing to the fact that the services were performed pursuant to a contract with the company. The primary loser was the company, which had contracted with the auditors. The plaintiffs' loss was derivative of, or relational to, the company's loss. The defendant auditors asserted that their only duty was to the company with which they had contracted. They argued that no relational tort duty to third parties lay in the circumstances. To affirm such a duty, they maintained, would be contrary to the policy considerations that had led courts in the past to deny recovery for relational economic loss. The Court,

Plus récemment, dans l'arrêt Hercules Managements Ltd. c. Ernst & Young, [1997] 2 R.C.S. 165, notre Cour a décrit la méthode générale devant être suivie pour déterminer quand l'indemnisation d'une perte économique est appropriée en matière délictuelle. Dans cette affaire, les demandeurs étaient actionnaires d'une société, Hercules Managements Ltd. On reprochait aux vérificateurs de la société d'avoir omis de divulguer dans leur rapport annuel certains faits défavorables à la société. Celle-ci a fait faillite et les demandeurs ont subi une perte financière. Les actionnaires demandeurs ont poursuivi les vérificateurs. La première question était de savoir si l'action des demandeurs contre les vérificateurs pouvait être maintenue en droit. Même si elle avait été présentée comme une action pour déclaration inexacte faite par négligence, l'action des demandeurs a été traitée comme une affaire de perte économique relationnelle étant donné que les services avaient été rendus conformément à un contrat passé avec la société. La principale perdante était la société, qui avait conclu un contrat avec les vérificateurs. La perte des demandeurs dérivait de la perte de la société, elle avait un caractère relationnel. Les vérificateurs défendeurs ont prétendu n'avoir d'obligation qu'envers la société avec laquelle ils avaient passé le contrat. Ils ont plaidé qu'il n'exis-per La Forest J., unanimously held that the shareholders had no cause of action against the auditors.

tait en matière délictuelle aucune obligation relationnelle envers des tiers dans les circonstances. Ils ont soutenu que confirmer l'existence d'une telle obligation irait à l'encontre des considérations de principe qui, par le passé, avaient amené les tribunaux à refuser l'indemnisation dans les cas de pertes économiques relationnelles. La Cour, dans des motifs exposés par le juge La Forest, a conclu à l'unanimité que les actionnaires n'avaient aucune cause d'action contre les vérificateurs.

52 La Forest J. set out the methodology that courts should follow in determining whether a tort action lies for relational economic loss. He held that the two-part methodology of Anns, supra, adopted by this Court in Kamloops, supra, should be followed: (1) whether a prima facie duty of care is owed; and (2) whether that duty, if it exists, is negated or limited by policy considerations. In applying the second step, La Forest J. wrote that while policy considerations will sometimes result in the prima facie duty being negated, in certain categories of cases such considerations may give way to other overriding policy considerations.

Le juge La Forest a énoncé la méthode que les tribunaux doivent suivre pour déterminer si une action en responsabilité délictuelle peut être intentée en cas de perte économique relationnelle. Il a statué que la méthode à deux volets proposée dans l'arrêt Anns, précité, et adoptée par notre Cour dans l'arrêt Kamloops, précité, devait être suivie: (1) Existe-t-il à une obligation de diligence prima facie? (2) Si oui, cette obligation est-elle annihilée ou limitée par des considérations de principe? En appliquant le second volet, le juge La Forest a écrit que, quoique des considérations de principe puissent parfois annihiler l'obligation prima facie, dans certains genres d'affaires il est possible que ces considérations cèdent le pas à d'autres considérations de principe impérieuses.

53 La Forest J. held that the existence of a relationship of "neighbourhood" or "proximity" distinguishes those circumstances in which the defendant owes a prima facie duty of care to the plaintiff from those where no such duty exists. The term "proximity" is a label expressing the fact of a relationship of neighbourhood sufficient to attract a prima facie legal duty. Whether the duty arises depends on the nature of the case and its facts. Policy concerns are best dealt with under the second branch of the test. Criteria that in other cases have been used to define the legal test for the duty of care can now be recognized as policy-based ways by which to curtail indeterminate or inappropriate recovery.

Le juge La Forest a conclu que l'existence d'un «lien étroit» permet de distinguer les cas où le défendeur a envers le demandeur une obligation de diligence prima facie de ceux où il n'existe aucune obligation de cette nature. L'expression «lien étroit» exprime le fait qu'il existe un rapport suffisamment étroit pour créer une obligation légale prima facie. L'existence de l'obligation dépend de la nature de l'affaire et des faits. Quant aux considérations de principe, il vaut mieux les examiner dans le cadre du deuxième volet du critère. Les critères qui ont servi dans d'autres affaires à définir le critère juridique permettant de déterminer s'il existe une obligation de diligence peuvent maintenant être reconnus comme un moyen — fondé sur des principes — de limiter les cas d'indemnisation inappropriée ou de responsabilité indéterminée.

54 Following this analysis, La Forest J. concluded that the first branch of the Anns test was satisfied and the defendant auditors owed a prima facie duty

Après cette analyse, le juge La Forest a conclu qu'on avait satisfait au premier volet du critère énoncé dans l'arrêt Anns et que les vérificateurs of care to the plaintiffs. First, the possibility that the plaintiffs would rely on the audited statements prepared for the company was reasonably foreseeable. Second, the relationship between the parties and nature of the statements themselves made the plaintiffs' reliance reasonable.

Policy considerations under the second branch of the test, however, negatived a duty of care. La Forest J. began by noting that while policy concerns surrounding indeterminate liability will serve to negate a prima facie duty of care in many auditors' negligence cases, there may be particular situations where such concerns do not inhere. The specific factual matrix of a given case may bring it within a category which, for policy reasons, is identified as an exception to the exclusionary rule; considerations of proximity may militate in favour of finding a prima facie duty of care at the first stage, and the policy considerations which usually negate it may be absent. In such cases, liability would appropriately lie. The main policy consideration at stake in Hercules was the spectre of indeterminate liability. Not everyone who picks up a financial statement and relies on it can sue for financial loss incurred as a result of reliance on the statement. Only persons that the makers of the statement can reasonably be expected to have foreseen relying on the statements can sue, and then only for uses that the auditors could reasonably have foreseen. The question thus became whether the plaintiffs had used the statements for the purpose for which they had been prepared. The Court held they had not. The statements had been prepared for the purpose of permitting the shareholders to collectively oversee the management of the company, not for the purpose of assisting individual shareholders in investment decisions. The policy considerations surrounding indeterminate liadéfendeurs avaient une obligation de diligence prima facie envers les demandeurs. Premièrement, il était raisonnablement prévisible que les demandeurs se fieraient aux états vérifiés préparés pour la société. Deuxièmement, vu le lien existant entre les parties et la nature des états vérifiés eux-mêmes, il était raisonnable que les demandeurs se fient à ces états.

55 Cependant, les considérations de principe examinées dans le cadre du deuxième volet du critère annihilaient l'obligation de diligence. Le juge La Forest a d'abord souligné que, même si dans beaucoup d'affaires de négligence visant des vérificateurs, des considérations de principe concernant la responsabilité indéterminée ont pour effet d'annihiler l'existence d'une obligation de diligence prima facie, il peut y avoir des cas particuliers où de telles considérations ne jouent pas. Il est possible que les faits particuliers d'une affaire la fassent entrer dans une catégorie qui, pour des raisons de principe, est considérée comme une exception à la règle d'exclusion; il se peut que des considérations touchant l'existence d'un lien étroit incitent à conclure, à la première étape, à l'existence d'une obligation de diligence prima facie, et que les considérations de principe qui écartent habituellement cette obligation soient absentes. Dans de tels cas, la responsabilité serait à juste titre retenue. La principale considération de principe en jeu dans l'arrêt Hercules était le spectre de la responsabilité indéterminée. Tous ceux qui consultent des états financiers et s'y fient ne peuvent intenter des poursuites pour les pertes financières qu'ils subissent parce qu'ils se sont fiés à ces états. Seules les personnes dont on peut raisonnablement s'attendre que les auteurs des états financiers avaient prévu qu'elles se fieraient aux états financiers peuvent poursuivre et seulement pour les fins que les vérificateurs avaient pu raisonnablement prévoir. La question qui se posait alors était de savoir si les demandeurs s'étaient servis des états financiers aux fins pour lesquelles ils avaient été préparés. La Cour a jugé que non. Les états financiers avaient été préparés afin de permettre aux actionnaires de surveiller collectivement la gestion de la société et non pas afin d'aider chaque actionnaire à prendre des décisions en matière de placebility accordingly inhered, negating the prima facie duty of care.

56 The same approach may be applied to the contractual relational economic loss at stake in the case at bar. The first step is to inquire whether the relationship of neighbourhood or proximity necessary to found a prima facie duty of care is present. If so, one moves to the second step of inquiring whether the policy concerns that usually preclude recovery of contractual relational economic loss, such as indeterminacy, are overridden.

(2) Application of the Law

57 Before applying the law set out above to the facts of this case, a preliminary point arises: is the loss claimed by the plaintiffs contractual relational economic loss at all? The plaintiffs argue that the loss they claim against the defendants is really loss transferred from BVHB, the rig owner. The plaintiffs argue that they were in a "common venture" (as distinguished from a joint venture) with BVHB, which resulted in BVHB's losses being transferred to them. Therefore, they argue, they should be able to claim the losses as though they stand in the shoes of BVHB. BVHB could have claimed consequential losses for loss of use of the drilling rig; so then, on this theory, can HOOL and BVI.

58 This argument suffers from a number of difficulties. First, insofar as courts have recognized transferred loss, it has been confined to physical damage: Norsk, supra. Applied to relational economic loss, it would need to meet the criteria for recovery of that category of loss, and hence would seem not to advance the plaintiffs' case. Second, the plaintiffs claim not only for loss of use of the drilling ments. Par conséquent, les considérations de principe concernant la responsabilité indéterminée entraient en jeu, annihilant l'obligation de diligence prima facie.

La même méthode peut être appliquée à la perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat dont il est question dans la présente affaire. La première étape consiste à statuer sur la présence ou l'absence du lien étroit nécessaire pour conclure à l'existence d'une obligation de diligence prima facie. Dans l'affirmative, on passe alors à la seconde étape, qui consiste à se demander si les considérations de principe qui font habituellement obstacle à l'indemnisation en cas de perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat, par ex. l'indétermination, sont supplantées.

(2) L'application du droit

Avant d'appliquer les règles de droit énoncées précédemment aux faits de l'espèce, il faut répondre à une question préliminaire: est-ce que la perte dont les demanderesses veulent être indemnisées est vraiment une perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat? Les demanderesses soutiennent que la perte pour laquelle elles réclament une indemnité aux défenderesses est en fait une perte transférée de BVHB, le propriétaire de la plate-forme. Elles plaident qu'elles participaient à une «entreprise commune» (par opposition à une entreprise conjointe) avec BVHB, et que de ce fait les pertes de BVHB leur ont été transférées. En conséquence, affirment-elles, elles devraient pouvoir demander à être indemnisées des pertes comme si elles étaient BVHB. Celle-ci aurait pu demander à être dédommagée des pertes indirectes subies en raison de la perte de l'usage de la plate-forme de forage; par conséquent, selon cette théorie, HOOL et BVI le peuvent également.

Cet argument se heurte à un certain nombre de problèmes. Premièrement, dans la mesure où les tribunaux ont reconnu la notion de perte transférée, elle a été limitée au préjudice physique: Norsk, précité. Appliquée à la perte économique relationnelle, elle devrait satisfaire aux critères relatifs à l'indemnisation pour cette catégorie de perte et, par conséquent, elle ne semble d'aucun secours rig, but for losses related to unavoidable expenses they incurred for other supplies, including food, drilling mud and additional equipment. It is more difficult to see how these losses, based entirely on contracts between the plaintiffs and others, independent of BVHB, can be said to be transferred from BVHB. Third, there is nothing to show that the day rates paid by HOOL and BVI while the rig was idle are identical to what BVHB's consequential losses would have been. Finally, what does one do about the contributory negligence of BVHB? Given that BVHB is 60 percent at fault, under the transferred loss theory would the plaintiffs be able to recover only 40 percent of their claim? These difficulties suggest that the plaintiffs' loss is not the transferred loss of BVHB, the owner of the damaged rig. It is contractual relational economic loss, and should be treated as such.

aux demanderesses. Deuxièmement, ces dernières demandent non seulement à être indemnisées de la perte d'usage de la plate-forme de forage, mais également des pertes relatives aux dépenses inévitables qu'elles ont exposées pour d'autres approvisionnements, y compris la nourriture, la boue de forage et le matériel supplémentaire. Il est plus difficile de voir comment ces pertes, fondées entièrement sur des contrats passés entre les demanderesses et d'autres sociétés, indépendantes de BVHB, peuvent être considérées comme des pertes transférées de BVHB. Troisièmement, rien ne prouve que les taux journaliers payés par HOOL et BVI pendant que la plate-forme ne servait pas correspondent aux pertes indirectes qu'aurait essuyées BVHB. Enfin, que fait-on au sujet de la négligence contributive de BVHB? Étant donné que BVHB est fautive dans une proportion de 60 pour 100, est-ce que, selon la théorie de la perte transférée, les demanderesses ne peuvent être indemnisées que de 40 pour 100 seulement de leur réclamation? Ces problèmes tendent à indiquer que la perte des demanderesses n'est pas la perte transférée de BVHB, le propriétaire de la plate-forme endommagée, mais plutôt une perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat, et elle devrait être traitée comme telle.

I return to the question of whether, on the approach articulated in Hercules, supra, the plaintiffs' claim for contractual relational economic loss is actionable. The Newfoundland Court of Appeal, without the benefit of Hercules, essentially followed the two-step process outlined in that case. It held that the defendants owed a prima facie duty of care to BVI and HOOL. The duty arose because BVI and HOOL's economic interests could foreseeably have been affected by a failure to warn BVHB of the danger of fire resulting from the use of products supplied by the defendants. The Court of Appeal went on to hold that there should be no recovery for other reasons. It held that it would be totally impractical to warn every person who could foreseeably suffer economic loss arising from the shutdown of the drilling rig. If there was a duty to warn BVI and HOOL, then there would also be a duty to warn other potential investors in the project, such as Mobil Oil Canada Ltd. and Petro

Je reviens à la question de savoir si, suivant l'approche énoncée dans l'arrêt Hercules, précité, la réclamation des demanderesses pour perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat donne ouverture à action. La Cour d'appel de Terre-Neuve, avant le prononcé de l'arrêt Hercules, a suivi essentiellement la démarche en deux étapes exposée dans cette affaire. Elle a conclu que les défenderesses avaient une obligation de diligence prima facie envers BVI et HOOL. Cette obligation a pris naissance en raison du fait qu'il était possible de prévoir que les intérêts financiers de BVI et de HOOL puissent être affectés si BVHB n'était pas mise en garde contre le danger d'incendie découlant de l'utilisation des produits fournis par les défenderesses. La Cour d'appel a poursuivi en statuant qu'il ne devrait pas y avoir d'indemnisation pour d'autres motifs. Elle a jugé qu'il serait totalement impossible en pratique de mettre en garde toutes les personnes dont il était

Canada, as well as a host of other persons who stood to gain from the uninterrupted operation of the drilling rig, including employees and suppliers of the rig. In these circumstances, in the Court of Appeal's view, the only duty on the defendants was to warn the person in control and possession of the rig of the dangers of fire associated with the use of Thermaclad.

possible de prévoir qu'elles subiraient des pertes financières en raison de l'arrêt des activités de la plate-forme de forage. S'il y avait obligation de mettre en garde BVI et HOOL, cette obligation existerait également envers les autres parties ayant investi dans le projet, comme Mobil Oil Canada Ltd. et Petro-Canada, ainsi qu'une foule d'autres personnes qui avaient intérêt à ce que les activités de la plate-forme de forage se poursuivent sans interruption, y compris les employés et les fournisseurs de la plate-forme. Dans ces circonstances, la Cour d'appel a jugé que la seule obligation qui incombait aux défenderesses était de mettre en garde la personne ayant la possession et la responsabilité de la plate-forme contre les dangers d'incendie liés à l'utilisation du Thermaclad.

60 As in Hercules, the decision as to whether a prima facie duty of care exists requires an investigation into whether the defendant and the plaintiff can be said to be in a relationship of proximity or neighbourhood. Proximity exists on a given set of facts if the defendant may be said to be under an obligation to be mindful of the plaintiff's legitimate interests in conducting his or her affairs: Hercules, at para. 28. On the facts of this case, I agree with the Court of Appeal that a prima facie duty of care arises. Indeed, the duty to warn raised against the defendants is the correlative of the duty to disclose financial facts raised against the auditors in Hercules.

Comme dans Hercules, pour décider s'il y a obligation de diligence prima facie, il faut se demander s'il existe un lien étroit entre le défendeur et le demandeur. Un tel lien existe si, compte tenu d'un ensemble de faits donné, il est possible d'affirmer que le défendeur est tenu de se soucier des intérêts légitimes du demandeur dans le cours de ses propres affaires: Hercules, au par. 28. Je suis d'accord avec la Cour d'appel pour dire que, d'après les faits de l'espèce, une obligation de diligence prima facie a pris naissance. De fait, l'obligation de mise en garde invoquée contre les défenderesses correspond à l'obligation de divulguer la situation financière qui a été plaidée contre les vérificateurs dans l'affaire Hercules.

61 Where a duty to warn is alleged, the issue is not reliance (there being nothing to rely upon), but whether the defendants ought reasonably to have foreseen that the plaintiffs might suffer loss as a result of use of the product about which the warning should have been made. I have already found that the duty to warn extended to BVHB. The question is, however, whether it extended as far as HOOL and BVI. The facts establish that this was the case. The defendants knew of the existence of the plaintiffs and others like them and knew or

Si on plaide l'existence d'une obligation de mise en garde, ce n'est pas la confiance qui est en jeu (il n'y a rien sur quoi s'appuyer), c'est la question de savoir si les défenderesses auraient dû raisonnablement prévoir que les demanderesses pouvaient subir une perte à la suite de l'utilisation du produit au sujet duquel il aurait fallu faire la mise en garde. J'ai déjà conclu que l'obligation de mise en garde s'étendait à BVHB. Il s'agit toutefois de se demander si elle s'étendait aussi à HOOL et BVI. Les faits établissent que tel était le cas. Les défenderesses connaissaient l'existence des demanderesses et d'autres personnes comme elles, et elles savaient ou auraient dû savoir que ces dernières ought to have known that they stood to lose money if the drilling rig was shut down.

The next question is whether this prima facie duty of care is negatived by policy considerations. In my view, it is. The most serious problem is that seized on by the Court of Appeal — the problem of indeterminate liability. If the defendants owed a duty to warn the plaintiffs, it is difficult to see why they would not owe a similar duty to a host of other persons who would foreseeably lose money if the rig was shut down as a result of being damaged. Other investors in the project are the most obvious persons who would also be owed a duty, although the list could arguably be extended to additional classes of persons. What has been referred to as the ripple effect is present in this case. A number of investment companies which contracted with HOOL are making claims against it, as has BVI.

No sound reason to permit the plaintiffs to recover while denying recovery to these other persons emerges. To hold otherwise would pose problems for defendants, who would face liability in an indeterminate amount for an indeterminate time to an indeterminate class. It also would pose problems for potential plaintiffs. Which of all the potential plaintiffs can expect and anticipate they will succeed? Why should one type of contractual relationship, that of HOOL, be treated as more worthy than another, e.g., that of the employees on the rig? In this state, what contractual and insurance arrangements should potential plaintiffs make against future loss?

The plaintiffs propose a number of solutions to the problem of indeterminacy. None of them succeeds, in my respectful view. The first proposal is to confine liability to persons whose identity was known to the defendants. This is a reversion to the risquaient de perdre de l'argent si la plate-forme de forage cessait de fonctionner.

62 La question suivante est de savoir si cette obligation de diligence prima facie est annihilée par des considérations de principe. Je suis d'avis que oui. Le problème le plus sérieux est celui qui a retenu l'attention de la Cour d'appel — le problème de la responsabilité indéterminée. Si les défenderesses avaient l'obligation de mettre en garde les demanderesses, il est difficile de voir pourquoi elles n'auraient pas la même obligation envers une foule d'autres personnes dont les pertes étaient prévisibles si la plate-forme cessait ses activités en raison des dommages subis. Les autres personnes ayant investi dans le projet seraient, à l'évidence, également créancières d'une telle obligation, même si, on pourrait le soutenir, la liste pourrait inclure d'autres catégories de personnes. On retrouve, en l'espèce, ce qu'on a appelé l'effet d'enchaînement car un certain nombre de sociétés de placement, qui ont passé des contrats avec HOOL, ont exercé des réclamations contre cette dernière, comme l'a fait BVI.

63 Il n'y a aucune raison valable de permettre l'indemnisation des demanderesses et de refuser de l'accorder aux autres. Conclure autrement créerait des problèmes pour les défenderesses, qui feraient face à une responsabilité pour un montant indéterminé, pendant un temps indéterminé à l'égard d'une catégorie indéterminée. Cela créerait également des problèmes aux demandeurs potentiels. Lesquels parmi tous ces demandeurs potentiels pourraient s'attendre à obtenir gain de cause? Pourquoi un certain type de lien contractuel, en l'occurrence celui de HOOL, serait-il considéré plus valable qu'un autre, par ex. celui des employés travaillant sur la plate-forme? Dans cette situation, quels arrangements les demandeurs potentiels devraient-ils prendre en matière de contrats et d'assurances pour se protéger contre des pertes futures?

64 Les demanderesses proposent un certain nombre de solutions au problème de l'indétermination. À mon humble avis, toutefois, aucune n'est efficace. La première proposition vise à limiter la responsabilité aux personnes dont l'identité était connue

"known plaintiff" test, rejected by a majority of this Court in Norsk, supra. As commentators have pointed out, the fact that the defendant knew the identity of the plaintiff should not in logic or justice determine recovery. On such a test, the notorious would recover, the private would lose: Norsk. The problem of indeterminate liability cannot be avoided by arbitrary distinctions for which there is no legal or social justification: Norsk, at p. 1112. There must be something which, for policy reasons, permits the court to say this category of person can recover and that category cannot, something which justifies the line being drawn at one point rather than another.

des défenderesses. C'est un retour au critère du «demandeur connu», qui a été rejeté par notre Cour à la majorité dans Norsk, précité. Comme l'ont indiqué les commentateurs, le fait que le défendeur connaisse le demandeur ne devrait pas, en toute logique ni en toute justice, déterminer l'indemnisation. Selon un tel critère, le demandeur très connu serait dédommagé tandis que le demandeur anonyme subirait une perte: Norsk. Le problème de la responsabilité indéterminée ne peut pas être évité par des distinctions arbitraires pour lesquelles il n'existe aucune justification juridique ou sociale: Norsk, à la p. 1112. Quelque chose doit permettre au tribunal de conclure pour des raisons de principe que telle catégorie de personnes peut être indemnisée et que telle autre ne peut l'être: quelque chose doit justifier de tracer la ligne de démarcation à un endroit plutôt qu'à un autre.

65 Second, and in a similar vein, the plaintiffs argue that determinacy can be achieved by restricting recovery to the users of the rig, a class which they say is analogous in time and extent to the owners and occupiers of the building in Winnipeg Condominium Corporation No. 36 v. Bird Construction Co., [1995] 1 S.C.R. 85. This argument fails for the same reasons as the known plaintiff test. There is no logical reason for drawing the line at users rather than somewhere else.

Deuxièmement, dans la même veine, les demanderesses soutiennent qu'on peut mettre fin à l'indétermination en limitant l'indemnisation aux utilisateurs de la plate-forme qui forment une catégorie analogue pour ce qui est de la durée et de l'étendue à celle des propriétaires et des occupants de l'édifice dans l'arrêt Winnipeg Condominium Corporation No. 36 c. Bird Construction Co., [1995] 1 R.C.S. 85. Cet argument doit être rejeté pour les mêmes raisons que le critère du demandeur connu. Il n'y a aucune raison logique de tracer une ligne de démarcation entre les utilisateurs et les autres.

66 Third, the plaintiffs attempt to distinguish themselves from other potential claimants through the concept of reliance. The defendants correctly answer this argument by pointing out that any person who is contractually dependent on a product or a structure owned by another "relies" on the manufacturer or builder to supply a safe product.

Troisièmement, les demanderesses tentent d'établir une distinction entre elles-mêmes et les autres réclamants potentiels en invoquant la notion de confiance. Les défenderesses répondent correctement à cet argument en soulignant que toute personne qui, en vertu d'un contrat, est tributaire d'un produit ou d'une construction appartenant à autrui «compte» sur le fabricant ou le constructeur pour fournir un produit sûr.

67 Finally, the plaintiffs argue that a finding of a duty to warn negates the spectre of indeterminate liability as the duty to warn does not extend to everyone in any way connected to the manufactured product. This argument begs the question. The duty to warn found to this point is only a prima facie duty to warn in accordance with the first

Enfin, les demanderesses font valoir que le fait de conclure à l'existence d'une obligation de mise en garde annihile le spectre de la responsabilité indéterminée, car l'obligation de mise en garde ne s'étend pas à quiconque est relié d'une façon ou d'une autre au produit fabriqué. Cet argument présume la question résolue. L'obligation de mise en requirement of Anns, supra, that there be sufficient proximity or neighbourhood to found a duty of care. It is not circumscribed and imports no limits on liability. Considerations of indeterminate liability arise in the second step of the Anns analysis. Hence the prima facie duty of care, by itself, cannot resolve the problem of indeterminate liability.

garde constatée ici est seulement une obligation de mise en garde prima facie, conformément à la première condition énoncée dans l'arrêt Anns, précité, voulant qu'il y ait un lien suffisamment étroit pour servir de fondement à une obligation de diligence. Cette obligation n'est pas restreinte et elle n'impose aucune limite à la responsabilité. Les considérations touchant la responsabilité indéterminée sont prises en compte dans la deuxième étape de l'analyse fondée sur l'arrêt Anns. En conséquence, l'obligation de diligence prima facie ne permet pas, à elle seule, de résoudre le problème de la responsabilité indéterminée.

The problem of indeterminate liability constitutes a policy consideration tending to negative a duty of care for contractual relational economic loss. However, the courts have recognized positive policy considerations tending to support the imposition of such a duty of care. One of these, discussed by La Forest J. in Norsk, is the need to provide additional deterrence against negligence. The potential liability to the owner of the damaged property usually satisfies the goal of encouraging persons to exercise due care not to damage the property. However, situations may arise where this is not the case. In such a case, the additional deterrent of liability to others might be justified. The facts in the case at bar do not support liability to the plaintiffs on this basis. BVHB, the owner of the drilling rig, suffered property damage in excess of five million dollars. This is a significant sum. It is not apparent that increasing the defendants' potential liability would have led to different behaviour and avoidance of the loss.

68 Ce problème constitue une considération de principe qui tend à écarter l'obligation de diligence en cas de perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat. Cependant, les tribunaux ont reconnu l'existence de considérations de principe positives qui tendent à appuyer l'imposition d'une telle obligation de diligence. Une de ces considérations, qui a été examinée par le juge La Forest dans l'arrêt Norsk, est la nécessité de fournir un moyen de dissuasion supplémentaire contre la négligence. La responsabilité potentielle envers le propriétaire du bien endommagé suffit habituellement pour inciter les personnes visées à exercer la diligence requise afin de ne pas endommager le bien. Toutefois, il peut se présenter des situations où cela n'est pas suffisant. Dans un tel cas, le moyen de dissuasion supplémentaire que serait l'extension de la responsabilité au profit d'autres personnes pourrait se justifier. Cependant, les faits de l'espèce ne justifient pas d'étendre la responsabilité en faveur des demanderesses sur ce fondement. BVHB, le propriétaire de la plate-forme de forage, a subi des dommages matériels de plus de cinq millions de dollars. Il s'agit d'une somme importante. Il n'est pas évident que le fait d'accroître la responsabilité potentielle des défenderesses aurait amené un comportement différent et permis d'éviter la perte.

Another situation which may support imposition of liability for contractual relational economic loss, recognized by La Forest J. in Norsk, is the case where the plaintiff's ability to allocate the risk to the property owner by contract is slight, either because of the type of the transaction or inequality of bargaining power. Again, this does not assist the plaintiffs in this case. BVI and HOOL not only had the ability to allocate their risks; they did just that. It cannot be said that BVI and HOOL suffered from inequality of bargaining power with BVHB, the very company they created. Moreover, the record shows they exercised that power. The risk of loss caused by down-time of the rig was specifically allocated under the Drilling Contracts between BVI, HOOL and BVHB. The contracts provided for day rate payments to BVHB and/or termination rights in the event of lost or diminished use of the rig. The parties also set out in the contracts their liability to each other and made provision for third party claims arising out of rig operations. Finally, the contracts contained provisions related to the purchase and maintenance of insurance.

du bien dans un contrat est faible, en raison soit du genre d'opération, soit de l'inégalité du pouvoir de négociation. Encore une fois, cela n'est d'aucun secours aux demanderesses en l'espèce. En effet, non seulement BVI et HOOL avaient-elles la capacité de répartir leurs risques, mais c'est exactement ce qu'elles ont fait. Il est impossible d'affirmer que BVI et HOOL ont souffert d'une inégalité du pouvoir de négociation à l'égard de BVHB, la société même qu'elles ont créée. De plus, il ressort du dossier qu'elles ont exercé ce pouvoir. Le risque de pertes causées par le temps d'inactivité de la plate-forme a été expressément réparti dans les contrats de forage intervenus entre BVI, HOOL et BVHB. Ces contrats prévoyaient qu'en cas de perte d'utilisation ou d'utilisation réduite de la plate-forme, il y aurait soit paiement d'un taux journalier à BVHB, soit droit de résiliation ou les deux. Les parties ont également précisé dans les contrats leur responsabilité mutuelle et elles ont pris des mesures au sujet des réclamations des tiers qui pouvaient découler des opérations de forage. En dernier lieu, les contrats comportaient des clauses relatives à la souscription et au maintien d'assurances.

70 I conclude that the policy considerations relevant to the case at bar negative the prima facie duty of care to BVI and HOOL.

Je conclus que les considérations de principe concernant le présent litige annihilent l'obligation de diligence prima facie envers BVI et HOOL.

G. Was BVHB Contributorily Negligent?

G. Y a-t-il eu négligence contributive de BVHB?

71 The Court of Appeal upheld the trial judge's finding that BVHB was contributorily negligent in failing to have an operable GFCB system, that this negligence was the immediate cause of the fire, and that the fire was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of BVHB's negligence. BVHB contends that the entire responsibility for the fire and consequential loss is attributable to the defendants' breach of their duty to warn of the dangers of using Thermaclad on the rig.

La Cour d'appel a confirmé la conclusion du juge de première instance selon laquelle il y a eu négligence contributive de BVHB qui n'a pas installé de système DFT efficace, que cette négligence a été la cause immédiate de l'incendie et que cet incendie était une conséquence raisonnablement prévisible de la négligence de BVHB. BVHB prétend que les défenderesses sont entièrement responsables de l'incendie et de la perte indirecte parce qu'elles ont manqué à leur obligation de mise en garde relativement aux dangers que présentait l'utilisation du Thermaclad sur la plate-forme.

72 BVHB argues that generally courts decline to ascribe contributory negligence in duty to warn cases for policy reasons related to assumption of risk. BVHB urges that in failure to warn cases, a finding of contributory negligence cannot be made unless the defendant shows that the plaintiff voluntarily assumed the risk of injury. This, it says, is not such a case.

contributive dans les affaires d'obligation de mise en garde. BVHB soutient avec insistance que, dans les affaires où il y a violation de l'obligation de mise en garde, les tribunaux ne peuvent conclure à l'existence de négligence contributive que si le défendeur prouve que le demandeur a accepté volontairement le risque de préjudice. Elle affirme que ce n'est pas le cas en l'espèce.

I cannot accept this argument. A finding of contributory negligence is not the same as a finding that the injured party voluntarily accepted the risk of injury. The latter is a complete defence (in the limited circumstances in which it applies), whereas the result of the former is that the injured party generally recovers less than full compensation for its injuries. As Viscount Simon said in Nance v. British Columbia Electric Railway Co., [1951] A.C. 601 (P.C.), at p. 611:

73 Je ne puis accepter cet argument. Conclure à la négligence contributive n'équivaut pas à conclure que la partie lésée a accepté volontairement le risque de préjudice. Dans ce dernier cas, il s'agit d'un moyen de défense complet (dans les circonstances limitées où il s'applique), tandis que, dans le premier, la partie lésée n'est généralement pas indemnisée complètement de son préjudice. Comme l'a déclaré le vicomte Simon dans l'arrêt Nance c. British Columbia Electric Railway Co., [1951] A.C. 601 (P.C.), à la p. 611:

But when contributory negligence is set up as a defence, its existence does not depend on any duty owed by the injured party to the party sued, and all that is necessary to establish such a defence is to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the injured party did not in his own interest take reasonable care of himself and contributed, by this want of care, to his own injury. For when contributory negligence is set up as a shield against the obligation to satisfy the whole of the plaintiff's claim, the principle involved is that, where a man is part author of his own injury, he cannot call on the other party to compensate him in full.

[TRADUCTION] Mais lorsque la négligence contributive est invoquée comme moyen de défense, son existence ne dépend d'aucune obligation que la partie lésée a envers la partie poursuivie, et tout ce qu'il faut pour établir le bien-fondé d'un tel moyen de défense, c'est de convaincre le jury que la partie lésée n'a pas, dans son propre intérêt, fait montre de diligence raisonnable envers elle-même et a contribué, par son absence de diligence, au préjudice qu'elle a subi. Car, lorsque la négligence contributive est invoquée pour combattre l'obligation d'indemniser complètement le demandeur de sa réclamation, le principe en cause est que, quand une personne est en partie responsable du préjudice qu'elle a subi, elle ne peut pas demander à l'autre partie de l'indemniser complètement de celui-ci.

BVHB next submits that the burden on the tortfeasor of proving contributory negligence in duty to warn cases should be more onerous because the injured party lacks the knowledge necessary to make an informed assessment of the risks of using the product. Here, BVHB's failure to use the GFCB system is a foreseeable consequence of the failure to warn of the fire propagation propensity of Thermaclad. In the absence of a warning of the dangers of using Thermaclad on the rig, BVHB viewed the GFCB system only as a protective measure against gas explosions. BVHB contends that had it been warned of the dangers posed by the use of Thermaclad in this marine installation, it would never have permitted the rig to operate in the absence of an effective grounding system. For these reasons, BVHB submits that the defendants bear total responsibility for the fire and its consequences.

74 BVHB soutient ensuite que, dans les affaires d'obligation de mise en garde, il devrait être plus difficile pour l'auteur du délit de se décharger du fardeau de prouver l'existence de la négligence contributive parce que la partie lésée n'a pas la connaissance nécessaire pour évaluer de façon éclairée les risques que présente l'utilisation du produit. En l'espèce, le défaut de BVHB d'utiliser le système DFT est une conséquence prévisible de la violation de l'obligation de mise en garde au sujet de l'inflammabilité du Thermaclad. En l'absence de mise en garde relativement aux dangers que présentait l'utilisation du Thermaclad sur la

plate-forme, BVHB a considéré le système DFT seulement comme une mesure de protection contre les explosions dues au gaz. BVHB prétend que, si elle avait été prévenue des dangers que présentait l'utilisation du Thermaclad dans son installation en mer, elle n'aurait jamais permis l'exploitation de la plate-forme en l'absence d'un système efficace de fuite à la terre. Pour ces raisons, BVHB affirme que les défenderesses doivent assumer l'entière responsabilité de l'incendie et de ses conséquences.

75 The defendants respond that the burden of showing contributory negligence is the same in duty to warn cases as in other cases. The evidence, they submit, establishes contributory negligence. The damage sustained by BVHB was a foreseeable result of BVHB's negligent failure to operate with a functioning GFCB system. BVHB did not need to foresee the specific role that Thermaclad would play in a fire. It is enough that BVHB foresaw the possibility of a gas explosion.

Les défenderesses répondent que le fardeau de la preuve en ce qui concerne la négligence contributive est le même dans les affaires où il y a obligation de mise en garde que dans les autres affaires. Elles prétendent que la preuve établit la négligence contributive. Les dommages subis par BVHB étaient une conséquence prévisible du défaut négligent de BVHB d'utiliser un système DFT efficace. BVHB n'avait pas besoin de prévoir le rôle précis que le Thermaclad jouerait dans un incendie. Il est suffisant que BVHB ait prévu la possibilité d'une explosion due au gaz.

76 I accept the defendants' submissions. The test for contributory negligence was summarized by Denning L.J. in Jones v. Livox Quarries Ld., [1952] 2 Q.B. 608 (C.A.), at p. 615:

> Although contributory negligence does not depend on a duty of care, it does depend on foreseeability. Just as actionable negligence requires the foreseeability of harm to others, so contributory negligence requires the foreseeability of harm to oneself. A person is guilty of contributory negligence if he ought reasonably to have foreseen that, if he did not act as a reasonable, prudent man, he might be hurt himself; and in his reckonings he must take into account the possibility of others being careless.

J'accepte les arguments des défenderesses. Le critère applicable en matière de négligence contributive a été résumé par lord Denning dans l'arrêt Jones c. Livox Quarries Ld., [1952] 2 Q.B. 608 (C.A.), à la p. 615:

> [TRADUCTION] Bien que la négligence contributive ne dépende pas d'une obligation de diligence, elle dépend bel et bien de la prévisibilité. Tout comme la négligence donnant ouverture à une poursuite exige la prévisibilité d'un préjudice à autrui, la négligence contributive exige la prévisibilité d'un préjudice à soi-même. Une personne est coupable de négligence contributive si elle aurait dû raisonnablement prévoir que, si elle n'agissait pas de façon raisonnable et prudente, elle pourrait se causer préjudice; et dans ses estimations, elle doit prendre en considération la possibilité que d'autres personnes manquent de diligence.

The trial judge found that the fire started because the rig was being operated without a GFCB system. The fire would not have occurred "but for" the negligence of BVHB: Snell v. Farrell, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 311. The conduct of BVHB viewed independently was negligent. The fire was a foreseeable result of BVHB's failure to operate with a functioning GFCB system. It was not necessary for BVHB to foresee the precise type of damage or sequence of events that would result from its negligence: Hughes v. Lord Advocate, [1963] A.C. 837 (H.L.), and Overseas Tankship (U.K.) Ltd. v. Miller Steamship Co. Pty., [1967] 1 A.C. 617 (P.C.) (Wagon Mound No. 2). The fact that it was aware of the risk of explosion was enough. It follows that the negligence of BVHB was a proximate cause of the fire.

BVHB a été négligente. L'incendie qui s'est produit était une conséquence prévisible du fait que BVHB n'a pas utilisé un système DFT efficace. Il n'était pas nécessaire que BVHB prévoie de façon précise les dommages ou la suite d'événements qui résulteraient de sa négligence: Hughes c. Lord Advocate, [1963] A.C. 837 (H.L.) et Overseas Tankship (U.K.) Ltd. c. Miller Steamship Co. Pty., [1967] 1 A.C. 617 (P.C.) (Wagon Mound No. 2). Le fait qu'elle connaissait le risque d'explosion était suffisant. Il s'ensuit que la négligence de BVHB a constitué une cause immédiate de l'incendie.

BVHB also argues that there should be a distinction between responsibility for "fire initiation" damages and "fire propagation" damages. The trial judge did not determine the precise role played by Thermaclad in the damage, particularly with respect to the damage to the cables. Although he found that the fire was initially spread from the Thermaclad to the cables, he also found that once the cables caught fire they fuelled themselves and caused additional Thermaclad to catch fire. These findings preclude distinguishing between the damage caused by initiation and propagation in this case.

I agree with the courts below that BVHB was contributorily negligent. The remaining question is the extent of BVHB's responsibility. Apportionment of liability is primarily a matter within the province of the trial judge, and appellate courts should not interfere with the trial judge's apportionment unless there is demonstrable error in the trial judge's appreciation of the facts or applicable legal principles: Sparks v. Thompson, [1975] 1 S.C.R. 618; see also the judgment of Dickson J. (as he then was) in Taylor v. Asody, [1975] 2 S.C.R. 414 (dissenting in result).

78 Je suis d'accord avec les juridictions inférieures pour conclure à la négligence contributive de BVHB. La question qui reste est celle de l'étendue de la responsabilité de BVHB. La répartition de la responsabilité est une question qui relève au premier chef du juge de première instance, et les tribunaux d'appel ne devraient pas modifier la répartition faite par ce dernier sauf s'il a commis une erreur démontrable dans l'appréciation des faits ou des principes juridiques applicables: Sparks c. Thompson, [1975] 1 R.C.S. 618; voir également les motifs du juge Dickson (plus tard juge en chef) dans l'arrêt Taylor c. Asody, [1975] 2 R.C.S. 414 (dissidents quant au résultat).

BVHB submits that the Court of Appeal should have reassessed the apportionment of responsibility because it reversed the trial judge's finding that it was negligent in allowing the cables to accumulate residue. The trial judge apportioned the majority of the fault to BVHB on the ground that BVHB's negligence in continuing to operate the heat trace system, even when unnecessary, outweighed the defendants' negligence. The accumulation of residue on the cables was not determinative. It follows that reversal on that issue does not invalidate the trial judge's conclusion that the plaintiff should bear the greatest portion of responsibility for the loss.

donné qu'elle a infirmé la conclusion du juge de première instance selon laquelle BVHB avait été négligente en permettant l'accumulation de résidus d'huile sur les câbles. Le juge de première instance a attribué la plus grande partie de la faute à BVHB pour le motif que la négligence dont celle-ci a fait montre en continuant de faire fonctionner le système de réchauffage des conduites, même lorsque ce n'était pas nécessaire, l'emportait sur la négligence des défenderesses. L'accumulation de résidus sur les câbles n'a pas été déterminante. Il s'ensuit que l'annulation du jugement sur ce point n'invalide pas la conclusion du juge de première instance que la demanderesse devrait assumer la plus grande partie de la responsabilité de la perte.

80 More generally, the trial judge made no error of fact or law in apportioning liability for the loss. There was ample evidence to support his finding that BVHB's negligence outweighed that of the defendants. Although it may not have been aware of the detailed characteristics of Thermaclad, BVHB was aware that it could burn. It was aware of the risk of arcing as there had been previous arcing incidents, and it was aware of the risk of explosion from arcing. Nor did the trial judge misapprehend the applicable legal principles. I would not disturb the trial judge's finding that the liability should be apportioned 60 percent to BVHB and 40 percent to the defendants Raychem and SJSL.

De façon plus générale, le juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur de fait ni de droit en répartissant la responsabilité de la perte. Il y avait amplement d'éléments de preuve étayant sa conclusion que la négligence de BVHB l'emportait sur celle des défenderesses. Même si BVHB ne connaissait peut-être pas le détail des caractéristiques du Thermaclad, elle savait qu'il pouvait brûler. Elle était au courant du risque de formation d'arcs électriques, car il y en avait déjà eus, et elle était au courant du risque d'explosion due à des arcs électriques. De plus, le juge de première instance n'a pas mal compris les principes juridiques applicables. Je suis d'avis de ne pas modifier sa conclusion que la responsabilité devrait être attribuée dans une proportion de 60 pour 100 à BVHB et dans une proportion de 40 pour 100 aux défenderesses Raychem et SJSL.

H. Does BVHB's Contributory Negligence Bar Its Claims?

H. La négligence contributive de BVHB constitue-t-elle une fin de non-recevoir à ses réclamations?

81 The defendants assert that the plaintiffs' claims are barred because at common law, contributory negligence is a bar to recovery. The plaintiffs respond that their contributory negligence is not a bar because: (a) the law of the vessel's flag, Bermuda, applies; (b) alternatively, the Newfoundland Contributory Negligence Act applies; (c) in the further alternative, the common law applicable in maritime cases does not make contributory negligence a bar. Les défenderesses prétendent que les réclamations des demanderesses sont irrecevables parce que, en common law, la négligence contributive constitue une fin de non-recevoir à l'indemnisation. Les demanderesses répliquent que leur négligence contributive ne constitue pas une fin de non-recevoir pour les raisons suivantes: a) le droit applicable est celui du pays dont le bâtiment bat pavillon, en l'occurrence les Bermudes; b) subsidiairement, c'est la Contributory Negligence Act de Terre-Neuve qui s'applique; c) subsidiairement encore, la common law applicable aux affaires maritimes ne fait pas de la négligence contributive une fin de non-recevoir. J'accepte la prétention des demanderesses pour le dernier motif invoqué, et je conclus que la négligence contributive de BVHB ne fait pas obstacle à l'exercice de son droit d'être indemnisée.

The first question is whether the law of the vessel applies. The plaintiffs argue that the fire occurred on the high seas, making applicable the law of the flag of the vessel, Bermuda. They then assert that since Bermuda law was not proven, the law of Newfoundland should be applied. This argument rests on a series of tenuous propositions, the first of which is that the fire occurred on the high seas. It must fail, if only because the fact was not proved.

82 La première question est de savoir si le droit du pays dont le navire bat pavillon s'applique. Les demanderesses soutiennent que comme l'incendie est survenu en haute mer, c'est en l'occurrence le droit des Bermudes qui s'applique. Elles poursuivent en affirmant que, puisque le droit des Bermudes n'a pas été prouvé, c'est celui de Terre-Neuve qui devrait être appliqué. Cette thèse s'appuie sur une série d'arguments plutôt faibles, le premier étant que l'incendie est survenu en haute mer. Cette thèse ne saurait être retenue, ne serait-ce que parce que ce fait n'a pas été prouvé.

Alternatively, the plaintiffs submit that the law of Newfoundland should be applied. The defendants reply that this is a maritime matter and that the applicable law is maritime law, not the law of Newfoundland. This raises the question of which law applies — Newfoundland law or federal maritime law?

83 Subsidiairement, les demanderesses avancent que le droit de Terre-Neuve devrait s'appliquer. Les défenderesses répondent qu'il s'agit d'une affaire maritime et que le droit applicable est le droit maritime et non le droit de Terre-Neuve. Cela soulève la question de savoir quel droit s'applique — le droit de Terre-Neuve ou le droit maritime fédéral?

The plaintiffs submit that maritime law should not apply because the Thermaclad had no relationship to the rig's navigational equipment and because the claims are advanced in tort and contract, rather than navigation and shipping. However, the legal nature of a claim is not the decisive factor in the determination of whether the principles of maritime law apply. What is required is "that the subject-matter under consideration in any case [be] so integrally connected to maritime matters as to be legitimate Canadian maritime law within federal legislative competence": ITO—International Terminal Operators Ltd. v. Miida Electronics Inc., [1986] 1 S.C.R. 752, at p. 774, per McIntyre J. It follows that "tortious liability which arises in a maritime context is governed by a body of maritime law within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of Parliament": Whitbread v. Walley, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1273, at p. 1289, per La Forest J.

85 This case involves tortious liability arising in a maritime context. The Court of Appeal, per Cameron J.A., held that "[t]he activities of the Bow Drill 3 are essentially maritime in nature, albeit a modern view of maritime activity" (p. 134). The rig was not only a drifting platform, but a navigable vessel. As Cameron J.A. put it at pp. 133-34, the rig "is capable of self-propulsion; even when drilling, is vulnerable to the perils of the sea; is not attached permanently to the ocean floor and, can travel world wide to drill for oil". Alternatively, even if the rig is not a navigable vessel, the tort claim arising from the fire would still be a maritime matter since the main purpose of the Bow Drill III was activity in navigable waters. The operation of the rig's heat trace system was hazardous because the GFCB system that was installed was not appropriate in the ungrounded marine context. The claims against the defendants for failure to warn included allegations that the defendants knew about the special marine material requirements such as non-combustibility or flame retardancy. The products liability issues in this case are clearly dominated by marine considerations.

86 This is not a case that "is in 'pith and substance' a matter of local concern involving property and civil rights or any other matter which is in essence within exclusive provincial jurisdiction under s. 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867": ITO, supra, at p. 774, per McIntyre J. I conclude that the issues sabilité délictuelle dont il est question dans un contexte maritime est régie par un ensemble de règles de droit maritime relevant de la compétence exclusive du Parlement»: Whitbread c. Walley, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 1273, à la p. 1289, le juge La Forest.

Il s'agit en l'espèce de responsabilité délictuelle dans un contexte maritime. La Cour d'appel, sous la plume du juge Cameron, a statué que [TRADUCTION] «[l]es activités de la plate-forme Bow Drill 3 sont essentiellement de nature maritime, quoiqu'il s'agisse d'une activité maritime d'un type moderne» (p. 134). La plate-forme n'était pas seulement une plate-forme flottante, mais un bâtiment navigable. Comme l'a dit le juge Cameron, aux pp. 133 et 134, la plate-forme [TRADUCTION] «peut se propulser par ses propres moyens; même lorsqu'elle fait du forage, elle est vulnérable aux dangers de la mer; elle n'est pas attachée en permanence au fond de l'océan et elle peut voyager à travers le monde afin de forer à la recherche du pétrole». Subsidiairement, même si la plate-forme n'est pas un bâtiment navigable, la réclamation fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle qui a été exercée à la suite de l'incendie n'en serait pas moins une question maritime puisque l'objet principal de la plate-forme Bow Drill III était une activité se déroulant dans des eaux navigables. Le fonctionnement du système de réchauffage des conduites de la plate-forme était dangereux parce que le système DFT qui avait été installé ne convenait pas dans un contexte maritime sans mise à la terre. Les réclamations exercées contre les défenderesses pour défaut de mise en garde comportaient des allégations selon lesquelles les défenderesses connaissaient les exigences spéciales concernant le matériel maritime comme l'incombustibilité ou l'ininflammabilité. Dans la présente affaire, les questions relatives à la responsabilité du fait des produits sont clairement dominées par des considérations d'ordre maritime.

Il ne s'agit pas d'une affaire qui «constitue, de par son caractère véritable, une matière d'une nature locale mettant en cause la propriété et les droits civils ou toute autre question qui relève essentiellement de la compétence exclusive de la province en vertu de l'art. 92 de la Loi constitu- for resolution in this case are integrally connected with maritime matters, and fall to be resolved under Canadian maritime law.

The plaintiffs next submit that even if the claims are maritime matters, the law of Newfoundland applies because treaties and related laws make Newfoundland the proper legal forum and provide for the operation of Newfoundland law on the continental shelf. The difficulty with this submission is that assuming Newfoundland law to apply, Newfoundland law includes federal law and the principle that Canadian maritime law applies to maritime matters:

> Once it has been determined that a matter is governed by constitutionally valid federal law, as in this case, then the relevant legal unit is Canada and not a particular province. Federal law is not foreign law vis-à-vis the law of a province since it is an integral part of the law of each province and territory. [Emphasis added.]

(ITO, supra, at p. 777, per McIntyre J.)

Since the claims advanced relate to maritime matters, the law of Newfoundland mandates the application of Canadian maritime law, not the Newfoundland Contributory Negligence Act.

Policy considerations support the conclusion that marine law governs the plaintiffs' tort claim. Application of provincial laws to maritime torts would undercut the uniformity of maritime law. The plaintiff BVHB argues that uniformity is only necessary with respect to matters of navigation and shipping, such as navigational rules or items that are the subject of international conventions. I do not agree. There is nothing in the jurisprudence of this Court to suggest that the concept of uniformity should be so limited. This Court has stated that "Canadian maritime law", not merely "Canadian maritime law related to navigation and shipping", must be uniform. BVHB argues that uniformity can be achieved through the application of provincial contributory negligence legislation as all prov-tionnelle de 1867»: ITO, précité, à la p. 774, le juge McIntyre. Je conclus que les questions qui se posent en l'espèce relèvent intégralement du domaine maritime et doivent être tranchées en vertu du droit maritime canadien.

87 Les demanderesses soutiennent ensuite que, même si les réclamations sont des questions d'ordre maritime, le droit de Terre-Neuve s'applique parce que des traités et des lois connexes font de Terre-Neuve le ressort compétent et prévoient l'application du droit de cette province au plateau continental. La difficulté que présente cet argument est que, en supposant que le droit de Terre-Neuve s'applique, celui-ci comprend le droit fédéral et donc le principe que le droit maritime canadien s'applique aux affaires maritimes:

> Dès qu'il est établi qu'une question est régie par une loi fédérale valide sur le plan constitutionnel, comme c'est le cas en l'espèce, l'entité juridique importante est alors le Canada et non une province en particulier. Le droit fédéral ne constitue pas du droit étranger par rapport à celui d'une province, puisqu'il fait partie intégrante du droit de chaque province et de chaque territoire. [Je souligne.]

Comme les réclamations présentées concernent le domaine maritime, le droit de Terre-Neuve commande l'application du droit maritime canadien et non celle de la Contributory Negligence Act de cette province.

88 Des considérations de principe viennent étayer la conclusion selon laquelle le droit maritime régit la réclamation fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle exercée par les demanderesses. L'application des lois provinciales aux délits maritimes nuirait à l'uniformité du droit maritime. La demanderesse BVHB soutient que l'uniformité est nécessaire seulement en ce qui concerne les affaires de navigation et d'expéditions par eau, comme les règles de la navigation ou les questions qui font l'objet de conventions internationales. Je ne suis pas d'accord. Rien dans la jurisprudence de notre Cour ne donne à penser que la notion d'uniformité devrait être ainsi limitée. Notre Cour a déclaré que «le droit maritime canadien», et non pas seulement «le droit maritime canadien relatif à la navigation et inces have apportionment provisions in the statutes. However, there are important differences between the various provincial statutes. These differences might lead over time to non-uniformity and uncertainty. Difficulty might also arise as to what province's law applies in some situations.

aux expéditions par eau», doit être uniforme. BVHB plaide que cette uniformité peut être réalisée par l'application des lois provinciales en matière de négligence contributive, puisque toutes les provinces ont édicté, dans ces lois, des dispositions concernant la répartition de la responsabilité. Cependant, il existe des différences importantes entre les diverses lois provinciales. Ces différences pourraient, avec le temps, créer de l'incertitude et entraîner une absence d'uniformité. Des difficultés pourraient également surgir lorsqu'il s'agira de déterminer le droit de quelle province s'applique dans certaines situations.

89 The plaintiffs argue that this Court's decision in Stein v. The Ship "Kathy K", [1976] 2 S.C.R. 802, provides that provincial laws can apply to maritime matters in the absence of federal law. Assuming this is so, it does not advance the plaintiffs' case. On the view I take, there is no "gap" that would allow for the application of provincial law. While the federal government has not passed contributory negligence legislation for maritime torts, the common law principles embodied in Canadian maritime law remain applicable in the absence of federal legislation. The question is not whether there is federal maritime law on the issue, but what that law decrees.

Les demanderesses prétendent qu'il ressort de l'arrêt de notre Cour Stein c. Le navire «Kathy K», [1976] 2 R.C.S. 802, que des lois provinciales peuvent s'appliquer à des affaires maritimes en l'absence de règles de droit fédéral. À supposer que ce soit le cas, cela n'aide pas la cause des demanderesses. Suivant le point de vue que j'adopte, il n'existe pas de «vide» qui justifierait l'application du droit provincial. Bien que le gouvernement fédéral n'ait pas adopté de loi concernant la négligence contributive en matière de délits maritimes, les principes de common law incorporés dans le droit maritime canadien restent applicables en l'absence de législation fédérale. La question n'est pas de savoir s'il existe des règles de droit maritime fédérales sur la question en litige, mais plutôt de savoir ce que dicte ce droit.

90 The common law inherited from Britain barred a contributorily-negligent plaintiff from recovery. Canadian maritime law embraces the common law principles of tort: ITO, supra, at p. 779. The basis of the old common law "defence" of contributory negligence, thought to have originated in Butterfield v. Forrester (1809), 11 East. 60, 103 E.R. 926 (K.B.), was that the damages suffered by a contributorily negligent party were not totally the fault of a tortfeasor. Courts were reluctant to allow the injured party to recover where the tortfeasor was not fully responsible for the damage. In essence, this was a "causation" rationale. The Court took the view that the injured party had failed to prove that the tortfeasor caused the damage: Toronto Transportation Commission v. The King, [1949]

La common law héritée de l'Angleterre faisait obstacle à l'indemnisation des demandeurs dont la négligence contributive avait été retenue. Le droit maritime canadien englobe les principes de la common law en matière de responsabilité délictuelle: ITO, précité, à la p. 779. Le vieux [TRADUCTION] «moyen de défense» fondé sur la négligence contributive en common law, dont l'origine serait l'arrêt Butterfield c. Forrester (1809), 11 East. 60, 103 E.R. 926 (K.B.), reposait sur l'idée que les dommages subis par une partie coupable de négligence contributive n'étaient pas entièrement imputables à la faute de l'auteur du délit. Les tribunaux étaient réticents à permettre l'indemnisation de la partie lésée alors que l'auteur du délit n'était pas totalement responsable des dommages. Essentielle-

S.C.R. 510, at p. 515. In England, prior to statutory revision, this bar for recovery by contributorily negligent plaintiffs was acknowledged to apply in maritime cases: see e.g. The "Sobieski" (1949), 82 Ll.L.R. 370 (C.A.). In Canada, the rule has been applied or referred to in the context of both non-maritime and maritime matters in cases including: Toronto Transportation Commission, supra, Gartland Steamship Co. v. The Queen, [1960] S.C.R. 315, Algoma Central & Hudson Bay Railway Co. v. Manitoba Pool Elevators Ltd., [1964] Ex. C.R. 505, and Fraser River Harbour Commission v. The "Hiro Maru", [1974] 1 F.C. 490 (T.D.).

ment, il s'agissait d'un raisonnement fondé sur la [TRADUCTION] «causalité». La Cour a estimé que la partie lésée n'avait pas prouvé que l'auteur du délit avait causé les dommages: Toronto Transportation Commission c. The King, [1949] R.C.S. 510, à la p. 515. En Angleterre, avant la réforme législative, il était admis que cet obstacle à l'indemnisation des demandeurs coupables de négligence contributive s'appliquait aux affaires maritimes: voir, par ex., l'arrêt The «Sobieski» (1949), 82 Ll.L.R. 370 (C.A.). Au Canada, la règle a été appliquée ou mentionnée dans le contexte d'affaires maritimes et d'affaires non maritimes, notamment dans les arrêts suivants: Toronto Transportation Commission, précité, Gartland Steamship Co. c. The Queen, [1960] R.C.S. 315, Algoma Central & Hudson Bay Railway Co. c. Manitoba Pool Elevators Ltd., [1964] Ex. C.R. 505, et Commission de port du Fraser c. Le «Hiro Maru», [1974] 1 C.F. 490 (1re inst.).

The common law rule has been abrogated for certain collisions between vessels by s. 565 of the Canada Shipping Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. S-9, but remains in effect for situations not covered by the Canada Shipping Act provisions: see e.g. Algoma Central, supra, and The "Hiro Maru", supra. Parliament recently tabled Bill C-73, which would (amongst other matters) reform the Canada Shipping Act in relation to collision cases involving wrongful death by stating that in such cases contributory negligence is not a bar to recovery and establishing an apportionment regime. The Department of Justice is considering wider reforms, including the abrogation of the contributory negligence bar through the enactment of federal legislation: see Department of Justice, Admiralty and Maritime Law Section, Discussion Paper, Eliminating Outmoded Common Law Defences in Maritime Torts.

91 La règle de common law a été abrogée à l'égard de certaines collisions entre des bâtiments par l'art. 565 de la Loi sur la marine marchande du Canada, L.R.C. (1985), ch. S-9, mais elle continue de s'appliquer aux situations non visées par les dispositions de cette loi: voir, par ex., Algoma Central, précité, et Le «Hiro Maru», précité. Récemment, le législateur fédéral a déposé le projet de loi C-73, qui vise à modifier (entre autres choses) la Loi sur la marine marchande du Canada en ce qui concerne les affaires de collision entraînant un décès causé par une faute, en précisant que, dans de tels cas, la négligence contributive de la victime n'entraîne pas l'irrecevabilité de la demande d'indemnisation et en établissant un régime de partage de la responsabilité. Le ministère de la Justice envisage des réformes plus vastes, notamment l'abolition de la fin de non-recevoir tirée de la négligence contributive par l'édiction de dispositions législatives fédérales: voir ministère de la Justice, Section de l'amirauté et du droit maritime, Document de travail, Éliminer les moyens de défense démodés de la common law en matière de responsabilité délictuelle maritime.

The plaintiffs argue that this Court should follow the approach taken by the Newfoundland

92 Les demanderesses soutiennent que notre Cour devrait suivre l'approche adoptée par la Cour d'ap-

Court of Appeal and remove the maritime contributory negligence bar. They contend that the bar is out of date, and that it is time for Canada to adopt a regime of apportionment in maritime claims, as other jurisdictions have done. The defendants, in response, submit that the common law rule barring recovery for contributory negligence in maritime cases is long established. They point out that parties involved in maritime activity arrange their affairs on the basis of the existing law, which bars recovery by contributorily negligent plaintiffs in maritime collision cases. If the bar is to be lifted, this should be done by Parliament, they argue.

pel de Terre-Neuve et abolir la fin de non-recevoir tirée de la négligence contributive en matière maritime. Elles prétendent que cette fin de non-recevoir est dépassée et que le temps est venu pour le Canada de faire comme ont fait d'autres pays et d'adopter un régime de partage de la responsabilité dans les réclamations en matière maritime. Les défenderesses répliquent que la règle de common law faisant obstacle à l'indemnisation en cas de négligence contributive dans les affaires maritimes est établie depuis longtemps. Elles soulignent que les parties qui exercent des activités dans le domaine maritime organisent leurs affaires en fonction du droit existant, qui interdit l'indemnisation des demandeurs coupables de négligence contributive dans les affaires de collision en mer. Si cette interdiction doit être levée, c'est par le législateur fédéral qu'elle devrait l'être, affirment-elles.

93 The question is whether the proposed change falls within the test for judicial reform of the law which has been developed by this Court. Courts may change the law by extending existing principles to new areas of the law where the change is clearly necessary to keep the law in step with the "dynamic and evolving fabric of our society" and the ramifications of the change are not incapable of assessment. Conversely, courts will not intervene where the proposed changes will have complex and far-reaching effects, setting the law on an unknown course whose ramifications cannot be accurately gauged: Watkins v. Olafson, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 750, and R. v. Salituro, [1991] 3 S.C.R. 654. As Iacobucci J. put it in Salituro (at p. 670):

La question qui se pose est de savoir si le changement proposé satisfait au critère élaboré par notre Cour en ce qui concerne la réforme du droit par les tribunaux. Les tribunaux peuvent changer le droit en étendant les principes existants à de nouveaux domaines du droit lorsque le changement est clairement nécessaire pour que le droit suive «l'évolution et le dynamisme de la société» et lorsqu'il n'est pas impossible d'évaluer les conséquences du changement. À l'inverse, les tribunaux n'interviendront pas lorsque les changements proposés auront des effets complexes et d'une grande portée, plaçant le droit sur une trajectoire inconnue et dont les conséquences ne peuvent pas être mesurées avec précision: Watkins c. Olafson, [1989] 2 R.C.S. 750, et R. c. Salituro, [1991] 3 R.C.S. 654. Comme l'a dit le juge Iacobucci dans Salituro (à la p. 670):

> These cases reflect the flexible approach that this Court has taken to the development of the common law. Judges can and should adapt the common law to reflect the changing social, moral and economic fabric of the country. Judges should not be quick to perpetuate rules whose social foundation has long since disappeared. Nonetheless, there are significant constraints on the power of the judiciary to change the law. As McLachlin J. indicated in Watkins, supra, in a constitutional democracy such as ours it is the legislature and not the courts which has the major responsibility for law reform; and for any changes to the law which may have complex

> Ces arrêts témoignent de l'attitude souple que notre Cour a adoptée envers l'évolution de la common law. Les juges peuvent et doivent adapter la common law aux changements qui se produisent dans le tissu social, moral et économique du pays. Ils ne doivent pas s'empresser de perpétuer des règles dont le fondement social a depuis longtemps disparu. D'importantes contraintes pèsent cependant sur le pouvoir des tribunaux de changer le droit. Comme le juge McLachlin l'a souligné dans l'arrêt Watkins, précité, en régime de démocratie constitutionnelle comme le nôtre, c'est le législateur et non les tribunaux qui assume, quant à la réforme du droit, la ramifications, however necessary or desirable such changes may be, they should be left to the legislature. The judiciary should confine itself to those incremental changes which are necessary to keep the common law in step with the dynamic and evolving fabric of our society.

responsabilité principale; et tout changement qui risquerait d'entraîner des conséquences complexes devrait, aussi nécessaire ou souhaitable soit-il, être laissé au législateur. Le pouvoir judiciaire doit limiter son intervention aux changements progressifs nécessaires pour que la common law suive l'évolution et le dynamisme de la société.

In my view, recognition of shared liability for fault and elimination of the contributory negligence bar in maritime torts falls within these principles.

À mon avis, la reconnaissance du partage de la responsabilité en cas de faute et la suppression de la fin de non-recevoir tirée de la négligence contributive en matière de délits maritimes sont visées par ces principes.

First, the change is required to keep the maritime common law "in step with the dynamic and evolving fabric of our society". The considerations on which the contributory negligence bar was based no longer comport with the modern view of fairness and justice. Tort law no longer accepts the traditional theory underpinning the contributory negligence bar — that the injured party cannot prove that the tortfeasor "caused" the damage. The contributory negligence bar results in manifest unfairness, particularly where the negligence of the injured party is slight in comparison with the negligence of others. Nor does the contributory negligence bar further the goal of modern tort law of encouraging care and vigilance. So long as an injured party can be shown to be marginally at fault, a tortfeasor's conduct, no matter how egregious, goes unpunished.

94 Premièrement, le changement est requis pour que la common law en matière maritime «suive l'évolution et le dynamisme de la société». Les considérations servant de fondement à la fin de non-recevoir tirée de la négligence contributive ne sont plus compatibles avec la conception moderne de l'équité et de la justice. Le droit de la responsabilité délictuelle n'accepte plus la doctrine traditionnelle qui sous-tend cette fin de non-recevoir — savoir que la partie lésée est incapable de prouver que l'auteur du délit «a causé» le dommage. La fin de non-recevoir tirée de la négligence contributive est source d'injustice manifeste, particulièrement lorsque la négligence de la partie lésée est légère en comparaison de celle d'autrui. Cette fin de non-recevoir ne sert pas non plus l'objectif du droit moderne de la responsabilité délictuelle qui consiste à favoriser la diligence et la vigilance. Tant qu'il est possible d'établir que la partie lésée est marginalement fautive, la conduite de l'auteur d'un délit, si odieuse soit-elle, reste impunie.

Judges and commentators are united in condemning the bar. The continuing existence of a maritime contributory negligence bar has been termed "archaic" (see W. Tetley, "A Definition of Canadian Maritime Law" (1996), 30 U.B.C. L. Rev. 137, at p. 138). In a maritime personal injury case, Mackenzie J. described the bar much less charitably as "a harsh anachronism out of tune with contemporary standards of fairness": Peters v. A.B.C. Boat Charters Ltd. (1992), 73 B.C.L.R. (2d) 389 (S.C.), at p. 397.

95 Les juges et les commentateurs s'unissent pour condamner cette fin de non-recevoir. Son maintien en matière maritime a été qualifié d'[TRADUCTION] «archaïque» (voir W. Tetley, «A Definition of Canadian Maritime Law» (1996), 30 U.B.C. L. Rev. 137, à la p. 138). Dans une affaire de lésions corporelles en matière maritime, le juge Mackenzie a décrit cette fin de non-recevoir en termes beaucoup moins charitables, la qualifiant d'[TRADUCTION] «anachronisme criant, complètement déphasé par rapport aux normes contemporaines de l'équité»: Peters c. A.B.C. Boat Charters Ltd. (1992), 73 B.C.L.R. (2d) 389 (C.S.), à la p. 397.

96 Although admiralty law in the United States is a combination of legislation and judicially created rules, much of the reform in the area of contributory negligence and apportionment based on liability originated with the judiciary. The United States Supreme Court removed the contributory negligence bar over one hundred years ago in The Max Morris, 137 U.S. 1 (1890). The plaintiff longshoreman sued for injuries sustained when he fell from the defendant ship's bridge. The accident was found to have been caused both by the negligence of the plaintiff and the negligent removal of a ladder by the defendant ship operators. Blatchford J., after reviewing the case law, concluded that the contributory negligence bar had been gradually relaxed and applied the divided damages rule which then prevailed in maritime collision cases. He stated (at pp.14-15):

All these were cases in admiralty, and were not cases of collision between two vessels. They show an amelioration of the common law rule, and an extension of the admiralty rule in a direction which we think is manifestly just and proper. Contributory negligence, in a case like the present, should not wholly bar recovery. There would have been no injury to the libellant but for the fault of the vessel; and while, on the one hand, the court ought not to give him full compensation for his injury, where he himself was partly in fault, it ought not, on the other hand, to be restrained from saying that the fact of his negligence should not deprive him of all recovery of damages. As stated by the District Judge in his opinion in the present case, the more equal distribution of justice, the dictates of humanity, the safety of life and limb and the public good, will be best promoted by holding vessels liable to bear some part of the actual pecuniary loss sustained by the libellant, in a case like the present, where their fault is clear, provided the libellant's fault, though evident, is neither wilful, nor gross, nor inexcusable, and where the other circumstances present a strong case for his relief. We think this rule is applicable to all like cases of marine tort founded upon negligence and prosecuted in admiralty, as in harmony with the rule for the division of damages in cases of collision. The mere fact of the negligence of the libellant as partly occasioning the injuries to him, when they also occurred partly

Bien que le droit de l'amirauté aux États-Unis soit un amalgame de règles législatives et prétoriennes, les tribunaux sont à l'origine d'une grande partie des améliorations apportées dans le domaine de la négligence contributive et de la répartition fondée sur la responsabilité. La Cour suprême des États-Unis a aboli la fin de non-recevoir tirée de la négligence contributive il y a plus de cent ans dans l'arrêt The Max Morris, 137 U.S. 1 (1890). Le débardeur demandeur avait intenté une action par suite des blessures qu'il avait subies en tombant du pont du navire défendeur. Le tribunal a conclu que l'accident avait été causé à la fois par la négligence du demandeur lui-même et par le retrait négligent d'une échelle par les exploitants du navire défendeur. Après examen de la jurisprudence, le juge Blatchford a conclu que la fin de non-recevoir tirée de la négligence contributive avait été graduellement assouplie et il a suivi la règle du partage de la charge des dommages, qui était alors appliquée dans les affaires de collisions maritimes. Il a déclaré ceci (aux pp. 14 et 15):

[TRADUCTION] Il s'agissait exclusivement d'affaires d'amirauté et non pas d'affaires de collision entre deux bâtiments. Elles attestent une amélioration de la règle de common law ainsi qu'une extension de la règle d'amirauté dans une direction que nous croyons manifestement juste et correcte. Dans une affaire comme la présente, la négligence contributive ne devrait pas empêcher totalement l'indemnisation. Le demandeur n'aurait pas subi de préjudice n'eût été la faute du bâtiment; et même si, d'une part, la cour ne doit pas lui accorder pleine compensation pour son préjudice, dès lors qu'il a lui-même été en partie fautif, elle ne doit pas, d'autre part, être empêchée de dire que sa négligence ne devrait pas le priver de toute indemnisation de ses dommages. Comme l'a déclaré le juge de district dans ses motifs en l'espèce, on favorisera davantage l'égalité de la justice, les préceptes de l'humanité, la sécurité de la vie et l'intégrité physique ainsi que le bien public en mettant à la charge des bâtiments une partie de la perte financière réelle subie par le demandeur, dans une affaire comme celle qui nous occupe, lorsque la faute du bâtiment est manifeste, pourvu que celle du demandeur, bien qu'évidente, ne soit ni volontaire, ni lourde, ni inexcusable, et lorsque les autres circonstances militent fortement en faveur de l'octroi d'une réparation à son endroit. Nous estimons que cette règle est applicable à toutes les affaires analogues de délit sur-through the negligence of the officers of the vessel, does not debar him entirely from a recovery.

venu en mer fondées sur la négligence et poursuivies en amirauté, car elle est en accord avec la règle du partage des dommages dans les affaires d'abordage. Le simple fait que la négligence du demandeur est partiellement à l'origine de ses blessures, alors qu'elles résultent également en partie de la négligence des officiers du bâtiment, ne l'empêche pas totalement d'être indemnisé.

Legislation providing for apportionment based on fault in personal injury cases was later enacted. More recently, the principle of contribution between tortfeasors was recognized in Cooper Stevedoring Co. v. Fritz Kopke, Inc., 417 U.S. 106 (1974). Finally, in relation to collision cases, the United States Supreme Court reformed the common law divided damages rule and apportioned damages proportionately to the comparative degrees of fault: United States v. Reliable Transfer Co., 421 U.S. 397 (1975).

Le texte de loi qui prévoit la répartition en fonction de la faute dans les affaires de lésions corporelles a été adopté plus tard. Plus récemment, le principe de la contribution appliqué aux auteurs d'un délit a été reconnu dans l'arrêt Cooper Stevedoring Co. c. Fritz Kopke, Inc., 417 U.S. 106 (1974). En dernier lieu, en ce qui concerne les affaires de collision, la Cour suprême des États-Unis a réformé la règle du partage de la charge des dommages en common law, et elle a réparti les dommages selon le degré comparatif des fautes commises: United States c. Reliable Transfer Co., 421 U.S. 397 (1975).

I turn next to the question of whether removal of the contributory negligence bar will have unforeseeable or complex ramifications beyond the cognizance of the judiciary. In my view, it will not. The principle of apportionment for non-maritime torts is universally accepted in every part of Canada and indeed, around the world. Statutes have eliminated the bar and substituted a rule of apportionment in England, Australia and the common law provinces of Canada. The same holds under the Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64 (art. 1478): see J.-L. Baudouin, La responsabilité civile (4th ed. 1994), at paras. 490-91. In England, Australia and the United States, the bar has been removed, and apportionment made the rule, for maritime torts. In all these jurisdictions, the rule of apportionment operates without apparent problem. In brief, the proposed change has been tried and tested. This experience tells us what will happen if the contributory negligence bar is lifted and apportionment allowed. We can confidently predict that lifting the bar will not produce unforeseen or problematic consequences. Rather, the effect will be positive: to bring the law in step not only with "the changing social, moral and economic fabric of the country" (Salituro, supra, at p. 670), but with the

J'aborde maintenant la question de savoir si l'abolition de la fin de non-recevoir tirée de la négligence contributive aura des conséquences imprévisibles ou complexes qui échappent aux tribunaux. À mon avis, elle n'en aura pas. Le principe de la répartition en matière de délits non maritimes est accepté universellement, partout au Canada et, de fait, à travers le monde. Des lois ont aboli cette fin de non-recevoir et l'ont remplacée par une règle prescrivant la répartition en Angleterre, en Australie et dans les provinces canadiennes de common law. La même règle existe en vertu du Code civil du Québec, L.Q. 1991, ch. 64 (art. 1478): voir J.-L. Baudouin, La responsabilité civile (4e éd. 1994), aux par. 490 et 491. En Angleterre, en Australie et aux États-Unis, cette fin de non-recevoir a été abolie et la répartition est devenue la règle en matière de délits maritimes. Dans tous ces ressorts, la règle de la répartition s'applique sans problème apparent. En résumé, le changement proposé a été mis à l'épreuve. Cette expérience nous renseigne sur ce qui se passera si la négligence contributive n'est plus considérée comme une fin de non-recevoir et si la répartition est permise. Nous pouvons prédire avec confiance que l'abolition de cette fin de non-recevoir n'entraînera pas de conséquences imprévues ni problématiques. Au contraire, cette décision aura un effet law of other jurisdictions like the United States, Australia and England.

98 The defendants submit that this Court should not change the law to eliminate the contributory negligence bar because it is not in a position to determine what type of regime to put in its place. Here again, however, the experience of other jurisdictions assists us.

99 The first question is whether a defendant should be responsible for only its share of the damages (several liability), or for all of the plaintiff's damages less the percentage of damage attributable to the plaintiff (joint and several liability). The defendants submit that the first approach (several liability) should be adopted as it is more consistent with the collision provisions in s. 565 of the Canada Shipping Act, which provides:

565. (1) Where, by the fault of two or more vessels, damage or loss is caused to one or more of those vessels, to their cargoes or freight or to any property on board, the liability to make good the damage or loss shall be in proportion to the degree in which each vessel was at fault.

This may be contrasted with s. 566, which provides that the liability of vessel owners for personal injury is "joint and several". Without definitively determining the effect of s. 565, which was not argued, the difference between the two sections falls short of demonstrating that Parliament intended liability under s. 565 to be several only. The precursors to ss. 565 and 566 were originally enacted in the Maritime Conventions Act, 1914, S.C. 1914, c. 13, in order to give effect to the articles of the 1910 Brussels Convention. Section 565 originated as a response to the common law admiralty divided damages rule which provided that when two ships collided, each bore 50 percent of the loss. As collisions between more than two positif: celui d'harmoniser le droit applicable non seulement avec les «changements qui se produisent dans le tissu social, moral et économique du pays» (Salituro, précité, à la p. 670), mais également avec le droit d'autres pays comme les États-Unis, l'Australie et l'Angleterre.

Les défenderesses soutiennent que notre Cour ne devrait pas changer le droit pour supprimer la fin de non-recevoir tirée de la négligence contributive car elle n'est pas en mesure de déterminer par quel type de régime il faudrait la remplacer. Encore une fois, cependant, l'expérience d'autres ressorts nous est utile.

La première question est de savoir si le défendeur devrait être responsable seulement de sa part des dommages (responsabilité individuelle) ou de tous les dommages du demandeur, déduction faite du pourcentage des dommages attribuable au demandeur (responsabilité solidaire). Les défenderesses prétendent qu'il faudrait retenir la première méthode (responsabilité individuelle), parce qu'elle est plus compatible avec les dispositions relatives aux collisions de l'art. 565 de la Loi sur la marine marchande du Canada, qui est ainsi rédigé:

565. (1) Lorsque, par la faute de deux ou plusieurs bâtiments, il y a avarie ou perte d'un ou plusieurs de ces bâtiments, de leurs cargaisons ou de leur fret, ou des biens à bord, la responsabilité en matière d'avarie ou de perte est proportionnée au degré de faute de chaque bâtiment.

Cette disposition peut être comparée avec l'art. 566, qui prévoit que les propriétaires des bâtiments sont «solidairement» responsables des lésions corporelles. Sans statuer de façon définitive sur la portée de l'art. 565, cette question n'ayant pas été débattue, j'estime que la différence entre les deux articles ne prouve pas que le législateur fédéral entendait que la responsabilité prévue à l'art. 565 soit individuelle seulement. Les dispositions qui ont précédé les art. 565 et 566 ont été édictées à l'origine dans la Loi des conventions maritimes, 1914, S.C. 1914, ch. 13, pour donner effet aux articles de la Convention de Bruxelles de 1910. L'article 565 répondait à l'origine à la règle d'amirauté en common law concernant le partage vessels are rare (no reported cases of such collisions have been cited to us), it may not have been considered necessary to address the issue of contribution between two or more vessels. By contrast, personal injury actions are more likely to involve more than one defendant, which may explain the reference to joint and several liability in s. 566.

des dommages qui prévoyait qu'en cas d'abordage entre deux bâtiments, chacun assumait 50 pour 100 de la perte. Comme les abordages entre plus de deux bâtiments sont chose rare (aucun cas de ce genre ne nous a été signalé), il est possible qu'on n'ait pas jugé nécessaire de traiter la question de la contribution de deux bâtiments ou plus. Par contraste, les actions pour lésions corporelles sont plus susceptibles de mettre en cause plus d'un défendeur, ce qui peut expliquer la mention de la responsabilité solidaire à l'art. 566.

In the United States, joint and several liability is the rule: Edmonds v. Compagnie Générale Transatlantique, 443 U.S. 256 (1979); see also W. B. Daly and G. H. Falter, "Contribution and Indemnity in Maritime Actions", in Benedict on Admiralty (7th ed. 1995 (loose-leaf)), vol. 2, at p. 1-6. Any tortfeasor paying the plaintiff a greater amount than its portion of liability can obtain contribution from the other tortfeasor(s): Cooper Stevedoring, supra, and Daly and Falter. This appears to be essentially consistent with the contributory negligence legislation of most provinces and England: see e.g. L. Klar, "Contributory Negligence and Contribution Between Tortfeasors" in Studies in Canadian Tort Law (1977), at pp. 163-64, and R. F. V. Heuston and R. A. Buckley, Salmond and Heuston on the Law of Torts (21st ed. 1996), at p. 491. The situation appears to be similar under the Civil Code of Québec (arts. 1523 and 1526): J.-L. Baudouin, Les obligations (4th ed. 1993), at para. 870.

100 Aux États-Unis, la solidarité est la règle: Edmonds c. Compagnie Générale Transatlantique, 443 U.S. 256 (1979); voir également W. B. Daly et G. H. Falter, «Contribution and Indemnity in Maritime Actions», dans Benedict on Admiralty (7e éd. 1995 (feuilles mobiles)), vol. 2, à la p. 1-6. L'auteur d'un délit qui verse au demandeur un montant supérieur à sa part de l'indemnité due peut obtenir une contribution des autres auteurs du délit: Cooper Stevedoring, précité, et Daly et Falter. Cela semble être essentiellement en accord avec la législation de la plupart des provinces et de l'Angleterre en matière de négligence contributive: voir, par ex., L. Klar, «Contributory Negligence and Contribution Between Tortfeasors» dans Studies in Canadian Tort Law (1977), aux pp. 163 et 164, et R. F. V. Heuston et R. A. Buckley, Salmond and Heuston on the Law of Torts (21e éd. 1996), à la p. 491. La situation semble la même en vertu du Code civil du Québec (art. 1523 et 1526): J.-L. Baudouin, Les obligations (4e éd. 1993), au par. 870.

A final question concerns the availability of contribution — that is, the right of a tortfeasor who pays more than its share of the plaintiff's damages to recover the excess amount paid from other tortfeasors. It is often stated that at common law there was no contribution between tortfeasors, citing Merryweather v. Nixan (1799), 8 T.R. 186, 101 E.R. 1337. It may also be noted that in Sparrows Point v. Greater Vancouver Water District, [1951] S.C.R. 396, Rand J. (at p. 412), in concurring reasons, after holding that provincial contributory negligence legislation could not apply, stated that as a result of the application of common law admiralty principles, there could be no contribution. However, the arguments in favour of and against contribution between tortfeasors appear not to have been considered. Commentators have questioned whether the common law rule against contribution was absolute, particularly in cases where the tort committed was not intentional, and there was no malicious motivation: see e.g. G. Williams, Joint Torts and Contributory Negligence (1951), at pp. 83-84, and see also Eliminating Outmoded Common Law Defences in Maritime Torts, supra, at pp. 5-6. Again, under the Quebec Civil Code, contribution is available to a tortfeasor who has paid more than its share of the liability (art. 1536): Baudouin, Les obligations, supra, at para. 881. Like the contributory negligence bar, the idea that there can be no contribution between tortfeasors is anachronistic and not in keeping with modern notions of fairness.

