construction of the related common property as determined by a cost consultant. Under s. 1(2)(c) of the Condominium Property Regulation, AR 168/2000, a cost consultant must act "at arm's length from the developer of the unit or common property". The Legislature also prohibited contracting out of these provisions: see s. 80(1) of the Act which provides that "... any waiver or release given of the rights, benefits or protections provided by or under sections 12 to 17 is void".

[11] The Legislature understood that it would not be sufficient to mandate that only the actual developer of the project be bound to comply with these provisions. To minimize the risk of purchase monies flowing out to third parties despite the statutory prohibitions, the Legislature expressly expanded the definition of "developer" under s. 14 of the Act to capture and include third parties receiving monies paid by purchasers of units in certain circumstances. Prior to 2000, "developer" was defined simply as a "developer or a person acting on his behalf". This definition was then amended to the present wording under s. 14(1)(c) of the Act which provides that "developer" includes "any person who, on behalf of a developer, ... receives money paid by or on behalf of a purchaser of a unit or a proposed unit pursuant to a purchase agreement".

[12] The interpretation of this definition will be a live issue at the trial of the matters in dispute between the appellants and MCAP. So too will be the question of whether the units and related common property in the Condo Project were substantially completed at the time of transfer of title of the various units – and who determines this question and under what circumstances. In particular, did the Legislature leave this up to the developer of a project or a s. 14 cost consultant? To be clear, for purposes of complying with the statutory trust and holdback provisions under the Act, "developer" in the context of this case includes 970365 and other parties, if any, found to fall within the definition of "developer" under s. 14(1)(c).

[13] The only exception from the statutory trust and holdback provisions imposed on a "developer" is set out in s. 14(10). If a project is within the scope of this exemption, then the statutory trust and holdback provisions do not apply. To come within the exemption, the purchase monies paid must be held, secured or dealt with under the "provisions of a plan, agreement, scheme or arrangement approved by the Minister". The Court was advised that the vast majority of new condominium projects in Alberta fall within this exemption. That includes projects covered under a government-approved plan such as the Alberta New Home Warranty Program which provides a form of insurance coverage for purchase monies. But the Condo Project is not covered by the Alberta New Home Warranty Program or any other approved plan. Therefore, on this record, the exemption under s. 14(10) does not – and did not – apply to the Condo Project.

III. Background Information

[14] I now turn to certain background information for which there is evidence on this record. That evidence remains to be evaluated at trial by the trial judge in the context of all relevant evidence. I also recognize that MCAP has offered contrary evidence on some points and that there is additional evidence as well that I do not canvass in these reasons. Nevertheless, for purposes of this appeal, the present record includes evidence in support of the following.

[15] MCAP was the construction lender for 970365 and provided interim financing for the Condo Project in accordance with a commitment letter dated July 8, 2002 (the Commitment Letter). The Commitment Letter, which governed the relationship between MCAP and 970365, set out the terms and conditions under which funds would be made available to 970365. There were two other parties to the Commitment Letter, the principal officer of 970365, Gary Nissen, and the parent corporation of 970365, Dome Britannia Properties Inc. Nissen and Dome Britannia accepted and executed the Commitment Letter as guarantors of MCAP's loan to 970365. The Commitment Letter initially dealt with financing for the first three buildings in the Condo Project. By a further agreement dated March 5, 2003 made amongst the parties to the Commitment Letter, it was amended to provide financing for all seven buildings in the Condo Project.

[16] The Commitment Letter contained a number of terms under which financing would be provided. In particular, Funding Condition 11 stated (at Appellants' Extract of Evidence (AEE) A18):

> A soils test report (load bearing capacity) by an acceptable professional engineer or such other similar report as is acceptable to the Lender, must be provided, demonstrating to the satisfaction of the Lender and its Cost Consultant that the proposed construction and site improvements of the Project are feasible under existing soil conditions, together with evidence that the construction specifications for the Project provide for construction in compliance with such conditions and with the recommendations, if any, which may be contained in such soils test report.

[17] The Commitment Letter identified the need for "the Lender's Cost Consultant" to verify the costs of the Condo Project: see eg. Funding Condition 7 at AEE A17. The cost consultant was described in various ways throughout the Commitment Letter. For example, references were made to "the Cost Consultant" (see eg. Funding Condition 7 at AEE A17) or "its cost consultant" (see eg. Funding Condition 22 at AEE A20) or the "Lender's cost consultant (see eg. Availability Condition 2 at AEE A21). Other Conditions 28 provided that:

> The Lender's [monitor(s)/cost consultants] shall be: Cuthbert Smith Consulting ... The terms of reference for the monitor/cost consultant will be as detailed in Schedule "B".

[18] Schedule "B" then set out the Terms of Reference for the subject cost consultant. Those terms included the requirement that prior to the initial advance, a required Project and Budget Review Report include "Documents confirming that project has been designed in accordance with Geotechnical Engineer's Report": see AEE A32. The Commitment Letter prescribed that all requests by 970365 for advances or draws include an inspection certificate from the "Lender's Cost Consultant" confirming that "the work to date is in accordance with the plans and specifications" and calculating "the amount of holdbacks and cost to complete": see Availability, Condition 2 at AEE A21. It was also a term of the Commitment Letter that if actual costs exceeded the budgeted and approved costs, such that the completion costs exceeded the balance of the loan not yet advanced, that 970365 would contribute the excess toward the Condo Project before receiving any further advances: see Funding Condition 22 at AEE A20.

[19] MCAP retained the "firm" of Cuthbert Smith Consulting (CSC) to act on our behalf as Cost Consultant" under a letter agreement between the two dated July 16, 2002 (CSC Contract). CSC's role as cost consultant was detailed in the CSC Contract. Certain parts of the Commitment Letter were attached to the CSC Contract. Among them was the section on the Funding Conditions, including Funding Condition 11 regarding the soils conditions report noted above. The Terms of Reference for the cost consultant attached to the Commitment Letter were also attached to the CSC Contract. This included the requirement that prior to any progress advance for work in place, CSC "[p]rovide revised cost schedule showing original Budget, Budget changes, revised Budget, total work in place, net holdback, work in place previous, payment due, and cost to complete [sic]": AEE A226. Thus, the CSC Contract mirrored the Commitment Letter in certain key respects.

[20] On July 15, 2002, a conversation took place between Doug Frey of RESG and Robert Balfour of MCAP. What was discussed during that conversation has not yet been fully explored. It was followed by what the appellants claim was a critical phone conversation the next day, that is on July 16, 2002 (2002 Phone Call). There is evidence on this record that the 2002 Phone Call took place between two representatives of RESG, namely Frey and Allan Penner, and the Vice-President of MCAP, Michael Roulston. According to the appellants, it was during the 2002 Phone Call that Roulston, on behalf of MCAP, represented that the terms and conditions of the Commitment Letter would be enforced for the benefit of those represented by RESG, namely purchasers of units in the Condo Project and the Condo Corporation. The appellants also contend that Roulston represented that CSC was the cost consultant for the purposes of s. 14 of the Act.

[21] The 2002 Phone Call, and what transpired during that Call, would figure prominently in the events that unfolded in 2003 when RESG's ongoing concerns about the Condo Project were finally brought to a head in September of that year.

[22] CSC had a scheduled inspection of the Condo Project arranged for September 10, 2003. RESG was apparently advised by Peter Abramovich of CSC in a phone message left September 10, 2003 that its request to attend this inspection would not be honoured. Penner did attend the site on September 10 and 11, 2003, accompanied by Ellen Martin, the resident manager of the Condo Project. Penner's evidence is that he was "shocked at the state of the site....": AEE A112. On September 11, 2003, Dan Kuhn of Permit Pro accompanied Penner to the site. Penner deposed that

Kuhn identified four Alberta Building Code violations which Kuhn advised he would immediately address with 970365: AEE A112-113.

[23] On September 12, 2003, Penner, on behalf of RESG, wrote a detailed 10 page letter to CSC (Deficiency Letter), copying MCAP, setting out various alleged serious deficiencies in the design and construction of the Condo Project, including suspected Alberta Building Code, development permit and contractual deficiencies. It is the appellants' position that this Deficiency Letter signalled grave concerns that the units and related common property in the Condo Project were not in fact substantially completed as contemplated by the Act. In particular, in their view, the suspected construction and design deficiencies identified for which statutory holdbacks might therefore be mandated included the effectiveness and safety of the mechanical system, the use and operation of the Heat Recovery Ventilator units, corridor pressurization and airflow, and the compaction and composition of fill materials in the asphalt areas.

[24] Accordingly, in the Deficiency Letter, RESG repeatedly requested that CSC provide it with estimates of costs to correct the identified deficiencies. It also confirmed that it had been "advised" that CSC had been selected as the required cost consultant for purposes of s. 14 of the Act. It pointed out to CSC that it "appears you were made aware of the fact that your reports are being used for statutory purposes, in addition to your monitoring role for MCAP.... Your role is to determine the appropriate level of funds to be held in trust for the benefit of purchasers, after assessing all pertinent information at your disposal. Your role is not to take your instructions from the developer": AEE A150 and A183. RESG closed the Deficency Letter by reminding CSC that 970365 had an obligation under the Act to act fairly and that it had breached that duty in several ways. It specifically asked CSC for an "immediate reply" to the Deficiency Letter.

[25] At the time that the Deficiency Letter was sent, construction was still progressing on the Condo Project. Although some transactions to purchase units in the Condo Project had closed, many others had not.

[26] Four days later, that is on September 16, 2003, Penner received a telephone call from James Cuthbert, the principal shareholder and director of CSC. There is evidence that Cuthbert advised Penner that he had reviewed the Deficiency Letter, that CSC was in the process of preparing its report to MCAP with respect to the September 10, 2003 site visit and that Cuthbert would require some time to evaluate the items Penner had raised in the context of CSC's dual role as the lender's monitor and the s. 14 cost consultant.

[27] On September 22, 2003, Penner wrote CSC another letter (Geotechnical Testing Letter) on behalf of RESG, copying MCAP, and urgently requesting that further development activity on the site of the Condo Project cease until a geotechnical soils test could be conducted to evaluate site conditions. This Letter asserted that there was "alarming evidence" that the recommendations by the geotechnical consultants had not been followed: AEE A160. It then proceeded to outline some of that evidence. RESG also put CSC on express notice that Roulston of MCAP had assured RESG during the 2002 Phone Call "that the terms of the commitment letter would be carefully monitored and upheld" by CSC: see AEE A160-1. RESG also wrote CSC another letter that same day, that is September 22, 2003, notifying CSC that it was considering advising certain tenants that "there exists a serious life safety issue, which will compound as the weather gets colder": AEE A162.