101 La dernière question concerne la possibilité d'une contribution — c'est-à-dire le droit pour l'auteur d'un délit qui verse plus que sa part de l'indemnité accordée au demandeur de recouvrer auprès des coauteurs la somme excédentaire qu'il a versée. On a affirmé souvent que, en common law, il n'y avait pas de contribution entre les coauteurs d'un délit, en citant alors Merryweather c. Nixan (1799), 8 T.R. 186, 101 E.R. 1337. On peut également noter que, dans l'arrêt Sparrows Point c. Greater Vancouver Water District, [1951] R.C.S. 396, le juge Rand (à la p. 412), dans des motifs concordants, après avoir conclu que la législation

provinciale en matière de négligence contributive ne pouvait pas s'appliquer, a déclaré que, par suite de l'application de principes de common law en matière d'amirauté, il ne pouvait y avoir contribution. Cependant, on ne semble avoir examiné ni les arguments favorables ni les arguments défavorables à la thèse de la contribution entre coauteurs d'un délit. Les commentateurs se sont demandé si la règle de common law interdisant la contribution était absolue, particulièrement dans les cas où le délit commis n'était pas intentionnel et où il n'y avait pas de motivation malveillante: voir, par ex., G. Williams, Joint Torts and Contributory Negligence (1951), aux pp. 83 et 84, et voir également Éliminer les moyens de défense démodés de la common law en matière de responsabilité délictuelle maritime, op. cit., aux pp. 5 et 6. Encore une fois, selon le Code civil du Québec, la contribution est ouverte à l'auteur d'un délit qui a versé une somme supérieure à celle correspondant à sa part de responsabilité (art. 1536): Baudouin, Les obligations, op. cit., au par. 881. Comme la fin de non-recevoir tirée de la négligence contributive, l'idée qu'il ne puisse pas y avoir de contribution entre les coauteurs d'un délit est anachronique et ne concorde pas avec les notions modernes d'équité.

102 I conclude that this is an appropriate case for this Court to make an incremental change to the common law in compliance with the requirements of justice and fairness. Contributory negligence may reduce recovery but does not bar the plaintiff's claim. The defendants SJSL and Raychem are jointly and severally liable to the plaintiff BVHB for 40 percent of its loss, subject to a right of contribution between defendants.

Je conclus qu'il s'agit d'un cas où il convient que notre Cour apporte un changement progressif à la common law conformément aux exigences de la justice et de l'équité. La négligence contributive peut réduire l'indemnité, mais elle ne constitue pas une fin de non-recevoir à la réclamation présentée par la demanderesse. Les défenderesses SJSL et Raychem sont solidairement responsables envers la demanderesse BVHB de 40 pour 100 de la perte subie par cette dernière, sous réserve du droit de chacune des défenderesses de demander une contribution à l'autre.

Les défenderesses SJSL et Raychem avaient l'obligation de mettre en garde la demanderesse BVHB contre les dangers que présentait l'utilisation du Thermaclad sur la plate-forme. Le contrat n'excluait pas que la responsabilité délictuelle de SJSL soit engagée à l'égard de BVHB. SJSL et Raychem did not discharge their duty to warn and are equally responsible for failing to do so.

The plaintiff BVHB was contributorily negligent, and responsible for 60 percent of its loss. Its contributory negligence does not bar recovery of the balance of its losses.

VI. Is SJSL Liable to BVHB in Contract?

The Court of Appeal found that the parties settled the contract issues out of court and that there was accord and satisfaction. BVHB appeals this finding.

In BVHB's submission, the purpose of the settlement concluded by the countersigned letter dated November 12, 1985 was not to discharge all contractual liabilities but to determine the final cost of construction so that the day rates could be established. The parties could not, it argues, have intended to abandon other rights in the contract, such as BVHB's intellectual property claims, SJSL's intellectual property reservations, or rights arising from breaches that they were unaware of at the time. It argues that the general release language of the letter should be restrained by the limiting language in an earlier letter outlining construction costs and warranty matters. BVHB also argues that the Court of Appeal's conclusion of accord and satisfaction contravenes the express provisions of clause 1903 of the construction contract:

1903. Any failure by Owner at any time or from time to time to enforce or require the strict keeping and performance of any of the terms or conditions of this Agreement shall not constitute a waiver of such terms or conditions and shall not affect or impair such terms or conditions in any way, or the right of Owner at any time to avail itself of such remedies as it may have for any breaches of such terms or conditions.

Raychem ne se sont pas acquittées de leur obligation de mise en garde et elles sont également responsables de ce manquement.

VI. SJSL est-elle responsable envers BVHB en matière contractuelle?

105 La Cour d'appel a conclu que les parties ont réglé à l'amiable les questions d'ordre contractuel et qu'il y a eu accord et satisfaction sur ce point. BVHB se pourvoit contre cette conclusion.

106 Selon BVHB, le règlement intervenu au moyen de la lettre contresignée en date du 12 novembre 1985 ne visait pas à acquitter toutes les obligations contractuelles mais à déterminer le coût final de la construction pour que les taux quotidiens puissent être fixés. Il n'est pas possible, affirme BVHB, que les parties aient eu l'intention de renoncer aux autres droits prévus au contrat, comme les réclamations de BVHB en matière de propriété intellectuelle, les réserves de SJSL à cet égard ou les droits découlant des manquements dont elles n'étaient pas au courant à l'époque. BVHB soutient que la libération générale formulée dans la lettre devrait être restreinte par le libellé limitatif d'une lettre antérieure exposant les coûts de construction et les clauses relatives à la garantie. BVHB affirme également que la conclusion de la Cour d'appel selon laquelle il y aurait eu entente va à l'encontre des dispositions expresses de la clause 1903 du contrat de construction:

[TRADUCTION]

1903. L'omission par le propriétaire de faire observer toute condition de l'accord ou d'en exiger le respect strict ne constitue pas une renonciation à ces conditions et n'a aucune incidence sur celles-ci ni sur le droit du propriétaire d'exercer en tout temps les recours dont il dispose en cas de manquement à ces conditions.

1997 CanLII 307 (SCC)

Thus, BVHB submits that SJSL's breaches of contract — its failure to provide letters of certification for Thermaclad and its failure to ensure that Thermaclad met the non-combustibility requirements incorporated into the construction contract — remain actionable.

Ainsi, BVHB soutient que les manquements de SJSL au contrat — son omission de fournir des lettres de certification pour le Thermaclad et son omission de vérifier si le Thermaclad satisfaisait aux exigences d'incombustibilité stipulées dans le contrat de construction — donnent encore ouverture à action.

107 SJSL responds by pointing out that the stated purpose of the exchange of cheques was to fully and finally settle all of the claims arising out of the contract, except in relation to the thruster problem (not at issue). The letter did not state that the exchange was for the limited purpose of settling the capital cost of the rig for the determination of the day rates. SJSL says that there is no evidence that SJSL knew or would have cared about BVHB's need to settle contractual issues in order to determine the day rates. Finally, in SJSL's submission, clause 1903 does not apply. A settlement agreement is not a "failure . . . to enforce or require the strict keeping and performance of any of the terms or conditions" of the contract. The purpose of a provision such as clause 1903 is to prevent an argument based on waiver or promissory estoppel, not to prevent the reaching of a settlement agreement entered into for good consideration.

SJSL répond en soulignant que l'objectif déclaré de l'échange des chèques était de régler totalement et définitivement toutes les réclamations découlant du contrat, sauf en ce qui concerne le problème du propulseur (qui n'était pas en litige). La lettre ne mentionnait pas que l'échange avait uniquement pour but de déterminer le coût en capital de la plate-forme en vue de la fixation des taux quotidiens. SJSL dit qu'aucune preuve n'établit qu'elle savait que BVHB devait régler des questions d'ordre contractuel pour déterminer les tarifs quotidiens, ni qu'elle s'y serait intéressée. Enfin, selon SJSL, la clause 1903 ne s'applique pas. Un règlement amiable n'est pas une «omission [. . .] de faire observer toute condition [du contrat] ou d'en exiger le respect strict». Une disposition telle que la clause 1903 a pour objet d'empêcher que soit invoqué tout argument fondé sur une renonciation ou une préclusion promissoire, non pas à empêcher la conclusion d'un règlement pour une contrepartie valable.

108 I agree with the Court of Appeal that the countersigned letter of November 12, 1985 and the exchange of cheques settled the claims for breach of contract. Cameron J.A. correctly stated the requirements of accord and satisfaction as outlined by Scrutton L.J. in British Russian Gazette and Trade Outlook, Ltd. v. Associated Newspapers, Ltd., [1933] 2 K.B. 616 (C.A.), at pp. 643-44:

Je suis d'accord avec la Cour d'appel pour dire que la lettre contresignée en date du 12 novembre 1985 et l'échange des chèques ont réglé les réclamations pour rupture de contrat. Le juge Cameron a bien exposé les exigences requises pour qu'il y ait accord et satisfaction, qui ont été formulées par le lord juge Scrutton dans l'arrêt British Russian Gazette and Trade Outlook, Ltd. c. Associated Newspapers, Ltd., [1933] 2 K.B. 616 (C.A.), aux pp. 643 et 644:

> Accord and satisfaction is the purchase of a release from an obligation whether arising under contract or tort by means of any valuable consideration, not being the actual performance of the obligation itself. The accord is the agreement by which the obligation is discharged. The satisfaction is the consideration which makes the agreement operative.

> [TRADUCTION] L'entente dite d'accord et satisfaction consiste à obtenir la libération d'une obligation découlant d'un contrat ou d'un délit en versant une contrepartie valable autre que l'exécution elle-même de l'obligation elle-même. L'accord est l'échange des consentements en vue d'éteindre l'obligation. La satisfaction est la contrepartie qui donne effet à l'accord.

1997 CanLII 307 (SCC)

The knowledge that BVHB may or may not have had of other potential contractual claims is irrelevant in light of its intention that there be a "full and final settlement". BVHB made no reservations in the letter except for the thrusters. I accept SJSL's argument that BVHB's motivation for entering into the agreement is also irrelevant. The court need not go beyond the purpose of the exchange of cheques unambiguously stated in the countersigned letter: to "constitute full and final settlement of the subject contract and the guarantee provision thereof, with the exception of the thruster problem". The accord and satisfaction was supported by consideration, discharging SJSL from any contractual liability to BVHB in relation to the alleged breaches raised in this case.

Le fait de savoir que BVHB peut avoir eu ou non d'autres réclamations contractuelles potentielles n'est pas pertinent à la lumière de son intention d'arriver à un «règlement complet et définitif». BVHB n'a fait aucune réserve dans la lettre sauf en ce qui concerne les propulseurs. J'accepte l'argument de SJSL que le motif pour lequel BVHB a conclu l'entente n'est pas pertinent non plus. La cour n'a pas à aller au-delà de l'objet de l'échange des chèques, qui est énoncé de manière non ambiguë dans la lettre contresignée: [TRADUCTION] «en règlement complet et définitif du contrat visé et de sa clause de garantie, à l'exception du problème du propulseur». L'entente d'accord et satisfaction était appuyée par une contrepartie et avait pour effet de libérer SJSL de toute responsabilité contractuelle envers BVHB à l'égard des manquements allégués en l'espèce. 109

In view of my conclusion that the contractual issues have been settled and are no longer litigable I make no findings on whether there was a breach of contract or whether if there was, damages would be reduced on account of BVHB's contributory negligence.

Vu ma conclusion selon laquelle les questions d'ordre contractuel ont été réglées et ne sont plus litigieuses, je ne tire aucune conclusion quant à savoir s'il y a eu rupture de contrat ou si, en cas de réponse affirmative à la première question, les dommages-intérêts devraient être réduits pour tenir compte de la négligence contributive de BVHB. 110

VII. Disposition

I would dismiss the main appeal and all cross-appeals, with costs in this Court. As to costs below, the order of the Newfoundland Court of Appeal remains.

VII. Dispositif

Je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi principal et les pourvois incidents, avec dépens devant notre Cour. Pour ce qui est des dépens devant les juridictions inférieures, l'ordonnance de la Cour d'appel de Terre-Neuve reste valide. 111

Version française du jugement des juges Gonthier, Cory, Iacobucci et Major rendu par

IACOBUCCI J. — I have had the advantage of reading the lucid reasons of my colleague, Justice McLachlin. At the outset, I wish to commend my colleague for her treatment of the approaches taken by her and La Forest J. in Canadian National Railway Co. v. Norsk Pacific Steamship Co., [1992] 1 S.C.R. 1021. In that respect, I simply wish to add one comment regarding the issue of contractual relational economic loss.

LE JUGE IACOBUCCI — J'ai eu l'avantage de prendre connaissance des motifs lumineux de ma collègue, le juge McLachlin. Je désire d'abord la complimenter pour sa façon d'aborder les méthodes qu'elle-même et le juge La Forest ont retenues dans l'arrêt Cie des chemins de fer nationaux du Canada c. Norsk Pacific Steamship Co., [1992] 1 R.C.S. 1021. À cet égard, je voudrais simplement ajouter un commentaire relativement à la question de la perte économique relationnelle découlant d'un contrat. 112

113 I understand my colleague's discussion of this matter to mean that she has adopted the general exclusionary rule and categorical exceptions approach set forth by La Forest J. in Norsk. My colleague has found that the circumstances of the present case do not fall within any of the three exceptions identified in that case. She points out that both her reasons and those of La Forest J. in Norsk recognize that the categories of recoverable contractual relational economic loss are not closed and that whether or not a new category ought to be created is determined on a case-by-case basis. In that connection, I approve of her analysis of the facts of this case and applaud the approach she has taken to meld her reasoning in Norsk with that of La Forest J. in this very difficult area of the law.

Si je comprends bien l'examen que ma collègue a fait de cette question, elle a adopté la méthode proposée par le juge La Forest dans l'arrêt Norsk qui consiste à poser une règle générale d'exclusion et à l'assortir d'exceptions fondées sur des catégories. Ma collègue a conclu que les circonstances de l'espèce ne sont visées par aucune des trois exceptions mentionnées dans cet arrêt. Elle souligne qu'il ressort tant de ses motifs que de ceux du juge La Forest dans l'arrêt Norsk que les catégories de pertes économiques relationnelles découlant d'un contrat susceptibles d'indemnisation ne sont pas limitatives et que la question de savoir s'il convient de créer une nouvelle catégorie est réglée dans chaque cas. À ce propos, je suis d'accord avec son analyse des faits en l'espèce et j'approuve la façon dont elle a combiné son raisonnement dans l'arrêt Norsk avec celui du juge La Forest dans ce domaine très difficile du droit.

114 While I agree with most of her analysis in this case, I cannot, with respect, concur with her interpretation of clauses 702, 905 and 907 of the contract between SJSL and BVHB. I agree with my colleague when she points out that limitation and exclusion clauses are to be strictly construed against the party seeking to invoke the clause. I also agree that, where the planned contractual obligations of two parties negate tort liability, contract will "trump" tort. But, I disagree with her conclusion that the clauses in question do not negate SJSL's duty to warn.

Tout en étant d'accord avec la plus grande partie de son analyse en l'espèce, je ne puis, en toute déférence, souscrire à son interprétation des clauses 702, 905 et 907 du contrat intervenu entre SJSL et BVHB. Je suis d'accord avec ma collègue pour dire que les clauses de limitation ou d'exclusion doivent être interprétées de façon stricte à l'encontre de la partie qui cherche à les invoquer. Je conviens également que, lorsque les obligations contractuelles prévues par les deux parties écartent la responsabilité délictuelle, le contrat «l'emportera» sur le délit. Mais je suis en désaccord avec sa conclusion selon laquelle les clauses en question ne font pas disparaître l'obligation de mise en garde qui incombait à SJSL.

115 Clause 907 states in part that, "Builder's liability with respect to the Owner Directed Supply shall extend only to installation thereof . . ." (emphasis added). As I read this clause, the parties have chosen to specify the only ground of builder liability related to the use of Thermaclad, namely, negligence in the installation thereof. By expressly limiting liability to only these circumstances, the parties have, in my view, by necessary implication

La clause 907 stipule notamment que: [TRADUCTION] «[l]a responsabilité du constructeur à l'égard du matériel imposé par le propriétaire s'étend seulement à son installation . . .» (je souligne). Selon mon interprétation de cette clause, les parties ont choisi de préciser le seul fondement permettant d'établir la responsabilité du constructeur relativement à l'utilisation du Thermaclad, à savoir la négligence commise dans son installation. À mon avis, en limitant expressément la responsabilité à ces seules circonstances, les parties ont écarté, par déduction nécessaire, tous les autres fondements excluded all other grounds of builder liability, including the duty to warn.

The fact that Thermaclad is "owner directed supply" reinforces my reading of the provisions in question. In the instant case, Thermaclad was chosen by the owner, BVHB, and the builder, SJSL, was obliged to use that product. Indeed, SJSL would have breached the contract if it had refused to use this material. It seems to me that where the owner specifies a particular product to be used, it is generally the owner and not the builder who, unless otherwise specified in the contract, should bear the losses that flow from the risk associated with that product's use.

Additional reinforcement for my conclusion that the contract provisions create exclusive liability limited to installation is found in the concluding language of clause 907, which reads: "In all other instances, the sole risk and responsibility for Owner Directed Supply shall, as between Builder and Owner, be borne by Owner" (emphasis added). I also draw support from clause 905 which states in part that, the "remedies provided in this Article are exclusive" (emphasis added). In addition, clause 702 states that "the Builder's sole obligation with respect to the Vessel shall be as specified in Article IX" (emphasis added). That article contains both clauses 905 and 907.

In concluding that the present contract does not exclude liability for negligence, my colleague puts much emphasis on the placement of the relevant provisions within the contract. Clauses 905 and 907, both found in the "warranty" section of the contract, are said to function as a "'warranty' of workmanship and materials" (para. 29). My colleague notes that warranties generally do not relate to the duty to warn about the risks associated with the use of the products they cover. However, in my opinion, the placement of clauses within a contract, while a factor to be considered, is not determinative. Rather, in my view, one should examine the contract as a whole with a view to searching for the intention of the parties by recognizing the de responsabilité en ce qui concerne le constructeur, dont l'obligation de mise en garde.

116 Le fait que le Thermaclad soit du «matériel imposé par le propriétaire» renforce mon interprétation des dispositions en question. Dans le cas présent, le Thermaclad a été choisi par le propriétaire, BVHB, et le constructeur, SJSL, était tenu d'utiliser ce produit. En effet, SJSL aurait manqué à son engagement contractuel si elle avait refusé d'utiliser ce matériel. Lorsque le propriétaire spécifie le produit qu'il faut utiliser, il me semble qu'à moins de stipulations contraires du contrat, c'est habituellement lui et non le constructeur qui devrait supporter les pertes découlant du risque lié à l'utilisation de ce produit.

117 Un autre élément qui vient renforcer ma conclusion selon laquelle les dispositions du contrat créent une responsabilité exclusive, limitée à l'installation, c'est la dernière phrase de la clause 907: [TRADUCTION] «Dans tous les autres cas, c'est le propriétaire qui supporte seul les risques et la responsabilité — entre le constructeur et le propriétaire — relativement au matériel imposé par le propriétaire» (je souligne). Je m'appuie également sur la clause 905, qui précise notamment que [TRADUCTION] «[l]es recours prévus au présent article sont exclusifs» (je souligne). De plus, la clause 702 stipule que [TRADUCTION] «la seule obligation du constructeur en ce qui concerne le bâtiment est celle précisée à l'article IX» (je souligne). Cet article comprend les clauses 905 et 907.

118 En concluant que le présent contrat n'exclut pas la responsabilité en cas de négligence, ma collègue insiste beaucoup sur l'endroit où sont placées les dispositions pertinentes dans le contrat. Les clauses 905 et 907, qui se trouvent dans la partie du contrat consacrée à la garantie, sont considérées comme jouant le rôle d'une «"garantie" quant à la fabrication et aux matériaux» (par. 29). Ma collègue note que les garanties ne portent pas en général sur les obligations de mise en garde au sujet des risques liés à l'utilisation des produits qu'elles couvrent. Toutefois, à mon avis, l'endroit où figurent les clauses dans un contrat, tout en constituant un facteur à prendre en considération, n'est pas décisif. Il me semble qu'on devrait plutôt natural meaning that flows from the language chosen.

examiner le contrat dans son ensemble afin de découvrir l'intention des parties en donnant aux termes qu'elles ont employés le sens qui s'en dégage naturellement.

119 When examined in the context of cases which have held parties responsible for negligence without any express contractual reference to that head of liability, it is clear that the clauses in the instant contract are of a very different nature. For example, in Falcon Lumber Ltd. v. Canada Wood Specialty Co. (1978), 95 D.L.R. (3d) 503 (Ont. H.C.), the court found the defendant liable for negligence despite the following at paragraph 13 of the defendant's price list: "The Canada Wood Specialty Company Limited is not responsible for damages or theft that may occur whilst customer lumber and/or property is on The Canada Wood Specialty Co. Ltd. premises." Whereas clauses such as this provide for general exclusion from liability, the language of the clauses at issue in the case at bar expressly provides for the assumption of liability limited to a specific circumstance, namely, negligent installation of owner-directed supply. I do not accept that contract clauses which are so fundamentally different should necessarily be interpreted in the same manner.

Lorsqu'on les examine dans le contexte d'affaires où les parties ont été tenues responsables de négligence sans que cette source de responsabilité ne soit mentionnée de façon expresse dans le contrat, il est clair que les clauses figurant dans le présent contrat sont de nature très différente. Par exemple, dans l'arrêt Falcon Lumber Ltd. c. Canada Wood Specialty Co. (1978), 95 D.L.R. (3d) 503 (H.C. Ont.), la cour a jugé la défenderesse responsable de négligence malgré le passage suivant du paragraphe 13 de la liste de prix de la défenderesse: [TRADUCTION] «La Canada Wood Specialty Company Limited n'est pas responsable des dommages ni des vols qui peuvent survenir pendant que le bois d'œuvre ou les biens du client se trouvent dans les locaux de la Canada Wood Specialty Co. Ltd.» Alors que les clauses comme celle-ci prévoient une exclusion générale de responsabilité, le libellé des clauses visées en l'espèce prévoit expressément l'acceptation d'une responsabilité limitée à un cas particulier, à savoir l'installation négligente du matériel imposé. Je n'accepte pas que des clauses contractuelles si fondamentalement différentes doivent nécessairement être interprétées de la même manière.

120 An alternative analysis set forth by this Court in ITO—International Terminal Operators Ltd. v. Miida Electronics Inc., [1986] 1 S.C.R. 752, leads me to the same conclusion. In Miida Electronics, a marine carrier (Mitsui) agreed in a contract evidenced by a bill of lading to carry goods from Japan to Montreal where the respondent Miida, the other party to the contract and the owner of the goods, could take delivery. The goods arrived in Montreal and were picked up by the appellant, ITO, a cargo-handling company and terminal operator. ITO had agreed with Mitsui to store the goods until delivery was made to Miida. Before the goods could be delivered to Miida, thieves broke into the storage facility operated by ITO and a large number of Miida's goods were stolen. Miida

Une autre analyse effectuée par notre Cour dans l'arrêt ITO—International Terminal Operators Ltd. c. Miida Electronics Inc., [1986] 1 R.C.S. 752, m'amène à la même conclusion. Dans l'arrêt Miida Electronics, un transporteur maritime (Mitsui) a convenu dans un contrat constaté par un connaissement de transporter des marchandises du Japon à Montréal où l'intimée Miida, l'autre partie au contrat et propriétaire des marchandises, pourrait en prendre livraison. Les marchandises sont arrivées à Montréal où elles ont été prises en charge par l'appelante, ITO, une compagnie de manutention et d'acconage. ITO avait convenu avec Mitsui d'entreposer les marchandises jusqu'à leur livraison à Miida. Avant que les marchandises aient pu être livrées à Miida, des voleurs ont pénétré par effrac-alleged that the theft would not have occurred but for the negligence of ITO.

One of the key issues in Miida Electronics was whether a "Himalaya" clause in Mitsui's bill of lading extended limitation of liability to those it employed in the performance of the contract of carriage. However, having decided that the Himalaya clause could be effective, the Court went on to consider whether the exemption clause in the bill of lading, which imposed limits on liability but did not expressly refer to negligence, could relieve ITO of liability for its own negligence. McIntyre J., writing for the majority, relied heavily upon Lamport & Holt Lines Ltd. v. Coubro & Scrutton (M. & I.) Ltd. (The "Raphael"), [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 42 (C.A.), where May L.J. canvassed the jurisprudence in the area and stated (at pp. 49-50):

. . . if an exemption clause of the kind we are considering excludes liability for negligence expressly, then the Courts will give effect to the exemption. If it does not do so expressly, but its wording is clear and wide enough to do so by implication, then the question becomes whether the contracting parties so intended. If the only head of liability upon which the clause can bite in the circumstances of a given case is negligence, and the parties did or must be deemed to have applied their minds to this eventuality, then clearly it is not difficult for a Court to hold that this was what the parties intended — that this is its proper construction. Indeed, to hold otherwise would be contrary to commonsense. On the other hand if there is a head of liability upon which the clause could bite in addition to negligence then, because it is more unlikely than not that a party will be ready to excuse his other contracting party from the consequences of the latter's negligence, the clause will generally be construed as not covering negligence. If the parties did or must be deemed to have applied their minds to the potential alternative head of liability at the time the contract was made then, in the absence of any express reference to negligence, the Courts can sensibly only conclude that the relevant clause was not tion dans l'entrepôt exploité par ITO et se sont emparés d'une grande partie des marchandises de Miida. Cette dernière a soutenu que le vol n'aurait pas eu lieu n'eût été la négligence de la société ITO.

Dans l'arrêt Miida Electronics, l'une des questions cruciales était de savoir si la clause «Himalaya» du connaissement de Mitsui étendait la limitation de responsabilité à ceux qu'elle employait pour exécuter le contrat de transport. Cependant, après avoir décidé que la clause Himalaya pouvait jouer, la Cour s'est demandé si la clause d'exemption du connaissement, qui limitait la responsabilité mais ne mentionnait pas expressément la négligence, pouvait dégager ITO de toute responsabilité due à sa propre négligence. S'exprimant au nom de la majorité, le juge McIntyre s'est appuyé largement sur l'arrêt Lamport & Holt Lines Ltd. c. Coubro & Scrutton (M. & I.) Ltd. (The «Raphael»), [1982] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 42 (C.A.), où le lord juge May a examiné minutieusement la jurisprudence en la matière et a dit (aux pp. 49 et 50):

[TRADUCTION] . . . si une clause de non-responsabilité du genre de celle dont nous sommes saisis exclut expressément la responsabilité pour négligence, les tribunaux donneront alors effet à cette exclusion. Si elle ne le fait pas expressément, mais que son texte est clair et suffisamment général pour le faire tacitement, il s'agit alors de déterminer si c'était bien là l'intention des parties contractantes. Si la seule catégorie de responsabilité que la clause peut frapper dans les circonstances d'une espèce donnée est celle due à la négligence, et que les parties ont eu cette éventualité à l'esprit ou doivent être réputées l'avoir eue, alors, manifestement, il ne sera pas difficile pour le tribunal de juger que c'était bien là la volonté des parties — que c'est là l'interprétation qu'il faut lui donner. D'ailleurs, juger autrement serait contraire au bon sens. D'autre part, s'il y a une catégorie de responsabilité que la clause pourrait viser outre celle due à la négligence, alors, parce qu'il est plus improbable que probable que l'une des parties sera prête à soustraire son cocontractant aux conséquences de sa négligence, la clause sera généralement interprétée comme non applicable à la négligence. Si les parties ont eu à l'esprit, ou doivent être réputées avoir eu à l'esprit, une autre catégorie possible de responsabilité au moment de la conclusion du contrat, alors, en l'absence de mention expresse de la négligence, les tribunaux ne peuvent que conclure que la clause pertinente n'est pas destinée à intended to cover negligence and will refuse so to construe it.

The Ontario Court of Appeal recently relied upon this same line of reasoning in Upper Lakes Shipping Ltd. v. St. Lawrence Cement Inc. (1992), 89 D.L.R. (4th) 722.

122 In Miida Electronics, supra, McIntyre J. found that, as the goods were in short-term storage awaiting delivery, the only liability that could be imposed on ITO would be based on negligence. Therefore, the exemption clause in the bill of lading, despite the absence of an express reference to negligence, was found to relieve ITO of liability for negligence. In my opinion, the contract provisions in the instant case warrant the same treatment. By the wording of clause 905, SJSL is relieved of any liability arising from defects. Clause 907 states that SJSL's liability shall extend only to installation of owner-directed supply and that in all other instances, BVHB bears the risk and responsibility for these products. Therefore, it seems to me that the natural meaning of these clauses indicates that the only head of liability upon which these clauses can bite is negligence in installation. As such, based upon the authority of Miida Electronics, SJSL ought to be relieved of any liability for failing to warn BVHB of the dangers associated with the use of Thermaclad.

123 Accordingly, I must respectfully disagree with McLachlin J.'s conclusion that BVHB was entitled to claim against SJSL based on the tort duty to warn. I note that it is not open to Raychem to seek contribution from SJSL, as a contractor which has protected itself against liability cannot be said to have contributed to any actionable loss suffered by the plaintiff: Giffels Associates Ltd. v. Eastern Construction Co., [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1346. Consequently, Raychem is liable for the entire 40 percent quantum found by the trial judge.

Dans l'arrêt Miida Electronics, précité, le juge McIntyre a conclu que, comme les marchandises étaient entreposées pour une courte période en attendant la livraison, la seule responsabilité qui pouvait être attribuée à la société ITO serait fondée sur la négligence. Par conséquent, il a été décidé que la clause d'exemption figurant dans le connaissement dégageait ITO de toute responsabilité due à la négligence, malgré l'absence d'une mention expresse de la négligence. À mon avis, les dispositions du contrat en l'espèce justifient le même traitement. En vertu du libellé de la clause 905, SJSL est dégagée de toute responsabilité à l'égard des vices. La clause 907 stipule que la responsabilité de SJSL s'étend seulement à l'installation du matériel imposé par le propriétaire et que, dans tous les autres cas, BVHB assume les risques et la responsabilité pour ces produits. Par conséquent, il me semble que selon le sens naturel de ces clauses, elles ne peuvent viser que la responsabilité due à une négligence dans l'installation. Ainsi, compte tenu du poids de l'arrêt Miida Electronics, SJSL devrait être dégagée de toute responsabilité pour avoir omis d'informer BVHB des dangers liés à l'utilisation du Thermaclad.

En conséquence, je suis dans l'obligation de me dissocier de la conclusion du juge McLachlin selon laquelle BVHB avait le droit de poursuivre SJSL en invoquant l'obligation de mise en garde en matière délictuelle. Je fais remarquer que Raychem ne peut pas réclamer une contribution de SJSL car on ne peut pas dire que l'entrepreneur qui s'est protégé de toute responsabilité a contribué à une perte l'exposant aux poursuites du demandeur: Giffels Associates Ltd. c. Eastern Construction Co., [1978] 2 R.C.S. 1346. Par conséquent, Raychem est seule responsable de la part de 40 pour 100 fixée par le juge de première instance.

I would therefore dismiss the appeal brought by HOOL and BVI. Further, I would dismiss all of the cross-appeals save for that of SJSL with regard to the duty to warn, which I would allow with costs throughout. As to costs on the main appeal and all other cross-appeals, I would assess these in the same manner as McLachlin J.

Je suis donc d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi formé par HOOL et BVI. De plus, je suis d'avis de rejeter tous les pourvois incidents, sauf celui de SJSL relativement à l'obligation de mise en garde que je suis d'avis d'accueillir avec dépens dans toutes les cours. Quant aux dépens du pourvoi principal et de tous les autres pourvois incidents, je suis d'avis de les fixer de la même manière que le juge McLachlin. 124

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Civil procedure — Summary judgment — Investor bringing action in civil fraud and subsequently bringing a motion for summary judgment — Motion judge granting summary judgment but being overruled by Court of Appeal — Elements of civil fraud — Whether motion judge erred in granting summary judgment — Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, Rule 20.

Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. is an American corporation. Its principal met with the principal of Frontline Investments, Inc. and as a result of these meetings, executed a number of investment documents in favour of Frontline. Bruno Appliance subsequently wired US$1 million to Cassels Brock, who assigned the funds to an account associated with Tropos Capital Inc., a company of which H was the principal. Bruno Appliance's funds were then bundled with other funds and paid to Tropos in a bank draft. Bruno Appliance's money was not invested and disappeared.

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DE L'ONTARIO

Procédure civile — Jugement sommaire — Investisseur intentant une action pour fraude civile et présentant ensuite une requête en jugement sommaire — Jugement accueillant la requête en jugement sommaire infirmé par la Cour d'appel — Éléments de la fraude civile — Le juge saisi de la requête a-t-il commis une erreur en accueillant la requête en jugement sommaire? — Règles de procédure civile, R.R.O. 1990, Règl. 194, règle 20.

Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. est une société américaine. Son dirigeant a rencontré le dirigeant de Frontline Investments, Inc. et comme suite à ces rencontres, il a signé un certain nombre de documents de placement en faveur de Frontline. Bruno Appliance a par la suite transféré un million de dollars américains à Cassels Brock, qui a placé l'argent dans un compte associé à Tropos Capital Inc., une entreprise dont H était le dirigeant. Les fonds de Bruno Appliance ont ensuite été regroupés avec d'autres fonds et versés à Tropos par traite bancaire. L'argent de Bruno Appliance n'a pas été investi et est disparu.

2014 SCC 8 (CanLII)

Bruno Appliance launched a civil fraud action against H and others, and brought a motion for summary judgment. The motion judge found that Bruno Appliance had established its claim and that there was no issue requiring a trial. The Court of Appeal disagreed and ordered that the Bruno Appliance action proceed to trial.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The scope and interpretation of the amended Rule 20 summary judgment motion are addressed in the companion appeal, Hryniak v. Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 87. Summary judgment may not be granted under Rule 20 where there is a genuine issue requiring a trial. The motion judge should ask whether the matter can be resolved in a fair and just manner on a summary judgment motion. This will be the case when the process (1) allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact, (2) allows the judge to apply the law to the facts, and (3) is a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result. If there appears to be a genuine issue requiring a trial, based only on the record before her, the judge should then ask if the need for a trial can be avoided by using the new powers provided under Rules 20.04(2.1) and (2.2). She may, at her discretion, use those powers, provided that their use is not against the interest of justice.

The Court of Appeal did not err in its determination that Bruno Appliance should not receive summary judgment against H. The following four elements constitute the tort of civil fraud: (1) a false representation made by the defendant; (2) some level of knowledge of the falsehood of the representation on the part of the defendant (whether through knowledge or recklessness); (3) the false representation caused the plaintiff to act; and (4) the plaintiff's actions resulted in a loss.

Civil fraud requires a finding that H made a misrepresentation which induced Bruno Appliance to invest. The motion judge neither identified the need for a misrepresentation, nor found that H made one. H was not present at the meeting that led to Bruno's investment and the motion judge's findings are insufficient to establish that any false statements made at the meeting can be attributed to him.

Bruno Appliance a intenté contre H et d'autres personnes une action pour fraude civile et a présenté une requête en jugement sommaire. Le juge saisi de la requête a conclu que Bruno Appliance avait établi le bien-fondé de sa poursuite et qu'aucune question ne nécessitait la tenue d'un procès. La Cour d'appel s'est dite d'avis contraire et a ordonné l'instruction de l'action intentée par Bruno Appliance.

Arrêt : Le pourvoi est rejeté.

La portée et l'interprétation de la règle 20 relative à la requête en jugement sommaire sont examinées dans le pourvoi connexe Hryniak c. Mauldin, 2014 CSC 7, [2014] 1 R.C.S. 87. Un jugement sommaire ne peut pas être rendu en vertu de la règle 20 en présence d'une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès. Le juge saisi de la requête doit se demander si l'affaire peut être réglée de manière juste et équitable par voie de requête en jugement sommaire. Ce sera le cas lorsque la procédure (1) lui permet de tirer les conclusions de fait qui s'imposent, (2) lui permet d'appliquer le droit aux faits et (3) constitue un moyen proportionné, plus expéditif et moins coûteux d'atteindre un résultat juste. Si, compte tenu uniquement du dossier dont dispose le juge, il semble y avoir une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès, ce dernier doit alors se demander si l'exercice des nouveaux pouvoirs que confèrent les par. 20.04(2.1) et (2.2) des Règles permet d'écarter le besoin d'un procès. Il peut, à son gré, exercer ces pouvoirs pourvu que leur exercice ne soit pas contraire à l'intérêt de la justice.

La Cour d'appel n'a pas commis d'erreur en décidant que Bruno Appliance ne doit pas obtenir un jugement sommaire contre H. Les quatre éléments suivants constituent le délit de fraude civile : (1) le défendeur a fait une fausse déclaration; (2) le défendeur savait, jusqu'à un certain point, que sa déclaration était fausse (sciemment ou par insouciance); (3) la fausse déclaration a incité le demandeur à agir; (4) les actes du demandeur ont entraîné une perte.

La fraude civile exige que H ait fait une fausse déclaration ayant incité Bruno Appliance à investir. Le juge saisi de la requête n'a ni souligné la nécessité qu'il y ait eu fausse déclaration, ni conclu que H avait fait une telle déclaration. H n'était pas présent à la rencontre qui a amené Bruno à investir et les conclusions du juge saisi de la requête ne suffisent pas à prouver que des déclarations fausses faites lors de la rencontre peuvent être attribuées à H.

While the evidence clearly demonstrates that H was aware of the fraud, and may in fact have benefited from the fraud, whether H perpetrated the fraud by inducing Bruno Appliance to contribute US$1 million to a non-existent investment scheme is a genuine issue requiring a trial.

Bien que la preuve démontre clairement que H était au courant de la fraude, et qu'il en a peut-être effectivement bénéficié, la question de savoir si H a commis la fraude en incitant Bruno Appliance à verser un million de dollars américains à un projet d'investissement inexistant constitue une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès.

[1] KARAKATSANIS J. — Like its companion, Hryniak v. Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 87 (Mauldin), this appeal concerns the interpretation and application of Ontario's new summary judgment rules. In this action, the Ontario Court of Appeal overturned the motion judge's decision to grant summary judgment in favour of the plaintiff and made various trial management orders under Rule 20.05 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194.

[2] In light of the principles articulated in the Mauldin appeal and for the reasons that follow, I would dismiss the appeal.

I. Facts

[3] Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. is an American corporation, whose principal is Albert Bruno. In late 2001, Bruno met with Robert Cranston, the principal of a Panamanian company, Frontline Investments, Inc. As a result of these meetings, Bruno executed a number of investment documents in favour of Frontline.

[4] In February 2002, Bruno met with Cranston and Gregory Peebles, a corporate-commercial lawyer at the Toronto offices of Cassels Brock and Blackwell. No notes were kept of this meeting, and the recollection of the participants varies. While Robert Hryniak did not attend this meeting, Tropos Capital Inc. (Tropos), a company of which Hryniak was the principal, received and paid a bill for Peebles' attendance.

Version française du jugement de la Cour rendu par

[1] LA JUGE KARAKATSANIS — Le présent pourvoi, comme le pourvoi connexe Hryniak c. Mauldin, 2014 CSC 7, [2014] 1 R.C.S. 87 (Mauldin), porte sur l'interprétation et l'application des nouvelles règles régissant les jugements sommaires en Ontario. Dans la présente affaire, la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a infirmé la décision du juge saisi de la requête de rendre un jugement sommaire favorable à la demanderesse. Elle a aussi rendu plusieurs ordonnances relatives à la gestion du procès en vertu de la règle 20.05 des Règles de procédure civile, R.R.O. 1990, Règl. 194.

[2] À la lumière des principes énoncés dans le pourvoi Mauldin et pour les motifs qui suivent, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

I. Faits

[3] Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. est une société américaine dirigée par Albert Bruno. Vers la fin de 2001, M. Bruno a rencontré Robert Cranston, le dirigeant d'une entreprise panaméenne, Frontline Investments, Inc. Comme suite à ces rencontres, M. Bruno a signé un certain nombre de documents de placement en faveur de Frontline.

[4] En février 2002, M. Bruno a rencontré M. Cranston et Gregory Peebles, un avocat spécialisé en droit des sociétés et en droit commercial du cabinet Cassels Brock and Blackwell à Toronto. Aucune note sur cette rencontre n'a été conservée et les participants en ont gardé un souvenir différent. Robert Hryniak n'a pas assisté à cette rencontre, mais Tropos Capital Inc. (Tropos), une entreprise dont M. Hryniak était le dirigeant, a reçu et payé une facture pour la présence de M. Peebles.

2014 SCC 8 (CanLII)

[5] In early March 2002, Bruno Appliance wired US$1 million to Cassels Brock, who assigned the funds to an account associated with Tropos. Bruno Appliance's funds were then bundled with other funds (totalling US$3.5 million) and paid to Tropos in a bank draft. At the end of April 2002, Tropos paid US$2.5 million to a company called Southern Equity Investors Inc., and in late June 2002 transferred approximately US$550,000 to an individual named Reinhard. By the end of September 2003, Tropos' balance with Cassels Brock had declined to US$19,000.

[6] In short, Bruno Appliance's money was not invested and it never received a return on its investment.

II. Judicial History

A. Ontario Superior Court of Justice, 2010 ONSC 5490 (CanLII)

[7] Bruno Appliance joined with the plaintiffs from the companion Mauldin appeal in a civil fraud action against Hryniak, Peebles and Cassels Brock. Both sets of plaintiffs brought motions for summary judgment, which were heard together.

[8] The motion judge found that Bruno Appliance had established its claim against Hryniak and that there was no issue requiring a trial. He was satisfied that, in spite of Hryniak's absence from an early meeting between Peebles, Cranston and Bruno, Hryniak knew that the meeting was occurring and his company, Tropos, paid for Peebles' attendance. The motion judge further found that Hryniak was aware that US$1 million was placed in Tropos' account on Bruno Appliance's behalf, and that Hryniak gave instructions regarding those funds.

[9] The motion judge found that none of Bruno Appliance's funds were invested. In part, they were

[5] Au début de mars 2002, Bruno Appliance a transféré un million de dollars américains à Cassels Brock, qui a placé l'argent dans un compte associé à Tropos. Les fonds de Bruno Appliance ont ensuite été regroupés avec d'autres fonds (totalisant 3,5 millions de dollars américains) et versés à Tropos par traite bancaire. À la fin d'avril 2002, Tropos a versé 2,5 millions de dollars américains à une entreprise appelée Southern Equity Investors Inc. et, à la fin de juin 2002, a transféré environ 550 000 $US à une personne du nom de Reinhard. À la fin de septembre 2003, le solde de Tropos détenu par Cassels Brock avait chuté à 19 000 $US.

[6] En résumé, l'argent de Bruno Appliance n'a pas été investi et la société n'a jamais touché quelque revenu de son placement.

II. Historique judiciaire

A. Cour supérieure de justice de l'Ontario, 2010 ONSC 5490 (CanLII)

[7] Bruno Appliance s'est jointe aux demandeurs du pourvoi connexe Mauldin dans une action pour fraude civile intentée contre M. Hryniak, M. Peebles et Cassels Brock. Dans les deux dossiers, les demandeurs ont présenté des requêtes en jugement sommaire qui ont été instruites ensemble.

[8] Le juge saisi de la requête a conclu que Bruno Appliance avait établi le bien-fondé de sa poursuite contre M. Hryniak et qu'aucune question ne nécessitait la tenue d'un procès. Il était convaincu que, même si M. Hryniak n'avait pas assisté à une rencontre antérieure entre MM. Peebles, Cranston et Bruno, il savait que cette rencontre avait eu lieu et que son entreprise, Tropos, avait payé pour la présence de M. Peebles. Le juge saisi de la requête a aussi conclu que M. Hryniak savait qu'un million de dollars américains avaient été déposés dans le compte de Tropos au nom de Bruno Appliance et que M. Hryniak avait donné des directives à propos de ces fonds.

[9] Le juge saisi de la requête a déclaré qu'aucune partie des fonds de Bruno Appliance n'avait été used to fund disbursements to another individual, Reinhard, and the remainder was slowly drained.

[10] The motion judge held that the tort of civil fraud was made out and there was no genuine issue requiring a trial.

[11] As in the companion Mauldin appeal, the motion judge dismissed the motion for summary judgment against Peebles, as he found that the claim involved factual issues that could not be resolved on the record. Consequently, the motion for summary judgment against Cassels Brock was dismissed, as it was premised on the theory that the firm was vicariously liable for Peebles' acts and omissions.

B. Court of Appeal for Ontario, 2011 ONCA 764, 108 O.R. (3d) 1

[12] Hryniak's appeal of this motion was heard together with the companion Mauldin appeal, as well as three other matters, which are not before this Court. The Court of Appeal found that Bruno Appliance's action should not be addressed through summary judgment due to its voluminous record, conflicting testimony, credibility issues, conflicting theories of liability advanced against multiple defendants, and the absence of reliable documentary evidence.

[13] Despite this conclusion, as in Mauldin, the Court of Appeal was prepared to review whether the motion judge was nonetheless entitled to grant judgment but, in this case, it concluded that the evidence against Hryniak was not nearly as overwhelming. Two genuine issues required a trial: first, whether Hryniak induced Bruno Appliance to invest, and second, whether some of the funds were misappropriated by Cranston, instead of Hryniak.

investie. Ces fonds ont notamment été utilisés pour financer des versements à une personne du nom de Reinhard. Le reste a lentement été épuisé.

[10] Le juge saisi de la requête a conclu que le délit de fraude civile avait été établi et qu'aucune véritable question ne nécessitait la tenue d'un procès.

[11] Comme dans le pourvoi connexe Mauldin, le juge a rejeté la requête visant à obtenir un jugement sommaire contre M. Peebles puisqu'il a conclu que la poursuite mettait en jeu des questions de fait qui ne pouvaient pas être résolues au vu du dossier. La requête en jugement sommaire contre Cassels Brock a donc été rejetée puisqu'elle était fondée sur la thèse selon laquelle le cabinet était responsable du fait d'autrui pour les actes et omissions de M. Peebles.

B. Cour d'appel de l'Ontario, 2011 ONCA 764, 108 O.R. (3d) 1 [12] L'appel interjeté par M. Hryniak à l'encontre de cette décision a été entendu avec l'appel connexe Mauldin, ainsi qu'avec trois autres affaires dont notre Cour n'est pas saisie. La Cour d'appel a conclu que l'action intentée par Bruno Appliance ne devrait pas être tranchée par jugement sommaire compte tenu de son volumineux dossier, des témoignages contradictoires, des questions de crédibilité, des thèses opposées en matière de responsabilité qui ont été avancées contre plusieurs défendeurs et de l'absence d'une preuve documentaire fiable.

[13] Malgré cette conclusion, la Cour d'appel était disposée, tout comme dans Mauldin, à réexaminer la question de savoir si le juge saisi de la requête était néanmoins habilité à rendre un jugement, mais en l'espèce, elle a conclu que la preuve présentée contre M. Hryniak n'était pas aussi accablante. Deux véritables questions nécessitaient la tenue d'un procès : premièrement, celle de savoir si M. Hryniak avait incité Bruno Appliance à investir, et deuxièmement, celle de savoir si une partie des fonds avait été détournée par M. Cranston plutôt que M. Hryniak.

2014 SCC 8 (CanLII)

[14] The Court of Appeal found that the motion judge failed to address the issue of whether Hryniak knowingly made any misrepresentation that induced Bruno Appliance to invest, a necessary element of fraud. The Court of Appeal concluded that there was no compelling evidence that Peebles acted as Hryniak's agent when the relevant representations were made. With respect to the second issue, the Court of Appeal found that it could not decide, based on the record, whether Bruno Appliance's investment was misappropriated entirely by Hryniak or by both Hryniak and Cranston in some proportion.

[15] As a result, the Court of Appeal ordered that the Bruno Appliance action proceed to trial, subject to certain trial management orders under Rule 20.05(2).

III. Analysis

[16] The scope and interpretation of the amended Rule 20 are addressed in the companion Mauldin appeal. Therefore, the issue that remains to be determined in this appeal is whether the Court of Appeal erred in its determination that Bruno Appliance should not receive summary judgment against Hryniak.

A. The Tort of Civil Fraud

[17] The parties disagree as to the elements of the tort of civil fraud, in particular whether proof is required that Hryniak induced Bruno Appliance to part with its funds.

[18] The classic statement of the elements of civil fraud stems from an 1889 decision of the House of Lords, Derry v. Peek (1889), 14 App. Cas. 337, where Lord Herschell conducted a thorough review of the history of the tort of deceit and put forward the following three propositions, at p. 374:

[14] La Cour d'appel a conclu que le juge saisi de la requête n'avait pas traité de la question de savoir si M. Hryniak avait sciemment fait une fausse déclaration ayant incité Bruno Appliance à investir, un élément nécessaire de la fraude. La Cour d'appel est arrivée à la conclusion qu'il n'existait aucune preuve convaincante selon laquelle M. Peebles avait agi à titre de mandataire de M. Hryniak au moment où les déclarations pertinentes ont été faites. Au sujet de la deuxième question, la Cour d'appel a conclu qu'elle ne pouvait pas décider, au vu du dossier, si le placement de Bruno Appliance avait été détourné entièrement par M. Hryniak ou par MM. Hryniak et Cranston selon certaines proportions.

[15] Par conséquent, la Cour d'appel a ordonné l'instruction de l'action intentée par Bruno Appliance, sous réserve de certaines ordonnances relatives à la gestion de l'instance rendues conformément au par. 20.05(2) des Règles.

III. Analyse

[16] Le pourvoi connexe Mauldin traite de la portée et de l'interprétation de la règle 20 modifiée. Par conséquent, il reste à décider en l'espèce si la Cour d'appel a commis une erreur en décidant que Bruno Appliance ne doit pas obtenir un jugement sommaire contre M. Hryniak.

A. Le délit de fraude civile

[18] L'énoncé classique des éléments de la fraude civile tire son origine dans un arrêt rendu en 1889 par la Chambre des lords, Derry c. Peek (1889), 14 App. Cas. 337, dans lequel lord Herschell a procédé à un examen approfondi de l'historique du délit de tromperie et a énoncé les trois propositions suivantes, à la p. 374 :

2014 SCC 8 (CanLII)

First, in order to sustain an action of deceit, there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Secondly, fraud is proved when it is shewn that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. . . . Thirdly, if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made.

[19] This Court adopted Lord Herschell's formulation in Parna v. G. & S. Properties Ltd., [1971] S.C.R. 306, adding that the false statement must "actually [induce the plaintiff] to act upon it" (p. 316, quoting Anson on Contract). Requiring the plaintiff to prove inducement is consistent with this Court's later recognition in Snell v. Farrell, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 311, at pp. 319-20, that tort law requires proof that "but for the tortious conduct of the defendant, the plaintiff would not have sustained the injury complained of".

[20] Finally, this Court has recognized that proof of loss is also required. As Taschereau C.J. held in Angers v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. (1904), 35 S.C.R. 330, "fraud without damage gives . . . no cause of action" (p. 340).

[21] From this jurisprudential history, I summarize the following four elements of the tort of civil fraud: (1) a false representation made by the defendant; (2) some level of knowledge of the falsehood of the representation on the part of the defendant (whether through knowledge or recklessness); (3) the false representation caused the plaintiff to act; and (4) the plaintiff's actions resulted in a loss.

B. Did the Motion Judge Err in Granting Summary Judgment?

[22] Summary judgment may not be granted under Rule 20 where there is a genuine issue requiring a trial. As outlined in the companion Mauldin appeal, [TRADUCTION] Premièrement, afin de fonder une action pour tromperie, il faut prouver qu'il y a eu fraude, et rien de moins que cela ne saurait suffire. Deuxièmement, la fraude est établie par la preuve qu'une fausse déclaration a été faite (1) sciemment, ou (2) sans la croire vraie, ou encore (3) avec insouciance, sans se soucier qu'elle soit vraie ou fausse. [. . .] Troisièmement, si la fraude est établie, le mobile de l'auteur de la fraude n'a aucune importance. Il importe peu que l'auteur de la déclaration n'eût pas l'intention de tromper son interlocuteur ou de lui faire du tort.

[19] Notre Cour a fait siens ces propos de lord Herschell dans Parna c. G. & S. Properties Ltd., [1971] R.C.S. 306, ajoutant que la fausse déclaration doit « porte[r] effectivement [le demandeur] à y donner suite » (p. 316, citant Anson on Contract). Obliger le demandeur à prouver qu'il y a eu incitation s'accorde avec le fait que la Cour ait ultérieurement reconnu dans Snell c. Farrell, [1990] 2 R.C.S. 311, p. 319-320, qu'en droit, en matière de responsabilité civile délictuelle, il faut démontrer que « n'eût été la conduite délictueuse du défendeur, le demandeur n'aurait pas subi le préjudice reproché ».

[20] Enfin, la Cour a reconnu qu'il faut aussi faire la preuve d'une perte. Comme l'a dit le juge en chef Taschereau dans Angers c. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. (1904), 35 R.C.S. 330, [TRADUCTION] « une fraude ne causant aucun préjudice ne [. . .] donne aucune cause d'action » (p. 340).

[21] Sur la base de cet historique jurisprudentiel, je résume ainsi les quatre éléments du délit de fraude civile : (1) le défendeur a fait une fausse déclaration; (2) le défendeur savait, jusqu'à un certain point, que sa déclaration était fausse (sciemment ou par insouciance); (3) la fausse déclaration a incité le demandeur à agir; (4) les actes du demandeur ont entraîné une perte.

B. Le juge saisi de la requête a-t-il commis une erreur en rendant un jugement sommaire?

[22] Un jugement sommaire ne peut pas être rendu en vertu de la règle 20 en présence d'une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès. Comme the motion judge should ask whether the matter can be resolved in a fair and just manner on a summary judgment motion. This will be the case when the process (1) allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact, (2) allows the judge to apply the law to the facts, and (3) is a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result. If there appears to be a genuine issue requiring a trial, based only on the record before her, the judge should then ask if the need for a trial can be avoided by using the new powers provided under Rules 20.04(2.1) and (2.2). She may, at her discretion, use those powers, provided that their use is not against the interest of justice.

il est souligné dans le pourvoi connexe Mauldin, le juge saisi de la requête doit se demander si l'affaire peut être réglée de manière juste et équitable par voie de requête en jugement sommaire. Ce sera le cas lorsque la procédure (1) lui permet de tirer les conclusions de fait qui s'imposent, (2) lui permet d'appliquer le droit aux faits et (3) constitue un moyen proportionné, plus expéditif et moins coûteux d'atteindre un résultat juste. Si, compte tenu uniquement du dossier dont dispose le juge, il semble y avoir une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès, ce dernier doit alors se demander si l'exercice des nouveaux pouvoirs que confèrent les par. 20.04(2.1) et (2.2) des Règles permet d'écarter le besoin d'un procès. Il peut, à son gré, exercer ces pouvoirs pourvu que leur exercice ne soit pas contraire à l'intérêt de la justice.

[23] For the reasons that follow, I am of the view that there is a genuine issue requiring a trial.

[23] Pour les motifs qui suivent, je suis d'avis qu'il existe une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès.

[24] As noted by the Court of Appeal, and following the analysis above, civil fraud requires a finding that Hryniak made a misrepresentation which induced Bruno Appliance to invest. The motion judge neither identified the need for a misrepresentation, nor found that Hryniak made one.

[24] Comme l'a indiqué la Cour d'appel et suivant l'analyse qui précède, la fraude civile exige que M. Hryniak ait fait une fausse déclaration ayant incité Bruno Appliance à investir. Le juge saisi de la requête n'a ni souligné la nécessité qu'il y ait eu fausse déclaration, ni conclu que M. Hryniak avait fait une telle déclaration.

[25] The motion judge found that Tropos did not invest Bruno Appliance's funds and that a misrepresentation had therefore been made to the investors. The point at which a misrepresentation occurred was a meeting between Peebles, Cranston and Bruno Appliance's principal in February 2002. He found: that Hryniak was supposed to be in attendance at this meeting, that Hryniak knew of the purpose of the meeting and that Hryniak's company paid for Peebles' attendance.

[25] Le juge saisi de la requête a conclu que Tropos n'avait pas investi les fonds de Bruno Appliance et qu'une fausse déclaration avait donc été faite aux investisseurs. C'est à l'occasion d'une rencontre entre M. Peebles, M. Cranston et le dirigeant de Bruno Appliance en février 2002 que cette fausse représentation a été faite. Il a conclu que M. Hryniak était censé assister à cette rencontre, que ce dernier connaissait l'objet de la rencontre et que l'entreprise de ce dernier avait payé pour la présence de M. Peebles.

[26] However, Hryniak was not present, and he can only be liable for any misrepresentation made by Peebles or Cranston if their statements can be attributed to him. For example, the Court of Appeal considered, and ultimately rejected, the possibility

[26] Cependant, M. Hryniak n'était pas présent à cette rencontre et il ne peut être tenu responsable de fausses déclarations faites par M. Peebles ou M. Cranston que si les déclarations de ces derniers peuvent lui être attribuées. Par exemple, la Cour that Peebles or Cranston was acting as Hryniak's agent.

[27] In my view, the motion judge's findings are insufficient to establish that any false statements made at the meeting can be attributed to Hryniak. There was no evidence that Peebles or Cranston were acting on instructions from Hryniak when they met with Bruno. While a principal will generally be vicariously liable "for the torts of her agent committed within the scope of her actual or apparent authority" (P. H. Osborne, The Law of Torts (4th ed. 2011), at p. 369), the motion judge did not find Peebles or Cranston to be Hryniak's agent, and there is no indication that the evidence established that Peebles or Cranston was authorized to make representations on behalf of Hryniak and did not do so on their own account. Similarly, there was insufficient evidence to establish that either Peebles or Cranston was acting as Hryniak's unwitting dupe and, as the motion judge concluded, that issue required a trial.

[28] While the motion judge found that Hryniak was aware of the falseness of the representations[1] and exercised "full dominion and control" over Bruno Appliance's funds (para. 169), as noted by the Court of Appeal, this finding would support liability in conversion, but is not sufficient to establish fraud.

[29] While I agree with the motion judge that the evidence clearly demonstrates that Hryniak was aware of the fraud, and may in fact have benefited from the fraud, whether Hryniak perpetrated the fraud by inducing Bruno Appliance to contribute US$1 million to a non-existent investment scheme is a genuine issue requiring a trial.

1 This follows from his finding in a footnote to para. 178 of his reasons that he accepted Peebles' evidence that he regularly reviewed trust activity with Hryniak (A.R., vol. V, at pp. 154-59).

d'appel a envisagé, puis a rejeté en fin de compte, la possibilité que M. Peebles ou M. Cranston ait agi comme mandataire de M. Hryniak.

[27] À mon avis, les conclusions du juge saisi de la requête ne suffisent pas à prouver que des déclarations fausses faites lors de la rencontre peuvent être attribuées à M. Hryniak. Rien ne prouve que M. Peebles ou M. Cranston suivaient des directives de M. Hryniak quand ils ont rencontré M. Bruno. Un dirigeant est généralement responsable du fait d'autrui [TRADUCTION] « pour les délits commis par son mandataire dans le cadre de son pouvoir réel ou apparent » (P. H. Osborne, The Law of Torts (4e éd. 2011), p. 369), mais le juge saisi de la requête n'a pas conclu que M. Peebles ou M. Cranston étaient les mandataires de M. Hryniak et rien n'indique que, selon la preuve, ils étaient autorisés à faire des déclarations au nom de M. Hryniak et qu'ils n'ont rien fait de tel de leur propre initiative. De même, la preuve était insuffisante pour établir que M. Peebles ou M. Cranston était la dupe de M. Hryniak et, comme l'a conclu le juge saisi de la requête, cette question nécessitait la tenue d'un procès.

[28] Bien que le juge saisi de la requête ait conclu que M. Hryniak était au courant de la fausseté des déclarations[1] et qu'il exerçait [TRADUCTION] « un plein contrôle » sur les fonds de Bruno Appliance (par. 169), comme l'a indiqué la Cour d'appel, cette conclusion justifierait l'imputation de responsabilité pour détournement, mais elle ne suffit pas pour établir la fraude.

[29] Je conviens avec le juge saisi de la requête que la preuve démontre clairement que M. Hryniak était au courant de la fraude, et qu'il en a peut-être effectivement bénéficié, mais la question de savoir si M. Hryniak a commis la fraude en incitant Bruno Appliance à verser un million de dollars américains à un projet d'investissement inexistant constitue une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès.

1 C'est ce qui ressort de sa conclusion dans une note en bas de page rattachée au par. 178 de ses motifs selon laquelle il acceptait le témoignage de M. Peebles, qui a dit avoir examiné régulièrement les activités de la fiducie avec M. Hryniak (d.a., vol. V, p. 154-159).

2014 SCC 8 (CanLII)

[30] The Court of Appeal also found the extent of Hryniak's misappropriation of Bruno Appliance's funds to be a second issue requiring a trial. The Court of Appeal found that Hryniak had appropriated US$450,000, but that the fate of the remaining US$550,000 required a trial. Given the principles of joint and several liability, I am satisfied that this issue would not normally preclude a finding that there is no genuine issue requiring a trial against Hryniak.

[31] The motion judge failed to find a necessary element of civil fraud, an error of law, and did not draw sufficient factual conclusions for either him, or an appellate court, to make such a finding. Since the action was proceeding to trial against the other defendants in any event, the order of the Court of Appeal that all the remaining actions be heard together is the most proportionate, timely and cost effective approach. In light of this conclusion, it is unnecessary for me to determine whether it was against the interest of justice for the motion judge to make use of his expanded fact-finding powers.

IV. Conclusion

[32] Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal, with costs to the respondent. I would not interfere with the case management orders made by the Court of Appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[30] La Cour d'appel a aussi conclu que le montant du détournement des fonds de Bruno Appliance par M. Hryniak constituait une deuxième question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès. Elle est parvenue à la conclusion que M. Hryniak avait détourné 450 000 $US, mais que le sort des 550 000 $US qui restaient nécessitait la tenue d'un procès. Compte tenu des principes de responsabilité solidaire, je suis convaincue que cette question n'empêcherait pas normalement de conclure à l'absence d'une véritable question nécessitant la tenue d'un procès contre M. Hryniak.

[31] Le juge saisi de la requête n'a pu conclure à l'existence d'un élément nécessaire de la fraude civile, ce qui constitue une erreur de droit, et n'a pas tiré de conclusions factuelles suffisantes pour lui permettre ou permettre à une cour d'appel de conclure à l'existence d'un tel élément. Puisque l'action donnait lieu à un procès contre les autres défendeurs en tout état de cause, l'ordonnance de la Cour d'appel portant que toutes les autres actions soient instruites ensemble constitue la marche à suivre la plus proportionnée, opportune et économique. À la lumière de cette conclusion, je n'ai pas à déterminer s'il était contraire à l'intérêt de la justice que le juge saisi de la requête exerce ses pouvoirs élargis en matière d'appréciation des faits.

IV. Conclusion

[32] Par conséquent, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi avec dépens en faveur de l'intimé. Je ne modifierais pas les ordonnances relatives à la gestion de l'instance rendues par la Cour d'appel.

THE DIRECTORS, &c., OF THE CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY OF VENEZUELA } APPELLANTS;

AND

JOSEPH KISCH . . . . . RESPONDENT.

Company—Prospectus—Misrepresentation—Shareholder—Practice—Appeal.

Where a person believes that he has been misled, by representations which are false or deceptive, into taking shares in a proposed company, it is his duty to raise the objection at an early period, and to be guilty of no needless delay.

The same rules as to false or deceptive representations which are applicable to contracts between individuals are also applicable to contracts between an individual and a company. No misstatement or concealment of any material facts or circumstances ought to be permitted in a prospectus issued to invite persons to become shareholders in a projected company.

The public are, in such a case, entitled to have the same opportunity of judging of everything material to a knowledge of the true character of the undertaking as the promoters themselves possess.

Where there has been fraudulent misrepresentation, or wilful concealment of facts, by which a person has been induced to enter into a contract, it is no answer to his claim to be relieved from it, that he might have known the truth by proper inquiry.

The phrase "available capital of the company" is not a true, but is a deceptive, description of capital which may be raised under the borrowing powers conferred upon directors.

Where a prospectus described a contract for the construction of a line of railway as entered into at "a price considerably within the available capital of the company," and the facts were, that from the nominal capital of £500,000 were to be deducted £50,000 as the price of purchasing the concession to make the railway, and the contract price for making it was £420,000, the representation was held to be untrue and deceptive.

A prospectus of a railway company stated that "the engineer's report, maps, plans, &c., may be inspected, and farther information obtained at the offices of the company." An applicant for shares signed the printed form of application, in which, as usual, it was stated that he agreed to be bound by the conditions and regulations contained in the memorandum and articles of association. An examination of all of these papers would have afforded him the information, the want of which he alleged as a ground for rescinding his contract. Trusting to the representations, he did not examine all:—

Held, that his neglect to do so was no answer to his demand to be relieved from the contract.

A bill was filed to rescind a contract on the ground of there having been misrepresentations of facts. Relief was given in the Court below on only some of the alleged grounds. An appeal was brought against the decree:—

Held, that it was open to the Respondent to sustain the decree on any or all of the grounds stated in his bill.

THIS was an appeal against a decision of the Lords Justices, by which an order of Vice-Chancellor Sir John Stuart had been reversed.

In the year 1856 the legislature of Venezuela, with a view to establish railways there by the aid of foreign adventurers, passed a law authorizing the executive government to conclude contracts for the construction of certain lines of railway to be called "The Central Railroad of Venezuela," giving, of course, certain advantages to those who should enter into such contracts. On the 18th of January, 1857, a contract was entered into between the Secretaries for the Interior, for Justice, for the Treasury, and for Foreign Relations, of the one part, and certain persons forming a financial company, and called "concessionaries," on the other, by which the latter bound themselves to construct certain railways on the terms mentioned in the contract. The construction of the railways was at first prevented by the existence of a war, which having come to an end, the period for commencing the works was fixed for the 31st of July, 1864. One of the terms of the contract required the deposit of £20,000 as "caution money" for the commencement of the works within twelve months after that date. The original concessionaries ultimately sold the concession, such of the works as had been commenced, and the plant thereof, to the Appellants, the promoters of the present company, the Central Railway Company of Venezuela, Limited, for the sum of £50,000. The company formed by the Appellants was, in July, 1864, registered under the Companies Act, 1862, and the memorandum of association stated that the objects of the company were the constructing, maintaining, managing, and working railways in Venezuela, the first section of which was to be from Puerto Cabello to San Felipe, a distance of fifty-four miles, the supplying the plant, acquiring concessions from the government, &c., and the capital was stated to be £500,000 in 10,000 shares of £50 each. The prospectus issued by the Appellants set forth that, among other advantages enjoyed by the company, there was a government guarantie to the shareholders of 9 per cent. per annum, for twenty years, on the capital employed, amply secured by a mortgage of 10 per cent. on the import duties of La Guayra and Puerto Cabello, together with 2½ per cent. guaranteed by the contractor during the construction of the line, and that the interest would run from the commencement of the works. The prospectus represented that Venezuela possessed, perhaps, the most prolific soil in the world; that tens of thousands of acres awaited occupation; that the railway would pass through a district most productive in coffee, cocoa, cotton, hides, indigo, &c., and richly agricultural; so that "a large and permanent traffic will be at once secured to the company," and that the government of the Republic had bound itself not to grant, for a period of twenty-five years, any other concession for the construction of a railway in the direction of the Central Railway. The prospectus went on thus to describe the privileges secured to the company:

1. "A guarantie of 9 per cent. interest on all calls paid on account of the subscribed capital for a period of twenty years, amply secured by a cession of the import duties of La Guayra and Puerto Cabello."

4. "A free grant of all lands required for the construction of the railways, and for the stations and other buildings required to be executed."

5. "A free grant of 30,000 acres of land, in addition to the above, in the provinces through which the railway will pass, and for which land warrants will be issued to the company on the completion of the line."

As to the contractor, the prospectus set forth: "A contract has been entered into by the company with a responsible contractor, based upon surveys, plans, and sections approved by the government, for the completion of the line from Puerto Cabello to San Felipe, including stations and rolling stock, at a price considerably within the available capital, and the works will be commenced forthwith. Security has been taken for the due fulfilment of the contract. The contractor, also, in consideration of receiving a large quantity of timber along the line for his use, guarantees $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the paid up capital during the construction of the works."

The Respondent received a copy of the prospectus in the ordinary way by post. Attached to it was the common form of application for shares, containing the usual words, "I agree to be bound by all the conditions and regulations contained in the memorandum and articles of association." He paid, on the 13th of July, the sum of £100 into the bankers of the Appellants, and then signed the form of application for 100 shares, and forwarded it. The shares were allotted to him at once. With this letter of allotment, dated 14th of July, came a demand on him to pay the farther sum of £2 per share. On the 20th of July he paid that call, but before doing so called at the office of the company, had an interview with the secretary, and asked that the number of shares allotted him might be reduced to twenty. On the 25th of July the secretary wrote to say that the directors could not comply with his request, adding, "but there will be no difficulty in your disposing of them on the Stock Exchange." In September a farther call of £2 per share was made on the Respondent, which, however, he did not answer, and the solicitors for the Appellants applied to him on the subject by letter on the 11th of November. On the following day the Respondent's solicitor applied for permission to inspect the concessions and contracts referred to in the prospectus. This application was granted, and he and the Respondent examined these documents on the 22nd of November. The call was not paid, and on the 15th of December, 1864, the Respondent owed for unpaid calls, and for interest thereon, the sum of £707 18*s.* 2*d.*, and an action was brought against him in the Court of Common Pleas to recover the amount. The declaration was delivered on the 26th of January, 1865, and on the 28th of January the Respondent filed his bill in Chancery, in which he set forth the circumstances of his becoming a shareholder in the company, alleged untruthfulness in the representations made in the prospectus, the discovery of certain facts of which he was ignorant when he applied for shares, and that he would not have taken the shares if he had known these facts, and he prayed, therefore, that he might be released from the contract on account of the fraudulent misrepresentations of the directors, that they might be ordered to repay to him the deposit and the calls paid by him, with interest and expenses, and he offered to return them the said shares; and he farther prayed that they might be restrained from proceeding in the action.

The representations of which he especially complained were the statements as to the capital of the company, from which all mention of the £50,000 for the purchase of the concession was omitted, while the contract for the construction of the line was made for £420,000, thus leaving no more than a possible balance of £30,000 for all contingencies; the statements as to the grants of land, as to the guarantie of 9 per cent., and as to the way in which that amount of interest was secured on the imports of Puerto Cabello and La Guayra. He also insisted that there had been great and material misrepresentations as to the contractor, his duties and liabilities.

Evidence was taken on both sides, and the various documents were produced (1). The authority given by the legislature to the government of Venezuela, of April, 1856, was thus set forth:— "The executive power is authorized, in order that, in the name of the nation, and as far as ten years, it guarantees the interest up to 7 per cent. on the capital which, during this time, may be employed in railroads; but, in case that the roads shall not be producing any interest on account of any causes imputable to the company, the nation shall not be obliged to pay the said interest."

(1) The documents are quoted as given in the printed papers laid before the House. The originals were not printed. The translations are very unsatisfactory, and, in some instances, hardly intelligible.

DIRECTORS, &C. OF CENTRAL RAILWAY CO. OF VENEZUELA v. KISCH.

Article 17 of the contract (made in January, 1857) was in these terms:—"The executive power, in the name of the nation, guarantees, for ten years, as a minimum, the interest of 7 per cent. annually, in favour of the capital which during this time may be employed in the railroads, while these do not produce it from a cause not imputable to the company; and, it being understood that, from the time when they may produce any, the nation shall not be bound to pay in this time, except what may be wanting to complete the 7 per cent. guaranteed."

By an authoritative article of October, 1858, called "An Explanation of the last-mentioned Contract," it was declared (Article 7), "That the interest of which Article 17 speaks shall not be paid except upon the sums really and actually laid out upon the railroads . . . and, whatever may be the amount of the sum employed in them, the assistance of the government for the payment of the 7 per cent. aforesaid, shall not exceed the 10 per cent. of the import and export duties which may be collected by the Custom House of Puerto Cabello; that as soon as the proceeds of the Central Railroad exceed 7 per cent. of the sums expended upon it, the excess shall be applied to the reimbursement of that which the government may have paid in virtue of this article, unless the company decides to make the reimbursement with shares of the said undertaking." The article went on to declare the appointment, by the government, of a director, who was, even though he might have no shares in the company, to be a controller of the company, and who was to have a salary paid by the company, "and that the payment of the 7 per cent. offered by this article shall not commence but when the company has a capital of 200,000 dollars at least, beyond the privileged shares mentioned in the Article 13."

In September, 1863, the government passed some resolutions, one of which (Article 3) was as follows:—"The government agrees to guarantee, as a minimum, for the term of 20 years, interest at 9 per cent. per annum, in favour of the capitals which may enter into the coffers of the company, from the day on which the government receives the official intimation that the works of the railway have been commenced, and the amount of the sum which this interest is to gain will be verified by the representative of the government, who, for this and other purposes, will have a seat in the direction of the company at London. This interest is guaranteed so long as the said capital does not produce 9 per cent. for a reason not imputable to the company, and this being understood in the same terms which Article 17 of the contract of January, 1857, and its only paragraph, express. For the payment of this interest there is set apart, specially and signally, during the first year, the 5 per cent., and in the rest, the 10 per cent. of the import duties of the Custom Houses of La Guayra and Puerto Cabello."

A decree of the 28th of January, 1864, contained the following article:—"The government will guarantee as dividend on the capital employed as far as 9 per cent. per annum, while, for causes not imputable to the company, what the line may produce do not reach so much; but this guarantie shall never be for more than 20 years."

With regard to the granting of lands to the company, the Articles 3 and 7 of the decree of April, 1856, were these:—"Art. 3. For fixing in the contract the rules necessary for obtaining private property when it may be necessary for the railway line or its dependencies, there being previously the just indemnification on the part of the undertaking: the work being considered as one of public convenience. The waste lands (1), which, according to the present decree, it is agreed to give to the company, shall only be able to be taken from the provinces benefited by the railroad, and in case there be not such in these, the concession remains without effect, which cannot be a subject for claim. In the grounds ceded by the present decree, those are not included which, with any title, the Venezuelans possess at the time of the publication of this decree."

In the contract of the 18th of January, 1857, Article 4 provided that—"The executive power, making use of the authorization which the legislative decree already mentioned gives to it, grants to the Senor Lorenzo Jose and his associates, and their heirs and successors, the ownership of 500 fanegadas of waste lands

(1) There was much discussion about the meaning of this expression—the Respondent insisted that it meant waste lands, the Appellants that it meant unoccupied or unappropriated lands.

for each mile of railway which they may construct, in addition to 30 varas of width for the line of road, throughout all its extent, and to those which may be necessary for forming the depôts or offices which the service of the railway may require: provided that the said lands are in the provinces benefited without being owned by Venezuelans at the date of this contract." "In case the lands necessary for the line of the road, its depôts and offices, are private property, the executive power shall intervene (if the company and the owner do not arrange between themselves) to cause them to be ceded to the company, the just indemnification having previously been made by the latter for their actual value, determined by skilled persons to be named by the company and the proprietor, one by each party, and an umpire whom the government shall name, without their entering into the estimate the greater value which the railway itself will give them."

Art. 5. "Each time the company presents constructed a part of the railway which can be made use of by the public, there shall be given to it the titles of the waste land corresponding to the extension of that part."

As to the Contractor,—the real arrangement with him was as follows:—"That the contractor shall pay to the company interest at the rate of 2½ per cent. per annum on all capital which should from time to time be paid up in the company, during the time of the construction of the railway and works, and until such railway and works are delivered up to the company entirely completed, and fit for traffic in accordance with the plan, section, and specification: Provided that the liability of the contractor to pay such interest should cease when and so soon as he should have paid the company for such interest sums of money amounting in the aggregate to £20,000. That in order to provide a fund for the payment of such interest, it should be lawful for the company to deduct and retain £5 per cent. interest out of every payment to be made to the contractor until the sums so deducted and retained shall amount to £20,000, when the sums so deducted and retained should be passed to the credit of the contractor in interest account with the company, and such account should be debited at the end of every six months at the rate of 2½ per cent. per annum on the paid up capital of the company for the time being, until such debt should amount to the sum of £20,000, and until the completion and delivery up to traffic of the entire line." It was also alleged that he had been in pecuniary embarrassment, and so was not what the prospectus described him.

The cause was heard before Vice-Chancellor Stuart, upon interlocutory motion for an injunction; and on the 21st of March, 1865, the Respondent's bill was ordered to be dismissed with costs. On appeal to the Lords Justices, an injunction was granted, and the order of the Vice-Chancellor, dismissing the bill, was reversed (1).

This was an appeal against their Lordships' decree.

Sir R. Palmer, Q.C., and Mr. W. Morris, for the Appellants:—

This decree of the Lords Justices cannot be supported unless bad faith can be shewn on the part of the Appellants. There is no pretence for such a charge against them. In Ex parte Briggs (2), though the circumstances were somewhat different, the principle was laid down which ought to govern this case. There the shareholder had, as here, full means of knowledge; he had paid his deposit, and but for a difficulty arising from the rules of the Stock Exchange, would have sold his shares. The Master of the Rolls refused to relieve him from his liability. Here the Respondent applied for more shares than he really wanted; the number he applied for was allotted to him; he sought to have that number reduced; that was refused, and after that he paid the £2 deposit. He was not entitled, under such circumstances, to ask to be put in a better situation than other shareholders: Nicol's Case (3). There was no fraud here; yet fraud was suggested by the Respondent. When it was so suggested, it was most essential that it should be accurately set forth in the bill, and that the Court should be informed how it had arisen: The New Brunswick, &c., Railway Company v. Conybeare (4). So in Jennings v. Broughton (5), Lord Justice Knight Bruce said, that in such a case, "the title to relief depended on three questions: First, whether in the statements or representations made there was anything untrue, material in its nature, that is to say, which, taken as true, added substantially to the value of the mine, and was not conjectural merely. Secondly, if so, was any such untrue assertion published or made without a belief in its truth by the person or persons publishing or making it. And thirdly, if not, was the belief entertained without fair or reasonable ground?" It was impossible for the Respondent here to sustain his claim to relief on any of these grounds. And as to such cases in general, the true rule was laid down by Lord Justice Turner, when, in the same case, he said (1), "Finally, I think that, although it is the undoubted duty of the Court to relieve persons who have been deceived by false representations, it is equally the duty of this Court to be careful that, in its anxiety to correct frauds, it does not enable persons who have joined with others in speculations, to convert their speculations into certainties at the expense of those with whom they have joined. This, in my opinion, would be the effect of giving the Plaintiff the relief which he asks, and, I think, therefore, that this bill ought to be dismissed." That ought to be the case here.

The facts here [which were observed upon very fully] do not justify the charge of misrepresentation. In every substantial respect they were true. If they were expressed in rather too sanguine terms, that is no ground for setting aside the contract. Every prudent man is on his guard against high-flown language in a prospectus. As the prospectus referred to the articles of contract with the government and with the contractor, he had full means of knowing all the circumstances connected with the company, and forming his judgment upon them. There is no ground here to rescind the contract, nor any to grant the injunction to stay the action for calls. Smith v. The Reese River Company (2) will be relied on by the other side. There an injunction was granted to protect a shareholder against an action for calls, but that was where the directors themselves had rescinded the contract; and when that case afterwards came before the Master of the Rolls, on a motion to take the Plaintiff's name off the list of contributories, he refused the application. The Respondent here sought to obtain the benefit which was refused in that case, and his application could not be supported. Neither with regard to the directors, nor to the creditors of the company, had he a right to be relieved from the liability which he had voluntarily, and with full means of knowledge, incurred.

The Respondent knew all the facts in November, and ought then to have sought relief; his delay precluded him from afterwards asking for it.

The Respondent obtained the judgment of the Lords Justices on two matters only. He cannot now be heard to sustain it upon others.

Mr. Dickinson, Q.C., and Mr. Swanston, for the Respondent:—

There has been no unnecessary delay here. [The LORD CHANCELLOR:—We think that you need not enter on that point.] There may be allowance made for large expressions in anticipation of what a company will do and will gain; but if things are stated as facts, they must be truly stated. The party misled has a right to be removed from the list of shareholders: Ship's Case (1). Misrepresentation as to facts avoids the contract founded upon them. In Nicol's Case (2) the applicant had not only received a dividend, but he had sold his shares, and he was therefore held to be liable to be treated as a shareholder up to the time of the transfer. That case has no application to the present. So in Jennings v. Broughton (3), it was quite within the power of the purchaser of the shares to avoid being misled, for from the first he had ample means of knowing the facts, and had not relied on the advertisements; but even there it was declared that misrepresentations of a material kind would be sufficient to avoid the contract. In Rawlins v. Wickham (4) the delivery of a false account, to induce a person to become a partner in a banking business, was held sufficient to entitle him to have the contract rescinded, and that, too, although he had continued in the partnership for four years; and in The New Brunswick and Canada Railway and Land Company v. Muggeridge (5) it was held that a person contracting to take shares on the statements contained in a prospectus had a right, not only not to be misled by statements actually false, but was entitled to be informed of all the facts the knowledge of which might reasonably influence his judgment in making the contract. The observations of Vice-Chancellor Kindersley were in that case very strong on this point. In Price v. Macaulay a misrepresentation as to the yearly value of some premises, occasioned by the suppression of the fact that that value arose from circumstances of a temporary nature only, was held sufficient to justify the rescinding of the contract. And the same result followed where houses were sold under the description of being "well supplied with water," when, in fact, though other houses near them were supplied with water from their own grounds, these houses were only supplied from the waterworks of the town: Leyland v. Illingworth (1). "A fraud may consist as well of the suppression of what is true as the representation of what is false," was said by Mr. Justice Chambre, in Tapp v. Lee (2); and that principle was acted on in Foster v. Charles (3), where a person who had recommended an agent by a statement which he knew to be false, was held liable in damages for the misconduct of that agent. Dobell v. Stevens (4), Attwood v. Small (5), Reynell v. Sprye (6), and Burnes v. Pennell (7), all proceed on the same principles. The last-named case contained some very strong observations by Lord Campbell, to which he adhered when Lord Chief Justice, in The Deposit Company v. Ayscough (8). And in Wilkinson's Case, In re the Madrid Bank (9) Lord Justice Cairns expressed his approval of the decision in the present case, although he held Wilkinson there to be liable, on the ground that he believed Wilkinson to have been fully informed of the facts. In Oakes's Case, In re Overend (10), Vice-Chancellor Malins recognised the principle that, in a case where fraud was practised by the promoters of a company, a person deceived by it would be released from his contract with the promoters, though as to creditors he might still continue liable. Where a party has been drawn into a contract by misrepresentation, he may compel the party making the misrepresentation to make it good, or, if that is impossible, he may avoid the contract: Pulsford v. Richards (1). Here there are many misrepresentations sufficient to avoid the contract; and the only parties in contest being the directors who made those misrepresentations and the party who was misled by them, he is entitled to relief.

The Respondent is entitled to sustain the decree, not only on the grounds on which it was rested by the Lords Justices, but on all those stated in his bill.