[28] On this record, the geotechnical testing RESG had requested in the Geological Testing Letter did not happen. Instead, on September 23, 2003, 970365 wrote a letter to CSC instructing CSC that CSC had not been retained as a s. 14 cost consultant and that it did not consent to CSC's taking on such role. The next day, September 24, 2003, MCAP wrote a letter to CSC instructing CSC to the same effect in essentially identical terms, that is that CSC had not been retained as a s. 14 cost consultant and MCAP did not consent to its taking on this role. RESG was not copied on either letter.

[29] There is evidence on this record that 970365 threatened to cancel agreements of purchase and sale and retain the deposits paid if the transactions of purchase and sale were not closed as 970365 demanded. Under s. 15 of the Act, purchasers lose the protection of s. 14 if the purchaser does not perform his or her obligations under the purchase agreement.

[30] On September 26, 2003, a number of purchases of units in the Condo Project were closed and MCAP received $1,463,940 from 970365's lawyers. Later, between October 8 and 16, 2003, MCAP received another $2,891,439 from 970365's lawyers. MCAP applied the funds received to reduce the debt 970365 owed to MCAP. Letters from 970365's lawyers to lawyers for purchasers of units in the Condo Project referenced the requirements of s. 14 of the Act at least, it appears, as regards the completion of the "related common property". For example, at AEE A268, in a letter dated August 15, 2003, 970365's lawyers gave the following undertaking to counsel for a purchaser (see also another letter to the same effect at AEE A524-525):

> To maintain a holdback pending completion of related common property in accordance with section 14 of the Condominium Property Act, provided that we shall be entitled to rely on the advice of our client's cost consultant, Cuthbert Smith, Chartered Quantity Surveyors, to determine the appropriate amount of such holdback from time to time.

IV. Reasons of the Chambers Judge

[31] Before the chambers judge, the appellants alleged that MCAP was responsible to them for the losses arising from the deficiencies in the Condo Project on a number of grounds. The chambers judge considered five issues:

2012 ABCA 26 (CanLII)

> (1) Did MCAP owe any duty of care to the appellants so as to ground an action in negligence for failing to strictly enforce and uphold the terms and conditions of the Commitment Letter?
> (2) Did MCAP breach a duty of care to the appellants through its alleged representation that the terms of the Commitment Letter would be strictly enforced so as to ground an action in negligent misrepresentation?
> (3) Was MCAP a "developer" within the meaning of s. 14 of the Act?
>
> (4) Did MCAP conspire with others in the breach of any statutory or fiduciary duty?
> (5) Was MCAP unjustly enriched by receipt from any purchaser of the net purchase price for any condominium unit?

[32] On the first issue, the chambers judge held that no sufficiently close relationship existed between MCAP and the appellants to justify imposing what would be a novel duty of care: Appeal Book Digest F96 at para 25. And even if it did, the chambers judge concluded that imposing such a duty on a lender would fundamentally change the nature of project financing and disrupt the market place. Thus, he determined that this too justified the court's refusing to impose such a duty. Accordingly, the appellants had no claim against MCAP in negligence.

[33] On the second issue, the chambers judge concluded that there was no basis for finding the required proximity between MCAP and the appellants. He determined it was not reasonably foreseeable by MCAP that any prospective purchaser could reasonably rely on the alleged representation; there was no evidence that any did; and in any event, any such reliance by a purchaser could not be found to be reasonable. Therefore, a claim in negligent misrepresentation did not lie.

[34] On the third issue, whether MCAP was a developer, the chambers judge held that when MCAP received funds from 970365's lawyers, the funds were the property of and paid by 970365 even though those funds came from purchase proceeds of the sale of units in the condominium project. Consequently, MCAP did not receive funds "on behalf" of a developer and did not fall within the definition of a "developer" under the Act.

[35] On the fourth issue, the chambers judge concluded that it would be impossible for MCAP to conspire with others in the breach of any duty since he had already found that MCAP owed no statutory or fiduciary duty to the appellants.

[36] Finally with respect to the fifth issue, unjust enrichment, the chambers judge noted that the law requires that a plaintiff be deprived of a benefit and that a defendant be correspondingly enriched without juristic reason. He found that since MCAP had received funds from 970365 under the terms of an interim financing agreement, this constituted a juristic reason for that receipt. Also, he determined that the receipt was not at the expense of the purchasers "but pursuant to the terms of their purchase agreements with the developer and required in order to obtain a discharge of MCAP's mortgage on their title": ABD F104.

[37] As a result, the chambers judge summarily dismissed all claims against MCAP.

2012 ABCA 26 (CanLII)

V. Issues

[38] The issues on this appeal may be summed up as follows. Did the chambers judge err in concluding that:

> (1) MCAP could not have owed a duty of care to the appellants in the circumstances of this case and thus, no action could lie in either negligence or negligent misrepresentation;
> (2) no claim could be brought against MCAP for breach of a statutory trust or unjust enrichment; and
> (3) MCAP did not fall within the s. 14(1)(c) definition of a "developer" in the circumstances of this case.

VI. Standard of Review

[39] Absent an error of law, the standard of review on an appeal of a summary judgment is reasonableness given the discretionary nature of the remedy. In Murphy Oil Company Ltd v Predator Corporation Ltd, 2006 ABCA 69, 384 AR 251 at para 23, this Court explained the standard of review this way:

> ... the applicable standard of review is correctness with respect to errors of law. For both errors of mixed fact and law, and fact alone, the standard is palpable and overriding error, unless the error of mixed fact and law involves an error relating to an extricable principle of law, in which case the standard of correctness applies to that extricable legal question.... Deference is owed given the discretionary nature of a decision to grant summary judgment. Accordingly, a chambers decision will not be upset unless it is unreasonable....

[40] Where a legal standard is applied to a set of facts, if an extricable question of law is engaged, the applicable standard of review remains correctness with respect to that question of law: Housen v Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33 at para 36, [2002] 2 SCR 235. Findings of fact are accorded great deference, absent palpable and overriding error: Housen, supra at paras 10 and 25. Whether a cause of action exists is a question of law reviewable on a correctness standard: Mitten v College of Alberta Psychologists, 2010 ABCA 159 at para 9, 487 AR 198.

VII. Test for Summary Judgment

[41] What then is the test for summary judgment? Under the Old Rules, Rule 159 (2) and (3) provided:

> 159(2) A defendant may, after delivering a statement of defence, on the ground that there is no merit to a claim or part of a claim or that the only genuine issue is as to amount, apply to the court for a judgment on an affidavit sworn by him or some other person who can swear positively to the facts, stating that there is no merit to the whole or part of the claim or that the only genuine issue is as to amount and that the deponent knows of no facts that would substantiate the claim or any part of it.
> (3) On hearing the motion, if the court is satisfied that there is no genuine issue for trial with respect to any claim, the court may give summary judgment against the plaintiff or a defendant.

[42] The Old Rules have now been replaced by new Rules of Court [New Rules] effective November 1, 2010. Under transitional New Rule 15.2(1), the New Rules apply to this appeal. New Rule 7.3.1(b) provides that summary judgment is available when "there is no merit to a claim or part of it". It is unnecessary on this appeal to consider whether there exists a subtle difference in the summary judgment rule under the New Rules as opposed to the Old Rules. That is not in issue on this appeal and I leave it for another day. It is clear under both the New Rules and the Old Rules that summary judgment may be granted where there is "no merit" to a claim or part of it.

[43] In the first instance, a summary judgment application involves two steps. First, the moving party must adduce evidence to show there is no genuine issue for trial. This is a high threshold. If there is no genuine issue for trial, then there will be no merit to a claim. Accordingly, if the evidentiary record establishes either that there are missing links in the essential elements of a cause of action or that there is no cause of action in law, then there will be no genuine issue for trial. The fact there is no genuine issue for trial must be proven; relying on mere allegations or the pleadings will not suffice: Canada (Attorney General) v Lameman, 2008 SCC 14 at para 11, [2008] 1 SCR 372. Second, once the burden on the moving party has been met, the party resisting summary judgment may adduce evidence to persuade the court that a genuine issue remains to be tried:

Murphy, supra at para 25. That effectively means showing that the claim has what is often referred to as "a real chance of success". This may be accomplished by establishing the existence of disputes on material questions of fact, including inferences to be drawn therefrom, or on points of law that cannot be readily resolved given the factual disputes.

[44] The question here is whether the chambers judge was correct in concluding that there was no merit to any of the appellants' claims.

VIII. Analysis

[45] I now turn to the three issues raised by this appeal.

A. The Duty of Care Issue

[46] The appellants' position is that MCAP owed a duty to the appellants to take reasonable steps to ensure that 970365 complied with and satisfied the terms and conditions of the Commitment Letter. They contend that MCAP's alleged failure to do so was either negligence or negligent misrepresentation. They assert that the chambers judge erred in concluding that MCAP could not have owed a duty of care to the appellants on either ground in the circumstances of this case.

1. Why There is No Genuine Issue for Trial Based on the Claim in Negligence

[47] To determine whether the appellants' claim in negligence against MCAP for failing to enforce the terms and conditions of the Commitment Letter should be summarily dismissed, the chambers judge was required to begin with this starting point. Is there a genuine issue about whether MCAP owed a duty of care in tort to the appellants?

[48] The appellants contend that an interim financier owes a duty of care to the purchasers of a condominium unit in a project financed by it to enforce the lending agreements between the financier and the developer of the project. To date, Canadian courts have not recognized the existence of such a duty of care. In deciding whether the law of negligence should be extended to recognize this claimed duty, the chambers judge correctly turned to the two-part test set out by the House of Lords in Anns v Merton London Borough Council, [1978] AC 728 as adopted and recast by the Supreme Court of Canada in Kamloops (City of) v Nielsen, [1984] 2 SCR 2 at pp 10-11 (the recast test being referred to as the Anns test). See also Cooper v Hobart, 2001 SCC 79, [2001] 3SCR 537 at paras 25 and 29-39; Hill v Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police Services Board, 2007 SCC 41, [2007] 3 SCR 129 at para 20; and Reference re Broome v Prince Edward Island, 2010 SCC 11, [2010] 1 SCR 360 at para 14.

[49] The first stage of the Anns test focusses on the relationship between the plaintiff and defendant. It contains two requirements: reasonable foreseeability of harm plus a close and direct relationship of proximity sufficient to justify the imposition of a prima facie duty of care. In other words, a court must determine whether a sufficiently close relationship – otherwise called proximity – exists between the defendant and the plaintiff that has suffered the damage such that the defendant could reasonably foresee that carelessness on its part might cause damage to the plaintiff. If foreseeability and proximity are established, a prima facie duty of care arises. The second stage asks whether there are any policy considerations which ought to negative or limit the scope of the duty, the class of persons to whom it is owed, or the damages to which a breach may give rise.

[50] I have concluded that the chambers judge was correct in determining that a construction lender does not owe a duty of care to the purchasers of units in a condominium project which it is financing or to the condominium corporation. Difficulties arise at both stages of the Anns analysis, making the recognition of a duty of care in these circumstances legally unmanageable and commercially unreasonable.

[51] To begin, liability in negligence is premised on the assumption that a party can reasonably foresee who would be damaged by its actions. While a plaintiff need not be foreseeable as an identified individual, the plaintiff must belong to a class of persons within the foreseeable range of risk: Stewart v Pettie [1995] 1 SCR 131 at para 28. This presupposes an ability on the part of the allegedly negligent party to determine who would fall within that range, that is within the affected class, as well as the degree to which that class might be adversely affected.

[52] However, in the context of the lender-purchaser relationship, problems arise in defining the composition of the class to whom a lender would owe a duty of care. Knowing this would be very important to an interim financier. What if the financier were willing to waive a default or grant extensions of time to the developer or consent to other changes, major or minor, to existing loan agreements? This it would typically be entitled to do under its contractual arrangements with the developer. But in order to mitigate its risk of being sued in negligence for breach of a duty of care, the lender would no doubt seek to consult those to whom it owed a duty of care or, at a minimum, put them on notice of proposed changes before implementing them.

[53] The difficulty is that an interim financier would not ordinarily be able to determine with any reasonable degree of certainty who should be consulted. Downstream purchasers change on a rolling basis. This problem is compounded by the very real possibility of units being "flipped" to other purchasers without notice to the developer or interim financier before construction is completed and before transfer of title. And where would the additions to the class stop? Would it include only the initial purchasers? Or ones to whom units had been "flipped" before closing? Or future purchasers even after title had been transferred following closing? And for how long into the future would this go on? This demonstrates that attempts to define the "class" to whom an interim financier would owe a claimed duty of care would be bound to lead to undue uncertainty for all.

[54] Turning to the proximity requirement, what a court is looking for is whether the circumstances of the relationship between the parties are such "that the defendant may be said to be under an obligation to be mindful of the plaintiff's legitimate interests in conducting his or her affairs": Hercules Managements Ltd v Ernst & Young, [1997] 2 SCR 165 at para 24. Put another way, in deciding whether the required proximity exists to give rise to a prima facie duty of care, is it just and fair to impose a duty of care in law on the defendant?

[55] On the broad issue of fairness, an interim financier's legitimate business interests might well conflict with those of the purchasers and condominium corporation. For example, a financier may elect to declare a loan in default, not advance any further funds and realize on its security rather than extend time to cure a default, advance the balance of the loan and allow the project to be completed. What if purchasers preferred the latter option? On what basis would these competing business interests and choices as between the lender's contractual rights and a supposed duty of care in tort to enforce those contractual agreements for the benefit of third parties then be resolved? By whom? And whose interests would prevail? And in what circumstances? And in any event, how, when and on what basis would a lender consult with the purchaser beneficiaries of a duty of care and secure their consent to changes in the financing agreements? And what would the lender do when and if there were disagreements amongst the purchasers?

[56] These problems expose a fundamental flaw in the appellants' assertion that a lender owes a duty of care to purchasers of units in a project it is financing. The Commitment Letter is a private contract between MCAP and 970365. No rights accrue under that contract to third party beneficiaries, including the purchasers of units in the Condo Project and the Condo Corporation. The alleged "duty to enforce" the Commitment Letter essentially amounts to an attempt to step round this limitation and create a cause of action. This attempt to obtain benefits for third party beneficiaries via the law of negligence is, in these circumstances, fundamentally unsound. It would place the lender in the position where legitimate business rights it has in contract could be undercut, indeed rendered nugatory, if a third party beneficiary did not agree with the way in which the lender was exercising its contractual rights.

[57] Collectively, the concerns noted reveal the practical and policy difficulties inherent in finding the required foreseeability of harm and proximity between an interim financier, on the one hand, and purchasers and a condominium corporation, on the other, sufficient to ground a prima facie duty of care. Many of the features of the subject relationship would necessarily be undefined, not only in scope and time but also content. By themselves, these reasons justify rejection of a duty of care.

[58] A consideration of the second stage of the Anns test also justifies rejection of the appellants' claimed duty of care. At this stage, a court must consider the purposes served by permitting recovery as well as any policy considerations which would call for a limitation on tort liability. The relationship between the parties is not the focus; it is the effect that recognizing a duty of care might have on other legal obligations, the legal system and society: see Cooper v Hobart, 2001 SCC 79, [2001] 3 SCR 537 at para 37. Generally, the question of concern to the courts is this. Would imposition of the duty of care expose the defendant to "liability in an indeterminate amount for an indeterminate time to an indeterminate class": Hercules, supra at para 31?

[59] Policy considerations have particular import where the claims are not for serious physical harm or threats to a person's health and safety but rather for economic loss in a commercial context: see eg. John G. Fleming, The Law of Torts, 10th ed. (Sydney: Law Book, 2011) at 202-203. In commercial cases, potential plaintiffs acting with due diligence may well have alternative means of protecting their positions. Their autonomy as individuals means that they have the freedom to make the choices they see fit. For this reason, policy considerations in commercial cases may more readily weigh in favour of limiting tort liability.

[61] Further, were this duty of care found to exist, this would fundamentally alter the economic and commercial realities of construction financing and significantly undermine the continued viability of the commercial lending industry. The risks to interim financiers in financing developers would increase substantially. It would no longer be sufficient for a lender to protect its interests and ensure repayment of its loan. Instead, a lender would effectively become a guarantor of the due performance by the developer of its obligations to the lender. This makes no sense. A developer owes obligations to a lender; the lender does not act as surety for the developer's non-performance of obligations owed to it. If the developer's obligations to the lender were to become the lender's obligations to third parties, the allocation of commercial risk would then fall disproportionately on the lender. The lender would typically face this dilemma: pursue the developer to "fully enforce" all contractual agreements with the lender or run the very real risk of liability to third parties.

[62] The deleterious effects that recognizing this novel duty of care would have on commerce and the financial industry and in turn economic development are obvious. Additional costs would be incurred by individual lenders in their quest to minimize the risk of being sued for not properly enforcing the terms and conditions of lending agreements between it and a borrower. Lenders would no doubt seek to pass these costs along to borrowers and borrowers to consumers. Imposing obligations on interim financiers that allocate risk in a commercially unreasonable manner is not in the public interest since this would in turn seriously jeopardize the availability of capital for the development of housing. In the end, all consumers – homeowners and renters alike – would lose.

[63] Thus, these reasons too justify rejecting the recognition of a duty of care by an interim financier in favour of purchasers of units in a project and its condominium corporation. Accordingly, there is no genuine issue for trial based on the appellants' claim against MCAP in negligence for failing to strictly enforce the terms and conditions of the Commitment Letter.

[64] However, this conclusion does not foreclose the possibility of liability being imposed on an interim financier for negligent misrepresentation depending on the specific facts of an individual case. It is to the issue of the appellants' claim against MCAP for negligent misrepresentation which I now turn.

2. Why There is a Genuine Issue for Trial Based on the Claim for Negligent Misrepresentation

(a) Elements for a Successful Negligent Misrepresentation Claim

[65] The Supreme Court of Canada outlined the required elements for a successful negligent misrepresentation claim in Queen v Cognos Inc, [1993] 1 SCR 87 at para 33. First, there must be a duty of care based on a "special relationship" between the representor and the representee. Second, the representation in question must be untrue, inaccurate or misleading. Third, the representor must have acted negligently in making the representation. Fourth, the representee must have relied, in a reasonable manner, on the negligent misrepresentation. And fifth, the reliance must have been detrimental to the representee in the sense that damages resulted.

[66] Regarding the first element, the duty of care, the same general framework that is used to assess whether a duty of care exists in negligence – the two-part Anns test – applies to negligent misrepresentation: Hercules, supra at para 21.

[67] At the first stage of the Anns test, in deciding whether a prima facie duty of care exists to ground a claim in negligent misrepresentation, a court must determine whether the defendant-representor and plaintiff-representee can be said to be in a relationship of proximity or neighbourhood, that is a "special relationship". As to what is required to create the necessary special relationship and corresponding prima facie duty of care, two criteria must be met. The defendant ought reasonably to foresee that the plaintiff will rely on its representations; and reliance by the plaintiff would be reasonable in the circumstances: see Hercules, supra at para 24. If these criteria are satisfied, then the special relationship exists to give rise to a prima facie duty of care. Thus, for negligent misrepresentation claims, more than foreseeable harm to a foreseeable plaintiff is required; the reasonableness of the plaintiff's reliance must also be considered.

[68] If the proximity requirement is met, a court must then go on and consider the second part of the Anns test. Are there policy considerations that warrant not recognizing, or otherwise limiting, the duty of care? It is at this stage that a court is concerned about the possibility of indeterminate liability. Of course, to properly take policy considerations into account, a court must have a clear understanding of the scope of the alleged misrepresentation. The precise wording of that misrepresentation is key to assessing whether a duty of care has been breached. The Supreme Court confirmed the nature and extent of that in Cognos, supra at para 55:

> The standard of care required by a person making representations is an objective one. It is a duty to exercise such reasonable care as the circumstances require to ensure that representations made are accurate and not misleading.

(b) Analysis of Reasons of Chambers Judge

[69] Against this backdrop, I now turn to why I have concluded that the chambers judge erred in summarily dismissing the negligent misrepresentation claim.

[70] To situate this in context, the appellants' claim against MCAP for negligent misrepresentation rests on the following theory. MCAP owed a duty of care to the appellants based on the special relationship between the appellants and MCAP as reflected in the dealings between RESG, the appellants' representative/agent, and MCAP. MCAP impliedly represented to RESG that (1) the terms and conditions of the Commitment Letter would be strictly enforced and upheld by CSC; and (2) it had retained a cost consultant for the purposes of s. 14 of the Act. Neither occurred and MCAP was negligent in making these implied representations. MCAP ought reasonably to have foreseen that RESG, and those it was representing, would rely on these representations. The appellants, through RESG, relied on these representations and that reliance was reasonable. MCAP's failure to enforce the terms of the Commitment Letter and to retain a cost consultant for purposes of s. 14 has resulted in significant damages to the appellants.