Sir R. Palmer, in reply:—

It is not contended that any principle of law is in doubt in this case, but only the application of the principle. For that purpose alone the case of The New Brunswick Company v. Conybeare was cited. That case shews that, if fraud and deception are relied on, they must be clearly alleged and distinctly proved. Burnes v. Pennell is to the same effect, and shews too the difference which exists, applying the rule to set aside an executed contract, or to give effect to one which is purely executory. Price v. Macauley and Leyland v. Illingworth were cases of specific performance. In Rawlins v. Wyckham there had been a direct misrepresentation of a positive fact. There was none here. In Ship's Case (2) there was no answer given to the applicant's positive statement on oath that he was not informed of the facts, and on that ground he was held entitled to relief. In Jennings v. Broughton the Master of the Rolls declared (3), that "it is always to be borne in mind, in suits of this nature, that the burden of proof is on the Plaintiff." He had said the same thing in Pulsford v. Richards (4). The Respondent here has not fulfilled that condition, on the performance of which he is alone entitled to ask for relief.

May 14. THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Chelmsford), having stated the facts of the case, said:—

The Respondent alleges that the prospectus which induced him to purchase the shares contains fraudulent representations, which entitle him to have the purchase declared void. The Appellants, denying that there are any false representations in the prospectus, contend that the Respondent's delay in instituting his suit as soon as he had knowledge, or means of knowledge, of all the facts, is fatal to his claim to relief.

"There is some little uncertainty as to the exact time when the Respondent made the discovery that the representations in the prospectus were not bonâ fide. He at first said that it was within three days after receiving his letter of allotment, which would be as early as the 16th of July; then, that it was after he had paid the £1 and the £2, the latter being the call on his 100 shares, which was paid on the 25th of July.

In his bill the Respondent states, that "it was in or about September, 1864, he heard rumours that the statements in the prospectus were, to a great degree, false; that on the 22nd of November he went to the office of the company, when certain documents were produced, and from them he, for the first time, learnt with certainty that the statements contained in the prospectus issued by the company were false in many particulars."

The fair result of these statements appears to me to be, that although the Respondent might have heard unfavourable rumours, and conceived suspicions of the company, at an early period after he obtained his shares, yet that he received no certain information upon which he could act until the month of November, and he did nothing between that day and the 28th of January, 1865 (when he filed his bill), which amounted to acquiescence. This case differs in this respect from that of Ex parte Briggs (1), which was mainly relied upon in support of the objection of delay, for there, Mr. Briggs, after he discovered that the representations in a prospectus, on the faith of which he was induced to take shares, were false, dealt with the shares as owner by instructing his broker to sell them. The Respondent, therefore, has not precluded himself by laches from his right to have the contract for the purchase of shares in the company rescinded, provided he has clearly and distinctly alleged in his bill the fraudulent representations (or any of them) upon which he relies, and has established them by satisfactory evidence.

(1) Law Rep. 1 Eq. 483.

The alleged representations are contained in a prospectus, the object of which was to invite the public generally to join the proposed undertaking. In an advertisement of this description some allowance must always be made for the sanguine expectations of the promoters of the adventure, and no prudent man will accept the prospects which are always held out by the originators of every new scheme, without considerable abatement.

But although, in its introduction to the public, some high colouring, and even exaggeration, in the description of the advantages which are likely to be enjoyed by the subscribers to an undertaking, may be expected, yet no misstatement or concealment of any material facts or circumstances ought to be permitted. In my opinion, the public, who are invited by a prospectus to join in any new adventure, ought to have the same opportunity of judging of everything which has a material bearing on its true character, as the promoters themselves possess. It cannot be too frequently or too strongly impressed upon those who, having projected any undertaking, are desirous of obtaining the co-operation of persons who have no other information on the subject than that which they choose to convey, that the utmost candour and honesty ought to characterize their published statements. As was said by Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, in the case of the New Brunswick and Canada Railway Company v. Muggeridge (1), "those who issue a prospectus holding out to the public the great advantages which will accrue to persons who will take shares in a proposed undertaking, and inviting them to take shares on the faith of the representations therein contained, are bound to state everything with strict and scrupulous accuracy, and not only to abstain from stating as fact that which is not so, but to omit no one fact within their knowledge the existence of which might in any degree affect the nature, or extent, or quality of the privileges and advantages which the prospectus holds out as inducements to take shares."

Applying these principles to the prospectus in question, I proceed to consider the grounds upon which it is impeached by the bill of the Respondent. Although the Lords Justices decided in favour of the Respondent upon two only of the alleged misrepresentations, or, rather, concealments of facts, in the prospectus, and expressed an opinion against him upon the others, it is quite open to him to maintain the decree upon any of the grounds laid in his bill, and accordingly the argument on his behalf has been extended to every misstatement in the prospectus, which he has attributed to the company.

I will pass lightly over those misstatements in, or omissions from, the prospectus, which, in my opinion, do not establish a case against the Appellants; agreeing, however, with the remark made in the course of the argument for the Respondent, that the suppression of a fact will often amount to a misrepresentation.

I do not think that there is anything in the omission from the prospectus of all mention of the deposit of £20,000 which the company was to make, and which was to be forfeited if the construction of the railway was not commenced by a certain day. The Respondent alleges, in his bill, that the Appellants, by undertaking only one line of the railway, and neglecting to commence or undertake another, are liable to forfeit the £20,000. It appears to me that the omission to mention this required deposit would be no evidence of wilful suppression of the truth, even if the liability to its being forfeited existed. The effect of the deposit would be to quicken the diligence of the company to commence the works, in order to obtain its return. And if the fact of the deposit being in jeopardy by anything which occurred after the issuing of the prospectus can have any bearing upon the statements it contains (which I think it cannot), the evidence shews that the railway has been commenced within the time limited, so as to entitle the company to have the deposit restored.

The next allegation of fraudulent concealment which I will deal with relates to certain shares which, under the contract with the Venezuelan government, the original concessionaries were to have a right to reserve to themselves, as privileged shares, to indemnify them for costs incurred by them up to the date on which they should open the subscriptions to the public. By a document, called "Explanations of the Contract," these shares were not to exceed 2075; 575 to be considered as paid by anticipation for the preliminary expenses, and 1500 as a compensation to the promoters of the undertaking. The Plaintiff alleges, that if these privileged shares had been mentioned in the prospectus he would not have purchased his shares. The truth of this assertion cannot, of course, be ascertained. But the answer to this charge is, that although the benefit of these privileged shares passed to the company under the purchase of the concession, there never has been any intention to act upon this clause in the contract, nor any provision in reference to it stated by the Appellants, and, therefore, there was no occasion to mention the privilege in the prospectus.

The next charge to be considered is one of alleged misstatement: —that, amongst other privileges secured to the company, is one of "a free grant of 30,000 acres in the provinces through which the railway is to pass." This the Respondent asserts in his bill to be untrue, for that it was expressly provided that the land to be granted should be 30,000 acres only, which were to be nowhere but in the provinces to be benefited by the railway, and that, too, with this condition annexed, that no land should be granted which was owned by Venezuelans. Another ground of misrepresentation was urged in argument, viz., that the prospectus states that the country through which the railway is to pass is a most productive one for produce of various kinds, besides being a rich agricultural district, leading (as it was said) to the belief that the 30,000 acres were to be of land of this quality, instead of which it was expressly stipulated in the decree which authorizes the executive power of Venezuela to arrange the contract for the Central Railroad, that the lands were to be "waste lands."

It seems to me, however, to be clear, that this description refers, not to the quality of the soil, but to the lands being unoccupied; a view which is confirmed by the qualification annexed to the proposed grant, that in the grounds ceded those "are not included which, with any title, the Venezuelans" (extended afterwards to foreigners) possess at the time of the publication of the decree. The Appellants were, in my opinion, warranted in stating that the grant was a free grant of 30,000 acres, without mentioning the qualification of its not extending to private property (which would of course be implied), or that the 30,000 acres were to be granted only out of the provinces to be benefited by the railway, and in case there should be none such, the concession was to remain without effect. There is no reason to suspect that the Appellants had any doubt that the quantity of land conceded could be found within the limited district, and the Venezuelan government bound itself to apply to the convention, or constitutional congresses, "in order that it might prevent the alienation of waste lands in the provinces through which the railroad was to pass, until the plans of the latter being presented, and its extension determined, they might designate those which, according to the contract, were to belong to the company."

I now proceed to consider an alleged misrepresentation upon which the Lords Justices thought that the Respondent had established a case against the Appellants. This relates to the statement in the prospectus, that there was secured to the company the privilege of a guarantie of 9 per cent. interest on all calls paid on account of the subscribed capital for a period of twenty years, amply secured by a cession of the import duties of La Guayra and Puerto Cabello.

The Respondent charges in his bill that this statement is entirely untrue, and that the import duties are already mortgaged for their full value to other persons. The proof of the mortgage of the duties to their full value fails, as it appears that they were previously mortgaged only to the extent of 55 per cent.

But it is said by the Respondent that the statement of the prospectus is untrue, because the government of Venezuela was not to pay the 9 per cent. in case the railroads were not producing any interest on account of any cause imputable to the company. I doubt whether the allegation in the bill places the untruth of the statement upon this ground. But admitting that it does, I do not see how the omission of the qualification can be regarded as a fraudulent suppression of the truth. Even if no mention of it had been made in the agreement for the guarantie, I should suppose it would necessarily be implied; for no party can claim the benefit of a contract the right to the performance of which arises from his own default; and no one could possibly suppose that such an absolute and unqualified guarantie would ever be given. At all events the omission to notice such a qualification does not appear to me (with great respect to the Lords Justices) to be a ground for attributing to the Appellants a fraudulent intention to conceal the truth.

Thus far I have examined the various allegations of fraudulent misrepresentations and concealment in the prospectus of the Appellants, and have been unable to discover anything upon which, if they had stood alone, the Respondent could claim to have his purchase of shares set aside; but I proceed to a part of the case which not only leads to a different conclusion, but also reflects upon the general fairness of the prospectus, even in the particulars which I have been considering.

The portions of the prospectus to which I am about to refer appear to me to be more or less connected with each other, and all of them bear upon the important question of the ability of the Appellants to perform the contract into which they have entered, with the means at their disposal, and by the contractor with whom they had engaged.

The misrepresentations and concealment alleged in the bill under these heads relate—

1. To the omission from the prospectus of all mention of the purchase of the concession by the Appellants for £50,000.

2. To the statement that the contract was entered into with a responsible contractor.

3. To the contract being considerably within the available capital.

4. To the liability of the contractor upon his guarantie of 2½ per cent. being limited to £20,000.

The Respondent alleges in his bill that the purchase of the concession by the company for £50,000 was fraudulently concealed. It is difficult to understand how such an important fact can have been honestly omitted from the prospectus. It cannot be said that the amount of the capital of a company is an insignificant matter for the judgment of those who are invited to become shareholders. The prospectus states the capital to be £500,000, whilst it was well known to those who prepared it that the company was established upon the footing of a payment of £50,000, which necessarily reduced the capital by that amount.

It was said by the counsel for the Appellants that when the prospectus stated that the railway was to be constructed and worked under a concession and important guaranties from the government of Venezuela every one would understand that such a valuable privilege was not likely to be granted gratuitously. But I see no reason why it is to be assumed that persons reading the prospectus would take for granted that the Venezuelan government would not make a gratuitous concession for the construction of a railway which might prove highly beneficial to the country. At all events, the terms of the prospectus import a direct concession and guaranties from the Venezuelan government, which might or might not be gratuitous, instead of stating the fact, that the Appellants had acquired the concession by purchase from the original concessionaries.

The Appellants also rely upon the fact that the Respondent was expressly referred by the form of the letter of application for shares to the memorandum or articles of association, the latter of which documents expressly mentioned the agreement for the purchase of the concession. But the Respondent applied for shares upon the faith of the prospectus, a copy of which was sent to him, and when the allotment of the 100 shares was made to him he was, in the opinion of the Appellants, fixed as a shareholder, as appears from a letter from their secretary in answer to an application from the Respondent to have the number of shares allotted to him reduced. In that letter he was told that this was not in the power of the Appellants, "as it would make the allotment illegal." It appears to me that there was an intentional and improper suppression as to the extent of the capital of the company by the description in the prospectus.

The next statement in the prospectus to be considered is that which represents that a contract had been entered into with a responsible contractor for the completion of the line from Puerto Cabello to San Felipe. A responsible contractor of course must be one who has the means at least of commencing the performance of his contract, though he may rely upon the money to be received in the progress of the works to enable him to complete it.

Now it appears to me that Croskey was a person who ought to have been known by the directors not to be a responsible contractor in this sense. I do not rely upon the fact of his insolvency in four months after the date of the contract, as that does not necessarily prove that he might not have been in a position to carry out the contract when he entered into it. Coupled with other circumstances, however, it is a significant fact. If Croskey had no means of his own, the payment of part of the contract price by 4000 shares, upon which he was to pay a deposit, would rather disable him from performing his contract. And the mode in which that deposit was paid, by an advance from the financial company, to be repaid out of the moneys Croskey would receive under the contract, ought to have raised a serious doubt as to his responsibility. This would hardly be removed by the security which he gave of a bond for £10,000 with two sureties, which is quite insignificant in comparison with his engagements. I do not think that the directors were justified in holding Croskey out to the world as a responsible contractor, and whether this was carelessly or designedly done seems to me to be immaterial.

The next alleged misrepresentation is of a serious character, and, as it appears to me, is completely established. The prospectus states that the contract entered into with the responsible contractor is "at a price considerably within the available capital." This statement connects itself with the representation of the amount of the capital. The Respondent, believing the capital to be £500,000, even if he had known that the contract price was £420,000, would no doubt have been satisfied that a sum of £80,000 being left, the statement that the contract was for a price considerably within the available capital was well founded; but if he had known, as the directors knew, that what remained after providing for the contract was only £30,000, he might have entertained a different opinion. I do not think that the £20,000 deposit ought to be deducted, because, although it was tied up until the commencement of the works, yet at that period it would be released, and would then form part of the available capital. Nor, on the other hand, ought the borrowing powers given to the directors by the articles of association to be taken into account, as suggested in argument, for no one would understand a power to borrow as intended by the term "available capital" of a company. It certainly was an exaggeration, to say the least of it, to describe a contract which would absorb the whole of a capital of £450,000, except £30,000, as being considerably within the available capital.

DIRECTORS, &C. OF CENTRAL RAILWAY CO. OF VENEZUELA v. KISCH.

It appears to me that this was not a fair and honest representation, but was calculated, if not intended, to deceive the public, who were invited by the prospectus to take part in the undertaking.

The last ground upon which the bill charges fraud on the prospectus is the omission to state the limitation to £20,000 of the contractor's guarantie of 2½ per cent. Lord Justice Turner thinks that in common honesty this limitation should have been mentioned, and I agree with him. But I should have hesitated, if the prospectus had been unimpeachable in every other respect, to have decided against the company upon this alleged concealment alone. That it ought to have been mentioned, so as to allow those who were asked to join in the undertaking to form a judgment upon it, there can be no doubt; and, looking to the other instances of suppression of facts material to be known, I cannot avoid the conclusion that this, amongst the rest, was designed for the purpose of deception, by concealing whatever would make the scheme less attractive, and so prevent persons from becoming purchasers of shares.

But the Appellants say that even admitting the prospectus to be open to the objections which are made to it, the Respondent has no ground of complaint, because he had an opportunity of ascertaining the truth of the representations contained in it, of which he did not choose to avail himself; that he was told by the prospectus that "the engineer's report, together with maps, plans, and surveys of the line, might be inspected, and any farther information obtained, on application at the temporary offices of the company;" and in his letter of application he agreed to be bound by all the conditions and regulations contained in the memorandum and articles of association of the company, which, if he had examined, would have given him all the information necessary to correct the errors and omissions in the prospectus.

But it appears to me that when once it is established that there has been any fraudulent misrepresentation or wilful concealment by which a person has been induced to enter into a contract, it is no answer to his claim to be relieved from it to tell him that he might have known the truth by proper inquiry. He has a right to retort upon his objector, "You, at least, who have stated what is untrue, or have concealed the truth, for the purpose of drawing me into a contract, cannot accuse me of want of caution because I relied implicitly upon your fairness and honesty." I quite agree with the opinion of Lord Lyndhurst, in the case of Small v. Attwood (1), that "where representations are made with respect to the nature and character of property which is to become the subject of purchase, affecting the value of that property, and those representations afterwards turn out to be incorrect and false, to the knowledge of the party making them, a foundation is laid for maintaining an action in a Court of common law to recover damages for the deceit so practised; and in a Court of equity a foundation is laid for setting aside the contract which was founded upon that basis." And in the case of Dobell v. Stevens (2), to which he refers as an authority in support of the proposition, which was an action for deceit in falsely representing the amount of the business done in a public house, the purchaser was held to be entitled to recover damages, although the books were in the house, and he might have had access to them if he thought proper.

Upon the whole case I think the decree of the Lords Justices ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD CRANWORTH:—

My Lords, the decree of the Lords Justices now under appeal was based on the principle that Mr. Kisch, the now Respondent, had been induced to take his 100 shares by means of false representations held out to him by the prospectus issued by the Appellants. The only question is, whether it is sufficiently alleged and proved that such false representations were made. I think it is, and so that the decree ought not to be disturbed.

The prospectus states that the object of the company is to construct and work a Central Railway in Venezuela, under a concession from the government, the first section being from Puerto Cabello to San Felipe, a distance of about fifty-four miles; and then, a little farther on, the prospectus proceeds to say that the government has by a decree and concession granted the right of making the Central Railway from Puerto Cabello westward to San Felipe and southward to Valencia, with power of extension to Carracas, and has bound itself for twenty-five years not to grant any other concession for the construction of a railway in the direction of the Central Railway.

(1) 6 Cl. & F. 395. (2) 3 B. & C. 623.

DIRECTORS, &C. OF CENTRAL RAILWAY CO. OF VENEZUELA v. KISCH.

The obvious and natural, though not, perhaps, necessary meaning of these paragraphs is, that the decree and concession spoken of was a decree and concession to or in favour of the company issuing the prospectus. But even if that be not the necessary meaning of the paragraphs taken by themselves, yet it seems to me that they admit of no other construction when read in connexion with the preceding part of the prospectus.

The prospectus opens by describing the company as incorporated under the Act of 1862, "for the construction and working of a Central Railway in the Republic of Venezuela, under a concession and important guarantees from the government," and then, after stating that the first section from Puerto Cabello to San Felipe was about fifty-four miles, it proceeds to state that the capital was £500,000, in 10,000 shares of £50 each.

The question here arises, for what purposes was the capital to be raised? Evidently, according to the context, for constructing and working a railway. Any one becoming a shareholder in the company on the faith of the prospectus must have supposed, that, assuming all the shares to be taken, the company would have £500,000 for constructing and working the railway under a concession from the government. This is what the prospectus represents, and what it was plainly intended to represent. But it is untrue. The capital was already, before the prospectus was issued, liable to the payment of £50,000, to be applied, not in constructing or working the railway, but in purchasing from intermediate concessionaries the right to make it. So that the capital for constructing and working the railway really was only £450,000, not £500,000, as represented by the prospectus. This fact ought, in common honesty, to have been disclosed to those who were taking shares. It appears to me that in the matters I have indicated there has been both suppressio veri and suggestio falsi, and that the Respondent is entitled to the relief given to him by the decree of which the Appellants have complained.

It was indeed contended that it cannot be supposed that the prospectus meant to represent the capital of £500,000 as a free, unincumbered capital to be employed in constructing and working the railway, for the articles of association expressly declare that the directors shall adopt and carry into effect the contract or agreement bearing even date therewith, already entered into on behalf of the company by the subscribers, for the purchase of the concession for the construction of the railway. The contract or agreement so referred to was no doubt the agreement for purchase of the concession from the National Finance Company at the price of £50,000; and if, when the Respondent took his shares, he is to be deemed to have had notice of what is so contained in the articles of association, the argument of the Appellants is unanswerable.

But I am of opinion no such notice can be imputed to him. The Winding-up Act, 1862, provides (sect. 16), that the articles of association shall bind every member of the company as if he had subscribed and sealed the same, and had covenanted to conform to all the articles thereof. If the Respondent had actually subscribed and sealed these articles, he certainly could not have alleged want of notice as to the purchase of the concession out of the £500,000 capital. But he never did subscribe or seal them; and in order to make them binding on the Respondent, under the provisions of the statute, it is necessary to shew that he had become a member of the company. The case of the Respondent is, that he never was a member; that all which he did was to act on the faith of the prospectus; and if the prospectus stated what was untrue he is entitled to treat all which he did in reliance on its being true as absolutely null and void.

The statute only meant to bind those who had actually become members. Any one who had without fraud taken shares could not allege ignorance of anything contained in the memorandum of association or in the articles of association, merely because he had not signed or sealed them; but if he never actually signed or sealed them, nor had notice of what they contained, the statute cannot be taken to impute to him knowledge of their contents, so as to protect those who, by a fraud, had induced him to do that which, in the absence of fraud, would have precluded him from saying he was ignorant of their contents. The statute does not authorize any one to sign or seal the instruments in question till after he has become a member. The case of the Respondent is that he never was a member, for that he was induced to take shares by fraudulent representations, which entitle him to repudiate and treat as null all which he was so induced to do.

I had at one time doubted whether this ground of fraud was sufficiently alleged in the bill; but I am satisfied that it is. In the 14th paragraph there is an express charge that the prospectus fraudulently concealed from the Plaintiff the fact that the company had purchased from the National Financial Company, for £50,000, the concession to make the Central Line of Railway. And that seems to me to involve substantially the whole question.

This being my view of the case, it is unnecessary that I should examine the other alleged frauds; I am ready, however, to say that many of them, if standing alone, would not have appeared to me sufficient to warrant the relief asked; but with respect to the omission to state that the contractor's guarantie was limited to £20,000, I am strongly disposed to concur with the Lords Justices. It may be that there is little probability of the guarantie of 2½ per cent ever reaching that amount; but that is a point on which the prospectus ought to have left all persons taking shares to form their own opinion. There would have been no difficulty in stating the limitation, and I should be reluctant to encourage the notion that it was lawful to persons framing a prospectus to decide for themselves that such a restriction need not be mentioned.

The result of my examination of this case is, that I concur with my noble and learned friend in the conclusion that the appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

LORD ROMILLY :—

My Lords, as I concur in the observations which have been made by my noble and learned friend, the Lord Chancellor, and by my noble and learned friend opposite, I think it is unnecessary for me to say more than that I agree in the reasons they have assigned as inducing your Lordships to come to the conclusion that this decree ought to be affirmed.

It is in my opinion not merely by one or two statements in the prospectus, which are not borne out by the facts, that the matter ought to be tried, but by the combined effect of them all producing a result which would have misled any person who took shares upon the faith of the prospectus; but I think also it is very important that your Lordships should by your judgment affirm two propositions, which, I apprehend, are intended to be affirmed by the observations of my noble and learned friend, the Lord Chancellor.

The first is, that contracts of this description between an individual and a company, so far as misrepresentation or suppression of the truth is concerned, are to be treated like contracts between any two individuals. If one man makes a false statement which misleads another, the way in which that is to be treated affords the example for the way in which a contract is to be treated where a company makes a false statement which misleads an individual.

The second proposition, which is also one of great importance, and was particularly alluded to in some of the observations of my noble and learned friend opposite, had reference to the question how far a person who applies for shares in a company is bound by the articles in the memorandum of association. On that subject I would observe that a contract between a company and an individual differs from a contract between two individuals alone in this respect, that upon the faith of his becoming a member of the company various persons are induced to deal with the company, and to become shareholders, which they would not do, except upon the belief that he was a member of it. The result is, that it becomes necessary for him, in order to set aside a contract of this description, that he should come with the utmost diligence for that purpose, so that no person may be misled by the fact of his remaining a member of the association. In this case, that question was minutely gone into by the Lord Chancellor, who shewed, in my opinion, that the party is not debarred by any laches on his part from raising that question. But if a person takes shares in a company, and forbears to make any examination into it, and becomes bound by the articles of association, and continues his connexion with it for a time, by which other persons may be induced, upon the credit of his name, to take shares in the association, or to deal with it, then I apprehend that your Lordships will be of opinion that it is too late for him to get rid of his liability on the ground of his having been induced by false representations to take shares in the company. These are the only observations I desire to add to those which have been addressed to your Lordships by my noble and learned friends, in which I fully concur.

LORD COLONSAY:—

My Lords, I entirely concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived, that this judgment should be affirmed.

Order appealed from affirmed; and appeal dismissed with costs.

STEWART J.:

Nature of the Action

[1] This is an action against the Defendants for damages on various grounds arising out of loans advanced by the Plaintiffs in the principal amount of $25 million to the defendant New World Engineering Corporation ("New World").

[2] The Plaintiff Century Services Inc. ("Century") advanced funds in 2005 and 2006 by way of two loans to New World, one in the amount of $5 million (less fees and interest reserves), the other in the amount of $10 million (less fees and interest reserves). The first loan was repaid by New World.

[3] The Plaintiff Clairvest Group Inc. ("Clairvest") also advanced two separate loans to New World in 2005 and 2006: one in the amount of $5 million (less fees and interest reserves), the other in the amount of $5 million (less fees and interest reserves).

[4] In July 2006, New World defaulted on the outstanding loans of approximately $20 million. New World was quickly placed into receivership by court order and has not defended this action.

[5] The Defendants Roberto Bustamante ("Bustamante") and Roberto Bustamante c.o.b. as Canada Stage Designs were noted in default early in these proceedings and their defences were struck. No request was made to set aside those default consequences. The Plaintiffs' allegations as against them are therefore undefended by them and are taken to be true.

[6] The action as against the Defendant Hatice Pakdil has been discontinued.

[7] When the trial of this action commenced, the Plaintiffs were advancing six main claims as follows:

(a) damages for fraud, misrepresentation, deceit, conspiracy, conversion and other related claims as against John Cheong ("Cheong") and Fred Bain ("Bain"), the principals of New World, and various related parties including Atique Choudhry ("Choudhry"), and an accounting and tracing claim against those corporations and individuals to whom loan proceeds have been traced;

(b) damages for negligence as against Magnus Verbrugge ("Verbrugge") and Borden Ladner Gervais LLP ("BLG") who acted as the Plaintiffs' counsel on all four loans;

(c) damages for breach of fiduciary duty as against Verbrugge and BLG;

(d) damages based on vicarious liability as against TD Waterhouse Canada Inc. ("TD Waterhouse") for the actions of its employee, Bulent Pakdil ("Pakdil") in the fraud and damages for fraudulent misrepresentation, fraud, and conspiracy to commit fraud, or in the alternative, for negligent misrepresentation against Pakdil;

(e) damages based on vicarious liability as against the Toronto-Dominion Bank ("TD Bank") for the actions of its employee, Allen de Vera ("de Vera") in the fraud or, in the alternative, for de Vera's negligence; and

(f) damages for breach of solicitor's undertakings by Gary Kissack ("Kissack"), Goodman & Carr LLP, Barry Fillmore ("Fillimore") and Fogler Rubinoff LLP ("borrower's counsel").

[8] The Plaintiffs obtained orders preserving certain assets and bank accounts of some of the Defendants, including Certificates of Pending Litigation against property owned by them, which represent the result of the efforts made by the Plaintiffs to trace the funds originally advanced to New World and to preserve wherever possible the funds and property held by the Defendants as a result of the fraud alleged against them. In doing so, some vehicles and other property owned by the Defendants were sold by court order and the proceeds of sale placed into trust pending the determination of these proceedings.

[9] The trial of this action and its array of claims began on April 2, 2012. After several weeks of evidence, by Minutes of Settlement dated June 8, 2012 the Plaintiffs settled all of their claims as against the Defendants Verbrugge, BLG, TD Waterhouse, Pakdil, TD Bank, de Vera, and all borrowers' counsel (the "Settling Defendants").

[10] The settlement document entered into by the Plaintiffs with the Settling Defendants was structured in the form of a "Pierringer Agreement". It provided that the Plaintiffs would continue with their claims against the remaining Defendants to pursue the judgment sought against them. All claims against the Settling Defendants and all claims for contribution and indemnity by the Settling Defendants against the remaining Defendants would be dismissed. The Pierringer Agreement received Court approval on June 12, 2012 and its provisions were thereby made effective.

[11] The Perringer Agreement provided for a very substantial payment of $15.5 million to the Plaintiffs which was disclosed to the Court by the settling parties, although the proportionate contribution of each to that overall amount was not revealed. Any judgment obtained against any of the remaining Defendants for damages must be correspondingly reduced by the amounts paid to the Plaintiffs for damages, interest, recovery expenses and legal costs.

[12] The resolution of those claims considerably streamlined and simplified the remaining issues to be addressed at trial. In accordance with the Pierringer Agreement, the Plaintiffs continued the balance of the trial only as against the remaining Defendants.

[13] The remaining Defendants are said to have either orchestrated the fraud, assisted with the fraud and/or are persons or entities to whom the loan proceeds are alleged to have been traced and/or from whom an accounting is sought.

[14] The remaining Defendants are:

(a) Cheong, one of the principals of New World who is said to have masterminded the fraud and to whom loan proceeds are said to have been traced, who represented himself at trial;

(b) Bain, the other principal of New World who is alleged to have knowingly and willingly participated in the fraud, who represented himself at trial;

(c) Bustamante, Bain's romantic partner with whom he cohabits, who is alleged to have knowingly assisted with the fraud and knowingly received proceeds of the fraud, and whose Statement of Defence has been struck;

(d) New World, Roberto Bustamante c.o.b. Canada Stage Designs ("Canadian Stage Designs"), Hingson Corporation, Hingson Entertainment Corporation ("Hingson Entertainment"), Hingson Financial Corporation ("Hingson Financial"), Hingson Development Corporation ("Hingson Development"), Circa Canada Incorporated, Greenfield Capital Engineering Inc. ("Greenfield"), Image Nightclub Incorporated, Banzai Restaurants Inc., Eight Restolounge Incorporated, Bustamante Holdings Corporation, 1249492 Ontario Inc. Blue Giant Productions Inc., Engineered Construction Limited and Daniel Distribution Corporation ("Daniel Distribution"), (collectively, the "Corporate Fraud Defendants") being companies controlled by one or more of Cheong, Bain, Bustamante and Choudhry and which are alleged to have been used by them defraud on the Plaintiffs and to misappropriate and fraudulently convert the Plaintiffs' loan proceeds;

(e) Lai Li Chong (Cheong's mother) and Julia Cheong (Cheong's wife), to whom loan proceeds are alleged to have been traced, who did not actively participate in the trial or give evidence on their own behalf or on behalf of any party;

(f) Choudhry, who is alleged to have knowingly assisted Cheong and Bain with the fraud and knowingly received proceeds of the fraud through Engineered Construction Limited ("Engineered Construction") and Blue Giant Productions Inc. ("Blue Giant").

[15] Following the hearing of evidence at trial, the Plaintiffs and the remaining Defendants were provided with substantial time to review the evidence and to supply submissions in writing to permit them to address the evidence and all issues raised in the action to the extent they considered necessary. I have now considered those submissions in light of all of the evidence and authorities provided.

The Positions of the Remaining Defendants

[16] Cheong agrees that the Plaintiffs were defrauded but maintains that he did not knowingly participate in the fraud. Rather, he asserts that it is Bain (with Bustamante's help) who is the real fraudster. He also asserts that the financing arrangement was Kissack's idea. Cheong makes no specific allegations of fraud against Pakdil or de Vera or anyone else at TD Waterhouse or TD Bank, but notes that de Vera was Bain's friend. Cheong alleges claims for contribution in negligence as against the lawyers and the law firms representing all parties to the loan transactions, and also submits that the Plaintiffs through their own carelessness were the authors of their own misfortune and should be held contributorily responsible for their losses.

[17] Bain agrees that the Plaintiffs were defrauded, but maintains that he did not knowingly participate in the fraud. Rather, he asserts that Cheong was the mastermind behind this fraud. He characterizes himself and Bustamante as Cheong's innocent dupes in the scheme.

[18] Although Bustamante's defence has been struck, in submissions provided by Bain the same position put forward by Bain is advanced on Bustamante's behalf: that it was Cheong who was the culprit who perpetrated this fraud on his own, without his or Bain's knowledge.

[19] Lai Li Chong and Julia Cheong did not testify at trial. To the extent that they received loan funds improperly, Cheong's assertions of innocence and lack of involvement in the fraud are taken to be repeated by them. Cheong also provided written submissions on their behalf and on behalf of the Corporate Fraud Defendants represented by him.

[20] Those Corporate Fraud Defendants which received loan proceeds directly or through which loan proceeds were said to have been channeled have the same protestations of innocence advanced on their behalf as are maintained variously by Cheong, Bain and Bustamante.

[21] Choudhry agrees that the Plaintiffs were defrauded, but maintains that he had no knowledge of or involvement in any scheme to defraud them. He swears that he was a mere contractor who did construction work under contract on projects for which he was hired and for legitimate payments received from Cheong and Bain, and that he had no knowledge that the money used to pay him or the companies in which he had an interest came from the Plaintiffs or as a result of any fraudulent scheme.

2013 ONSC 2140 (CanLII)

Conclusion

[22] I accept without reservation the evidence tendered by the Plaintiffs against Cheong, Bain and Bustamante. This evidence provides in considerable detail how these loans were sought by Cheong and Bain, the false information provided by them, the phony promises made by them with respect to the security arrangements, and the discovery in due course that the entire apparatus was a sham designed to defraud the Plaintiffs of the loan proceeds they had advanced to New World. This evidence includes the testimony of Dean Chan ("Chan"), Rod Hudson ("Hudson"), Larry Dugdale ("Dugdale") and Bruce Maclennan ("Maclennan") of Century and Heather Crawford ("Crawford") and Kenneth Rotman ("Rotman") of Clairvest, and as augmented by the evidence of Kissack. False representations of fact were made by Cheong and Bain, with the assistance of Bustamante, with knowledge of their falsity, and with the intention they be acted upon by the Plaintiffs. The Plaintiffs did act upon these false representations to their detriment and suffered damages by doing so.

[23] I likewise accept without reservation the evidence of the Receiver of New World (Allen Shiner) and of Navigant Consulting (Ted Baskerville), who together provided a detailed account of their efforts to trace the loan funds into and through entities controlled by Cheong, Bain and Bustamante and to persons related to them after the fraud was discovered. Their persistent efforts to track down the money are further detailed in eleven Receiver's Reports filed with the Court which contain full information as to the convoluted trail of the funds they were forced to pursue.

[24] According to the Receiver, cash and property worth approximately $4 - $5 million has been traced, located and preserved thus far. The specific whereabouts of much of the rest of the $20 million loan proceeds advanced by the Plaintiffs and remaining outstanding is unknown. A considerable portion of the loan proceeds found its way into work done constructing or refurbishing night clubs in downtown Toronto's Entertainment District - most notably the now-defunct Circa – which raises the distinct suspicion that additional but unknown persons not before the Court were involved in or derived considerable benefit from the fraud.

[25] I reject the protestations of innocence offered by Cheong, Bain and Bustamante. Their evidence, except for their allegations against each other, was a tissue of lies. Their respective explanations of their involvement in the process by which the loans were obtained by New World for purposes later shown to be false, how they engaged the assistance of Pakdil and/or other unknown persons at TD Bank and/or TD Waterhouse to co-operate in a scheme designed to make the Plaintiffs and their counsel believe that the T-Bills purchased with the loan proceeds would be held secure in a locked-in account at TD Waterhouse, or why they assisted in the establishment of and involvement in an array of corporate and other vehicles through which the loan proceeds were churned and directed to these Defendants or their related parties were completely lacking in credibility when measured against the evidence of the Plaintiffs and the volumes of incriminating documentation put forward at trial. I also find the evidence of Kenneth Robinson ("Robinson"), called by Cheong apparently to seek to characterize Bain as the mastermind of this multi-million dollar fraud, to be of very little credibility or weight when viewed against the rest of the evidence which supports a conclusion that Cheong was in charge.

[26] Cheong, Bain and Bustamante failed to provide any credible explanation as to why or how they managed to receive large sums of money from the supposedly "locked-in" accounts used by them to varying degrees to buy flashy cars, a boat, expensive houses, to carry on the construction and refurbishment of a series of fancy nightclubs in which they had an interest or involvement and to attempt to establish reserves of investment by secreting the funds in accounts held in names other than their own. Cheong's efforts to explain the justification of his receipt of funds as being payment pursuant to a $25 million "Employment Executive Agreement" with Hingson Entertainment Corporation for which he provided essentially no services are aptly described by Plaintiffs' counsel as simply preposterous.

[27] I am of the view that the evidence presented at trial presents overwhelmingly solid and substantial proof that the Plaintiffs were the victims of a fraud carried out by Cheong and Bain with Bustamante's knowing assistance. Although the evidence supports the conclusion that Cheong was the "brains" behind the fraud, Bain and Bustamante to varying degrees willingly and knowingly participated in it and enjoyed at least a portion of its financial spoils. All three must therefore be held jointly and severally liable to the Plaintiffs for the damages suffered as a result.

[28] For these and the reasons that follow, I find that the Plaintiffs have proven all of their claims against those remaining Defendants to the extent required by law. The burden on them to do so is on the civil standard of a balance of probabilities. The clear, cogent and compelling evidence presented at trial, in my opinion, very easily discharges that burden.

[29] The Plaintiffs are also entitled to all accounting and tracing orders sought in their Amended Amended Fresh As Amended Statement of Claim as against Lai Li Chong, Julia Cheong, and the Corporate Defendants to the extent these have not already been ordered and enforced. All allegations as against them of fraudulent conversion and unjust enrichment have been proven and to the extent they have received funds or the product of funds as a result of this fraud, they must be returned to the Plaintiffs.

[30] Finally, I am not satisfied that the Plaintiffs have adequately discharged their burden of proving their claims of fraud against Choudhry to the extent the law requires or have established any entitlement to recoup payments received by him from Cheong, Bain and/or Bustamante through Blue Giant, Engineered Construction or Daniel Distribution Corporation for construction work performed by him.

The Scheme

[31] Despite the extent of evidence called at trial and the volumes of exhibits and other materials filed in the action, I must conclude the scheme employed by these individuals to defraud the Plaintiffs, when distilled to its essentials, was a conceptually simple one.

[32] The scheme was based upon a series of fraudulent misrepresentations by Cheong and Bain, assisted by Bustamante, to the Plaintiffs and their counsel concerning the nature of New World's business, the reason for seeking the loans, the security features to be attached to the security to be given for the loans, and the virtually immediate and progressive improper use of the loan proceeds in violation of the strict security arrangements which they had assured the Plaintiffs were supposed to be in place.

The Loans

[33] In order to obtain the loans in question, Cheong and Bain retained Kissack of Goodman & Carr as counsel to facilitate New World's efforts to borrow money.

[34] Cheong and Bain represented to Kissack that New World was in the business of distributing and servicing large pieces of equipment. They said that if New World could show a required amount of assets held by the company on its balance sheet, it could deal directly with the manufacturers of such equipment to obtain benefits of such direct dealings by way of significant price discounts.

[35] Cheong and Bain told Kissack that these manufacturers would not be concerned with the fact that the balance sheet for New World would show the loan as a liability because the manufacturer was only concerned with the value of assets held in the company name. It would therefore serve New World's purposes if all loan proceeds were deposited into an account at TD Waterhouse in the name of New World and made to remain there.

[36] Century is in the business of providing "asset-backed" loans. Often such loans are made to entities in some financial distress which have been rejected by more traditional lenders. Century's principal concern in negotiating such loans is to ensure that its security for the loan is rock solid. Clairvest, although a more conventional lender, similarly was vitally concerned with the quality of the security package to be put into place.

[37] On October 19, 2005, Hudson, Century's CFO, participated in a conference call with Cheong and Kissack along with Chan and Cam Deller ("Deller") of Century. Kissack explained to them the concept behind the loan sought based on information provided to him by Cheong and Bain. When asked about New World's business, Cheong explained that New World promoted, installed and monitored "process logic controllers" in manufacturing environments. Cheong represented to Century that New World acted as a reseller of these process logic controllers for large industrial manufacturers and already had a large customer base for which New World had installed such process logic controllers and continued to be responsible for their monitoring.

[38] Hudson, Deller and the other participants on the call believed Cheong when he made these representations as Cheong appeared to be very knowledgeable about process logic controllers. As was later discovered, all of this information conveyed to the representatives of Century was false.

[39] Indeed, New World had no such business. Following the demise in 2006 of New World, its Receiver was not able to find any evidence that suggested that New World ever operated the business for which these loans were purportedly obtained. Baskerville, the Managing Director of Navigant Consulting which had been retained by the Receiver to perform a tracing analysis of funds advanced, testified at trial that the banking records received from New World indicated that New World was not even a legitimate operating business.

[40] Crawford, Clairvest's general counsel, attended a presentation for potential lenders in October 2005 at Goodman & Carr's Toronto office organized by Kissack at the request of Cheong and Bain. At that time, Cheong and Kissack (based on information provided by Cheong) made essentially the same presentation as was made to Century, stating that New World serviced factories and that they wanted to get "higher up in the chain" of stocking distributors of such equipment to qualify for discounts and needed money to be reflected on its balance sheet in order to do so.

[41] None of this was true. New World was not operating the business for which the loans were purportedly obtained. New World had never been paid by any customers for work related to robotics or process automation during his time at the company.

[42] Throughout the time he dealt with these prospective lenders, Cheong referred to himself as "Dr. Cheong", and held himself out as a professional engineer with a doctorate in engineering and an MBA. Although he had some experience in industry, Cheong was neither a professional engineer, a doctor in engineering or an MBA.

[43] Bain also conducted himself during these negotiations as an experienced legitimate business executive. In fact, most of the time prior to 2005 Bain had been unemployed, subsisting on a small government pension. His partner, Bustamante, had worked in an A&W restaurant before taking up work in an adult video store on Yonge Street in Toronto.

[44] The financial statements of New World and Hingson Corporation (a Corporate Fraud Defendant operated by Cheong and Bain) which were provided to the Plaintiffs were inaccurate, false and misleading. These financial statements were signed by Bain and hand delivered by Bain to Kissack to be provided to the Plaintiffs. Robinson, the chartered accountant who prepared the statements and signed the Notice to Reader, swore that Cheong had provided him with all of the information contained in them and that he had just reproduced the information on the financial statements without any attempt at verification.

[45] Likewise, the information on the Hingson Group and its principals (Cheong and Bain) that was presented to the Plaintiffs and later to their counsel was false and misleading. Kissack testified that he prepared an "executive summary" that was provided to the Plaintiffs based upon information provided to him by Cheong and Bain. Kissack explained that he obtained the information for this executive summary from a biography Cheong e-mailed to him as well as from links to one or more websites that discussed the business operations of some or all of the companies described in the executive summary, and from discussions that he had with Cheong and Bain.

[46] The biography used by Kissack contains information which even Cheong admitted was false, including the description of the Hingson Group's (Hingson Entertainment and Hingson Financial) business and the description of Cheong's role in the Hingson Group's business.

[47] Bain admitted at trial that the "executive summary" of the Hingson Group also misrepresented Bain's experience and responsibilities as well as the business operations of New World and the Hingson entities.

[48] Essentially, Cheong and Bain procured these loans by misrepresenting who they were, what they did and what the money they were seeking was to be used for.

Involvement of TD Bank and TD Waterhouse

[49] Both Plaintiffs had expressed internally some serious reservations about proceeding with these loans given the somewhat unusual explanation given as to their purpose. However, their concerns and skepticism were assuaged by the feature of the loan agreement which required the full loan proceeds to be invested in secure T-Bills and locked into an account with TD Waterhouse and not to be released without their written consent.

[50] In order to assure the Plaintiffs that the loaned funds would remain secure, Cheong and Bain had represented and agreed that the monies loaned to New World were to be deposited into specified accounts at TD Waterhouse and used to purchase Government of Canada treasury bills (the "T-bills"). The T-bills were not to be sold, transferred, pledged or encumbered in any manner. They were to be held in a TD Waterhouse account like "gold in a box", as Maclennan described the plan.

[51] New World and TD Waterhouse purportedly agreed to place certain controls on its accounts at TD Waterhouse so that no activity could take place in such accounts without the written consent of the applicable lender.

[52] Cheong, Bain and Bustamante obtained letters from the TD Bank signed by de Vera which were provided to the Plaintiffs which stated that TD Bank would not take a security interest in the T-Bills proposed to be purchased with the proceeds of the loans and would not assert any interest in or claim to the securities in priority to the lenders' security interest therein.

[53] Cheong, Bain and Bustamante obtained additional Acknowledgement letters from TD Waterhouse purportedly signed by Pakdil which were provided to the Plaintiffs which stated that TD Waterhouse will not allow any activity in the accounts to occur without the signature of the authorized signing officer to the account and consented to in writing by the lending Plaintiff, or allow New World to incur any indebtedness without the prior written consent of the lending Plaintiff.

[54] Pakdil swore that he never signed any such letters. Expert handwriting analysis tendered at trial through two separate experts demonstrated that two of the letters bear Pakdil's signature but the other letters bear signatures which are not those of Pakdil. At the very least, these subsequent acknowledgement letters are suspect and it is probable that they were forged by Cheong with Bain's knowledge.

[55] On October 25, 2005, Century Loan #1 closed. Kissack, Cheong, Bain and Chan all attended at TD Waterhouse's offices. Chan's role was to ensure that TD Waterhouse understood that funds were not to be released from the account holding the loan proceeds without Century's written consent. Chan testified that he met with Pakdil at TD Waterhouse who at that time confirmed to him directly all aspects of the deal for which TD Waterhouse had assumed responsibility – that he had seen the acknowledgement, that it bore his signature and that it would be placed into the account file and flagged for special attention.

[56] Induced by Cheong's and Bain's fraudulent misrepresentations regarding their experience and qualifications, the business of New World, the purpose of the loans and the security arrangements being offered, Century and Clairvest advanced loans to New World through a series of four loans as follows:

(a) Century Loan #1: Century advanced New World $5 Million on October 25, 2005;

(b) Clairvest Loan #1: Clairvest advanced New World $5 Million on December 7, 2005;

(c) Century Loan #2: Century advanced New World $10 Million on April 5, 2006;

(d) Clairvest Loan #2: Clairvest advanced New World $5 Million on May 4, 2006.

[57] In each instance, and almost immediately after the funds were advanced and placed into TD Waterhouse accounts, they were allowed by TD Waterhouse personnel to be withdrawn from the accounts in which they were to be held. In my opinion, it is highly unlikely that this could ever have been done without the knowledge and willing assistance of some person or persons on the inside at TD Waterhouse.

How was the Fraud Discovered?

[58] Cheong and Bain could not hide their fraudulent scheme forever. As already noted, a large portion of the loan proceeds were used in the construction and refurbishment of a series of downtown Toronto night clubs. They eventually ran out of money, largely because of disputes and cost overruns for the construction of Circa, an extravagant downtown Toronto night club. Ultimately, they could no longer use the loan proceeds themselves to fund the making of regular interest payments owing to the Plaintiffs which had served for a while to prevent the Plaintiffs from discovering the truth.

[59] Indeed, Cheong and Bain had created forged account statements for delivery to the Plaintiffs and concocted a letter on TD Bank stationery signed by a non-existent employee to explain and apologize for a slip-up in investment of the loan proceeds which had come to the attention of one of the Plaintiffs.

[60] In July 2006, New World ultimately failed to make the monthly interest payments owed to the Plaintiffs. The fraud was discovered when this non-payment led to the making of inquiries by the Plaintiffs of the principals of New World and of TD Waterhouse. It was then determined that the TD Waterhouse cash accounts that were supposed to have been holding $20 million of the Plaintiffs' monies were empty.

[61] Bain admitted that he was not surprised when Chan contacted him in July 2006 after the fraud had been discovered, because he knew the money was missing and that the lenders would come looking for it at some point.

[62] Bain testified that, after the discovery of the fraud, Cheong contacted him and told him to blame everything on Kissack. Bain then called Kissack on July 25, 2006 to alert him to Cheong's intention to blame Kissack and to attempt to spirit away some significant portion of the missing funds. Kissack immediately contacted and advised counsel for the Plaintiffs of the information he had received. Receivership proceedings had already been started and by order of Morawetz J. dated July 21, 2006, New World and the other Corporate Fraud Defendants as detailed therein were placed into receivership. Various freezing orders were also obtained.

[63] As noted above, Cheong blames Bain and Bustamante and others. Bain and Bustamante blame Cheong. In my view, the evidence very clearly establishes that, whatever they may say now, they were working together to perpetrate this fraud.

Where did the Money Go?

[64] After the discovery of the fraud, the Receiver conducted an investigation into New World's operations. He contacted Allen-Bradley, one of the companies with which New World had purportedly had extensive dealings and from whom the fictitious "stocking discounts" were to be obtained. No one at Allen-Bradley had ever heard of Cheong, Bain, New World or the Hingson Group of Companies.

[65] The Receiver retained Navigant Consulting ("Navigant") to continue to perform an extensive tracing analysis based on corporate documents and bank records which the Receiver had obtained through the receivership process.

[66] Baskerville testified that he had carriage of the tracing analysis in this case. Baskerville is certified by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants as a forensic accountant and has had extensive experience in the field of investigative forensic accounting.

[67] The Navigant tracing analysis was not contradicted by the remaining Defendants in any material substance. Although Cheong said that he disagreed with all of it, he provided no alternative tracing or other evidence to seriously refute or undermine the Navigant analysis. I also note that Cheong was not actively co-operative with the Receiver in the efforts to determine where the funds went.

[68] Navigant traced millions of dollars of the Plaintiffs' loan proceeds to Cheong, Julia Cheong, Lai Li Chong, Bain, Bustamante and/or corporations under their control.

[69] As noted, Baskerville testified that the tracing information was based primarily upon banking and other records that had been obtained by the Receiver and provided to Navigant. This tracing information was continuously updated as additional banking information was obtained and is reflected in the periodic reports of the Receiver.

[70] Baskerville testified that the loan proceeds were funneled and churned through the bank accounts of the various Corporate Fraud Defendants of which Cheong, Bain and Bustamante were signing officers. Cheong was a director of Hingson Corporation, Greenfield and Engineering Construction, and that Bain was a director of Greenfield Capital, Hingson Financial and Hingson Entertainment. Hingson Entertainment, Hingson Financial, Hingson Development, Hingson Media and Hingson Capital are all companies affiliated with Hingson Corporation that were controlled by Cheong and Bain. Bustamante was the sole director of Bustamante Holdings Corporation. These several corporations as well as individuals were involved in the funneling of loan proceeds in various ways.

[71] The Reports prepared by Navigant record the details of the tracing exercise described in Baskerville's evidence. These are set out in summary fashion in paragraphs 33 – 101 of the Plaintiffs' Closing Argument and are adopted in substance by reference into these Reasons. Among the various results of the tracing exercise are the following notable discoveries:

(a) Bain's mentally disabled brother, Richard, was used as a means by which to funnel $2 million of loan proceeds into a TD Bank account in his name;

(b) $5 million was channeled into Bustamante's company Canadian Stage Designs and then transferred into a TD Bank account held jointly by Bustamante and Bain;

(c) Over $5 million of the loan proceeds found its way into bank or investment accounts held by Cheong, Julia Cheong or Lai Li Chong (Cheong's elderly, ailing mother);

(d) Loan proceeds were used to discharge mortgages on Cheong's residence at 28 Theobolds Circle, Richmond Hill. Title to that property was transferred to Julia Cheong for no consideration, a fraudulent transaction designed to defeat creditors and to obfuscate any efforts to trace the loan funds or attach them;

2013 ONSC 2140 (CanLII)

(e) Loan proceeds were also used to purchase a residential property at 101 McGill Street, Toronto now held in the names of Bain and Bustamante.

Choudhry

[72] Choudhry is a graduate in mechanical engineering and a Certified Professional Engineer who met Cheong when he was embarking upon an internship at Chrysler Canada Corporation in Brampton, Ontario.

[73] Choudhry became involved at Cheong's invitation in the contracting of construction work done on downtown Toronto nightclub locations in which Cheong, Bain and Bustamante were involved. When he became concerned about the slipshod banking, accounting and record-keeping practices that Cheong employed in Engineered Construction, Choudhry formed Blue Giant to deal with the documentation required for receipt of funds and disbursement of payments to the various trades who worked on these projects. Compensation, based upon a percentage of the value of the contract performed, was received by him.

[74] Choudhry did not participate in the obtaining of the loans or any dealings with the Plaintiffs, TD Bank or TD Waterhouse. Neither Cheong, Bain nor Bustamante sought to implicate him in any way in the scheme. Although the payments Choudhry received may have been generous, I find that they were on the whole for work genuinely performed by him through his company.

[75] As the problems faced by Cheong, Bain and Bustamante began to mount, Choudhry started to worry that "something fishy" was going on. He was instructed by Cheong to make a few what he thought were irregular payments – for partial purchase of a boat and to Julia Cheong (under her maiden name), for instance – which caused him some concern and suspicion. There is no sufficiently compelling evidence, however, that Choudhry ever knew that the funds used to pay him came from the Plaintiffs and certainly no evidence that proves that he was aware of any fraud carried out against the Plaintiffs by Cheong, Bain and Bustamante.

[76] As it turned out, Choudhry ended up performing work for months without being paid and ultimately lost his home. There is no indication in the evidence that he has received any lasting tangible benefit from his business association with Cheong, Bain and Bustamante. I accept Choudhry's evidence and his counsel's submission that he was duped by this collection of fraudsters, as were the Plaintiffs. Perhaps he should have known that something nefarious was afoot, but that suggestion is not enough to justify a finding of fraud against him. One might easily make the same observation about the Plaintiffs themselves.

[77] Choudhry willingly co-operated with the Receiver and supplied information to him relating to Engineered Construction and Blue Giant and their activities.

[78] I therefore must conclude that Choudhry's mere involvement in the business activities carried on by Cheong, Bain and Bustamante has not been proven by the Plaintiffs to be of such a nature to support a finding of fraud or the other findings urged by the Plaintiffs against him, including their claim that he ought to be ordered to turn over to them the funds received by him as a result of the settlement of litigation against third parties arising out of the construction project in which he was involved. The action against Choudhry is therefore dismissed.

2013 ONSC 2140 (CanLII)

Damages

[79] Pursuant to the settlement with the Settling Defendants, the Plaintiffs received a payment of $15.5 million. The settlement amount was comprised of the following components:

(a) $10.5 million in respect of the Plaintiffs' principal loss;

(b) $2.8 million in respect of pre-judgment interest;

(c) $500,000 in respect of recovery expenses; and

(d) $1.7 million in respect of legal costs.

[80] The Plaintiffs are therefore entitled to the following relief as against Cheong, Bain, Bustamante and the remaining Defendants, with the exception of Choudhry, to the extent they have obtained or are in possession of the proceeds of the fraud as traced by the Receiver:

(a) $7,184,172 in respect of the Plaintiffs' principal loss ($17,684,172 principal loss minus the $10.5 million received from the Settling Defendants);

(b) $531,883.13 in respect of recovery damages ($1,031,883.13 recovery damages minus $500,000 received from the Settling Defendants in respect of recovery damages).

[81] The Receiver's 11th Report indicates that the Receiver has frozen the following assets:

Proceeds from the sale of seized assets	$ 226,128
Funds in Receiver's Account	$ 9,300
Accounts at TD, RBC and RBCDS	$4,244,412
Cash in safety deposit box	$ 39,550
Monies held by Adam Vassos, a Toronto lawyer	$ 80,000
Total	$4,599,390

[82] In addition to the above, the assets frozen held by the Receiver include two Cartier watches and three rings that were purchased for $90,540.86 as outlined in the Receiver's 9th Report.

[83] The Receiver also has obtained and placed Certificates of Pending Litigation on properties at 28 Theobalds Circle and 101 McGill Street. To the extent the transfer of 28

Theobalds Circle from Cheong to Julia Cheong referred to herein is to be set aside as fraudulent, an order shall go accordingly. The Receiver is hereby instructed to sell the properties and turn over the proceeds of sale and the proceeds of all of the frozen assets referred to above to the Plaintiffs. No claim is made by Choudhry or Blue Grant against the proceeds of sale of the boat currently being held by the Receiver.

2013 ONSC 2140 (CanLII)

Punitive Damages

[84] It was mentioned during the course of the proceedings that criminal charges arising out of these events were laid against Cheong, Bain and Bustamante, but did not proceed to trial for final determination.

[85] The conduct of Cheong and Bain is of such a willfully reprehensible nature that it should attract an award of punitive damages that will reflect the Court's strong disapproval of same, will punish and will deter others from engaging in similar behaviour. I therefore award punitive damages to the Plaintiffs in the amount of $300,000.00, a sum for which Cheong and Bain shall be jointly and severally liable. I view Bustamante's role in this scheme as being mainly supportive. I decline to make any award of punitive damages against him or against any of the other remaining Defendants.

The Pierringer Agreement – Effect on Proportionate Liability Of Cheong, Bain and Bustamante

[86] The Pierringer Agreement provides that the remaining Defendants may seek a judgment which provides for contribution and indemnity from all or any of the settling Defendants, thus potentially reducing their liability. Claims of negligence and other bases for contribution have been advanced by the remaining Defendants against certain settling Defendants.

[87] Although the action against the Settling Defendants was terminated before all of the evidence (including the evidence of several Defendants and their experts) was called, I am of the view that the state of the evidence prior to the settlement would have served to justify a finding that the Plaintiffs had been negligent in failing to carry out reasonable due diligence on the principals of New World and the purpose of the loans before advancing the funds, and failing to adequately monitor the TD Waterhouse account and respond promptly to several warning signals received by them before the funds disappeared. Similarly, there is evidence upon which it could also be concluded that the Plaintiffs' legal advisors were negligent in failing to advise the Plaintiffs of the risks of advancing the loan funds in these unusual circumstances and failing to confirm directly with the responsible legal personnel at TD Bank and TD Waterhouse that all security measures were actually legitimate and in place.

[88] Further, as already noted, it is evident that Cheong, Bain and Bustamante had some assistance from a person or persons within TD Bank and/or TD Waterhouse. The claims against Goodman & Carr, Kissack, Fogler Rubinoff and Barry Fillimore are principally for breach of solicitors' undertakings and, in my view, do not raise any issues of contribution or indemnity. If I am incorrect in that conclusion, for the same reasons as articulated below I do not consider any order for contribution or indemnity by these Defendants would be just.

[89] Although there may be some rare circumstances in which persons found liable in fraud may take advantage of and rely upon the provisions of the Negligence Act or any common law right to seek contribution and indemnity from other parties, in my opinion the preponderance of authority supports the proposition that want of care is no defence to fraud (see: United Services Fund v. Richardson Greenshields Canada Limited (1988), 22 BCLR 322 (BCSC); Ambico Ltd. v. Loeb Inc. et al., 13 O.R. (3d) 423 (Ont. C.A.)). It would be wholly unjust and highly inappropriate in this case to allow these Defendants to shift any portion of liability for their fraudulent conduct onto the Plaintiffs or any of the other Defendants. Their culpability for the Plaintiffs' losses is of such magnitude that it wholly extinguishes any argument that some want of care on the part of the Plaintiffs or any of their co-Defendants should give rise to contribution. Accordingly, the Pierringer Agreement will have no bearing upon the liability of those remaining Defendants other than to reduce the amount of the judgment to reflect the rule against any double recovery by the Plaintiffs of their losses and damages.

Conclusion

[90] If there are any related orders that are required by any of the parties which are not reflected in the above disposition, I may be spoken to.

[91] If the subjects of interest and costs cannot be agreed upon written submissions may be delivered by the Plaintiffs within 30 days from today's date, and by the remaining Defendants within 30 days thereafter.

Memorandum of Decision of the
Honourable Mr. Justice J.T. Eamon

2018 ABQB 170 (CanLII)

I. Introduction

[1] The Applicant applies pursuant to section 125 of the Chartered Professional Accountants Act, SA 2014, c C-10.2 (the "Act") to enforce the portions of a Sanction Agreement imposing money fines and costs on the Respondent arising from three allegations of professional misconduct which he committed as a Certified General Accountant. Two of the allegations of misconduct occurred before the Respondent became bankrupt. One arose from events after he became bankrupt. The Sanction Agreement was made during his bankruptcy.

[2] The Respondent says that the financial liabilities in his Sanction Agreement are provable claims in the bankruptcy, so the Applicant cannot enforce the Sanction Agreement outside that process.

[3] The issue is whether disciplinary fines and costs imposed on a professional accountant by his or her professional regulatory authority after the accountant became bankrupt are a provable claim under subsection 121(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, RSC 1985, c B-3 ("BIA").

II. Background facts

[4] The Respondent was a Certified General Accountant in Alberta ("CGA"). The CGA profession was regulated by the Certified General Accountants' Association of Alberta (the "CGAA") under the Regulated Accounting Professions Act, RSA 2000, c R-12 ("RAPA"). The Applicant is CGAA's successor.

[5] On November 20, 2014 a third party complainant (in this case, an accounting firm) made a complaint to the CGAA alleging that the Respondent:

(a) knowingly falsified financial statements for 2 corporations;
(b) knowingly distributed the false financial statements to third parties that included the misappropriated and unauthorized use of the complainant's logo;
(c) engaged in conduct which reflects negatively on the Respondent's honesty, integrity, trustworthiness, or suitability as a registrant of the profession.

[6] CGAA was required under section 70(1) of RAPA to send a copy of the complaint to the regulated member concerned within 30 days after receiving it.

[7] The CIC Secretary of the CGAA sent the complaint to the Respondent by letter dated January 14, 2015 and delivered February 2, 2015. There was no explanation provided why the CGAA did not meet the 30 day deadline and nothing is made of it by the Respondent in argument. There is no evidence to suggest that the delay was related to any knowledge or concern the Respondent might go bankrupt or to manipulate the issue whether the matter is or is not a provable claim.

[8] The Respondent was notified by the CIC Secretary in the January 14, 2015 letter that he was required to respond to the complaint under subsection 70(2) of RAPA. He was provided the wrong response date (30 days from the date of the letter rather than 30 days from receipt) but nothing turns on that.

[9] The Respondent assigned himself into bankruptcy on February 12, 2015. The Respondent's response to the complaint was not yet due.

[10] On July 1, 2015 the Act came into force, replacing RAPA as the legislation governing the accounting professions in Alberta. Section 159 provides that a complaint under RAPA must be concluded as if RAPA remained in force, by the various officers, committees and tribunals under the Act.

[11] On July 29, 2015 the Respondent's registration under the Act was suspended. I was not provided information about of the grounds for suspension or when suspension proceedings were commenced.

[12] The CIC Secretary reported to the CIC Chair on September 10, 2015 that the complainant provided sufficient documentation to suggest the Respondent falsified financial statements and misappropriated and fraudulently used the complainant's logos. The CIC Secretary recommended the matter be sent for investigation.

[13] The CIC Chair directed an investigation on September 17, 2015.

[14] On September 29, 2015 the Applicant notified the Respondent that an investigator was appointed.

[15] On March 8, 2016 the Applicant's Complaints Inquiry Committee concluded there was sufficient evidence to warrant a hearing by a Discipline Tribunal and referred the allegations of professional misconduct to hearing. The substance of these (edited to remove the names of third parties) was as follows:

(a) Allegation #1: Attaching the complainant's logo to the unaudited financial statements of a named private company for the years ended September 30, 2012 and 2013, without the complainant's knowledge or authorization and without the complainant's participation in the financial statements;
(b) Allegation #2: Associating with false and misleading information by sending all or part of those financial statements to certain named persons;
(c) Allegation #3: Not responding to the CIC Secretary's request of February 2, 2015 to provide a response to the complaint and not cooperating with the investigation.

[16] Allegation #3 is an internal complaint by the CIC Secretary that arises from the Respondent's alleged failure to cooperate in the investigation of the third party complaint.

[17] The Applicant and Respondent made a Sanction Agreement on August 8, 2016 under subsection 74(1) of RAPA.

[18] Under that agreement the Respondent admitted, purportedly for that proceeding only, to the allegations of unprofessional conduct referred to hearing on March 8, 2016 by the

2018 ABQB 170 (CanLII)

Complaints Inquiry Committee. He agreed that the following sanctions would be imposed in consequence of the misconduct:

(a) cancellation of registration;
(b) fines of $20,000 for Allegation #1, $15,000 for Allegation #2, and $15,000 for Allegation #3, payable within 30 days of service of the statement of costs;
(c) costs of the investigation, hearing and compliance with any orders, payable within 30 days of service of the statement of costs;
(d) publication to all members of CPA Alberta;
(e) publication by posting the notice on the CPA Alberta website for 10 years;
(f) publication to all other regulatory accounting bodies in Canada and any other professional organization in which the Respondent was known to hold concurrent membership;
(g) publication in several named news media outlets.

[19] The Sanction Agreement provided that three other complaints, which had been referred to hearing on unspecified dates, would be stayed. Two of these complaints were from members of the public and the third was from the CIC Secretary. The CGAA agreed to stay these files because the complaints from the public were already before criminal courts and the public interest was served by the proposed Sanction Agreement. The Respondent sought disclosure of these stayed files in the present proceeding.

[20] On October 25, 2016 the Applicant requested payment of the fines and costs from the Respondent under the Sanction Agreement. The amount of costs demanded was $15,579.84 and the fines amounted to $50,000.

[21] The Respondent refuses to pay.

[22] The Respondent has not yet been discharged from bankruptcy.

[23] The Respondent says the claims are provable claims in his bankruptcy, and are subject to the stay of claims under the BIA. He stated in submissions to the Court that if he had known the CGAA's monetary claims were not stayed in his bankruptcy, he would not have agreed to the Sanction Agreement. The Respondent said in an affidavit filed in response to the application that he was told by the lawyer representing him in the negotiation of the Sanction Agreement that he and counsel for the Applicant had agreed any monetary order would not be enforceable due to the stay provided by the Respondent's assignment into bankruptcy.

[24] That lawyer is no longer acting for the Respondent. The Respondent did not provide evidence from his former lawyer. He said during argument of this application that he was not successful in obtaining from his former lawyer any information about conversations he may have had with the CGAA's counsel about a stay. He told me that he was not seeking a further adjournment to pursue evidence from his former lawyer.

[25] The Applicant provided evidence in response, including an affidavit from the Applicant's lawyer who negotiated the Sanction Agreement, to the effect that it has no record or information of any agreement that the monetary claims would be stayed. No one cross-examined on these affidavits.

[26] The Respondent's trustee in bankruptcy was notified of this application and chose not to appear. It submitted a letter outlining its position that the costs and fines may be a contingent liability in the bankruptcy because they arose from conduct and actions prior to the bankruptcy.

III. Applicable law

[27] The parties dispute whether the monetary obligations which the Applicant seeks to enforce are a claim provable in bankruptcy under the BIA.

[28] A claim provable in bankruptcy is defined in section 2 of the BIA:

> claim provable in bankruptcy, provable claim or claim provable includes any claim or liability provable in proceedings under this Act by a creditor;

[29] Creditor is also defined in section 2:

> creditor means a person having a claim provable as a claim under this Act;

[30] Subsection 121(1) of the BIA establishes the criteria for a provable claim:

> 121 (1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.
>
> (2) The determination whether a contingent or unliquidated claim is a provable claim and the valuation of such a claim shall be made in accordance with section 135.
>
> (3) ...
> (4) ...

[31] As mentioned, the Respondent asserts the Applicant's claim is stayed. Subsection 69.3(1) of the BIA provides for a stay of proceedings for the recovery of provable claims:

> Subject to subsections (1.1) and (2) and sections 69.4 and 69.5, on the bankruptcy of any debtor, no creditor has any remedy against the debtor or the debtor's property, or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings, for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy.

[32] The Respondent also relies on section 69.6 of the BIA. Subsection 2 provides:

> Subject to subsection (3), no stay provided by section 69 or 69.1 affects a regulatory body's investigation in respect of an insolvent person or an action, suit or proceeding that is taken in respect of the insolvent person by or before the regulatory body, other than the enforcement of a payment ordered by the regulatory body or the court.

[33] These provisions should be interpreted in light of the purposes of the BIA. One of the key objectives of the BIA is financial rehabilitation of the debtor (Alberta (Attorney General) v Moloney, 2015 SCC 51, [2015] 3 SCR 327 at paras 36 - 38, 77). Discharge from provable claims is the main rehabilitative tool under the BIA, and provides the bankrupt a fresh start, relieved of the burdens of pre-existing indebtedness (ibid). Parliament has created various exceptions to the discharged liabilities (BIA, section 172 and subsection 178(1); Moloney at paras 37, 79).

[34] Unlike in proceedings governed by common law or civil law, a claim may be asserted in insolvency proceedings (that is, a provable claim) even if it is contingent on an event that has not yet occurred (Re AbitibiBowater, Inc, 2012 SCC 67, [2012] 3 SCR 443 at para 34). Peters v Remington, 2004 ABCA 5 at para 25 provides a classic description of a contingent claim:

> A contingent claim is "a claim which may or may not ever ripen into a debt, according as some future event does or does not happen": Gardner v. Newton (1916), 1916 CanLII 337 (MB QB), 29 D.L.R. 276 at 281, 10 W.W.R. 51 (Man. K.B.).

[35] The BIA does not specify the degree of certainty required to make a contingent or unliquidated claim provable. The need for probability of liability arising from pending Court proceedings is too high a threshold for the establishment of such a claim. The criterion used by Courts to determine whether a contingent claim will be included in the insolvency process is whether the event that has not yet occurred is too remote or speculative (Re Confederation Treasury Services Ltd (Bankrupt), [1997] OJ No 67, 96 OAC 75 (CA); National Bank of Canada v Merit Energy Ltd, 2001 ABQB 583, 294 AR 15 at paras 77 - 78, aff'd 2002 ABCA 5, 96 Alta LR (3d) 1; AbitibiBowater at para 36). Claims to discretionary remedies or awards might or might not be provable claims, depending on the degree of discretion (Schreyer v Schreyer, 2011 SCC 35, [2011] 2 SCR 605 at paras 26 - 28; Lacroix c Valois, [1990] 2 SCR 1259 (not cited by the parties)). The assessment whether the claim is too remote or speculative is fact specific (AbitibiBowater at paras 48, 58, 61).

[36] In the regulatory context, financial charges may qualify as a provable claim. Where they do, they are included in the ambit of the discharge provisions of section 178 (Moloney at paras 50, 79).

[37] The rehabilitative purpose of the BIA does not, of course, erase all consequences of professional misconduct. The BIA does not prevent a professional regulator from pursuing proceedings to protect the public from unprofessional practice, including proceedings to suspend or remove the practitioner from the profession or to assess or rehabilitate the practitioner. In Moloney, the Court stated:

> .... Bankruptcy does not purport to erase all the consequences of a bankrupt's past conduct. However, by ensuring that all provable claims are treated as part of the bankruptcy regime, the BIA gives debtors an opportunity to rehabilitate themselves financially. While this does not amount to erasing all regulatory consequences of their past conduct, it is certainly meant to free them from the financial burden of past indebtedness.
> (Moloney at para 83)

[38] In Re Hover, the Alberta Court of Appeal held that a regulated professional's failure to pay past indebtedness may have regulatory consequences post-bankruptcy, where the regulator is acting in the public interest to regulate the profession and not to collect the debt. In that case, Dr. Hover's sanctions included suspension of his license until he paid the fines and costs assessed in his discipline proceeding. He later became bankrupt and claimed the regulator could no longer refuse him a license based on his failure to pay. The Court held that Dr. Hover's failure to pay fines and costs imposed before his bankruptcy (which were a provable claim) did not preclude the professional regulator from refusing to reinstate him. It was acting in the public interest to regulate the profession of dentistry and not to collect a debt (KPMG Inc. v. Alberta Dental Association (Re Hover), 2005 ABCA 101).

[39] Hover was discussed extensively by the Alberta Court of Appeal in Moloney, but the Supreme Court of Canada did not mention it on that appeal or in the companion case of 407 ETR Concession Co. v. Canada (Superintendent of Bankruptcy), [2015] 3 SCR 397, 2015 SCC 52. Moloney and ETR were concerned with debt collection schemes, not professional regulation.

[40] Parliament subsequently enacted section 69.6 of the BIA, which came into force in September 2009 (SC 2007, c 36, s 37; cif September 18, 2009, SI 2009-68). Section 69.6 only pertains to proposals and does not address the specific point in Hover.

[41] Regulatory charges are not similar in all respects to financial claims between private parties. The AbitiBowater decision held that financial regulatory charges are a provable claim if three criteria are met: (1) there must be a debt, liability or obligation owed to a creditor, (2) which was incurred before the debtor became bankrupt, and (3) it must be possible to attach a monetary value to the debt, liability or obligation (AbitibiBowater at para 26; Moloney at para 55).

[42] In AbitiBowater the Court described the first part of the test as follows at para 27:

> The BIA's definition of a provable claim, which is incorporated by reference into the CCAA, requires the identification of a creditor. Environmental statutes generally provide for the creation of regulatory bodies that are empowered to enforce the obligations the statutes impose. Most environmental regulatory bodies can be creditors in respect of monetary or non-monetary obligations imposed by the relevant statutes. At this first stage of determining whether the regulatory body is a creditor, the question whether the obligation can be translated into monetary terms is not yet relevant. This issue will be broached later. The only determination that has to be made at this point is whether the regulatory body has exercised its enforcement power against a debtor. When it does so, it identifies itself as a creditor, and the requirement of this stage of the analysis is satisfied.
> [Underlining added]

[43] The inquiry into the second requirement is based on section 121(1) of the BIA, which imposes a time limit on claims. The Court observed at para 28:

> The enquiry into the second requirement is based on s. 121(1) of the BIA, which imposes a time limit on claims. A claim must be founded on an obligation that was "incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt"....

(The Court noted that the statute under consideration in that case provided more flexibility for environmental claims.)

[44] With respect to the third requirement, that it be possible to attach a monetary value to the obligation, the question in that case was whether the environmental orders that were not expressed in monetary terms could be translated into such terms (ibid at para 30). In the context of an environmental order, there must be sufficient indications that the regulatory body that triggered the enforcement mechanism will ultimately perform remediation work and assert a monetary claim to have its costs reimbursed. If there is sufficient certainty in this regard, the court will conclude that the order can be subjected to the insolvency process (ibid at para 36).

[45] In a recent decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal, the majority summarized this test, again in the environmental context, as follows:

> 60 If the environmental obligation is framed in monetary terms, it will qualify as a provable claim: AbitibiBowater at paras. 2, 30. If it is not framed in monetary terms, it must be examined to see whether it will "ripen into a financial liability", having regard to the "factual matrix and the applicable statutory framework" (at paras. 3, 31). There is a three part test (at para. 26):
>
> > (a) There must be a debt, liability or obligation to a creditor. When a regulatory body exercises its enforcement powers against a debtor, it is a "creditor" in insolvency proceedings (at para. 27);
> >
> > (b) The debt, liability or obligation must be incurred at the relevant time in relation to the insolvency. For environmental claims, this can be before or after the insolvency proceedings have commenced (CCAA, s. 11.8(9); BIA, s. 14.06(8)); and
> >
> > (c) It must be possible to attach a monetary value to the debt, liability or obligation. The claim may be contingent, as long as it is not too remote or speculative to be included with the other claims. That depends on whether there is "sufficient certainty" that the regulatory body will ultimately perform remediation and crystallize the claim (at para. 36). In assessing the certainty of the claim, the court can examine the entire factual context, including whether the debtor is in control of the property, whether it has the means to comply with the order, whether there are other parties responsible for the remediation, as well as the effect that compliance with the order would have on the insolvency process.
> (Grant Thornton Ltd v Alberta Energy Regulator, 2017 ABCA 124, leave to appeal granted, [2017] SCCA No 231, appeal heard and reserved February 15, 2018).

[46] The Applicant argued, relying on AbitibiBowater, that to satisfy the first part of the three part test, the regulator must exercise enforcement power against a debtor before the date of bankruptcy. Otherwise, the regulatory agency is not a creditor. It argues that all that had occurred in the present case before bankruptcy was sending a letter to the Respondent asking him to comment on the complaint. This was not exercise of enforcement power, so the Applicant is not a creditor. The Respondent says it is enough that the regulator received the complaint before bankruptcy, thus engaging the complaints inquiry process.

[47] What is sufficient regulatory activity in the context of the BIA? To what extent (if any) does AbitibiBowater require enforcement proceedings before the date of bankruptcy? In answering the questions it is useful to briefly review the factual context of that case.

[48] The Abitibi companies entered debtor protection proceedings under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, RSC 1985, c C-36 (“CCAA”) on April 17, 2009. On June 12, 2009, the Province asked Abitibi to provide certain reports for five industrial sites, including environmental site assessment reports. A claims procedure order was issued August 26, 2009. The Minister issued the environmental protection orders over the sites in issue on November 12, 2009, requiring certain remediation action plans and work. The industrial activities giving rise to the remediation claims had ceased well before the CCAA proceedings started. The dispute between the Province and Abitibi had started at least by December 2008 when the Province passed legislation expropriating three of the sites, including provisions that would shield the Province from counter-claims in any restructuring process (motion judge's reasons, 2010 QCCS 1261 at paras 184 - 190).

[49] The motion judge found that the Minister acted as a creditor both before and after making the environmental protection orders in issue (2010 QCCS 1261 at para 212). The Supreme Court of Canada observed that because the Province issued the orders, it would be recognized as a creditor (para 46) and the Province identified itself as a creditor by resorting to EPA enforcement mechanisms (para 49).

[50] In some regulatory cases, including environmental remediation cases like AbitibiBowater, it is necessary to distinguish the general duty owed to the public at large to comply with legislation from those cases where a statutory debt or regulatory charge has arisen (AbitibiBowater at paras 44 - 48, 72 - 74, and PanAmericana de Bienes y Servicios SA v Northern Badger Oil & Gas Ltd, 1991 ABCA 181, 81 Alta LR (2d) 45, 117 AR 44, leave to appeal denied, [1991] SCCA No 497 cited therein). As McLachlin CJC (as she then was) stated at para 72, the BIA draws a fundamental distinction between ongoing regulatory obligations owed to the public, which generally survive restructuring, and monetary claims that can be compromised. I do not read the majority's reasons as differing over this fundamental proposition (AbitibiBowater at para 59).

[51] The requirement that the regulator exercise enforcement powers serves to identify it as a creditor by distinguishing the situation from the general duty on citizens to obey the law. However, I do not see any suggestion in the BIA that the requirement of a creditor means that the creditor must necessarily identify itself before the bankruptcy event. Such a strict requirement would defeat the rehabilitative objectives of the BIA, and would be contrary to subsection 121(1) of the BIA, which includes as provable claims "all debts and liabilities, present or future, … to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt".

[52] That interpretation would also run counter to the ordinary principles concerning contingent claims. The essence of a contingent claim is that not all elements necessary to establish liability have occurred by the date of bankruptcy. It is not necessary that a contingent claimant identify itself before the date of bankruptcy or has decided by that date to advance its claim based on facts occurring before the date of bankruptcy. The fact the claim is disputed does not disqualify it as a contingent claim. (That is not to say that these are irrelevant. The degree of knowledge of a claim is relevant to the third part of the test, whether the claim is too speculative or remote for inclusion in the insolvency process. For a recent example, see RMP Energy Inc v SemCAMS ULC, 2012 ABQB 495 at paras 41 - 51, 56, 66 - 69; leave to appeal refused, 2012 ABCA 312 at paras 28 - 29 (not cited by the parties)).

[53] Some passages in the reasons of the motion judge, Mr. Justice Gascon (as he then was), in AbitibiBowater suggest that the decision to enforce (i.e., identify as a creditor) is one of the contingencies of a contingent claim. He said:

> [233] Contingent claims are nothing more than incomplete claims, the enforceability of which depends on some contingency or future event that has not yet occurred (and may never occur). In the case of a guarantee, it might be the non-payment by the principal debtor. In the case of an environmental claim of the sort advanced by the Province, it would be the decision of the latter to carry out the remediation and pass along the cost as the EPA provides.
> [234] The fact that all the elements of the claim do not presently exist does not deprive a contingent claim of its essential element of being a claim that can be quantified and the amount of which can be compromised.

[54] The Supreme Court did not discuss whether the relevant date for assessing claims was the initial Canadian Filing Date, the claims bar date, or another date. It was not necessary to deal with that, because the first part of the test (status as a creditor) was not in issue in that case (AbitibiBowater at para 49).

[55] The CCAA as it existed on the date the debtors entered CCAA proceedings provided that claims would be determined, for companies other than those in bankruptcy or winding up, in the amount which might be proved under the BIA (CCAA, s 12(2)(a)(iii)). Section 19 further provided, with a few exceptions, that the only claims that could be compromised were those that related to debts or liabilities, present or future, to which the company (i) was subject on the day on which proceedings were commenced, or (ii) may become subject before the compromise or arrangement is sanctioned by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which proceedings were commenced (CCAA, s 19 as amended by SC 2007, c 36, s 69).

[56] The fact the environmental protection orders were made well after the CCAA proceedings commenced, given the substantial similarity between section 19 of the CCAA and subsection 121(1) of the BIA, would suggest that it is not necessary that the enforcement power be exercised before the relevant claims assessment date. But again, the timing of the first part of the test was not in issue in that case.

[57] The only temporal requirement discussed by the Supreme Court of Canada in AbitibiBowater concerns the second part of the test - whether the liability was by reason of an obligation incurred before the debtor became bankrupt. Absent additional guidance from the Court, I see no reason why regulatory charges should be singled out for different treatment by requiring a contingent creditor in a regulatory context to have decided to actually advance its claim before the date of bankruptcy.

[58] With respect to the third part of the AbitibiBowater test, the Applicant relies on a line of administrative penalty cases in support of its position that administrative penalties imposed after the date of bankruptcy are too remote and speculative to be included as contingent claims: Association des courtiers & agents immobiliers du Québec c Fuoco, 2007 QCCQ 292; Chambre de la sécurité financière c Harton, 2008 QCCA 269, 2008 CarswellQue 756; Re Thow, 2009 BCSC 1176, 57 CBR (5th) 222; Chambre de la sécurité financière v Thibault, 2016 QCCA 1691, [2016] QJ No 13897, 42 CBR (6th) 8.

[59] These cases (other than Thibault) refused to accept an administrative penalty imposed after the date of bankruptcy is a provable claim, on one or both of two grounds: the claim would be too remote or speculative; or, a fine imposed after the date of bankruptcy is not a provable claim.

[60] For example, in Re Thow the Court found that a sanction imposed by a securities regulator for misconduct that occurred before bankruptcy was not a provable claim. The Court reasoned:

> 46 In my opinion, the (Re) Air Canada case supports the Commission's position that the penalty is not an obligation as contemplated by s. 121 of the BIA until the penalty is assessed by the Commission. Likewise, Chaloux, Strini and Glenister also support the Commission's position that because its decision was discretionary, there was not a contingent liability or "obligation" until the Commission actually fined Mr. Thow, which was after the date of his bankruptcy. Therefore, in my opinion the obligation did not arise until after bankruptcy and the Commission's penalty is not a provable claim in this bankruptcy.