(i) Trying the Case is Not for the Chambers Judge

[71] The chambers judge began by concluding that it was "highly unlikely" that the appellants would be successful at trial in establishing that a representation had been made. He reasoned that while MCAP had asserted that its representative never undertook to enforce the Commitment Letter, the appellants offered "only an impression that that was what was meant" in the 2002 Phone Call between Penner and Frey of RESG and Roulston of MCAP. The chambers judge erred in purporting to try the case given the patent conflict in the evidence on the issue of the alleged representations. It was not for the chambers judge to determine that it would be "highly unlikely" that the appellants' claim would succeed at trial. Whether MCAP made any implied representation and, if so, the content of any such representation, are both issues for a trial judge following a trial on the merits.

(ii) Whether an Implied Representation was Made Remains a Live Issue

[72] Further, the chambers judge framed the issue improperly. The question is not whether there was evidence that MCAP made an express representation; the absence of evidence about an express representation is not dispositive of the real issue. Nor is the question whether the evidence established that the appellants received an impression only of what was meant by Roulston of MCAP. The question is whether there was evidence on this record to support the appellants' claim that MCAP made an implied representation. The underlying assumption by the chambers judge that representations are not actionable at law because they depend on inferences or implications rather than on direct and express statements is incorrect: see Cognos, supra at paras 73-76.

[73] Whether a statement or implied statement is a representation is a question of fact that depends on a trial judge's assessment of the evidence and inferences drawn from the evidence: Ault v Canada, 2011 ONCA 147, 274 OAC 200, leave den. (October 20, 2011) [2011] SCCA No 206 (QL). The impression conveyed may in fact be evidence of an implied representation. If the party listening received that impression from what was said – and not said in response to what was said – it may be some evidence that a reasonable bystander would also have had the same impression. A trial judge would consider what MCAP conveyed through Roulston during the 2002 Phone Call viewed from the perspective of a reasonable person in those circumstances.

[74] Put simply, representation by implication, that is an implied representation, may well suffice to ground a successful claim in negligent misrepresentation. The chambers judge's failure to recognize that this is so and that there is on this record a dispute on a material fact, namely whether MCAP made an implied representation, constitutes reviewable error. These are both matters for a trial judge as is whether any representation, if implied, is actionable negligence.

(iii) Scope of Implied Representation is Also in Dispute

[75] This takes me to a further error. The chambers judge appears to have characterized the alleged representation this way. Is there evidence that MCAP represented that it would enforce strictly the terms of the Commitment Letter? But what this means in the context of this case was never explored by the chambers judge. It should have been. In the result, he failed to recognize that the scope of the alleged representations was broader than he assumed.

[76] The appellants' claims go beyond maintaining that MCAP represented during the 2002 Phone Call that the terms of the Commitment Letter would be monitored and upheld by CSC. The import of this claim is that MCAP represented that it would audit or supervise the quality of construction of the Condo Project through CSC. In addition, the appellants contend that MCAP represented that CSC had been retained as a cost consultant for purposes of s. 14 of the Act. Penner, on behalf of RESG, alleges that during the 2002 Phone Call, Frey specifically asked Roulston whether a cost consultant had been engaged, who it was and whether the selected cost consultant, CSC, possessed the necessary qualifications in terms of timeliness and quality in reporting processes: see AEE A498-499. RESG contends that MCAP assured it during the 2002 Phone Call that the terms of the Commitment Letter would be enforced including the provisions relating to the cost consultant for the Condo Project.

[77] MCAP contends that no representation of any kind was ever made to any of the appellants during the 2002 Phone Call or otherwise. It submits that the terms and conditions of the Commitment Letter were confidential and intended to be treated as such. Again, while there is evidence to this effect, there is also evidence from Penner of RESG from which it may be inferred that the subject of the Commitment Letter and the cost consultant in particular came up, and were discussed, during the 2002 Phone Call. Penner contends that it was made clear to Roulston of MCAP during that conversation that if MCAP did not undertake the due diligence required under the Commitment Letter that "we would have to": AEE A499.

[78] This, and other evidence, underscores the fact that serious factual disputes exist about many issues: what transpired during the 2002 Phone Call; whether CSC was the cost consultant for purposes of s. 14 of the Act; who retained CSC for this purpose; if CSC was not the cost consultant for this purpose, whether MCAP represented to RESG that CSC was nevertheless acting in that role and capacity; whether RESG relied on that representation to the detriment of the purchasers for whom it alleges it was acting as representative/agent; whether MCAP knew that there was no cost consultant for the Condo Project and, if so, when; whether MCAP, by itself or in concert with 970365, concealed that information from RESG or failed to inform RESG that its understanding that there was a s. 14 cost consultant was incorrect; and, if so, what, if anything, turns on any of this.

[79] There are other related statutory interpretation issues that might well be relevant and linked to the cost consultant issue. Given the requirement that the cost consultant act at arms length from the developer, who is to retain the cost consultant for purposes of s. 14 of the Act? And when, if ever, is this to occur? Does the legislative scheme envision one cost consultant only per project? Further, do the duties of a cost consultant under the Act mirror the duties of the cost consultant under the Commitment Letter?

[80] In the Geological Testing Letter, Penner confirmed RESG's position on the 2002 Phone Call, namely that Roulston of MCAP had assured RESG that the terms of the Commitment Letter would be monitored and upheld by CSC. The Geological Testing Letter was written within a week of the Deficiency Letter. By the time of both, it had become obvious, at least to RESG, that there were a number of grave deficiencies in the Condo Project. Penner, on behalf of RESG, not only sent the Geological Testing Letter to CSC, but also copied MCAP. RESG urged that geotechnical testing be conducted at the site of the Condo Project since it appeared that recommendations of the geotechnical consultants had not been followed. Roulston testified that, to the best of his knowledge, MCAP did not respond to this Geological Testing Letter or advise RESG that it should not rely on MCAP: AEE A593-595.

[81] When Roulston was cross-examined about the reference in the Geological Testing Letter to his having represented to RESG during the 2002 Phone Call that the terms of the Commitment Letter would be carefully monitored and upheld by CSC, and the fact that MCAP had not responded to that Letter, Roulston stated that MCAP had no intention of responding to RESG about the Commitment Letter because it was confidential and RESG should not have had a copy. He emphasized that MCAP would never talk about or make commitments to third parties about the Commitment Letter. That may be so. But whether it is, and what, if anything, turns on this, is for the trial judge. So too is the issue of what transpired during the 2002 Phone Call.

[82] It is sufficient to note that on this record, a pointed evidentiary dispute exists on the cost consultant issue. Given the context here and the centrality of the cost consultant issue, the evidence led to date reveals that there is a material dispute whether MCAP represented to RESG that CSC would be acting as cost consultant for the purposes of s. 14 of the Act. The evidence adduced to date confirms the existence of this factual and legal dispute. That evidence also reveals the existence of a dispute on whether MCAP represented to RESG that the terms and conditions of the Commitment Letter would be strictly enforced and upheld by CSC. Therefore, unless summary dismissal is warranted on another ground, all of this is a matter for a trial judge as is the question of whether there is linkage between these two alleged representations.

(iv) Material Disputes Remain on Special Relationship – Reasonable Foreseeability and Reliance Issues

[83] I recognize that the chambers judge did go on to conclude that summary dismissal was justified irrespective of his assessment that it was "highly unlikely" that the appellants would succeed in proving that MCAP had made a representation. His reasons for so concluding were that:

> [I]t was not reasonably foreseeable by MCAP that any prospective purchaser or plaintiffs could reasonably rely on the alleged representation.
> Furthermore, there is no evidence that any such purchaser or plaintiffs did rely...upon that alleged undertaking.
> In my view, any such reliance by a purchaser or plaintiffs or the alleged purchaser's representative RESG cannot be found to be reasonable. A purchaser could not reasonably look to the interim finance lender to ensure the proper completion of the project": ABD F101 at paras 54-56.

[84] This analysis is flawed. The proposition that it was not reasonably foreseeable by MCAP that any prospective purchaser could reasonably rely on the alleged representation and that there is no evidence that any purchasers did so ignores the fact that these matters are tied up with a dispute on other material facts, namely the relationship between RESG and the appellants, on the one hand, and RESG and MCAP, on the other. In the Amended Amended Statement of Claim, RESG is described as "a representative of purchasers in the Project": AEE A79. In an affidavit before the chambers judge, Penner, part owner of RESG, refers to RESG as an "authorized representative of a number of past and present owners of condominium units" and describes RESG as an "advocate" for the RESG purchasers as regards individual unit matters, and for all potential purchasers as regards the condominium common property: AEE A89. There is also evidence that MCAP was on notice that RESG was acting as a "real estate syndicator" in the sale of the units with everything that this would arguably entail: AEE A48, A49. In this regard, there is evidence that RESG was acting in accordance with certain agreements made between it and 970365 to sell units in the Condo Project and that both 970365 and MCAP were involved in direct dealings with RESG for this purpose. In addition, the affidavit evidence indicates that RESG made certain representations to the prospective purchasers": AEE A87.

[85] Thus, there is a genuine issue whether RESG was acting as an agent for the purchasers or in some other capacity such that knowledge by or representations that MCAP made to RESG, if any, could be held to be knowledge of the appellants. Further, in any event, regardless of the technical nature of the relationship between the purchasers and RESG, there is also a material dispute about whether MCAP ought to have reasonably foreseen that any alleged representation to RESG would arguably be a representation to prospective purchasers through RESG and would be relied on and whether, in turn, RESG or the ultimate purchasers or both did rely on those alleged representations. And if RESG alone were found to have relied on the alleged representations, then a further issue is whether that would suffice for purposes of the appellants' claim against MCAP given other evidence that indicates that the purchasers were relying on RESG to represent them in relation to their purchases of units. Again, these are all matters for a trial judge.

[86] The record reveals that RESG was particularly concerned to ensure that a cost consultant for purposes of s. 14 of the Act had been retained for the Condo Project. When a party asks a question and receives an answer, one reasonable inference is that they are relying on the answer given, and, depending on the circumstances, that the answer is important to it. Otherwise, unless idle chit chat, why ask the question? In other words, when specific information is requested and a response provided, this may be relevant in assessing whether a party will reasonably foresee that it will be relied on. All of this is for a trial judge including whether the questions that RESG asserted it posed to MCAP about the cost consultant went to the issue of who would play the central role envisioned under s. 14 of the Act in protecting purchasers and what, if anything, turns on this. In considering these issues, a trial judge should evaluate the 2002 Phone Call in accordance with commercial realities. The term "cost consultant" has a special meaning under the Act.

[87] More fundamentally, the reason the chambers judge gave for finding that any such reliance could not be reasonable is without merit. That stated reason: a purchaser cannot look to an interim lender to ensure the proper completion of the project. I agree that an interim lender owes no duty of care to purchasers of units in a project it is financing to ensure that the project is completed in accordance with the lending agreement. I have explained why this is so earlier. However, a court cannot use the absence of a duty of care based on a lender-purchaser relationship to determine whether the specific facts and circumstances of a particular case created or gave rise to a special relationship between the lender and purchasers and a corresponding duty of care sufficient to ground an action in negligent misrepresentation. But that is what happened here. This too constitutes reviewable error. There may well be circumstances in which a lender owes a duty of care to third parties involved in a project it is financing sufficient to ground an action in negligent misrepresentation: see Keith Plumbing & Heating Co v Newport City Club Ltd, 2000 BCCA 141, 184 DLR (4th) 75.

[88] As to why reliance on the alleged representations would be reasonable, a trial judge would need to take into account a number of considerations. Professor Bruce Feldthusen has set out in Economic Negligence (3rd ed. 1994) at pp. 62-63 five general indicia of reasonable reliance, namely: (1) the defendant had a direct or indirect financial interest in the transaction in respect of which the representation was made; (2) the defendant was a professional or someone who possessed special skill, judgment, or knowledge; (3) the advice or information was provided in the course of the defendant's business; (4) the information or advice was given deliberately, and not on a social occasion; and (5) the information or advice was given in response to a specific enquiry or request. To what extent these indicia existed in this case is for a trial judge.

[89] Therefore, it was not open to the chambers judge, on this record, to determine that it was not reasonably foreseeable by MCAP that any prospective purchasers could reasonably rely on the alleged representations. There is ample evidence here demonstrating the existence of a material dispute on this point too. Again, all of this is for a trial judge with the benefit of a full hearing.

[90] So too is the question of whether any alleged representation involved a future expectation and whether, in law, that claim is actionable. There is authority that only a representation of a present fact and not a future intention can give rise to actionable negligence. This issue was not definitively resolved by the Supreme Court in Cognos, supra at para 71-72. Nevertheless, the weight of authority at present supports the view that statements about future intentions cannot ground an action in negligent misrepresentation: see Motkoski Holdings Ltd. v Yellowhead (County), 2010 ABCA 72, 474 AR 367 at paras 39-55. That said, one has to be careful not to confuse a statement of present fact with the future consequences flowing from the negligent misrepresentation of that fact. Many statements of existing facts are inextricably linked to the future and it is what happens in the future that brings home the full extent of the damages caused by the negligent misrepresentation.

(c) Conclusion

[91] Thus, for these reasons, the appellants have shown that the claim for negligent misrepresentation is a genuine issue for trial.

B. Why a Genuine Issue for Trial Exists on the Claims Related to Breach of a Statutory Trust and Unjust Enrichment

1. Threshold Elements for Knowing Assistance and Knowing Receipt

[92] The appellants submit that MCAP participated in a breach of trust by knowingly assisting in a fraudulent and dishonest design on the part of a trustee or by receiving monies it knew were subject to trust conditions. In submissions before the chambers judge, this argument was not developed at any length. Understandably, therefore, it was not dealt with expressly by the chambers judge. However, on appeal it became one of the main grounds of appeal.

[93] In Citadel General Assurance Co v Lloyds Bank Canada, [1997] 3 SCR 805, the Supreme Court of Canada discussed the fundamental distinction between a stranger to a trust knowingly assisting in a fraudulent and dishonest design on the part of a trustee ("knowing assistance") and knowingly receiving trust property ("knowing receipt") and set forth the different thresholds that had to be met in each situation. Assuming for the sake of argument that MCAP is not a "developer" for purposes of s. 14, MCAP would be a stranger to the statutory trust created under s. 14 of the Act.

[94] Under the first category, knowing assistance, a finding of liability requires that the stranger to the trust have either actual knowledge of the trustee's fraudulent and dishonest design or be reckless or willfully blind to that intention. And where the trust is, as here, imposed by statute, the stranger will be deemed to have known of it: Air Canada v M & L Travel Ltd., [1993] 3 SCR 787 at para 39. The dishonest and fraudulent intent of the trustee does not refer to fraud in the criminal sense; conduct that is morally reprehensible will do. Nor is it necessary that the stranger have acted in bad faith or dishonestly. The test is whether the stranger can be said to be "taking a risk to the prejudice of another's rights, which risk is known to be one which there is no right to take": Air Canada, supra at para 60.

[95] The second category, knowing receipt, occurs where a stranger receives trust property for its own use or benefit and with knowledge that the property was transferred to it in breach of trust. It is irrelevant whether the breach was fraudulent. For knowing receipt, the level of knowledge required is lower since the stranger is being enriched at the expense of the plaintiff. Thus, relief will be granted where a stranger, having received trust property for its own benefit and having knowledge of facts which would put a reasonable person on inquiry, fails to inquire as to the possible misapplication of trust property. Because the recipient is held to this higher standard, constructive knowledge, that is knowledge of facts sufficient to put a reasonable person on notice or inquiry, will be adequate as the basis for liability: Citadel, supra at paras 48-49.

2. Threshold Elements for Unjust Enrichment

[96] The claim for unjust enrichment stands on a different legal footing than the claims for knowing assistance and knowing receipt. Unjust enrichment is a separate common law cause of action; the latter two are equitable causes of action: Alberta v Elder Advocates of Alberta Society, 2011 SCC 24, [2011] 2 SCR 261 at para 94. Three elements must be proven to establish unjust enrichment: (1) enrichment of the defendant; (2) a corresponding deprivation of the plaintiff; and (3) an absence of juristic reason for the enrichment: Garland v Consumers' Gas Co., 2004 SCC 25, [2004] 1 SCR 629, at para 30.

3. Material Disputes Remain for Knowing Assistance, Knowing Receipt and Unjust Enrichment Claims

[97] The appellants' position may be summed up this way. MCAP knew that RESG considered CSC to be the cost consultant for purposes of s. 14 of the Act. MCAP was aware of the terms of the purchase and sale agreements since it had required that those contracts be on terms agreeable to it. Those agreements contemplated a cost consultant as required under s. 14. At the time of closing of the transactions of purchase and sale, MCAP was on notice through the Deficiency Letter and later the Geological Testing Letter that individual units and related common property had not been substantially completed. Therefore, the proceeds of sale were subject to the statutory trust and holdback provisions mandated under the Act. MCAP took no steps to correct RESG's understanding of CSC's role. Indeed, MCAP instructed CSC not to act as a s. 14 cost consultant but never at any time disclosed this critical fact to RESG. Nor did MCAP make any inquiries after receiving RESG's warnings in September 2003 about substantial deficiencies in the Condo Project to determine whether there could be a misuse or misapplication of trust funds by 970365. Further, given the very short period of time between MCAP's receiving notice of the serious deficiencies and the actual closing of the transactions of purchase and sale, MCAP would have known that those deficiencies could not have been substantially completed. Thus, MCAP is liable for knowing assistance, knowing receipt and unjust enrichment.

[98] I have concluded that based on the record before this Court, there are genuine issues for trial with respect to all three claims.

[99] I begin with this. The Commitment Letter contemplated that the Condo Project would be registered with a new home warranty provider acceptable to MCAP: Funding Condition 16 of the Commitment Letter at AEE A19. Under the terms of the Commitment Letter, all purchasers and contracts of purchase and sale were required to be "satisfactory" to MCAP: Other Conditions 6 of the Commitment Letter at AEE A23. It appears from this record that the new home warranty provider was not intended to be one that would bring this Condo Project within the exception to s. 14 of the Act. If so, the statutory trust and holdback provisions under s. 14 would apply to the Condo Project. The contracts of purchase and sale appear to contemplate this as well since they provided in relevant part (AEE A131):

> 3. Money in Trust
> All funds paid by the Purchaser ... shall be held in trust by the Vendor's solicitors pursuant to section 14 of the Condominium Property Act (the "Act") and released in accordance with the Act.... For the purposes of section 14 of the Act, a written statement of the Vendor's consulting engineer or architect for the Project confirming (as the cost consultant under the Act) that the improvements to the Property or any part of it or to the Common Property are substantially complete shall be proof of such facts and conclusively binding upon the Purchaser. The Vendor may act on the statement of the cost consultant in disbursing or using the Purchase Price.

[100] Other evidence supports the appellants' position that there are genuine issues for trial with respect to both the knowing assistance and knowing receipt causes of action. The appellants point to the fact that on September 12, 2003, RESG sent the Deficiency Letter to CSC, copying MCAP, confirming that RESG had been "advised by counsel" that 970365 had failed to obtain the appropriate exemption from the cost consultant requirements under the Act. As noted above, the Deficiency Letter stated that RESG had been "further advised that CSC has been selected as the required cost consultant" for the purpose of determining the amount of the statutory holdback to be held in trust under s. 14 of the Act: AEE A150. The Deficiency Letter then went on to describe at considerable length the numerous and varied serious alleged deficiencies in the design and construction of the Condo Project.

[101] There is also evidence that prior to the Deficiency Letter, CSC had issued letters to 970365 certifying costs to complete common areas for the purpose of determining a holdback from purchaser funds for units that had closed. The appellants assert that both 970365 and 970365's lawyers represented that these certification letters were the certifications required under s. 14 of the Act.

[102] This evidentiary record suggests that 970365's lawyers also understood that CSC was acting as the s. 14 cost consultant under the Act. In their trust letters to purchasers' counsel, 970365's lawyers undertook to maintain a holdback in accordance with s. 14, stating that in doing so, "we shall be entitled to rely upon the advice of our client's cost consultant, currently Cuthbert Smith Chartered Quantity Surveyors, to determine the appropriate amount of such holdback from time to time": AEE A525. Further, 970365's lawyers have given evidence in this case that, in closing the transactions of purchase and sale, they believed that CSC was acting as the s. 14 cost consultant: see affidavit of 970365's lawyer, Gordon Van Vliet, at AEE A4C at line 13.

[103] This record reveals that Penner discussed the Deficiency Letter with Cuthbert of CSC on September 16, 2003. In addition, as noted above, RESG then sent the Geotechnical Testing Letter to CSC and copied MCAP. This was the Letter that asked that further development activity cease until geotechnical testing could be done at the site of the Condo Project. In the Geotechnical Testing Letter, RESG advised that it had been provided with the Commitment Letter on July 15, 2002 and pointed out that the Commitment Letter required a soils test and "construction in compliance with such conditions and with the recommendations". As also noted above, RESG then asserted that it had been assured by MCAP that the Commitment Letter would be enforced, stating (AEE A160):

> By telephone conversation on July 16.2002 with Mr. Michael Roulston, Assistant Vice-president of MCAP, we were assured that the terms of the commitment letter would be carefully monitored and upheld by Mr. John [sic] Cuthbert of CSC.