[61] In my view, the mere fact that fines or costs were imposed after bankruptcy does not necessarily disqualify the claim as provable in bankruptcy. Some discretionary decisions lead to provable claims (Schreyer). Others do not (Lacroix). In Thibault, the bankrupt attempted to plead guilty to a regulatory charge before his bankruptcy. The Court found on the facts of that case that the resulting sanctions were a provable claim in his bankruptcy although not imposed by the regulator until after the bankruptcy (Thibault at paras 22 - 28). Every case is a question of fact.

[62] The Applicant also relies on a line of cases holding that a costs award in a civil claim arising out of pre-bankruptcy litigation but made after the date of bankruptcy is not a provable claim. The Applicant emphasizes that costs are discretionary and where the discretion has not been exercised before the date of bankruptcy, they cannot be considered provable claims.

[63] This line of costs cases says that costs of legal proceedings are in the discretion of the Court, and until an order for payment of costs is made there is no obligation or liability to pay them and no right to recover them. Even if the litigation were substantially or entirely completed before the date of bankruptcy, the costs would not be a provable claim if the Court had not ordered costs before bankruptcy (Chaloux v Kingston Fairways Golf Course (2004), 48 CBR (4th) 237 (Ont SCJ) and Strini v Mihalicz, 2006 ABQB 912, following Glenister v. Rowe, [1999] EWCA Civ 1221, [1999] 3 All ER 452 (CA)). To like effect, though not cited by the parties, is the proposition stated in Houlden, Morawetz and Sara, The 2017 Annotated Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Thomson Reuters, 2017) at G36(21) that costs awarded against a bankrupt as defendant in pre-bankruptcy litigation are not provable in the bankruptcy.

[64] I would not follow the costs cases cited to me (Glenister, Chaloux, Strini) or others like them. I consider them wrongly decided and inconsistent with the principles set out in AbitibiBowater.

[65] There is no watertight compartment insulating costs awards relating to pre-bankruptcy litigation from the consequences of bankruptcy merely because costs are discretionary. Rather, the question is whether a costs award is too remote or speculative to be included in the claims process.

[66] Those who engage in litigation in the Courts subject themselves to a costs regime which is well defined and predictable. Discretion is exercised in accordance with principle not whim.

[67] In Alberta, these costs principles are established in the Alberta Rules of Court, Part 10 and well developed in case law. It is probable that costs will follow the event or events (where costs are awarded by issue) of the litigation (Rule 10.29). Cases where party and party or solicitor and client costs are the norm are well defined in case law. Where a party and party costs award is probable, the scale of costs is predictable. Costs can, and sometimes must, be allocated to steps taken before or after an event in time such as service of a formal offer to settle (Rule 4.29). So it is possible to allocate costs to steps taken before and after the date of bankruptcy.

[68] Pre-bankruptcy costs in civil litigation are sufficiently predictable that they should be included as provable claims. They are not remote or speculative. The trustee in bankruptcy would need to value them having regard to contingencies.

[69] What about costs relating to steps taken in proceedings that continued after the date of bankruptcy? In the present case, some costs related to steps taken before the date of bankruptcy and others after. Although many civil claims against bankrupts will be stayed on bankruptcy and subsumed into bankruptcy administration, some claims can continue. As an example some personal claims do not vest in the trustee, such as ongoing non-financial parenting litigation in a matrimonial dispute. The disciplinary proceeding against the Respondent is also such a case, in the sense that it was primarily a non-financial regulatory proceeding aimed at protecting the public from unfit accounting practitioners and was not a proceeding that could be stayed under the BIA (apart from the limited circumstances where section 69.6 of the BIA applies).

[70] I am mindful of commentary cited in Strini that a bankrupt should not be entitled to "litigate with impunity" and the suggestion that a costs order made after the bankruptcy event will not be caught in the bankruptcy if the bankrupt party continues the litigation (Strini at para 23 and commentary cited therein). However, the question whether a bankrupt should be released from provable claims, and to what extent, is a policy decision for Parliament in making exceptions to the section 172 and 178 discharge provisions. Other values come into that policy question, including rehabilitation of the debtor and the debtor's access to justice.

[71] Costs are a provable claim if they are a liability "present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt" (subsection 121(1), underlining added). That is a question of fact having regard to all the circumstances.

[72] The mere fact a person who later became bankrupt continued in litigation is not enough for the entire costs obligation to have arisen from an obligation incurred before the bankruptcy. The answer to the question depends on the context, including the type of litigation, its status and maturity at the date of bankruptcy, the opportunities to exit litigation, and formal or other settlement offers made during the course of the proceedings where a party is put to his or election to settle or suffer the consequences of a costs penalty for ongoing litigation steps.

[73] As an example, where bankruptcy occurs mid-stream of an interim parenting application, the costs to the date of bankruptcy might be associated with having undertaken litigation before bankruptcy. Perhaps the later costs associated with completing the interim application also are associated with the pre-bankruptcy decision to commence that application. It does not follow that the later costs of the larger parenting dispute qualify for the same treatment. In most civil claims there are opportunities to settle and exit litigation. It may be that at some point, costs of ongoing steps should no longer be associated with the decision to undertake or carry on proceedings before the date of bankruptcy. Or, putting it another way, some of the costs might be too remote.

[74] Although I would refuse to follow the costs cases cited by the Applicant for the foregoing reasons, I also note that Glenister and other UK cases before and after it to like effect were unanimously overruled by the UK Supreme Court in Re Nortel, 2013 UKSC 52, [2014] AC 209 at paras 87 - 93 and 136 (not cited by the parties). The majority characterized the earliest cases holding that contingent costs liabilities were not provable claims as "somewhat aberrant" in view of the purposes of bankruptcy legislation (ibid at para 93).

[75] How do these principles apply to the costs of the regulatory proceeding in the present case? The Alberta Rules of Court do not apply to the Applicant's discretion to award costs in disciplinary proceedings. Whether costs imposed by a regulator are too remote or speculative depends on the Court's factual assessment of the practices and policies of the regulator concerned and the context of the proceeding.

[76] The same principles apply to fines. It is a question of fact whether the prospect of a fine is remote or speculative. However, unlike costs awards, it would be a rare occasion where that prospect could be considered sufficiently certain before the sanction decision is pronounced.

[77] In any professional discipline process, sanctions serve a variety of objectives including specific and general deterrence and maintaining the public confidence in the regulated profession. Every case is fact specific. As the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal commented in Merchant v Law Society of Saskatchewan, 2009 SKCA 33 at para 95:

> ... Not unexpectedly, the reasonable range of sentences in disciplinary matters is elastic. It will be impacted by considerations of age, experience, discipline history, the unique circumstances of the member, and the nature of the conduct complained of.

[78] In sanctioning, tribunals must be sensitive to proportionality; otherwise they risk judicial review by the Courts. As the Alberta Court of Appeal has said, "at the end of the day the sanction must be proportionate and reasonable…. The pursuit of general deterrence does not warrant imposing a crushing or unfit sanction…." (Walton v Alberta (Securities Commission), 2014 ABCA 273 at paras 154 and 165).

[79] Accordingly, absent other evidence, a Court should presume that a professional disciplinary sanction process includes consideration of the personal circumstances of the offender at the time of sanctioning, and aggravating and mitigating factors. These often cannot be known if bankruptcy occurs at an early stage of the regulatory complaints process. In some rare cases, such as Thibault, the evidence might indicate sufficient certainty of the result. It depends on all the circumstances, such as the regulator's practices, procedures and rules, the maturity of the proceedings, and the position taken by the respondent in such proceedings.

[80] In summary, in cases of administrative penalties or costs of disciplinary proceedings, the inquiry in relation to the third step of the AbitibiBowater test is whether the event that has not yet occurred is too remote or speculative. The mere fact a fine or costs award was imposed after bankruptcy does not necessarily disqualify the amount as a claim provable in bankruptcy.

IV. Analysis

[81] Before dealing with the issue of provable claims, I will deal with three preliminary issues.

2018 ABQB 170 (CanLII)

[82] First, the Respondent submitted hearsay evidence of an agreement between the lawyers for each side who negotiated the Sanction Agreement that the costs and fines would be subject to the stay under the BIA (paras 23 - 24 above). The Applicant submitted direct evidence refuting the existence of such an agreement (para 25 above).

[83] There are constraints on my resolving conflicting evidence in a summary proceeding such as this one. The Respondent's evidence is not admissible (being hearsay), but might have supported a request for a trial of an issue if it was sufficient to suggest a genuine issue for trial. However, the Respondent did not want an adjournment to obtain direct evidence from his former lawyer (para 24 above). His hearsay evidence is not sufficient to raise a triable issue, and even if admissible I would not give it any weight:

(a) The Respondent's evidence is a bare assertion, relaying a hearsay statement from a third person without any details of the words spoken in the alleged conversation or records thereof. It is well established that such assertions, without details, do not necessarily raise an issue requiring a trial (Shefsky v California Gold Mining Inc, 2016 ABCA 103 at para 113 per Slatter JA dissenting; approved in Goodswimmer v Canada (Attorney General), 2017 ABCA 365 at paras 39 - 40).

(b) The evidence is highly suspect because it is inconsistent with the written agreement, which was signed by the Respondent while he was in bankruptcy. It provided for payment of the fines and costs within 30 days of service of the statement of costs. The Respondent's bare assertion does not explain the inconsistency.

[84] The second preliminary issue is the Respondent's request for disclosure of files from the Applicant relating to other complaints that were stayed under the Sanction Agreement (para 19 above).

[85] I have power to order records production where necessary to maintain fairness in the proceedings. I did not during argument, and still do not, see any grounds to order disclosure of those files. Nothing in the evidentiary record or submissions before me indicates they have any potential relevance or materiality to the issues whether the fines and costs agreed to in the Sanction Agreement are provable claims.

[86] The third preliminary issue is the Respondent's submission that the Applicant could not bring the application under section 125 of the Act because proceedings are stayed. The Applicant seeks permission nunc pro tunc (i.e., retroactively) in the event any claims are stayed.

[87] I exercise my discretion under section 69.4 to permit this application to be heard; as I am satisfied it is equitable to do so. All interested parties either participated or had notice and opportunity to participate. The additional expense associated with first bringing the dispute before the trustee would be needless.

[88] I turn to whether the fines and costs are provable claims.

[89] The structure for the complaints process under RAPA is typical of professional regulators. Complaints must be reviewed in the first instance by an officer of the regulator (here, the CIC Secretary). They must be sent to the member for comment. The regulator may encourage resolution between complainant and member, but may continue proceedings notwithstanding a settlement. Following comment and review, the regulator must decide whether to summarily dismiss the complaint or refer it for investigation. Following investigation, the Complaints Inquiry Committee (which is composed of members of the profession and, optionally, additional members selected from the public) decides whether to direct further investigation, summarily dismiss it, or refer it to a discipline tribunal for determination. A member may make a sanction agreement with the Complaints Inquiry Committee. If approved, the agreement is a finding and order of a discipline tribunal. A discipline tribunal may impose sanctions following the necessary hearing and determinations of unprofessional conduct. In addition to fines, the tribunal may order the member to pay the costs or any part of the costs of an investigation and hearing in the manner determined by the bylaws. See RAPA, sections 67 - 97, 121, 122.

[90] Costs and fines are governed by sections 92 and 93 of RAPA:

> 93(1) If a discipline tribunal determines that the conduct of an investigated party constitutes unprofessional conduct, the discipline tribunal may make one or more of the following orders:
>
> (a) reprimand the investigated party;
>
> (b) suspend registration for a stated period or pending compliance with specified conditions;
>
> (c) restrict any or all aspects of the investigated party's public accounting practice or other areas of practice for a stated period of time, pending compliance with specified conditions, or until otherwise ordered by a discipline tribunal or a person or body specified by the discipline tribunal;
>
> (d) impose conditions or requirements on the investigated party for a stated period of time or until otherwise ordered by the discipline tribunal, including conditions that the investigated party
>
> (i) practise under supervision in accordance with specified terms,
>
> (ii) not engage in sole practice,
>
> (iii) undergo counselling in accordance with specified terms,
>
> (iv) permit periodic inspections of practice by an individual authorized by the practice review committee or complaints inquiry committee or the chair of either of those committees, or
>
> (v) report on specified matters to the accounting organization, the CIC secretary or the discipline tribunal secretary;
>
> (e) accept, for a stated period or pending compliance with specified conditions, a voluntary suspension of registration or an undertaking to restrict practice;
>
> (f) direct the investigated party to satisfy a committee or person specified by the discipline tribunal that a disability or addiction can be or has been overcome, and suspend the investigated party until the committee or person is so satisfied;

(g) require the investigated party to take counselling that is appropriate in the opinion of a committee or person specified by the discipline tribunal;

(h) direct the investigated party to successfully complete a particular course of studies or examinations, or both, or to satisfy a committee or person specified by the discipline tribunal as to the investigated party's professional competence generally or in a specified area of practice;

(i) direct a public accounting firm to develop and implement quality control procedures or professional development policies, to undergo a specific practice review or to increase the amount or change the type of professional liability insurance carried by the public accounting firm;

(j) direct the payment of all or part of the costs of complying with an order;

(k) prohibit, restrict or place conditions on the ability of a member of an accounting organization or a public accounting firm to train students or to supervise how students are trained;

(l) cancel registration under this Act;

(m) specify a time limit within which an order or any part of it must be complied with and specify the consequences of failing to comply, including suspension or cancellation of registration;

(n) direct the publication or posting of a decision in any manner the discipline tribunal considers appropriate to protect the public interest and to notify clients or former clients of the investigated party as the situation requires;

(o) make any further or other order that the discipline tribunal considers appropriate in the circumstances.

(2) Before making any order under subsection (1), the discipline tribunal is entitled to review and the accounting organization must provide

(a) the past disciplinary record of the investigated party, and

(b) any other information the accounting organization possesses about the investigated party concerning findings of unprofessional conduct against the investigated party in disciplinary proceedings by a professional organization in Alberta or another jurisdiction.

94(1) The discipline tribunal may order the investigated party to pay to the accounting organization

(a) the costs or any part of the costs of an investigation and hearing in the manner determined by the bylaws;

2018 ABQB 170 (CanLII)

(b) a fine not exceeding $20 000 for each finding of unprofessional conduct;

(c) costs and a fine.

(2) Unless the discipline tribunal orders otherwise, the investigated party must pay to the accounting organization, as part of the costs ordered under subsection (1), all of the reasonable costs for the indemnification of the accounting organization for the costs relating to the review of complaints, the investigation and the discipline tribunal hearing, including the legal expenses and lawyer's fees in accordance with the Alberta Rules of Court.

(3) The order may specify when and how the amount is to be paid.

(4) If the investigated party does not pay costs or fines in accordance with the order of a discipline tribunal or appeal tribunal, the registration of the registrant is immediately cancelled unless a discipline tribunal or an appeal tribunal otherwise directs.

[91] In all of this, the CGAA is guided by the purposes of the complaints process. Section 65 of RAPA defines those purposes:

(a) to protect the public interest,

(b) to enforce practice standards and rules of professional conduct for registrants,

(c) to provide a means by which complaints about the conduct of registrants and former registrants can be dealt with in a fair and expeditious way, and

(d) to preserve the integrity of the accounting profession.

[92] The Applicant's amended notice of application seeks a declaration that the financial amounts under the Sanction Agreement are not a contingent liability or a claim provable in bankruptcy. The onus is on the Applicant to show it is entitled to the remedy it seeks.

[93] No authority was cited to me explaining when or why a CGAA discipline tribunal would impose a fine or costs in the complaints resolution process. I was not told whether CGAA discipline tribunals have policies or procedures about costs, whether they deliver formal published reasons in support of their decisions or whether any such decisions include discussions about costs.

[94] The Respondent submitted extracts from CGAA's legacy internet site providing links to decision summaries, showing that in all the discipline cases involving the CGAA which were notified on its internet site, the CGAA discipline tribunal imposed costs or the settlement included costs. The Applicant does not contest that assertion.

[95] As mentioned earlier, sanctions in a professional discipline process serve a variety of objectives including specific and general deterrence and maintaining the public confidence in the regulated profession. Every case is fact specific. Absent any evidence of any precedent for starting points or fixed sanctions for specific regulatory misconduct imposed by CGAA discipline panels, I conclude that the sanctioning phase in a CGAA proceeding was highly discretionary as would be expected in a regulatory process having the objectives defined in section 65 of RAPA. The decision to impose fines is part of that discretionary process.

[96] In the absence of other evidence, I conclude that the costs provisions are a cost recovery mechanism. Where the CGAA successfully disciplined a member it was extremely likely that the CGAA would seek and obtain an order for costs. That virtually invariable practice indicates that the costs awards are primarily a costs recovery mechanism. They may have a deterrent effect and exposure to them may be relevant to whether fines should be imposed, but the costs awards are not primarily a financial sanction.

[97] In this case, there were three allegations against the Respondent to which fines and costs were attached (para 15 above). Each had a discrete fine attached (para 18 above). The costs award applied to all the proceedings, without allocating specific amounts to each allegation (ibid).

[98] The CGAA was aware of the third party complaint (Allegations #1 and #2) and commenced reviewing that complaint as required by RAPA well prior to the bankruptcy. The CGAA may not have known all the facts at the date of bankruptcy. The Applicant emphasizes that the proceeding was in its early stages. However, it had the complaint for months before the bankruptcy. There is nothing to indicate that the third party complainant was not cooperative or informative. As a matter of common sense, the allegations in this complaint probably called for immediate attention to protect the public from fraud. Yet, the Applicant did not provide any evidence to show the allegations were not well understood or well supported, that it was unable to attend to the complaint quickly for the protection of the public, or anything about the likelihood of a conviction as of the date of bankruptcy.

[99] In contrast, the regulator's complaint (Allegation #3) had not occurred before the date of bankruptcy. The Respondent was not in default of his professional obligation to respond to the third party complaint on the day he assigned himself into bankruptcy.

[100] I cannot infer merely from the timing that the consequences of the third party complaint were remote or speculative. A professional accounting firm had complained to the CGAA that the Respondent had fraudulently taken their logo and put it on the statements of a non-client. There is no suggestion the Respondent was working for that firm or somehow mistakenly acted as an employee and issued statements without authority. It is difficult to think that a professional accounting regulator, acting in the public interest, would not proceed to investigate a complaint of fraud and act if it appeared there was a reasonable prospect of conviction.

[101] In my view, the CGAA was identified as a creditor in the context of the disciplinary matter. It received and forwarded the third party complaint to the Respondent before bankruptcy. It continued proceedings including suspension of the Respondent from practice during the bankruptcy. It would obviously investigate these serious allegations. In doing so it would incur recoverable costs. If the allegations were substantiated, it would be claiming these costs from the regulated professional. No one suggests there was some obvious and innocent explanation for the discrepancy in the financial statements. The fact the allegations were not admitted, or were disputed, does not disqualify financial claims such as costs from consideration as contingent claims.

[102] The costs of investigating and managing Allegations #1 and #2 to a voluntary settlement, both before the bankruptcy event and during the bankruptcy administration, are so closely related to the pre-bankruptcy professional misconduct and third party complaint that they should be considered as having arisen from an obligation incurred before the bankruptcy. The CGAA has provided no evidence to suggest that the third parry complaint would not be investigated, or that any part of the costs relating to the third party complaint were remote or unexpected.

[103] I find that those costs are a provable claim. They are subject to the stay. Whether the Respondent is released from them by the bankruptcy is not before me and I make no ruling about that issue.

[104] In contrast, costs relating to Allegation #3 were remote and speculative at the date of bankruptcy because the regulatory default had not occurred at that date.

[105] How should I deal with the fact the costs were assessed for all the allegations together? It is not unusual that a professional regulator joins a complaint for failure to cooperate to an underlying third party claim. Often, the failure to cooperate complaint is so closely tied into the underlying facts of a third party complaint that it does not occasion any material additional costs. In my view it is appropriate to consider whether there are any incremental costs associated with Allegation #3. If there are incremental costs associated with it, they would not be a provable claim on the facts of this case.

[106] I turn to the question whether the fines are a provable claim.

[107] It is clear that the fine for Allegation #3 is not a provable claim. The failures to respond and subsequently to cooperate, which were key elements, had not occurred at the date of bankruptcy.

[108] The issue concerning the fines for Allegations #1 and #2 is whether the prospect of fine was too remote or speculative. If I am incorrect that Allegation #3 was not a contingent claim at the date of bankruptcy as stated in the immediately preceding paragraph, the same issue arises for that allegation.

[109] Given the integrity issues raised in the allegations, suspension or de-registration were probably foregone conclusions if the allegations were proved. However, whether a discipline tribunal would pile on fines could not be predicted.

[110] It is one thing to predict that costs would be imposed if there was misconduct. It is a very different thing to predict as of the date of bankruptcy whether a tribunal would see fit to impose a fine. As mentioned earlier, discipline tribunals must be sensitive to proportionality and the relevant facts and circumstances at the time of sanctioning. Their sanction decision depends on a myriad of information about the specific circumstances of the Respondent, and would likely include any aggravating circumstances (such as refusing to cooperate in the investigation) and any mitigating circumstances (such as an early and meaningful acknowledgment of responsibility or guilty plea). There is nothing in the record that suggests the regulator would have had such information at the date of bankruptcy. Important pieces of the puzzle did not exist at the date of bankruptcy, including information about the Respondent’s cooperation or an early and meaningful guilty plea. At the date of bankruptcy, the disciplinary fines must have been remote or speculative.

[111] I do not accept the Respondent’s submission that section 69.6 applies. That provision modifies stays under section 69 (where a notice of intention to file a proposal is given) and section 69.1 (where a proposal is filed). It does not apply to the stay where bankruptcy occurs, as imposed by section 69.3.

V. Conclusion

[112] The Applicant's costs claim is a provable claim, other than incremental costs (if any) associated with Allegation #3. The amount of the provable claim would be determinable by the trustee in bankruptcy in the ordinary way. If the parties need directions on any incremental costs associated with Allegation #3, they can arrange to speak to them in the application before me. The Applicant is entitled to a money judgment for those incremental costs, if sought.

[113] The Applicant's claims for fines are not provable claims. The Applicant is entitled to a money judgment against the Respondent for the fines.

[114] The formal order should provide that the Court declares pursuant to section 69.4 of the BIA that the stay under section 69.3 of the BIA does not apply to the commencement and prosecution of the application or any claim determined by the Court on this application not to be a provable claim. The stay applies to those claims determined in this application to be provable claims.

[115] If additional clarifications or directions are required, or anyone seeks costs of the application, the parties should arrange to speak to those within 45 days.

[1] The plaintiff, Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce ("CIBC"), seeks judgment against Douglas F. Walls, Michael Whitfield Millard and the numbered companies under Rule 18A for the following relief:

>
> (a) a declaration that the Defendants Douglas F. Walls, Michael Whitfield, 406392 B.C. Ltd. and 509894 B.C. Ltd. Millard [sic] have participated in a cheque-kiting scheme to defraud the Plaintiff;
>
> (b) a declaration that the liability of the Defendants Douglas F. Walls, Michael Whitfield Millard, 406392 B.C. Ltd. and 509894 B.C. Ltd. to the Plaintiff arises through the Defendants Douglas F. Walls, Michael Whitfield Millard, 406392 B.C. Ltd. and 509894 B.C. Ltd. obtaining the Plaintiff's funds through false pretences and, or in the alternative, fraudulent misrepresentation;
>
> (c) Damages for fraud against the Defendants Douglas F. Walls, Michael Whitfield Millard, 406392 B.C. Ltd. and 509894 B.C. Ltd.;
>
> (d) Punitive and/or aggravated damages against the Defendants Douglas F. Walls, Michael Whitfield Millard, 406392 B.C. Ltd. and 509894 B.C. Ltd.;

2001 BCSC 982 (CanLII)

[2] "Cheque-kiting" has become something of a term of art in Canada. The Privy Council described it in this manner in Corporation Agencies Ltd. v. Home Bank of Canada, [1927] 2 D.L.R. 1, affirming [1925] S.C.R. 706:

> There is a device known in Canada as "kiting," which is described as follows:--
>
> > Kiting is a term used with regard to obtaining money by cheques passed through banks without value being deposited against the cheque -- that is, kiting is an effort to obtain the use of money during the process of a cheque passing through one bank or through a clearing house to another, and perhaps through many more.
>
> To this Bowler, who was examined as a witness for the defendant bank, adds that kiting is a means of getting credit for the time it takes to clear a cheque from one bank to another bank. Cheques are passed from one bank account to another, and credit is obtained at the bank into which they are paid, for which they are debited at the bank on which they are drawn.

[3] The CIBC's Director of Corporate Security, Jay Stark, described a kiting scheme in his report, the admissibility of which was challenged, properly so in my view, but his description of the scheme is not controversial and I will reproduce it:

>
> A simple act of kiting may comprise a cheque drawn against insufficient funds on deposit. The scheme becomes more elaborate when the objective is to obtain unauthorized funds and maintain balances within credit or overdraft limits (sustain credit). The scheme continuously misstates account balances by showing the same amount on deposit simultaneously in two bank accounts, made possible by exploiting the time required for a cheque to clear through the banking system. Such a scheme may be accomplished as follows.
>
> A cheque, drawn against insufficient funds on deposit, is deposited to a second account. Until the outstanding cheque is cleared, the same amount is on deposit simultaneously in two accounts. During the period that amounts are on simultaneous deposit, a kiter may be able to withdraw funds from the second account, although the balance is represented by a NSF cheque. To continue the scheme, the kiter would deposit a cheque, drawn on the second account, to the first account. The amount of the cheque would be equal to or greater than the amount of the first cheque. A series of similar parallel deposits must be continuously generated to continue the scheme.
>
> The simultaneous deposits last only as long as the time required for a cheque to clear through the banking system. Because domestic cheques written against Schedule A banks clear quickly, the kiter must often write cheques on a daily basis to maintain the inflated balances. The kiter benefits from any increase in the amount of time it takes to clear funds. Therefore, some schemes involve Schedule B and foreign banks and the use of altered or mutilated cheques, each of which increases the time for the outstanding cheques to clear.

[4] The alleged kiting scheme has resulted in a net loss to the CIBC of $1,503,712.69.

2001 BCSC 982 (CanLII)

[5] It will be seen that kiting is a commercial fraud and a criminal offence if the requisite mens rea is proven.

[6] Walls and Millard were the senior officers in a very large Ford dealership carrying on business in Prince George.

[7] It is essentially alleged that they masterminded a kite for in excess of a year between corporate accounts at the plaintiff and at the Spruce Credit Union.

[8] The defendants Walls and Millard oppose the application on the merits, but they also submit that it is unsuitable for disposition under the summary trial process and that the matter should proceed to trial.

[9] I have concluded that this is an inappropriate case for a Rule 18A disposition.

[10] Because of that conclusion, I think it imprudent to discuss in much detail the evidence before me. To do so, risks a premature assessment of that evidence which, because of my conclusion, must be left to be developed before the trial judge.

[11] It is sufficient to say this of the record before me: the plaintiff points to a significant body of evidence, including alleged admissions against interest by Walls and

Millard to officers of the plaintiff, admissions by them on discovery, and voluminous documentary evidence and says that the trier of fact must be irresistibly drawn to the conclusion that the defendants have worked a fraud.

[12] Walls and Millard, on the contrary, lead affidavit evidence denying the admissions against interest and deposing, in part:

> 3. In answer to paragraph 15 of the Affidavit of Michael Smith, I deny that I acknowledged or said that I knew that cheques drawn on the numbered companies and deposited to the accounts at CIBC were not covered by monies on deposit at the Credit Union. In fact, at all times, we believed, and to this day do believe, there were sufficient funds on deposit at the Credit Union to cover all cheques deposited to the Fred Walls accounts at CIBC. I spoke to Mr. Smith a few days after the meeting and he told me and I believe that CIBC had analysed the flow of cheques between CIBC and the Credit Union and had concluded that there would not be any shortfall in the CIBC accounts. It was only subsequently and apparently as a result of dealings between CIBC and the Credit Union, to which we were not privy, that CIBC took the position that there was a shortfall in the accounts.

> 7. At all times I believed that all cheques drawn on the Fred Walls accounts and deposited to the numbered companies and all cheques drawn on the numbered companies and deposited to the Fred Walls accounts would be honoured upon presentation. The companies carried on a very > large business as a car dealership. The company was in the process of arranging a refinancing and expected to be able to complete a refinancing with Bank of Nova Scotia. By shutting down the operation of the bank account CIBC effectively stopped the refinancing plan before it could be completed. While I understand the steps that CIBC took to terminate the operation of the account, the steps did ultimately have the effect of destroying the value of the business as a going concern and led indirectly to the realization of the assets of the company by a Receiver appointed by Ford Credit.

9. I believe that several senior people within the bank who were responsible for administering the accounts of Fred Walls with the bank knew and acquiesced in the way the accounts were being operated although none of them has said so to me expressly. My reasons for believing bank employees knew include:

   a) The Fred Walls account was a very large account with the CIBC. We also generated very large spin-off business for the "Dealer Plan" arm of CIBC. As a result of our business the Dealer Plan department for CIBC was one of their largest in the country so the local branch had reasons for accommodating us.

   b) Our accounts at CIBC frequently showed large credit balances and I believe that within CIBC's organization and accounting arrangement the local branch received some form of recognition or reward for those large credit balances. I assume that CIBC would have regularly reviewed the costs and benefits of our account given its size.

   c) Our accounts were closely monitored as the result of previous financial difficulties that the companies had had.

> d) We would occasionally have insufficient funds on deposit when cheques were presented at the CIBC and on such occasions Mr. Dabb would contact us and we would make a deposit.
>
> e) My mother, Emma Walls, would frequently make the deposit to the accounts at CIBC in the period to Thanksgiving in 1997, when she had a stroke, and then during the months of January, February and March 1998 when she returned to work from having the stroke. I am told by my mother and verily believe that her practice was to meet with Mr. Dabb personally and would hand the cheques and deposit slips to him and he would take the materials and personally attend to the deposit and then they would commonly have a cup of coffee together before she returned to the office.

[13] It is, of course, urged by the plaintiff that this conflict in the affidavit evidence before the court can be resolved by a reference to the many documents filed and analyzed by CIBC and which, it is said, admit of only one conclusion: that fraud on the part of Walls and Millard has been made out.

[14] But fraud or deceit requires proof of a subjective element.

[15] Professor Fridman, writing in The Law of Torts in Canada (Toronto: Carswell, 1990) (v. 2 pp. 123-124), notes that the law of deceit includes the act of making a wilfully false statement either by words or conduct:

> … Any conduct designed to deceive another by leading him to believe that a certain fact existed was equivalent in law, as in morals, to a statement in words that the fact did exist.

[16] Professor Fridman continues:

> … Liability for deceit or fraud is based upon the idea that to lie or deceive are morally wrong acts which merit legal sanction, when they result in harm suffered by the victim. Actual fraud and not just misrepresentation must be proved.
>
> Falsehood therefore entails a deliberate, wilful, conscious distortion of the truth. It will not suffice that the maker of the deceptive statement is inaccurate unless he is also aware of the inaccuracy (or is so reckless that he does not care whether or not he is speaking the truth). He must lack honest belief in the truth of what he is stating. Nor will it suffice if the defendant is merely giving an opinion or making an estimate which he believes, although mistakenly, is or will be correct. Deceit involves facts, not opinions, estimates, advice or promises. There must be a positive assertion that is or becomes dishonest, made with the intent to deceive. …
> [Footnotes omitted.]

[17] Demonstrating a "lack of honest belief in the truth of what he is stating …" on the part of a defendant, to the required standard of proof, on the basis of conflicting affidavit evidence is an exceedingly difficult task. As well

it should be in view of the stigma attaching to men or women in business upon any such finding.

[18] The summary trial process under our Rules of Court has enjoyed a significant acceptance by lawyers, litigants and judges, as an efficient and fair method for disposing of cases on the trial list. But it is not for every dispute.

[19] In cases where fraud is the issue, Justice Harvey has said in Campeau v. Provident Life & Accident Insurance Company, [1996] B.C.J. No. 1356 (B.C.S.C.) at para. 45:

> … Suffice it to say, however, that I am of the view that cases involving allegations of fraud are more likely found to be inappropriate for summary resolution than those involving many other types of issues. I say this because, as Hollinrake J.A. referred to in the reasons quoted above, fraud has a subjective element that is not easily determined or resolved with affidavit evidence alone.

> The leading authority on the use of Rule 18A is Inspiration Management v. McDermid St. Lawrence Ltd.(1989), 36 B.C.L.R. (2d) 202 (C.A.). That case establishes that in order to give judgment under Rule 18A a judge must be satisfied that on his or her findings on the disputed or undisputed facts, the issues can be decided. Furthermore, the judge must be satisfied that it would not be unjust to > give judgment. In connection with the latter requirement the judge should consider the following factors:

>
> 1. the amount involved;
>
> 2. the complexity of the matter in issue;
>
> 3. the urgency of the matter;
>
> 4. the likelihood of prejudice arising from delay;
>
> 5. the cost of proceeding to a conventional trial in relation to the amount involved;
>
> 6. the course of the proceedings;
>
> 7. any other matters which arise for consideration.

[21] In the case before me the amount sought by way of damages is very substantial.

[22] Both general damages and an award of punitive damages "at the higher end of the scale" are sought.

[23] The matter is complex, however perhaps not overly so. There is little urgency that I can perceive and none was really urged upon me. (In saying this I recognize that any party who is owed the amount this plaintiff alleges feels an understandable urgency to see to its collection.)

[24] No prejudice is alleged if this matter is delayed for a traditional trial. And finally, the cost of a full trial would be fully justified in light of the amount involved and the risks to the defendants.

[25] In all of the circumstances, in my opinion, in the words of Rule 18A(11)(a)(ii), it would be unjust to decide the issues between these parties on this application and I include in that conclusion the arguments advanced by the defendants seeking a dismissal of the claim.

[26] Costs of this application shall be in the cause.

on appeal from the court of appeal for alberta

Trusts and trustees -- Breach of trust -- Liability of strangers to trust -- Knowing assistance -- Knowing receipt -- Insurance agent depositing premiums collected on insurer's behalf into bank account -- Bank transferring funds to account of insurance agent's parent company to reduce overdraft -- Whether bank liable for breach of trust on basis of knowing assistance or knowing receipt.

D sold insurance to auto dealers. After collecting the premiums, D paid commissions and settled any current claims under the policies. The balance of the premiums was remitted on a monthly basis to the appellant insurance companies, the underwriters of the policies. In December 1986, D and its parent company started banking with the respondents (the "bank"). D used one bank account for all its transactions. Through its senior officers, the bank was aware that insurance premiums were being deposited into that account. In May 1987, a "trip report" by one of the appellants' employees indicated that D was reluctant to establish a trust account for the premiums but would do so if necessary. From June 1, D no longer settled claims under the insurance policies, with the result that the monthly premiums payable to the appellants increased significantly. In June the bank received instructions from the parent company's signing officers, who were identical to D's signing officers, to transfer all funds in D's account to the parent company's account at the end of each business day. In July and August, the transfer of funds between the accounts resulted in an overall reduction in the parent company's overdraft. In late August D advised the appellants that the July and August premiums could not be remitted. It agreed to pay these outstanding receipts by way of promissory note. After D and its parent company ceased carrying on business, the appellants brought an action against the bank for the outstanding insurance premiums. They were successful at trial and judgment was entered against the bank. The Court of Appeal allowed the bank's appeal and dismissed the appellants' claim.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

Per La Forest, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci and Major JJ.: The relationship between the appellant insurers and D was clearly one of trust. Under s. 124(1) of the Alberta Insurance Act, an agent who receives any money as a premium for an insurance contract from the insured is deemed to hold the premium in trust for the insurer. The promissory note was merely confirmation of the amount owed by D to the appellants and did not amount to a revocation of the trust. As well, the arrangement between them meets the three characteristics of a trust, namely certainty of intent, certainty of subject-matter, and certainty of object. The fact that the trust funds in D's account were commingled with other funds does not undermine the relationship of trust between the parties. Also, D's actions in failing to remit to the appellants the insurance premiums collected on their behalf in July and August 1987 were clearly in breach of trust. Moreover, the appellants did not acquiesce in the breach of trust by asking for and receiving the promissory note from D.

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

There are three ways in which a stranger to a trust can be held liable as a constructive trustee for breach of trust: as a trustee de son tort; for "knowing assistance"; and for "knowing receipt". The first type of liability is inapplicable to the present case since the bank never assumed the office or function of trustee. A stranger to a trust can be liable for breach of trust by knowingly assisting in a fraudulent and dishonest design on the part of the trustees. Assuming the present case falls under this "knowing assistance" category, it is clear that only actual knowledge, recklessness, or wilful blindness will render the bank liable for participating in the breach of trust. Since the bank had only constructive knowledge, it cannot be liable under the "knowing assistance" category of constructive trusteeship.

Liability on the basis of "knowing receipt" requires that strangers to the trust receive or apply trust property for their own use and benefit. By applying the deposit of insurance premiums as a set-off against the parent company's overdraft, the bank received a benefit and thus received the trust funds for its own use and benefit. The bank cannot avoid the "property" issue by characterizing the deposit of trust monies in D's account as a debt obligation. A debt obligation is a chose in action and, therefore, property over which one can impose a trust. The receipt requirement in "knowing receipt" cases is best characterized in restitutionary terms. In this case the bank has been enriched at the appellants' expense and thus, in restitutionary terms, there can be no doubt that the bank received trust property for its own use and benefit.

The second requirement for establishing liability on the basis of "knowing receipt" relates to the degree of knowledge required of the bank in relation to the breach of trust. While constructive knowledge is excluded as the basis for liability in "knowing assistance" cases, in "knowing receipt" cases, which are concerned with the receipt of trust property for one's own benefit, there should be a lower threshold of knowledge required of the stranger to the trust. More is expected of the recipient, who, unlike the accessory, is necessarily enriched at the plaintiff's expense. Because the recipient is held to this higher standard, constructive knowledge (that is, knowledge of facts sufficient to put a reasonable person on notice or inquiry) will suffice as the basis for restitutionary liability. This lower threshold of knowledge is sufficient to establish the "unjust" or "unjustified" nature of the recipient's enrichment, thereby entitling the plaintiff to a restitutionary remedy. More specifically, relief will be granted where a stranger to the trust, having received trust property for his or her own benefit and having knowledge of facts which would put a reasonable person on inquiry, actually fails to inquire as to the possible misapplication of trust property.

On the issue of knowledge, it is clear from the trial judge's findings that the bank was aware of the nature of the funds being deposited into, and transferred out of, D's account. The bank knew that D's sole source of revenue was the sale of insurance policies and that premiums collected by D were payable to the appellants. In light of the bank's knowledge of the nature of the funds, the daily emptying of D's account was in the trial judge's view "very suspicious". In these circumstances, a reasonable person would have been put on inquiry as to the possible misapplication of the trust funds. The bank should have inquired whether the use of the premiums to reduce the account overdrafts constituted a breach of trust. By failing to make the appropriate inquiries, the bank had constructive knowledge of D's breach of trust. The bank's enrichment was thus clearly unjust, rendering it liable to the appellants as a constructive trustee.

1 LA FOREST J. -- This appeal concerns the liability of a bank for its customer's breach of trust. The appellants, as beneficiaries of the trust, seek recovery for unpaid insurance premiums collected by the trustee and deposited with the respondent banks. The principal question in this appeal is this: Are the respondent banks liable as constructive trustees for the breach of trust committed by one of their clients? This question deals with the liability of strangers who participate in a breach of trust and, in particular, the degree of knowledge required for the imposition of liability as a constructive trustee.

I. Factual Background

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

2 The Citadel General Assurance Company and the Citadel Life Assurance Company ("Citadel") are insurance companies which carried on business in Alberta. Beginning in 1979, Citadel's business operations involved another Alberta corporation, Drive On Guaranteed Vehicle Payment Plan (1982) Limited ("Drive On"). As a wholly owned subsidiary of International Warranty Company Limited ("International Warranty"), Drive On sold consumer life, casualty, and unemployment insurance to auto dealers. The insurance premiums were collected by auto dealers at the time vehicles were sold and then remitted to Drive On. After collecting the premiums, Drive On paid commissions and settled any current claims under the policies. The balance of the premiums was remitted on a monthly basis to Citadel, the underwriter of the insurance policies. In early 1987, the premiums received during a calendar month were normally forwarded to Citadel at the end of the following month. This arrangement continued satisfactorily until August 1987 when Drive On defaulted on its payments to Citadel. As well, from 1979 until late August 1987, there was no written agreement between Citadel and Drive On.

3 In December 1986, the International Warranty Group of Companies, including Drive On and International Warranty, started banking with the now-amalgamated Lloyds Bank Canada and Hongkong Bank of Canada (hereinafter collectively called "the Bank"). During 1987, the only banker of Drive On was the Bank. Drive On used one bank account for all its transactions. The only deposits to that account were either insurance premiums collected from auto dealers or transfers of funds from International Warranty. Through its senior officers, the Bank was aware that insurance premiums were being deposited into Drive On's account. During the period after April 1, 1987, Drive On's account was usually in an overdraft position. On April 8, the Bank received instructions from International Warranty's signing officers (who were identical to Drive On's signing officers) to transfer funds between the International Warranty and Drive On accounts to cover overdrafts on either account.

4 Also in April 1987, the Presidents of Drive On and Citadel met to discuss their business relationship. As a result of the meeting, Citadel and Drive On agreed that a written agreement would be prepared to formalize their business relationship. It was also agreed that Drive On would no longer settle claims under the insurance policies. From June 1, 1987, Citadel assumed the adjudication and payment of all claims. As a result, the monthly premiums payable to Citadel were increased significantly. Also as a result of the presidents' meeting, Citadel ordered a detailed examination of Drive On's current procedures. A "trip report" was delivered by one of Citadel's employees on May 14. The report found that Drive On was depositing insurance premiums in a general bank account which was not set up as a trust account. The report also indicated that Drive On was somewhat reluctant to establish a trust account but would do so if necessary.

5 On June 5, 1987, the Bank received instructions from International Warranty's signing officers to transfer all funds in the Drive On account to the International Warranty account at the end of each business day. In July and August, the transfer of funds between the International Warranty and Drive On accounts resulted in an overall reduction in International Warranty's overdraft.

6 On August 7, 1987, Drive On forwarded the June premiums to Citadel. In late August, Citadel first learned of Drive On's financial difficulties. The President of Drive On advised Citadel that the July and August premiums could not be remitted. A new arrangement, effective September 1, was set in place whereby all premium monies would be forwarded directly to Citadel. With regard to the outstanding July and August receipts, Drive On agreed to pay Citadel by way of promissory note dated September 21, 1987. The note provided for monthly payments of $100,000. Drive On made a number of payments until it, and the other members of the International Warranty Group of Companies, ceased carrying on business in December. Citadel sued Drive On and the guarantor on the promissory note but has been unsuccessful in collecting anything. The parties agree that the outstanding amount payable to Citadel is $633,622.84.

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

7 Citadel brought an action against the Bank for the outstanding insurance premiums. At trial, Citadel was successful and judgment was entered against the Bank for $633,622.84: [1993] A.J. No. 680 (QL). The Court of Appeal allowed the Bank's appeal and dismissed Citadel's claim: (1996), 181 A.R. 76, 116 W.A.C. 76, 37 Alta. L.R. (3d) 293, [1996] 5 W.W.R. 9, 33 C.C.L.I. (2d) 241, [1996] A.J. No. 59 (QL).

II. Decisions Below

A. Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta

8 The trial judge, Marshall J., found that a relationship of trust existed between Citadel and Drive On. This finding was based in part on s. 124(1) of the Insurance Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-5, which provides that an agent or broker who negotiates a contract of insurance with an insurer and receives insurance premiums for that contract is deemed to hold the premiums in trust for the insurer. As well, the trial judge found that the arrangement between Citadel and Drive On had the three certainties of a trust, namely, certainty of subject-matter, certainty of intent, and certainty of object. Further, the trial judge held that a breach of trust occurred when Drive On failed to remit the insurance premiums collected on Citadel's behalf.

9 The trial judge stated that in order for the Bank to be liable as a stranger to the trust, the Bank must have had knowledge that the funds were trust monies or the circumstances must have required it to inquire before dealing with the money. In scrutinizing the evidence, the trial judge found that Drive On's instructions to empty its account daily were "very suspicious" (para. 26), given the Bank's knowledge that insurance premiums were being deposited in the account. As well, the trial judge concluded that the Bank, having received a benefit from Drive On's breach of trust, was under a greater duty to explain its actions. Liability was imposed on the following basis (at para. 33):

> The Bank had actual knowledge of the nature of the funds in the Drive On account and had an obligation to inquire about their position in the circumstances. The Bank shut its eyes in circumstances which should have caused it to inquire of its customer at least. It did not do so. The Bank had constructive knowledge and is a constructive trustee within the cases . . . .

The plaintiffs received judgment for $633,622.84.

B. Alberta Court of Appeal (1996), 181 A.R. 76

10 On appeal to the Alberta Court of Appeal, Kerans J.A., speaking for the court, began by noting, at p. 77, that there was "no serious difficulty with the finding of creation of the trust made by the trial judge". As such, Kerans J.A. was willing to assume that a trust existed between Citadel and Drive On and that a breach of trust occurred.

11 In Kerans J.A.'s view, the real difficulty with the case was the imposition of liability on the Bank. More specifically, he disagreed with the trial judge's conclusion that constructive knowledge was sufficient to render the Bank liable as a constructive trustee. Relying on this Court's decision in Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., [1993] 3 S.C.R. 787, Kerans J.A. concluded that only actual knowledge, recklessness, or wilful blindness could render the Bank liable for a breach of trust from which it received a benefit. This test was not met in the present case because, although the Bank had "shut its eyes" in the circumstances, the trial judge refused to find that the Bank was actually aware it was taking money in breach of trust. However, since Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd. was decided after the trial judge rendered judgment in the present case, the parties were invited to re-argue the facts before the Court of Appeal. Nonetheless, even after reconsidering the facts, Kerans J.A. concluded for the court at p. 78:

> . . . we have come to the conclusion that we cannot say on the balance of probabilities that this bank, when it honoured the direction to pay, was aware that it was moving out money in breach of any trust between the defaulting company and the insurance company. We do not have any difficulty with the trial finding that the bank had some warning that this was the case. But that is not enough. Nor do we think this is an appropriate case in which to rely on wilful blindness.

The Court of Appeal accordingly allowed the Bank's appeal and dismissed the claim.

III. Issues

12 As mentioned, one main question is raised on this appeal: Under what circumstances can the respondent banks be held liable as constructive trustees for the breach of trust committed by one of their customers?

IV. Analysis

A. The Nature of the Relationship between Citadel and Drive On

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

13 Before beginning my analysis regarding the liability of the Bank as a constructive trustee, I note that I have read the reasons of Iacobucci J. in Gold v. Rosenberg, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 767, a case also dealing with the liability of a bank for a breach of trust committed by one of its customers. I generally agree with Iacobucci J.'s approach in Gold and, indeed, consider it similar to my own in the present appeal.

14 There can be no doubt that the relationship between Citadel and Drive On was one of trust. In this Court, the parties did not dispute the existence of a trust relationship. Relevant to the arrangement between Citadel and Drive On is s. 124(1) of the Insurance Act, which provides:

> 124(1) An agent or broker who acts in negotiating, renewing or continuing a contract of insurance with an insurer licensed under this Act, and who receives any money or substitute for money as a premium for such a contract from the insured, shall be deemed to hold the premium in trust for the insurer.

From 1979 to 1987, Drive On, the insurance agent, was in the business of selling insurance policies underwritten by Citadel, the insurer. In negotiating insurance policies on Citadel's behalf, Drive On collected insurance premiums from auto dealers, paid commissions, and settled current claims under the policies. However, on June 1, 1987, the arrangement was changed and the premiums collected by Drive On were to be forwarded without deductions for policy claims. However, even when Citadel assumed the adjudication of all claims, Drive On still acted as agent or trustee and Citadel remained the principal or beneficiary of the insurance premiums. Moreover, I agree with the trial judge that the repayment arrangements between Citadel and Drive On did not amount to a revocation of the trust. The promissory note dated September 21, 1987, was merely confirmation of the amount owed by Drive On to Citadel. By agreeing to have the promissory note prepared in its favour, Citadel did not revoke its beneficial interest in the insurance premiums.

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

15 As well, the arrangement between Citadel and Drive On meets the three characteristics of a trust, namely certainty of intent, certainty of subject-matter, and certainty of object; see Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., supra, at pp. 803-4; Canadian Pacific Air Lines, Ltd. v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (1987), 61 O.R. (2d) 233 (H.C.), at p. 237. The arrangement in the present case was based on the collection of insurance premiums by the insurance agent, Drive On, and the remittance of these premiums, subject to adjustments, to the insurer, Citadel. The intent to create a trust clearly follows from this principal-agent relationship. The object of the trust is the insurer, Citadel. Finally, the insurance premiums constitute the subject-matter of the trust.

16 The fact that the trust funds in Drive On's account were commingled with other funds does not undermine the relationship of trust between the parties. As Iacobucci J. wrote for the majority of this Court in Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., supra, at p. 804, "[w]hile the presence or absence of a prohibition on the commingling of funds is a factor to be considered in favour of a debt relationship, it is not necessarily determinative"; see also R. v. Lowden (1981), 27 A.R. 91 (C.A.), at pp. 101-2; Bank of N.S. v. Soc. Gen. (Can.), [1988] 4 W.W.R. 232 (Alta. C.A.), at p. 238.

17 The intention of the parties in the present case was to create a trust relationship. That Drive On deposited the funds in a general bank account, as opposed to a special trust account, does not alter this intention. In May 1987, Citadel prepared a report of Drive On's procedures. This report found that a trust account had not been set up by Drive On. However, the report also noted that Drive On would establish a trust account if required by Citadel. The report indicates, therefore, that the parties had turned their minds to the possibility of setting up a trust account to prohibit the commingling of funds. Even though the trust account was never established, the fact that the parties considered this possibility confirms that the relationship was viewed by Citadel and Drive On as one of trust.

B. The Liability of the Bank as a Stranger to the Trust

1. General Principles

18 Having found that the relationship between Citadel and Drive On was one of trust, it is clear that Drive On's actions were in breach of trust. Quite simply, Drive On failed to remit to Citadel the insurance premiums collected on Citadel's behalf in July and August 1987. Moreover, I agree with the trial judge that Citadel did not acquiesce in the breach of trust by asking for and receiving the promissory note from Drive On. By accepting the note, Citadel did not represent that it was acquiescing in the use of the funds by the Bank. Consequently, Citadel is not barred from bringing an action against the bank for breach of trust; see Fletcher v. Collis, [1905] 2 Ch. 24 (C.A.); P. H. Pettit, Equity and the Law of Trusts (7th ed. 1993), at p. 491. The question remains whether the Bank, as a stranger to the trust between Citadel and Drive On, can be liable as a constructive trustee.

19 There are three ways in which a stranger to a trust can be held liable as a constructive trustee for breach of trust. First, a stranger to the trust can be liable as a trustee de son tort. Secondly, a stranger to the trust can be liable for breach of trust by knowingly assisting in a fraudulent and dishonest design on the part of the trustees ("knowing assistance"). Thirdly, liability may be imposed on a stranger to the trust who is in receipt and chargeable with trust property ("knowing receipt"; see Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., supra, at pp. 809-11).

20 To be liable as trustees de son tort, strangers to the trust must commit a breach of trust while acting as trustees. Such persons are not appointed trustees but "take on themselves to act as such and to possess and administer trust property"; see Selangor United Rubber Estates, Ltd. v. Cradock (No. 3), [1968] 2 All E.R. 1073 (Ch.), at p. 1095. This type of liability is inapplicable to the present case. The Bank never assumed the office or function of trustee; nor did it administer the trust funds on behalf of the beneficiary Citadel.

21 The two remaining categories of liability, namely "knowing assistance" and "knowing receipt", relate to strangers to the trust who knowingly participate in a breach of trust. In Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., supra, this Court considered the requirements for bringing a case within the "knowing assistance" category. In that case, the defendant travel agency collected funds from the sale of Air Canada tickets and held them in trust to be remitted to Air Canada. The funds were kept in the agency's general bank account. The individual directors of the travel agency, who had personally guaranteed a demand loan, authorized the bank to withdraw funds from the general account to cover monies owing on the loan. A dispute arose between the directors with regard to misappropriation of funds. The bank sent demand notices to the directors and withdrew the full amount owing under the loan from the agency's general account. As a result, Air Canada did not receive monies owed to it for ticket sales. The issue arose whether the appellant director, as stranger to the trust, was liable to Air Canada for the travel agency's breach of trust.

22 This Court found the director liable for knowingly assisting in a breach of trust. The liability of the director was based on his knowledge of, and assistance in, a fraudulent and dishonest breach of trust on the part of the trustees. With regard to the knowledge requirement, Iacobucci J. wrote for the majority, at p. 811: "The knowledge requirement for this type of liability is actual knowledge; recklessness or wilful blindness will also suffice." He expressly excluded constructive knowledge from this test. Iacobucci J. defined constructive knowledge, at p. 812, as "knowledge of circumstances which would indicate the facts to an honest person, or knowledge of facts which would put an honest person on inquiry".

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

23 The Court of Appeal in the present case relied on the knowledge requirement set out in Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., supra. Assuming the present case falls under the "knowing assistance" category, it is clear that only actual knowledge, recklessness, or wilful blindness will render the Bank liable for participating in the breach of trust. Constructive knowledge will not suffice. The trial judge's conclusions regarding the knowledge of the Bank were as follows (at para. 33):

> The Bank had actual knowledge of the nature of the funds in the Drive On account and had an obligation to inquire about their position in the circumstances. The Bank shut its eyes in circumstances which should have caused it to inquire of its customer at least. It did not do so. The Bank had constructive knowledge and is a constructive trustee. . . .

Kerans J.A. considered this passage from the trial judge's reasons and concluded, at p. 77:

> It is true that the judge used the words "shut its eyes", but reading the passage in its entirety, it seems clear that the judge is refusing to say that the bank was actually aware that it was taking money in breach of trust, as opposed to what it should have known or what its duty was.

I agree with Kerans J.A. that the trial judge refused to make a finding of actual knowledge by the Bank. Rather, the trial judge restricted his findings to constructive knowledge, based on the Bank's duty to inquire of its customer in the circumstances.

Moreover, there was no finding of recklessness or wilful blindness as such. It follows from the trial judge's findings that the Bank does not meet the knowledge requirement set out in Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., supra. Since the Bank had only constructive knowledge, it cannot be liable under the "knowing assistance" category of constructive trusteeship.

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

24 The only basis upon which the Bank may be held liable as a constructive trustee is under the "knowing receipt" or "knowing receipt and dealing" head of liability. Under this category of constructive trusteeship it is generally recognized that there are two types of cases. First, although inapplicable to the present case, there are strangers to the trust, usually agents of the trustees, who receive trust property lawfully and not for their own benefit but then deal with the property in a manner inconsistent with the trust. These cases may be grouped under the heading "knowing dealing". Secondly, there are strangers to the trust who receive trust property for their own benefit and with knowledge that the property was transferred to them in breach of trust. In all cases it is immaterial whether the breach of trust was fraudulent; see Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed. 1995), vol. 48, at para. 595; Pettit, supra, at p. 168; Underhill and Hayton, Law Relating to Trusts and Trustees (14th ed. 1987), at p. 357. The second type of case, which is relevant to the present appeal, raises two main issues: the nature of the receipt of trust property and the degree of knowledge required of the stranger to the trust.

2. Liability for Knowing Receipt

(a) The Receipt Requirement

25 Liability on the basis of "knowing receipt" requires that strangers to the trust receive or apply trust property for their own use and benefit; see Agip (Africa) Ltd. v.

Jackson, [1990] 1 Ch. 265, aff'd [1992] 4 All E.R. 451 (C.A.); Halsbury's Laws of England, supra, at paras. 595-96; Pettit, supra, at p. 168. As Iacobucci J. wrote in Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., supra, at pp. 810-11, the "knowing receipt" category of liability "requires the stranger to the trust to have received trust property in his or her personal capacity, rather than as an agent of the trustees". In the banking context, which is directly applicable to the present case, the definition of receipt has been applied as follows:

> The essential characteristic of a recipient . . . is that he should have received the property for his own use and benefit. That is why neither the paying nor the collecting bank can normally be made liable as recipient. In paying or collecting money for a customer the bank acts only as his agent. It sets up no title of its own. It is otherwise, however, if the collecting bank uses the money to reduce or discharge the customer's overdraft. In doing so it receives the money for its own benefit. . . . [Footnotes omitted.]

26 Thus, a distinction is traditionally made between a bank receiving trust funds for its own benefit, in order to pay off a bank overdraft ("knowing receipt"), and a bank receiving and paying out trust funds merely as agent of the trustee ("knowing assistance"); see Underhill and Hayton, supra, at p. 361.

27 In the present case, we saw, Drive On deposited trust funds, namely insurance premiums collected on Citadel's behalf, in an operating account at the Bank. Drive On's parent company, International Warranty, also had an account at the Bank. In April 1987, the Bank transferred funds between the Drive On and International Warranty accounts to cover overdrafts in either account. As well, in June, the Bank transferred the balance of any funds in the Drive On account to the International Warranty account on a regular basis. As a result of the transfers between the accounts in July and August, a net amount was transferred to the International Warranty account. This amount, which was in excess of the July and August premiums deposited by Drive On, was used to reduce International Warranty's overdraft. Although the Bank was instructed by Drive On's signing officers to make the transfers, the Bank did not act as mere agent in the circumstances. The Bank's actions went beyond the mere collection of funds and payment of bills on Drive On's behalf. The Bank, by applying the deposit of insurance premiums as a set-off against International Warranty's overdraft, received a benefit. This benefit, of course, was the reduction in the amount owed to the Bank by one of its customers. It follows that the Bank received the trust funds for its own use and benefit.

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

28 In this Court, the respondents argued that they could not be liable on the basis of "knowing receipt" because they had not received the trust property. The respondents took the position, accepted by the authorities, that a bank deposit is simply a loan to the bank; see Foley v. Hill (1848), [1843-60] All E.R. Rep. 16 (H.L.); Fonthill Lumber Ltd. v. Bank of Montreal (1959), 19 D.L.R. (2d) 618 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 628. Accordingly, the deposit of money in Drive On's account was characterized as a debt obligation owed by the Bank to Drive On. This debt obligation gave rise to a credit in Drive On's favour. On instruction from its customer, the Bank simply transferred "credits" from Drive On's account to International Warranty's account. The transfer of credits had the incidental effect of reducing an overdraft in the International Warranty account. In other words, the transfers between the accounts in July and August simply amounted to an off-setting of debt obligations. In the respondents' view, the Bank was not receiving trust property but simply transferring credits from one account to another.

29 The respondents' arguments are not convincing. A debt obligation is a chose in action and, therefore, property over which one can impose a trust. This conclusion is supported by the House of Lords' decision in Lipkin Gorman v. Karpnale Ltd., [1991] 3 W.L.R. 10. In that case, a firm of solicitors was authorized to operate a client's bank account. One of the firm's partners subsequently stole funds from the account and used them for casino gambling. Considering whether the solicitors could trace their client's funds at common law, Lord Goff of Chieveley wrote, at pp. 28-29:

> The relationship of the bank with the solicitors was essentially that of debtor and creditor; and since the client account was at all material times in credit, the bank was the debtor and the solicitors were its creditors. Such a debt constitutes a chose in action, which is a species of property; and since the debt was enforceable at common law, the chose in action was legal property belonging to the solicitors at common law.

The respondents cannot avoid the "property" issue by characterizing the deposit of trust monies in Drive On's account as a debt obligation. The chose in action, constituted by the indebtedness of the Bank to Drive On, was subject to a statutory trust in Citadel's favour. That same chose in action can also be the subject of a constructive trust in Citadel's favour.

30 Nonetheless, the respondents' arguments reflect a difficulty with the traditional conception of "receipt" in "knowing receipt" cases. In my view, the receipt requirement for this type of liability is best characterized in restitutionary terms. In Lac Minerals Ltd. v. International Corona Resources Ltd., [1989] 2 S.C.R. 574, at p. 669, I stated that a restitutionary claim, or a claim for unjust enrichment, is concerned with giving back to someone something that has been taken from them (a restitutionary proprietary award) or its equivalent value (a personal restitutionary award). As well, in Air Canada v. British Columbia, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1161, at pp. 1202-3, I stated that the function of the law of restitution "is to ensure that where a plaintiff has been deprived of wealth that is either in his possession or would have accrued for his benefit, it is restored to him. The measure of restitutionary recovery is the gain the [defendant] made at the [plaintiff's] expense." In the present case, the Bank was clearly enriched by the off-setting of debt obligations, or transferring of credits between the Drive On and International Warranty accounts. That is, the amount due to the Bank was reduced. As well, the Bank's enrichment deprived Citadel of the insurance premiums collected on its behalf. Moreover, the fact that the insurance premiums were never in Citadel's possession does not preclude Citadel from pursuing a restitutionary claim. After all, the insurance premiums would have accrued to Citadel's benefit. The Bank has been enriched at Citadel's expense. Thus, in restitutionary terms, there can be no doubt that the Bank received trust property for its own use and benefit.

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

(b) The Knowledge Requirement

31 The first requirement for establishing liability on the basis of "knowing receipt" has been satisfied. The Bank received the trust property for its own benefit and, in doing so, was enriched at the beneficiary's expense. The second requirement relates to the degree of knowledge required of the Bank in relation to the breach of trust. With regard to this knowledge requirement, there are two lines of authorities. According to one line of jurisprudence, the knowledge requirement for both "knowing assistance" and "knowing receipt" cases should be the same. More specifically, constructive knowledge should not be the basis for liability in either type of case. A second line of authority suggests that a different standard should apply in "knowing assistance" and "knowing receipt" cases. More specifically, the authorities favour a lower threshold of knowledge in "knowing receipt" cases.

32 A leading case in relation to the first line of authority is In re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, [1987] 1 Ch. 264. That case involved a dispute arising out of a 1923 settlement in which the future tenth Duke of Manchester had made an assignment of certain chattels to a number of trustees. The trustees were under a fiduciary duty to select and make an inventory of the chattels after the ninth Duke of Manchester died. The selection and inventory did not occur and the tenth Duke took absolutely whatever chattels he wanted. Megarry V.-C. held that the Duke was not liable as a constructive trustee because he did not know that the chattels were subject to a trust. In discussing the degree of knowledge required of the Duke, Megarry V.-C. emphasized that liability in "knowing receipt" cases is personal in nature and arises only if the stranger's conscience is sufficiently affected to justify imposing a constructive trust. Although cases involving actual knowledge, recklessness, and wilful blindness justify imposing a constructive trust, Megarry V.-C. doubted, at p. 285, whether the carelessness associated with constructive knowledge cases could sufficiently bind the stranger's conscience.

33 In re Montagu's Settlement Trusts was followed in Polly Peck International plc v. Nadir (No. 2), [1992] 4 All E.R. 769 (C.A.). There, the plaintiff company sought to impose liability on a bank for assisting in the misapplication of trust funds and for receiving and dealing in some way with trust property. The bank had been instructed by the trustee to transfer substantial trust funds into offshore accounts. Scott L.J. dealt with the case on the basis of both "knowing assistance" and "knowing receipt" because some of the transfers were made by the banker as agent while others were received for the bank's own benefit. With regard to the "knowing receipt" claim, the plaintiff beneficiary argued that, in the circumstances, the bank should have been put on inquiry as to whether there were improprieties in the transfers. Addressing the "knowing receipt" claim, Scott L.J. commented, at p. 777:

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

> Liability as constructive trustee in a 'knowing receipt' case does not require that the misapplication of the trust funds should be fraudulent. It does require that the defendant should have knowledge that the funds were trust funds and that they were being misapplied. Actual knowledge obviously will suffice. Mr. Potts [lawyer for the plaintiff] has submitted that it will suffice if the defendant can be shown to have had knowledge of facts which would have put an honest and reasonable man on inquiry, or, at least, if the defendant can be shown to have wilfully and recklessly failed to make such inquiries as an honest and reasonable man would have made. . . . I do not think there is any doubt that, if the latter of the two criteria can be established against the Central Bank, that will suffice. I have some doubts about the sufficiency of the former criterion but do not think that the present appeal is the right occasion for settling the issue.

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

It should be noted that Scott L.J. went on to apply the test for constructive knowledge, but found that the bank was not liable because it did not have cause to suspect improprieties and was not put on inquiry.

34 The English approach favouring exclusion of constructive knowledge received the approval of the Manitoba Court of Appeal in C.I.B.C. v. Valley Credit Union Ltd., [1990] 1 W.W.R. 736. In that case, a business obtained a line of credit from the plaintiff bank. Under the bank's general security agreement, the customer became trustee of monies paid to it with respect to accounts receivable or sales of inventory. The customer subsequently opened an account with the defendant credit union and used this account to deposit trust monies. The bank became aware of the other account, eventually called the customer's loans, and brought an action against the credit union to recover the funds in the customer's account. Philp J.A. refused to find the credit union liable as a constructive trustee. Without distinguishing between the categories of "knowing assistance" and "knowing receipt", Philp J.A. doubted whether the carelessness associated with constructive knowledge was sufficient to impose liability on the bank as a constructive trustee. Relying in part on In re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, supra, he stated, at p. 747:

> I do not think that it can be said that it has been authoritatively decided in Canada that carelessness or negligence is sufficient to impute constructive knowledge to a stranger, and to impose upon him liability as a constructive trustee. I think that it is a doubtful test, particularly in the case of a bank. The relationship between a bank and its customer is contractual and a principal obligation of the bank is to pay out as directed the moneys its customer has deposited. It seems to me that that obligation should be a paramount one, save in special factual circumstances sufficient to hold the bank privy to its customer's breach.

It should be noted, however, that later in his reasons Philp J.A. applied the test for constructive knowledge, but found that it had not been met in the circumstances.

35 That constructive knowledge should be excluded as a basis for liability in "knowing receipt" cases is also supported by the Ontario Court of Appeal's decision in Bullock v. Key Property Management Inc. (1997), 33 O.R. (3d) 1. There, a trustee had deposited trust funds in a bank account. The funds were then used to service the trustee's own interests, including the reduction of the trustee's indebtedness to the bank. The court dismissed the action against the bank on the grounds that it did not have the requisite degree of knowledge of the breach of trust. The court did not deal with the categories of "knowing assistance" and "knowing receipt" and apparently found it unnecessary to distinguish between the various heads of liability. Apparently assuming that there was only one category of liability, the court concluded, at p. 4:

> As the law presently stands, a stranger to a trust will be held liable for a breach of that trust by the trustee only where the stranger has actual knowledge or is reckless or wilfully blind as to both the existence of the trust and the dishonest conduct of the trustee in connection with the trust. The inquiry must be directed to what the stranger to the trust actually knew or suspected and not to what the stranger would have known had reasonable inquiries been made. Failure to make reasonable inquiries may have evidentiary value in determining what the stranger to the trust in fact knew or suspected, but it is not a basis for the imposition of liability as a constructive trustee.

36 As well, the Court of Appeal in the present case concluded, without restricting its comments to any particular head of liability, that constructive knowledge should be excluded as a basis for imposing liability on a stranger to the trust. Relying on Iacobucci J.'s reasons in Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., supra, Kerans J.A. wrote, at p. 77, that "[a] stranger to a trust is not liable for a breach of trust from which it received a benefit unless it had both actual knowledge of the trust and participated in the breach".

37 According to a second line of authority, however, constructive knowledge is sufficient to find a stranger to the trust liable on the basis of "knowing receipt". A leading English authority, in terms of formulating the test for constructive knowledge in breach of trust cases, is Selangor, supra. There, a company director carried out a fraudulent takeover bid by using the company's funds to purchase its own shares. Two banks were involved in the takeover. One bank acted on behalf of the director by paying, for a fee, those shareholders who had agreed to sell. The bank's fee was paid for by way of an advance from a second bank, where the company's account had been transferred. The second bank was repaid with trust funds drawn from the company's account. In addressing the banks' liability, Ungoed-Thomas J. did not distinguish between receipt and assistance cases. He presumed, at p. 1095, that there was only one category of liability for strangers to the trust who, unlike trustees de son tort, "act in their own right and not for beneficiaries". Relying on this single category of liability, Ungoed-Thomas J. held, at p. 1104:

> The knowledge required to hold a stranger liable as constructive trustee in a dishonest and fraudulent design, is knowledge of circumstances which would indicate to an honest, reasonable man that such a design was being committed or would put him on enquiry, which the stranger failed to make, whether it was being committed.

Ungoed-Thomas J. found both banks liable as constructive trustees.

38 The Selangor decision was followed by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Groves-Raffin Construction Ltd. v. Bank of Nova Scotia (1975), 64 D.L.R. (3d) 78. There, a construction company deposited trust funds collected from building contracts with the defendant bank. These trust funds were then used to repay the company's indebtedness to the bank and to reduce personal overdrafts belonging to a director of the company. As well, the director stole trust monies from the company's account and transferred them to a personal account at a second bank. Addressing the liability of the second bank as a constructive trustee, Robertson J.A. wrote, at p. 136, that he was dealing with a "collecting bank" and not a "paying bank", thereby suggesting that the case fell under the "knowing receipt" category. Relying in part on Selangor, supra, Robertson J.A. found, at p. 138:

> Under what I think is the proper test no necessity to take care arises until either it is clear that a breach of trust is being, or is intended to be, committed, or until there has come to the attention of the person something that should arouse suspicion in an honest, reasonable man and put him on inquiry. The person, for his own protection, in the first event should have nothing to do with the improper transaction, and in the second event should not continue to be involved in the suspected transaction until his inquiry shows him — or, more correctly, would show a reasonable man — that the suspicion is unfounded.

39 The Selangor decision was also applied by this Court in Carl B. Potter Ltd. v. Mercantile Bank of Canada, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 343. In that case, the plaintiff bid for the construction of a waste treatment plant. The bid was accompanied by a tender deposit cheque, to be held in trust by the owner of the project. The proceeds of the tender cheque eventually found their way into the owner's collateral account where they were drawn upon to meet the owner's obligations to the defendant bank. In these circumstances, it appears that the trust funds were received by the bank for its own use and benefit, thereby meeting the first requirement under the "knowing receipt" head of liability. Ritchie J., at p. 347, approved of the following test regarding the bank's knowledge of the breach of trust:

> The position of a banker who has been placed "on inquiry" in the manner aforesaid is summarized in the following brief paragraph from Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed.) vol. III, para. 60:
>
> > A banker may be a constructive trustee of money in his customer's account and in breach of that trust if he pays the money away, even on the customer's mandate, in circumstances which put him upon inquiry.

The footnote references for this passage, although not referred to by Ritchie J., included Selangor, supra. Ritchie J. went on to apply this test to the facts and found the bank liable for breach of trust.

40 A similar test of constructive knowledge was applied by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Arthur Andersen Inc. v. Toronto-Dominion Bank (1994), 17 O.R. (3d) 363, leave to appeal refused, [1994] 3 S.C.R. v. In that case, the defendant bank was sued by a trustee appointed under the Construction Lien Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.30. The bank had agreed to administer the accounts of a number of associated construction companies, in accordance with a "mirror accounting system". Among other things, this system eliminated the need to monitor overdrafts in individual accounts and permitted the informal transfer of debits and credits between all of the operating companies' accounts. The trial judge's findings implied that the funds in the accounts were transferred in breach of the trust requirements under the Construction Lien Act. Considering the liability of the bank as a constructive trustee, Grange and McKinlay JJ.A. thus wrote in their joint reasons, at pp. 381-82:

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

> We consider that the law on this point can be summarized thus: in the absence of sufficient facts or circumstances indicating that there is a good possibility of trust beneficiaries being unpaid there is no duty of inquiry on a bank to determine whether the trades have been paid or will be able to be paid.
>
> . . .
>
> Only if a bank is aware of facts which would indicate that trades would not be paid in the normal course of business should it be charged with a duty of special inquiry.

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

It should be noted that Grange and McKinlay JJ.A. formulated this test without distinguishing between receipt and assistance cases. However, their comment, at p. 385, that the "Bank can only be liable for a breach of trust, and that breach would have to involve making use for its own benefit of money held on a trust for trade creditors", suggests that the case fell under the "knowing receipt" head of liability.

41 This analysis was endorsed by the Manitoba Court of Appeal in Glenko Enterprises Ltd. v. Ernie Keller Contractors Ltd. (1996), 134 D.L.R. (4th) 161. On facts similar to Arthur Andersen, supra, the court, at pp. 164-65, considered "whether a bank which has applied trust funds received from a building contractor to reduce an account overdraft has participated in a breach of trust and must therefore account to the beneficiaries of that trust for those funds". The funds in question, which were misappropriated by the defendant contractor, were subject to trust requirements under the Builders' Liens Act, R.S.M. 1987, c. B91. Considering whether the bank was a party to a breach of trust by its customer, Scott C.J.M. held, at p. 167:

> . . . the Bank is not liable for the builder's breach of trust if the Bank, in the ordinary course of business, accepted deposits and allowed cheques to be written thereon — or for that matter if it applied the funds on the overdraft — unless it had or clearly should have had knowledge of the breach of trust by the contractor or of facts to put it on notice.

The court went on to agree with the trial judge, at p. 176, that the bank, although it apparently received the trust funds for its own benefit, was not liable because "the inquiries and arrangements for further information which were made by the bank . . . were reasonable in all the circumstances".

42 There are also a number of recent English authorities supporting the view that constructive knowledge is sufficient to impose liability on the basis of "knowing receipt". In Agip (Africa) Ltd. (Ch.), supra, Millett J. made a number of comments regarding "knowing receipt" cases, even though the case before him was of the "knowing assistance" category. With regard to the degree of knowledge required in "knowing receipt" cases, he wrote, at p. 291:

> The first [category of "knowing receipt" cases] is concerned with the person who receives for his own benefit trust property transferred to him in breach of trust. He is liable as a constructive trustee if he received it with notice, actual or constructive, that it was trust property and that the transfer to him was a breach of trust; or if he received it without such notice but subsequently discovered the facts.

However, Millett J.'s comments must be read in light of a later passage, at p. 293, where he refused to express an opinion as to whether constructive knowledge sufficed in "knowing receipt" cases.

43 Millett J.'s comments were subsequently referred to by Knox J. in Cowan de Groot Properties Ltd. v. Eagle Trust plc, [1992] 4 All E.R. 700 (Ch.). In this "knowing receipt" case the issue arose whether a purchaser company had knowledge of a breach of duty arising out of the sale of another company's property. The purchaser's liability as a constructive trustee turned on whether or not it had knowledge that the directors of the vendor company were deliberately selling at a gross undervalue. Knox

J. noted, at p. 758, that there was a "substantial body of authority in favour of the proposition that constructive notice based on what a reasonable man would have concluded though falling short of want of probity on the part of the person charged as a constructive trustee may suffice in a knowing receipt case". Despite this body of authority, Knox J. preferred a test based on actual knowledge, wilful blindness, or recklessness. However, he added that if, contrary to his view, constructive knowledge was sufficient, there would still have been no liability on the facts before him. As well, at p. 761, he suggested "that the underlying broad principle which runs through the authorities regarding commercial transactions is that the court will impute knowledge, on the basis of what a reasonable person would have learnt, to a person who is guilty of commercially unacceptable conduct in the particular context involved".

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

44 Millett J. reiterated the views he expressed in Agip (Africa) Ltd., supra, in El Ajou v. Dollar Land Holdings plc, [1993] 3 All E.R. 717 (Ch.). That case involved a massive share fraud carried out by three Canadians in Amsterdam between 1984 and 1985. The plaintiff, the largest single victim of the fraud, claimed to be able to trace some of the proceeds of the fraud from Amsterdam through locations in Geneva, Gibraltar, Panama, back to Geneva, and then to London, where they were invested in a joint venture to carry out a property development project. In this "knowing receipt" case, Millett J. was prepared to assume that constructive knowledge was a sufficient basis for liability. At p. 739, he stated:

> In the absence of full argument I am content to assume, without deciding, that dishonesty or want of probity involving actual knowledge (whether proved or inferred) is not a precondition of liability; but that a recipient is not expected to be unduly suspicious and is not to be held liable unless he went ahead without further inquiry in circumstances in which an honest and reasonable man would have realised that the money was probably trust money and was being misapplied.

45 According to the second line of authority, then, the degree of knowledge required of strangers to the trust should be different in assistance and receipt cases. Generally, there are good reasons for requiring different thresholds of knowledge under the two heads of liability. As Millett J. wrote in Agip (Africa) Ltd., supra, at pp. 292-93:

> The basis of liability in the two types of cases is quite different; there is no reason why the degree of knowledge required should be the same, and good reason why it should not. Tracing claims and cases of "knowing receipt" are both concerned with rights of priority in relation to property taken by a legal owner for his own benefit; cases of "knowing assistance" are concerned with the furtherance of fraud.

46 In other words, the distinction between the two categories of liability is fundamental: whereas the accessory's liability is "fault-based", the recipient's liability is "receipt-based". In an extrajudicial opinion, Millett J. described the distinction as follows:

> . . . the liability of the accessory is limited to the case where the breach of trust in question was fraudulent and dishonest; the liability of the recipient is not so limited. In truth, however, the distinction is fundamental; there is no similarity between the two categories. The accessory is a person who either never received the property at all, or who received it in circumstances where his receipt was irrelevant. His liability cannot be receipt-based. It is necessarily fault-based, and is imposed on him not in the context of the law of competing priorities to property, but in the application of the law which is concerned with the furtherance of fraud. [Footnotes omitted.]
> "Tracing the Proceeds of Fraud", supra, at p. 83.

47 S. Gardner makes a similar point in "Knowing Assistance and Knowing Receipt: Taking Stock" (1996), 112 L.Q.R. 56, at p. 85:

> . . . it is questionable whether knowing receipt is about wrongfully causing loss at all. There may be more than one other thing that it could be about, > but most modern opinion takes it to be a restitutionary liability, based on the fact that the defendant has acquired the plaintiff's property.

The same view was expressed by the Privy Council in Royal Brunei Airlines Sdn. Bhd. v. Tan, [1995] 3 W.L.R. 64, at p. 70: "Different considerations apply to the two heads of liability. Recipient liability is restitution-based; accessory liability is not." These comments are also cited with approval by Iacobucci J. in Gold, supra, at para. 41.

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

48 Given the fundamental distinction between the nature of liability in assistance and receipt cases, it makes sense to require a different threshold of knowledge for each category of liability. In "knowing assistance" cases, which are concerned with the furtherance of fraud, there is a higher threshold of knowledge required of the stranger to the trust. Constructive knowledge is excluded as the basis for liability in "knowing assistance" cases; see Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., supra, at pp. 811-13. However, in "knowing receipt" cases, which are concerned with the receipt of trust property for one's own benefit, there should be a lower threshold of knowledge required of the stranger to the trust. More is expected of the recipient, who, unlike the accessory, is necessarily enriched at the plaintiff's expense. Because the recipient is held to this higher standard, constructive knowledge (that is, knowledge of facts sufficient to put a reasonable person on notice or inquiry) will suffice as the basis for restitutionary liability. Iacobucci J. reaches the same conclusion in Gold, supra, where he finds, at para. 46, that a stranger in receipt of trust property "need not have actual knowledge of the equity [in favour of the plaintiff]; notice will suffice".

49 This lower threshold of knowledge is sufficient to establish the "unjust" or "unjustified" nature of the recipient's enrichment, thereby entitling the plaintiff to a restitutionary remedy. As I wrote in Lac Minerals, supra, at p. 670, "[t]he determination that the enrichment is 'unjust' does not refer to abstract notions of morality and justice, but flows directly from the finding that there was a breach of a legally recognized duty for which the courts will grant relief". In "knowing receipt" cases, relief flows from the breach of a legally recognized duty of inquiry. More specifically, relief will be granted where a stranger to the trust, having received trust property for his or her own benefit and having knowledge of facts which would put a reasonable person on inquiry, actually fails to inquire as to the possible misapplication of trust property. It is this lack of inquiry that renders the recipient's enrichment unjust.

50 Some commentators go further and argue that a recipient may be unjustly enriched regardless of either a duty of inquiry or constructive knowledge of a breach of trust. According to Professor Birks, a recipient of misdirected funds should be liable on a strict, restitutionary basis. In his article "Misdirected Funds: Restitution from the Recipient", [1989] L.M.C.L.Q. 296, he argues that a recipient's enrichment is unjust because the plaintiff did not consent to it, not because the defendant knew that the funds were being misdirected. In particular, he writes, at p. 341, that "[t]he 'unjust' factor can be named 'ignorance', signifying that the plaintiff, at the time of the enrichment, was absolutely unaware of the transfer from himself to the defendant". Birks, however, lessens the strictness of his approach by allowing a defendant to take advantage of special defences, including a defence arising out of a bona fide purchase for value. (See also P. Birks, "Overview: Tracing, Claiming and Defences", in P. Birks, ed., Laundering and Tracing (1995), 289, at pp. 322 et seq.)

51 In my view, the test formulated by Professor Birks, while not entirely incompatible with my own, may establish an unjust deprivation, but not an unjust enrichment. It is recalled that a plaintiff is entitled to a restitutionary remedy not because he or she has been unjustly deprived but, rather, because the defendant has been unjustly enriched, at the plaintiff's expense. To show that the defendant's enrichment is unjustified, one must necessarily focus on the defendant's state of mind not the plaintiff's knowledge, or lack thereof. Indeed, without constructive or actual knowledge of the breach of trust, the recipient may very well have a lawful claim to the trust property. It would be unfair to require a recipient to disgorge a benefit that has been lawfully received. In those circumstances, the recipient will not be unjustly enriched and the plaintiff will not be entitled to a restitutionary remedy.

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

52 In the banking context of the present case, it is true that s. 206(1) of the Bank Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-1, negates any duty on the part of a bank to see to the execution of any trust, whether express, implied or constructive, to which a deposit is subject. In accordance with this provision, a bank is not under a duty to regularly monitor the activities of its clients simply because the funds deposited by those clients are impressed with a statutory trust. Nonetheless, this provision does not render a bank immune from liability as a constructive trustee or prevent the recognition of a duty of inquiry on the part of a bank. Indeed, in certain circumstances, a bank's knowledge of its customer's affairs will require the bank to make inquiries as to possible misapplication of trust funds. As discussed earlier, the degree of knowledge required is constructive knowledge of a possible breach of trust. It follows that a bank which is enriched by the receipt of trust property and has knowledge of facts that would put a reasonable person on inquiry is under a duty to make inquiries of its customer regarding a possible breach of trust. If the bank fails to make the appropriate inquiries, it will have constructive knowledge of the breach of trust. In these circumstances, the bank will be unjustly enriched and, therefore, required to disgorge the benefit it received at the plaintiff's expense.

53 The respondents argued that imposing liability on a banker who merely has constructive notice of a breach of trust will place too great a burden on banks, thereby interfering with the proper functioning of the banking system. While this may be true in assistance cases where a banker merely pays out and transfers funds as the trustee's agent, the same argument does not apply to receipt cases where a banker receives the trust funds for his or her own benefit. Professor Harpum addresses this point in "The Stranger as Constructive Trustee" (1986), 102 L.Q.R. 114, at p. 138:

> Although there should be a reluctance to allow the unnecessary intrusion of "the intricacies and doctrines connected with trusts" into ordinary commercial transactions, considerations of speed and the importance of possession which normally justify the exclusion of these doctrines, are less applicable to a banker who chooses to exercise his right of set-off than they are to other commercial dealings. Where a banker combines accounts, he alone stands to gain from the transaction. Because of that benefit, more should be expected of him than if he gained nothing. [Footnotes omitted.]