[104] As also discussed above, on September 23 and 24, 2003, 970365 and MCAP respectively wrote separate letters to CSC instructing CSC that it had not been retained as a s. 14 cost consultant and that neither consented to CSC's taking on such a role.

[105] Specifically, 970365's September 23 letter admonished CSC for what 970365 perceived to be "unauthorized communications" between CSC and RESG. The letter stated at AEE A570:

> We wish to make it expressly clear that your firm has been retained as the cost consultant for the purposes of the loan transaction between ourselves as developer and MCAP Financial as lender, and for no other purpose. Your firm has not been retained for any expanded role as alleged by RSG, nor do we consent to you taking on such a role. RSG is simply wrong in this regard.

[106] That letter went on to state that 970365 was taking the allegations advanced by RESG "very seriously" and had referred the correspondence to the architects, engineers and contractor. 970365 copied MCAP on this letter. It did not copy RESG and the appellants point to the fact that there is no evidence that 970365 or MCAP ever provided a copy of that letter to RESG.

[107] MCAP sent CSC a letter to the same effect on September 24, 2003 (AEE A36). In that letter, MCAP referred to the various allegations that RESG had made concerning the Condo Project and cautioned CSC, in words essentially identical to those used by 970365 in its September 22 letter, that CSC's role was as follows (AEE A36):

> [W]e wish to make it clear that your firm has been retained by our office as the cost consultant for the purposes of the loan transaction between 970365 Alberta Ltd as developer and ourselves as lender, and for no other purpose. MCAP Financial has not retained your firm for any expanded role as suggested in RSG's correspondence of September 12, 2003, nor do we consent to you taking on such a role.

[108] MCAP did not copy RESG with this letter and again, the appellants note that there is no evidence that MCAP ever provided a copy of this letter to RESG. They also observe that, on the current record before this Court, at no time did MCAP or 970365 ever write to RESG or Penner advising that CSC was not the s. 14 cost consultant under the Act.

[109] In addition, the appellants assert that both MCAP and 970365 knew full well the jeopardy that existed for each at the time that they sent their subject letters to CSC. According to the appellants, at this stage the exposure for both MCAP and 970365 was at its greatest since the outstanding loan amount would have been approaching the highest level. In the appellants' view, by not informing RESG that CSC was not the cost consultant for purposes of s. 14 of the Act, MCAP improperly reduced its own risk exposure to the significant detriment and harm of purchasers of units in the Condo Project.

[110] As noted earlier, on September 26, 2003, MCAP received $1,463,940 from the closing of a large number of sales transactions in the Condo Project. And then between October 6 and 8, 2003, it received another $2,891,439. MCAP applied all funds against the debt 970365 owed to MCAP.

[111] Intertwined in all of this is also the alleged threat by 970365 to cancel the contracts of purchase and sale and claim forfeiture of deposits paid, who knew what and when about these threats, whether they were used to force closings notwithstanding 970365's alleged failure to substantially complete specific units and related common property and what, if anything, turns on all this.

[112] All this being so, given the allegations contained in the Amended Amended Statement of Claim and the evidentiary record before this Court, I cannot say that the appellants' claims for knowing assistance and knowing receipt are without merit. There are genuine issues for trial as to whether MCAP knowingly assisted in a breach of trust or knowingly received monies impressed with a statutory trust.

[113] Similar considerations apply to the appellants' claim against MCAP for unjust enrichment. The chambers judge relied on the fact that there was a juristic reason as between 970365 and MCAP for the payments received by MCAP to summarily dismiss the unjust enrichment claim. But whether the subject proceeds had lost all identity as purchasers' funds once MCAP received them is very much in dispute on this record. The appellants' position is that when MCAP received the subject monies, these were payments from the purchasers, rather than being 970365's monies. Assuming only for the sake of argument that the appellants are correct, the analysis would then lead a different inquiry. The question would be whether MCAP had a juristic reason to retain monies received from the purchasers of the units. That is a different issue than what the chambers judge considered. The answer to it is also in dispute.

[114] I again caution that I make no findings on any of the matters discussed. Suffice to say that given this record, summary dismissal of these claims was not appropriate.

C. Why There is a Genuine Issue on Whether MCAP was a "developer" under s. 14 of the Act

1. Statutory Definition of "developer"

[115] Section 14(1)(c) defines developer as follows:

> "developer" includes any person who, on behalf of a developer, acts in respect of the sale of a unit or a proposed unit or receives money

> paid by or on behalf of a purchaser of a unit or a proposed unit pursuant to a purchase agreement

2012 ABCA 26 (CanLII)

[116] The significance of the appellants' claim that MCAP falls within this definition in connection with the Condo Project is this. If MCAP were found to be a "developer" under the Act, it would have been subject to, and bound by, the statutory trust conditions under ss. 14(4) and (5) of the Act in its own right irrespective of any potential liability for knowing assistance, knowing receipt or unjust enrichment.

2. Appellants' Theory of Liability

[117] As noted, the relationship between MCAP, as lender, and 970365, as borrower, was governed by the Commitment Letter. Neither the Condo Corporation nor any condominium unit owner was a party to that Commitment Letter. Nevertheless, it is the appellants' position that when MCAP received monies from 970365's lawyers, these monies were captured by the wording of s. 14(1)(c) such that MCAP should properly be treated as a "developer" for purposes of s. 14 and the statutory trust and holdback provisions.

[118] The test for determining who is a "developer" for purposes of s. 14 of the Act has three parts. The person or entity in question must: (1) "receive money paid by or on behalf of a purchaser"; (2) "pursuant to a purchase agreement"; and (3) "on behalf of a developer".

[119] The appellants assert that when MCAP received the proceeds of sale, those funds had not lost all their identity as purchasers' monies. On their theory, these funds were subject to repayment if the required partial discharges of MCAP's mortgage security and caveat 022 293 886 relating to an assignment by 970365 of rents and leases in favour of MCAP (Caveat) were not provided as required. They assert that this is clear from the way in which the subject transactions were structured, documented and closed. In their view, MCAP knew the monies it received from 970365's lawyers were "monies paid by or on behalf of a purchaser" and also knew it had received the monies "pursuant to a purchase agreement" especially since MCAP had required that 970365 grant in its favour a general assignment of all agreements of purchase and sale made between 970365 and purchasers of units in the Condo Project.

[120] In the appellants' view, there are several reasons why MCAP should be found to have received the purchase monies "on behalf of a developer", namely 970365. They point out that the purchase and sale agreements themselves mandated that purchase monies be paid to MCAP "on behalf of the developer". Why? Because item 4 of Schedule I defines "Permitted Encumbrances" as including: "Registrations relating to the Vendor's financing requirements which are to be discharged out of and conditional upon receipt of the full Purchase Price". The appellants further submit that this is also consistent with the Commitment Letter, under the heading "Partial Discharge" which states: "Partial Discharges shall be provided in respect to each condominium unit upon payment to the Lender of 100% of the Net Closing Proceeds".

[121] They also point out that the way in which the purchase and sale transactions were closed supports their position. In particular, they stress that 970365's lawyers did not pay the purchase proceeds to MCAP unconditionally. The purchase monies paid by purchasers of the condominium units were initially paid into the trust account of 970365's lawyers. Those lawyers in turn then paid those funds to MCAP but those payments were expressed to be conditional on receiving partial discharges of both MCAP's mortgage security and Caveat. Thus, according to the appellants, those funds were open to being returned to 970365's lawyers if MCAP failed to comply with its obligations to provide a partial discharge of both its mortgage security and Caveat. More important, on the appellants' theory, these funds remained the purchasers' funds until the purchasers received clear title. Accordingly, in their view, MCAP received those payments "on behalf of a developer", thereby making it a developer within the meaning of s. 14.

[122] I have concluded that there is a genuine issue for trial as to whether MCAP should, in the particular circumstances of this case, be properly characterized as a "developer" for purposes of s. 14 of the Act. Accepting, without deciding, that ordinarily, an interim financier would not be found to have received funds "on behalf of a developer" when it receives proceeds of sale of condominium units in repayment of the debt a developer owes to it, it does not follow that this will invariably be the case. Depending on the facts, there may well be instances in which an interim financier is properly included within the definition of "developer" under s. 14 of the Act. A trial judge considering this issue in this case will need to address and resolve a number of matters.

3. Material Disputes Remain on Whether MCAP was a "developer"

[123] First, there is the issue of the intended scope of the legislation and s. 14 in particular. Interpreting legislation is best done in context. It is a matter of statutory construction as to what the Legislature intended under s. 14 and in particular s. 14(1)(c), the definition of developer. This definition is special to s. 14; the Act contains another definition of "developer" for other purposes under the Act. Statutory construction assesses not merely the words of an act in their grammatical and ordinary sense; it does so in their entire context, harmoniously with the scheme of the act, its object and the intention of the Legislature.

[124] It is preferable for the development of the law that a trial judge consider the intended breadth and scope of s. 14 and the definition of "developer" thereunder. We have had no argument on the policy implications of different interpretations of the definition of "developer" contained in s. 14(1)(c). As noted, this is part of a parcel of consumer protection legislation designed to protect purchasers of condominium units from being unfairly taken advantage of by developers. But what precisely do the words "on behalf of a developer" in this section mean? Do the words simply mean "for the benefit of" and "in the interest of"? Or does this wording require that the developer or a third party to whom the developer may otherwise be accountable for those funds have retained some claim on those funds? And if so, what kind of claim will do for a court to conclude that the recipient of the purchase proceeds has received those monies "on behalf of a developer"?

[125] Further, did 970365 retain an absolute or some lesser claim on the monies paid by its lawyers to MCAP? The payments that MCAP received from 970365 were paid in partial satisfaction of the debt 970365 owed to MCAP. But if so, does this necessarily mean that MCAP received those proceeds solely in its own right and for its own benefit? Also, since the limitation "on behalf of a developer" does not state "on behalf of a developer alone", could a recipient of purchase proceeds be found to be a developer where the recipient has arguably received funds on two grounds, namely "on behalf of a developer" and in the recipient's own right? And if so, what would be the consequences to the recipient?

[126] MCAP contends that it received the funds in question solely for its own benefit, pointing out that they were not sent to them in trust. While the funds received were not sent in trust in the sense of their being subject to lawyer's trust conditions, a trial judge will need to consider whether it follows that MCAP received the funds unconditionally and for its sole benefit. The record reveals that they were paid by 970365's lawyers on the "understanding" that MCAP would provide partial discharges of both its mortgage security and Caveat. This "understanding" is not a solicitor's trust condition and would not be enforceable as such. But the Commitment Letter imposed a contractual obligation on MCAP in certain circumstances to provide partial discharges on receipt of Net Closing Proceeds as defined therein. MCAP points out that if 970365 had been in default when MCAP received the Net Closing Proceeds, it would have had no obligation to provide even the partial discharges. Whether this is so and how it affects MCAP's contention that it received the Net Closing Proceeds unconditionally and for its sole benefit is also for the trial judge.

[127] Second, the basis on which, and circumstances under which, a lender receives funds may be relevant to this issue. Here, the structure of the transactions of purchase and sale may raise the question whether there was in fact any privity of contract as between MCAP and unit purchasers as a result of the security granted by 970365 to MCAP. Certain evidence may be relevant to this issue. While MCAP was not a party to any of the agreements of purchase and sale, nevertheless, in accordance with the Commitment Letter, those agreements were required to be on terms satisfactory to MCAP. The sales prices had to be not less than the amounts set forth in Schedule "C" in the Commitment Letter. Further, MCAP required that 970365 provide "satisfactory confirmation that each of the purchasers has qualified and accepted take out mortgage financing at a financial institution acceptable to" MCAP: Commitment Letter Funding Condition 2 at AEE A17. Of particular note, in accordance with the Commitment Letter, 970365 was required to deliver to MCAP a general security agreement registered under the Personal Property Security Act of Alberta granting a first general assignment of all Agreements of Purchase and Sale inclusive of purchaser's deposits. In addition, 970365 was required to pay the Net Closing Proceeds of sale of each condominium unit to MCAP: see Commitment Letter at AEE A14.

[128] Third, this issue is further complicated by reason of the appellants' outstanding claims against MCAP for knowing assistance and knowing receipt. If an interim lender to a developer is found to have received sale proceeds knowing, or being deemed to know, that the developer has failed to comply with its statutory obligations under s. 14 of the Act and the funds in question are the proceeds of sale, then it may be open to a trial judge to conclude that those funds were then impressed with a statutory trust. If so, then the issue is whether they were received by the lender "on behalf of a developer" and were required to be returned for the benefit of the beneficiaries of the statutory trust. I am not suggesting that the dragnet of liability as a "developer" under s. 14 should be expanded to sweep within it all interim lenders. But where an interim lender is liable for knowing assistance or knowing receipt, then a trial judge must assess whether that lender properly falls within the definition of "developer" under s. 14. Simply because a lender is liable for knowing assistance or knowing receipt does not innoculate the lender from potential liability on another basis, that is as a "developer" under s. 14. It also goes without saying that any lender liable for knowing assistance or knowing receipt is not carrying on business in accordance with acceptable commercial practices.

[129] Fourth, public policy issues will no doubt factor into a trial judge's analysis of this issue. On the one hand, an interpretation of this legislation that seriously compromises the integrity of the commercial lending industry ought to be rejected. On the other hand, a court will need to consider how best to ensure that this legislation protects those whom it was intended to protect. This will include an assessment of whether claimed risks from the lender's perspective are valid or whether means exist by which any risks might be obviated.

[130] The trial judge may explore whether this situation is analogous to the builders' lien regime. Lenders require appropriate land titles searches to ensure that as advances are made, no builders liens are registered against the title to the lands. The concept underlying the builders' lien regime is that in certain circumstances, employees and suppliers of materials may gain priority over the interests of a secured lender. Prudence dictates therefore that lenders follow certain procedures to minimize the risk of this occurring by demanding that borrowers provide evidence of clear title as and when advances are made plus whatever additional assurances the lender may consider appropriate to ensure that workmen and suppliers are being paid as required.

[131] A trial judge will no doubt consider as part of this analysis the steps that may reasonably be available to a lender to mitigate the risk that it might lose priority over purchase proceeds if the developer has failed to substantially complete a unit and related common property at the time of sale. And what steps, if any, a lender is required to take to avoid the risk that it may be considered a developer for purposes of s. 14. In other words, is it possible for a lender to protect itself from being treated as a developer under s. 14 by the simple expedient of requiring an appropriate certificate of substantial completion from a cost consultant each time it receives purchase proceeds from the sale of units in a new condominium project to which the statutory trust and holdback provisions apply? And if a lender does not do so – if this degree of due diligence is not followed – then what consequences, if any, should properly flow from this? All of this is for a trial judge.

[132] For these reasons, I have concluded that whether MCAP is a developer for purposes of s. 14 of the Act is also a genuine issue for trial and ought not to have been summarily dismissed.

IX. Conclusion

[133] In conclusion, the appellants have shown that there are a number of genuine issues for trial in connection with certain claims against MCAP. Therefore, for the reasons explained, I allow the appeal from the order of the chambers judge summarily dismissing the claims for negligent misrepresentation, knowing assistance, knowing receipt, unjust enrichment and the s. 14 developer issue. This case should go to trial on these various claims. However, the chambers judge was correct in summarily dismissing the negligence claim and thus, the appeal on this ground is dismissed.

Reasons for Judgment Reserved of the Honourable Mr. Justice McDonald Dissenting in Part

2012 ABCA 26 (CanLII)

Introduction

[134] I have had the benefit of reading the Reasons for Judgment Reserved of the majority. While there is much with which I agree, I have respectfully come to a different conclusion regarding the issues of negligent misrepresentation (paragraphs 65 - 91) and whether or not MCAP is a developer within the meaning of section 14 of the Act (paragraphs 115 - 132).

[135] In particular, I agree with the comments contained in paragraph 43 of the Reasons for Judgment Reserved regarding the two-step process to be followed in a successful application for summary judgment. The first step involved requires the moving party to adduce evidence to show that there is no genuine issue for trial. This is admittedly a high threshold. If the evidentiary record establishes that either there are missing links in the essential elements of the cause of action, or that there is no cause of action in law at all, there will then be no genuine issue for trial. The fact that there is no genuine issue for trial must be proven; relying on mere allegations or the pleadings will not suffice: Papaschase Indian Band No 136 v Canada (Attorney General), 2008 SCC 14, [2008] 1 SCR 372 at para 11. Secondly, once the burden on the moving party has been met, the party resisting the summary judgment application may then adduce evidence to persuade the court that a genuine issue remains to be tried.

[136] Ultimately this devolves to the question as to whether there is "no merit to any of the alleged causes of actions".

Background

[137] The background to this appeal, including the facts of the case and the decision of the chambers judge below, is set out in paragraphs 1 through 37 of the Reasons for Judgment Reserved of the majority.

[138] That said, there are certain facts, or more accurately, a lack of any evidential basis, relevant to the points on which I diverge from my colleagues that I will need to highlight in the appropriate sections below.

Claim for Negligent Misrepresentation

[139] In paragraph 65 the majority, citing Cognos, identified the necessary elements for a claim in negligent misrepresentation. I repeat these again for convenience. In order to succeed in establishing negligent misrepresentation, the plaintiff must prove:

(i) a duty of care based on a "special relationship" between the representor and the representee;

(ii) the representation in question was untrue, inaccurate or misleading;

(iii) the representor acted negligently in making the representation;

(iv) the representee relied, in a reasonable manner, on the negligent misrepresentation; and

(v) the reliance was detrimental to the representee in the sense that damages resulted.

[140] I concede that there may be a genuine issue for trial with respect to whether, on the unique and specific facts of this case, there was a "special relationship" between MCAP and the appellants, in large part through the involvement of RESG, sufficient to give rise to a duty of care in this case. I further concede that, as noted in paragraphs 72 through 74 of the Reasons for Judgment Reserved, the question of whether there was in fact an implied representation made by MCAP that it would enforce the terms of the Commitment Letter may be a live issue. Consequently, there may be a genuine issue for trial as to whether such an implied representation was untrue, inaccurate or misleading, and furthermore whether it was made negligently. Finally, there is no question that the appellants suffered damages in this case. However, I respectfully disagree with the majority on the issue of reasonable reliance.

[141] The majority writes at paragraph 84, that "[t]he proposition that it was not reasonably foreseeable by MCAP that any prospective purchaser could reasonably rely on the alleged representation and that there is no evidence that any purchasers did so ignores the fact that these matters are tied up with a dispute on other material facts, namely the relationship between RESG and the appellants, on the one hand, and RESG and MCAP, on the other."

[142] With the greatest of respect, in my opinion, there is no evidence to support the argument that the appellants were aware of any alleged representation or that they reasonably relied on it if it was in fact made. Furthermore, there is no evidence of an agency relationship between RESG and the appellants, and therefore no basis upon which to impart any reliance by RESG to the appellants themselves.[1]

[143] No where in the substantial affidavit evidence before the chambers judge was there any indication that RESG communicated its understanding of the alleged representations by MCAP to the purchasers, or that the purchasers themselves relied on MCAP's representations. The chambers judge expressly found that "there is no evidence that any such purchaser or plaintiffs did rely on the [sic] upon that alleged undertaking": ABD F101 at para 55. This court owes deference to the findings of fact of the chambers judge. I see no palpable and overriding error in his conclusion that there was no evidence of reliance by the appellants, and therefore, I see no basis for interfering with his conclusion on this point.

[144] The evidence is clear that RESG believed MCAP had represented it would enforce the terms of the Commitment Letter, and furthermore that RESG relied on that perceived representation when making recommendations to the purchasers. Penner, of RESG, deposed that "a critical factor that influenced RESG to recommend that purchasers enter into the Purchase Agreements, and subsequently close their transactions, was RESG's reliance on MCAP's assurances and representations that it intended to enforce the terms of the Commitment Letter": AEE A50 at para 31 [emphasis added]. See also AEE A95 at para 42. However, RESG's reliance is not the same as the appellants' reliance.

[145] Penner further deposed that "All [the potential purchasers] were prepared to enter into agreements based solely on the reputation of Bamber, Frey, and I. Nor did they enquire as to the exact nature of what they understood to be a co-venture relationship between RESG and the Developer Group. Rather, their only concern was that they were acquiring what was represented to them by the Developer Group and RESG": AEE A87 at para 30. There was no mention of any representations made by MCAP to the appellants. To succeed in establishing negligent misrepresentation the appellants must demonstrate that they relied on the alleged misrepresentation by MCAP; the absence of any evidence on this point is, in my opinion, fatal to their claim.