In "knowing receipt" cases, therefore, it is justifiable to impose liability on a banker who only has constructive knowledge of a breach of trust.

54 In the present case, it has already been established that the Bank was enriched at Citadel's expense by the receipt of insurance premiums collected by Drive On and subject to a statutory trust in favour of Citadel. The only remaining question is whether the Bank had the requisite degree of knowledge to render the enrichment unjust, thereby entitling the plaintiff insurer to a remedy.

55 On this issue, it is clear from the trial judge's findings that the Bank was aware of the nature of the funds being deposited into, and transferred out of, Drive On's account. On discovery, two of the Bank's employees stated that they knew Drive On's sole source of revenue was the sale of insurance policies. The Bank also knew that premiums collected by Drive On were payable to the plaintiff insurer. The Bank's knowledge of the nature of Drive On's deposits must also be considered in conjunction with the activities in Drive On's account. It is recalled that in April 1987 the Bank began transferring funds between the Drive On and International Warranty accounts to cover overdrafts in either account. As well, in June 1987, the Bank was directed to empty the Drive On account on a daily basis, again to facilitate the transfer of funds to the International Warranty account.

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

56 In light of the Bank's knowledge of the nature of the funds, the daily emptying of the account was in the trial judge's view "very suspicious". In these circumstances, a reasonable person would have been put on inquiry as to the possible misapplication of the trust funds. Notwithstanding the fact that the exact terms of the trust relationship between Citadel and Drive On may have been unknown to the Bank, the Bank should have taken steps, in the form of reasonable inquiries, to determine whether the insurance premiums were being misapplied. More specifically, the Bank should have inquired whether the use of the premiums to reduce the account overdrafts constituted a breach of trust. By failing to make the appropriate inquiries, the Bank had constructive knowledge of Drive On's breach of trust. In these circumstances, the Bank's enrichment was clearly unjust, thereby rendering it liable to Citadel as a constructive trustee.

57 I make one additional point regarding the nature of the Bank's liability in the present case. As already established, recipient liability is restitution-based. The imposition of liability as a constructive trustee on the basis of "knowing receipt" is a restitutionary remedy and should not be confused with the right to trace assets at common law or in equity. The principles relating to tracing at law and in equity were thus set out by the English Court of Appeal in Agip (Africa) Ltd., supra, at pp. 463-64 and 466:

> Tracing at law does not depend upon the establishment of an initial fiduciary relationship. Liability depends upon receipt by the defendant of the plaintiff's money and the extent of the liability depends on the amount received. Since liability depends upon receipt the fact that a recipient has not retained the asset is irrelevant. For the same reason dishonesty or lack of inquiry on the part of the recipient are irrelevant. Identification in the defendant's hands of the plaintiff's asset is, however, necessary. It must be shown that the money received by the defendant was the money of the plaintiff. Further, the very limited common law remedies make it difficult to follow at law into mixed funds.
> Both common law and equity accepted the right of the true owner to trace his property into the hands of others while it was in an identifiable form. The common law treated property as identified if it had not been mixed with other property. Equity, on the other hand, will follow money into a mixed fund and charge the fund.

58 In my view, a distinction should be made between the imposition of liability in "knowing receipt" cases and the availability of tracing orders at common law and in equity. Liability at common law is strict, flowing from the fact of receipt. Liability in "knowing receipt" cases is not strict; it depends not only on the fact of enrichment (i.e. receipt of trust property) but also on the unjust nature of that enrichment (i.e. the stranger's knowledge of the breach of trust). A tracing order at common law, unlike a restitutionary remedy, is only available in respect of funds which have not lost their identity by becoming part of a mixed fund. Further, the imposition of liability as a constructive trustee is wider than a tracing order in equity. The former is not limited to the defence of purchaser without notice and "does not depend upon the recipient still having the property or its traceable proceeds"; see In re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, supra, at p. 276.

59 Despite these distinctions, there appears to be a common thread running through both "knowing receipt" and tracing cases. That is, constructive knowledge will suffice as the basis for imposing liability on the recipient of misdirected trust funds.

1997 CanLII 334 (SCC)

Notwithstanding this, it is neither necessary nor desirable to confuse the traditional rules of tracing with the restitutionary principles now applicable to "knowing receipt" cases. This does not mean, however, that a restitutionary remedy and a tracing order are mutually exclusive. Where more than one remedy is available on the facts, the plaintiff should be able to choose the one that is most advantageous. In the present case, the plaintiff did not seek a tracing order. It is therefore unnecessary for me to decide whether such a remedy would have been available on the facts of the present appeal, and I have not explored the issue.

I. PREAMBLE

1. The Actions

[1] VIRTUE J.: – These proceedings arise out of efforts by two competitors - the plaintiffs Grenon, Edwards and Colborne, on the one hand, and the defendant Stampeder/Ricinus on the other - to acquire interests in the shares of Petro, from the owner, Group. Group sold its shares of Petro to Stampeder.

[2] The plaintiffs allege they had a right of first refusal from Petro which entitled them to carry out a restructuring of Petro, which would have resulted in the plaintiffs acquiring a substantial equity position in the restructured company. They claim that Group's sale of its shares to Stampeder constituted a breach by Petro of its agreement with the plaintiffs and, further, that Stampeder and Group wrongfully interfered with their contractual rights, or failing that, their economic interests.

[3] Stampeder, by counterclaim, alleges it suffered damage as a result of a conspiracy between the plaintiffs and Thomas Pointer (an officer and director of Petro) to interfere with a public share offering which Stampeder planned to issue to cover the costs of acquiring the Petro shares and that this was done as part of a fraudulent scheme to force Stampeder into making a deal to transfer Petro's tax losses to the plaintiffs.

[4] In addition, Stampeder, Group and Petro seek to be indemnified by Pointer, in the event that the plaintiffs' claim against them should succeed.

[5] After the main action was commenced, the Plaintiffs joined Peter Williams as a defendant, claiming that Williams, Stampeder and Group caused damage to Colborne by a tortious breach of confidence.

[6] A second action was joined for trial with the Colborne action. In those proceedings Pointer claims against Stampeder, 542 and Petro, for breach of an agreement between Pointer and Petro and/or Group, to pay Pointer the sum of $100,000 in lieu of an option to participate in the equity of Petro; and further, for breach of a balance due under a severance agreement between Pointer and Petro.

[7] Petro counterclaims against Pointer, alleging fraudulent misrepresentation on Pointer's part with respect to the severance agreement. Petro seeks to recover the amount paid to Pointer under the severance agreement, before the fraud was discovered.

2. The Parties

[8] The parties are as follows:

[9] Petro was a private corporation which operated as a small oil and gas company, with offices at Calgary, Alberta. The entire issued capital of the company was owned by the defendant Group, a private holding company with offices in Vancouver, B.C. The other major stakeholder in Petro was the Bank of Montreal which held security on all of the assets of the company and had an option on 49.9% of the company's shares for a debt of $43.5 million. The physical assets of Petro had a value of about $30 million, so the company, on the face of it, had no net worth. Petro did, however, have $100 million in tax losses and resource pools.

[10] Group had pledged the shares of Petro to a consortium of bankers (the Group lenders), to whom Group owed the sum of $300 million. As a consequence, Group, the Bank of Montreal, and the Group lenders were the three principal stakeholders in Petro.

[11] Stampeder is a publicly traded junior oil and gas company, with offices at Calgary, Alberta. Stampeder, with the concurrence of the Group lenders, purchased (through its subsidiary Ricinus) the issued shares of Petro from Group, for $2 million, and, at the same time, Stampeder purchased the entire debt and security position of the Bank of Montreal in Petro, for $28 million. Both transactions closed on August 3rd, 1993.

[12] Grenon and Edwards are merchant bankers who sometimes referred to themselves as GE, and frequently carried out their investments through Colborne, a private company controlled by them.

[13] Pointer was, at all material times, a director and an officer, but not a shareholder, of Petro.

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

[14] When the events giving rise to these actions began, the defendant Williams was a law partner in the firm of Bennett Jones Verchere who, during the course of the events giving rise to these actions, became the vice-president of Stampeder.

[15] 542 was a wholly-owned subsidiary of Group, which, during the course of the events, came to hold Group's shares of Petro, as a trustee for Group.

[16] Ricinus is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Stampeder.

3. The Issues

[17] Thfe major issues confronting the Court are:

(i) Did the negotiations between Group, Colborne and Petro result in an agreement between Colborne and Petro, under which Colborne was entitled to a right of first refusal agreement from Petro;

(ii) If so, did such an agreement bind Group with respect to the disposition of its shares of Petro;

(iii) If so, was a right of first refusal to restructure Petro conditional upon Colborne presenting, and Group approving, a satisfactory restructuring plan;

(iv) If so, did Group approve a restructuring plan presented by Colborne;

(v) If Colborne came to have a right of first refusal to restructure Petro, did Group and Stampeder conspire to: (a) wrongfully interfere with a contractual right held by Colborne, or (b) wrongfully interfere with Colborne's economic interest;

(vi) Was Pointer, as an officer and director of Petro, or otherwise, entitled to have Petro enter into a secret right of refusal agreement with Colborne, and a secret unanimous shareholders agreement between 542 and Colborne, affecting Group's ability to deal with its shares of Petro, without the knowledge or consent of his fellow directors, and without the knowledge or consent of Group;

(vii) Did the actions of Grenon and Pointer, in executing and keeping secret the rights of first refusal and unanimous shareholder agreements, while encouraging Stampeder to complete its purchase of Group's shares, constitute an actionable tort against Stampeder, and if so, did Stampeder suffer any loss thereby;

(viii) Did Pointer's conduct disentitle him to the benefits provided by the equity agreement and the severance agreement, and entitle Petro to rescind the agreements and recover the monies paid under the severance agreement;

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

(ix) Did Colborne's lawyer, Alan Ross, improperly disclose confidential tax information received from his client, the plaintiff Grenon, to the defendants Stampeder, and if so, are Ross's partner Williams and Stampeder, or either of them, liable to Colborne for the tort of breach of confidence, and if so, did Colborne suffer any damage thereby;

(x) Did the tactics of any of the parties, carrying on business in a free enterprise society, exceed the bounds of ethical corporate behaviour to such an extend as to warrant the interference of the Court, and if so, what damages or other remedies follow upon such behaviour?

4. Historical Background

[18] While the events set out below are not without significance, they are recorded primarily to set the background against which the more critical events of 1993 can be understood and assessed.

[19] Group is the successor to B.C. Resources Investment Corporation (the BRIC). During the latter part of 1992, a change occurred in the control of the Board of Directors of Group. Until that time the Board was mainly controlled by the Harrowston Group of companies, represented on the Board by David Bookbinder and Brent Belzberg. After the change of control, and during the events of 1993, the Board of Directors of Group was controlled by the Jim Pattison group of companies. Peter Geer was the president of Group, and Robert Chase was the chief financial officer of the company. Chase was also one of three directors of Petro, the other two being the defendant Pointer, and David Savage.

[20] Group, a holding company, owned and operated a number of subsidiaries in the resource field, one of which was Petro, its oil and gas arm. The drop in world commodity prices which began in 1984 had an adverse effect on the performance of Group's timber, mining, and oil and gas subsidiaries. The only subsidiary which continued to perform well was Westshore Terminals Ltd., which operated a successful coal terminal and seaport facility near Vancouver, B.C.

[21] In 1991, Group found it necessary to sell its timber and pulp operations. In September 1992, Group's subsidiary Westar Mining Ltd. went into bankruptcy, leaving unpaid a very substantial debt to the Bank of Montreal. (The Bank claims to have suffered the largest single loss in the history of Canadian banking.) The result was that the relationship between Group and the Bank of Montreal was strained.

[22] In 1985 a drop in world oil prices, coupled with the effects of the National Energy Program, created serious financial difficulties for Petro. The company's surplus cash flow was eliminated, its oil and gas operations became uneconomical, and it owed the Bank of Montreal $70 million, a sum substantially more than the value of its assets, all of which were held as security by the Bank. Petro's debt repayment to the Bank was renegotiated in 1986, and thereafter the Bank conducted a monthly cash sweep of Petro's revenues, leaving the company with just enough of its revenue to carry on its existing operations, but nothing for exploration, or for the development of its existing land holdings.

[23] By September 1986, Petro's financial situation was such that the value of Group's share interest in Petro was written down by Group, to nominal value.

[24] Group itself was indebted, to the extent of $300 million, to a consortium of banks, headed by the Royal Bank of Canada, which I have referred to as the Group lenders. Group had pledged the shares of Petro to these lenders, as security for Group's debt.

[25] In 1988, Group, by having Petro sell most of its land holdings in British Columbia, reduced Petro's debt to the Bank of Montreal from $70 million to $43 million. At the same time Group began searching for opportunities to sell its shares of Petro, or to restructure the company, so as to obtain some sort of return for its investment in the company.

[26] The persons chiefly responsible for carrying out this initiative for Group were David Bookbinder, a director of Group, and Chase, its chief financial officer. Pointer, as chief financial officer of Petro, provided technical assistance.

[27] Pointer, a chartered accountant, had joined Petro in June 1985, as a financial analyst. He was appointed chief financial officer, and a director of the company, in May 1991. From that time on, until December 1992, the members of the Board of Directors of Petro were: Larry Bell (a director of Group and president of Petro) and Robert Chase (the chief financial officer of Group), both of whom were resident in Vancouver; and Thomas Pointer and David Savage (who was the chief operating officer of Petro), both of whom were resident in Calgary. At the end of December 1992, the Jim Pattison group of companies took control of Group. Bell resigned his positions in both Group and Petro, and thereafter Chase, Pointer and Savage remained as the three directors of Petro. From that time forward, Pointer understood that he was to report to Jim Pattison, but he did so in fact, by reporting to Chase and to Nick Geer, who became president of Group at the beginning of 1993. Pointer and Chase were in frequent and regular communication with respect to Group's efforts to sell its shares of Petro or to restructure the company, and both Pointer and Savage were called upon from time to time to make formal reports to the entire Board of Directors of Group.

[28] One of Pointer's responsibilities, both prior to and during 1993, was to devise a method, for Group's consideration, of using Petro's accumulated tax losses and resource pools to create some value in the company for Group. Pointer worked closely with the various presidents of Petro, and with various members of the management team of Group in seeking to carry out this objective.

[29] In 1989, Pointer had approached the plaintiff, Murray Edwards, who was then associated with Peters & Co., about doing a transaction involving Group's shares of Petro. Peters & Co. investigated various possibilities but nothing concrete developed.

[30] In 1991, Petro engaged Tom Olson, a tax lawyer, to obtain advice on how the tax losses might be sold or otherwise employed to produce value for Group. The Bank of Montreal held security on all of Petro's assets, so it was essential that a method be devised that would be satisfactory to the Bank. Olson thought it possible to reorganize Petro so as to separate off the tax attributes into another entity, leaving the Bank with its security on the physical assets, and then negotiating with the Bank to reduce its debt to the level of the value of the physical assets. The idea then would be to use the tax attributes to raise capital for exploration and development. Over a period of several months Olson approached 15 or 20 prospects but again nothing developed.

[31] By an engagement letter dated July 11, 1991, Group engaged Peters & Co. Limited, a firm of investment counsellors, to provide financial assistance in raising capital by employing Petro's tax losses. The plaintiffs Grenon and Edwards were associated with Peters at that time, and it is significant to note that the engagement letter (Tab 37) was addressed to Group, not Petro. The letter suggested raising capital by selling Petro's tax deductions. Action on the proposal was deferred because the Bank of Montreal was demanding payment of its loan, and dealing with that problem became the more pressing issue for Group.

[32] The Board of Directors of Group, on the advice of David Bookbinder, a member of the Board, concluded that if Group was to salvage something from its ownership of Petro, it should first negotiate an agreement with the Bank of Montreal to refinance the debt owed by Petro to the Bank, on more favourable terms. The negotiations were led by David Bookbinder, with Pointer providing technical information and assistance.

[33] In August 1991, in preparation for the negotiations with the Bank, Chase had Pointer arrange to have Peters & Co. prepare an evaluation of Petro's tax pools for the Board of Directors of Group. Peters estimated the value to be $5 million to $6 million.

[34] Bookbinder was able to negotiate a restructuring of Petro's debt with the Bank of Montreal, which was approved by the Board of Directors of Group. The documents setting out the new arrangement were prepared by Lawson Lundell, Group's solicitors in Vancouver, and executed by Group, Petro, and the Bank, on April 30th 1992.

[35] Under the new arrangement Petro's $43.2 million debt to the Bank was converted into $24.4 million in distress preferred shares, and an oil bond for the remaining 18.4 M (the interest on which was indexed to the price of oil). The Bank took security on all of the assets of Petro, and an option on 49.9% of Group's shares of the company.

[36] It is worth noting that the intercorporate method followed for the restructure of Petro's debt to the Bank in 1992, was to obtain the approval of the Board of Directors of Petro, obtain the approval of the Group's management committee, and finally, to obtain the approval of the Group Board of Directors.

[37] As a result of the 1992 restructuring, the Bank of Montreal became a major stakeholder in Petro. The Bank held security on all of Petro's assets and a 49.9% option on Group's shares, so that, as between Group and the Bank, the Bank had as much, if not more, control over any plan affecting Group's shares or a further restructuring of Petro, than Group itself.

[38] Under the new arrangement with the Bank of Montreal, the amount of interest payable by Petro was reduced, but the Bank continued to do a cash sweep, so that Petro still had no access to funds for further development or exploration, so Group was still interested in using Petro's tax losses to increase the value of its shares. Immediately after closing the restructuring with the Bank, Chase, Bookbinder and Pointer went back to work on the problem. Once again they turned to Peters & Co., and on June 9th 1992, a letter agreement was signed by Pointer, engaging Peters & Co. Capital Limited as financial advisor. Peters & Company Capital Ltd. was a joint venture arrangement between the plaintiffs Grenon and Edwards, and Peters & Co.

[39] Peters & Company Capital Ltd. had intended that its contract of engagement should, once again, be with Group, but Pointer intervened and by telling Grenon that he was not authorized to sign for Group, arranged to have the engagement letter addressed to Petro rather than Group. Pointer knew that Petro was not the proper party to the agreement but he told Peters that he would deal with the matter of moving the obligation from Petro to the appropriate party when the strategy was more fully developed. This arrangement (concurred in by Grenon) was the beginning of a series of actions Pointer took in an effort to personally control matters affecting Group's shares and the restructuring of Petro.

[40] By the latter part of October 1992, Grenon, with technical input from Pointer, and Petro's tax lawyer Olson, had developed a plan for the restructuring of Petro which involved, among other things, inserting a new company between Group and Petro, to hold Group's shares. Pointer and Grenon realized the plan would require the consent of the Bank of Montreal, so in October 1992, Pointer went to Toronto to meet with officials of the Bank. Pointer did not tell anyone at Group that he was going to the Bank with a proposal. The Bank expressed some interest in the ideas discussed, but doubted that the Group lenders, who held a pledge of Group's shares of Petro as security for Group's indebtedness to them, would agree.

[41] On November 5th, 1992, Pointer sent a follow up letter to the Bank (Ex. 30) confirming the details of the proposal but did not send a copy of the letter to Group. Instead he sent a memo to Chase on that day, enclosing copies of two letters from Olson, setting out the essence of the proposal, which, Pointer said in his memo to Chase, had been "tabled with the Bank of Montreal."

[42] The plan involved the insertion of a new company between Group and Petro which would hold Group's shares of Petro. Chase obtained the consent of the Group lenders (who held a pledge on Group's shares of Petro) to the change.

[43] On December 10th, 1992, Pointer attended a meeting of the Group Board of Directors seeking approval of the plan, as well as the Board's approval of a share option for himself and Savage. The idea of a share option was put off by the Board, but the plan was discussed. The Board authorized the acquisition of an off the shelf company which the Board understood would be wholly-owned by Group and would hold Group's shares of Petro as part of the plan of re-organization. Pointer led the Board to believe that if this was done immediately, so as to be completed before year end, it would result in a saving of $300,000 in Saskatchewan capital tax.

[44] Group's shares were then transferred to 542775 Alberta Ltd., which held Group's shares of Petro. Although 542 was a subsidiary of Group, Pointer had arranged that he and Savage would own a 10% minority interest in anticipation of obtaining the Group Board's approval of the share option plan (which, as we have seen, was deferred by the Board). In addition Pointer had set the company up so that he was the sole director and president. When Chase learned of this in late December 1992 or early January 1993, he directed Pointer to transfer the shares back to Group. Pointer saw to this, but only after Chase advised him it had better be done by the next meeting of the Group Board of Directors, or Pointer didn't have to bother showing up. The proposal to save Saskatchewan capital tax never materialized. Although Pointer knew that the Board of Directors of 542 was to mirror that of Petro, he did not complete this so that he remained the sole director and president of 542 for several months and, as we shall see, Pointer purported to use his false position as president and sole director of 542 to the disadvantage of Group.

[45] In the latter part of 1992, the Jim Pattison group of companies became the controlling shareholder of Group and Jim Pattison became a member of the Group Board. On December 31st, 1992, Larry Bell, who had been president of both Group and Petro, resigned his offices, and Nick Geer - a nominee of the Pattison Group of shareholders - became chairman of the Board and president of Group.

[46] As previously indicated, Group owned Westar Terminals Ltd., which in turn owned the shares of Westshore Industries Ltd. (Industries), a corporation which owned and operated a large coal terminal and seaport facility at Point Roberts, near Vancouver, B.C. The Preferred C shares of Industries were held by the Bank of Montreal as its security for the indebtedness of Group to the Bank, in the amount of $27 million. The combination of Group's debt to the Bank of Montreal, and its $300 million debt to the Group lenders, greatly exceeded the value of its assets and the Bank had no realistic hope of recovering its debt from Group. Both Group and the Bank regarded the Preferred C shares, which the Bank held as security, as having little or no intrinsic value. However, the directors of Group hoped to be able to restructure and refinance Group, and they regarded the acquisition of these shares from the Bank, and their cancellation, as fundamental to that plan. Because of the strained relationship between Group and the Bank of Montreal referred to earlier, the Bank was not prepared to readily give up the shares without extracting as much as possible from Group, despite their insignificant worth.

II. THE EVENTS OF 1993

[47] The plaintiffs, Grenon and Edwards, were former corporate lawyers who, through working with Peters & Co. as brokers, and participating in a number of ventures, had honed their skills as merchant bankers. They carried out their business activities in a loose and ill defined relationship, but in their dealings with Petro, Group and Stampeder they acted together, and their rights and liabilities are the same. They sometimes used the designation GE, or the name Colborne Capital Corporation (a private company which they controlled), as the entity which would carry out their investment activities. For the sake of convenience I will refer to the plaintiffs as Colborne. Grenon was the person mainly in charge of the plaintiffs' efforts to acquire an interest in group's shares of Petro.

[48] On January 18th, 1993, Grenon advised Pointer that he and Edwards had severed their connection with Peters & Co. and he proposed that they should participate in the restructuring of Petro by the introduction of capital in exchange for an equity position, and be involved as principals, rather than as agents. Pointer was interested in this and it was agreed that the first step should be for Pointer and Grenon to approach the Bank of Montreal in Toronto, and while in Toronto to discuss the proposition with Bookbinder and another director of Group, Brent Belzberg.

[49] Grenon's plan at this time was to negotiate with the Bank of Montreal to sell its debt and security position to Colborne at a substantial discount to its face value, and to acquire one half of the Bank's 49.9% option on Group's shares of Petro, for a nominal amount, on the basis that Colborne would inject capital into Petro which would enhance the Bank's security. He planned further to have Group transfer one half of its share in Petro to Colborne for a nominal amount so that Colborne would have a 50% equity in the company. Thereafter Colborne would use its expertise to restructure the company so as to obtain value for Petro's $100 million tax attributes, and then take the company public, in a corporate vehicle, the shares of which would be owned by Colborne, Group, the Bank of Montreal and the management team of Pointer and Savage.

[50] Pointer and Grenon went to Toronto on February 9th 1993 to meet with officials of the Bank of Montreal. Pointer took with him, and gave to the Bank, a copy of a letter from Grenon to Pointer dated February 8th (Tab 109) in which Grenon described the arrangements set out above which, he said, would be directed towards the "reincarnation" of Petro.

[51] The Bank officials expressed some general but conditional interest, but made it clear to Grenon and Pointer that the Bank would not look at a proposal until Colborne had obtained the approval of Group and came back with a specific proposal. Chase learned of Pointer's visit to the Bank from third party sources.

[52] Following the meeting, Embury and Konigsmann, who had attended the meeting as part of the Bank contingent, met with their superior Keith Lewis, who was the vice-president of the Bank's special accounts management unit. He had ultimate responsibility for Petro's account with the Bank. Lewis and the others reviewed Grenon's proposal and concluded that the only people who would be winning would be Colborne, and that there was nothing in it for the Bank. The discussion did, however, stimulate the Bank's interest in disposing of its security on Petro's assets, and its option interest in Group's shares, for cash. The Bank was not getting any interest on its loan and Lewis thought that if the Bank could convert a non-producing asset to cash, it would be wise to do so.

[53] Neither Lewis, nor the Bank, heard anything further from Colborne after the meeting of February 9th 1993, until July 2nd, an interval of almost five months.

[54] After the meeting with the Bank on February 9th, Grenon and Pointer met with Bookbinder and Belzberg, two directors of Group who resided in Toronto. They expressed interest in Grenon's proposal. Pointer told Bookbinder and Belzberg that he intended to come to the next directors' meeting of Group to present a proposal. Pointer knew there was to be a Board meeting of Group on February 24th 1993, and he thought this would provide an opportunity to get the approval of Group to a new proposal.

[55] On the return trip from Toronto, Grenon and Pointer discussed a more detailed proposal. During the course of their discussions, it became apparent that Grenon's idea was to sell off Petro's oil and gas assets, but to retain the tax losses to be used in a merger with a revenue company. Pointer opposed this and ultimately persuaded Grenon to go along with an approach that would see the tax losses internalized so as to keep Petro going as an operating oil and gas company. I am satisfied that Pointer's position was motivated by his concerns for his personal future. Grenon appeared to concede.

[56] In his discussions with Pointer, Grenon raised the concern that Colborne might do the work with respect to such a restructuring, and then be excluded from the transaction. In a letter to Pointer dated February 18th (Tab 114) Grenon stated (in part): "… we would like somehow to protect ourselves against the risk that we invest a lot of effort trying to get everything resolved only to find ourselves on the outside looking in …" The letter refers as well to the need to obtain the approval of Group, and the approval of the Bank of Montreal, to any proposal. The target date for Bank approval was March 23rd.

[57] During the two-week period following the visit to Toronto, Grenon, with input from Pointer and tax advice from Grenon's lawyer Alan Ross, of Bennett Jones Verchere, developed a tentative plan to be submitted to a meeting of the Board of Directors of Group, which was scheduled for February 24th. Pointer incorporated Grenon's plan in a document he prepared for Group entitled "Westar Petro Ltd. Corporate Strategy. New Equity Investment" (Tab 119), and dispatched it by fax to Pattison, Geer, and Chase on February 22nd, for their review prior to the Group Board meeting scheduled for February 24th.

[58] In the document Pointer said that Grenon planned to acquire from the Bank of Montreal its reducing term loan to Petro of $18.8 million, for $.5 million, on the basis that Colborne would contribute $1.5 million to Petro's assets thereby increasing the value of the Bank's security. Colborne would then be entitled to convert the term loan into a 49.9% ownership of the shares of Petro, following which the ownership of the shares of Petro would be: Colborne:– 49.9%; Group:– 22.6%; Bank of Montreal:– 22.5%; Management:– 5%. Petro would use the $1.5 million to acquire assets from major oil companies on a discounted basis by purchasing them without tax pools. By using its tax attributes, Petro would shelter its increased revenue from tax, thereby increasing the value of the company. Colborne would then take the company public.

[59] Pointer stated in the document that the Bank of Montreal would be willing to accommodate the plan, on terms which Pointer set out. This statement was an exaggeration of the level of the Bank's interest.

[60] The document set out a timetable that Grenon had suggested to Pointer in his letter of February 18th, and referred to Grenon's suggestion that there be a letter agreement between Petro and Colborne providing Colborne with an exclusive right to work on the equity investment for a period of time. The timetable extended to April 6th 1993.

[61] Chase reviewed the "New Equity Investment" document when he received it from Pointer on February 22nd. He questioned in his own mind the suggestion that there be an exclusive period, but thought if there was to be one it should be of short duration.

[62] Pointer attended in Vancouver on February 23rd, and met with the management committee of Group, prior to the Board meeting scheduled for the following day. There were present at the meeting Geer, the new president and chairman of the Board of Group, together with Chase, Bookbinder, Pointer and Savage. Pointer knew that there had been a shift of power on the Board and that Geer was now the key player.

[63] Pointer reviewed the new equity proposal with the meeting. The committee was generally interested in the proposal and Chase agreed that he would present it to the Board meeting the next day. The management committee recognized that the agreement of the Bank of Montreal was the key to any reorganization of Petro.

[64] The matter of a period of exclusivity for Colborne was discussed and Geer stated that he was not interested in such an arrangement unless he had a proposal prepared and presented by Colborne that met his approval. That ended the matter and the issue was not pursued further by Pointer.

[65] Chase prepared a memorandum with respect to the new equity proposal for the consideration of the members of the Board of Directors (Tab 121). In the memo Chase described in brief terms the new equity concept and stated: "Specifically, the management of Westar Petro would like to know if the Board would in principle support an idea which involved further dilution of Group's remaining 50.1% interest." Each board member also received a copy of the New Equity Investment document (Tab 119) in which Pointer had described the Grenon concept. On a slide which he prepared for presentation to the Board Chase described the concept as a "smaller equity in a bigger pie."

[66] Pointer made a brief presentation to the Board of Group on February 24th. The members expressed an interest in the New Equity concept, and Savage and Pointer were requested to bring back a specific proposal for consideration by the Board. It was clear that any proposal from Colborne would have to come to the Board of Group for consideration and approval, and that this should occur before any further approach was made by Pointer to the Bank of Montreal. It was made clear to Pointer that neither Geer nor the Board of Directors was prepared to give Colborne any period of exclusive negotiation, or a right of first refusal.

[67] The minutes of the Board of Directors meeting record the following:

> It was agreed that Mr. Geer, Mr. Bookbinder and Mr. Chase would review and confirm the estimated current value of Westar Petro Ltd. and that inquiries would be made to verify the credibility and reputation of the proposed investor. It was further agreed that Mr. Savage and Mr. Pointer would obtain a specific proposal for review by the Directors and, at the appropriate time, the Bank of Montreal.

[68] Following the meetings, Pointer and Chase had a private discussion in which they agreed that if it became necessary to provide a period of exclusivity to Colborne in order to retain their interest, it should be on terms that allowed Group to deal with any third parties, who came forward on their own initiative, seeking to do a transaction with respect to Petro, and in this context Chase told Pointer that two such parties were Focal Resources and Jeff Tonken of Stampeder Exploration Ltd. Chase asked Pointer to contact both Focal Resources and Stampeder.

[69] On his return from Vancouver, Pointer reported to Grenon his discussions with Group. He arranged to meet with Grenon on February 26th, and arranged to meet with Tonken, the president of Stampeder, on the same day.

[70] The background with respect to Stampeder's interest in Petro is that on February 22nd, Chase received a conference telephone call from Jeff Tonken and Bill Dickson, the president and vice-president of Stampeder, indicating that Stampeder was interested in acquiring Group's shares of Petro. Chase agreed to get back to Tonken after the Group Board meeting on February 24th.

[71] Stampeder's interest in Petro stemmed from the fact that the properties of the two companies in the Kindersley area of Saskatchewan were intermingled, and their operations were similar. Stampeder had acquired Allheart Resources, a company that held extensive interests in the Kindersley area, in October 1992, and had carried out a successful public financing of that purchase, which had caused Stampeder's shares, which were listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange, to rise substantially. In January 1993, Stampeder was looking for another acquisition.

[72] Stampeder did its banking with the Bank of Montreal in Calgary. In late January or early February 1993, Donald Archibald, who was in charge of resource based companies for the Bank, brought to Tonken's attention the fact that the Bank was interested in selling its debt and security position in Petro and that he had noticed that Stampeder and Petro had land holdings in the same area. Archibald inquired if Stampeder might be interested in acquiring the Bank's interest. Tonken indicated that he was interested. Archibald arranged for Tonken to speak with Embury, of the Bank's special accounts section, in Toronto.

[73] Tonken spoke with Embury in mid-February and learned from him the details of the Bank's security and option interest in Petro, including the fact that the Bank did not hold the shares of Petro as security, so it became evident to Tonken that Stampeder would have to buy the debt and share option from the Bank, and then buy the shares from Group.

[74] Tonken made a soft offer to the Bank of $28 million for its interest and gained the impression that the Bank would likely accept such an offer. He then telephoned Chase on February 22nd to indicate Stampeder's interest in purchasing Group's shares. Chase told him that he would get back to him after the Group Board meeting of February 24th. After the meeting Chase telephoned Tonken and asked him to contact Pointer to do a specific review of the company so as to be in a position to make an offer. Pointer called Tonken and a meeting was arranged for February 26th.

[75] Tonken and Dickson met with Pointer in the Petro offices on February 26th and Pointer gave them full and detailed information on all aspects of Petro's assets, land holdings, debt, staffing, tax attributes, cash flow, production, costs of production, and other details of the company in which Tonken was interested. Pointer subsequently sent Petro's land maps to Tonken. Tonken concluded that the acquisition of Petro would be very advantageous to Stampeder, and that such an acquisition would increase the value of its shares.

[76] Following this meeting Tonken met again with Embury to indicate that Stampeder intended to offer money to Group for its shares. Embury was unhappy with this. The Bank of Montreal had suffered very substantial losses at the hands of Group and was of the view that Group's shares were of little value because Petro's debts greatly exceeded it assets. The Bank was not prepared to see Group benefit, at the expense of the Bank, from any disposition of its shares of Petro. Tonken was able to persuade the Bank that in order to complete the transaction with the Bank, Stampeder was going to have to pay Group something of value for the shares and the Bank eventually agreed.

[77] On March 2nd Stampeder wrote to Group (Tab 131) offering 750,000 shares of Stampeder stock in exchange for Group's shares of Petro. At the same time, Tonken arranged to meet with Geer and Chase in Vancouver, on March 3rd.

[78] Tonken and Larry Shaw (Stampeder's chairman) met with Geer and Chase as arranged. Geer said that Group was not interested in Stampeder's offer of shares but would be interested in an offer for cash. Geer indicated that if Stampeder wished to pursue the purchase they should get back to Geer or Chase, and that Stampeder was free to contact Pointer for technical information.

[79] On March 15th, Stampeder sent a letter offering to purchase Group's shares of Petro for $2.25 million cash.

[80] After sending the offer, Tonken was in frequent communication with Chase but could get no definite response. Geer and Chase would only say that Group was considering a number of options and would get back to Tonken.

[81] The other options that Group was considering were firstly the Colborne proposal; and secondly, the possibility of recovering from the Bank of Montreal the Preferred C shares of Industries (referred to earlier), which the Bank held as security for Group's debt to the Bank.

[82] I return to the events concerning the Colborne proposal.

[83] On his return from Vancouver Pointer reported to Grenon what had occurred at the meetings with Group, and Chase's position that Group had to be free to consider offers from Stampeder and others. In the next few days, Pointer met frequently with Grenon while Grenon struggled with the problem as to how he could get something in writing with respect to a period of exclusivity. Grenon and Pointer had originally intended that the letter agreement that Grenon was drafting, which would include references to exclusivity and a right of first refusal, should be addressed to Group, but after discussing the matter with Pointer following his meetings with Group on February 23rd and 24th, they decided that the letter agreement should be addressed to Petro, and executed by Pointer. I am satisfied that they knew that if they addressed the proposed letter agreement to Group, as originally intended, it would be rejected, and that Grenon addressed the letter agreement to Petro in an attempt to draft his way around the difficulty that Group was not prepared to grant a period of exclusivity or a right of first refusal. Grenon did not send a copy of the letter agreement to Group, although it directly affected Group's shares.

[84] The letter agreement (Tab 127) was dated March 3rd, and was sent to Pointer on that day. By coincidence, Geer phoned Pointer on March 5th, to tell him that he was satisfied with the credentials of Colborne. Although Pointer had the March 3rd letter in his possession when Geer phoned (still unsigned), he made no reference to the letter or its subject matter in his conversation with Geer, although it was a letter agreement with Colborne that could have the effect of restricting Group's ability to deal with its shares. I believe Pointer deliberately kept the existence of the letter from Geer because he knew Geer would not allow him to sign it. Pointer signed the document after his conversation with Geer.

[85] I am also satisfied that Pointer did not send a copy of the March 3rd letter agreement to Chase. This was unusual because the record amply discloses that the consistent practice, on matters affecting Group's interests, was for Pointer to record everything in writing and to send copies to Chase. I find Pointer's failure to send a copy of the March 3rd letter agreement to Chase to have been a deliberate act on Pointer's part to keep this particular document from Group's attention. Pointer's equivocal evidence, when he is so positive on everything else, renders his credibility on this point suspect. When I couple these facts with Chase's positive testimony that the letter was never sent to him by Pointer nor disclosed or discussed with him until June 29th, I am reinforced in my view that Pointer deliberately kept the letter from Group to achieve his personal objectives as to how Group's shares should be dealt with.

[86] I also note that Pointer knew, when he signed the March 3rd letter agreement on March 5th, that Chase would be coming to Calgary to meet with him on March 9th. It is remarkable that he did not wait until he met with Chase before signing the letter, and it is worth noting as well, that he did not mention or discuss the letter with Chase at their March

9th meeting, or subsequently until the letter agreement was disclosed to Chase on June 29th.

[87] The key points in the March 3rd letter agreement (Tab 127) relative to exclusivity and a right of first refusal are:

– In the event Group Approval is obtained to the Restructuring plan:

• Colborne shall be granted an exclusive period of one month to obtain the approval of the Bank of Montreal;

• Colborne will be granted a right of first refusal to match any offer contemplating a restructuring;

• Prior to obtaining the approval of Group to a restructuring plan involving Colborne, Petro shall be free to meet with other parties to respond to enquiries about the potential for a restructuring involving them.

[88] The agreement was signed by Pointer without the approval of the Petro Board of Directors, and without having it reviewed by counsel, and no copy was provided to Savage, although he was a director and chief operating officer of the company.

[89] When he signed the document on March 5th, Pointer knew of Stampeder's interest in acquiring Group's shares. He had met with Tonken and Dickson on February 26th and he had received a copy of Stampeder's offer dated March 2nd. Pointer was meeting almost daily with Grenon during that period, and the inference is inescapable that he had kept Grenon fully informed as to Stampeder's offer to Group including the fact that Stampeder proposed to finance an acquisition of Group's shares by a public financing.

[90] Several things emerge from this sequence of events: Pointer attended the meetings of February 23rd and 24th to present the Grenon plan to Group and to obtain Group's instructions. The Board instructed Pointer to obtain a detailed proposal from Grenon for the Board's review and made it clear to Pointer that neither Geer nor the Board of Directors of Group was prepared to give Grenon an exclusive period, or a right of first refusal. In the face of this knowledge, Pointer entered into the March 3rd letter agreement, purporting to act on Petro's behalf. The March 3rd letter agreement was not the product of either the Petro Board or the Group Board, and was not revealed to Group by either Grenon or Pointer until the 29th of June. Despite this, it is the foundation upon which the plaintiffs seek to establish a right of first refusal with respect to Group's shares of Petro.

[91] Group, unaware of the March 3rd document, continued to be interested in the possibility of a transaction with Colborne. Geer and Chase arranged to meet with Grenon and Edwards in Calgary on March 9th, and at the conclusion of the meeting Geer encouraged Grenon to work with Pointer to prepare a detailed plan for the consideration of the Group Board. Neither Grenon nor Pointer referred to the March 3rd letter agreement during the meeting although it was a key document and had been executed by Grenon and Pointer just a few days previously. Although Chase made it clear to Grenon that Group was considering competing offers, neither Grenon nor Pointer raised the question of exclusivity or a right of first refusal.

[92] During the balance of the month of March, Grenon - with technical input from Pointer, and from his tax lawyer Alan Ross (of the firm of Bennett Jones Verchere) - developed a proposal to be presented to Group. The document is unsigned, but is dated March 30th, and is stated to have been prepared for Group by Murray Edwards and Jim Grenon or their nominee (herein "GE"). It has been referred to throughout the trial as "the March 30th Proposal" (Tab 151).

[93] The March 30th proposal is an ambiguous and confused document. It seeks "Group's approval in principle", and acknowledges that: "the precise legal structure can only be resolved after the Bank has agreed on Phase II." The proposal speaks of three "Phases" and acknowledges that "Phase III is not described at all …" It acknowledges that nothing can be accomplished without the co-operation of the Bank of Montreal, and states specifically that "… it is not proposed that any steps for Phase I (the negotiations between Group and Colborne to establish the terms of Colborne's involvement in the restructuring) be effected without first having obtained the approval of the Bank of Montreal for Phase II. It proposes a contribution of $1.5 million capital by GE "on condition that an agreement be reached with the Bank …" It proposes that Group's shares of Petro be redistributed: 50% to GE, 22.5% to Group, 22.5% to the Bank, and 5% to Pointer and Savage. There is no reference in the proposal to the March 3rd letter agreement nor is there any reference to a period of exclusivity or a right of first refusal.

[94] Geer and Chase reviewed the March 30th proposal (which they considered to be only an outline of an idea, or a discussion paper) and agreed to determine what actual value Colborne was placing on Group's shares. Chase passed this on to Pointer and on April 1st, Pointer faxed Chase stating that Colborne would make a cash offer for Group's shares. At the same time, Pointer arranged for Geer and Chase to meet with Grenon on April 7th, in Calgary.

[95] On April 5th, Grenon faxed a letter to Chase (Tab 158) to the effect that Colborne would be prepared to offer $2.5 million for Group's shares if a satisfactory arrangement could be made with the Bank of Montreal.

[96] Before dealing with Group's response to this, it will be helpful to return to a review of the progress of Stampeder in its negotiations with Group and the Bank of Montreal.

[97] In its letter of March 15th to Group (Tab 139), Stampeder proposed to purchase Group's shares of Petro for $2.25 million cash, and to negotiate with the Bank of Montreal to reduce Petro's debt to the Bank to approximately $30 million, which debt Stampeder would then assume, following which Stampeder would inject $15 million into an infill drilling program on Petro's properties.

[98] A few days after receipt of this offer from Stampeder, Chase told Grenon that Stampeder was aggressively pursuing the acquisition of Petro, and had made an offer to Group which was conditional on Stampeder making an arrangement with the Bank of Montreal.

[99] On March 22nd Tonken, and his counsel Williams, of Bennett Jones Verchere, met with Lewis, Embury and Konigsmann of the Bank of Montreal in Toronto. Tonken advised the Bank of the offers Stampeder had made to Group on March 2nd and March 15th. Tonken felt that by that time he had reached a "soft agreement" with the Bank - through his negotiations with Embury - to purchase the Bank's debt, security and the Bank's 49.9% option on Group's shares, and the purpose of the visit to Toronto was to meet with senior officials of the Bank, on a face to face basis. In addition, because Tonken had been unable to get a response from Chase following Stampeder's March 15th offer to Group, he wanted to discuss with the Bank what could be done to entice Group to sell its shares to Stampeder.

[100] On April 5 th, Tonken spoke again with Chase who arranged for Geer and Chase to meet with Tonken on April 7th (the day planned for Chase's meeting with Grenon) at Stampeder's offices in Calgary. On the day before the meeting, Tonken had made a verbal offer to the Bank of Montreal to pay the sum of $28 million cash for the Bank's debt and option interest in Petro, subject to Stampeder being able to purchase Group's shares. Tonken understood that Embury would recommend the acceptance of the offer. Tonken followed this with a written offer to the Bank in the same terms (Tab 164) dated April 8th. The Bank formally accepted Stampeder's offer on April 27th, and the transaction subsequently closed on that basis, on August 3rd.

[101] On April 7th Geer and Chase came to Calgary. They met first with Pointer and Savage, then with Tonken and Dickson of Stampeder, and following that with Grenon and Edwards.

[102] At the meeting with Pointer and Savage, both the Colborne and the Stampeder proposals were discussed. Geer told Pointer and Savage that the Bank was keen to do a deal with Stampeder and that it might be difficult to convince the Bank to deal with Colborne. Pointer and Savage were concerned that if the deal with Stampeder went through it would result in a merger and there would be no jobs for them, but that if the Colborne proposal to revitalize Petro materialized, their employment would continue. Both opposed very vehemently any transaction with Stampeder. After hearing from Pointer, Chase thought there was some possibility the Bank might be persuaded to consider a deal with Colborne.

[103] Geer and Chase then met with Tonken and Dickson. Dickson made an unconditional offer of $2 million cash for Group's shares. This was the first offer Group had ever received which was not made conditional on the offeror being able to make an arrangement with the Bank of Montreal relative to Petro's debt. The offer was subject only to due diligence requirements. Chase and Geer were interested, but were concerned that Stampeder might use the due diligence requirement as a means of backing out of its offer to Group, after obtaining Group's commitment, so Geer told Tonken he would get back to Stampeder with respect to its offer.

[104] Geer and Chase then met with Grenon and Edwards. There are differences of interpretation as to what occurred at the meeting. I find the facts to be that Geer and Chase told Grenon that they considered the March 30th proposal to be only a concept, and that they needed more details before a proposal would be considered by the Board of Group. They encouraged Colborne to move as quickly as possible to finalize a plan for Group's consideration, including a definite arrangement for dealing with the Bank of Montreal. They discussed the fact that Stampeder was dealing directly with the Bank. Geer and Chase indicated that they favoured the Colborne approach and left the meeting expecting to receive a more detailed proposal from Colborne. The March 3rd letter was not referred to by Grenon or Edwards, nor did they raise the matter of exclusivity, or a right of first refusal.

[105] The plaintiff Edwards says that he called Geer about two weeks after the April 7th meeting, and that Geer told him Group's approval would be forthcoming. Geer denies that he said that to Edwards. I prefer Geer's testimony on this point, particularly in view of the fact that the evidence of Edwards' partner, Grenon, is: "Mr. Edwards told me that he had phoned Mr. Geer … three or four days after the meeting and asked Mr. Geer to confirm that we had the approval and did not obtain that approval from him…"

[106] Sometime between April 5th and May 10th, Grenon arranged for Pointer to sign a document (Tab 443), which broadened the scope of the exclusivity and right of first refusal rights referred to in the March 3rd letter agreement. Pointer signed it without consultation with Chase, or Savage, or his Board of Directors, and he did not reveal the document to Group, despite the fact that he knew of Group's ongoing discussions with Stampeder, and the apparent preference of the Bank of Montreal to deal with Stampeder. The document is, surprisingly, undated. I am not prepared to make a finding as to when it was signed, other than to say it was prepared by Grenon and signed by Pointer at a time when Grenon thought he wanted it. The reasons given by Grenon for the creation of this document are incomprehensible and I am suspicious as to why and when this document came into existence other that to suit Grenon's purpose, which was to create a weapon to ensure that Colborne, and not Stampeder, ended up acquiring Group's interest in Petro.

[107] There were at least two reasons why Stampeder was having difficulty obtaining a definite response from Group to its March 15th offer. One was that Group was considering its position with respect to the Colborne offer which it preferred at that point, and the other was that Group was not prepared to make a deal with anyone (which would involve the Bank of Montreal) unless it reached an agreement with the Bank to recover the Preferred C shares of Westar Industries, which the Bank held as security for Group's indebtedness to the Bank in the sum of $27 million.

[108] I do not agree with the plaintiffs' suggestion that Group "sacrificed" Petro in order to recover these shares. Group had been negotiating with the Bank for the return of the shares ever since the bankruptcy of Westar Mining Ltd., in September, 1992. The Bank convened a meeting on January 12th 1993, to discuss a number of matters which remained outstanding from the bankruptcy. Chase attended on behalf of Group. One of the items discussed was the matter of the Preferred C shares. Chase expressed the view that the shares were valueless and that Group would like them returned as they were an impediment to an easy reorganization of Group. The Bank officials appeared to agree with Chase as to the value of the shares, but were not ready to give them up. The Bank had not forgiven Group for the enormous loss it sustained when Westar Mining Ltd. went bankrupt, and was not about to do Group any favours. Despite this Chase thought he saw a small window of co-operation developing with the Bank. In a memorandum to file (Ex. 128) Chase noted that continued cultivation of the relationship with the Bank would be required.

[109] On April 9th, Pointer received a phone call from Greg Wood of the Bank of Montreal asking for the Fairies Engineering reports on Petro's oil and gas reserves. Wood disclosed to Pointer that the reports were required to enable the Bank to assess an offer which the Bank had received from Stampeder. Pointer passed this information on to Chase. This was the first time either Chase or Pointer knew that Stampeder was dealing directly with the Bank and that the Bank was seriously considering the acceptance of Stampeder's offer.

[110] On April 12th, Chase had a meeting with Geer, where they discussed a number of items, including the matter of the Preferred C shares. Geer urged Chase to endeavour to bring the matter of the recovery of the shares to a conclusion. Geer was prepared to have Group pay cash to the Bank for the shares but he did not want the Bank to have any continuing involvement in the affairs of Group. Chase telephoned Horton of the Bank in Toronto, and a meeting was arranged for April 15th.

[111] During the course of the April 15th meeting, various officials of the Bank were called into Horton's office depending on the subject being discussed. On the subject of Petro, Embury told Chase that the Bank was considering an offer from Stampeder for its debt and option position, for a sum (which Chase gathered) was between $24 million and $30 million. Chase understood that if the offer was accepted, the Bank would be financing Stampeder's purchase prior to Stampeder going to the equity market. Chase told the Bank about Stampeder's offer to purchase Group's shares of Petro for $2 million. Embury was not happy with that because he considered that anything that went to Group for its shares of Petro (which were of negligible value) was really coming out of what the Bank would receive for its debt.

[112] Chase told Horton and Embury that although Group was considering the offer from Stampeder, it preferred the proposal made by Colborne. Chase explained the Colborne concept, and expressed the opinion that it was at least equal to the Stampeder offer, with an additional upside for the Bank, because the Bank would continue to hold shares of Petro which might go up in value after a re-organization. He urged the Bank to consider a presentation from Colborne. Horton indicated that the Bank was still evaluating the Stampeder offer, and that he would think about the Colborne concept.

[113] When it appeared to Chase that the Bank was seriously considering selling its debt and security interest in Petro (which from a practical standpoint could not readily be done without Group's co-operation), Chase suggested to the Bank the possibility of making the return of the Preferred C shares a condition of Group selling its shares to anyone. There was no immediate response to this suggestion and Chase was informed that the Bank was in the process of obtaining an independent evaluation of the Preferred C shares. Horton told Chase the Bank would get back to him on the various issues discussed at the April 15th meeting, during the following week.

[114] Chase called Horton on April 21st, and learned that Embury was recommending acceptance of the Stampeder offer to the senior officials of the Bank. Embury told Chase that the Stampeder offer required the purchase of Group's shares, and sought Group's co-operation. Chase indicated that if the Bank wanted Group's co-operation, Group would like some co-operation from the Bank on the Preferred C shares issue.

[115] Chase reported to Pointer and Grenon what had occurred at his meeting with the Bank, and told them that Stampeder had made an offer to the Bank in the $24 million to $30 million range. Grenon's response was that this information would allow Colborne to make a competitive offer to the Bank. Chase encouraged Grenon to make a definitive offer to Group and to the Bank. Chase made reference to the fact that Group was looking to the Bank for accommodation on another issue, by which he meant, without specifically identifying it, the issue of the Preferred C shares. Chase hoped that by holding off the Bank on the Preferred C issue, he could achieve an opportunity for Grenon to sell the Bank on the Colborne concept, and come up with a specific proposal that Group could consider.

[116] On April 27th, the Bank wrote to Pointer, with a copy to Chase, advising that it had accepted an offer from Stampeder for the Bank's debt and equity interest in Petro (Tab 175). The Bank had in fact accepted Stampeder's offer of $28 million cash on that day. In its letter to Chase, the Bank stated that it considered the issue of the Preferred C shares to be separate from the sale of Group's shares in Petro, but that the Bank was prepared to consider the Preferred C issue in due course, and stated that: "… it is in the best interest of Westar Group to fully examine the sale of Westar Petro to Stampeder Exploration Ltd."

[117] Geer and Chase were indignant about the Bank accepting the Stampeder offer without Group's consent, and resented the tone of the Bank's letter. Chase discussed the letters with Pointer.

[118] On April 28th, Pointer reported to Chase that Tonken had advised him that in order to finance the $28 million purchase of the Bank's interest, Stampeder intended to raise funds on the equity market, and that this would take about six to eight weeks to accomplish. I think it a fair inference that Pointer conveyed the same information to Grenon.

[119] On April 29th, the Bank of Montreal convened a meeting to discuss some 20 items remaining outstanding from the Westar Mining Ltd. bankruptcy. During the course of the meeting, Chase raised the matter of the Preferred C shares, and was informed that the Bank had engaged Ernst & Young to value the shares. The Bank gave Chase a list of additional information required by Ernst & Young in order to complete its evaluation. The Bank was not prepared to accept Group's attempt to tie the Preferred C shares issue to the Bank's desire to sell its Petro loan to Stampeder, and instead wanted to know how much Group would pay the Bank for the return of the shares. Nothing further developed at that time (Ex. 131).

[120] There was a further meeting with the Bank on May 13th, with respect to the Preferred C shares. The Bank was still upset about Group's suggestion that the sale of its Petro shares to anyone be tied to the return of the Preferred C shares. Chase asked why the Bank would not consider the plan proposed by Colborne, and continued to take the position that any transaction which involved dealing with Group's shares would be tied to the return of the Preferred C shares. Chase told the Bank that Group wouldn't consider selling its shares of Petro to anybody, "Stampeder, Colborne, or the man-in-the-moon", unless the Bank dealt with the Preferred C shares issue. The Bank indicated it would check Grenon's and Edwards' credentials and would see whether its commitment to Stampeder precluded their consideration of a Colborne proposal.

[121] Chase's memo of what took place at the May 13th meeting (Tab 192) records the fact that: "… we have two players competing for our interest in Westar Pete …" and the fact that: "The Colborne deal with Pete and the Bank is potentially much better for us", and concluded with the statement that:

> Current action by Westar (Group) includes:
> – Keeping both Colborne and Stampeder interested in doing a deal with Pete.
> – Assisting Colborne to get a foot in the door with the Bank.
> Current action by the Bank includes:
> – Consideration of whether Colborne will be allowed to pitch them.
> – Review of information provided relative to value of Industries.
> – An analysis of options available to them if we persist in our position of tying a Pete deal to a WIL deal.

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

[122] Chase kept Grenon aware of the fact that he was seeking an accommodation from the Bank. Grenon did not know the details of the accommodation, but Grenon's position was that the longer the accommodation issue remained unresolved, the longer Colborne would have to complete arrangements he was attempting to make with Trocana, a company with whom Grenon hoped to merge Petro. Chase emphasized to Grenon that it was the Bank that controlled the timetable, not Group, and told him that as soon as the Bank made up its mind on the accommodation issue, Group was going to have to move very quickly. He emphasized to Grenon that it was the Bank that would make the final decision between Stampeder and Colborne.

[123] The standoff between Group and the Bank with respect to the Preferred C shares issue (and hence the completion of any sale of the Bank's interest in Petro) continued throughout the month of May and into the month of June.

[124] As of June 8th, Stampeder was urging Group to accept its offer, and the Bank was still working on its valuation of the Preferred C shares. Grenon advised Chase that Colborne still needed two to three weeks to put a competing offer forward to the Bank, and he asked Chase to continue to stall the Stampeder deal. Chase again reminded Grenon that Group was not the stalling party and told him that as soon as the Bank made an arrangement with Group for the return of the Preferred C shares, Group would consider the Stampeder offer (Tab 208). It is worth recalling at this point, that the Bank had heard nothing at all from Colborne since the meeting with Grenon and Pointer on February 9th.

[125] When the Bank finally received its independent opinion as to the value of the Preferred C shares, Brannan, on behalf of the Bank, and Chase began negotiating a cash deal for the return of the Preferred C shares to Group, and ultimately, on June 18th, they agreed upon a figure of $500,000.

[126] Chase took the position with the Bank officials that the return of the Preferred C shares would have to be unconditional, irrevocable, and not dependent on the Bank completing the sale of its interest in Petro. He brought this to the attention of the Bank. On July 7th Embury confirmed that the Bank would agree to return the Preferred C shares on that basis.

[127] Despite this assurance from the Bank, Chase did not consider the Preferred C issue closed until he heard from Group's solicitor, Smith, on July 19th, that all matters had been agreed upon with the Bank's solicitor.

[128] I return now to a consideration of the events relative to the Colborne proposal following the April 7th meeting in Calgary between Chase, Geer, and Grenon.

[129] On May 10th, Grenon telephoned Chase to the effect that he needed approval from Group so that he could approach a Phase III candidate. After Chase spoke with Geer, he phoned back and told Grenon, "you have our approval." Grenon said he would like to follow that up with a letter and he did so. The letter was faxed to Chase, signed by him and returned to Grenon. This document has come to be known as the May 10th letter (Tab 186).

[130] The plaintiffs' contention is that this letter, coupled with the March 3rd letter, and the March 30th proposal, combine to entitle Colborne to a right of first refusal agreement in favour of the plaintiffs, which would allow Colborne the right to meet any competing offer for Group's shares. The thrust of the plaintiffs' submission is that the May 10th letter constituted the approval of Group to the Colborne proposal of March 30th, which "triggered" the right of first refusal rights referred to in the March 3rd letter agreement between Colborne and Petro. In my view the plaintiffs' position is not supported either by the evidence or an interpretation of the documents.

[131] The circumstances giving rise to the May 10th letter were that Chase had been pressing Pointer and Grenon to produce a definitive plan for consideration first by the management committee of Group and then, if the plan passed the management committee test, by the Board of Group. In particular, Chase had been pressing Grenon to develop a definite approach to the Bank of Montreal, whose concurrence would be required before any plan could proceed. Chase wanted a specific and detailed proposal from Grenon because he was endeavouring to have the Bank consider Colborne's plan despite the Bank's apparent intention to deal with Stampeder. On May 10th, Grenon told Chase that he would have to talk with an unidentified Phase III (takeover) candidate in order to develop a definite position. He said he wanted something in writing from Group to show such a candidate that Group was interested in dealing with Colborne. Chase agreed to sign a letter for that purpose, which Grenon said he would prepare.

[132] Grenon faxed a draft to Chase. Chase discussed it with Geer. Chase requested alterations in paras. i and iii. Grenon made the changes and the letter was signed by Chase and returned to Grenon on May 12th. The change to para. i removed a reference to Colborne dealing direct with Stampeder. The change to para. iii involved adding the words: "… provided that this restriction shall not apply in respect of a party with which Petro or Group is currently in active discussion with respect to a Restructuring."

[133] The May 10th letter referred to Grenon's discussions with Chase and the fact that Colborne was involved in negotiations "which may allow us to generate an offer for the Bank's position in Petro. We are hopeful that the offer will appeal to the Bank more than the current proposal that is in front of it (by which Grenon meant Stampeder) and that it will also be more attractive to Group." In the third paragraph the letter states: "However, with the alternative proposal currently in front of the Bank we are probably going to need much more of a final solution to get the Bank's approval". On p. 2, para. ii, Grenon says: "To the extent that Group or Petro does approve of any transactions that we may propose …" and in para. iii, "If Group or Petro does not approve of a transaction proposed by GE…"

[134] Given this language, and no matter what the balance of the letter may or may not say, it is difficult to comprehend how the plaintiffs can honestly have believed that Chase's signature on that letter constituted the approval by Group to a restructuring plan as referred to in the March 3rd letter agreement, or at all.

[135] Grenon knew that approval by Group meant approval by the Group Board of Directors. He knew further that no Colborne plan would ever get to the Group Board until he had satisfied Chase and Geer that Colborne had a plan that would satisfy the Bank of Montreal. Grenon knew that Colborne had made no approach whatsoever to the Bank since the conversation on February 9th.

[136] Chase was not aware of the March 3rd letter agreement and it was not referred to either in Grenon's conversation with Chase seeking the May 10th letter, nor in his conversations with Chase about the changes to para. iii, nor was it referred to at all in the May 10th letter which Grenon drafted and asked Chase to sign.

[137] If Grenon honestly expected that the May 10th letter was to constitute the approval of Group to the Colborne proposal, then he deceived Chase as to the purposes for which he was seeking the letter.

[138] From Chase's point of view, it is improbable that he would purport to execute an agreement approving a proposal from Colborne given the state of Group's negotiations with the Bank, and with Stampeder, at that point in time.

[139] I have referred to the fact that Chase faxed the May 10th letter to Geer who agreed that it should be signed. Geer's understanding was that the letter would allow Colborne to meet with a third party, and thereby expedite Colborne's efforts to present a definite proposal to Group. This was especially necessary because Chase had arranged to meet with officials of the Bank of Montreal in Toronto on May 13th, to discuss a number of issues, one of which was trying to get the Bank to listen to a proposal from Colborne.

[140] I am firmly of the view, based upon my interpretation of the document referred to, and the facts surrounding its creation, that the May 10th letter did not constitute Group's approval of a Colborne proposal for the restructuring of Petro as referred to in the March 3rd letter agreement, or at all. I am also of the view that Grenon knew that to be the case.

[141] A demonstration of this is a letter which Grenon wrote to Chase and Geer as late as June 4th, in which he states in part: "We will hopefully have a tentative proposal within two weeks, before which we will provide details of Target's asset base to Petro staff for their review." In Chase's memorandum to file dated June 8th, he records the fact that: "Colborne Capital (Jim Grenon) Need 2 to 3 weeks to put a competing offer forward to the Bank."

[142] I also note that despite the plaintiffs' attempt to portray the May 10th letter as a key document, neither Grenon nor Chase sent a copy to Pointer, or mentioned it to him, nor did Grenon proceed with the preparation of the right of first refusal, which under the March 3rd letter he was to be entitled to once Group approval was obtained. In fact, Pointer was unaware of the existence of the May 10th letter until June 29th when Grenon brought it to his attention for the first time.

[143] The day after Grenon received the May 10th letter, he met with John Halliwell, the President of Trocana, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Petro-Canada, and members of his staff (Sanders and Cheung) to explore details of a merger of Trocana with Petro. While Grenon had proposed to Group that Colborne would invest $1.5 million in Petro, in exchange for an equity position, so as to revitalize Petro, Grenon in fact intended to broker a merger of Petro with Trocana, which was interested in Petro's tax losses and resource pools, on such a basis that Trocana would put up the required funds, merge with Petro so as to acquire Petro's tax attributes, sell off the bulk of Petro's physical assets to pay the Bank, and provide Colborne with a substantial equity position in a merged company without Colborne investing anything other than Grenon's time.

[144] The attraction to Trocana was that it had projected oil and gas revenues of $40 million per year but no offsetting tax losses or resource pools. If it could get access to Petro's losses and pools by a merger, it could offset its taxable revenue for several years and thereby greatly enhance the market value of the merged company. Trocana was not interested in Petro's oil and gas properties, or other tangible assets, and planned to sell off 80% of them, if a deal was struck.

[145] It is true as well that Grenon's hopes were that Group, in exchange for its shares in Petro, would also have an equity in the merged company, and significantly, that Pointer and Savage would also end up with an equity position which, on the basis that Grenon was touting the deal, would have given Pointer an equity worth $650,000, with a considerable upside if the merged company was taken public and the market response was favourable. This potential for personal profit if the Colborne plan went ahead was well known to Pointer.

[146] Grenon's proposal to Trocana was that Group, Colborne and Petro management (Pointer and Savage) would together receive a 6.25% to 6.5% interest in the merged company which Grenon projected would have a value of $200 million. This would produce an equity interest worth $13 million (6.5% of $200 million), to be shared on the basis of 50% to Colborne, and 50% to Group, out of which Group would pay 10% to Pointer and Savage. Other variations of this proposed division were discussed, including Pointer's insistence that he and Savage should receive 10% of the projected $13 million, or $1.3 million, to be shared equally between them (Tab 223). The precise division was never resolved.

[147] Grenon's statement, in a letter which he wrote to Trocana on May 18th, is a revealing commentary as to the style of his negotiations up to that point. He says in para. 3: "Since GE has committed substantial effort and resources into manoeuvring Petro into a position where we believe a deal can be done …"

[148] Colborne's proposal to Trocana was highly speculative in that: (1) it required the approval of the management committee and the Board of Directors of Group, which had not been obtained; (2) it required an arrangement with the Bank of Montreal which had not yet been approached; (3) the Bank had, to Grenon's knowledge, agreed to accept an offer from Stampeder on April 27th, and notified Tonken, Pointer and Chase to that effect; (3) it required the approval of Trocana, which was never obtained; (4) it required the approval of the Board of Directors of Petro-Canada, which was never obtained; (5) it depended upon the merged company being able to use Petro's tax losses and resource pool to offset revenue, after selling off 80% of Petro's assets, which was a doubtful proposition which would have to meet the requirements of the Income Tax Act, as to which there was considerable risk.

[149] Colborne's negotiations with Trocana continued during the month of May and June and into July. Grenon's intention was to try and get a commitment from Trocana before approaching the Bank, so that Colborne would not have to put up any money.

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

[150] By about mid June, Grenon and Edwards, who were aware of the fact that Stampeder appeared to have the Bank tied up, began thinking about, and discussing with Halliwell of Trocana, the possibility of persuading Stampeder to purchase 85% of Petro's tangible assets. This would leave Petro's tax losses and pools for the Petro/Trocana merger; provide the funds to pay off the Bank; and resolve Grenon's concern that Stampeder had reached an arrangement with the Bank which might result in destroying Colborne's hopes for a profit of $6.5 million. From this point forward both Grenon and Edwards wanted to "cut a deal" with Stampeder.

[151] I return briefly to review the state of Stampeder's negotiations with the Bank and with Group.

[152] The Bank of Montreal accepted Stampeder's offer of $28 million cash, for the Bank's interest in Petro, on April 27th. The terms of the acceptance required Stampeder to provide the Bank with a deposit of $1 million (50% non-refundable) within 10 days of April 27th, and Stampeder was given until May 11th, to confirm that the terms were acceptable.

[153] When Stampeder's offer was accepted by the Bank on April 27th, Tonken arranged to obtain tax advice on the proposed transaction from Alan Ross, of Bennett Jones Verchere. A meeting was arranged for April 30th. It will be remembered that Ross had previously given Grenon tax advice with respect to Colborne's interest in acquiring an equity holding in Petro. The plaintiffs submit that Ross revealed to Stampeder confidential information which he had received from his client Grenon. That claim is dealt with herein, under a separate heading entitled: "The Plaintiffs' Claim v. Williams and Stampeder/Ricinus for Breach of Confidence."

[154] Very little transpired, insofar as Stampeder was concerned, from April 30th until Group reached its understanding with the Bank of Montreal with respect to the Preferred C shares on June 19th. On June 21st, Stampeder paid the sum of $500,000 to the Bank as a deposit on its purchase of the Bank's interest in Petro. Although the deposit was to be non-refundable with respect to the arrangement between Stampeder and the Bank, it was to be refunded if Stampeder was unable to purchase Group's shares.

[155] On the same day, June 21st, Pointer called Chase to describe the plan which Grenon was endeavouring to arrange with Trocana. He indicated Grenon wanted to talk with Stampeder to make a deal to sell Petro's assets to Stampeder, and he told Chase that Colborne was suggesting that it had some sort of a right of first refusal. Chase asked Pointer to look into this suggestion. I accept as a fact Chase's evidence that the first reference he heard to Colborne claiming a right of first refusal was when this discussion took place with Pointer in their telephone conversation on June 21st.

[156] I find this to be the case despite the plaintiffs' efforts to discredit the evidence of Chase through references to a previous statement at examination for discovery, and by calling the evidence of Leslie Peace, a handwriting expert, who gave opinion evidence with respect to an entry made by Chase in his diary (Ex. 130) with respect to Pointer's telephone call of June 21st. I reject Peace's opinion. His opinion was, to a significant extent, based upon infra-red photographs taken for him by Paul Birnie. In my view, Birnie was not sufficiently experienced in the field of infrared photography, to take, expose and print photographs of sufficient reliability to permit Peace to make the type of subtle examination required to support his opinion. Birnie did not follow the instructions that were given to him as to how the photos should be taken or exposed and printed and he did not use the copy stand recommended for this type of work. Furthermore I am satisfied that neither Peace, nor anyone else, could arrive at the conclusions he expressed, on the basis of what he observed. In short, I was not at all impressed with Peace's evidence, and I am not prepared to accept his opinion that the entries he examined in Chase's note book (Ex. 130) were made with a different writing instrument. Even if they were, I find that the impugned entries were validly made by Chase at the times he says they were.

[157] Tonken was having numerous phone calls with Chase but getting nowhere. Chase was encouraging Tonken to meet with Colborne to see if an arrangement could be made between them because Chase felt that the Colborne offer was better for Group than the Stampeder offer. Tonken refused to deal with Colborne and repeated to Chase that his information was that the Bank would not permit any transaction in which Group would receive more that $2 million for its shares. In order to try and break the log jam, Tonken arranged for a meeting in Calgary, on June 29th, between officials of the Bank, Group, and Stampeder. Lewis and Embury attended for the Bank. Lewis had specific instructions not to allow any transaction where Group would receive more than $2 million for its shares.

[158] During the course of the June 29th meeting, three positions evolved: Chase wanted the Bank to consider the Colborne plan, and was adamant that Group would not make a disposition of its shares to anyone without absolute assurance that it would recover the Preferred C shares from the Bank for $500,000, on an unconditional basis. Chase also was not prepared to take a chance on Stampeder's ability to raise funds on the equity market and took the position that any transaction Group might agree to with Stampeder would have to be on a cash for shares basis. Tonken was anxious to purchase Group's shares and get on with its public financing while the junior oil market was still hot. The Bank was committed to a deal with Stampeder and adamant that it would not allow any transaction to take place that would result in Group getting more than $2 million for its shares. Compromises were discussed and Chase appeared to be about ready (without making a commitment) to recommend to the Board of Directors of Group that the company sell its shares to Stampeder. Chase agreed to bring Pointer to a meeting that afternoon to provide further technical information to Stampeder.

[159] Chase then left the meeting with Stampeder and the Bank, and met with Pointer and Savage. They were disappointed to learn that a deal with Stampeder was a distinct possibility. They were of the view that they had a better opportunity to continue operating the company under the Colborne plan. Chase asked Pointer if he had learned anything more about Grenon's assertion that Colborne had a right of first refusal. Pointer mentioned the March 3rd letter to Chase for the first time, but said it was just a letter that laid out the working relationship between the parties. Chase asked Pointer to send him a copy of the March 3rd letter to him in Vancouver, which Pointer did on June 30th.

[160] Later in the afternoon of the same day (June 29th), Chase brought Pointer to meet with Lewis and Embury in an effort to persuade the Bank to consider a proposal from Colborne, but the Bank officials simply reiterated their position that the Bank would not agree to any transaction that would result in Group getting more than $2 million for its shares. Furthermore, Lewis pointed out that Colborne had not made an offer, and that the Bank was, in any event, committed to deal with Stampeder.

[161] During the course of the afternoon of June 29th, Chase and Pointer met with Tonken and Brockway, and Pointer provided detailed information with respect to tax losses and resource pools, infill drilling programs, and other technical information which Stampeder required about Petro. Tonken recognized that Chase had not made any commitment to Stampeder with respect to the sale of Group's shares to Stampeder at that point.

[162] There was no discussion at the meetings with Stampeder and the officials of the Bank, on June 29th, about any right of first refusal, nor did Pointer at any time raise the March 3rd letter agreement with Chase, Stampeder or the Bank as something that might prevent Group from completing a sale of its shares to Stampeder, if it should decide to do so.

[163] Later in the day on June 29th, Chase and Pointer met with Grenon, and described to him what had taken place at the meeting with Stampeder and the Bank officials, including the fact that the Bank was refusing to consider an offer from Colborne. Chase, Pointer and Grenon discussed how they might persuade the Bank to change its mind and agreed that Colborne should send a written offer to the Bank.

[164] On the following day, Pointer telephoned Grenon to encourage him to send an offer to the Bank quickly. Grenon responded by saying: "Why should I hurry, I'll just rely on the right of first refusal," and referred to the March 3rd letter agreement, claiming that a right of first refusal had been created when Chase signed the May 10th letter. Pointer asked Grenon to send him a copy of the May 10th letter, which he did. Pointer's evidence is that when he read the May 10th letter he concluded that Colborne was entitled to a right of first refusal under the terms of the March 3rd letter agreement. Pointer telephoned to discuss this with Chase. Chase asked Pointer again to send him a copy of the March 3rd letter, which Pointer did on June 30th.

[165] I am satisfied that from this point forward, Pointer saw the possibility of relying on Grenon's claim to a right of first refusal as an opportunity to advance his own interests. Thereafter, Pointer was prepared to, and did sign in Petro's name, anything suggested by Grenon that might advance the Colborne proposal and defeat Stampeder's endeavours to close its deal with the Bank, and purchase Group's share.

[166] It was apparent to Grenon, when he met with Pointer and Chase on June 29th, that Chase was under very great pressure from the Bank to conclude a deal with Stampeder. Grenon telephoned Edwards after the meeting, and on the following morning Edwards telephoned Tonken to suggest that Stampeder, Colborne, and Group make a deal, under which Stampeder would acquire the oil and gas properties of Petro, and Colborne would acquire the tax attributes. Tonken said that Stampeder preferred to do the deal on its own. I accept Tonken's evidence that Edwards made no reference to any alleged rights of first refusal in his conversation with Tonken. Edwards reported the results of the conversation to Grenon, and told Grenon to deal with it.

[167] On the afternoon of June 30th, Grenon faxed a letter to Tonken (Tab 243) proposing an arrangement under which Stampeder would acquire most of the resource properties of Petro, and Colborne receive most of the tax deductions. In the letter, Grenon said, in part: "If we do not come to such an agreement, it is my belief that there is a significant risk that the acquisition will get more expensive for the successful party, whomever that may be." Grenon also stated: "You may not be aware of this, but we have been granted a right of first refusal to effect any restructuring that Group/Petro wishes to enter. Certainly we would exercise that right of first refusal for the transaction you currently propose." I accept Tonken's evidence that this was the first he had heard about an alleged right of first refusal.

[168] Tonken responded, requesting a copy of the right of first refusal, but on July 1st, Grenon replied stating in part: "We are not prepared to provide the details of our right of first refusal." Stampeder continued its negotiations with Group.

[169] On June 30th, Grenon had contacted Alan Ross, of Bennett Jones Verchere, who arranged for Grenon to meet with Yorke-Slader, a litigation lawyer in that firm. Yorke-Slader examined the March 3rd letter, the March 30th proposal, the May 10th letter and other correspondence and discussed the circumstances with Grenon. Yorke-Slader told Grenon that the documents did not justify an application for an interim injunction.

[170] Following his meeting with Yorke-Slader, Grenon prepared, and had Pointer sign, a letter (Tab 255), which stated that the May 10th letter "… constitutes the approval of Group to the Restructuring plan presented to Group by Colborne as required by the March 3, 1993 letter to Westar Petro Ltd. from Colborne, such that certain terms and conditions that commence to operate on such approval are now in effect." Pointer signed the letter without consulting either Group, or the Board of Directors of Petro.

[171] In my view, the creation of this letter, and its execution by Pointer on July 2nd, was a major step in a plan of deception devised by Grenon and Pointer, to force Stampeder into a position where it would make a deal to turn over the Petro tax losses and pools to Colborne.

[172] On July 2nd, Grenon also wrote to Chase asserting a right of first refusal. Grenon wrote in part:

> To the extent anyone attempts to conclude a restructuring without regard to our right of first refusal, we will be seeking an injunction, launching a lawsuit, etc. I can only speculate how the Bank and the potential money raisers for Stampeder might react to this. Even a relatively short delay, which is about the worst we can expect to achieve, may see the currently over-heated equity markets cool to the extent that Stampeder can't raise the money it needs.

[173] This letter forecasts precisely the course of action the plaintiffs followed and discloses as well their true motives in launching a lawsuit, that is to make it difficult for Stampeder to raise the money it required on the equity market.

[174] Chase replied to the letter, denying the existence of a right of first refusal.

[175] On July 2nd, Colborne also, for the first time, made an offer to the Bank of Montreal offering to pay the Bank 28 M for the Bank's interest in Petro. The Bank replied stating: "We note your offer expires July 30/93".

[176] On July 5th, Grenon met with Geer and Chase in Vancouver. Geer demanded that Grenon retract the assertion that Colborne had a right of first refusal, and that he do so formally, and in writing. Grenon agreed to do so, and wrote a letter of retraction to Group on the following day (Tab 264). Geer told Grenon that Group was still waiting for a definitive proposal from Colborne that could be considered by the Group Board. On July 7th, Grenon wrote to Group referring to a cash offer for Group's shares, but stating that it was subject to the condition that "… this is not a binding offer." Geer considered the revised offer vague and unspecific and not something that he could take to his Board and Chase communicated this to Grenon by telephone on July 8th.

[177] On July 10th, Grenon, following a suggestion made by Yorke-Slader, prepared what became the first of many versions of a "Statement of Facts" which Grenon drafted and Pointer signed. Each draft referred to "the attached right of first refusal" although there was no such document either attached or in existence. The first draft of the "Statement of Facts" signed by Pointer (Tab 278) had in it a final sentence, in which Pointer said (with reference to a right of first refusal agreement): "… I do not feel I should execute such agreement without the approval of Group, which approval I am sure will not be forthcoming." When Yorke-Slader saw this "Statement of Facts", he suggested to Grenon that the words I have quoted above be removed, and they were.

[178] Yorke-Slader also suggested that a right of first refusal document be prepared and suggested that Grenon contact Bruce Libin, a member of the Bennett Jones Verchere firm, for assistance. Grenon met with Libin on July 12th, and thereafter they worked together almost daily to create documents, which Pointer willingly signed, designed to force Stampeder into a position where it would have to make an arrangement with Colborne. All of this was done secretly by Grenon, Libin and Pointer, without the knowledge of Chase or Geer, or the Board of Directors of Petro.

[179] A new "Statement of Facts" was prepared by Grenon, deleting the final words I have referred to, and it too was signed by Pointer. Later a third version was signed by Pointer. When Libin first saw it he asked Grenon if he had offered Pointer anything to sign it, because it seemed to him that Pointer was "acting against the wishes of his corporate bosses". Grenon said he had not but that Pointer knew that if the Stampeder deal went through, Pointer would lose his job.

[180] Libin's notes of his first meeting with Grenon on July 12th, disclose what Grenon was intending to achieve. Grenon wanted Libin to create a right of refusal document between Petro and Colborne that would be broad enough to encompass everyone (Petro, 542, Group and Stampeder), and everything (any transaction in Group's shares), and he wanted it to be a tough agreement. He wanted provisions that would prevent the agreement from being disclosed to Stampeder or to Group or to the Bank or to the other directors of Petro. He wanted an agreement that would be a "poison pill" to anyone other than Colborne. He wanted the agreement to "demonstrate" that Group had approved Colborne's proposal.

[181] Libin recognized that the right of first refusal document he and Grenon drafted for Pointer's signature went beyond anything referred to in the March 3rd letter (which spoke only of a right to match a restructuring offer), in that the right of first refusal agreement was drafted so as to have application to a sale of Group's shares.

[182] Libin had never before, in his considerable corporate experience, drafted a document to be signed by the director of a corporation, where the director was prohibited from revealing the document to his corporation, or to his fellow directors, but he did so on this occasion.

[183] In addition, Libin's notes of his discussions with Grenon (Tab 279) reveal that Grenon's view was that: "we have enough to screw the Stampeder deal", and that the idea should be to "build the arsenal, then negotiate", with Stampeder.

[184] Several versions of a right of first refusal agreement between Petro and Colborne were prepared by Libin and massaged by Grenon. In an early draft the concept that Colborne would make a contribution of capital to Petro and that the purpose of the restructuring should be the rejuvenation of Petro (as per the March 3rd letter) was included, but these references were subsequently removed by Grenon, and did not find their way into the final draft. A provision was added which would render Petro liable to Colborne in the sum of $17 million as liquidated damages. Although the right of first refusal agreement was between Colborne and Petro, it was drafted in such a way that a breach could occur, by the actions of Group, Stampeder, or the Bank, parties over whom Petro had no control.

[185] While this drafting was going on, Grenon was attempting to negotiate a transaction with Trocana which would have seen Petro merged with Trocana, and the oil and gas assets of Petro sold off.

[186] On Libin's suggestion, Pointer sought the advice of Reid, a lawyer with whom Pointer had worked closely, as to his position in signing such a document. Reid advised him strongly not to sign it, but Pointer ignored Reid's advice, and persisted in signing the document. He also ignored Reid's advice to the effect that if Pointer insisted on signing it, the document should be authorized by a resolution of the Petro Board of Directors.

[187] While these statements and documents were in the process of preparation, Grenon had a discussion with Chase in which Chase suggested that Colborne should increase its offer to the Bank, and on July 14th Grenon sent two offers to the Bank of Montreal (Tab 288). The one increased Colborne's July 2nd offer of $28 million to $29 million, and the other was an offer to pay the Bank $500,000 for the release of "the accommodation" (the Preferred C shares) to Group. The Bank replied on the following day stating that it was unable to consider the offers at this time.

[188] Grenon at no time revealed to Chase or to the Bank the fact that he, Pointer and Libin were in the process of preparing the right of first refusal and unanimous shareholder documents I have referred to.

[189] Ultimately, on July 21st, three copies of the right of first refusal agreement (Tab 276) were prepared, and each was signed by Pointer as an original. One bore the date May 10th (which was totally misleading), one bore the date July 21st and a third was left undated, to be filled in with whatever date should later prove to be most useful from Colborne's standpoint.

[190] A further document was prepared by Grenon and signed by Pointer on July 21st. It purports to be a letter agreement between Petro and Colborne to the effect that if the Colborne proposal cannot be completed "… because of the failure of the Bank to cooperate and provided that no other Proposal is completed, then Westar Petro Ltd. shall not be liable to any damages which would otherwise arise from such noncompletion."

[191] On July 22nd, Grenon prepared and had Pointer sign a document purporting to be a resolution of the Board of Directors of 542 (Tab 311). The document purports to give Pointer, among other things, the widest possible powers to enter into agreements with Colborne. This document was prepared by Grenon, in his office (without the knowledge of Libin), signed on July 22nd, although stated to refer to a one-man meeting of Pointer on July 14th (which I believe to be a fiction), and was not revealed to Libin, or to Group, or to the directors of Petro. Pointer well knew that the directors of 542 were in fact, if not in form, the same as the directors of Petro, namely: Chase, Savage and Pointer.

[192] On July 25th, Grenon gave instructions to Libin to draft a unanimous shareholders agreement between 542 and Colborne. Libin doubted that Pointer would sign such an agreement but Grenon assured him Pointer would. Libin drafted a unanimous shareholders agreement and a resolution of 542 purporting to authorize "any director" to execute it. Pointer signed the resolution on July 27th, as "the sole director of 542" and purported to sign the unanimous shareholders agreement on behalf of 542 (Tab 321).

[193] The unanimous shareholders document purported to prohibit Petro from furthering any proposal (a term so defined as to be wide enough to include a sale of Group's shares to Stampeder) without the consent of Colborne, and to give Colborne the right to appoint one of two directors of Petro so as to stalemate the Board. The USA contained a paragraph prohibiting the disclosure of the document "to any person, including the directors, officers, employees, agents, financial or professional advisors and legal counsel and advisors to the shareholders of Petro". The document is replete with conditions which purport to affect "the shareholders of Petro" which, of course, was Group, the sole shareholder of 542. The agreement and resolution were signed on July 27th, but Grenon had three originals signed, one as of May 10th, one as of July 24th and one with the date blank. All three were signed as originals by Pointer.

[194] The various statements of fact, rights of first refusal, unanimous shareholder agreement and accompanying resolutions, were all prepared and kept secret by Grenon and Pointer. Pointer at no time consulted with Chase or Geer or with the Bank of Montreal, nor did he ever call a meeting of the Petro Board of Directors nor the 542 Board of Directors.

[195] I am firmly of the view that these were not agreements or resolutions in any true sense, that is, the honest recording of genuine agreements between the parties, nor were the resolutions the honest expression of corporate intent. Rather, they were concoctions falsely created by Grenon and Pointer in a benighted and devious effort to force Stampeder to deal with Colborne on Grenon's terms. The documents were not to be revealed to Stampeder until it had completed its purchase of Group's shares, at which point Grenon planned to bring Stampeder to heel by springing on them the right of first refusal and the unanimous shareholders agreement. (Libin and Grenon's so called "nuclear arsenal".)

[196] Grenon knew by July 30th, that Stampeder intended to sign - on August 3rd - agreements to purchase Group's shares and the Petro debt from the Bank. He knew that on that date, Stampeder would commit itself to the expenditure of millions of dollars without any knowledge of the right of first refusal or the unanimous shareholders agreement. And he knew further that Stampeder was relying on being able to complete a successful public offering of shares based upon the acquisition.

[197] The plan which Grenon evolved with Libin was that the existence of the right of first refusal and unanimous shareholder agreements would not be revealed to Stampeder until it had completed the execution of the purchase documents. Grenon gave strict instructions to Pointer and to Libin that the documents were not to be revealed to Stampeder, or anyone else, until he gave the word to do so. His instructions were that the documents were not to be disclosed until after Stampeder closed its transactions with Group and the Bank, and was "fully in the snare."

[198] Under these circumstances Grenon faxed a letter to Stampeder on July 30th (Tab 356) in which he stated that Colborne was aware of the imminent closing of Stampeder's purchase of the shares of Petro. He said Colborne had decided not to bid up the price for the shares, and that: "We are hopeful that you will meet with us shortly after closing the Petro acquisition to discuss a prospective transaction with us involving Petro," and concluded with the statement: "I look forward to being able to present our proposal to you after you have closed your transaction with Group" (Emphasis mine).

[199] I am satisfied that this letter was intended by Grenon to lure Stampeder into completing the transaction, after which Grenon intended to spring the trap and display his "nuclear arsenal" in an attempt to force Stampeder into making a deal with Colborne.

[200] When Yorke-Slader and Libin saw the July 30th letter to Stampeder, they told Grenon they thought it could constitute a waiver of any rights Colborne may have had, and that the letter should not have gone to Stampeder.

[201] As a result of this advice, and after furious drafting and redrafting, Grenon sent a further letter to Stampeder on August 3rd, purporting to retract the letter of July 30th.

[202] Neither the July 30th nor the August 3rd letters to Stampeder made any reference to the right of first refusal and unanimous shareholder agreements which Grenon (with Pointer's concurrence) had designed with the specific intent to put Stampeder in a position where, on completion of the purchase, Stampeder would find itself with an obligation to pay Colborne $17 million liquidated damages (Grenon's poison pill).

[203] The Group, Bank of Montreal, Stampeder transaction closed on August 3rd. Stampeder purchased Group's shares of Petro for $2 million, and acquired the Bank's interest in Petro for $28 million, both in cash.

[204] One of the terms of the sale of Group's shares to Stampeder was that Pointer and Savage should each receive, at closing, a severance payment in the amount of $175,000, and $225,000 respectively, and a further sum of $100,000 in settlement of a right to share in any value received for Group's shares in Petro. Pointer made Grenon aware of this entitlement and sought to make certain that he obtained payment before Group and Stampeder learned that he had signed the right of first refusal and unanimous shareholder agreements.

[205] On August 3rd, Grenon agreed that Stampeder should not be told of the agreements until after Pointer got his money.

[206] Grenon further discussed with Libin on that day the deal they would try to have Stampeder make with Colborne. The strategy Grenon intended to use was to have a firm of solicitors commence legal action against Stampeder, but at the same time, Libin would act as a "good guy" and offer to deal with Stampeder. They discussed the fact that commencement of legal action against Stampeder seeking to set aside Stampeder's acquisition of Petro would "block the investment dealers", who Grenon knew Stampeder would be approaching to do its equity financing. The Statement of Claim (which is the subject of this action) was issued on August 3rd but not served until some days later.

[207] When the Group, Bank, Stampeder transaction closed on August 3rd, Pointer received a cheque for $87,500, being one half of his severance pay. Despite Pointer's attempt to arrange for immediate payment of the entire sum, the balance was held back by Stampeder pursuant to its right to have Pointer's services for the period until the completion of 30 days after closing. In addition, Pointer had arranged with Group that he would be paid the sum of $100,000 for his "share" on August 6th, and he informed Grenon of this. Grenon agreed to wait until that date to notify Stampeder of the existence of the agreements. At 3:45 on that day Grenon gave instructions to Libin to call Williams, of Stampeder, but to give him only the unanimous shareholders agreement.

[208] On the same day, that is, August 6th, Colborne issued a press release (Tab 398) aimed at the investment community announcing that Colborne was "in the process of filing a lawsuit against Stampeder Exploration Ltd. (Stampeder) seeking to terminate the transaction recently announced by Stampeder concerning the acquisition of shares of an unnamed private company or seeking damages in the alternative." There is no doubt in my mind that the plaintiffs' intent, in filing the statement of claim and issuing the press release to announce that fact, was to block Stampeder's ability to raise the funds from the investing community that it needed to complete the purchase, as a means of forcing Stampeder to make a deal with Colborne.

[209] Again on August 6th, on Grenon's instructions, Libin telephoned Peter Williams, who was now the vice-president of Stampeder. He asked Williams if he had seen the Statement of Claim. Williams replied that he had not seen the Statement of Claim but that he had seen the press release. Libin told Williams that Stampeder would be better off making a deal with Colborne rather than allow the matter to be dealt with in the courts. Williams refused to deal with Libin telling him: "This reeks of devious action."

[210] Again on August 6th, Grenon had his solicitors, Blake, Cassels & Graydon, write to Stampeder's solicitors, Howard Mackie, enclosing a copy of the unanimous shareholder agreement and demanding that the Board of Petro be reconstituted to consist of one director appointed by Colborne and one appointed by Petro.

[211] On August 7th, James Surbey, a lawyer with Howard Mackie, telephoned Libin and asked for a copy of the right of first refusal agreement. Libin refused, saying he had no authority from Grenon to release it, but, Libin said, there was still a deal to be done. Surbey's reply was: "How can there be a settlement in a matter that constitutes fraud?" and he hung up the telephone. Later in the day Pointer spoke with Grenon by telephone and it was agreed that the right of first refusal document should now be shown to Stampeder. Pointer then produced the unanimous shareholder and right of first refusal agreements from his locked briefcase and gave them to Williams, the vice-president of Stampeder.

[212] Stampeder continued to refuse to be driven to a deal with Colborne and this lawsuit proceeded.

[213] Several weeks after the lawsuit was commenced Colborne agreed to pay Pointer's legal fees.

III. LEGAL ANALYSIS

1. The Plaintiffs' Claim v. Group, 542 and Petro

[214] The plaintiffs' claim against these defendants is based upon two assertions: Firstly, that Colborne acquired a right of first refusal to Group's shares by entering into a right of first refusal agreement with Petro. Secondly, that Group and Stampeder conspired to interfere with a contractual right, or economic interest that Colborne had acquired in Group's shares. I do not agree with either assertion for the following reasons:

(a) Only Group had the power to grant a right of first refusal with respect to its shares

[215] The shares of Petro were registered in the name of 542, and were beneficially owned by Group. They were not owned by, nor were they the property of, Petro. Group itself did not at any time execute a right of first refusal agreement, nor did 542. Counsel for the plaintiffs asserts that through their business dealings with Group, Petro, and 542, the plaintiffs "achieved" or "earned" a right of first refusal.

[216] Short of some statutory right, which is not asserted here, the law proceeds upon the basis that rights with respect to property are acquired by entering into an agreement with the owner.

[217] The law recognizes a legal ownership in shares as property which can be bought and sold. No one other than Group had the right to enter into an agreement which would interfere with Group's right to dispose of its property. Neither Group nor 542 executed a right of first refusal agreement nor any other documents which constituted the granting of such a right.

[218] The only other legal entities that had an interest in or right to the Petro shares were the Bank of Montreal, which held both a 49.9% equity option on the shares and, through its debt security, a de facto veto in respect of the transfer of those shares, and the Group lenders, to whom Group had pledged the shares. The plaintiffs had no agreement with the Bank or the Group lenders.

[219] The only form of agreement between the plaintiffs and Group was the May 10th letter (Tab 186) which makes no reference to Group's shares and does not grant a right of first refusal affecting those shares. The only restriction the letter places upon Group's actions is found in the paragraph numbered iii, which states:

> If Group or Petro does not approve of a transaction proposed by GE, Petro and Group shall be precluded from pursuing a Restructuring with the party involved in GE's proposed transaction for a period of two years, unless GE approves, provided that this restriction shall not apply in respect of a party with which Petro or Group is currently in active discussions with respect to a Restructuring.

[220] The transaction referred to was the plaintiffs' attempts to merge Petro with Trocana, and the plaintiffs do not claim a breach of that provision.

[221] Group, to the knowledge of the plaintiffs, was negotiating with Stampeder at that time.

(b) Plaintiffs' actual knowledge of Petro's lack of authority

[222] The plaintiffs submit that Pointer had actual or ostensible authority to commit Group to a right of first refusal agreement and that he did so when he entered into the March 3rd letter agreement between Petro and Colborne (Tab 135), one of the provisions of which was:

> 2. In the event Group Approval is obtained to the Restructuring plan: ii. Colborne will be granted a right of first refusal (the "Right of First Refusal") to match any offer or > agreement in principal contemplating a restructuring which Petro proposes to accept within three months of the Exclusive Period. The detail of this Right of First Refusal shall be further elaborated in a Right of First Refusal Agreement to be prepared by Colborne for the approval of Petro.

[223] I do not accept the plaintiffs' submissions with respect to either the interpretation of this document or its legal effect.

[224] Firstly, the right to match any offer contemplating a "restructuring" of Petro does not include a sale by Group of its shares. The term "restructuring", as it was used in the March 3rd letter agreement, meant an internal revamping and refinancing of Petro by an injection of capital, so as to revitalize the company. The plaintiffs drafted the words used, and, if there is any doubt about their meaning, that doubt should be resolved against the plaintiffs.

[225] Furthermore, a right to match any offer contemplating a restructuring of Petro, as contemplated in the March 3rd letter agreement, did not envision the type of right of first refusal agreement Libin and Grenon drafted and had Pointer sign in July. The July document was, in my view, drafted with one specific purpose in mind, that is, to cover Group's proposed sale of its shares to Stampeder, and to load Petro, and hence the purchase of Group's shares, with a $17 million obligation in liquidated damages when the sale went through. That was neither the intent nor the effect of the words used to describe the right of first refusal contemplated in the March 3rd letter agreement.

[226] Even if the term "restructure", as used in the March 3rd letter agreement, was to be interpreted so that a sale by Group of its shares would trigger a right of first refusal, the document is, in my view, without effect because Pointer had no authority to have Petro enter into a right of first refusal agreement concerning Group's shares and Grenon knew this to be the case.

[227] In any event, the plaintiffs' submission that Pointer was entitled to have Petro enter into an agreement enabling Colborne to demand a right of first refusal agreement, hinges upon the plaintiffs' ability to satisfy the court on each of a staged sequence of events:

1) That Pointer had actual or ostensible authority from Group, on March 3rd, to have Petro provide Colborne with a right of first refusal on Group's shares;

2) If so, that Group had approved a Colborne plan to restructure Petro, which was a fundamental condition that had to be satisfied - as set out in the March 3rd letter agreement - before Colborne would be entitled to a right of first refusal;

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

3) If so, that Pointer had authority to have Petro enter into a right of first refusal agreement in late July, without Group's knowledge or consent, which would give Colborne the right to purchase Group's shares, when Pointer knew that Group had agreed to sell its shares to Stampeder;

4) If so, that Pointer had the authority to have 542 (a company wholly-owned and controlled by Group) enter into a unanimous shareholders agreement with Colborne requiring 542 to enforce the right of first refusal agreement.

The plaintiffs have not satisfied me on any of these matters.

[228] I am satisfied that Pointer had no authority - actual or ostensible - to have Petro enter into an agreement granting Colborne a right of first refusal affecting Group's rights to dispose of its shares of Petro. Such an action was contrary to the explicit instructions Pointer received from the Group management committee on February 23rd, and the Board of Directors of Group on the following day. Pointer was told that Group was not prepared to grant Colborne any period of exclusivity nor a right of first refusal. Pointer's only role was to bring back a proposal for consideration by Group's Board of Directors.

[229] It was clear to Grenon from the outset of his involvement with Petro that any transaction respecting Group's shares of the company would have to be made with Group. Pointer told Grenon as early as June 5th 1992, that he did not have authority to sign for Group. On February 9th 1993, officials of the Bank of Montreal told Grenon, in Pointer's presence, that he would have to deal with Group with respect to anything affecting Group's shares. On the way back from that visit to Toronto, Pointer again told Grenon that any proposal should be made to Group. Later in February, Pointer told Grenon that Group wanted a proposal to consider at the February 24th meeting of its Board of Directors.

[230] When Colborne's March 30th proposal was made, it was said to be prepared by Grenon and Edwards for: "Westar Group Ltd. (Group)", and states that: "Phase I refers to the negotiations between GE and Group to establish the terms of GE's involvement in the restructuring."

[231] Grenon knew that the March 3rd letter should be addressed to Group but was persuaded by Pointer to address it to Petro. The terms of the letter were not accepted or ratified by Group. In fact Group was not aware of the existence of the letter until June 29th, and consistently repudiated the suggestion that it had granted a right of first refusal to Colborne.

[232] If Grenon and Pointer genuinely believed that Group had authorized Pointer or Petro to grant a right of first refusal agreement respecting Group's shares, one would expect the agreement (when it was prepared) to be between Colborne and Group, not Petro. The fact that it was not, and was in fact made between Colborne and Petro, and executed in secret without Group's knowledge or consent, demonstrates clearly that Grenon and Pointer knew that Group had not agreed to grant a right of first refusal and would not do so.

[233] The fact that both Pointer and Grenon knew that Pointer had no authority to have Petro enter into a right of first refusal agreement is further demonstrated in the first "Statement of Facts" which was drafted by Grenon on July 10th. Grenon and Pointer included in the statement - with respect to a proposed right of first refusal agreement - the phrase: "… I do not feel that I should execute such agreement without the approval of Group, which approval I am sure will not be forthcoming." This phrase is clear evidence that both Grenon and Pointer knew that Pointer lacked authority from Group to have Petro enter into a right of first refusal agreement, in either the March 3rd letter, or in the July document, and the deliberate removal of the phrase from the "Statement of Facts" illustrates the extent of their complicity.

[234] I am satisfied that Grenon had actual knowledge Group had not authorized Petro to grant a right of first refusal respecting Group's shares, and I reject the plaintiffs' submission, in the face of actual knowledge of lack of authority, that they can rely on an allegation of ostensible authority.

(c) No approval by Group as required in March 3rd letter agreement

[235] Even if it could be said that Pointer had authority to enter into the March 3rd letter, Group did not approve a Colborne restructuring plan, which was a pre-condition to Colborne attaining a right to any form of right of first refusal agreement.

(d) The May 10th letter did not constitute approval

[236] It is the position of the plaintiffs that Group granted such an approval when Chase executed the May 10th letter. I do not agree. In arriving at this conclusion I have considered whether Chase, when he signed the letter of May 10th, had a copy of the March 3rd letter agreement. I am satisfied that he did not.

[237] It became obvious during the course of the trial that there were differences between the evidence of Chase and Pointer on this issue. Pointer's evidence was that he provided a copy to Chase when it was prepared. Chase was positive that he did not receive a copy of the letter from Pointer until June 30th. The issue is significant because if Chase had the March 3rd letter in his possession and knew that it contained a provision that: "In the event Group Approval is obtained to the Restructuring plan … Colborne will be granted a right of first refusal …", one might be more inclined to consider more seriously the view that his execution of the May 10th letter constituted the approval referred to. However, if he was not aware of that provision, the contrary is true, for there is no reference in the May 10th letter agreement to the March 3rd document.

[238] Accordingly, I considered the general credibility of both Chase and Pointer, both at trial, and on the basis of the written submissions of counsel. It would be surprising if, in a matter as complex and detailed as this, a witness had perfect recall not only for every event, but for the precise date and sequence of its occurrence. Chase did not, nor would I expect him to. Nonetheless, I have sufficient confidence in the general credibility of Chase, and a sufficient lack of confidence in the general credibility of Pointer, that I prefer and accept the evidence of Chase that he did not have a copy of the March 3rd letter when he signed the May 10th letter, and that he did not have a copy until Pointer sent him one on June 30th.

[239] The route to obtaining the approval of Group to a restructuring plan, as Grenon well knew, was that Chase and Geer would first have to be satisfied that they had a proposal from Colborne that was sufficiently specific and definite to warrant taking it to the Group Board of Directors. That was a decision for Chase and Geer to make, not Pointer, not Petro and not Grenon.

[240] Chase made it perfectly clear to Grenon and Pointer both before and after the May 10th letter, that although he favoured the type of plan Colborne was trying to develop, the March 30th proposal was not detailed enough to warrant Group's committal to Colborne, and that any proposal would have to meet with the approval of the Bank of Montreal.

[241] Grenon clearly understood that the approval of the Bank of Montreal was essential. The March 30th proposal, which was drafted by Grenon, specifically contemplated that the agreement of the Bank was required. The facts are that Colborne did not make a proposal to the Bank until July 2nd, by which time the Bank was so committed to Stampeder that it had little interest in dealing with Colborne. Without the Bank, Colborne was going nowhere.

[242] Grenon's interest and effort was directed to trying to make a deal to merge Petro with Trocana in such a way that Colborne would not have to advance its own funds to the Bank of Montreal. The fate of the proposed Trocana transaction rested upon the consideration and approval of the Board of Directors of Petro-Canada, which was never obtained.

[243] The result was that plaintiffs never brought a proposal to Group for approval which was sufficiently definite to persuade Chase and Geer to take it to the Board of Directors of Group for consideration and approval, or to approve it themselves if they had the power to do so.

[244] I am satisfied that neither Grenon nor Pointer genuinely believed that the May 10th letter constituted Group's approval. Why otherwise would Grenon have considered it necessary on July 2nd to draft and have Pointer sign the letter (Tab 255) in which Pointer purports to have Petro declare that the May 10th letter constituted Group's approval as required by the March 3rd letter agreement? The letter, written some two months after the May 10th letter, is, in my view, a clear attempt to paper up a fatal weakness in the sequence of events upon which the plaintiffs rely. It demonstrates further the fact that Grenon and Pointer knew that Group had not approved the Colborne proposal.

(e) Pointer's powers and duties as an officer and director of Petro

[245] The plaintiffs have relied heavily upon the submission that Pointer, throughout, was acting in the capacity of a director of Petro, and submit that his only duty was to act in the sole interest of the corporation of which he was a director.

[246] In Alberta, the duty of care of directors and officers of a corporation is set out in s. 117 of the Alberta Business Corporations Act, S.A. 1981, c. B-15 ("ABCA"), as amended, which provides, in part, as follows:

> 117(1) Every director and officer of a corporation in exercising his powers and discharging his duties shall
> (a) act honestly and in good faith with a view to the best interests of the corporation.

[247] The question arises: who or what is included within the expression "interests of the corporation" in the particular circumstances of this case?

[248] Directors of a corporation must respond to a variety of interests, particularly where there are a number of shareholders, of different classes and with differing goals and objectives. The "interests of the corporation" include the obligation of a director to see to those duties imposed upon the corporation by statute, and to act honestly and in good faith, with respect to those interests which the law requires a director to watch over and protect. It is clear that one of the interests to which a director must have regard is that of the shareholders and other stakeholders in the corporation. Where there is but one shareholder, "the interests of the shareholders" can be readily identified.

[249] That is the case here: Petro was a private company with but one shareholder, Group, and one stakeholder, the Bank of Montreal. In my view Pointer, as an officer and director of Petro, owed a very substantial (although not exclusive) duty to act honestly and in good faith with respect to those interests, particularly as here, where the interests of the shareholder and the Bank were common, and well known. At the very least, Pointer, as an officer and a director, had an obligation not to deliberately use his powers as an officer and director, to have the corporation, without the knowledge of the sole shareholder, act in such a way as to interfere with the shareholder's rights with respect to its shares of the corporation.

[250] I am also of the view that Pointer as a director of Petro had no inherent power to do anything with respect to Group's shares. Such power could only come from Group, and I am satisfied that Group did not invest in Petro the power to grant a right of first refusal agreement with respect to its shares either in the name of Group or in the name of Petro.

[251] The plaintiffs refer to s. 97(1) of the ABCA, which provides as follows:

> 97(1) Subject to any unanimous shareholder agreement, the directors shall manage the business and affairs of a corporation.

[252] The point is, however, that the matter of granting a right of first refusal with respect to Group's shares was not "the business or affairs" of the corporation Petro; it was the business or affairs of the corporation Group, and Pointer was not a director of that company. This is not a situation where a director is dealing with the yet to be issued share capital of a company of which he is a director. Here he is purporting to have the corporation deal with the property (shares) owned by another entity.

[253] Even if it could be said that Petro had some inherent power to make arrangements with respect to Group's shares of the company (and I do not believe it did) any inherent power that Petro had as a corporation was not unrestricted. Petro was a wholly-owned subsidiary of Group, and while it had its own Board of Directors, it had no chairman of the Board and it had no president. It had two officers: Pointer, who was the chief financial officer, and Savage, who was the chief operating officer. Of the two, Savage was the most senior. As a consequence, Pointer reported not to a president of Petro, but to Chase and to Geer, the chief financial officer and president respectively of Group.

[254] No matter how Petro might be characterized in law, the facts are that it operated more as a unit or division of Group than as a separate corporation. Group placed strict monetary limits on Pointer's spending and contractual powers. Pointer and Savage were in constant communication with and were required to report to Chase and Geer. Pointer and Savage were required at regular intervals (as unit managers) to report to the Board of Directors of Group.

[255] The overall impression that I formed from listening to the evidence was that Pointer's relationship with Group was akin to that of an employee. He took his instructions from Group, he reported to Group, and he required Group approval for any major purchase or contract.

[256] In the reorganization of Petro's debt with the Bank of Montreal, which was completed in April 1992, Pointer had carried out his duties according to the instructions of Chase and under the leadership of Bookbinder, a director of Group. Every step of that transaction had been led by Group, monitored by Chase and Bookbinder and approved by formal resolutions of the Board of Directors of Petro and the Board of Directors of Group. Neither Pointer nor Petro exercised any independent authority.

[257] That pattern was repeated in February 1993, when the Board of Directors of Group, with the full concurrence of Pointer, passed a resolution to further Group's avowed intention to get some value for its Petro shares. The resolution stated in part: "It was further agreed that Mr. Savage and Mr. Pointer would obtain a specific proposal for review by the directors (of Group) and, at the appropriate time, the Bank of Montreal." In carrying out those instructions, Pointer was acting not so much as a director in the management of the business and affairs of the corporation Petro, but more in the capacity of an officer of a wholly-owned subsidiary of Group who had been asked to assist Group in seeking proposals which might enable Group to achieve some value for its shares.

[258] The relationship between Pointer and the shareholder Group was similar to that addressed by McBain J. in Tongue v. Vencap Equities Alberta Ltd. (1994), 148 A.R. 321 [17 Alta. L.R. (3d) 103, [1994] 5 W.W.R. 674] (Q.B.). After acknowledging that no general fiduciary duty arises between a director and shareholders simply because of that relationship (unless something else is present to create such a duty), the learned justice at p. 349 determined that such a duty could arise in appropriate circumstances.

[259] McBain J. illustrates at p. 349 how such a duty may arise when he quotes from Gadsden v. Bennetto (1913), 3 W.W.R. 1109 (Man. C.A.), as follows:

> "The position of the members of the committee in this case is very different from that of ordinary directors of a company as regards their fiduciary relations and is quite distinguishable from Percival v. Wright (1902), 2 Ch. 421; 71 L.J. Ch. 846. In the present case the committee were acting outside the ordinary duties of directors; they > were appointed for the purpose of securing and bringing in a proposal for disposing, not only of the land which was the property of the company, but the shares which were the property of individual shareholders … The members of the committee were the confidential agents of the company and the shareholders. Their concealment of Cooper's offer, which so greatly enhanced the value of the shares, with a scheme in view to buy the shares at a low price, was a breach of duty and a fraud upon the shareholders whose shares they acquired, by means of that concealment, at a price far less than their intrinsic value …"

[260] In dealing with the facts in the case before him, McBain J. states at p. 350:

> In the present case, it is clear that Negin was in charge of the disposition of Synerlogic: he was a disposition committee of one. At the June 28, 1988, Synerlogic Board meeting expressions of interest in acquiring Synerlogic were discussed and it was decided, and reflected in the minutes, that "Mr. Negin was to respond to their expressions of interest and see what steps were required next." …
>
> Minutes of the July 29, 1988, Synerlogic Board meeting also reflect the fact that Negin was in charge of the Synerlogic disposition. One need only examine these minutes, set out in full above, to discover that it was Negin that was orchestrating the whole deal with Vencap acting as his intermediary.
> Therefore, in my view Negin has by virtue of his function in soliciting, and arranging for, the disposition of the shares in Synerlogic owned by the shareholders, a different relationship arose between Negin and the plaintiffs. Negin occupied a position that was outside of the scope of the duties of ordinary directors, and a fiduciary relationship was created with him on the one hand and the plaintiffs and Synerlogic on the other.

[261] I am satisfied that when Pointer was assisting Group, the sole shareholder of Petro, in obtaining value for its shares, he occupied a position that was outside the scope of the duties of an ordinary director of Petro and that he owed a duty to the shareholder to deal with its shares in a trustworthy manner. There is no question in my mind that Pointer breached the duty he owed to the shareholder when he deceitfully participated with Grenon in a plan intended to defeat the shareholder's desire to sell its shares to Stampeder.

[262] In any event, I find it difficult to believe that Pointer as a director of Petro was acting in the best interests of the corporation when he participated with Grenon in a scheme to put the company in a position where it had but two alternatives: either merge with Trocana, where its physical assets would be sold off and it would disappear completely as a corporation; or be placed in a position where, if the shareholder sold its shares to Stampeder, the corporation would be indebted to Colborne for liquidated damages in the sum of $17 million.

[263] The plaintiffs submit that Petro, having put the condition in the March 3rd letter agreement requiring Group's approval, had the right to declare that the condition had been met, and purported to do so in the July 2nd letter (Tab 255). I am not prepared to give any credence to that submission in the circumstance of this case where the facts so clearly demonstrate that both Grenon and Pointer clearly understood that such approval could only come directly from Group itself.

[264] In the final analysis, I am satisfied that Petro did not have, nor was it granted, the right or power to enter into an agreement with Colborne, either on March 3rd, or in July, which fettered the rights of the shareholder to freely deal with its shares.

(f) Pointer's powers with respect to 542

[265] The plaintiffs submit that Pointer, acting as the sole director of 542, had authority to pass the 542 resolutions and to execute on behalf of 542 the unanimous shareholders agreement. My conclusion is that Pointer's conduct in purporting to sign those documents as the sole director of 542 was deceitful. Pointer well knew that the directors of 542 were the same as the directors of Petro - Chase, Savage and Pointer. Pointer had been instructed in January 1993 to see to the formalization of this, but the process of recording the names of the directors was not completed until July 26th. Pointer signed the 542 resolution and the USA agreement on July 27th. It was Grenon who persuaded Pointer to do this although they both knew the true status of the directorships of that company. This typifies the practice of both Grenon and Pointer in dealing in form rather than in substance. Much of what they did together, including the 542 resolutions and agreement, was nothing more than papering, done not to achieve the stated purpose, but to force Stampeder into making a deal with Colborne.

[266] In fact, the entire process by which Pointer found himself as sole director, officer and president of 542, to which corporation he persuaded Group to transfer its shares, was to say the least brazen, and reconfirms my apprehensions as to Pointer's motives and aspirations. It will be remembered that I stated earlier that it appeared to me that Pointer was bent on controlling the restructuring of Petro so as to maintain the corporation as an operating entity in which he would have an important role. The original plan he had devised was to insert a corporation between Group and Petro as a vehicle to carry out his initial restructuring plan. To this end he arranged to set up 542, appoint himself the sole director, officer and president, and then arranged to have Group transfer its shares to 542. The Group Board approved the share transfer on the basis that this would accomplish a substantial saving of Saskatchewan capital tax if it was done before the 1992 year end. The tax saving never materialized, and when Chase learned in late 1992 about the state of the company and that, in addition, Savage and Pointer were shown as holding 10% of the shares, he immediately ordered Pointer to retransfer the shares to Group and to establish a Board of Directors for 542 that would mirror Petro. This is the flimsy foundation upon which the plaintiffs assert that Pointer as sole director and president of 542 had the authority to pass the 542 resolution and to have 542 enter into a unanimous shareholders agreement with Colborne committing the company to enforce the right of first refusal agreement with respect to Group's shares. The law surely cannot be used to validate such a course of action.

(g) The meaning of "unanimous shareholder agreement"

[267] I am satisfied that the plaintiffs' purpose in persuading Pointer to execute the unanimous shareholders agreement between 542 and Colborne was to use the ABCA as a further means of pressuring Stampeder to do a deal with Colborne. However, I am of the view that the document which Pointer purported to have 542 execute was not a unanimous shareholder agreement as defined by s. 1(z) of the ABCA. The definition reads as follows:

> (z) "unanimous shareholder agreement" means
>
> (i) a written agreement to which all the shareholders of a corporation are or are deemed to be parties, whether or not any other person is also a party, or
>
> (ii) a written declaration by a person who is the beneficial owner of all the issued shares of a corporation, > that provides for any of the matters enumerated in section 140(1). (emphasis mine)

[268] The definition is, with respect, awkwardly worded, especially in situations such as the one before me where there is one owner of all the issued capital of 542, and that owner (Group) is not a party to the agreement.

[269] Counsel were not able to direct me to any previous authority on the interpretation of the definition section.

[270] I am of the view that subs. (ii), not subs. (i), was intended to control the situation where there is one beneficial owner of all the issued capital. I am led to this opinion by the use of the plural terms: "shareholders", "are", and "parties", which is inappropriate language if the subsection was intended to apply to a single shareholder. Further, the fact that subs, (ii) provides an approval mechanism specifically designed for a single shareholder situation reinforces this interpretation. Further, having the single shareholder provide a declaration is a simple and practical means of ensuring that the shareholder has concurred in the subject matter of the unanimous shareholder agreement. The ABCA is intended, after all, to be a practical working code for businessmen.

[271] If subs. (i) were to apply in the case of a single shareholder corporation (and I do not believe it does) the question would then become: should it be applied in the circumstances of this case? Here, the shareholder of the corporation (Group) is not a party to the agreement. However, the definition refers to: "a written agreement to which all the shareholders of a corporation are or are deemed to be parties …"

[272] One can only assume this means, in the final analysis, deemed by the court. Ordinarily the term "deemed" is used in a context where, if certain circumstances exist, then it shall be deemed that certain consequences will follow. No such preconditions are specified in subs. (i). I should think that an important factor that would guide a court in exercising its discretion to deem a sole shareholder to be a party to an agreement would be whether or not there existed satisfactory evidence from which a court could infer knowledge of and concurrence with the overall purpose and intent of the agreement, or evidence from which a court could infer that the shareholder had provided authority to the corporation to enter into such an agreement.

[273] In this case, the sole shareholder (Group) was not a party to the agreement, and it was signed without its knowledge. There is no evidence from which I am prepared to infer that Group either concurred in or authorized the corporation to enter into the agreement. Under these circumstances I am not prepared to "deem" Group to be a party to the agreement. Hence, I conclude that the agreement is not a unanimous shareholder agreement within the meaning of s. 1(z) of the ABCA and cannot have the effect of that type of agreement. As the 542 agreement is not a valid unanimous shareholders agreement, it cannot operate so as to fetter Group or 542's ability to sell the shares of Petro to Stampeder.

[274] In any event, the 542 agreement is unenforceable because, at best, it represents a sham transaction by which Grenon and Pointer sought to fraudulently impose legal obligations on 542 and Petro in an effort to thwart the legitimate purchase and sale transaction between Stampeder and Group. As the agreement was created for an unlawful purpose it is not enforceable at law. See Letkeman v. Zimmerman, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 1097 at 1101-1104 [[1977] 6 W.W.R. 741].

(h) Conclusion as to existence of a valid right of first refusal agreement

[275] I conclude that there was never a valid and enforceable right of first refusal agreement in favour of the plaintiffs, either by way of the March 3rd letter, or the formal right of first refusal document, or the unanimous shareholders document or otherwise.

2. The Plaintiffs' Claim v. Williams and Stampeder/Ricinus for Breach of Confidence

[276] This claim is based upon the plaintiffs' allegation that Alan Ross, a tax lawyer in the firm of Bennett Jones Verchere, disclosed confidential information which he had received from his client, the plaintiff Grenon, to the defendant, Stampeder/Ricinus, at a meeting held at the offices of Bennett Jones Verchere on April 30th, 1993.

[277] The plaintiffs have brought their action not against Ross, who is said to have disclosed the confidential information, but against the defendant Williams, a law partner of Ross, and against the defendant Stampeder/Ricinus, whose officers and representatives were in attendance at the April 30th meeting for the purpose of obtaining tax advice from Ross.

(a) Facts

[278] Ross and Williams were partners in the law firm of Bennett Jones Verchere. Ross was a tax partner and Williams was a partner in the corporate-commercial field. Williams was on the executive committee of Bennett Jones Verchere.

[279] Ross began doing tax consulting work for the plaintiff, Grenon, in 1988. In February 1993, Ross was retained by Grenon to provide tax advice with respect to a proposal Grenon was preparing for the restructuring of Petro. They had several meetings on the subject in February and March of 1993.

[280] During the course of these meetings Grenon communicated to Ross information which Grenon had obtained during the course of his negotiations with Pointer, the Chief Financial Officer of Petro, concerning the corporate relationship between Group and Petro, the details of Petro's obligations to the Bank of Montreal and the details of Petro's tax attributes. In particular, on February 26th Ross had meetings with Grenon and Pointer, during which he received a detailed breakdown of Petro's tax losses and resource pools as follow:

	Before refiling	After refiling
Non-capital losses	$17 million	$50 million
Undepreciated capital cost	$19 million	$6.3 million
Canadian Oil & Gas Property Expense	$64 million	$34 million
Investment Tax Credit	$2 million	$1.8 million

[281] Ross discussed with Grenon various methods for restructuring Petro from a tax standpoint, as well as a proposal to have the Bank of Montreal reduce the face amount of its debt to the actual value of the Petro assets, and the fact that forgiveness of debt could result in the tax attributes of Petro being reduced, and how this might be avoided by attributing the debt reduction to the distress preferred shares held by the Bank. He and Grenon also discussed various ways in which Petro's tax pools could be redistributed between resource pools and non-capital losses by refiling Petro's tax returns.

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

[282] The tax aspects of the plan devised by Ross and Grenon or the restructuring of Petro was a sophisticated and complex one involving the refiling of Petro's tax returns to eliminate non-capital losses and to increase the resource pools; the transfer of Petro's assets to two separate subsidiaries; the exchange of the distress preferred shares held by the Bank for a reduced debt obligation at commercial rates; the creation of a $2 million debt obligation from Petro to the plaintiffs; and other complex corporate manoeuvrings designed to use the tax losses and resource pools to advantage and to give the plaintiffs a substantial equity position, along with Group, and the Bank, in Petro.

[283] Grenon's last consultation with Ross prior to the April 30th meeting was on March 22nd. Grenon prepared a proposal for the financial restructuring of Petro which he submitted to Group on March 30th. Ross did not participate in the preparation of the proposal, but received a copy from Grenon in early April, which he scanned.

[284] The defendant Williams, who was Ross's partner at Bennett Jones Verchere, had been retained as counsel by Stampeder in October 1992, and thereafter he provided legal advice to Stampeder on a variety of matters. In January 1993, Williams was asked by Stampeder to join the company as vice president. Williams decided in late February to do so, and on April 23rd announced his intention to his partners at Bennett Jones Verchere. Ross did not become aware of this until after the April 30th meeting. Williams remained as a partner of Bennett Jones Verchere until June 3rd 1993, when he joined Stampeder as senior vice president.

[285] In late February or early March 1993, while he was still a partner at Bennett Jones Verchere, Williams was asked by Stampeder to provide legal advice in connection with three possible acquisitions, one of which was Petro. Some time in March, Williams became aware of the fact that Ross was doing work for Grenon in connection with Petro, and he discussed with Ross their respective clients' involvement with the company. Williams told Ross that if Stampeder was successful in acquiring Petro he hoped Ross would be Stampeder's general tax counsel and that Ross would provide tax advice in the completion of Stampeder's transaction. Ross told Williams he would clear the way and that he looked forward to working for Stampeder. Both Ross and Williams knew that because Ross had provided advice to Grenon relative to Petro, there was a conflict of interest that would have to be addressed before Ross undertook any work for Stampeder relative to that company.

[286] On March 2nd, 1993, Stampeder made a detailed written offer to Group to purchase all of the shares of Petro in exchange for 750,000 shares of Stampeder stock.

When Group indicated it preferred a cash offer, Stampeder, on March 15th, sent a new written offer to Group to purchase the shares of Petro for $2.5 million and referred to its discussions with the Bank to take over Petro's debt of $43 million to the Bank for approximately $30 million and indicated, in general terms, how it planned to use Petro's tax losses. The offer was conditional upon the Bank accepting Stampeder's offer. On April 7th the Bank informed Stampeder that, subject to the approval of its credit committee and an independent valuation, it would accept $28 million for the Bank's position in Petro. On the same day Stampeder made an unconditional offer to Group to purchase the shares of Petro for $2 million, which was the maximum amount the Bank would allow Group to receive for its shares, which the Bank considered to be virtually worthless. On April 8th Stampeder made a formal written offer to purchase the Bank's position in Petro for $28 million. The Bank accepted Stampeder's offer by a letter dated April 27th.

[287] Williams' involvement as counsel for Stampeder in connection with its acquisition of Petro intensified when Tonken advised Williams of the Bank's acceptance of Stampeder's offer and gave him a copy of the Bank's letter of acceptance.

[288] Williams showed Ross a copy of the April 27th letter from the Bank, and told him, "We just got the deal". Williams asked Ross if he could attend a meeting to provide advice to Stampeder as to whether there were any tax issues or complications which Stampeder should consider, arising from the way Stampeder had structured its acquisition of Petro and to ascertain whether the structure Stampeder was proposing "was doable from a tax perspective". Ross agreed.

[289] The meeting was scheduled for April 30th. A short time before the meeting began, Williams went to Ross to confirm that Ross had cleared away the conflict with Ross's client Grenon. Ross told him he had not. Ross and Williams decided to proceed with the meeting in any event and agreed that before any meaningful work was undertaken the conflict would be cleared away. Ross understood his role was simply to provide general tax information and advice to Stampeder in respect to its plans to acquire the shares of Petro from Group and to acquire the debt interest from the Bank. Before the meeting Ross went to Grenon's file and jotted down the amount of Petro's non-capital losses, resource pools, undepreciated capital cost and investment tax credit both before and after refiling, so that he could have this information at his fingertips. At the outset of the meeting, Williams asked, "Did you get clearance to speak to us?" Ross answered, "No." Williams asked, "Could you just tell us general information then?" To which Ross replied in the affirmative.

[290] Ross attended the April 30th meeting in the capacity of a tax advisor engaged by Stampeder to provide legal advice. He opened a file in Stampeder's name and charged Stampeder $585 for his services. Those in attendance at the April 30th meeting were Tonken (the president of Stampeder); Surbey (a lawyer from the firm of Howard Mackie representing Stampeder); Brockway (a C.A. and tax consultant to Stampeder); and the two Bennett Jones Verchere lawyers, Williams and Ross, both of whom were present in their capacity as counsel to Stampeder.

[291] When the meeting opened Tonken explained to Ross the agreement Stampeder had reached with the Bank and showed him the Bank's letter of acceptance. Tonken also explained to Ross the offer Stampeder had made to Group to purchase shares of Petro. During the course of the meeting, Ross reviewed the corporate ownership structure that existed between Group, Petro and the numbered company, and reviewed Petro's debt arrangements with the Bank of Montreal. More importantly, he reviewed Petro's tax attributes, and in doing so disclosed to Stampeder the detailed amounts of Petro's non-capital losses, undepreciated capital cost, resource pools and investment tax credits, both before and after refiling, which he had obtained from Grenon's file. He advised that the distribution of the tax losses and resource pools could be altered by refiling, and that refiling could take place after a change of control. He discussed the fact that any forgiveness of debt by the Bank could reduce the tax pools and he advised how Stampeder might allocate the purchase price for the Bank's interests to the distress preferred shares held by the Bank rather than to the debt obligation so as to avoid debt forgiveness and the consequent reduction of the tax pools. He informed Stampeder that Petro had received a tax ruling at the time of the issuance of the distress preferred shares and that the creation of the shares did not constitute a debt forgiveness by the Bank. He advised that non-arm's length debt was not an exception to the rule that forgiveness of debt reduces tax losses and therefore that the intercorporate debt between Petro and its subsidiary should not be written off.

[292] Ross did not reveal to the meeting who his other client was nor did he disclose to the meeting any part of the plans, structures or proposals which he and Grenon had devised. What he did was to advise Stampeder, as a tax lawyer to whom they had come for advice, of some of the tax ramifications of the transactions which Stampeder already had underway, and advise Stampeder, in a general way, and within the confines of those transactions, how the value of the tax attributes of the company they expected to purchase might best be preserved. Ross's advice, in essence, was that Stampeder should ensure that when the transaction was done there was no forgiveness of debt.

[293] In the course of the meeting Ross did, however, disclose the precise tax pool numbers that he had received from Grenon/Pointer on February 26th. His explanation for this is that when he received the information in February he did not consider it to be confidential because Petro had been for sale for some time and the information was generally known. His recollection is that all of the people at the meeting, and in particular Mr. Brockway, the chartered accountant, and Mr. Tonken, the president of Stampeder, were familiar with the tax attributes of the company and he did not think that he was discussing anything that they did not already know. In my view, however, the precise details of the non-capital losses, undepreciated capital cost, Canadian oil and gas property expense and investment tax credit were confidential information which Ross had received from his client Grenon.

(b) Analysis of breach of confidence claim

[294] The legal positions of the defendant Williams, and the defendant Stampeder, with respect to the April 30th meeting, are quite different.

[295] The analysis would be straightforward if the plaintiff had named Ross as defendant. There can be no doubt that Ross owed a duty to his client Grenon to keep confidential the information about the detailed breakdown of the resource pools which he received from Grenon in a solicitor/client relationship, unless that information was so well known to the public as to be notorious.

(i) A lawyer's duty to his client

[296] It is settled law that a lawyer must not voluntarily disclose confidential information which he or she receives in a professional capacity without the consent of the client or a direction of the court.

[297] McEachern C.J.S.C. (as he then was) in Ott v. Fleishman, [1983] 5 W.W.R. 721 (B.C.S.C.), states the proposition and its limits clearly at p. 722:

> Apart from an indication of future unlawful conduct I regard it as settled law that any confidential information communicated to a lawyer and received by him in his professional capacity must not voluntarily be disclosed without either the consent of his client or a direction from the court. This is made apparent in the canons of the legal ethics which require a lawyer "scrupulously" to guard and not divulge his client's secrets or confidences (Canon 3[7]). But not all information received by a lawyer is privileged: Zielinski v. Gordon, [1983] 1 W.W.R. 414, 40 B.C.L.R. 165 (S.C.).

[298] While the court's primary duty is to resolve issues between parties, a secondary and very important concern is to maintain the high standards of the legal profession and the integrity of our system of justice. An important statement of public policy concerning the conduct of a barrister and solicitor is contained in the professional code of ethics of the governing bodies of the profession.

[299] In Alberta, the Law Society Code of Professional Conduct provides: Chapter 7, p. 67:

> A lawyer has a duty to keep confidential all information concerning a client's business, interests and affairs acquired in the course of the professional relationship.

[300] While the courts are not bound to apply a code of ethics, nonetheless, an expression of a professional standard in such a code relating to a matter before the court is an important factor to be taken into account in establishing public policy. (See: Gainers Inc. v. Pocklington (Alta. C.A., 9 May, 1995, as yet unreported [reported 29 Alta. L.R. (3d) 323])

[301] In MacDonald Estate v. Martin, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1235 at 1245-46 [[1991] 1 W.W.R. 705], Sopinka J. for the majority discusses the appropriate standard to be applied in determining whether a lawyer who has acted for a client is disqualified from acting for another client by reason of conflict of interest. Sopinka begins his analysis with the statement, at p. 1244:

> The legal profession has historically struggled to maintain the respect of the public. This has been so notwithstanding the high standards that, generally, have been maintained. When the management, size of law firms and many of the practices of the legal profession are indistinguishable from those of business, it is important that the fundamental professional standards be maintained and indeed improved. This is essential if the confidence of the public that the law is a profession is to be preserved and hopefully strengthened. Nothing is more important to the preservation of this relationship than the confidentiality of information passing between a solicitor and his or her client.

[302] It is certain that when a lawyer receives confidential information attributable to a solicitor/client relationship, that information should be kept confidential and it should not be misused to the prejudice of the client from whom the information was received.

[303] While these statements have direct application to the question of when a lawyer must disqualify himself (or be disqualified by the Court) from acting in civil litigation, I am satisfied that they are equally applicable to situations where a lawyer puts himself in a position of conflict of interest and uses confidential information which he has received from one client as a basis upon which to advise another client, on a matter in which the clients are in conflict or competition, without the consent of the client from whom the confidential information was received.

[304] Sopinka J. in MacDonald Estate (supra) considers a lawyer's position in a conflict of interest situation and concludes at p. 1261:

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

> A lawyer who has relevant confidential information cannot act against his client or former client. In such a case the disqualification is automatic.

(ii) Was the detailed information as to Petro's tax losses and resource pools "notorious"?

[305] There is a further matter I must consider and that is whether the information that Ross received from his client was so notorious as not to be confidential information.

[306] It is true that Petro had been on the market for a considerable period of time and that persons or corporations considering the acquisition of the company had received information about its tax attributes and without the imposition of a confidentiality agreement. However, I am unable to conclude that the detailed information about Petro's tax losses and resource pools, which Ross retrieved from his client Grenon's file and disclosed at the April 30th meeting, should be regarded as notorious information. It was detailed and up-to-date information recently assembled from Petro's tax records and communicated by Grenon to his lawyer Ross so that Ross might provide him with specific tax advice based upon that information. The fact that some aspects of the information may have been provided by Petro to other suitors does not render the information so notorious as to enable Ross to disclose that information to his client's competitor, Stampeder, without Grenon's consent. The burden of showing that the information was not confidential rests with the lawyer and that burden has not been discharged.

[307] In the circumstances here, the nature of the information itself; and the circumstances under which it was received by Ross; and the circumstances under which it was subsequently disclosed; satisfy me that the detailed tax loss and resource pool information was confidential in the hands of Ross and that Ross was in breach of his duty to the plaintiffs when he disclosed that information to his client's competitor, Stampeder.

(iii) The position of the defendant Williams as a partner of the plaintiffs' lawyer

[308] The foregoing concerns the duties of Ross, who is not a defendant. It is, however, relevant because I have concluded that the defendant Williams was subject to the same duty as his partner Ross, to keep the detailed tax information confidential. Instead, he participated in the disclosure of the confidential information to Stampeder when he knew there was a conflict of interest and that it had not been resolved.

[309] Turning again to MacDonald Estate v. Martin (supra), Sopinka J. discusses the question of imputed knowledge between members of a law firm at p. 1262:

> There is, however, a strong inference that lawyers who work together share confidences. In answering this question, the court should therefore draw the inference, unless satisfied on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that all reasonable measures have been taken to ensure that no disclosure will occur by the

"tainted" lawyer to the member or members of the firm who are engaged against the former client.

[310] In the circumstances here the defendant Williams is unable to escape the inference referred to. He had discussed with Ross their various involvements with Petro, and he knew there was a conflict of interest which had not been resolved when Ross began to provide tax information and legal advice to Stampeder at the April 30th meeting.

[311] In Michel v. Lafrentz (1992), 85 Alta. L.R. (2d) 1 (C.A.), the Court, per curiam, held at p. 4:

> A partnership is not a separate legal person, so each partner in Ogilvie & Company is the lawyer for each client of that firm. The plaintiff company is one of those clients. The reported cases always identify law partners for purposes of conflict of interest and disqualification. The Canadian Bar Association Code of Professional Conduct says that a client is a client of all the lawyers in a law firm, whether or not the individuals handle the client's work, as Cory, J. emphasizes: MacDonald Estate v. Martin, at p. 730. Alberta has largely adopted that Code.

[312] The knowledge of Ross is, in my view, imputed to Williams, who had an equal duty to see that confidential information which Ross had received from the plaintiffs was kept confidential. They both knew there was a conflict of interest and in failing to deal with it, and proceeding with the April 30th meeting where confidential information was disclosed, Williams failed, as well as Ross, in the discharge of the duty of confidentiality.

(iv) Was a duty of confidentiality cast upon Stampeder by the events of the April 30 meeting?

[313] While Ross and the defendant Williams owed a duty to the plaintiff arising out of the relationship of solicitor and client, no such relationship existed between the defendant Stampeder and the plaintiffs.

[314] Nonetheless, the plaintiffs seek to establish the proposition that the defendant Stampeder received confidential information from Ross, and misused it.

[315] The test for whether there has been a breach of confidence involves establishing three elements:

(1) that the information conveyed was confidential;

(2) that it was communicated in confidence; and

(3) that it was misused by the party to whom it was communicated.

See: International Corona Resources Ltd. v. LAC Minerals Ltd., [1989] 2 S.C.R. 574 at 635.

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

[316] The question is: did Stampeder receive information on a confidential basis, and then misuse that information? I do not think so.

[317] The facts as I find them to be are that Stampeder retained Ross as its lawyer to provide tax advice with respect to the proposal it had developed for the acquisition of Petro. There was, in my mind, nothing out of the ordinary in Stampeder engaging Ross to provide such advice. Ross was Williams' partner and as Stampeder had retained Williams to provide corporate commercial advice with respect to the acquisition of the Petro shares, there was nothing sinister or unusual in Stampeder looking to the tax partner of Bennett Jones Verchere to provide tax advice on the very transaction on which the partner Williams was already retained.

[318] It is true that Stampeder was aware of the fact that Ross, through work he had done for other clients, was familiar with the affairs of Petro. There was nothing surprising about that. Petro had been on the market for years and its principal attraction was its tax losses. Tonken and Dixon had, in fact, met with Pointer, the chief financial officer of Petro, on February 26th (five weeks prior to the April 30th meeting) for the specific purpose of obtaining from Pointer the information it needed to consider the acquisition of Petro from Group and the Bank. Pointer gave Tonken a breakdown of what the tax pools and losses were, and told him that Petro had a tax ruling that confirmed the fact that the issuance of the distress preferred shares and the re-organization of the Bank debt had not eliminated or reduced the tax losses or resource pools. The details of the tax losses and tax pools that Pointer gave Tonken on that occasion may not have been quite as specific as that disclosed by Ross at the April 30th meeting, but at the very least, Pointer advised Tonken that there were $95 to $100 million in tax attributes divided about equally between noncapital losses and tax pools/UCC and COGPE, which was the extent of the tax information Stampeder required for the purposes of determining whether to continue with its efforts to purchase the Petro interests from the Bank and from Group.

[319] From the perspective of a reasonable and objective observer, Stampeder attended at the offices of its lawyers, Bennett Jones Verchere, to meet with a tax partner who they retained to advise them on the tax implications of transactions to acquire the shares of Petro from Group, according to plans which they had already devised. Stampeder was aware of the fact that Ross would be acquainted with Petro's affairs through consulting with other clients who had an interest in acquiring Petro. The discussion as to whether Ross had obtained clearance from his other client - even to a sophisticated client like Stampeder - would be regarded as an internal matter for Bennett

Jones Verchere to sort out. The meeting proceeded on the basis that Ross would provide general tax information and advice. Stampeder had a right to expect that two partners of a major law firm would know what they were doing in this respect, and that they could proceed in confidence to obtain from Ross, the lawyer who it had retained, the general tax information and advice it was seeking.

[320] Would a reasonable man standing in the shoes of Stampeder have realized upon reasonable grounds that he was receiving confidential information and that it was being given to him in confidence? I think not.

[321] In my view there was no duty owed by Stampeder to the plaintiffs, and there was no information communicated to Stampeder in circumstances giving rise to an obligation of confidence. Accordingly the action against the defendant Stampeder on that ground must fail.

(v) Are the plaintiffs entitled to a remedy against the defendant Williams?

[322] I have concluded that although the defendant Williams was in breach of the duty owed by a solicitor to a client, the plaintiff has not established a right to a remedy. There was no unauthorized use of the information to the detriment of the plaintiffs.

[323] The plaintiffs' actions in singling out Williams as the defendant, rather than Ross (their lawyer and the principal author of the disclosure), casts some doubt upon the bona fides of the plaintiffs' claim against Williams, and detracts from the strength of the plaintiffs' claims to have suffered a loss as a result of the disclosure of information at the April 30th meeting. I can find no causal link between the disclosure of the details of Petro's tax losses and resource pools, and the loss alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiffs, nor Stampeder's successful acquisition of Petro.

[324] La Forest J. in LAC Minerals (supra) sets out the statement of the majority, as to breach of confidence at p. 635 (S.C.R.) as follows:

> Breach of Confidence
>
> I can deal quite briefly with the breach of confidence issue. I have already indicated that Lac breached a duty of confidence owed to Corona. The test for whether there has been a breach of confidence is not seriously disputed by the parties. It consists in establishing three elements: that the information conveyed was confidential, that it was communicated in confidence, and that it was misused by the party to whom it was communicated. In Coco v. A.N. Clark (Engineers) Ltd., [1969] R.P.C. 41 (Ch.), Megarry J. (as he then was) put it as follows at p. 47:
>
> "In my judgment, three elements are normally required if, apart from contract, a case of breach of confidence is to succeed. First, the information itself, in the words of Lord Greene, M.R. in the Saltman case on page 215, must 'have the necessary > quality of confidence about it.' Secondly, that information must have been imparted in circumstances imparting an obligation of confidence. Thirdly, there must be an unauthorized use of that information to the detriment of the party communicating it.…"

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

>
> This is the test applied by both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal. Neither party contends that it is the wrong test. Lac, however, forcefully argued that the courts below erred in their application of the test. Lac submitted that "The real issue is whether Corona proved that LAC received confidential information from it and [whether] it should have known such information was confidential."

[325] I am satisfied that a breach of a duty of confidentiality, whether it arises in contract or in tort, cannot produce a remedy for the plaintiff against the confidant (here Williams), unless it is shown by the plaintiff that the confidential information was used by the confidant himself or that it was, as a result of some action by the confidant, used by a third party to the detriment of the confider. There must be an unauthorized use of that information to the detriment of the party communicating it before there can be a remedy.

[326] La Forest J. at p. 636 (S.C.R.) in referring to the third element set out above says:

> (3) Lac made use of the information in obtaining the Williams property and was not authorized by Corona to bid on that property.

[327] La Forest J. in his reasons in LAC makes frequent references to the need to establish as a factual underpinning, that the recipient of the confidential information misused it to the detriment of the confider. A further example is found at pp. 638-39:

> If, as we saw, each of the three elements of the above-cited test are made out, a claim for breach of confidence will succeed. The receipt of confidential information in circumstances of confidence establishes a duty not to use that information for any purpose other than that for which it was conveyed. If the information is used for such a purpose, and detriment to the confider results, the confider will be entitled to a remedy. [My emphasis.]

[328] The plaintiff has not established to my satisfaction that the confidential information disclosed at the April 30th meeting was used to the detriment of the plaintiff.

[329] I have previously outlined the way in which Stampeder came to be interested in acquiring Petro, and the extended negotiation which had taken place with both the Bank and Group prior to the April 30th meeting. I am satisfied that any disclosure of information made to Stampeder at the April 30th meeting had no effect on Stampeder's plans to acquire the shares of Petro from Group and the Petro debt from the Bank. Stampeder was bent on that specific course of action well prior to the April 30th meeting and it did not alter or change its plans following the meeting, nor take any action as a result of the information received at the meeting that it had not already decided upon.

[330] The information it received at the April 30th meeting did not serve Stampeder as a springboard leading to the acquisition of the shares and the Bank debt, nor did it give Stampeder a head start or any advantage over the plaintiff. There was, in my view, no misuse of confidential information to the detriment of the plaintiffs and for that reason, and despite the breach, the plaintiffs' action against the defendant Williams must fail. The confidential information was not used to the disadvantage of the plaintiffs.

[331] In the result, the plaintiffs' claim against both Williams and Stampeder, based upon breach of confidentiality, is dismissed.

3. The Plaintiffs' Claim against Group, 542, Stampeder and Ricinus for Interference with Contractual Relations

[332] In Ed Miller Sales & Rentals Ltd. v. Caterpillar Tractor Co., [1994] 5 W.W.R. 473 [17 Alta. L.R. (3d) 251] (Alta. Q.B.), Berger J. [at p. 540] approves as a correct statement of the law with respect to the tort of interference with contractual relations the following passage from Fleming, The Law of Torts, 7th ed. (1987), at p. 653:

> "Liability will attach if the intervenor, with knowledge of the contract and intent to prevent or hinder its performance, either (i) persuades, induces or procures one of the contracting parties not to perform his obligations, or (ii) commits some act, wrongful in itself, to prevent such performance. The first is usually described as 'direct', the second as 'indirect' interference; the first involving immediate pressure on one of the contracting parties, while in the second the intervenor acts 'at one remove' …"

[333] In one of the leading Canadian cases, Posluns v. Toronto Stock Exchange, [1964] 2 O.R. 547 (H.C.), Gale J. stated [p. 598]:

> Thus, if a person without lawful justification knowingly and intentionally procures the breach by a party to a contract which is valid and enforceable and thereby causes damage to another party to the contract, the person who has induced the breach commits an actionable wrong.

[334] It is clear from this and the other authorities referred to by Justice Berger, that it is essential that the plaintiff prove the existence of a valid and enforceable contract as the first of the several elements required to establish the tort of interference with contractual relations.

[335] The plaintiffs having failed to prove the existence of a valid and enforceable contract with Group, 542, or Petro, they are not entitled to succeed on this aspect of their claim.

4. The Claim against Group, 542, Stampeder and Ricinus for Interference with the Plaintiffs' Economic Interest

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

[336] Unlawful interference with another's economic interests is still an emerging tort in Canada. Lewis N. Klar, in Tort Law, 1991, at p. 454 discusses the topic under the heading "Interference with economic interests by unlawful means" and has this to say:

> The above discussion illustrates that when defendants engage in unlawful acts, with the intention of damaging another party's economic interests, and damage does result, this will, in some circumstances, constitute a tort. As we have seen, to threaten a person with unlawful acts constitutes the tort of intimidation. To conspire with others in the use of unlawful means constitutes the tort of conspiracy, and to use unlawful means to indirectly interfere with contractual relations is also tortious. The question has been raised whether there exists a general principle of tort liability which subsumes these nominate torts, whereby any use of unlawful means by an individual with the intention of causing injury to another, without justification, can be considered to be tortious. Is there a tort of interference with economic interests by unlawful means?
> Dicta in a few Canadian and Commonwealth cases suggest that such a tort is emerging…

[337] Berger J. in Ed Miller Sales & Rentals (supra) accepts the proposition that there is now, in Canada, a recognized tort of unlawful interference with economic interests short of an actual contract, and, with respect, I concur.

[338] I adopt the view of Professor Klar that the tort is founded upon proof of unlawful conduct. In I.B. of T.C.W. & H. of A. v. Therien (1960), 22 D.L.R. (2d) 1 (S.C.C.), Locke J. speaking for the majority stated at p. 13:

> … you are not entitled to interfere with another man's method of gaining his living by illegal means.

[339] I am of the view that this is an area where the courts should proceed with caution so as to leave room for a clear distinction between the tort of interfering with economic interests and what should be regarded as fair competition in a free enterprise economy. What will constitute unlawful means and what will constitute a valid economic interest are subjects that will be delineated by the courts over time, on a case by case basis, and will, I believe, be fact specific.

[340] What kind of "economic interest" will the courts protect? The plaintiffs cite a number of cases where the court found an interference with an economic interest.

[341] In Mintuck v. Valley River Band No. 63A, [1977] 2 W.W.R. 309 (Man. C.A.), the plaintiff, a lessee of Crown lands, was harassed by an Indian Band with intent to interfere with his ability to carry on farming on the lands. There the plaintiff had an established economic right, the right to farm under the lease.

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

[342] In J.T. Stratford & Son Ltd. v. Lindley, [1964] 2 All E.R. 209 (C.A.), it was held that "… the respondent's action made it impossible to do any new business with the barge hirers." There, the appellant had a right to carry on his transport business.

[343] In I.B. of T.C.W. & H. of A. v. Therien (1960), 22 D.L.R. (2d) 1 (S.C.C.), Justice Locke stated at p. 13: "… you are not entitled to interfere with another man's method of gaining his living by illegal means." There, the plaintiff had a right to carry on his trucking business.

[345] In Dufferin Real Estate Ltd. v. Giralico, [1989] OJ. 1525 (H.C.); affirmed [1992] OJ. 947 (C.A.), the interference was with the right to sell property under a listing agreement.

[346] I refer to these cases to illustrate the kind of economic interest that will be protected by the court, through the mechanism of the tort of unlawful interference with economic interests. I conclude that what is referred to as an economic interest in the context of this tort is an inherent right to carry out some type of economic activity, which is so entrenched in the Canadian economic community that it will be recognized and protected by the courts.

[347] I have considerable difficulty in this case in satisfying myself that the plaintiffs had any valid economic interests or business right that was interfered with. I have already held that they had no valid contractual right, and beyond that, it seems to me, their only economic right or interest was to be free to negotiate, in an open market, with Group and with the Bank, for the right to acquire an equity interest in Petro. What happened here is that Colborne, despite being given every opportunity to do so, was simply unable to gain the approval of Group, or to make an arrangement with the Bank. In a competitive situation they simply lost the game.

[348] If it could be said that the plaintiffs had, by proper means, elevated their position to a valid economic interest which the court would protect, I am satisfied that there was no act of unlawful interference by the defendants. The unlawful act suggested by the plaintiffs is that the defendants Group and Stampeder conspired together to defeat the plaintiffs' economic interests in restructuring Petro. The facts lead me to the opposite conclusion. Group used its best efforts to encourage the plaintiffs to present a definitive proposal that would be acceptable to the Bank of Montreal and to the Group Board of Directors. The plaintiffs were unable to do so. It was only when it was abundantly apparent to Group that the plaintiffs would be unable to obtain the essential co-operation of the Bank, that Group proceeded to complete negotiations to sell its shares to Stampeder. Insofar as Stampeder is concerned, it entered the competition to acquire Group's shares at the same time as the plaintiffs, but Stampeder was quickly able to obtain a commitment from the Bank of Montreal to sell its interests in Petro to Stampeder, which proved to be the key to success.

[349] It is true that before the Stampeder transaction was closed both Group and Stampeder knew that Colborne was claiming a right of first refusal based upon the March 3rd and May 10th letters. However, Stampeder took all reasonable steps to determine whether the plaintiffs had a valid claim. Even in this they were frustrated by the plaintiffs' refusal to reveal the documents upon which it claimed to have rights. Stampeder continued to negotiate with Group and purchased Group's shares only after receiving assurances from Group that no rights existed in favour of the plaintiffs and after receiving the opinion of its own and Group's lawyers to that effect, an opinion which I have now held to be correct.

[350] I find nothing sinister in the Group transactions being closed on August 3rd, without a period of due diligence. It was a straightforward shares for cash arrangement. Stampeder had, during the several months preceding the sale, done a thorough search and analysis of Petro's affairs with the full co-operation of Group and Petro. In addition Chase, the chief financial officer of Group, provided an officer's certification. There was a valid reason for such a closing: there had been difficult negotiations which were resolved by closing the Bank/Stampeder transaction, the Group/Stampeder transaction, and the Bank/Group transaction (re: the Preferred C shares) at the same time and without conditions. In any event, the Group/Stampeder sale for $2 million was relatively insignificant in comparison to the Bank/Stampeder sale for $28 million, and Stampeder had a due diligence period following the closing of the purchase of the Bank's interest in Petro.

[351] In the certificate provided to Stampeder by Chase as senior vice-president and chief financial officer of Group, Chase certified, among other things, that:

1. Group had not approved (within the meaning of the March 3rd letter) any restructuring proposal submitted to it by Colborne;

2. At the time of signing the letter dated May 10th, 1993, Group was not aware of the March 3rd letter; and

3. Petro did not have outstanding any rights to acquire its shares other than to the Bank of Montreal (the 49.9% option).

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

[352] The Certificate containing those assurances was reviewed by Pointer, Savage and Chase on August 3rd, the day the Group/Stampeder transaction was to close. Pointer took no exception to the Certificate, nor did he mention to Chase or anyone else on that day the existence of the secret right of first refusal and the unanimous shareholder documents, despite the fact that he knew the sale to Stampeder was about to close, and that Chase was certifying that no rights of first refusal existed.

[353] Neither Group, Stampeder nor the Bank were aware of the existence of the right of first refusal and unanimous shareholder agreements when the transactions closed on August 3rd. Their very existence was kept secret from them by the plaintiffs and Pointer.

[354] The plaintiffs have not satisfied me that the defendants engaged in unlawful conduct with the intention of damaging any valid economic interest of Colborne, and the plaintiffs' claim on that count fails.

[355] In the final result, I am satisfied that the plaintiffs have no claim, on any basis, against any of the defendants, and their action is dismissed.

5. The Counterclaim of Stampeder/Ricinus v. Colborne, Edwards, Grenon and Pointer

[356] Stampeder claims that Colborne's actions unlawfully interfered with Stampeder's right to market its share warrants at the most advantageous price, and constitutes a tort, for which Stampeder is entitled to recover pecuniary, exemplary and punitive damages.

[357] The law recognizes a class of wrongful acts arising out of unfair business conduct, most aptly described as business torts. Included in this general classification are: Deceit, Interference with Contractual Relations, Intimidation, Conspiracy, Interference with Economic Interests, and Abuse of Process. These separate torts are still developing and their elements overlap, so that it is sometimes difficult to say whether a particular set of circumstances falls within the one or another, or more than one. Together, however, they provide the court with a means of dealing with business behaviour which is so inappropriate that, even in a robust free enterprise environment, it exceeds the bounds of business morality to the extent that a court will intervene, and provide an appropriate remedy.

[358] I am satisfied that however one may classify the conduct of the defendants by counterclaim, it exceeded the bounds I have referred to, and caused damage to Stampeder, constituting a tort for which Stampeder is entitled to be compensated.

[359] Following the June 29th meetings, when Colborne became aware that Stampeder had reached a business deal with Group and the Bank that would allow

Stampeder to acquire the shares of Petro, Colborne and Pointer conspired to defraud and cause serious economic injury to Stampeder. Their scheme involved creating secret agreements and then encouraging Stampeder to close and publicly announce the Petro acquisition. Colborne then issued its own press release and commenced this action based upon the false documents it had created, with the expectation and intent that when the allegations were made known to the investment community, Stampeder would be unable to raise the necessary financing to complete its deal with the Bank and would therefore be forced into a deal with Colborne (on Colborne's terms) so that Colborne would obtain Petro's tax attributes and Stampeder would be left with the bulk of the oil and gas properties.

[360] Colborne planned to use the funds paid by Stampeder for the oil and gas properties to pay the Bank. Trocana would then acquire the tax attributes, and Colborne would reap a significant windfall without risking any money. Petro would not be rejuvenated, and Stampeder would be harmed, but Colborne would have its profit.

[361] Colborne's intention is clearly revealed in a letter Grenon wrote to Chase on July 2nd (Tab 253):

> To the extent anyone attempts to conclude a restructing [sic] without regard to our right of first refusal, we will be seeking an injunction, launching a lawsuit, etc. I can only speculate how the Bank and the potential money raisers for Stampeder might react to this. Even a relatively short delay, which is about the worst we can expect to achieve, may see the currently overheated equity markets cool to the extent that Stampeder can't raise the money it needs.

[362] Colborne thereafter did its best to see that this threat was carried into effect. Grenon first had Pointer sign the July 2nd letter (Tab 255), purporting to confirm that Group had approved a Colborne restructuring plan, and with that in hand (and after writing Group to confirm his withdrawal of the suggestion that Colborne had a right of first refusal), Colborne began to build what later would be described by Grenon and Libin as the "arsenal" of "nuclear weapons" which included the several versions of Pointer's "Statement of Facts" (amended to take out the offending reference to the need to obtain Group's approval) and the secret right of first refusal and unanimous shareholder agreements. The plaintiffs' stated intention was to "screw the Stampeder deal." The tactics were to "build the arsenal, then negotiate."

[363] The scheme of the defendants by counterclaim to get Stampeder "in the snare" and then spring the documents was in fact carried out. Grenon had Pointer and Libin keep the documents secret, encouraged Stampeder to close its acquisition from Group by his letter of July 30th, and then, after Stampeder had entered into the transactions, but before it could go to the market for financing, sprung the agreements, issued a Statement of Claim, and issued a press release directed to the investment community announcing its intention to set aside Stampeder's acquisition and to seek damages of $30 million, in the expectation that these actions would prevent Stampeder from getting the funds required to complete the acquisition, and by this means force Stampeder into a position where it would have to make a deal with Colborne.

[364] The final step in the execution of the Grenon/Pointer scheme was Libin's phone call to his former law partner Williams, by now vice-president of Stampeder. Libin stated that Stampeder should not be put off by the statement of claim as "litigators exaggerate" and there was a business deal to be done. When Williams told him that the agreements would never stand up in court Libin responded to the effect that although that might be so, could Williams afford to have the court make that decision for him, and again suggested that Williams make a deal with Colborne, to which Williams properly responded that the plaintiffs' conduct "reeked of devious action."

Legal Analysis

(a) Fraud

[365] Fraud and deceit are related actions. Fraud is so infinite in its varieties that courts have not attempted to define it with precision. McDonnell, Monroe, Kerr on the Law of Fraud and Mistake, 7th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell Limited, 1952), at p. 1 states:

> It is not easy to give a definition of what constitutes fraud in the extensive signification in which that term is understood by Civil Courts of Justice. The Courts have always avoided hampering themselves by defining or laying down as a general proposition what shall be held to constitute fraud. Fraud is infinite in variety. The fertility of man's invention in devising new schemes of fraud is so great, that the Courts have always declined to define it … Fraud, in the contemplation of a Civil Court of Justice, may be said to include properly all acts, omissions, and concealments which involve a breach of legal or equitable duty, trust or confidence, justly reposed, and are injurious to another, or by which an undue or unconscientious advantage is taken of another. All surprise, trick, cunning, dissembling and other unfair way that is used to cheat any one is considered as fraud. Fraud in all cases implies a wilful act on the part of any one, whereby another is sought to be deprived, by illegal or inequitable means, of what he is entitled to.

[366] The legal elements of fraud at law are: (1) dishonest conduct; (2) an intention to deceive; and (3) damages suffered by the innocent party. To determine if conduct is dishonest, an objective standard is applied. It is conduct which a reasonable, decent person would consider dishonest.

[367] The intention element of fraud is established by proof of subjective knowledge of the prohibited act, and subjective knowledge that the act could have as a consequence deprivation, in the sense of causing another to lose its pecuniary interest in certain property or in placing that interest at risk. There is no requirement that the accused subjectively appreciate the dishonesty of his acts. Generally, the primary objective of fraudsmen is to advantage themselves:

R. v. Théroux, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 5;

R. v. Olan, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1175.

[368] I am satisfied that the actions of Grenon and Pointer constitute fraud. They wilfully conspired to deprive Stampeder by inequitable means of its right to complete its financing on the public market. Any reasonable, decent and objective business person, fully acquainted with the facts would consider their conduct dishonest and fraudulent.

(b) Conspiracy to cause economic harm

[369] A thorough discussion of the tort of conspiracy is found in Justice Berger's reasons for judgment in Ed Miller Sales & Rentals Ltd. (supra) [p. 501]:

> "The leading Canadian authority on the tort of civil conspiracy is Canada Cement LaFarge Ltd. et al v. British Columbia Lightweight Aggregate Ltd. et al., [1983] 1 S.C.R. 452; 47 N.R. 191. At pp. 471-472, Estey, J., dealt with the requisite elements in a conspiracy action:
>
> " 'Although the law concerning the scope of the tort of conspiracy is far from clear, I am of the opinion that whereas the law of tort does not permit an action against an individual defendant who has caused injury to the plaintiff, the law of torts does recognize a claim against them in combination as the tort of conspiracy if:
> " '(1) whether the means used by the defendants are lawful or unlawful, the predominant purpose of the defendants' conduct is to cause injury to the plaintiff; or
> " '(2) where the conduct of the defendants is unlawful, the conduct is directed towards the plaintiff (alone or together with others), and the defendants should know in the circumstances that injury to the plaintiff is likely to and does result.
> " 'In situation (2) it is not necessary that the predominant purpose of the defendants' conduct be to cause injury to the plaintiff but, in the prevailing circumstances, it must be a constructive intent derived from the fact that the defendants should have known that injury to the plaintiff would ensue. In both situations, however, there must be actual damage suffered by the plaintiff.' "

[370] The key to the recognition of the tort of conspiracy is to determine the purpose or object in the minds of the alleged conspirators when they acted as they did. I am satisfied that the predominant purpose of the actions of Grenon, Edwards and Pointer, working together, was to injure Stampeder by interfering with its ability to raise capital on the public market, and thereby force Stampeder to make a deal with Colborne.

[371] The tort of conspiracy to cause economic harm has, I find, been made out.

(c) Interference with economic interests by unlawful means

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

[372] I have described this tort as the unlawful interference with a valid business interest, using unlawful means, with the object and effect of causing damage to another.

[373] I have described Colborne's actions in creating what I have described as the false right of first refusal and unanimous shareholder agreements, and their actions in luring Stampeder into completing the purchase of Group's shares and the Bank interest, without revealing the agreements. Once Stampeder had committed itself to the $30 million acquisition, and, to the knowledge of Colborne, was about to go to the public market with a share warrant issue, Colborne published a press release to the investment community (Tab 398) stating:

> Colborne Capital Corporation ("Colborne") announces that it is in the process of filing a lawsuit against Stampeder Exploration Ltd. ("Stampeder") seeking to terminate the transaction recently announced by Stampeder concerning the acquisition of an unnamed private company or seeking damages in the alternative.

[374] I am satisfied that the only purpose for which this press release was published by Colborne was to interfere with Stampeder's ability to raise the funds it required on the open market.

[375] The defendants by counterclaim intentionally sought to injure Stampeder's valid economic interest: the right to raise funds on the public market. The means employed were fraudulent and unlawful, and caused Stampeder damage.

[376] The tort of interference with economic interests by unlawful means has, I find, been made out.

(d) Abuse of Process

[377] Fleming, in his text The Law of Torts, 1992, 8th ed., provides a helpful description of what constitutes abuse of process where, at p. 622, he says the tort occurs:

> … where a legal process, not itself devoid of foundation, has been perverted for some extraneous purpose …
>
> … the misuse of process, no matter how properly obtained, for any purpose other than that to which it was designed to serve. It involves the notion that the proceedings were "merely a stalking-horse to coerce the defendant in some way entirely outside the ambit of the legal claim upon which the court is asked to adjudicate". It is therefore immaterial whether the suit thus commenced was founded on reasonable cause or even terminated in favour of the instigator: the improper purpose is the gravamen of liability.
>
> In addition to the improper purpose, there must be some overt act or threat, distinct from the proceedings themselves, in furtherance of that purpose…

[378] A helpful discussion on abuse of process is to be found in the Reasons for Judgment of Madam Justice Fruman in Rocky Mountain Rail Society v. H & D Hobby

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

Distributing Ltd. (Alta. Q.B.), dated 2 March 1995 (as yet unreported) [reported 27 Alta. L.R. (3d) 424].

[379] I have concluded that the statement of claim herein was issued by Colborne as part of an overall scheme to force Stampeder into making a deal with Colborne to part with the tax attributes of Petro. The issuance of statement of claim; the publication of the press release; the releasing of the secret documents to Stampeder; the phone calls to Williams and Surbey to advise that "a deal could be made" (meaning a deal to transfer the tax attributes to Colborne); and the timing of all these events; taken together with Grenon's previous statement forecasting such a course of action for the purpose of interfering with Stampeder's ability to raise the required funds on the capital markets, all satisfy me both with respect to the requirement of improper purpose, and the requirement that there be proof of definite actions in furtherance of such a purpose. What Colborne was attempting to obtain by issuing the statement of claim in combination with its other action was totally outside the scope of the action itself. Colborne was trying to use the action to obtain something that it could not obtain by way of the action itself. In my view, the issuance of a court process to further such an unlawful scheme constitutes an abuse of the court's process. The scheme, and the steps taken to implement it, constitute the overt action required for the establishment of the tort. Stampeder is not required to prove that Colborne lacked reasonable and probable grounds for initiating the action.

[380] I am satisfied that claim tort of abuse of process has been established.

6. Damages

(a) Pecuniary loss

[381] Stampeder's plan, from the outset, had been to go to the public market to raise the funds required for its acquisition of Petro. The company had been particularly successful in 1992, and again in 1993 in acquiring oil and gas properties which fit well with Stampeder's existing holdings, and thereby increasing its production of oil and gas, and its cash flow per share, and ultimately the value of its shares as a publicly traded junior oil and gas company, listed on the TSE. The market for oil and gas stocks was particularly "hot" during the first nine months of 1993. Tonken, Stampeder's president, knew this and planned the acquisition of Petro in the justifiable expectation that such a favourable acquisition would not only allow him to raise the required funds on the market but would result in a continuance of the rather dramatic increase in the price of Stampeder stock.

[382] Through previous public financings, Stampeder, and its president Tonken, had carefully built a reputation with blocks of investors in eastern Canada with whom he had acquired a trustworthy reputation based on his proven ability to carry out the plans for Stampeder that he described to institutional investors, in visits to Toronto and Montreal. The company had also established a record of successful performance with the leading underwriters in Calgary, and in particular Peters & Co. which specialized in energy stocks.

[383] Tonken had, from time to time, kept his group of institutional investors and underwriters informed as to his expectations with respect to the Petro acquisition.

[384] Stampeder stock consistently outperformed all relevant stock price indices, hitting a high of $7 5/8 near the end of June 1993. I am satisfied on the evidence that the market, in June, was anticipating a further acquisition by Stampeder and that this acquisition was reflected in the trading value of the stock. In July, the Stampeder stock fell with the rest of the oil and gas market to a closing price of $5.50. By August 3rd, the date Stampeder's acquisition of Petro closed, the stock had risen to $6.12. In August, 1993, after Stampeder closed its purchase of Petro, the oil and gas market continued to rise steadily to an all time high reached on September 3rd. However, notwithstanding the fact that Stampeder stock had consistently outperformed the various oil and gas indices in 1993, Stampeder stock remained flat in August, and did not participate in the rally. I am satisfied that the reason for this was the allegations made in the statement of claim issued by Colborne on August 6th, and the press release which Colborne caused to be published on the same day, both of which were designed to convince the investing community that Colborne was in a position to set aside Stampeder's acquisition.

[385] Furthermore, sometime between August 3rd and August 6th, Grenon telephoned Michael Timms, the president of Peters & Co. (who he knew to be the normal lead underwriter for Stampeder at that time), referred to Stampeder's acquisition of Petro, and told Timms that Colborne intended to assert a prior right to acquire that company, and said to Timms, "Presumably no underwriter would finance this deal with this kind of cloud hanging over it." I am satisfied that the purpose to this call was to interfere with Stampeder's right to go to the public market for funds.

[386] The defendant by counterclaim, Murray Edwards, also had a number of telephone conversations with Timms. On August 8th, Edwards "reminded" Timms that Peters & Co. had a business relationship with Colborne and with Edwards and Grenon personally. Timms replied: "Yes, but we also have an obligation to Stampeder in this circumstance and at the end of the day we have to do what's right." I am satisfied that Edwards' call was intended to interfere with Stampeder's financing.

[387] The evidence is clear that Colborne's allegations caused uncertainty in the investing community generally, and especially Stampeder's group of institutional investors, and to Peters & Co., who Stampeder had selected as the lead underwriter for its impending stock warrant issue.

[388] I was particularly impressed with the evidence of William Gobert, a securities analyst doing investment research with Peters & Co. for sixteen years. Gobert majored in mathematics and holds a Masters degree in business administration with a major in finance, and is a Chartered financial analyst. I accept his evidence - that the expectation on August 3rd would be that Stampeder stock would perform in the relative order of magnitude of the Peters Picks index - as the best evidence available as to what would have been the performance of Stampeder stock during the period immediately following August 3rd, but for the actions of Colborne. I am satisfied that the probabilities are that it would have performed as expected: generally in the same magnitude as the index referred to, which reached an all time high on September 3rd. Had Stampeder stock followed that pattern it would have reached a price of $7.08 on that day; instead, it remained flat at $5.50.

[389] Stampeder had planned to raise the funds necessary for the Petro acquisition by a public issue of $5.5 million stock warrants. The matter of fixing the price for each warrant was left to be determined by agreement between Stampeder and its lead broker, Peters & Co., on the day of the actual issue. The warrants were issued on August 13th, and the price was fixed at $5.50, the price for the stock on that day. Counsel for Stampeder submits that this date was forced upon Stampeder by the events culminating on August 6th, but the evidence does not satisfy me that this is the case. Stampeder was anxious to proceed with the issue while the market was hot and I am not satisfied that it would have waited until later in the month of August to issue the warrants (when the index was higher) but for the actions of the plaintiff. I am, however, satisfied that Colborne's actions caused the price fixed for the issue on August 13th (that day's market price) to be lower than it would otherwise have been, because of Colborne's unwarranted interference which caused the market price of Stampeder stock to remain flat after August 3rd, rather than rise as the rest of the equivalent market did.

[390] Had Stampeder's stock performed as the witness Gobert reasonably expected, the warrants would have issued at $6.16 per share, the calculated market price for August 13th. I consider this to be a conservative approach to the determination of what the shares would have brought but for the interference by the defendants by counterclaim, because in using averages of the prices actually attained by similar stock, to establish the probable price, I have not taken into account the fact that Stampeder was bringing "an excellent acquisition to a red hot market."

[391] I also consider this approach valid because it does not represent an attempt to predict what a stock would do in the future but what the stock most probably would have done based, by hindsight not foresight, on what other stocks in an equivalent category actually did.

[392] In McGregor on Damages, 15th ed., para. 1725, the author, in dealing with the value to be placed on shares when assessing damages in tort, warns that: "… care must be taken not to assess the value of the shares at the price at which they stand in the market, since such a price may be a false and artificial one induced by the very deceit of which the plaintiff is complaining." And he concludes that [para. 1726]: "The actual value is, therefore, the price the shares would fetch in the market if the truth was revealed and all the facts were known."

[393] The loss to Stampeder, calculated as the difference between $6.16 per share (the probable share price on August 13th) and the actual issue price of $5.50, multiplied by 5.5 M, being the total number of shares issued, is $3,630,000, and I award that sum as the pecuniary damage caused to Stampeder by Colborne's wrongful interference.

(b) General damages

[394] Stampeder seeks an award for damages at large, for loss of reputation and expense in defending the lawsuit. I do not intend to embark upon a discussion of this developing area of the law. In my view, there is no evidence to support a conclusion that Stampeder sustained any permanent material loss to its business reputation or interests sufficient to warrant a consideration of damages under this head.

(c) Exemplary or punitive damages

[395] I am of the view that this is an appropriate case in which to consider the imposition of exemplary or punitive damages.

[396] The conduct of the defendants by counterclaim has been motivated by jealousy and greed. It has encompassed the torts of conspiracy and abuse of process. The conduct has so far exceeded the bounds of ordinary corporate morality as to warrant an award of punitive damages designed to make a statement to the business community that the courts of civil law will not condone excessive conduct of this kind nor tolerate an abuse of court process.

[397] In considering what is an appropriate amount for such an award, I have in mind that Colborne sought to employ a devious and tortious scheme, and to abuse the process of the court, to gain a profit which Grenon predicted, at one point, to be in the vicinity of $15 million.

[398] Counsel for Stampeder seeks an award of $5 million in punitive damages, but in my view, even given the means employed and the amounts involved, an award of $1 million is sufficient to convey the message the court wishes to convey.

7. Costs

[399] Stampeder, having succeeded in its defence to the action brought against it and also on its counterclaim, is entitled to the costs of both the action and the counterclaim. I invite counsel to address the details of the costs award in my private chambers or otherwise as may be arranged. However, it is my intention that should be assessed, not on the usual party and party basis, but on a solicitor/client basis, to be taxed, if necessary, by the taxing officer of the court.

[400] My reason for awarding costs on a solicitor/client basis is that the plaintiffs' actions were intended to be used as a lever to intimidate Stampeder into making a deal with the plaintiffs, and constituted an abuse of process. Stampeder should not be required to fund such a lawsuit in any way.

8. Interest

[401] Stampeder is entitled to recover interest from the defendants by counterclaim, pursuant to the provisions of the Judgment Interest Act of Alberta.

9. The Claims of Pointer v. Group and Petro

(a) Pointer's claim to an equity interest

[402] It will be recalled that on April 30th, 1992 Group completed an arrangement with the Bank of Montreal to restructure Petro's debt with the Bank. The Bank and Group agreed at that time that Group should arrange for an incentive for Petro management, the cost of which would be borne equally by the Bank (which held a 49.9% option on the shares of Petro) and Group. The purpose was to ensure that management, Group and the Bank had the same objectives for Group's shares. Pointer knew this was the purpose of the equity incentive plan. The general arrangement with the Bank was that Group was to have the right to issue up to 10% of the stock of Group to the management of Petro. How this was to be done was left with Group to work out. Pointer was anxious to get something documented to record this understanding.

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

[403] It will be recalled that by October 1992, at the initiative of Group, Pointer and Grenon (who was still with Peters & Co.), and Petro's solicitor Tom Olson, had worked out a tentative plan for a further restructuring of Petro's debt and shareholdings which involved the insertion of a new company between Group and Petro.

[404] In November 1992, Pointer instructed John Reid, a partner of Olson, to incorporate a company to be inserted between Group and Petro, which would be wholly-owned by Group and would hold Group's shares of Petro.

[405] Reid incorporated 542775 Alberta Ltd. (542) and, on Pointer's instructions, the shares of 542 were issued to Pointer and Savage, each as to 50%. Pointer was initially shown as the sole director and president of the Co., although Pointer told Reid that the directors of 542 were to be the same as the directors of Petro.

[406] Pointer then had Reid prepare a set of documents which purported to be a stock option agreement from 542 to Pointer and Savage, and an exercise of that stock option, and a unanimous shareholders agreement of 542, the effect of which was that, by this purely internal means, the shareholders of 542 (the company which was to hold all of Group's shares of Petro) were shown to be Pointer and Savage as to 10% and Group as to 90%. None of this was known to nor approved by Group.

[407] Pointer's next step was to have the Petro Board of Directors approve, subject to the approval of the Group Board, the plan to have a new company inserted between Group and Petro and to agree to a 10% participation to be split between Pointer and Savage, subject to documentation being finalized and "presented to" the Group Board.

[408] Pointer's next step was to attend a meeting of the Group Board of Directors on December 10th, 1992. I accept the evidence of David Bookbinder and Geer as to what transpired at this meeting from the perspective of the directors of Group. Pointer presented the stock option plan. Geer and other directors were dismayed to find that 542 was not 100% owned by Group and that Pointer and Savage were minority shareholders. As a result, the question of an equity participation for Pointer and Savage was deferred, to be considered at the next meeting of the Group Board to be held in February 1993. However, the Board was persuaded by Pointer that if Group transferred its shares to the new holding company (542) before the end of the year, this would accomplish a saving of $300,000 in Saskatchewan capital tax. The Board agreed to this on the basis that 542 would simply be a shell company and that Group would continue to be the beneficial owner of 100% of the shares of Petro.

[409] In fact, when the share transfer took place in late December 1992, it was to a company (542), 10% of the shares of which company were shown to be held by Pointer and Savage. As I have earlier stated, the $300,000 tax saving never materialized.

[410] The result was that in early January 1993, the shares of Group were held by 542, a company in which Pointer and Savage held 10% of the shares, and the president and sole director of which was Pointer.

[411] When Chase and Geer discovered this state of affairs in early January 1993, Pointer was given instructions to transfer the shares back into the name of Group, but did not do so until Chase told him that if it was not done by the February Board meeting of Group, Pointer would (in effect) be without a job. However, despite the clear understanding that the directors of 542 were to be identical to the directors of Petro, this was not formalized by Pointer until July 27th.

[412] The result was that during the critical events that took place from February to July 1993, Pointer was in a position where he was improperly shown to be the sole director and president of 542. As we have seen, he proceeded to use that paper position for the purpose of signing resolutions and the unanimous shareholders agreement with Colborne as the sole director and officer of 542, in a fraudulent attempt to defeat the interests of Group, the shareholder of 542.

[413] Returning to the sequence of events with respect to the management incentive agreement, the Board of Group, at its February 24th meeting, agreed in principle to provide Pointer and Savage with a 10% equity participation, the details of which were to be agreed upon. This ultimately took the form of an agreement that out of the $2 million to be received from the sale of Group's shares to Stampeder, Pointer and Savage would receive 10% or $100,000 each.

[414] No written agreement was prepared, other than a Release which Pointer drafted, signed and delivered to Group on August 6th. The release (Tab 391) recited the efforts of Pointer in creating equity value in Petro, the sale of the shares to Stampeder (Ricinus) and the fact that Group, on behalf of 542 and Petro, had agreed to compensate Pointer in lieu of documenting the equity option, and provided for the payment by Group to Pointer in the amount of $100,000, in satisfaction of all claims. Pointer sent the release to Group on the morning of August 6th, and on receipt Chase, as arranged with Pointer, immediately drew a cheque for $100,000 to be couriered to Pointer that day.

[415] It will be remembered that Grenon had agreed with Pointer that the right of first refusal and unanimous shareholder documents would not be revealed until that day

(August 6th). There is no doubt in my mind that this arrangement was made to enable Pointer to get his money before Group discovered the existence of the secret documents.

[416] When the statement of claim was served on Stampeder alleging the existence of a right of first refusal and a unanimous shareholder agreement, Tonken immediately called Chase and Geer in Vancouver. When Chase learned of the secret agreements he went to the mail which had been set out for the courier pick up, retrieved the letter and the cheque to Pointer for $100,000, which he cancelled forthwith.

[417] I am satisfied that Pointer, by his conduct, has forfeited his right to be compensated by Group for the incentive option.

[418] The very basis for the participation incentive was to ensure that management's objectives were attuned to the stakeholders' objectives (Group and the Bank) in dealing with matters concerning Group's shares. Instead of working with Group and the Bank, Pointer sought to defeat their objectives.

[419] Altogether apart from the duty which Pointer assumed by entering into the incentive agreement, I have already stated my conclusion - based upon the decision of this court in Tongue v. Vencap Equities Alberta Ltd. (supra) - that in matters concerning Group's shares, Pointer was acting outside the ordinary duties of a director of Petro, and in the capacity as an agent of Group, and that he owed a duty to Group arising out of that relationship. See also: Martin v. Gibson (1907), 15 O.L.R. 623 at 631-32 (H.C.), where a resolution that shares be at the disposal of the directors constituted the directors trustees for the shareholders.

[420] Counsel for Pointer submits that Pointer, as a director of Petro, was acting in the best interests of the corporation. I have already expressed the views of the court on that subject and they are equally applicable here.

[421] In the circumstances I have described, Pointer's primary duty, insofar as Group's shares were concerned, was to advance the interests of the sole shareholder, the major stakeholder, and those who held the pledge of the shares, all of whom were in agreement as to the course of action to be followed with respect to those shares. I am unable to identify any other interests to which Pointer owed a duty as a director in dealing with those shares, and certainly none that would allow him not only to ignore those interests, but to work secretly to frustrate them.

[422] The observations of Berger J. in Teck Corp. v. Millar (1972), 33 D.L.R. (3d) 288 [[1973] 2 W.W.R. 385] (B.C.S.C.), are pertinent (p. 315):

> It would be altogether a mistake if the law, in seeking to adapt itself to the reality of corporate struggles, were to allow the directors any opportunity of achieving an advantage for themselves at the expense of the shareholders. The thrust of companies legislation has brought us a long way since Percival v. Wright, [1902] 2 Ch. 421.
>
> If the directors have the right to consider the consequences of a takeover, and to exercise their powers to meet it, if they do so bona fide in the interests of the company, how is the Court to determine their purpose? In every case the directors will insist their whole purpose was to serve the company's interest. And no doubt in most cases it will not be difficult for the directors to persuade themselves that it is in the company's best interests that they should remain in office. Something more than a mere assertion of good faith is required.
> How can the Court go about determining whether the directors have abused their powers in a given case? How are the Courts to know, in an appropriate case, that the directors were genuinely concerned about the company and not merely pursuing their own selfish interests? Well, a similar task has been attempted in cases of conspiracy to injure. There the question is whether the primary object of those alleged to have acted in combination is to promote their own interests or to damage the interests of others: Crofter Hand Woven Harris Tweed Co. v. Veitch, [1942] A.C. 435.

[423] The evidence satisfies me that Pointer was acting in the advancement of his own interests in behaving the way he did. The Grenon plan at first offered the revitalization of Petro and, hence, continued employment for Pointer. When the Grenon plan changed to a merger with Trocana and the consequent disappearance of Petro as a separate company, I believe Pointer came to be motivated by the lure of personal profit to be gained from a 5% interest in a new corporation, an interest which, on the basis of Grenon's toutings, could have been worth (to Pointer) anywhere from $650,000 to a million and a half dollars.

[424] Returning then to Pointer's claim to be entitled to enforce the incentive agreement and to recover from Group the sum of $100,000, I am satisfied that Pointer:

(a) breached the conditions upon which the agreement was based;

(b) failed in his duty as an agent of Group in dealing with Group's shares;

(c) failed in his general duty as a director of the corporation by working secretly to frustrate the wishes of the sole shareholder, the Bank which was major stakeholder, and the Group lenders to whom the shares of the corporation were pledged, all of whom agreed that the shares be sold to Stampeder;

(d) failed in his duty to act honestly and fairly in dealing with other directors and the shareholder of Petro and to provide full, complete and timely information to them on essential matters;

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

(e) fraudulently conspired with Grenon to enter into a right of first refusal agreement intended to defeat the interests of the shareholder of Group;

(f) fraudulently abused his false position as sole director and president of 542 to make agreements purporting to affect the shares of 542 when he knew 542 was merely a trustee of the shares for Group;

(g) failed to act with candour and openness as a director of Petro;

(h) conspired to keep secret documents executed by him which he knew would be damaging to both Group and the Bank, in the expectation that he would receive payment under the agreement before the existence of the documents was discovered;

(i) falsely purported to act in the best interests of the company by putting Petro in a position where it would either be merged and disappear, or find itself with an obligation in liquidated damages in the sum of $17 million.

[425] By his actions, Pointer has violated the spirit and terms of the arrangement under which he was to receive an incentive and has put himself in a position where he is not entitled to benefit from the incentive agreement. His claim against Group, 542 and Petro under that agreement is dismissed.

(b) Pointer's claim for the balance due under the terms of his severance agreement with Petro

[426] During the course of the negotiations which eventually culminated in the sale of Group's shares to Stampeder, Chase and Pointer discussed the fact that if the negotiations with respect to Group's shares should result in the termination of Pointer's employment he should be entitled to severance compensation.

[427] These discussions came to a head on July 27th, when, after a detailed review with Pointer, Chase recommended to Geer that Savage should receive a severance payment in the sum of $225,000, and Pointer the sum of $175,000. Both Pointer and Savage agreed, in writing, that the severance arrangement should be unique to the Stampeder deal, and if the Stampeder deal did not close the agreement would be null and void. The arrangement was approved by Geer, and on July 28th, a severance agreement (Tab 328) between Pointer and Petro, which Pointer had drafted, was signed by him, faxed to Vancouver and signed by Chase for Petro, on the same day.

[428] It will be remembered that it was just at this time that Pointer was signing the unanimous shareholder agreement between 542 and Colborne, and the revised versions of the right of first refusal agreement, and was conspiring with Grenon to keep these documents secret until after Stampeder closed its purchase of Group's shares. Pointer revealed none of this to Chase during the final negotiations for and the execution of the severance agreement. In fact, Pointer arranged with Grenon that the documents would not be revealed until after he had received his payment on the equity and severance agreements.

[429] When the Group/Stampeder transaction closed on August 3rd, Pointer endeavoured to obtain payment - on that day - of the entire sum payable under the severance agreement; however, Stampeder (Petro) paid him one half, being $87,500, on August 3rd, and exercised its right to pay the balance in 30 days time, expecting that it would employ Pointer during that transition period. Pointer accepted the payment, and agreed to continue in Petro's employment as required, but continued to conceal the existence of the documents from Stampeder and Petro, having removed them from the Petro office before the turn over. When Stampeder discovered, on August 6th, the truth as to Pointer's conduct, his employment was terminated and payment of the balance due under the severance was withheld. Pointer sued Petro, Group and 542, for the balance due under the severance, and Petro counterclaimed against Pointer for the return of the monies paid.

[430] Pointer acted fraudulently in inducing Chase to enter into the severance agreement under the circumstances I have described. He obtained the Chase agreement and his execution of the document as a director of Petro, by deceiving him as to the true role he was playing in the final stages of the negotiations with Stampeder. The representation was that he, as a director of Petro, was assisting Group in its intention to sell its shares to Stampeder when the true facts were that he was, at that very time, conspiring with Grenon to prevent the completion of the transaction or if the transaction did close to have Petro in a position where it would owe millions of dollars to Colborne in liquidated damages. The severance agreement was induced by this fraudulent misrepresentation as to the true state of affairs. The misrepresentation was material in that it went to the factual foundation upon which the parties entered into contract. In these circumstance es the party deceived is entitled to damages and rescission.

[431] The contract is rescinded and Petro is entitled to judgment against Pointer for the amount paid under the contract. Pointer's claim against Petro, 542 and Group is dismissed, and Petro's counterclaim is allowed in the sum of $87,500, in both cases with costs on a party and party basis.

1995 CanLII 9100 (AB KB)

[432] While dealing with the Pointer action, I should say as well that: as I have dismissed the claim of the plaintiffs Grenon, Edwards and Colborne, against all defendants, it is not necessary for me to make any formal disposition of the third party notice against Pointer. However, I will hear submissions from counsel as to costs in the Pointer action, and also with respect to the third party proceedings against Pointer, in private chambers or as may be arranged, recognizing that a significant portion of the 97 days occupied in hearing the evidence on this trial (apart altogether from the time spent in dealing with argument) was attributable to the third party proceedings against Pointer and the Pointer action itself.

IV. Summary of Conclusions

Action No. 9301-12382

(a) The claims of the plaintiffs Colborne Capital Corporation, James T. Grenon and Murray Edwards are dismissed;

(b) The counterclaim of Westar Petro Ltd., Stampeder Exploration Ltd. and Ricinus Holdings Ltd. against Colborne, Grenon, Edwards and Pointer is allowed in the sum of:

(i)	Pecuniary damages	$3,630,000;
(ii)	Punitive damages	$1,000,000;
	Total	$4,630,000

(c) Interest is allowed under the terms of the Judgment Interest Act.

Action No. 9301-13674

(d) The claim of Pointer is dismissed;

(e) The counterclaim of Petro against Pointer is allowed in the sum of $85,000;

(f) Interest is allowed under the terms of the Judgment Interest Act.

(g) Costs in both actions have been dealt with in a general way but counsel are invited to attend in private chambers or as arranged, within thirty days, to resolve cost issues if required.

[433] The able assistance of all counsel has been greatly appreciated by the court.

Actions dismissed; counterclaims allowed.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT RESERVED

PER CURIAM:

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[1] This appeal raises issues concerning the scope of the powers of a director of a single shareholder company and the standard of conduct governing competitors for the control of a corporation.

I. INTRODUCTION

[2] It will be useful to commence with a brief description of the parties and the history of this matter.

A. Parties

[3] Westar Group Ltd. ("Group") is a private holding corporation with offices in Vancouver, British Columbia. Originally it held, among other interests, all the issued shares of Westar Petroleum Ltd. (“Petroleum”). Most of Group’s subsidiaries performed poorly after a drop in world commodity prices in 1984. One of them, Westar Mining Ltd. went into bankruptcy leaving a large unpaid debt to the Bank of Montreal (“th Bank”), one of Group’s bankers. Thereafter, relations between Group and that bank were strained. Group’s shares in Petroleum had been pledged to a consortium of bankers as security for Group’s debt of $300 million. In 1988, Group began to search for opportunities to sell its shares of Petroleum or to restructure the company to obtain some return on its investment.

[4] Westar Petroleum Ltd. ("Petroleum") was an oil and gas corporation wholly owned by Group. In early 1993, its assets were roughly $30 million. But it owed about $43 million to the Bank of Montreal. The debt was converted into $24.4 million in distress preferred shares and an oil bond for the remaining $18.4 million. As well, the Bank took security on all of Petroleum’s assets and an option on 49.9% of Group’s shares in Petroleum. The Bank also did a monthly cash sweep leaving Petroleum only enough cash for operations but none for exploration or development. Between Group and the Bank of Montreal, the latter had as much or more control over any plan affecting the restructuring of Petroleum or the sale of Group's shares in that company. Group had written down the value of its shares in Petroleum to a nominal amount. However, Petroleum was not entirely without value. It had on its books losses of about $100 million which, as tax attributes, were potentially valuable to third parties.

[5] Thomas Pointer ("Pointer") was a director, Chief Financial Officer and Secretary of Petroleum at all relevant times. He began his employment with Petroleum in 1985, and in May 1991, became an officer and director of the company. He was also a director and officer (President) of 542775 Alberta Ltd. at the relevant times. One of his responsibilities was to propose, for Group's consideration, a method to use Petroleum's accumulated tax losses and resource pools and thereby create some value in Petroleum for Group.

[6] 542775 Alberta Ltd. ("542") was a company controlled by Group. Incorporated in September 1992 at the instigation of Pointer, 542 was to help facilitate a tentative plan of re-organization proposed to the Group board of directors by James Grenon and Pointer. In December 1992, Group transferred its shares of Petroleum to 542.

[7] James Grenon ("Grenon") is a "merchant banker" (so described by the trial judge), a lawyer and a broker formerly employed by Peters & Co., a Calgary brokerage house. He and Murray Edwards are the principals of Colborne Capital Corporation.

[8] Murray Edwards ("Edwards") is also a "merchant banker", a lawyer and a broker formerly employed by Peters & Co. Edwards and Grenon, through Colborne, were active and successful in revitalizing companies by re-organization and financial restructuring.

[9] Colborne Capital Corporation ("Colborne") is a private Alberta corporation, controlled by Grenon and Edwards. In their activities leading to this litigation they sometimes referred to themselves as “GE”. For simplicity, where the context permits, Colborne, Grenon and Edwards will be referred to as “GE”.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[10] Stampeder Exploration Ltd. ("Stampeder") was a public "junior" oil and gas company with offices in Calgary, Alberta. It had properties in the area of Kindersley, Saskatchewan which were intermingled with Petroleum’s properties. The operations of the two companies were similar. As a consequence of acquiring another company with interests in the same area, Stampeder’s shares, listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange, rose substantially. In January 1993, it was looking for another acquisition. Stampeder banked at the Bank of Montreal. Early in 1993, a senior Bank employee informed Jeff Tonken, President of Stampeder (“Tonken”), that the Bank was considering selling its interest in Petroleum. Tonken met with other Bank officials and obtained more particulars. It was evident to him that Stampeder would have to buy the Bank’s debt and share option and then would have to buy the shares of Petroleum from Group since the Bank did not actually own any of them. Tonken made a “soft” offer of $28 million to the Bank for its interests which he believed the Bank would accept. He then communicated with Robert Chase, Chief Financial Officer of Group and a director of Petroleum (“Chase”), to advise of Stampeder’s interest in buying Group’s shares of Petroleum. Stampeder ultimately purchased the Bank of Montreal's debt and security position in Petroleum for $28 million.

[11] Ricinus Holdings Ltd. ("Ricinus") is a subsidiary of Stampeder which purchased all the outstanding shares of Petroleum for $2 million on August 3, 1993.

B. History

[12] Colborne, Grenon and Edwards (“GE”) claimed their rights of first refusal were violated when Stampeder and Ricinus acquired Petroleum. They also alleged breach of a unanimous shareholders agreement, intentional interference with contractual relations, and unlawful interference with economic interests. This litigation is essentially an inquiry into the validity of the interests claimed by GE.

[13] Some events in the history of this matter are interpreted differently by the various parties. The trial judge generally rejected the interpretations advanced by GE. Those trial findingsweare the subject of vigorous attack on this appeal. The disputed findings will be dealt with when discussing the trial judgment. But there are many undisputed facts which provide the superstructure of this matter.

[14] One of the key background facts was the relationship between Group and the Bank of Montreal. Group's debt of $27 million to the Bank of Montreal and its $300 million debt to the Group lenders greatly exceeded the value of its assets. As security for the indebtedness of Group, the Bank of Montreal held preferred C shares of Westshore Industries Ltd. (“the Westshore shares”), a subsidiary of Group. The Bank, as well as Group, regarded those shares as having little or no intrinsic value. However, the directors of Group, hoping to be able to restructure and refinance Group, regarded the acquisition of those shares from the Bank, and their cancellation, as fundamentally necessary to that plan. Because of the strained relationship between Group and the Bank of Montreal referred to earlier, the Bank was not prepared to readily give up the shares despite their insignificant worth.

[15] Group considered that the Bank of Montreal could not succeed in its desire to sell its debt and security interest in Petroleum without Group’s co-operation. Initially, the Bank was not prepared to tie the transfer of the Westshore shares with any sale of its interests in Petroleum. On April 27, 1993, the Bank of Montreal accepted Stampeder's offer for the Bank's interest in Petroleum, but that sale was conditional on Stampeder acquiring the Petroleum shares controlled by Group. Group withheld making any deal with Stampeder until the Bank agreed to sell the Westshore shares back to it. Eventually, the Bank agreed to do so for $500,000 and Group arranged for the sale of Petroleum shares to Stampeder.

[16] The involvement of GE with Group and Petroleum began in 1989 when Edwards, then associated with Peters & Co., was approached by Pointer about a transaction involving Group's shares of Petroleum. Nothing concrete developed from that.

[17] On July 11, 1991, Group engaged Peters & Co., where Edwards and Grenon were associated, to provide financial assistance in raising capital by using Petroleum's tax losses. Action on this was deferred because the demands of the Bank of Montreal became the more pressing problem.

[18] After the completion of the debt restructuring with the Bank of Montreal in 1992, Group returned to Peters & Co. On June 9, 1992, Pointer signed a letter agreement engaging Peters & Co. Capital Limited, a joint venture between Grenon, Edwards and Peters & Co., as a financial advisor. Peters & Co. Capital Limited intended that the engagement be with Group. But Pointer told Grenon to have the engagement letter addressed to Petroleum rather than Group since he was not authorised to sign for Group. Pointer said that eventually he would arrange to transfer the obligation to Group.

[19] By late October 1992, Grenon with input from Pointer and Petroleum's tax lawyer had developed a plan for restructuring Petroleum. It involved the transfer of Group's shares in Petroleum to a new company. Chase obtained approval from Group's lenders to whom the shares were pledged.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[20] On December 10, 1992, the Group board approved the proposal to transfer the Petroleum shares to 542 which was to be wholly owned by Group. Pointer advised the Board that if the transfer was completed before the year end, a saving of $300,000 in Saskatchewan capital tax would result.

[21] Pointer set up the incorporation of 542. Initially, Pointer had arranged that he and David Savage, another Petroleum director and its chief operating officer ("Savage"), owned a 10% interest in 542 with the remaining shares held by Group. This was in anticipation of obtaining the approval of Group's board for a share option plan. That approval was delayed and Pointer was ordered by Chase to transfer the 10% to Group so that Group would hold 100% of the 542 shares. Pointer did so in early 1993.

[22] Pointer also knew that the board of directors of 542 was to mirror that of Petroleum, but he took no steps to effect the necessary changes with the result that he remained the sole director and officer of the company during the most critical events leading to this litigation.

[23] On January 18, 1993, Grenon advised Pointer that he and Edwards had severed their connection with Peters & Co. Grenon proposed that GE should participate in the restructuring of Petroleum by the introduction of capital in exchange for an equity position. This way they would be involved as principals, rather than agents.

[24] Grenon planned that Colborne would buy the Bank's debt and security position at a substantial discount to its face value, acquire one-half of the Bank's 49.9% option on Group's shares of Petroleum for a nominal amount and then, inject capital into Petroleum to enhance the Bank's security. He planned further to have Group transfer one half of its share in Petroleum to Colborne for a nominal amount so that Colborne would have a 50% equity in the company. Thereafter, Colborne would use its expertise to restructure the company in order to obtain value for Petroleum's $100 million tax attributes. The plan was to take the company public through a corporation owned by Colborne, Group, the Bank of Montreal and the management team of Pointer and Savage.

[25] On February 9, 1993, Grenon and Pointer met with Bank of Montreal officials who expressed conditional interest in the general proposal. They made it clear that they would not look at the matter until GE had obtained the approval of Group and until there was a specific proposal. The Bank did not hear from GE again until July 2, 1993. But its interest in obtaining cash for its Petroleum assets had been stimulated and coincided with the interest of Stampeder in Petroleum's properties.

[26] Following the February 9 meeting, Grenon expressed concern to Pointer that GE might work on a restructuring but be excluded from participation in it. In a February 18 letter to Pointer, he said that GE wished to be protected against the risk of investing effort on a resolution only to find themselves "on the outside looking in".

[27] The Group board met on February 24, 1993. For that meeting, Pointer prepared a document entitled "Westar Petro Ltd. Corporate Strategy. New Equity Investment." It incorporated a tentative plan developed by Grenon with input from Pointer and tax advice from Grenon's lawyer.

[28] The day prior to the Group board meeting, Pointer reviewed the tentative proposal with Group's management committee. Peter Geer, the new president and chairman of the board ("Geer") was present. Pointer knew that there had been a power shift making Geer the key player. The committee was generally interested in the proposal, but Geer made it clear that he was not interested in a period of exclusivity for GE as requested unless he had a more detailed plan from GE which met his approval.

[29] Pointer and Chase presented the tentative GE restructuring plan to the Group board. The board wanted the credentials of Grenon and Edwards verified and a more detailed proposal to be put together before further consideration. It is not clear whether the board dismissed any potential of a period of exclusivity or right of first refusal at that time. But if not clearly dismissed, it was accepted that Group should remain free to deal with any third parties who came forward on their own initiative.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[30] The minutes of the board meeting record that:

> It was agreed that Mr. Geer, Mr. Bookbinder and Mr. Chase would review and confirm the estimated currant (sic) value of Westar Petro Ltd. and that inquiries would be made to verify the credibility and reputation of the proposed investor. It was further agreed that Mr. Savage and Mr. Pointer would obtain a specific proposal for review by the Directors and, at the appropriate time, the Bank of Montreal.
> [David Bookbinder was a director of Group.]

[31] After the meeting, Chase advised Pointer that if a period of exclusivity was necessary to keep GE interested, it should be on terms allowing Group to deal with others who came forward on their own initiative. Pointer was advised that one such party was Tonken of Stampeder and was told to contact Tonken. Chase also called Tonken and told him to meet with Pointer. As a result of that meeting and detailed information received by him, Tonken concluded that the acquisition of Petroleum would be very advantageous to Stampeder.

[32] On March 2, 1993, Stampeder offered Group a share exchange for the Petroleum shares. Geer advised Tonken that was unacceptable. On March 15, Stampeder made a cash offer. Tonken contacted Chase frequently for a response but was told that Group was considering a number of options.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[33] Grenon learned the results of the February 24 Group board meeting from Pointer. The two met frequently thereafter while Grenon struggled to put in writing something to provide GE with a period of exclusivity. The result was a letter agreement (“the March 3 letter”) between GE and Petroleum rather than Group. It was dated March 3 and signed by Grenon for GE and Pointer for Petroleum. It provided generally that Petroleum and GE would attempt to develop a restructuring plan for approval by Group. Concerning “exclusivity”, it provided that prior to Group approval of any GE plan, Petroleum would be free to meet other parties to respond to restructuring enquiries; once Group approval was obtained, GE would have a one-month exclusive period in which to attempt to obtain Bank of Montreal approval and GE would also be "granted a right of first refusal to match any offer or agreement in principal contemplating a Restructuring ..."

[34] The March 3 letter was not provided to Group until June 29 by which time all substantial impediments to a deal with Stampeder, save for any arising from the letter itself, had been removed.

[35] At a meeting on March 9 with Chase, no mention was made of the March 3 letter. Chase made it clear to Grenon and Pointer that Group was considering other offers. Neither Grenon nor Pointer raised the question of exclusivity or a right of first refusal.

[36] On March 30 (“the March 30 proposal”), Group received a proposal from GE. It sought Group's approval “in principle" and acknowledged that: "the precise legal structure can only be resolved after the Bank has agreed on Phase II." The proposal spoke of three "Phases" and acknowledged that "Phase III is not described at all...". It acknowledged that nothing could be accomplished without the co-operation of the Bank of Montreal and stated specifically that “it is not proposed that any steps for Phase I (the negotiations between Group and Colborne to establish the terms of Colborne's involvement in the restructuring) be effected without first having obtained the approval of the Bank of Montreal for Phase II.” It proposed a contribution of $1.5 million capital by GE "on condition that an agreement be reached with the Bank...". It further proposed that Group's shares of Petroleum be redistributed: 50% to GE, 22.5% to Group, 22.5% to the Bank, and 5% to Pointer and Savage. There was no reference in the proposal to the March 3 letter agreement nor to a period of exclusivity or right of first refusal.

[37] Geer and Chase reviewed the March 30 proposal and considered that it was only an outline of an idea or a discussion paper. Chase reported that to Pointer.

[38] On April 5, Grenon advised Chase by fax that GE would be prepared to offer $2.5 million for Group's Petroleum shares if a satisfactory arrangement could be made with the Bank of Montreal.

[39] Geer and Chase came to Calgary on April 7 and met separately with Pointer and Savage of Petroleum, Tonken and Bill Dickson [Vice President of Operations] of Stampeder, and Grenon and Edwards. At the Pointer/Savage meeting, Pointer and Savage urged Geer and Chase to consider the GE proposal and to help convince the Bank of Montreal to agree to it; at the Tonken/Dickson meeting, Stampeder made an offer of $2 million for Group's shares of Petroleum, subject only to a due diligence requirement (the offer was neither rejected nor accepted at that point); at the Grenon/Edwards meeting, Geer and Chase said that they favoured the GE concept but needed a more detailed proposal to take to the board.

[40] In dealings with the Bank of Montreal during April 1993, Geer and Chase attempted to convince the Bank that the GE plan was preferable to any deal with Stampeder. As already noted, the Bank accepted Stampeder's offer to purchase its interests in Petroleum and advised Pointer and Chase of that fact.

[41] On May 10, Grenon phoned Chase to request approval from Group to approach a third party candidate to participate in the GE proposal for restructuring Petroleum. After discussing it with Geer, Chase gave Grenon such approval. Grenon faxed a letter ("the May 10 letter") to

Chase to confirm the approval. Chase signed it and returned to Grenon. Thereafter, through May and June, Grenon carried on discussions with Trocana, a subsidiary of Petro-Canada, exploring details of a possible merger between Petroleum and Trocana. In the meantime, Chase continued his efforts to have the Bank of Montreal consider the GE proposal. He also informed Grenon that the Bank controlled the timetable of events and that once the Bank made up its mind, Group would have to move quickly. Chase told Grenon that Group was seeking an accommodation from the Bank but did not disclose that it related to the Westshore shares.

[42] While Grenon was endeavouring to make an arrangement with Trocana, the Stampeder deal was at a standstill due to a deadlock between Group and the Bank. Group was adamant that it would not dispose of its Petroleum shares to anyone without assurance that it would recover the Westshore shares from the Bank for $500,000.00. Group was insisting that the Bank consider the proposal of GE, but the Bank was equally adamant that it would not allow any transaction by which Group would receive more than $2 million for the Petroleum shares.

[43] In an effort to break the log jam, Tonken arranged a meeting on June 29 between officials of the Bank, Group and Stampeder. Compromises were discussed. Chase then met with Pointer and Savage, who were disappointed to learn that a deal with Stampeder was a possibility. Pointer mentioned the March 3 letter. Chase asked for a copy of it.

[44] Later on June 29, Chase and Pointer met with Bank of Montreal officials in an effort to persuade them to consider a proposal from GE. The Bank officials were intransigent on the $2 million return limit to Group and pointed out that they had not received an offer of any kind from GE. They also said the Bank was committed to deal with Stampeder.

[45] That same day, Chase and Pointer met Grenon to report on the meetings with the Bank and Stampeder. They discussed how they could persuade the Bank to consider an offer from GE and agreed that GE should make a written offer to the Bank. But the next day when Pointer called to encourage Grenon to act quickly, Grenon said there was no need to do so as GE could rely on the right of first refusal created when Chase signed the May 10 letter. Pointer asked for a copy of it. After reading it, he concluded that GE was entitled to a right of first refusal under the terms of the March 3 letter. Pointer called Chase to discuss this. Chase again asked Pointer to send him a copy of the March 3 letter, which Pointer did that day, June 30.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[46] On July 2, without consulting either Group or the directors of Petroleum, Pointer signed a letter created by Grenon, stating that the May 10 letter "constitutes the approval of Group to the Restructuring plan presented to Group by Colborne as required by the March 3, 1993 letter to [Petroleum] from Colborne, such that certain terms and conditions that commence to operate on such approval are now in effect." On the same day, Grenon wrote Chase asserting a right of first refusal saying:

> To the extent anyone attempts to conclude a restructuring without regard to our right of first refusal, we will be seeking an injunction, launching a lawsuit, etc. I can only speculate how the Bank and the potential money raisers for Stampeder might react to this. Even a relatively short delay, which is about the worst we can expect to achieve, may see the currently over-heated equity markets cool to the extent that Stampeder can't raise the money it needs.

[47] On July 5, Grenon met with Geer and Chase in Vancouver. Geer demanded that Grenon retract, in writing, the assertion of a right of first refusal. Grenon appeared to agree to do so and the next day forwarded a letter which was interpreted as such a retraction. Notwithstanding that, Grenon, engaged lawyers and worked almost daily with Pointer to create documents, including a right of first refusal agreement, willingly signed by Pointer, designed to force Stampeder into a position where it would have to make an arrangement with GE.

[48] Among the first documents signed by Pointer was a "Statement of Facts". In that statement, referring to a right of first refusal agreement, he said, "I do not feel I should execute such agreement without the approval of Group, which approval I am sure will not be forthcoming." On the advice of Grenon's lawyer, those words were removed. Later Pointer, on behalf of Petroleum, signed several versions of a right of first refusal agreement ("RFR") prepared by another of Grenon's lawyers. The final version required that the terms and conditions of the RFR not be disclosed to (amongst others) the directors or officers of Petroleum. It also provided for liquidated damages of $17 million for breach by Petroleum.

[49] Pointer also executed at least three different copies of a unanimous shareholder agreement ("USA"), allegedly on behalf of 542 as the sole shareholder of Petroleum, which essentially prohibited 542 from taking any steps in furtherance of any restructuring, winding-up, etc., without GE's written consent.

[50] While Grenon and Pointer were busy preparing what Grenon termed his "nuclear arsenal", Group, Stampeder and Bank of Montreal were finalizing the details of a sale to Stampeder.

[51] On July 30, Grenon wrote to Stampeder stating that he was aware of the imminent closing of Stampeder's purchase of Petroleum's shares, that Colborne "was hopeful that [Stampeder] will meet with us after closing the Petroleum acquisition to discuss a prospective transaction with us involving Petroleum", and offering to "present our proposal to you after you have closed your transaction with Group". No right of first refusal or unanimous shareholder agreement was mentioned.

[52] On the advice of his lawyers, who considered that the July 30 letter might constitute a waiver of any right of first refusal, Grenon wrote to Stampeder on August 3 purporting to "retract" the July 30 letter.

[53] Stampeder and Ricinus' purchase of the Bank of Montreal's interest in Petroleum and of all the outstanding shares of Petroleum (from 542) closed on August 3. Chase certified in writing to Stampeder that Group had not approved any restructuring proposal within the meaning of the March 3 letter and that the sale did not violate any agreement to which Group or 542 was a party.

Pointer was present at the closing, but said nothing of the RFRs or the USAs he had executed only days earlier.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[54] On August 6, Colborne issued a press release stating that Colborne was seeking to terminate the Stampeder deal on the basis of certain rights. The same day, Colborne filed its Statement of Claim and Grenon's lawyer called Stampeder's counsel offering to "make a deal". Stampeder refused, demanded to see the alleged agreements, but was denied them.

[55] Stampeder "went public" on August 13 with a special warrant offering in order to raise the funds to pay for the purchase of Petroleum's debt and equity interests. Some 5.5 million shares were issued at $5.50 per share.

[56] In addition to the foregoing facts which are pertinent to the dispute involving all the corporate parties and Grenon and Edwards, there are uncontested facts relevant to the litigation between Group, 542 and Petroleum on one side and Pointer on the other.

[57] In May 1992, the Group board discussed providing Pointer and Savage each with a 5% equity participation in Petroleum's restructuring. In December 1992, the Petroleum board approved that participation which meant they each would be entitled to receive 5% of the amount of any value realized by Group for Petroleum. The Group board formally recognized the equity participation scheme on February 24, 1993. On July 27, 1993, the Group board agreed to pay Pointer 5% of the proceeds of sale of Petroleum to Stampeder.

[58] On July 28, 1993, Pointer executed an agreement with Petroleum (signed by Chase on behalf of Petroleum) which provided that if the Stampeder deal was completed and resulted in the termination of Pointer's employment, he would be entitled to a severance payment of $175,000. Stampeder had the option to retain Pointer for 30 days after the closing of the deal. In such a case, half the funds would be paid upon closing and the remaining half after the 30 days. Pointer received $87,500, one half of his severance pay, on August 3 when the deal with Stampeder closed. The remaining half was to be paid at the end of a 30 day period during which Stampeder/Ricinus was to have the benefit of Pointer's services.

[59] Pointer also provided a release to Group, Petroleum and 542 of his equity participation upon the assurance that he would receive $100,000 (i.e., 5% of $2 million) on August 6.

[60] On August 6, Pointer provided Geer with a new release incorporating changes requested by Geer. Chase prepared a cheque for $100,000 to courier to Pointer. Chase then heard from Tonken of the "secret agreements" and the filing of the statement of claim by Colborne. He immediately stopped the delivery of the cheque to Pointer and cancelled it. Stampeder and Petroleum terminated Pointer's employment and refused to pay the balance of his severance payment.

[61] Group and 542 defended the action commenced by Colborne alleging that the claims made by the plaintiff were based on actions of Pointer for which he had no authority. They claimed contribution and indemnity from Pointer as a third party.

[62] Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum defended the action and counterclaimed against Colborne, Grenon, Edwards and Pointer. They alleged that Pointer breached his fiduciary duties to Petroleum by taking unauthorised steps which provided Colborne, Grenon and Edwards with the documents on which they based their claims. The counterclaim alleged that Colborne, Grenon, Edwards and Pointer acted fraudulently and unlawfully conspired to interfere with the economic and contractual relations of the Plaintiffs by Counterclaim. An amendment [Appeal Book starting at 9653] alleged that the Colborne, Grenon and Edwards' statement of claim was filed in circumstances which constituted an abuse of process. The counterclaim sought damages because it was alleged that the conduct of the Defendants by Counterclaim adversely affected the share offering of Stampeder which followed its purchase of Petroleum. It also asked for punitive damages.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[63] Pointer commenced a separate action against Group, Petroleum and 542. He sought performance of severance and stock option agreements which he allegedly had with one or more of the defendants, or alternatively, damages. Petroleum defended and counterclaimed alleging that Pointer breached fundamental terms of his employment relationship with Petroleum and also his fiduciary duties to Petroleum. It asked for a declaration that the severance agreement was null and void together with damages.

II. THE JUDGMENT

[64] The actions were tried together before Virtue J., who dismissed all the claims of Colborne, Grenon, Edwards and Pointer and allowed the counterclaims against them. He also held them liable for punitive damages and for the solicitor-client costs of some of the parties.

[65] The trial judge made certain express findings of credibility against Pointer and Grenon. Generally, he preferred the evidence of witnesses for Group, 542, Stampeder, Petroleum and Ricinus ("the respondents") over the evidence of the witnesses for Colborne, Grenon, Edwards and Pointer ("the appellants"). He described the actions of the appellants, particularly Grenon and Pointer, in terms such as "false", "deliberate act", "plan of deception", "fiction", "concoctions falsely created", "a benighted and devious effort", "deceitful", "dishonest and fraudulent" and "unlawful".

[66] He found that in matters concerning any refinancing or restructuring of Petroleum, there was an established procedure which Pointer understood and accepted. It involved Pointer reporting to Chase and to the president of Group, who for most of the relevant period was Geer. Pointer and Chase were in frequent and regular communication with respect to Group's efforts to sell its shares of Petroleum or to restructure the company. The process for any formal approval was to first, obtain the approval of the board of directors of Petroleum, then obtain the approval of Group's management committee, and finally, obtain the approval of the board of directors of Group.

[67] When Grenon and Edwards first became involved in the Petroleum restructuring or sale, they intended that it be an engagement between them and Group. Pointer told Grenon that he was not authorised to sign for Group and arranged to have the engagement letter addressed to Petroleum rather than Group. Pointer knew that Petroleum was not the proper party to the agreement, but he told GE that he would deal with the matter of moving the obligation from Petroleum to the appropriate party when the strategy was more fully developed. The trial judge found this was the beginning of a series of actions Pointer took in an effort to personally control matters affecting Group's shares and the restructuring of Petroleum and that Grenon concurred in it.

[68] He also found that Pointer knew that the board of directors of 542 was to mirror that of Petroleum. Although he instructed the solicitor who incorporated 542 that the directors of 542 were to be the same as the directors of Petroleum, he did not see to the completion of that. Consequently, Pointer remained the sole director and president of 542 for several months and used his false position to the disadvantage of Group.

[69] The trial judge found that from an early point in the relationship with GE, Pointer was motivated by concerns for his personal future. Grenon’s original idea was to sell off Petroleum's oil and gas assets but retain the tax losses to be used in a merger with a revenue company. Pointer opposed this because Petroleum, and his job, would disappear. He ultimately persuaded Grenon to go along with an approach that would see the tax losses internalized and so keep Petroleum operating as an oil and gas company.

[70] After the February 24 Group board meeting, Pointer told Grenon that Group had to be free to deal with Stampeder. In the following days, Grenon struggled to get something in writing granting a period of exclusivity. Grenon and Pointer had originally intended that a letter agreement referring to exclusivity and a right of first refusal should be addressed to Group. But after learning of Group's resistance to that, they decided that the letter agreement should be addressed to Petroleum and signed by Pointer. The trial judge found that they knew if the letter agreement was addressed to Group, as originally intended, it would be rejected. Grenon addressed the letter agreement to Petroleum in an attempt to draft his way around the difficulty that Group was not prepared to grant a period of exclusivity or a right of first refusal. Grenon did not send a copy of the letter agreement to Group, although it directly affected Group's shares.

[71] Pointer spoke to Geer by telephone on March 5 but he made no reference to the letter or its subject matter despite the fact that it was a matter which could have restricted Group's ability to deal with its shares. The trial judge found that Pointer deliberately kept the existence of the letter from Geer because he knew Geer would not allow him to sign it. Pointer signed the document after his conversation with Geer. He also found that Pointer did not sent a copy of the March 3 letter agreement to Chase. This was unusual because the record showed that the consistent practice on matters affecting Group's interests was for Pointer to record everything in writing and to send copies to Chase. He found Pointer's failure to send a copy of the March 3 letter agreement to Chase was a deliberate act on Pointer's part to keep this particular document from Group's attention so that Pointer could achieve his personal objectives for dealing with Group's shares.

[72] The March 30 proposal, the March 3 letter and the May 10 letter formed the basis for GE's claim of a right of first refusal. The March 30 proposal was considered by Group to be no more than the outline of an idea and not a concrete proposal on which to act. It was found by the trial judge to be an ambiguous and confused document.

[73] The trial judge did not construe the March 3 letter, March 30 proposal and May 10 letter as leading to any right of first refusal.

[74] He found that prior to May 10, Chase had been pressing Pointer and Grenon to produce a definitive plan for consideration by the management committee of Group. If the plan passed the management committee, it would be considered by the board of Group. In particular, Chase had been pressing Grenon to develop a definite approach to the Bank of Montreal, whose concurrence would be required before any plan could proceed. Chase wanted specifics because he was endeavouring to have the Bank consider Colborne's plan despite the Bank's apparent intention to deal with Stampeder. On May 10, Grenon told Chase that he would have to talk with an unidentified party in order to develop a definite position. He said he wanted something in writing from Group to show such a party that Group was interested in dealing with Colborne. Chase agreed to sign a letter for that purpose.

[75] Grenon faxed a draft of such a letter to Chase. After discussing it with Geer, Chase requested some alterations, which Grenon made. One change removed a reference to Colborne dealing directly with Stampeder. Another involved adding the words, " provided that this restriction shall not apply in respect of a party with which Petroleum or Group is currently in active discussion with respect to a Restructuring." The letter was signed by Chase and returned to Grenon on May 12.

[76] The May 10 letter referred to the fact that Colborne was involved in negotiations "which may allow us to generate an offer for the Bank's position in Petro. We are hopeful that the offer will appeal to the Bank more than the current proposal that is in front of it [by which Grenon meant Stampeder] and that it will also be more attractive to Group." It went on to say, "However, with the alternative proposal currently in front of the Bank we are probably going to need much more of a final solution to get the Bank's approval." It also used phrases such as "to the extent that Group or Petroleum does approve of any transactions that we may propose" and "if Group or Petroleum does not approve of a transaction proposed by GE".

[77] The trial judge found that given the above quoted language, no matter what the balance of the letter may have said, it was difficult to comprehend how Grenon honestly could have believed that Chase's signature on that letter constituted the approval by Group to a restructuring plan referred to in the March 3 letter, or at all. He found that Grenon knew that approval by Group, meant approval by the Group board of directors. He knew further that no GE plan would ever get to the Group board until he had satisfied Chase and Geer that GE had a plan which would satisfy the Bank of Montreal, with which GE had no contact since February 9. The trial judge found that even if Grenon honestly expected that the May 10 letter was to constitute the approval of Group to the GE proposal, then he deceived Chase about the purposes for which he was seeking the letter.

[78] Geer agreed to the May 10 letter on the understanding that it would allow GE to meet with a third party and expedite GE's efforts to present a definite proposal to Group. The trial judge found that the letter did not constitute Group's approval of a GE proposal for the restructuring of Petroleum as referred to in the March 3 letter agreement. More importantly, he found Grenon knew that it did not constitute such approval.

[79] The trial judge accepted that the first reference Chase heard of GE's claim of a right of first refusal was in a telephone conversation with Pointer on June 21. GE made strong efforts to discredit the evidence of Chase on this point. They called a handwriting expert, who gave opinion evidence that an entry made by Chase in his diary concerning the telephone call of June 21 had been made with a different writing instrument and therefore, was not made at the time when Chase testified they were made. The trial judge rejected that opinion because it was based upon infra-red photographs of insufficient reliability. He also was of the opinion that neither the expert nor anyone else could arrive at the conclusions the expert expressed on the basis of what the expert observed.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[80] During the several meetings of June 29, Chase asked Pointer, if he had learned anything more about Grenon's assertion that GE had a right of first refusal. According to the trial findings, Pointer mentioned the March 3 letter to Chase for the first time, but said it was just a letter that laid out the working relationship between the parties. Chase asked Pointer to send him a copy of the letter. On that day, Pointer did not know of the May 10 letter. He was told about it the next day by Grenon. When Pointer saw a copy of it, he concluded that GE was entitled to a right of first refusal under the terms of the March 3 letter agreement. The trial judge found that from this point forward, Pointer saw the possibility of relying on Grenon's claim to a right of first refusal as an opportunity to advance his own interests. He found that thereafter Pointer was prepared to sign, and did sign, in Petroleum's name, anything suggested by Grenon which might advance the Colborne proposal and defeat Stampeder's endeavours to close its deal with the Bank and Group.

[81] The first such document was a July 2 letter which stated that the May 10 letter "constitutes the approval of Group to the Restructuring plan presented to Group by Colborne as required by the March 3, 1993 letter to Westar Petroleum Ltd. from Colborne, such that certain terms and conditions that commence to operate on such approval are now in effect." The trial judge found that this was a major step in a plan of deception devised by Grenon and Pointer to force Stampeder to turn over the Petroleum tax losses and pools to GE.

[82] The next document created was the "Statement of Facts". In the first signed version, Pointer, referring to a proposed right of first refusal agreement, said, "I do not feel I should execute such agreement without the approval of Group, which approval I am sure will not be forthcoming."

[83] The right of first refusal document Pointer eventually signed was prepared on Grenon's instructions by a lawyer with considerable corporate experience. The document prohibited Pointer from revealing it to his corporation or his fellow directors. Grenon's lawyer in his experience had never before drafted anything with such restrictions. Grenon's lawyer suggested Pointer should seek the advice of counsel before signing the document. The trial judge found that Pointer ignored the advice of counsel not to sign it, or at least to have it authorised by the board of directors before signing.

[84] The next documents in the series purported to be a resolution of the board of directors of 542. It claimed to give Pointer, among other things, the widest possible powers to enter into agreements with GE. Grenon himself prepared this document, had Pointer sign it and never revealed it to the lawyers who were preparing the other documents for him.

[85] Next, Grenon instructed his lawyer to draft a unanimous shareholders agreement between 542 and Colborne and a resolution of 542 purporting to authorise "any director" to execute it. Pointer signed the resolution on July 27, as "the sole director of 542" and signed the unanimous shareholders agreement on behalf of 542. The USA prohibited Petroleum from furthering any proposal (including a sale of Group's shares to Stampeder) without the consent of Colborne and gave Colborne the right to appoint one of two directors of Petroleum in order to stalemate the board. It contained a provision prohibiting the disclosure of the document to anyone connected with Petroleum. The document was signed by Pointer in three original versions, two bearing different dates and one undated.

[86] The trial judge found these purported agreements and resolutions were "concoctions falsely created by Grenon and Pointer in a benighted and devious effort to force Stampeder to deal with Colborne on Grenon's terms." The documents were not to be revealed to Stampeder until it had completed its purchase of Group's shares, at which point Grenon planned to "bring Stampeder to heel by springing on them the right of first refusal and the unanimous shareholders agreement."

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[87] The trial judge found that Grenon knew of the arrangements for a severance payment to Pointer of $175,000 and of Group's obligation to pay a further sum of $100,000.00 in settlement of a right to share in any value received for Petroleum. Pointer wanted to make certain that he obtained payment before Group and Stampeder learned that he had signed the RFRs and USAs. Grenon agreed that Stampeder should not be told of the agreements until after Pointer got his money. Despite Pointer's attempts to arrange for immediate payment of the entire amount of his severance pay, only one half was paid and the balance was held back by Stampeder pursuant to its right to have his services for 30 days after closing.

[88] Pointer arranged with Group that he would be paid his incentive bonus (in lieu of equity participation) of $100,000.00 on August 6. Pointer informed Grenon, who agreed to wait until that date to notify Stampeder of the existence of the agreements. Pointer ensured that there were no copies of the USA or RFR in the files of 542 or Petroleum. He did not release them from his locked briefcase until instructed to do so by Grenon on August 6.

[89] The trial judge found that in filing the statement of claim and issuing the press release announcing that fact on August 6, GE intended to block Stampeder's ability to raise, from the investing community, the funds it needed to complete the purchase. By this means, they would force Stampeder to make a deal with Colborne.

[90] Concerning Pointer, he held that Pointer, by his conduct, "violated the spirit and terms of the arrangement" such that he forfeited any claim to the incentive payment. The conduct referred to included breaching the conditions of the arrangement itself, breaching his duty as Group's agent in dealing with Group's shares, breaching his duties as director of Petroleum by working to frustrate the interests of all the stakeholders, failing to act honestly and fairly in dealing with his co-directors of Petroleum, fraudulently conspiring with Grenon to enter into an RFR which would defeat the interests of Petroleum's shareholder; fraudulently abusing his position as sole director and officer of 542, and several other "breaches".

[91] The trial judge made certain other findings and interpretations which were attacked on appeal, but which it is unnecessary to recite, as the disposition of this appeal is not in any way affected by them. Some of them will be mentioned below in the context of summation of the arguments of the parties.

III. GROUNDS OF APPEAL

A. The Appellants

[92] Colborne, Grenon, Edwards and Pointer appealed the awards made against them. All but Edwards also appealed the dismissal of their respective claims. Group and 542 cross-appealed the refusal of the trial judge to award them solicitor-client costs.

[93] The appellants took the following positions: Colborne and Grenon argued that Colborne had reached an agreement with Petroleum and 542 to restructure Petroleum, and had gained an RFR from Petroleum to participate in any restructuring of Petroleum.
The key steps allegedly leading to this RFR were the March 3 letter, the March 30 proposal, the May 10 letter, the July 21 formal RFR signed by Pointer, and the USA.

[94] On the basis of the rights allegedly gained under those agreements, Colborne and Grenon claimed that:

(a) Petroleum breached the RFR by cooperating in the Stampeder deal and by failing to provide notice to Colborne of the Stampeder deal.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

(b) 542, as sole shareholder of Petroleum, breached its USA by permitting the Stampeder transaction to go ahead without proper regard for the RFR. Ricinus also breached this USA, being a "deemed party" under the Alberta Business Corporations Act S.A. 1981, c. B-15, as amended ("ABCA").

(c) Stampeder, Ricinus and Group are liable for the tort of intentional interference with contractual relations and/or the tort of unlawful interference with economic interests, essentially, for interfering with the contractual obligations of Petroleum and 542 towards Colborne.

[95] Colborne and Grenon also denied any liability on the counterclaim of Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum, primarily because even if the appellants acted aggressively or if their conduct was "unsavoury", there was no legal wrong committed, and because it was not properly established on the basis of admissible evidence that Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum suffered any loss as a result of these transactions.

[96] Colborne [and in what follows, unless otherwise stated, reference to Colborne's position on appeal will include Grenon] raised some 27 grounds of appeal. Pointer and Edwards both substantially adopted the Colborne grounds. In addition, Pointer raised 11 of his own and Edwards, another 5.

[97] Colborne's grounds of appeal may be divided into the following groups:

1. Grounds relating to the trial judge's failure to find an enforceable contract between Petroleum and Colborne, and his failure to find any enforceable rights against 542 and Ricinus arising from the USA.

2. Grounds relating to the trial judge's dismissing of the tort claims (intentional interference with contractual relations and unlawful interference with economic interests) against Stampeder, Ricinus, Group and 542.

3. Grounds relating to the awarding of damages on the counterclaim both in finding that any damages were established and in finding that the requisite elements of the various alleged torts had been established.

4. Grounds relating to the punitive damages awarded against the appellants.

5. Grounds relating to the solicitor-client costs awarded in favour of Stampeder and Ricinus against the appellants.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[98] Pointer's position mirrored Colborne's in many respects. His overall theme was that the trial judge seriously erred in assessing the duties of Pointer when faced with the seriously conflicting interests of Petroleum and Group, and where Pointer confidently believed that his actions were justified as actions which were in Petroleum's best interests. Although Pointer approached some issues slightly differently than Colborne, there was sufficient similarity in the submissions to make it convenient that the grouping of issues applied to Colborne's arguments may be used for Pointer as well. One additional group is needed, however:

6. Grounds of appeal unique to Pointer’s claim against Petroleum and Group for breach of the “equity participation agreement” and the severance agreement, and for Petroleum’s counterclaim against Pointer for return of the severance amount paid.

[99] Since Edwards appealed only the finding of liability against him and not the dismissal of his claims against Stampeder and the other defendants, many of the grounds raised by Colborne and Pointer are not applicable. On the other hand, Edwards expressly adopted Colborne's submissions with respect to the findings of liability on the counterclaim by Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum. To that extent, the same groupings used to address the arguments of Colborne may be used for Edwards. Edwards' other grounds of appeal may be grouped as:

7. Grounds of appeal unique to Edwards' situation, focussing on his lack of direct involvement in any of the subject transactions.

B. The Cross-Appellants

[100] Group and 542 cross-appealed the trial judge's refusal to award solicitor-client costs in their favour. Their position was simply that they were equally affected by this lawsuit as were Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum, and that the conduct and the claims against them were equally unfounded and abusive. The Group/542 cross-appeal makes an eighth "group" of grounds of appeal:

8. Grounds arising on the cross-appeal, regarding the trial judge's refusal to award solicitor-client costs to Group and 542.

IV. ARGUMENTS

1. Grounds relating to the trial judge's failure to find an enforceable contract between Petroleum and Colborne, and his failure to find any enforceable rights against 542 and Ricinus arising from the USA.

[101] Colborne's first group of grounds of appeal (adopted by Edwards and Pointer) revolved around the submission that the trial judge made several "pervasive errors of law". These particularly related to:

(a) the distinct legal identities, obligations and rights of Petroleum, 542 and Group,

(b) the nature and effect of Pointer's obligations to Petroleum, as distinct from Group, and

(c) the nature of the various agreements executed by Pointer on behalf of Petroleum and the significance of various facts in relation to those agreements.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

(i) The Distinct Legal Identities

[102] The appellants argued that the trial judge erred by ignoring the distinct legal identities of Petroleum, 542 and Group, effectively “piercing the corporate veil” where it was inappropriate at law to do so on the basis of the evidence before the court. He viewed Petroleum as having virtually no authority to act independently from Group and essentially ignored 542 as the true 100% shareholder of Petroleum. The appellants argued that the evidence clearly indicated that 542 was, from December 1992 on, the legal and beneficial owner of Petroleum. Moreover, this was not a situation in which a "compelling reason" existed to ignore the distinct legal identities and hold both 542 and Petroleum to be the "puppets" of Group.

[103] The respondents did not directly reply to these arguments, but rather submitted that the trial judgment was based on fact findings of dishonesty and manipulation by Pointer, Grenon and Edwards. They argued that a high standard of review applies. The appellants essentially want the Court of Appeal to re-try the issues, which it should not do.

(ii) Pointer's Duties to Petroleum vs. Group

[104] According to the appellants, this error led the trial judge to misconstrue Pointer's obligations and the legality of his actions. Because Pointer was the CFO and a director of Petroleum, his fiduciary duties were owed to Petroleum and not Group. Where Petroleum's and Group's interests conflicted, Pointer was obliged to advance Petroleum's, not Group's interests. The trial judge placed insufficient emphasis on the conflict between Group’s and Petroleum’s interests which resulted because of Group's desire to obtain from the Bank of Montreal a release of the Westshore shares. Since Pointer held the view, on reasonable grounds, that the Colborne proposal was in the best interests of Petroleum and 542, he was entitled and even obligated to take steps to see that proposal succeed over the Stampeder deal. The trial judge erred, submitted the appellants, in holding that Pointer owed (and breached) fiduciary obligations to Group, rather than recognizing that Pointer acted in what he believed were Petroleum's best interests.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[105] Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum responded to the appellants by arguing that Pointer's conduct was far from being in Petroleum's "best interests" on the facts. Pointer's secrecy in executing the alleged agreements (including non-disclosure to his fellow directors/officers) was in violation of his fiduciary obligations to Petroleum; his perceived duties did not provide him with authority to execute what he did; the full Petroleum Board would have had to authorise the RFR; "all stakeholders" were behind the Stampeder deal, and there was no particular advantage for Petroleum to the Colborne deal.

(iii) Petroleum's Capacity to Execute the RFR

[106] The appellants further argued that the trial judge's blurring of the corporate identities led him in part to err in holding that Petroleum did not have the capacity to grant the RFR agreement. The RFR in this case was not a right to acquire the Petroleum shares, but rather a right to participate in a Petroleum restructuring. Petroleum had the authority to grant such a right and could be liable for breach of its obligations pursuant to it (i.e., for failure to give notice to Colborne of all the Stampeder deal details, for co-operating with the Stampeder transaction, etc.). This authority existed even though the granting of such a right would affect the ability of the sole owner of the Petroleum shares to dispose of them.

[107] The respondents did not directly reply to this point, presumably, because even if the appellants succeed in showing that the trial judge erred in this regard, that would not demand that the appeal be allowed. The respondents focussed, rather, on Pointer's authority and upon the (non)-effectiveness of the various letter agreements.

(iv) Pointer's Authority to Execute the RFR on Petroleum's Behalf

[108] The appellants said that the trial judge misunderstood the issue of Pointer's authority to execute the RFR agreement when he considered whether Pointer had such authority from Group. They submitted that although Pointer may not have had authority from Group, he did have authority to carry on the "business and affairs" of Petroleum. Executing the RFR agreement fell within the scope of that authority.

[109] Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum took issue with that argument. They said that Pointer could not have bound Petroleum to the RFR agreement for at least two reasons: first, because any RFR agreement was contingent upon Group approval because the March 3 letter expressly required such approval [but see below for the appellants' position on this] and second, because the authority to manage the business and affairs of a corporation are collectively granted to its directors and there was no resolution of the board of Petroleum delegating to Pointer such power to bind Petroleum. On the contrary, the expenditure limits imposed on Pointer were a mere $50,000, considerably less than the liquidated damages clause of the RFR.

(v) Requirement for Group Approval in March 3 Letter

[110] The appellants argued that although the March 3 letter agreement stated that Colborne's right to claim a right of first refusal was contingent upon Group approval to the Colborne restructuring plan, since this was a Petroleum agreement, not Group's agreement, the assessment of whether Group approval had been given was to be made by Petroleum. Pointer made that determination on Petroleum's behalf (rightly or wrongly, it does not matter) on June 30. This triggered the right to claim and execute a right of first refusal.

[111] Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum replied that Pointer had no authority to make such an assessment of whether Group had approved the Colborne plan. The trial judge properly found as a fact that no one, including Pointer, reasonably could have believed that the May 10 letter constituted Group approval of the Colborne plan. Therefore, the trial judge properly rejected the suggestion that it was up to Pointer (Petroleum) to determine subjectively whether Group approval had been granted.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

(vi) The Term "Restructuring" in the March 3 Letter

[112] The appellants submitted that the trial judge incorrectly concluded that the Stampeder deal was not a restructuring within the terms of the March 3 letter, and so, could not trigger the RFR. On its face, this is a strong argument and the respondents do not appear to take issue with it. But demonstrating that the trial judge erred in his interpretation of this document does not take the appellants very far since the numerous questions about Pointer's authority and bona fides remain.

(vii) Whether the RFR Agreement was Contingent on Group Approval

[113] In a subtle twist of an earlier argument, Colborne suggested that although the March 3 letter may have made "perceived Group approval" a condition of Colborne's right to claim a right of first refusal, once the RFR was signed around July 21, 1993, Petroleum "unconditionally" accepted the obligations set out therein.

[114] Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum responded to this suggestion essentially by arguing that the trial judge's characterization of the RFR as a fraudulent, unenforceable document was unassailable upon any review of the facts.

(viii) Pointer's Actual or Ostensible Authority to Execute the USA

[115] The appellants claimed that Pointer had actual authority under the by-laws of 542, as the sole director and officer at the time, to execute the USA on behalf of 542. This was further bolstered by Pointer's passing of a resolution, as a one man board, granting Pointer exceptionally wide powers to enter into agreements with Colborne et al. The appellants claimed the trial judge erred in ignoring the fact that Pointer was a "one man board" of 542 at the relevant time, notwithstanding Group's alleged intention that the 542 Board mirror that of Petroleum. In any event, they said, even if Chase and Savage were de facto members of the 542 Board at the relevant time, any one of the 542 directors could execute the USA. In the further alternative, they submitted that Pointer had ostensible authority to execute the USA on behalf of 542.

[116] Ricinus and 542 (who are the only respondents against whom claims are made on the basis of the USA) responded in essence that the facts support the trial judge's finding that the USA was a sham and of no force. Such a document required full 542 board approval to be valid. The various USA documents and resolutions giving Pointer alleged authority to execute them were all created after July 26, 1993, the date the 542 board was increased to 3, but back dated. Additionally, 542 could not breach an agreement it knew nothing about and which was kept secret from the majority of the board. Moreover, there was no valid corporate purpose for the USA from 542's perspective. Further, the respondents argued that Colborne waived any rights it may otherwise have had under a USA because of its deliberate concealment of the USA.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

(ix) Did the Alleged USA Meet the Formal Requirements Under the ABCA?

[117] The appellants challenged the trial judge's interpretation of s.1(z) of the ABCA, defining a USA. They argued he erred in holding that a sole shareholder corporation can only create a USA by following s.1(z)(ii), not s.1(z)(i).

[118] The respondents supported the trial judge's view.

[119] This is an issue only if the validity of the USA cannot be determined on the basis of Pointer's authority to execute it or his bona fides in so doing.

2. Grounds relating to the trial judge's dismissing of the tort claims (intentional interference with contractual relations and unlawful interference with economic interests) against Stampeder, Ricinus, Group and 542.

(i) Claim for Intentional Interference with Contractual Rights

[120] The appellants submitted that the trial judge erred in dismissing their claim for intentional interference with contractual rights because there were never any valid contracts entered into between Colborne and Petroleum or 542. Here, they simply adopted their previous grounds of appeal relating to the RFR and USA agreements. The respondents replied that this tort was not plead, but in any event, the trial judge was correct that because there were no valid contractual rights extant, the claim for "interference" with such rights must fail.

(ii) Claim for Unlawful Interference with Economic Interests

[121] Colborne claimed that the trial judge erred in describing the economic interest which Colborne submitted was interfered with and in misunderstanding the nature of the "unlawful act" alleged against Group and Stampeder. More particularly, the suggestion was that the trial judge failed to recognize that the appellants had a legitimate "business expectancy to restructure" Petroleum and he failed to understand the unlawful acts alleged.

[122] This submission was not advanced with any vigour and the respondents likewise gave it little attention. It is difficult to contest the trial judge's fact findings that there was no "unlawfulness" in either Group's or Stampeder's conduct.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

3. Grounds relating to the awarding of damages on the counterclaim, both in finding that any damages were established, and in finding that the requisite elements of the various alleged torts had been established.

(i) Damages assessment founded on inadmissible expert evidence

[123] The appellants claimed that the trial judge erred in admitting and then utilizing, as a basis for his findings on damages, the opinion evidence of the witness Wilf Gobert. The complaint founded on the failure of the respondents to provide statements and reports from Gobert as required by Rule 218.1 of the Alberta Rules of Court. Upon objection at trial, Gobert's evidence was allowed in as non-expert factual evidence. The appellants argued that despite the allegedly factual nature of Gobert’s evidence, it was expert opinion evidence and moreover, it provided the very foundation for the damages assessment of the trial judge. By evading the requirements of R. 218.1, the respondents "ambushed" the appellants with expert evidence and the appellants suffered prejudice thereby.

[124] Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum replied that overall Gobert's evidence was factual and the trial judge properly exercised his discretion to allow the witness some latitude in expressing opinions. Further, they argued that if the appellants felt ambushed by the evidence, the proper course for them would have been to request an adjournment.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

(ii) Reasonableness of the Finding of Causation

[125] The appellants claimed that the trial judge's finding that the appellants' conduct caused the damages awarded was unreasonable. Even assuming Gobert's evidence was properly admitted, there was evidence to suggest other trends would have affected Stampeder's public financing and no rational reason to accept that the special share warrants issued on August 13 would have been priced any differently in the absence of the lawsuit.

[126] Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum replied that the trial judge's finding on causation cannot be said to be a "palpable and overriding error". The trial judge found Colborne's purpose in issuing the press release was to make it difficult for Stampeder to raise the needed funds, thus, forcing a "deal" with Colborne. They argued, in the alternative, that damages may be awarded "at large" where the torts of abuse of process or conspiracy are made out. Colborne in its reply argued that this issue is foreclosed on appeal, since the trial judge specifically rejected Stampeder's claim for such damages and it was not appealed.

(iii) Calculation Errors in Assessing Damages

[127] The appellants claimed that the trial judge made palpable and overriding calculation errors in determining the quantum of damages: first, he used the August 13 share price rather than the August 12 share price; second, he failed to recognize the price of special warrants was generally lower than the trading share price to enhance their desirability in the market; third, he failed to account for the commission Stampeder would owe to Peters & Co.; fourth, he should have discounted the value to reflect unknown "other factors" which may have affected the share price.

[128] Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum asserted that "the award of damages is a decision that is fundamentally one of judicial assessment, not of calculation."

(iv) Finding of Conspiracy

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[129] The appellants submitted that the conspiracy finding cannot stand: first, because damages were not proved; second, because the trial judge committed palpable and overriding errors in finding the "building blocks" of a conspiracy; and third, because the trial judge's finding that the predominant purpose of the appellants' conduct was to injure Stampeder was unsupported by the evidence. The appellants detailed the various "building blocks" which they suggested make up the foundation of the finding of conspiracy. They then attacked each of those blocks as being inadequate to support a conspiracy.

[130] Stampeder's replied by pointing out that the trial judge clearly did not trace the conspiracy back as far as the appellants allege, but rather, he clearly defined his starting point as "following the June 29th meetings". Further, Stampeder set out numerous fact findings and evidence in support of the conspiracy finding.

[131] Ultimately, this amounted to a battle over fact findings, not over the law regarding conspiracy. Similarly, Colborne's complaint about the finding of an intent to injure Stampeder amounted to a debate about whether there was evidence to support the trial judge's fact findings.

(v) Finding Abuse of Process

[132] The appellants argued that the trial judge erred in finding the existence of an "extraneous and collateral purpose", but for which the action would not have been started, and in finding there was an act "unrelated to the proceedings". Both of these elements, the appellants said, are required to establish abuse of process.

[133] Apart from a brief discussion of the law, the parties disagreed again about what "spin" to put on the facts. The appellants argued that what the trial judge considered improper purposes were not outside the scope of litigation, particularly, the purpose of starting the action with a view to persuading Stampeder to “make a deal” with Colborne. Stampeder argue that it and other actions constituted improper purposes. Stampeder, however, did not appear to respond to Colborne’s claim that the trial judge erred in finding that there was an act “unrelated to the proceedings”.

[134] Pointer argued a distinct ground of appeal regarding the abuse of process claim, namely, that he should not have been found liable for abuse of process because he was not a party to the Colborne, Grenon and Edwards’ statement of claim issued on August 6, 1993. Apparently, when Stampeder sought the amendment to the pleadings to allege abuse of process, it was specifically said not to relate to Pointer.

(vi) Finding Unlawful Interference with Economic Interests

[135] In addition to again relying on the no damages and misapprehension of Pointer’s fiduciary duties points raised earlier, the appellants argued that this tort was not established because there was no termination of Stampeder’s economic interests and no evidence that unlawful means were used.

[136] Stampeder took issue with the notion that an interest must be completely terminated in order for a remedy to lie. It argued that the loss of expectation of fair prices on the issuance of shares was sufficient to establish that an economic interest was interfered with and that there was ample unlawfulness in the findings of fraud, breach of fiduciary duties, etc.

(vii) Finding of Fraud

[137] The thrust of Colborne's complaint with the fraud finding was that the trial judge erred in finding dishonest conduct. First, Colborne submitted that the trial judge erred by essentially creating a new category of civil fraud, modelled on the elements of criminal fraud. Colborne acknowledged the high standard of review applicable to this Court's consideration of the trial judge's fact findings, but countered this by noting that allegations of fraud must be clearly and conclusively proven.

[138] In particular, Colborne attacked the trial judge's view that Grenon did not have a right of first refusal pursuant to the March 3 letter and did not honestly believe he had such a right. They argued that since Grenon sought and was given legal advice that Colborne did have a right of first refusal, it was palpably unreasonable to conclude Grenon knew he had no such rights. Further, Colborne argued that Grenon's non-disclosure of the various "secret documents" was improperly considered to be evidence of fraud, since Grenon was under no legal obligation to disclose the documents, particularly, to Stampeder. Colborne pointed out that only Stampeder, not Petroleum, was found to have been defrauded. Even if a duty existed to disclose to Petroleum, it did not exist vis-à-vis Stampeder. Finally, Colborne argued the trial judge erred in finding dishonest conduct in Grenon's sending the July 30 letter which "lured" Stampeder into the closing with 542 and Group.

[139] Stampeder replied to these submissions point by point, arguing that there was ample evidence on which to sustain the trial judge's findings of fraud.

4. Grounds Relating to the Punitive Damages Awarded Against the Appellants

[140] In a short passage of the judgment, the trial judge held the appellants liable for punitive damages in the amount of $1 million. All the appellants appealed that part of the judgment and all for the reasons set out in the Colborne factum. Essentially, Colborne argued that punitive damages should not have been awarded at all, but particularly not in the amount of $1 million. The suggestion was that even if the appellants are liable for one or more of the "actionable wrongs" plead by Stampeder in its counterclaim, they all acted in good faith and in the belief that they had an arguable case. In these circumstances, they submitted, no punitive damages should have been awarded. Further, because Stampeder "encouraged and participated" in both the breach of the confidentiality provisions in Colborne's agreements with Petroleum and the breach of the Bank of Montreal's duty of confidentiality to Petroleum, among other things, Stampeder should not benefit from an award of punitive damages. Additionally, because the general damages award here was so large, punitive damages were unnecessary and inappropriate. Finally, they argued that in any event, the quantum of punitive damages awarded was excessive, particularly, in comparison to other recent cases, even exceptional ones, in which the punitive damages were considerably lower.

[141] Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum responded that given the fraudulent, conspiratorial conduct of the appellants, this was a suitable case for punitive damages. As to quantum, they argued that the trial judge was correct to consider the size of the potential profit which the appellants stood to gain if they succeeded in their fraudulent scheme. The huge potential gain demanded a very significant punitive damages award, particularly, here, where the appellants were of substantial means.

5. Grounds Relating to the Solicitor-Client Costs Awarded in Favour of Stampeder and Ricinus Against the Appellants

[142] Colborne and the other appellants submitted that the trial judge set Stampeder's recoverable fees too high. Colborne went further and asked for solicitor-client costs against Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum, both for trial and the appeal.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

(i) Alleged errors of principle in setting Stampeder's costs

[143] Colborne did not directly contest the fact that Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum were awarded solicitor-client costs, rather, they argued that the figure set by the trial judge was inordinately high given: (a) the lack of material before the trial court supporting Stampeder's alleged fees, (b) the duplication of services rendered to Stampeder, which retained both Howard Mackie and MacLeod Dixon because of its own oversight in failing to see that its Howard Mackie solicitor would have to be a witness, (c) the trial judge's failure to reduce the costs awarded, despite stating that he would not take into account the "bonus" billed to Stampeder by Howard Mackie after the trial judge had said in his reasons for judgment that he intended to award solicitor-client costs and (d) the vast difference in Stampeder's fees compared to the other parties, including Colborne.

[144] The sum of these factors, Colborne argued, led to the conclusion that the trial judge failed to exercise his discretion judicially.

[145] Stampeder's response simply suggested that costs are discretionary; the trial judge exercised his discretion judicially; this Court should not interfere lightly with such an exercise of discretion; and the trial judge properly refrained from sending the matter to taxation because he "wanted it resolved" without further litigation over costs. In short, Stampeder did not address the question of whether the exact amount set was appropriate and why. It simply relied upon the high standard of review of discretionary orders.

(ii) Colborne seeks solicitor-client costs

[146] As noted, Colborne went beyond saying Stampeder's costs figure was too high, they also claimed solicitor-client costs against Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum contingent upon Colborne's success on appeal.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[147] The only real basis for this claim was the fact that these respondents alleged fraud, conspiracy, etc. against Colborne and “severely harmed” its reputation. The claim was awkward in light of the fact that the real thrust of the appellants’ arguments were in support of a new trial, rather than for this Court to allow the appellants’ claims and dismiss the counterclaims. Admittedly, Colborne sought to have the counterclaims dismissed. However, Colborne’s request for solicitor-client costs was contingent upon a result that it was truly wronged by these events and the action. They do not seek that result in this Court and should not expect the costs consequences sought.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

6. Grounds of appeal unique to Pointer's claim against Petroleum and Group for breach of the "equity participation agreement" and the severance agreement, and to Petroleum's counterclaim against Pointer for return of the one half of the severance amount paid.

[148] This “group” of issues is specifically related to the action brought by Pointer against Group and Petroleum, and Petroleum’s counterclaim against Pointer, relating to the payments Pointer expected to receive upon completion of the Stampeder deal. The trial judge dismissed Pointer’s claim and allowed Petroleum’s claim for the return of the $87,500 already paid. Pointer appealed both aspects of that judgment.

(i) Severance Agreement

[149] With respect to the severance amount, Pointer simply argued that the trial judge made a manifest error in finding that Pointer represented to Chase that he would assist in closing the Stampeder deal in consideration, presumably, for the severance payment. The Petroleum response to Pointer’s submission was to highlight the facts upon which the court could have concluded that Pointer did in fact mislead Chase.

(ii) Equity Participation Payment

[150] With respect to the promise by Group to pay Pointer 5% in lieu of the equity participation in a restructured Petroleum, the trial judge found that "the very basis for the participation incentive was to ensure that managements's objectives were attuned to the stakeholders' objectives (Group and the Bank) in dealing with matters concerning Group's shares."

[151] Pointer's adopted the position (stated earlier in relation to the appeal of the finding of liability against Colborne and Pointer) that he owed his duties to Petroleum, not Group, and was not bound to account for the "purely collateral objectives" of Group. He argued that he only owed duties to Petroleum and fulfilled them.

[152] On the other hand, if the agreement was an incentive for Pointer to help achieve a particular result, then if the trial judge's findings of fraud, etc. are sustainable, then his conclusion on this issue also appears to be sound.

7. Grounds of appeal unique to Edwards' situation focussing on his lack of direct involvement in any of the subject transactions.

[153] Edwards appealed only the finding of liability against him on Stampeder's counterclaim, not the dismissal of his claims against Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum. He adopted Colborne's arguments respecting the appeal from the counterclaim and added others which emphasized that he was not an active participant in or even aware of any of Grenon's, Pointer's and Colborne's actions which provided the basis for liability. Grenon and Colborne essentially acknowledged Edwards' non-participation. Their factum said that "in the event that the Counterclaim is upheld . . . no right to claim contribution and indemnity from Edwards in respect of the payment of such judgment would be asserted against Edwards by or on behalf of Grenon or Colborne.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[154] The respondents made no such concession and indeed, directly contested Edwards' arguments that he should not be held liable even if Colborne, Grenon and Pointer are.

[155] Basically, Edwards submitted that the trial judge erred in failing to consider Edwards' role in the entire series of events separately from the roles played by Pointer and Grenon. The trial judge treated Edwards as though he was aware of and participated in or at least sanctioned everything done by Grenon – hence he was liable to the same degree. Edwards argued that the evidence was clear that he took no part in any of the drafting of documents, devising strategies or even was aware of the details of the various documents. Further, the trial judge made no findings of dishonesty against Edwards. In light of the uncontroverted evidence that Edwards honestly believed Colborne had acquired certain legal rights and was entitled to assert them, the trial judge could not have reasonably made such findings.

[156] Stampeder's response to this argument was threefold. First, the trial judge did indeed make findings of fact which accepted that Edwards actively participated in the relevant steps and could not have honestly believed Colborne had acquired the rights it claimed. Second, Stampeder pointed to various statements which it suggested demonstrated that the trial judge found Edwards personally liable for the torts alleged in the counterclaim. Third, Stampeder argued that Edwards may be held liable as a partner of Grenon since there was ample evidence that the two were in fact partners in respect of these events and since it is settled law that one partner will be liable for the other's tortious acts.

[157] Edwards' reply countered some of the arguments made by Stampeder by highlighting evidence which supported his argument that he had no direct involvement in the tortious conduct. He said the real issue was whether he should be held vicariously liable because the trial judge's conclusion that Grenon and Edwards acted together was not supported by the evidence.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[158] Edwards argued that if the trial judge found Edwards liable vicariously rather than as a principal, he erred in doing so without considering the circumstances. That is, the situation is analogous to an employee who commits a tort outside the scope of his or her employment. Here, if the torts alleged in the counterclaim are proven against Grenon, then he was clearly acting outside the scope of the partnership. Edwards should not be held liable in those circumstances. Alternatively, Edwards suggested that at the very least, the punitive damages award cannot stand where liability is vicarious as opposed to direct.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[159] Group and 542 cross-appeal the trial judgment only to the extent that they were refused solicitor-client costs. Their grounds of appeal are as follows: (a) the trial judge erred in finding that there were genuine issues to be tried between Group and Colborne; (b) the trial judge erred in failing to recognize that the actions which he held warranted solicitor-client costs in favour of Stampeder applied equally to Group and 542, and (c) even absent an award of solicitor-client costs, the trial judge erred in failing to provide an inflation factor for the costs awarded on Column 6 of Schedule C.

[160] In essence, Group argued that the appellants alleged serious intentional torts at trial, including conspiracy, but abandoned them on appeal, that the claims against Group were without merit, and that the appellants' conduct of the trial was deserving of sanction in the form of costs. Group and 542 also specifically argued that Edwards should not be excused from having to pay solicitor-client costs, noting that one who is willing to lend his name to a "statement of claim seeking millions of dollars of damages and alleging serious, culpable conduct" ought to take the time to read the relevant documents.

[161] Colborne responded that the costs award was a proper exercise of discretion and should not be disturbed. They argued that the trial judge was correct in finding genuine issues between Group and Colborne, that credibility findings also had to be made, that Colborne's conduct in relation to Group was not particularly offensive, that most of Group's complaints related to matters caused by Group's own conduct in producing documents, and finally, that an inflationary increase was not requested at trial and should not be granted now nor should it be used to indirectly award solicitor-client costs.

[162] Pointer also contested the cross-appeal for similar reasons.

[163] Group's reply focussed on whether Group acted improperly in its production of documents and whether this may have or should have been a factor in refusing to award solicitor-client costs to Group. Group highlighted passages from the trial judge's reasons in the costs proceedings, arguing that they demonstrated that the production of documents issue had no blameworthiness attached.

V. ANALYSIS

1. The Main Appeal: Colborne et al. v. Group et al. and Stampeder et al.

[164] The appellants argued that the trial judge made pervasive errors which undermined the entire judgment. They said the most fundamental error was ignoring the distinct legal identities of Group, 542 and Petroleum. Flowing from that error was the fundamental error of ascribing fiduciary duties on the part of Pointer as being owed to Group rather than to Petroleum or 542. They further argued that the trial judge erred in finding Pointer did not have the capacity or authority to bind Petroleum by the RFR.

[165] In our view, had the trial judge taken the approach urged on us by the appellants, he would have been led inescapably to the conclusion that the appellants seek to avoid, that is, that the alleged right of first refusal and the unanimous shareholder agreement were both invalid.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[166] The appellants' starting point is the distinctness of Petroleum. As a corporation it had the right to pursue objectives which might conflict with those of its sole shareholder be that Group or 542. The management of Petroleum was in the hands of the directors, not Group. The directors owed fiduciary duties to Petroleum and to no other party. Providing the directors acted honestly and in good faith in a manner which they believed on reasonable grounds was in the best interests of the company, their actions were not impeachable.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[167] The appellants relied heavily on the judgment of Berger J. in Teck Corporation Ltd. v. Millar (1972), 33 D.L.R. (3d) 288 (B.C.S.C.). In our view, that case has only limited, if any, application to the matter before us. It was decided there that directors have absolute power to manage the affairs of a company even to the extent of contravening the expressed wishes of the majority shareholders provided that they act in good faith in the best interests of the company and that there are reasonable grounds for their belief in the propriety of their actions. Berger J. concluded that if the directors of a company decide, on reasonable grounds, that a takeover will cause substantial damage to the company's interests, the directors are entitled to use their powers to protect the company. The challenged action there was an agreement to issue shares in order to prevent a majority shareholder from exercising control of the company.

[168] Notwithstanding that the directors themselves benefited from the share issue, it was held that they were acting in good faith because the primary purpose of their decision was to further the interests of the company.

[169] The trial judge here found that Pointer was motivated by his own interests rather than those of Petroleum. It is apparent that he did not accept Pointer's evidence that he believed he was acting in the best interests of Petroleum. The appellants argued that proper regard was not given to the explanation which Pointer offered for his conduct. It was submitted that the trial judge failed to understand that Group was prepared to sacrifice Petroleum in order to regain the Westshore shares. In those circumstances, Pointer was duty bound to protect Petroleum. His fiduciary duties to that company took precedence over any obligations he had as an agent of Group.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[170] In our view, there are two reasons why the appellants cannot succeed even were one to view Pointer's action only in the light of his fiduciary duties to Petroleum disregarding any third party obligations and any personal interests which may have motivated him. The first is a failure on the good faith test in the circumstances of this case. The second is his own clear and incontrovertible breach of his fiduciary duties to Petroleum

[171] The appellants argued that the trial judge incorrectly concluded that Pointer owed a direct fiduciary duty to Group based on the decisions in Gainers Inc. v. Pocklington Holdings Inc. (1995), 35 Alta. L.R. (3d) 348(Q.B.) and Tongue v. Vencap Equities Alberta Ltd. (1994), 148 A.R. 321 (Q.B.); aff. (1996), 184 A.R. 368 (C.A.). They said that those cases are either distinguishable from, or inapplicable to, the facts of this case. It is not necessary for us to consider the correctness of that argument. Assuming arguendo that they have no application here, the authority which remains, and which is the cornerstone of the appellants' position, is Teck.

[172] In Teck, there was no question of the power of the board of directors to enter into an agreement to issue shares. It was also not a case of a single member of a group acting unilaterally. In the case of Petroleum, Pointer was one of three directors. The proposition which the appellants wish us to adopt is that a director may act unilaterally to bind a corporation so long as he in good faith believes his conduct to be in the best interests of the corporation. That proposition would lead to an absurd and chaotic state of affairs. Directors by their bona fides or good faith belief in the best interest of the company would empower themselves individually to do what they collectively may have decided against doing. The Teck case does not take us that far.

[173] Before the question of the good faith belief in the best interests of a company even arises, the power or authority of a director or directors must be clear. In Alberta, the duty of directors and officers of a corporation is set out in section 117, of the ABCA, which provides, in part, as follows:

> Every director and officer of a corporation in exercising his powers and discharging his duties shall
>
> (a) act honestly and in good faith with a view to the best interests of the corporation . . .

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[174] It is only authorised acts which are immunized from close scrutiny by the good faith test. In this case, the trial judge found that Pointer did not have the authority to enter into an agreement which could have had the effect of obligating Petroleum to pay liquidated damages many times in excess of the monetary limits of his spending authority. That finding of fact has unshakeable support in the evidence and we cannot interfere with it.

[175] The only argument which the appellants and Pointer can make is that, absent explicit authority, Pointer was duty bound to act in the best interests of the corporation and if he did so in good faith, then his actions are justified and binding and immune from impeachment. We do not accept the validity of that argument. But, again arguendo, if directors can act without explicit authority, then, in our opinion, the reach of the good faith test would go beyond an examination of the reasonableness of belief in the best interests of the company. It would also encompass an honest belief in the implied authority to act and the reasonableness of that belief.

[176] The question of immunity of an official, in that case a public servant, for acts done purportedly within authority was considered in Dorman Timber Ltd. v. British Columbia (1997), 40 B.C.L.R. (3d) 230 (C.A.). Finch J.A. examined the meaning of the words “good faith” in a statute prohibiting proceedings where an official acts “reasonably and in good faith while discharging or purporting to discharge responsibilities”. He said at p. 253:

> My conclusion is that the correct test of good faith is subjective: there is good faith if the public servant honestly believes (understood as a state of mind) that he or she has authority. There are of course limits to a belief that, even though genuine, a court can accept as honest. Where there is absolutely no foundation at all for the belief, it will not be honest. Likewise, if the public servant is willfully blind to the true facts, the belief will not be honest. In this context, the reasonableness of a belief will assist in determining whether the belief is honest. But a belief may be unreasonable and yet honestly held because of the subjective situation of the public servant.

[177] Pointer's position can be no better than that, and indeed, we should not be taken as suggesting that a director's subjective situation and beliefs may be relied on to authorise otherwise unauthorised acts. It is not necessary for us to decide that. We only attempt to demonstrate that the appellants' arguments, taken at their highest, cannot lead to a result that differs from the one at trial.

[178] On the facts of this case, Pointer and the appellants must fail on the issue of the validity of the RFR. The best evidence of the state of a person's mind is the person's own contemporaneous verbalization of it. There is no question that Pointer did not have a reasonable belief in his authority to execute an RFR when regard is had to the first version of the "Statement of Facts" which he signed before he signed the RFR. He recognized that he needed, but lacked, Group's authority to sign it. There is no argument based on "good faith" which can validate his unauthorised execution of the RFR.

[179] The provisions of s. 118(3) of the ABCA do not assist Pointer. That subsection exempts a director from liability if he in good faith relies on an opinion or report of a lawyer. The trial judge found, amply supported by the evidence, that Pointer disregarded legal advice to not sign the RFR .

[180] The second reason why Pointer and the appellants cannot successfully rely on Pointer's fiduciary duties to Petroleum is because Pointer's execution of the RFR, by its terms, was a breach of his fiduciary duty to disclose to Petroleum all information of importance to the corporation. This Court noted in Michel v. Lafrentz (1992), 4 C.P.C. (3d) 155 that a director is bound to reveal to his corporation any information which is relevant to it. As stated at p. 158, "As a fiduciary, he cannot keep secrets from his beneficiary." By signing and concealing the RFR from Petroleum, he violated the fiduciary relationship which he argued gave validity to his action. A more spurious attempt to justify the unjustifiable is difficult to imagine.

[181] But Pointer, guided by Grenon according to the trial findings, plumbed the depths of corruption even further. He concealed the RFR from Petroleum even as he observed the corporation close a transaction which by the terms of the RFR would expose it to a liability of $17 million. That was not only a breach of his fiduciary duties to Petroleum, but as the trial judge found, it was dishonest and deceitful.

[182] Pointer was in no better position to act unilaterally as a director and officer of 542 than he was as a director and officer of Petroleum. His acknowledged sense that he could not sign the RFR without the approval of Group infected as well any suggestion that he acted in good faith in signing the USA for 542, which was one step closer to Group and whose sole purpose was to hold the shares of Petroleum for Group. Furthermore, Pointer committed himself to work to obtain some value for, not only Group, but for the Bank of Montreal by a sale or restructuring of Petroleum. In return, he was promised a 5% equity interest in Petroleum. The parties both recognized the contractual force of that arrangement. It was sought by Pointer and agreed to by Group before the significant events in the sale to Stampeder began to unfold. It is wrong to characterise that arrangement, as the appellants attempted, as a "bribe" to Pointer to favour the interests of Group over those of Petroleum.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[183] As part of the ongoing efforts to obtain value for Group from Petroleum, 542 was incorporated and Pointer appointed president and director. In that capacity and considered in connection with his contractual obligations to Group, he occupied the position of a fiduciary. The three general characteristics of a fiduciary relationship are:

> (1) The fiduciary has scope for the exercise of some discretion or power.
>
> (2) The fiduciary can unilaterally exercise that power or discretion to affect the beneficiary's legal or practical interests.
>
> (3) The beneficiary is peculiarly vulnerable to or at the mercy of the fiduciary holding the discretion or power.

[184] The characteristics of the relationship between Pointer as a director and president of 542 and Group met the test for the imposition of fiduciary duties on Pointer. In our view, the trial judge did not err in finding that Pointer owed such duties to Group and that he breached them by signing the resolution prepared by Grenon and the USA. We note in passing that there was no satisfactory explanation for the preparation of the resolution by Grenon rather than by the solicitor, Kim Reid, from whom Pointer said he was obtaining advice.

[185] The argument made by the appellants and Pointer urging this Court to find that the trial judge erred in not considering the distinct corporate entities involved in this matter is, in simple terms, a plea to shield Pointer and the appellants from the consequences of his dishonest and deceitful conduct by maintaining the corporate veil. In Cunningham v. Hamilton (1995), 29 Alta. L.R. (3d) 380 (C.A.), Fraser C.J.A. observed that separate legal entities will not be ignored absent some compelling reason. The exposure of dishonest, deceitful and corrupt conduct, is, in our view, a compelling reason to disregard the corporate veil. This is especially so when the corporations themselves did not claim that such veil in practice existed and did not seek to maintain it. Rather it was the wrongdoer who attempted to wrap himself in it to hide his misdeeds. In our opinion, the trial judge made no error in considering that there was no corporate veil between Petroleum, 542 and Group for the purposes of examining the integrity of the conduct of Pointer.

[186] By any analysis, whether that chosen by the trial judge, or that proposed by the appellants, correctly applied, the actions of Pointer in signing and concealing the various documents in July and into August 1993 were unauthorised and invalid.

[187] The actions of Grenon and Colborne were equally, perhaps more, dishonest than those of Pointer. Grenon, Edwards and Colborne argued that the trial judge did not understand the realities of competition for control of a target corporation and that he applied an unduly rigid standard of honesty to the circumstances of this case. We reject categorically the proposition that a lower standard of honesty pertains to corporate or commercial situations than for others.

[188] The facts connecting GE to Petroleum, 542 and Group are essentially simple and beyond dispute. GE knew that the board of directors of Group controlled Petroleum. GE wished to have an exclusive arrangement with Group to plan the restructuring of Petroleum. Group would not agree, but did leave the door open to a limited exclusive arrangement. One limitation to any rights which GE might be given was made clear to GE throughout these events – Group was to be free to deal with Stampeder. Pointer, Grenon and Edwards understood that Group, acting for itself and for Petroleum, was not to be restricted in its dealing with Stampeder. Group kept GE informed of the state of the Stampeder negotiations and encouraged GE to make a competing proposal to the Bank of Montreal. In fact, Group openly favoured the idea GE had for the restructuring of Petroleum over the Stampeder proposal. While Group was dealing with Stampeder, GE said nothing about claiming a right of first refusal. Then, when it appeared that events were moving swiftly in favour of Stampeder, GE raised, then retracted, its claim of a right of first refusal yet immediately commenced the preparation of documents by which they sought to bind Group to do that which they knew Group chose not to do.

[189] The business community as a whole would be sorry to learn that the courts understand such conduct to be honest and condone it. The appellants' argument that their conduct was not dishonest or unlawful but merely unsavoury is simply unpalatable and unsupportable.

[190] We are satisfied that the trial judge did not err in his conclusion that the conduct of Pointer, Grenon and Colborne was dishonest and deceitful. He was correct in dismissing the claims brought by GE against Petroleum, 542, Group, Stampeder and Ricinus. The documents on which those claims rested were correctly found to be the product of fraudulent conduct and therefore, void.

[191] In the circumstances, it is not necessary to consider whether the trial judge was correct in alternative interpretations leading to invalidation of any of the documents produced by Grenon and Pointer.

2. Pointer's Appeal For Severance and Other Compensation

[192] Pointer sued Petroleum and its parent, Group, for breach of an equity participation agreement and severance pay. Petroleum counterclaimed for fraudulent misrepresentation and sought to recover the amount paid to Pointer prior to the fraud being discovered. The trial judge dismissed Pointer's action but allowed the counterclaim in the sum of $85,000.00. Pointer appealed the dismissal of his claims against Petroleum and Group, the judgment against him on the counterclaim, and the judgment in favour of Group for its costs.

[193] The issues raised on this portion of the appeal repeat many of the issues raised in the main appeal, namely:

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

Did the trial judge err in law in finding that Pointer was in breach of contract, or of a fiduciary duty as an agent of Group, or of his fiduciary duty as director and officer of Petroleum or 542, warranting forfeiture of his equity participation?

Did the trial judge err in finding Pointer liable for fraudulent misrepresentation, warranting rescission of the severance agreement and forfeiture of the amounts already paid?

A. Pointer's claim to an equity interest

[194] Pointer contended in support of his claim, as he did on the issues in the main appeal, that the trial judge erred in finding that Pointer owed a fiduciary duty to Group, and in failing to recognize the independent legal status of 542 and Pointer's paramount duty to advance the best interests of that company and Petroleum. He argued that those errors arose from the failure to recognize admissions of adverse witnesses, factual errors and failure to make findings of credibility, which demonstrates reversible error.

[195] Recall some of the facts outlined above, Petroleum was a wholly owned subsidiary of Group. Pointer began his employment with Petroleum in 1985, and in May 1991, became the Chief Financial Officer and a director along with Chase and Savage. By then, Petroleum was in financial difficulty, which resulted in a proposal to restructure its loan with the Bank and to increase the equity value of the company. As part of its plan to restructure, in May 1992, Group agreed to establish an 10% equity incentive plan for its management as an incentive to generate value for the Bank and Group in Petroleum.

[196] In the fall of 1992, as another part of the plan to restructure Petroleum, Pointer proposed the incorporation of the company, 542, to be inserted between Group and Petroleum, which would be wholly owned by Group and would hold Group's shares of Petroleum. The directors were to mirror the board of Petroleum. Initially, Pointer was appointed as the sole director and president of 542, although Pointer told Reid, Petroleum's solicitor who handled the incorporation, that the directors were to be the same as Petroleum.

[197] Pointer instructed Reid to prepare a stock option agreement and a unanimous shareholders agreement which had the effect of showing that Pointer and Savage each held 5% of the shares of 542 and that 90% were held by Group. This was done without the knowledge of Group, but with the hope that Group would approve that plan.

[198] That plan was reviewed and approved by the board of Petroleum on December 3, 1992 and was presented to a meeting of the Group board of directors on December 10, 1992. That board was surprised to learn that 542 was not wholly owned by Group. But the board agreed in principle to the plan on the understanding that 542 would be a shell company, the board of directors would be restructured to mirror that of Petroleum, Group would be the beneficial owner of 100% shares of Petroleum and it would result in substantial savings of Saskatchewan capital tax. The Group board deferred a decision whether to provide Pointer and Savage with a 5% equity participation in Petroleum's restructuring.

[199] Pointer denied that 542 was inserted for any improper purpose and pointed to the anticipated tax savings, although those never materialized.

[200] When Chase and Geer learned, in January 1993, that 10% of the shares were still shown to be held by Pointer and Savage, Pointer was instructed to transfer the shares back to Group and to amend the directorship to mirror that of Petroleum's board. The shares were transferred shortly thereafter, but the other directors were not added until July 27 when Chase instructed the Group's solicitors to add himself and Savage to that board. So, throughout the critical period from February to July when the impugned transactions occurred, Pointer knew that he remained the sole director of 542 contrary to the express directions of both Group and Petroleum.

[201] At the Group board meeting on February 24, 1993, the equity participation was formally recognized and on July 27, 1993, the Board ultimately agreed that Pointer should receive 5% of the Stampeder sale proceeds, or $100,000.00. That approval was given without any knowledge of any clandestine activities. The only written confirmation of that agreement was a release which was executed on August 6 in lieu of documenting the equity option and upon assurance that Pointer would receive $100,000.00. Chase issued, but later cancelled, a cheque to Pointer in that amount when he learned of Pointer's secret dealings with Colborne and the filing of the statement of claim.

[202] The lack of documentation makes it difficult to discern the objective of the agreement. Pointer suggested that it was intended to be an incentive for Pointer and Savage to remain with Petroleum. But the trial judge found its purpose was "to ensure that management, Group and the Bank had the same objectives for Group's shares." That finding was not strongly contested and we see no basis to interfere with it.

[203] The trial judge refused to enforce the incentive agreement because in his view, Pointer had violated its spirit and terms by failing to perform both his duty as an agent to Group and his fiduciary duty to Petroleum, and by engaging in conspiracy and fraud. The trial judge had already found that as an officer and director of Petroleum, Pointer owed a substantial duty to Group and the Bank. He found that when Pointer was assisting Group in the restructuring process he occupied a position outside the scope of his duties as an ordinary director of Petroleum and owed Group a duty to deal with its shares in a trustworthy manner. He was akin to an employee of Group.

[204] The trial judge also found that Pointer was improperly shown as sole director and president of 542 during the critical period and used that position to sign resolutions and the USA with Colborne in a fraudulent attempt to defeat the interests of Group. He concluded that Pointer had breached the incentive agreement as well as the duty he owed to Group as its agent and as a director of Petroleum, and thus, had forfeited his right to be compensated for the incentive option, the purpose of which was to ensure that management advanced the interests of Group. Applying the reasoning of Berger J. in Teck Corporation Ltd. v. Millar, supra, he decided that Pointer was acting in his own rather than Petroleum's best interests. He found that Pointer had engaged in both fraud and conspiracy in the transaction concerning 542 to deprive Stampeder of its right to complete financing on the public market.

[205] As in the main appeal, Pointer argued that the trial judge erred in concluding that Petroleum and 542 were merely divisions of Group and Pointer was obliged to advance Group's strategy of selling Petroleum to Stampeder and to disclose Petroleum's contracts to Group. Since Petroleum was doing the restructuring, he argued it did not need Group's approval, even though Group was its sole shareholder. Pointer maintained that Group's interest in closing the transaction with Stampeder was motivated by its desire to close the side agreement with the Bank and was not a decision made in the best interests of Petroleum.

[206] Again, Pointer said it was enough to show that he believed he was acting in best interests of Petroleum and that proper regard was not given to his explanation of his conduct. But it is apparent that the trial judge found that Pointer's alleged belief that he was acting in best interests of Petroleum was not credible. Nor was there objective evidence that he intended to act solely in the best interests of Petroleum or 542.

[207] Moreover, as has already been stated, Pointer's fiduciary duty to Petroleum did not authorise him to do anything with Group's shares, other than to advance Group's interests as sole shareholder. And regardless of what Pointer believed to the best interests of Petroleum, once he perceived a conflict of interest, he was obliged to call a meeting of the directors of Petroleum to air his concerns or to apply for leave to bring a derivative action or an oppression action.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[208] In our view, as stated above in our analysis of the issues on the main appeal, Teck does not stand for the proposition that each individual director can unilaterally determine what is in the best interests of a corporation. Only the board acting collectively can decide what is in the best interests of the corporation. The best interests of a corporation include the interests of the shareholders collectively. Where there is but one shareholder, the best interests of the corporation will accord with the best interests of that shareholder: Gainers Inc. v. Pocklington Holdings Inc., supra. A director's duty to preserve the value of the corporation does not permit the director to ignore the collective interests of its shareholders. Nor do we agree that Teck, stands for the proposition that directors will never owe a fiduciary duty to the shareholders. Where the relationship between the shareholder and director is unique a director may owe a direct fiduciary duty to the shareholders: Tongue v. Vencap Equities Alberta Ltd., supra.

[209] Here, the trial judge did not err in finding such a unique relationship between Pointer and Group. Pointer acknowledged that the relationship between Group and himself required him to act in Group's best interests because he stood to benefit from the equity participation agreement and because 542 was wholly owned by Group. As well, since Pointer was appointed director of Petroleum and 542 by Group, according to s. 117(4) of the ACBA, special consideration may be given to the interests of Group. As Pointer was acting on the instructions of Group in restructuring Petroleum, we see no error in the conclusion of the trial judge that Pointer's relationship with Group was akin to that of an employee. And, moreover, as part of that restructuring, it was Pointer who persuaded Group to transfer all of its shares in Petroleum. All of those factors support the conclusion that Pointer had a unique relationship which evolved into a fiduciary relationship with Group.

[210] Pointer argued that any attempt by Group to limit his authority would be unlawful due to the requirement in s. 117(1)(a) of the ABCA that directors and officers act honestly and in good faith with a view to the best interests of the corporation. He relied on Scottish Cooperative Wholesale Society Ltd. v. Meer [1959] A.C. 324 at pp. 366-367 where Denning L.J. held that directors of a textile company, who were nominated to also serve as directors of a cooperative society, were wrong in failing to defend the interest of the textile company against the conduct of the cooperative society. By subordinating the interests of the textile company to those of the cooperative society, they conducted the affairs of the textile company in a manner oppressive to the other shareholders. But that case is clearly distinguishable because it involved a dispute between majority and minority shareholders. Here, there is only one shareholder. And where good faith cannot be shown, Pointer cannot invoke s. 117(1)(a) of the ABCA to shield his activities. We repeat our agreement with the trial judge's finding, good faith was clearly absent in this case.

[211] Pointer argued further that the trial judge erred in focussing on his authority to grant the right of first refusal rather than on his authority to restructure Petroleum which included the authority to negotiate with Colborne and the right to execute the letter of March 3. In Pointer's view, he was authorised to provide the March 3 letter and to decide for Petroleum whether the RFR was triggered. Hence, he contended he honestly believed that he had the authority to sign the RFR.

[212] As stated earlier, whatever implicit authority Pointer may have had to facilitate the restructuring of Petroleum, it could not reasonably have included the authority to enter into the March 3 letter and RFR. Moreover, on the evidence of this case, it is difficult to accept that belief in such authority could be honestly held when it was in direct conflict with Pointer's understanding of what Group wanted, which was to pursue the Stampeder the option. To repeat, the facts were that Pointer recognized that he needed, but lacked, Group's authority to sign the RFR.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[213] Additional facts and findings militate against the conclusion Pointer sought on appeal. Pointer failed to explain why he signed the letter of July 2, stating that the May 10 letter constituted the approval of Group to the restructuring plan per the March 3 letter, without consulting Group or the board of directors of Petroleum. Rather, the trial judge found that the July 2 letter and its execution was a major step in the plan of deception devised by Grenon and Pointer to force Stampeder into the position where it would make a deal to turn over the Petroleum's tax losses and resource pools to Colborne.

[214] Moreover, the trial judge found that the July 22 minutes of a board meeting of 542 on July 14 was a fiction and dismissed argument that Pointer had authority to act on the resolution or to sign the USA. Pointer knew the other directors would not approve of the agreement and so, falsely concocted it. The agreement purported to preclude Petroleum from doing anything without the consent of Colborne and to preclude 542 from taking any action it might take as a shareholder without the consent of Colborne. It was executed without authority and in clear breach of Pointer's fiduciary duty and it is trite law that courts will not enforce a contract for an unlawful purpose.

[215] Pointer said that the RFR agreement merely protected Colborne's right to match a competing restructuring proposal and did not bind Petroleum to any transaction. He argued, relying on Teck, that directors of a corporation may legitimately put plans in place to protect the company from takeover by unsuitable candidates. He also maintained that since Colborne's negotiations could have resulted in a greater return to the shareholders, he might have faced liability if he had supported the Stampeder transaction. Further, he said that 542 was entitled to protect Petroleum, despite the clear understanding conveyed at the December 10, 1993 meeting that Group was sole beneficial owner.

[216] However, Pointer failed to explain why the RFR definition of restructuring included the definition in the March 3 letter, why it was prepared in Reid's absence or why it provides that any trifling breach triggers the $17 million financial penalty created by Pointer for the exclusive benefit of Colborne. It is certain that Petroleum stood to gain nothing from it. In fact, the Colborne transaction would have dismembered Petroleum. Moreover, as emphasised earlier, Pointer's authority was subject to specific expenditure limits ($50,000) imposed by the Petroleum board and the liquidated damages clause exceeded that limit by three hundredfold.

[217] On either August 4 or 5, Pointer stripped the RFR agreement, all versions of the USA and the July 21 letter from the files of Petroleum and generated a memo, which was misleadingly dated July 15, referring to a right of first refusal. The USA and RFR were not produced until August 7 and the July 21 letter was not revealed until examinations for discovery. The only reasonable inference is that the RFR was a fraudulent and illegal document and that Pointer breached his fiduciary duty to Petroleum and 542 by executing it.

[218] Pointer distorted and misrepresented Reid's role and his evidence concerning the preparation of the RFR agreement. But the evidence of Reid's advice, that Pointer should not sign the RFR agreement, was unambiguous in our view. Pointer was determined to sign in any event and did not tell Reid he was involved in drafting the document. Reid was unwavering in his advice that if Pointer signed the RFR agreement, he seriously risked breaching his fiduciary duties to Petroleum. But that advice was ignored. As already concluded, s. 118(3) of the ABCA,which protects a director who in good faith relies on counsel, is of no assistance to Pointer, since Pointer did not act on that advice.

[219] Pointer sought to equate himself with Petroleum, but in fact he acted unilaterally, secretly and for improper motives. It was his duty to make full disclosure to the other directors and not their responsibility to ferret out his covert activities. There is no principle of corporate law that entitles an individual director to circumvent the authority of the board and secretly create documents. The confidentiality clause was unprecedented and contrary to the provisions of the ABCA. Even Edwards found it onerous and outside the limits of usual business practice. It is astonishing that Pointer would argue that the confidentiality clauses in documents unilaterally created by him required him to maintain secrecy. Pointer argued that there was no evidence that Stampeder relied on any non-disclosure. But the secrecy was directed towards Petroleum and those actions were manifestly not in the best interests of Petroleum.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[220] The underlying premise of Pointer's claim was that the trial judge failed to understand that Pointer was compelled by his fiduciary duties to act secretly and alone with Grenon to concoct a $17 million liability within Petroleum that would be triggered by the sale of Petroleum shares to Stampeder, to circumvent the Board of Petroleum, and to stand silently by while that liability was triggered. It is beyond belief that this was in the best interests of Petroleum. In fact, Pointer knew that transaction would trigger a $17 million penalty in favour of Colborne, yet he said nothing. It was his duty to disclose, but knew that if he did, he would get neither his severance allowance nor his equity option. That money would not come to him unless Stampeder closed the deal.

[221] In the result, we see no error in the reasoning of the trial judge that Pointer owed and breached fiduciary duties to both Group and Petroleum, or in his conclusion that Pointer was not entitled to benefit from the incentive agreement.

B. Pointer's claim to severance pay

[222] On July 29, 1993, following discussions between Pointer and Chase anticipating that the sale of Group's shares to Stampeder might result in the termination of Pointer's employment, Geer agreed that Pointer should receive a severance payment of $175,000.00, and other benefits valued at $8,120.31, on condition that the Stampeder deal closed . At the same time, Pointer was engaged in concealing from Chase the fact that he had signed the USA and the RFR. Before learning of Pointer's covert activities, Stampeder, which had by then acquired Petroleum, paid Pointer one half the sum payable under the severance agreement, that is $87,500.00. But, on August 8, when Stampeder discovered his stratagem, Pointer was fired and the balance due under the agreement was withheld.

[223] Pointer then alleged a fundamental breach of the severance agreement and sued to obtain the balance and Petroleum counterclaimed to recover the amount paid.

[224] The trial judge found that Pointer committed fraud in inducing Chase to enter the severance agreement by representing that he was assisting Group to sell its shares to Stampeder, when in fact he was engaged in a conspiracy that would dramatically transform the consequences of that transaction. Because the misrepresentation was material to the contract, the trial judge held that Petroleum was entitled to rescission of the contract and judgment for the amount paid.

[225] On this appeal, Pointer claimed $242,423.31 plus interest.

[226] Pointer argued that the trial judge made a manifest error in finding that he represented to Chase that he would assist in closing the Stampeder deal. He also maintained that by late July, he had told Chase that Petroleum was of the view that Group had approved and that any transaction would have to be subject to Colborne's rights.

[227] The evidence showed otherwise. When the severance arrangement was first agreed upon on July 27, Pointer was told by Chase that it was unique to the closing of the Stampeder deal. Chase testified that he knew Pointer was disappointed that the deal appeared to be going ahead with Stampeder and not Colborne. Pointer, however, said nothing of the USAs and revisions of RFRs which he and Grenon were then preparing. In fact, when Chase asked him about the March 3 letter, Pointer said it was nothing more than a working plan, not a right of first refusal.

[228] On August 3, Pointer met with Chase to prepare for the closing of the Stampeder transaction. Pointer reviewed a certificate that Chase was to sign certifying that Group did not have any outstanding rights to acquire its shares and that they were free of all encumbrances or third party claims. Pointer said nothing of the RFR or USA. On the same day, he participated in a meeting of the Petroleum board which approved the severance agreements for himself and Savage and then attended the formal closing of the Stampeder deal. Again, he did not disclose the existence of the RFR, USA and other documents which the appellants have relied upon.

[229] At the formal closing, Chase had with him a cheque for half the severance amount. The severance payments were to be made in two installments, one half on closing and one half 30 days later. Hence, Pointer needed the Stampeder deal to close. But Pointer's duplicity was demonstrated on August 3, when he sought full payment of the severance package. The trial judge also found that Grenon knew of the arrangements and agreed that Stampeder should not be told of the RFR or USA until after Pointer received his payments. From August 3 to August 6, Pointer also assisted in keeping the documents from coming to light by removing copies of the RFR and USA as well as correspondence from the records of Petroleum. During these same days, he continued to demand payment of the equity participation. Only on August 6, when Pointer was about to receive the equity participation payment, did Stampeder and Group learn of the existence of the USA. That payment was withdrawn and the second half of the severance was not paid.

[230] The evidence supported the trial judge's conclusion that Pointer deceived Chase about the true role he was playing in the final stages of the negotiations with Stampeder and that misrepresentation went to the factual foundation upon which the parties entered into the severance agreement. We find no reason to interfere with the trial judge's decision that the contract was rescinded and that Petroleum was entitled to judgment against Pointer for the amount paid under the contract.

C. Award of Costs at Trial

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[231] The trial judge awarded solicitor-client costs against Colborne et al. on the grounds that their actions were intended to be used as a lever to intimidate Stampeder into making a deal with them and constituted an abuse of process. Pointer argued that the pleading of abuse of process was not directed against him. The trial judge, however, did not except out Pointer in his finding of abuse of process along with the other business torts of conspiracy, unlawful interference with economic interests and fraud. Although Pointer was not directly involved in the press release or statement of claim, the damages to Stampeder were nonetheless foreseeable to him due to his complicity in the events that led to it. Therefore, as he is jointly liability for the counterclaims of Stampeder, so he is liable for the award of solicitor-client costs.

3. Group and 542's Cross-Appeal

[232] The trial judge awarded Group and 542 party-party costs at three times Column 6 of Schedule "C" of the Alberta Rules of Court. Group and 542 cross-appealed that award on the grounds that the trial judge erred by failing to award solicitor-client costs to compensate for the costs of defending groundless litigation and to prevent the abuses of the court processes. They maintained that the actions of Colborne, Grenon, Edwards and Pointer were aimed at destroying the Group-Stampeder transaction and necessarily harmed all parties to that transaction, including Group and 542.

[233] Absent an error of law, disregard of applicable principles or misapprehension of facts, an appellate court will rarely interfere with a discretionary award of costs which is based on the trial judge's view of the conduct of the case. However, it appears to us that the trial judge failed to follow the indicia for awarding solicitor-client costs which were outlined by this Court in Jackson and Parkview Holdings Ltd. v. Trimac Industries Ltd. et al. (1994), 155 A.R. 42. In our view, those indicia are satisfied in this case with respect to Group and 542, to the same extent that they were satisfied with respect to Stampeder.

[234] They include the fact that the claims of Colborne, Grenon, Edwards and Pointer were found to be groundless, and the actions of Grenon and Pointer were found to be fraudulent, dishonest and deceitful, and that they involved the use of the courts as an instrument of that conduct. Further, the appellants' evidence was found to be neither reliable nor credible. At trial, Grenon, Edwards and Colborne alleged conspiracy on the part of Group and 542, a claim which they abandoned on appeal. Edwards had not read the March 3 letter even though he based his claim on it. Moreover, several unsuccessful attempts were made throughout the trial to impugn the honesty and integrity of the cross appellants' witnesses.

[235] The trial judge awarded Stampeder solicitor-client costs because in his view Colborne et al.'s actions were intended to intimidate Stampeder into making a deal with them and constituted an abuse of process. But he failed to recognize that those same actions were also aimed at Group and 542, who were drawn into the same snare which ultimately entangled them in this lawsuit. Clearly, the suit was primarily intended to thwart the Group-Stampeder transaction and not merely to harm Stampeder's equity financing. Though the trial judge found there were no genuine issues to be tried, he later appeared to contradict that finding in his ruling on costs. He stated that he was required to make important credibility findings. But, after finding that neither Grenon nor Pointer genuinely believed that the May 10 letter constituted approval, there could not be any genuine issue arising from the allegation of interference with rights arising from the March 3 letter.

[236] Edwards, a lawyer, cannot avoid responsibility for the award of costs by pleading ignorance of key documents, which were in his possession and under his control, when he permitted his name to be added as a plaintiff without familiarizing himself with them. He unequivocally sought to reap the full benefit of the litigation; he must now also bear its full burden.

[237] The absence of any claim or finding of tortious conduct, or of any award of damages in favour of Group and 542, does not preclude an award of solicitor-client costs in their favour because it is the conduct of the trial which is the determining factor in a cost award. Although this Court will only rarely interfere with the exercise of discretion in an award of costs, the failure to appreciate the true target of the abusive conduct warrants intervention in this case. Accordingly, we allow Group and 542's cross-appeal. They are awarded costs at trial for both actions to be taxed on a solicitor-client basis.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

4. Culpable Involvement of the Appellant Murray Edwards

[238] The trial judgment levied compensatory and punitive damages against the appellant, Edwards, as well as Colborne and its principals. On appeal, Edwards sought to divorce his activities from Grenon and Pointer. On the evidence, it was clear that Edwards, who along with Grenon, drove Colborne and its activities, played, at best, a subsidiary role to Grenon in Colborne's predatory attempts to acquire Petroleum and its attempts to frustrate Stampeder's purchase in order to advance its own acquisition plan. Indeed, Mr. Marshall, counsel for Stampeder, agreed that there was no evidence that Edwards prepared or participated in the preparation of the misleading documents used to advance Colborne's deceptions.

[239] Counsel for Edwards, Mr. Thrasher, and Stampeder's counsel, Mr. Marshall, canvassed the trial record (14,000 pages) and summarized, in submissions confined to that issue, the evidence supporting or refuting Edwards' exposure. This has been very helpful. However, it is not necessary to weigh and assess each evidentiary reference against Edwards' submission that he was unnecessarily and improperly swept up in the trial judge's condemnation of the other defendants by counterclaim.

[240] Edwards' culpable involvement, at least in the opinion of the trial judge, was mandated by the evidence of his discussions with various brokers before August 6, 1993, joining the suspect litigation and his idea of issuing an early press communique. The latter, in the conclusion of the trial judge, was done for the purpose of stultifying any support from the financial community, ". .

. for financing by Stampeder to enable it to pay out the Bank of Montreal". Despite Edwards' trial denial, it is difficult to conclude otherwise in the face of all the evidence.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[241] Edwards had several conversations with Michael Timms of Peters & Co. Edwards conveyed to Timms his last ditch proposal for settlement in the expectation that it would be conveyed by Timms to Stampeder. It was that if Stampeder was willing to settle for Petroleum's production interests, Colborne would take its tax pool. He offered Timms a copy of Colborne's proposed statement of claim. Edwards continued to monitor Stampeder's financing progress by staying in touch with Peters & Co. through Timms. This culminated in another phone call on August 13, 1993, one regarded as critical by the trial judge. In it Edwards, in response to his inquiry, was advised that the question of whether Peters & Co. would be underwriting the Stampeder/Petroleum deal was not yet resolved. Edwards then took the occasion to remind Timms that Peters & Co. had a personal business relationship with himself and Grenon.

[242] The judge had to be mindful of a contemporaneous call to the underwriter, Peters & Co., by Edwards' associate, Grenon, in which Grenon said, "Presumably no underwriter would finance this deal with this kind of cloud hanging over it." Coincidence with no imputations drawable against Edwards? The judge might have so found. But he did not. This was not a threat, but it was clear evidence of a renewed attempt to lay third party pressure on Stampeder at a critical time. Thus, Edwards was particeps in the Grenon-Pointer-Colborne scheme, openly reiterating the warning to Chase first floated by Grenon in his July 2 letter. It led the trial judge to conclude that "Edward's call was intended to interfere with Stampeder's financing." We would decline to intervene in the trial fact-finding associating Edwards with Colborne's overall plan. Moreover, Edwards' position at trial was not easily reconcilable with his earlier affidavit of documents.

[243] The trial finding, in our respectful view, was far from irresponsible. At the very least, the trial judge's conclusion was sustainable and resistant to appellate interference. The result is that this aspect of Edward's appeal must be rejected. His adjuvancy was heavily a matter in the trial judge's assessment of his credibility. In this it is relevant to remember Robert H. Jackson J.'s reminder to the appellate process that:

> A few minutes observation of the parties in the courtroom is more informing than reams of cold record.
>
> (Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U.S. 143, at p. 169)

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[244] It is not necessary therefore, to proceed to Thrasher's submission that, in law, Edwards could not be vicariously answerable in damages for the tortious activities of the other defendants by counterclaim. His liability rests on more.

5. Stampeder et al. counterclaim

[245] Without reiterating the evidence reviewed above, we are satisfied that the trial findings, that the conduct of Colborne, Grenon, Edwards and Pointer exceeded the bounds of business behaviour to the extent that a court will intervene, are sound. Therefore, we will not interfere with the finding of liability against Colborne et al. for the torts counterclaimed by Stampeder, Petroleum and Ricinus.

6. Damages

A. Rule 218.1

[246] The appellants, Colborne et al., sought a new trial over the manner in which the opinion evidence of the expert, Wilf Gobert, was received. It was urged that Rule 218.1 of the Alberta Rules of Court was ignored when the trial judge ruled that the witness could be heard, notwithstanding Stampeder's (who sponsored Gobert) failure to furnish any statements, summaries or reports of Gobert's anticipated testimony and conclusions to opposing parties. The rule says:

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

> 218.1(1) A party intending to call an expert witness at a trial shall, not less than 90 days prior to the day of the commencement of the trial, serve on every other party to the action a copy of a substance of opinion statement signed by the expert setting out the following:
>
> (a) the expert's name and qualifications;
>
> (b) the area of expertise that the party calling the expert is seeking to have the expert qualified in;
>
> (c) the substance of the expert's opinion.
>
> (1.1) A party on who a statement has been served under subrule (1) who intends to call an expert witness in rebuttal to the matters mentioned in the statement shall, not more than 45 days from service of the statement, serve on every other party to the action a copy of a statement signed by that expert setting out his name and qualifications and the substance of his opinion.
>
> (2) Unless subrule (1) or (1.1), as the case may be, has been complied with, a party may not call an expert witness to testify without leave of the court.
>
> (3) Where a party proposes to call an expert witness at the trial and to offer in evidence a report by the expert witness, that party shall, without prejudice to the right to any party to object to its admission in evidence, serve on every other party to the action a copy of the report not fewer than 10 days prior to the commencement of the trial.
> (4) This Rule does not apply to a very long trial action.

[247] Gobert's evidence has been referred to elsewhere in these reasons. Its significance to the outcome of the case was that it clearly led to the trial judge's conclusion that if Colborne et al. had not issued the Statement of Claim and media communique on August 5th, Stampeder's stock price would have steadily increased between August 5th to August 13th and attained a market price of $6.16 per share.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[248] Objection to the receipt of Gobert's evidence was taken. It was fully argued that to admit it would ignore the strictures of Rule 218.1 and the intendment behind that rule. Stampeder defended the admissibility of Gobert's evidence despite lack of formal notice because it had already complied with Rule 218.1 by furnishing statements of the proposed evidence of two witnesses, Mote and McEachern, which evidence also related to the calculation of compensatory damages. Stampeder's position was that McEachern's evidence was redundant because Gobert's evidence would cover the same ground. No harm was therefore done: nobody was misled. That was the argument.

[249] The dispute emerged on the 94th day of a complex document trial. This may partially explain why there was no application to adjourn the proceedings to accommodate Colborne et al.'s concerns and allow for the consideration and preparation of rebuttal evidence if necessary. In any event, the trial judge chose to receive Gobert's evidence and it was only when the trial reasons for judgment were released did its impact in the case emerge.

[250] We think we should ally ourselves with the trial judge's discretion in resolving the issue. It is clearly contemplated by the relevant rule of court and despite Colborne's stated anxieties about the trial judge's decision to proceed to hear Gobert, he was undoubtedly aware of the following. These were proceedings in which damages (other than punitive damages) of $30,000,000 were sought. He was free to assume that an exhaustive discovery of the amount plead would have been made by Colborne and those parties aligned in interest with it, long before trial. If Stampeder's production of Gobert contributed to a "trial by ambush", it was not the type of ambush feared by Rule 218.1.

[251] We dismiss this ground of appeal.

B. Calculations of Damages

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[252] Very much in issue is the substructure of the award of compensatory damages to Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum in their tort counterclaim against Colborne, Grenon and Edwards, as well as Pointer.

[253] The sum awarded for compensatory damages was $3,630,000. It was coupled to punitive or exemplary damages in the amount of $1,000,000, costs, and prejudgment interest. These trial awards are defended by Stampeder et al., who take the core position that they should be validated by this Court simply because of appellate deference to their trial determination — the paramountcy of the trial judge in these matters.

[254] The history of Stampeder's compensatory damages was as follows. While the junior oil market was aware, by rumour, that Stampeder was about to broaden its asset base by acquisition, nothing was publicly confirmed until Stampeder's media announcement that it had acquired an unidentified private oil company for thirty million dollars. This information, published the following day by, at least, the Globe and Mail, was released after the close of trading on the Toronto Stock Exchange on August 3, 1993. It was in this form:

> Stampeder buying firm
> Stampeder Exploration Ltd. of Calgary says it has bought all the shares and debt of an unidentified private oil company for $30-million.
>
> Stampeder paid $2-million for the company's shares and agreed to purchase all of the private concern's debt from a Canadian financial institution for $28-million.
>
> Stampeder said the private company has oil production of about 1,850 barrels a day in southwest-central Saskatchewan, in an area where Stampeder has significant existing oil and gas interests.

> Stampeder said the acquisition increases its daily production by an estimated 65 per cent.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[255] On August 6, 1993, the Colborne interests parried with their own communique. This was suggested by the appellant Edwards. It read:

> Colborne Capital Corporation ('Colborne') announces that it is in the process of filing a lawsuit against Stampeder Exploration Ltd. ('Stampeder') seeking to terminate the transaction recently announced by Stampeder concerning the acquisition of the shares of an unnamed private company or seeking damages in the alternative.
>
> For further information:
>
> Judi Schofield
> Colborne Capital Corporation
> (403) 221-8150

[256] Both announcements concealed more than they revealed. It will be seen that on August 6, readers, including the investment community, were only told, somewhat cryptically, that Colborne's proposed lawsuit would seek to terminate Stampeder's acquisition or would seek damages in the alternative. The possibility of immediate relief by way of injunction was not put forth.

[257] Faced with these tremors what did the market do? The answer seems to be very little; either on Stampeder's presumably good news released on August 3rd or Stampeder's presumably bad news released by Colborne on August 6th. This includes both the bidding for Stampeder stock or the volume of shares in Stampeder that were traded on the T.S.E.

[258] In our respectful assessment of the evidence, the market was so unruffled between August 6th and August 13th, the date Stampeder's subsequent special warrant equity financing issue came out, that it is, at least, difficult to conclude that the Colborne communique (and the Statement of Claim which followed) played any instrumental role in the August, 1993 fortunes of Stampeder Exploration shares. About Colborne, the market simply didn't know or didn't care.

[259] The compensatory damages ($3,630,000) flowed from the trial judge's estimate of the cost to Stampeder when he found that the company had been denied the ability to raise the amount of funding in the equity market that it would have generated had Colborne not published the press release of August 6, 1993 and issued the statement of claim which was promised. The statement of claim, of course, provided that Colborne would, by law, seek to terminate Stampeder's purchase of Petroleum (and 542) because of Colborne's claimed right of first refusal, which Stampeder had refused to recognize. The damage allegation at trial was that Stampeder, at the end of the day, had been denied the full fruits of equity financing for the Petroleum acquisition. These were urged to be monies which would have been received but for Colborne's tortious intervention, calculated to induce Petroleum and 542 to deal with Colborne instead of Stampeder.

[260] The difficulty in the calculation of this sizeable award ($3,630,000) lies in the determination of what price per share Stampeder might have gathered under its special warrant offering in the marketplace on August 13th absent Colborne's tortious misconduct. Stampeder had the onus of proving that its warrant offering on August 13, 1993 would have been higher than the $5.50 per share cost that it assigned to its own stock in the special warrant issue because of Colborne's attempts to embarrass the equity financing. The issue sold out at that price and provided funding for both the payout of Petroleum's debt to the Bank of Montreal and acquirement of Petroleum's remaining asset value. All of the $30,000,000 cost was recovered from the investment community under the special warrant issue.

[261] The trial judge held that because of Colborne's press communique of August 6, 1993, and the oblique motives behind it, Stampeder stock remained flat throughout the rest of the month. This prevented Stampeder from sharing in a market upswing enjoyed by comparable junior oil stocks within the investment climate of the day. (Peters Picks Index). After hearing opinion evidence on the probabilities that the market rise would have included equities in Stampeder, the trial judge concluded:

> I am satisfied that the reason for this were (sic) the allegation made in the Statement of Claim issued by Colborne on August 6th, and the press release, which Colborne caused to be published on the same day, both were designed to convince the investing community that Colborne was in a position to set aside Stampeder's and Petro's (and 542775) acquisition.

He further found that:

> The evidence is clear that Colborne's allegation caused uncertainty in the investing community generally and especiallyStampeder's group of institutional investors and to Peters (sic) and Co. who Stampeder had selected as the lead underwriter for its impending stock warrant issue.

[262] Use of this methodology to calculate compensatory damage appealed to the trial judge because it was not:

> . . .[an] attempt to predict what a stock would do in the future but what the stock most probably would have done, based on hindsight not foresight, on what other stocks in an equivalent category actually did.

[263] The trial judge's formula was of perfectly good motivation. Yet it was not hindsight – it contained substantial elements of speculation. It had to. It breaks down when the assumptions that had to support it are reviewed. There are two areas of concern.

[264] First, the common shares of Stampeder had no proven history of marching in lock step with the market price of the other junior oils of the Peters Picks Index. Nor is it reliable to assume that it would have done so during August 1993. The trial judge used the Peters Picks Index to conclude that Stampeder would probably have attained a trading price and value of $6.16 per share instead of $5.50, the price at which the shares were publicly traded on August 13, 1993. This, he held, forced the special warrant price down to $5.50 per share as decided by Stampeder and its underwriters. Under this rationale 5,500,000 special warrant shares were offered at that price. Hence the trial judge calculated the net loss to Stampeder's coffers at $3,650,000 – 66¢ per share (11.11% of market value).

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[265] The first criticism arises from the assumed pricing fraternity between Stampeder and the other junior oils found in the Peters Picks Index. Earlier in 1993, including the month of August, Stampeder's common stock appears to have marched to its own, not the industry's, drum. The point (and its implication) is persuasively summarized in the factum of the appellant, Edwards (p. 34, para. 18):

> The patent and demonstrable unreliability of the use of the Peters Picks Index as a predictor of how the shares of a company such as Stampeder would perform during any given one-week period is illustrated by a comparison of the relative performances of Stampeder and the Peters Picks Index in the week prior to issuance of the press release and statement of claim. On July 30th the Peter Picks closed at 3962.022 and on August 5th (the eve of commencement of litigation) they closed down just slightly at 3938.667. Stampeder had closed on July 30th at $6.25. Having regard for the evidence of Tonken, Bailey and Gobert that the Petro acquisition was a positive development which had been enthusiastically received by the market, it is reasonable to expect (if Gobert's opinion were sound) that Stampeder would have done better, and certainly no worse, than the Peters Picks had done during the period July 30 to August 5th. In fact, however, Stampeder's share price of $6.25 declined by 8 percent to close on August 5th (two days after public announcement of the Petro acquisition) at $5.75. It is respectfully submitted that it was patently unreasonable to conclude that, but for the litigation, Stampeder's share price would have performed as well as the Peters Picks Index in the week following commencement of the litigation, given that in the week preceding commencement of the litigation (when perceived positive news about Stampeder was being given to the > market), Stampeder's share price had declined by fifteen times more than the Peters Picks prices.

[266] Accurate prognostication as to where the stock market will go, or its handmaiden – how far an individual stock might have gone but for collateral influences – , is a conjuration few have mastered. To reach the conclusion that the common shares of Stampeder would have traded above $5.50 per share on August 13, 1993 had it not been for Colborne et al.'s intervention, the learned trial judge had to accept the opinions of the Peters Picks Index experts that Stampeder instead of stalling in the $5.40-$5.70 range, would have climbed to $7.08 by September 3, 1993. Within those projections he accepted the expert testimony that Stampeder would have traded at $6.16 on August 13, 1993. He held that it was Colborne and its media invocation leading to the issuance of its statement of claim which dampened a sure rise in the value of the security. This, in both its assumptions, was neither proved nor safe.

[267] Stampeder stock went from $1.75 (January 4, 1993) to $7.38 (June 30, 1993), an increase of 321% in six months. While doing so, Stampeder did not track gains by other junior oils in the Peters Picks Index. We have already referred to its singular performance in the first week of August 1993. During the month of June 1993, Stampeder rose from $5 per share, peaking at $7.50 per share and finally settling at $7-3/8. In July 1993, the stock first fell back to $5 but by month-end had closed at $6.25. August saw it dropping for about ten days, stabilizing for three or four days and falling back again. At the end of August it had closed slightly below the price at which it had opened at the beginning of that month.

[268] That the Stampeder special warrant issue sold out, indeed was oversubscribed, at $5.50, does not refute the possibility that it would have been fully subscribed even at some higher valuation. Special warrant price was a business decision. Certainly, it was not too expensive. Whether it was too low is not, at least, easily deducible from the evidence.

[269] Clearly in the summer of 1993, the common stock of Stampeder was dwelling in interesting times, whatever the fallout from the Petroleum acquisition publicity may have contributed to its value. Indeed, international oil prices were softening, but Stampeder held its value as well, if not better, than many junior oils regarded as its peers. It must be remembered that Stampeder was reputed in the industry to be a Beta stock – a market leader, either outperforming and underperforming the others. But it was still dangerous for the learned trial judge to assume that there was some umbilical relationship then in place between Stampeder and the other junior oils.

[270] It is equally clear, however, that from August 9, 1993 onward, the trading level of Stampeder did not correspond with the advancing market values of the composite of one hundred other oil stocks, the Peters Picks Index. This was explained by the witness, Gobert. Stampeder was not, at least in August trading volumes, an underlined stock, up or down.

[271] This raises the second assumption – that the attendant publicity created by Colborne caused a negative market climate for Stampeder within the investment community, institutional and speculative, during August 1993. To us, the evidence is far from satisfactory that the Colborne statement of claim and media commentary alone undermined investor confidence in Stampeder forcing the reduced warrant price offering.

[272] With the 26,548,399 outstanding shares in Stampeder already in public placement on August 6th (the day Colborne made its intervention publicly known), it is somewhat surprising that on the next Toronto Stock Exchange trading day – August 9, 1993 – demand for Stampeder's stock had slipped, but hardly precipitously, from $5.60 to $5.40 with the total shares traded being a mere 13,050. 13,050 shares represented .049% of the issued capital stock of Stampeder. The next trading day, August 10th, saw a mere 3,700 shares (only .014% of the company's issued capital stock) being traded by investors, institutional and otherwise, but who were later categorized by Stampeder as investors who were discouraged by worry brought on by Colborne's possible lawsuit. Further market activity in Stampeder shares revealed that on August 11th and August 12th, 3,300 and 108,200 shares changed hands. 6,300 traded on August 13th (Exhibit 219)*. The point of all this is that in terms of volume, the market really didn't seem to care about what Stampeder acquired or what Colborne had to say about it. In the Stampeder/Colborne exchange little confirmation for the shopworn adage that the market buys on rumour and sells on fact, emerged. There was no blood in the streets. Between August 9th (the first trading day after the Colborne communique) and August 13th, the stock remained constant at $5.60 per share, with a slight interim dip to $5.40 on August 9th and August 10th.

[273] It was not until August 12, 1993 that Stampeder's Toronto Stock Exchange trading volume regained the level attained by it on August 5, 1993 (two days after the publicity generated by its acquisition of Petroleum, but a day before the allegedly enervating Colborne announcement). Looked at from the standpoint of trading activity, the absence of any real erosion of market confidence in, let alone panic selling, of the issued capital stock of Stampeder, the Colborne press communique of August 6, 1993 and the statement of claim which followed made few ripples. From the placid trading that followed, neither announcement, it would seem, was either a growth or loss driver. Investors, unaware that the tax pools, not production, were the significant asset, may have suspected that either the acquisition of Petroleum was not worth $30,000,000 or that lawsuits of the type that was threatened were usually years away from becoming enforceable judgments.

[274] The proven market response in Stampeder stock is especially unsettling when Gobert's expert evidence is reviewed. Gobert allowed that the market takes two or three days to respond to news and that the ultimate evaluation of stock market forecasting lies in the market itself. Neither truism assists Stampeder.

[275] In today's Alberta, no evidence is required to support the proposition that the perception of an oil stock's value (and the base value and cost of any equity offering thereof) can shift (or drift) in response to many factors. Buyer confidence must discount escalating reserve replacement costs, national and international production levels, including the moods of OPEC, as well as worldwide political considerations; all play their role. While the international oil market craves stability, production and the price of oil do not always oblige. Within a national perspective, even winter drilling programs in the Canadian northwest and the rising costs of industry services and land access can materially affect prospects for future productivity, market reserves, profit and value.

[276] Even if the Peters & Co. prognostications were reliable – that Stampeder stock should have been trading at $6.16 instead of $5.60 per share on August 13th – an 11% swing in a six dollar junior oil stock was hardly calamitous. It was consistent with seesaw market trends, the presence of which are confirmed not only by the Peters Picks Index, but the oil and gas sub-index of the Toronto Stock Exchange as determined over the past decade.

[277] As to the proven impact of Colborne's public trumpeting of its alleged right of first refusal of the Petroleum deal, apart from the absence of empirical evidence that Colborne dragged Stampeder down in the estimation of the investing public, there are other considerations. Alberta oilmen and investors in their companies are not naive. It is well known that allegations in statements of claim and media releases are not offered under oath. The leverage hoped for from threats of litigation is often part of market politics and there is little hard evidence that Colborne's intended scuttling, or even embarrassment, of Stampeder's financing initiatives, led to a price reduction in the stock.

[278] To be fair, the trial judge faced a difficult evidentiary task in quantifying any damages claimed by Stampeder. But with respect, the evidence of Gobert and Stampeder's industry experts was speculative; it did not reliably couple all diminution of Stampeder's equity financing to the machinations of Colborne and its principals. In 1808, 190 years ago, the English poet and artist, William Blake mused, "God forbid that truth be confined to mathematical demonstration," a caution which reemerged in Killeen v. Kline [1982] 3 W.W.R. 289 (B.C.C.A.), where Lambert J.A. observed at p. 302:

> The task of the appellate court is clearly made less perplexing if the cloak of mathematics does not seem to give an air of scientific accuracy to a decision that is fundamentally one of judicial assessment, not of calculation.

[279] Underlying this bitterly fought and protracted case remains the classic caveat raised by Cardozo J. earlier this century in Broadway Photoplay v. World Film, 225 N.Y. 104 at p. 108, "The rule of damages must give true expression to the realities of life." We fear that the damages awarded here may well have outrun those realities.

[280] At the risk of repetition, it is clear from the damage exhibits reviewed by counsel for Colborne, Mr. Duguid, that there was no positive evidence that the market price – therefore the value – of Stampeder shares, in the eyes of the investing public, regarded Stampeder's acquisition of Petroleum to be a positive development for Stampeder. After all, $30,000,000 was paid, but the market was not immediately told what Stampeder obtained or who Stampeder obtained it from: there was nothing about the tax attributes in either communique. The announced lawsuit (August 6, 1993) was a negative development for Stampeder. But how serious was it in the eyes of the market? The choice of the warrant price $5.50 (discounted, as usual, from the market value) a week later was an uncertain vessel by which to presume substantial downward pressure from Colborne's activities by themselves. At $5.50 per share, the warrant issue sold out. Indeed, it was oversold. It issued at an 11.11% discount. But it is a matter of assumption that it would not have sold out at some fixed higher price.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[281] If Stampeder had the onus of proving its loss at the special warrant price that it selected, and it does, Stampeder has proven, at best, that it incurred a loss but it has not proven that loss to be $3,630,000. From the evidence of industry experience, past performance does not ensure future gains and it is not clear that the learned trial judge kept that in mind. Stampeder proved that 5,500,000 shares of its stock moved quickly at $5.50. But in special warrant issues that discount of 11.11% from its trading price was not unusual. This was confirmed in the evidence of J. C. (Cam) Bailey of Peters & Co.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

C. Ancillary Challenges to the Damage Calculations of the Learned Trial Judge

[282] There are other challenges to the damage methodology employed by the learned trial judge. They were argued by counsel for Colborne, Mr. Trawick, as "calculation errors":

(a) The trial judge concluded that, absent Colborne's intervention, the price of Stampeder's stock would have advanced 7.19% between August 5th and August 13, 1993, as did Stampeder's peer stocks in the Peters Picks Index. Colborne's argument was that August 13th was not the relevant day from which to calculate loss. While the special warrant price ($5.50) for the financing was decided on August 13th, the price was actually fixed by the closing price of Stampeder stock on the previous trading day, August 12th. Therefore, Stampeder's assumed value, from the Peters Picks Index, should have been projected from the earlier date – $6.1268, not $6.16. That translates to an increase of 6.55%, not 7.19% as Stampeder's August 12th closing price was $5.625. Colborne argued that this would substantially reduce the trial judge's extrapolation of Stampeder's loss from $0.66 for each special warrant sold to $0.5768.

(b) In projecting Stampeder's loss, the trial judge overlooked the overhead cost to Stampeder that would arise from employing Peters & Co. to oversee the special warrant issue of August 13th. That was a 5% commission override calculated against all equity money generated by the special warrant issue. That commission amounted to $137,500, an expense that should have been reflected by a reduction in the calculation of Stampeder's net damages. Mr. Trawick said it was not.

(c) The trial judge concluded that without the intervention of Colborne's press communique and the issuance of its statement of claim, the stock of Stampeder would have traded at $6.16 on August 13, 1993. The special warrant issue involving 5,500,000 new shares had been planned to finance the Petroleum acquisition. The trial judge assumed that the special warrant price would have been in the same amount as the stock price – i.e. $6.16. Colborne said that was an unsafe assumption, having regard to normal underwriting practices.

[283] Mr. Trawick for Colborne pointed out that the history of special warrant issues, generally, had seen them discounted from the current trading prices of the stocks involved. Otherwise, there would be no investor incentive to take them up. Colborne pointed to other special warrant issues of Stampeder stock both before and after August 13, 1993 to demonstrate this. In those cases, price was discounted in order to encourage interest in the special warrant issue. If the usual price discount accompanied the special warrant issue of August 13th, Stampeder's projected loss may well have been substantially less than the $3,630,000 awarded by the trial judge. The difference would lie between $6.16 per share and the discounted special warrant price. We think there is merit in this submission. It is at least arguable as Bailey, Peters' lead underwriter, testified that he could remember few undiscounted special warrant issues.

[284] The sum of all these concerns throw into serious question the methodology that is said to defend the trial damage award of $3,630,000 for pecuniary loss to Stampeder. With every respect to the learned trial judge, the assumptions he made, if not supportable, point to an overriding and determinative error in assessing the balance of probabilities deciding the factual issue here. The gravamen of the various torts that were successfully pleaded against Colborne et al. and Pointer was proof of damage.

[285] The learned trial judge concluded, and the finding is supportable, that the appellant Pointer used Grenon's colourable claim to a right of first refusal as a springboard to promote his own interest. He pledged Petroleum's backing and concurrence to much that Grenon assembled to advance the Colborne proposal which presupposed the impairment of the Stampeder/Bank of Montreal/Petroleum deal. That Pointer was not instrumental in the August 6 press communique does not absolve him. The infliction of damage to Stampeder was not only foreseeable but intended by him when regard is had to his complicity in the events prior to August 6th.

[286] We do not say that the record is devoid of support for the finding that the Colborne press release and its attendant legal proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta, impaired Stampeder's market value in the eyes of the investing public. We only reiterate that the loss should not be approximated and wholly laid upon Colborne et al.

[287] Evidence of effect is shown in the testimony of H. A. Jackson, an investment counsellor in the employ of The Hospitals of Ontario Pension Plan. Jackson, called by Stampeder, testified as follows:

> Q. Now, Mr. Jackson, in your experience, how common is it for private companies to issue press releases?
>
> A. It's not very common.
>
> Q. And, sir, what effect did this press release have on you as an investor in Stampeder?
>
> A. Well, there were, on a couple of different levels. First of all, I was confused about the pending acquisition that Stampeder had announced that they had. I was concerned whether in fact they actually had the acquisition, and also in light of the fact that we still had substantial shareholdings in Stampeder stock, I was concerned that the news release would negatively affect the stock price.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

Q. And to your knowledge on this date of August 6, sir, had a price been set for the financing?

A. No.

Q. All right. And, Mr. Jackson, what did you ultimately think of the price for the special warrant issue?

A. I thought that the company was fortunate to get the price they did. There's – you know, investors, we don't like uncertainty, and lawsuits create uncertainty, and there are a lot of – I mean, there are some people that would out and out sell a stock because of a lawsuit, and there are a lot of people that wouldn't purchase a stock because of a lawsuit, so I felt all in all, in the end, the company was fortunate to get their price. I had actually indicated that I wanted a lower price.

Q. Sir, did you continue to monitor the stock following the press release?

A. Yes, I did.

Similarly, Bailey of Peters & Co. testified in cross-examination:

Q. Okay. Now, you mentioned to Mr. Ircandia that the lawsuit may have had some effect on the market of some sort. You wouldn't be surprised that a major lawsuit would have an effect on the market for a publicly traded stock, would you?

A. Yes, I'm not surprised.

Q. Yes, you're not surprised?

A. Right.

Q. And, indeed, if the market works as it's supposed to, people will react to news of things like major litigation, won't they?

A. That's correct.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

Q. That's why information is disseminated?

A. That's correct.

[288] There was no evidence that Jackson's concerns resulted in any sale of existing Stampeder shares by The Hospitals of Ontario Pension Plan.

[289] The fact that Stampeder's trading value was likely negatively influenced by Colborne's misconduct does not define the dollar cost attributable to Colborne. That was the trial judge's task and, in review, ours. And we are far from satisfied that Stampeder's market decline was wholly attributable to the activities of Colborne, its principals or Pointer.

[290] As stated, we are concerned that the calculation of pecuniary damages here was reached under assumptions that the evidence did not support. The award of $3,630,000 for compensatory or pecuniary damages to Stampeder for the attempted impairment of its Petroleum acquisition financing should be substantially discounted. We think that a fair assessment of Stampeder's probable loss arising from Colborne's August 1993 intercession should be 50% of the sum which was awarded at trial. This award includes the "calculation errors" urged by Colborne et al.

D. Exemplary or Punitive Damages

[291] Equally, the exemplary or punitive damages in the amount chosen by the trial judge cannot stand. A $1,000,000 award of punitive damages is, so far as we can determine, unprecedented in Canadian law. Such an award calls up the concerns arise from some recent American runaway jury awards in cases against insured corporate entities such as B.M.W. of North America Inc. v. Gore, (1996) 517 U.S. 559 (U.S.S.C.) and others. Not only is the award of punitive damages a head of damage that is emotionally enticing to triers of fact, but it is one which can be easily miscalculated. This is not to say that punitive damages should be taken from triers of fact, it is only that such awards should be carefully policed, especially where relief lies elsewhere. In Alberta, the rationale underlying awards of punitive damages lies within Clement, J.A.'s declaration of principle in Paragon Properties Ltd. v. Magna Envestments Ltd. (1972), 24 D.L.R. (3d) 156 (Alta.S.C.A.D.) at p. 167:

> The basis of such an award [of punitive damages] is actionable injury to the plaintiff done in such a manner that it offends the ordinary standards of morality or decent conduct in the community in such marked degree that censure by way of damages is, in the opinion of the Court, warranted. The object is variously described to include deterrence to other possible wrongdoers, or punishment for maliciousness, or supra-compensatory recognition of unnecessary humiliation or other harm to which the claimant has been subjected by the censurable act.

Paragon Properties Ltd. v. Magna Envestments Ltd. was decided in 1972. Clement J.A.'s remarks have since been endorsed by Wilson and McIntyre JJ. in Vorvis v. I.C.B.C. [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1085.

[292] Still the award and calculation of punitive damages is no longer at large at either the trial or appellate levels: Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto (post). While we have nothing to say in favour of the business practices employed by the Colborne people and Pointer, it is not idle to remember that neither the Court of Queen's Bench nor the Court of Appeal of Alberta, in the exercise of their civil jurisdiction, are courts of morality, or the civil keepers of the business community. Each court administers a statutory and parallel criminal jurisdiction that may be better suited to punitive courtroom reprisal. That alternate jurisdiction may administer sanctions other than judicial outrage and crushing monetary awards in cases where proven misconduct is found and is deserving of publicity and money punishment to deter others in future.

[293] In Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1130, Cory J. reconfirmed the general appellate reluctance to intervene in trial damage awards. Nonetheless, he did recognize the need for Canadian appellate courts to supervise awards for punitive damages more critically than awards for general or compensatory damages. Noting at p. 1208 that:

> ... Unlike compensatory damages, punitive damages are not at large. Consequently, courts have a much greater scope and discretion on appeal.

Cory J. continued at p. 1209:

> The appellate review should be based upon the court's estimation as to whether the punitive damages serve a rational purpose. In other words, was the misconduct of the defendant so outrageous that punitive damages were rationally required to act as deterrence?

[294] With this caution in mind we look at the misconduct of Colborne, Pointer, Grenon and Edwards as drawn from the evidence, measuring it against the remedies levied against them by the trial judge. It is our view that $1,000,000 in punitive damages is really a windfall for the respondents. Such an award serves no rational purpose that wasn't met by a fair calculation of compensatory damages (see above), unlimited (but taxable) solicitor-client costs throughout (which will be taxed in seven figures) and prejudgment interest. This is no arbitrary interference with the trial award as it is our view that the objectives of deterrence and punishment are still met within the heads of damage found elsewhere in the judgment. In other words the compensation award, and costs, beyond exemplary or punitive damages, was ". . . alone patently sufficient to satisfy whatever need there may be for punishment or deterrence." Walker v. CFTO Ltd. (1987), 59 O.R. (2d) 104 (C.A.).

[295] We do not resile from the trial judge's repudiation of Colborne et al. and Pointer's misconduct and motives. Nonetheless, it is relevant that Stampeder stood its ground and successfully defended its Petroleum acquisition against the appellants' attack. When all was said and done, Stampeder successfully acquired Westar Petroleum Ltd. It acquired the tax attributes and it acquired its future production. It paid nothing more than it was prepared to pay – $30,000,000; $28,000,000 to the Bank of Montreal to retire debt and $2,000,000 to Westar. Nothing that Colborne tried to do deprived Stampeder of what it had sought all along. Nor did Colborne et al. cause the price of the acquisition to inflate. Stampeder got the assets and shares of Petroleum it had agreed to purchase. Its bargain was kept. The cost came from the issuance, via special warrant, of 5,500,000 more shares of Stampeder's capital stock.

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

[296] In the end, there was no pecuniary gain for Colborne. On the contrary, Colborne, its principals and Pointer have shouldered liability for compensation damages, interest, payment of costs on a solicitor-client basis (coupled to their own individual legal fees for a ninety-five day trial and a nine day appeal). There was no base profit to disgorge. Beyond that, the business activities of the Colborne principals and Pointer have now been outed and castigated. Pecuniary damages resulting from Colborne's attempt to embarrass Stampeder's financing, costs and interest will indemnify the respondents and will warn those who may in future be tempted to seek commercial advantage through the commission of fraud. Thus, there is no severable rational purpose sustaining a duplicated and substantial punitive damage award. As a head of damage, it had already been met within the compensatory award of pecuniary damages, interest, and a broad-gauged award of legal costs bearing in mind the trial judge's conclusion that:

> . . . the plaintiff's actions were intended to be used as a lever to intimidate Stampeder into making a deal with the plaintiffs . . . Stampeder should not be required to fund such a lawsuit in any way.

To Stampeder, we add 542, Petroleum, Group and Ricinus.

7. Costs of the trial and the proceedings before the Court of Appeal

[297] The trial judge chose to award the costs of this extended trial to Stampeder, Petroleum and Ricinus calculated on a solicitor-client basis. Westar Group Ltd. and 542775 were awarded one set of costs to be taxed under triple column six of Schedule C of the Alberta Rules of Court. Solicitor-client costs were awarded on grounds that the actions of Colborne et al. were intended to be used as a lever to intimidate Stampeder into making a deal.

[298] Peter Attlee Williams was awarded costs in Action #9301-12382, but they were confined to single column six of Schedule C. Williams is not a party to the appeal.

[299] All the above trial costs were ordered to be payable, jointly and severally, by Colborne Capital Corporation, James T. Grenon, Murray Edwards and Thomas H. Pointer.

[300] While the principal appeal must be allowed because of the failure of Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum to justify the full trial award of damages attributable to the Colborne/Grenon/Pointer and Edwards' attempt to thwart Stampeder's acquisition of Petroleum, it does not follow that their unlawful 1993 contrivance should be awarded costs at either level of litigation. Indeed, in the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, they should not be immunized against their payment. The trial judgment in the principal action reveals that the trial judge regarded himself as obliged to use epithets such as fraud, misrepresentation, wilful non-disclosure, conspiracy, abuse of corporate office, jealousy and greed in his description of the activities of Colborne et al. It must also be remembered that apart from the counterclaim, Stampeder successfully defended an allegation levied against it in the initiating Colborne action.

[301] In our view, Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum were dragged into prolonged litigation and without justification. At risk in the proceeding were not only damages, but the industry reputation of the respondent corporations and their officers. In sum, Colborne et al.'s attempts to frustrate by oblique means Stampeder's acquisition of Petroleum ought never to have been attempted and litigation to that end abused the processes of the court. Through no lack of initiative by Colborne et al., Stampeder has been unable to maintain the damages awarded at trial. That does not mitigate the moral culpability of the appellants. Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum (as well as Williams) had to defend themselves and at substantial cost. We know of no reason within this record why they should not be saved harmless from all expenses incurred in that defence. Costs throughout these proceedings are awarded Stampeder, Ricinus and Petroleum and the same shall be payable on a solicitor-client basis. Solicitor-client costs, in law, are no substitute for exemplary damages. However, we base their award, as did the trial judge, on the respondents full release from all legal and associated expenses in this litigation.

[302] As stated earlier, Group and 542's cross-appeal on costs at trial is allowed and the costs of these proceedings are also awarded on a solicitor-client basis.

8. Conclusion

[303] We would allow the appeals of Colborne Capital Corporation, James T. Grenon, Murray Edwards and Thomas H. Pointer and vary the damages awarded against them at trial as follows:

(a) The compensatory damages awarded by Virtue J. are reduced to $1,815,000.

(b) The trial award for punitive damages is vacated.

The cross-appeal of Group and 542 is allowed and as a result:

1999 ABCA 14 (CanLII)

(c) Stampeder, 542, Petroleum, Group and Ricinus will be awarded one bill of costs for both actions 9301-12382 and 9301-13674 to be taxed on a solicitor-client basis.

(d) The trial award for interest at the rates prescribed in the Judgment Interest Act is affirmed, in both actions 9301-12382 and 9301-13674.

[304] Stampeder, Petroleum, Ricinus, Group and 542 are awarded costs on appeal to be taxed on a solicitor-client basis.

Reasons for Judgment Reserved of
The Honourable Chief Justice Fraser

I. Introduction

[1] The appellant, Condominium Corporation No. 0321365 (Condo Corporation), owns the common property of a seven building condominium complex in Fort McMurray known as Alfred Penhorwood Place (Condo Project). The Condo Project consists of 168 units. Real Estate Strategies Group Inc. (RESG) was involved with and in some fashion assisted purchasers of 72 of the units in the Condo Project. Together with a representative plaintiff for the condominium unit holders, the Condo Corporation is suing a number of defendants for damages to remedy the alleged faulty design and construction of the Condo Project. The defendants include the developer of the Condo Project, 970365 Alberta Ltd. (970365) and the respondent, MCAP Financial Corporation (MCAP), which provided interim financing to 970365 for the Condo Project.

[2] The appellants allege that the Condo Project, which they characterize as a "disaster", suffers from several serious problems. In particular, they assert that the Condo Project is sinking into the ground because the footings have failed and geotechnical standards for compaction and fill were not followed. They further allege that all roofs require replacement, that the wall system has failed resulting in extensive moisture penetration, and that the air quality and circulation are very poor and hazardous to health. They also allege that the units in the Condo Project and related common property were not substantially completed at the time of transfer of title to the units, and that this triggered certain statutory protections in favour of the purchasers under the Condominium Property Act, RSA 2000, c C-22 (Act).

[3] MCAP applied under Rule 159(2) of the former Alberta Rules of Court (Old Rules) seeking a summary judgment dismissing all the appellants' claims against MCAP. Prior to hearing the summary judgment application, the chambers judge dealt with and granted, with the consent of counsel for MCAP, an outstanding application to amend the Statement of Claim. Once that was concluded and the amendment allowed, he dealt with the summary judgment application on the basis of the Amended Amended Statement of Claim. This is the proper procedure and one that ought to be followed as a matter of good practice. That is to say, outstanding applications to amend pleadings should be resolved prior to a chambers judge's considering a summary judgment application on its merits: Elbow River Marketing v Canada Clean Fuels Inc., 2011 ABCA 258 at para 3.

[4] After hearing MCAP's summary judgment application on its merits, the chambers judge granted summary judgment dismissing all claims against MCAP. It is from this decision that the appellants now appeal.

[5] I have concluded that the appeal must be allowed in part. An inspection of undoubted law plus arguable or provable law shows that there are several material factual disputes interlocked with significant legal issues, all of which need to be tried. This is particularly so where, as here, the legal issues in dispute are unsettled or complex or intertwined with the facts: Tottrup v Clearwater (Municipal District No. 99), 2006 ABCA 380, 401 AR 88 at para 11.

[6] I stress that my purpose in reviewing the limited evidence and law I do is to demonstrate why there are genuine issues for trial and therefore why certain claims ought not to have been summarily dismissed. Accordingly, my analysis is not intended to provide a complete or balanced view of the contested facts nor foreshadow what may happen at trial. It is for a trial judge to consider the outstanding claims following a full hearing on the merits of the case. Further, for convenience of legal analysis, I discuss various areas of law separately along with certain key allegations of fact only relating to each. But the factual matrix is linked to all claims. Finally, I do not address the question of possible defences, causation, remedies, quantum of damages or mitigation with respect to any of the legal claims. These are separate issues and they too, depending on the outcome of the trial, are for the trial judge.

II. Relevant Legislation

[7] To place in context background information and factual and legal issues in dispute, I must first set out the essential portions of the section of the Act primarily engaged on this appeal, namely s. 14, as well as s. 15:

> 14(1) For the purposes of this section,
>
> (a) "common property" includes facilities and property that are intended for common use by the owners notwithstanding that the facilities or property may be located in or comprise a unit or any part of a unit;
>
> (b) "cost consultant" means a person who meets the requirements of the regulations to be a cost consultant or is otherwise designated as a cost consultant pursuant to the regulations;
>
> (c) "developer" includes any person who, on behalf of a developer, ... receives money paid by or on behalf of a purchaser of a unit or a proposed unit pursuant to a purchase agreement; ...
>
> (e) "substantially completed" means, subject to the regulations,
>

(2) A reference in this section to "related common property" is, in relation to a unit, a reference to the following:

(a) the common property or a portion of the common property that is necessarily incidental to the completion of the unit;

(b) the common property or a portion of the common property that is necessarily incidental to the intended use of the unit;

(c) in the case of a unit other than a bare land unit, the common property or a portion of the common property consisting of

> (i) utilities required to service the unit and the common property,
>
> (ii) a facility providing for reasonable access to or entrance into the unit,
>
> (iii) a facility providing for reasonable access to highways, municipal roads or streets,
>
> (iv) waste removal facilities or other facilities for handling waste, and

(i) roadways, parking areas and walkways;

(ii) fences or similar structures;

(iii) landscaped areas and site lighting; ....

(3) A developer shall hold in trust all money, other than rents or security deposits, paid by the purchaser of a unit up to the time that the certificate of title to the unit is issued in the name of the purchaser in accordance with the purchase agreement.

(4) Notwithstanding subsection (3), if a unit is not substantially completed, the developer shall hold in trust money, other than rents or security deposits, paid by the purchaser of the unit so that the amount of money held in trust will be sufficient, when combined with the unpaid portion of the purchase price of the unit, if any, to pay for the cost of substantially completing the construction of the unit as determined by a cost consultant.

(5) Notwithstanding subsection (3), if the related common property is not substantially completed, the developer shall hold in trust money, other than rents or security deposits, paid by the purchaser of the unit so that the amount of money held in trust will be sufficient, when combined with the unpaid portion of the purchase price of the unit, if any, to pay for the proportionate cost of substantially completing the construction of the related common property as determined by a cost consultant ....

(10) Subject to subsection (11), this section does not apply in respect of money paid to a developer under a purchase agreement if that money is held, secured or otherwise dealt with under the provisions of a plan, agreement, scheme or arrangement approved by the Minister that provides for the receipt, handling and disbursing of all or a portion of that money or indemnifies against loss of all or a portion of that money or both....

(13) Where, with respect to a unit or related common property, or both,

(a) money is held in trust under this section ..., and

> 15 Section 14 does not apply if the purchaser does not perform the purchaser's obligations under the purchase agreement.

[8] The purpose of s. 14 is clear. This is part of a package of remedial consumer protection legislation designed to protect purchasers buying condominium units off plan, that is before a condominium project has been built. The Legislature opted not to bar closing of purchase agreements where a unit or related common property is not substantially completed. Instead, the Legislature has sought to achieve its objective by statutorily mandating that developers hold back in trust from purchase proceeds sufficient funds to substantially complete sold units and their related common property. It has also imposed a duty of fair dealing on developers and purchasers "with respect to the entering into, performance and enforcement" of agreements: s. 11.

[9] In enacting this package of legislation, the Legislature was alive to several economic and social realities. On the one hand, it did not want to prevent developers from securing, on reasonable terms, the financing required to build and complete condominium projects. On the other, it recognized that consumers needed to be protected from hit and run developers, who promise much but deliver little, whether because of ineptitude, negligence, greed or worse yet, fraud. Through this statutory regime, the Legislature has provided some reasonable assurance that what developers agree to provide, and purchasers agree to buy, will be completed as promised: see Bare Land Condominium Plan 8820814 (Owners) v Birchwood Village Greens Ltd., 1998 ABQB 1023, 235 AR 217 at paras 9-10.

[10] The statutory trust and holdback provisions in s. 14 may be summarized as follows. If a unit in a condominium project or the related common property is not substantially completed at the time of transfer of title to the unit, then the developer is required to hold in trust sufficient monies to pay for the cost of substantially completing the construction of the unit as determined by a cost consultant plus monies sufficient to pay for the proportionate cost of substantially completing the