[146] Having failed to provide any evidence of an essential element of the cause of action of negligent misrepresentation, the appellant's claim was bound to fail and accordingly the chambers judge's decision summarily dismissing this aspect of the appellant's action was not unreasonable.

[147] The majority finds, at paragraph 85, that "... there is a genuine issue whether RESG was acting as an agent for the purchasers or in some other capacity such that knowledge by or representations that MCAP made to RESG, if any, could be held to be knowledge of the appellants." Again with the greatest of respect, I disagree with this conclusion.

[1]By virtue of a Letter Agreement dated May 8, 2008, between RESG and 970365, RESG was named as a "co-developer" and it was contemplated that it would have involvement as a financial participant in the Condo Project. AEE A85 at para 26.

[148] The onus of establishing an agency relationship lies with the party alleging that the agency existed: Tanouye v KJM Developments Ltd (1980), 25 AR 200 (QB) at para 25 citing Canadawide Investments Ltd v Muirhead (1958), 15 DLR (2d) 526, 26 WWR 460 (Alta SC-AD). See also Merchants Bank of Canada v Stevens (1919), 30 Man R 46, 49 DLR 528 (CA) at page 561. In this case, if the appellants desire to establish the essential element of reliance through an agency relationship with RESG, they must lead evidence to establish the existence of such a relationship. Based on the record before us, there is no evidence capable of supporting an argument that RESG was agent for the appellants.

[149] The essential elements of a relationship of agency include (i) consent of both the agent and the principal, (ii) the ability of the agent to affect or alter the principal's legal relationship with third parties, and (iii) the principal's control over the agent's actions: Royal Securities Corp v Montreal Trust Co, [1967] 1 OR 137, 59 DLR (2d) 666 (HCJ) at page 684. Consent is particularly important because, in general, "[n]o one can become the agent of another person except by the will of that other person": Johnson v Forbes (1931), 26 Alta LR 268, [1932] 1 DLR 219 (SC -AD) at 222[2].

[150] The record in the present appeal provides no evidence of the appellants' consent or desire that RESG act as their agent; nor is there any evidence that RESG had authority to act on behalf of or bind any of the appellants by its own actions, or alter the appellants' legal relationships with other parties. In my opinion, in the absence of any evidence on these essential points, there can be no genuine issue whether RESG was acting as agent for the appellants. Therefore RESG's reliance on MCAP's alleged representation cannot be imputed to the appellants and one fundamental element of a claim in negligent misrepresentation is still lacking.

[151] In any event and regardless of the exact nature of the relationship between RESG and the appellants, it bears repeating that the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Hercules Managements Ltd v Ernst & Young, [1997] 2 SCR 165, makes clear the necessity of a party being able to satisfy the court that reliance on a statement actually occurred. La Forest J. stated, in part, at para 18:

> Needless to say, actual reliance is a necessary element of an action in negligent misrepresentation and its absence will mean that the plaintiff cannot succeed in holding the defendant liable for his or her losses; see: Queen v Cognos Inc., [1993] 1 S.C.R. 87 at p.110.

[2] There are, of course, exceptions to this general proposition (eg. agent by necessity) but none of these are applicable to the facts of this case. Unquestionably, a contract of agency requires the consent of both parties.

Although the above comment was strictly speaking obiter, it is a correct statement of the law. There being no evidence given by any plaintiff that MCAP's alleged representations were a factor in his/her purchase of a unit in the Condo Project, there can be no basis for a successful claim in negligent misrepresentation.

[152] Based on the reasons above, I conclude that there is no genuine issue for trial based on a claim in negligent misrepresentation. I would dismiss the appeal on this point.

Claim that MCAP is a "Developer" Under Section 14 of the Act

[153] I repeat here, again for convenience, the test for determining who is a "developer" for the purposes of section 14 of the Act, as stated in paragraph 118 of the Reasons for Judgment Reserved of the majority. A "developer" includes a person who:

(i) received money paid by or on behalf of a purchaser;
(ii) pursuant to a purchase agreement; and
(iii) on behalf of a developer.[3]

I concede that there may be genuine issues for trial as to whether the funds MCAP received through the purchase transactions of units in the Condo Project was money "paid on behalf of a purchaser" "pursuant to a purchase agreement". However, I cannot accept the suggestion that those funds were received "on behalf of a developer".

[154] The majority concludes that it is an open question what precisely the words "on behalf of a developer" in section 14 means: paragraph 124. However, in my opinion, whatever the scope of that phrase might be, it cannot be so broad as to include money received by MCAP, pursuant to a loan agreement, to pay off the debt owed by 970365. Money received in this way is fundamentally received by MCAP on its own behalf. The chambers judge clearly held that, based on the arrangement between the parties, the money received by MCAP was 970365's money, and it was paid by 970365, not on behalf of 970365.

[155] Again, I see no reversible error with respect to the chambers judge's finding on this point. Having concluded that one element of the definition in section 14 was not established, the chambers judge summarily dismissed the appellants' claim on this point; his decision to do so was not unreasonable.

[3] The reference to a "developer" here is to the general definition contained in section 1(i)(j) of the Act, viz "a person who, alone or in conjunction with other persons, sells or offers for sale to the public units or proposed units that have not previously been sold to the public by means of an arm's length transaction".

[156] I respectfully disagree with the majority's position that the Legislature's failure to state "on behalf of a developer alone" opens the door to claims based on money paid by a developer that benefits both the developer and the recipient; after all, every payment, save for perhaps pure charity, provides some benefit to the payor in that it either relieves the payor of an obligation owed to the payee or creates an obligation that the payee owes back to the payor. Such an interpretation of section 14 is, in my opinion, too broad and unsupportable on the words of the legislation.

[157] As further support for the position that there is a genuine issue on the section 14 developer argument, the majority also concludes, at paragraph 127, that there remains an unanswered question as to whether there might be privity of contract in this case between MCAP and the appellants based on the security granted by 970365 to MCAP. Again, I respectfully disagree. I can see no evidential basis for this suggestion on the record before this court.

[158] Furthermore, the chambers judge expressly held that "[t]here was no contractual relationship between MCAP and the plaintffs [appellants] ... The only interest of MCAP in any purchase agreement between the developer and the plaintiffs is the enforcement of the covenant by the developer to ensure that the developer paid the net proceeds of the sales so received from a purchaser to MCAP": ABD F96 at para 26.

[159] This was part of the lending arrangement between MCAP and 970365. I see no basis upon which this court can disturb this factual finding. And in any event, I see no way such a finding could affect the nature of the money MCAP received from 970365; even if there was a contractual relationship between MCAP and the appellants, the specific money impugned in this appeal was still received by MCAP from 970365 in repayment of 970365's loan, and therefore was received on MCAP's own behalf and not on behalf of a developer.

[160] Further on this point, the majority notes that the issue of whether MCAP received money "on behalf of" 970365 is further complicated by the possibility that MCAP knowingly received trust funds. This reasoning flows from the fact that if a party receives money knowing that the developer has failed to comply with the Act, those funds may be found to be impressed with a statutory trust. If they are subject to a statutory trust, then the developer is liable to the purchaser for those funds, i.e. the purchaser can require that they be returned. As such, the money in question is not unconditionally available to the receiving party, but rather that party is in effect holding that trust money for the developer; therefore the receiving party received the money "on behalf of the developer".

[161] With the greatest of respect, this reasoning is flawed and I disagree with the majority on this point. As noted by the majority in paragraphs 93 and 95 of their Reasons for Judgment Reserved, a condition precedent to a finding that a party knowingly received trust property is a finding that the party was a stranger to the trust. With respect to a section 14 statutory trust, this means the party is not a "developer" for the purposes of section. In paragraph 95, the majority explains that "[t]he second category, knowing receipt, occurs where a stranger receives trust property for its own use or benefit and with knowledge that the property was transferred to it in breach of trust" [emphasis added]. This requirement is essential because if the party was a trustee, as opposed to a stranger to the trust, it would not receive the trust property for its own benefit, but rather for the benefit of the trust's beneficiaries. Also, a transfer to such a party would not be a transfer in breach of trust; it would merely be a transfer from one trustee to another. Therefore, if MCAP is liable for knowingly receiving trust property, it cannot have been a developer under section 14. It begs the question to say that MCAP might have knowingly received trust property, based on the premise that MCAP is a stranger to the section 14 statutory trust, and subsequently use that finding to bring MCAP within the definition of "developer" and therefore within the ambit of the trust itself.

[162] Furthermore, with respect to section 14 holdbacks, that money is subject to a statutory trust. Therefore, if a party receives that money knowing it is subject to a statutory trust, that party would likely already be held liable to the beneficiary on that basis. It seems unnecessary to me to extend the analysis to the issue of whether the money is also held "on behalf of a developer", simply to engage the definition of "developer" in section 14 of the Act.

[163] There is no need to take the further step of categorizing the money as received "on behalf of" the developer and thereby bring the receiving party within section 14 if that party does not otherwise satisfy the criteria set out in the definition of "developer". In my respectful opinion, with this argument the majority is conflating, unnecessarily, the cause of action noted above (knowingly receiving trust property) with the meaning of "on behalf of a developer" in section 14.

[164] The majority recognizes that public policy issues will be a factor to consider when analyzing the scope of the definition of "developer " in section 14 of the Act. However, the majority believes this is a question that is best left to be decided at trial. With respect, I again diverge on this point. In my opinion, even opening the door at trial to an interpretation of section 14 that may include interim construction lenders in the definition of "developer" would clearly be inconsistent with the object of the Act and the intention of the Legislature.

[165] The Act is, admittedly, consumer protection legislation aimed at protecting the interests of purchasers and owners of condominiums. However, this is not the only objective of the legislation. The Act attempts to strike a balance between the need to protect the interests of purchasers and owners, and the need to enable developers to undertake and complete condominium projects in an efficient and effective manner.

[166] Section 14 is an example of the balance that the Act attempts to create. On the one hand, the definition of "developer" is directed at holding a larger group of persons accountable for the proper construction and completion of new condominium projects. In fact, the definition of "developer" presently set out in section 14 was only introduced in 2000 as part of a package of amendments to the Act (the "2000 Amendments").

[167] Prior to that time, the applicable definition was the much narrower definition of "developer" applicable to the entire Act; the current general definition of "developer" in section 1(j), which was also amended in 2000 but for the purposes of this appeal is substantially the same as it was prior to the amendments, reads:

> "developer" means a person who, alone or in conjunction with other persons, sells or offers for sale to the public units or proposed units that have not previously been sold to the public by means of an arm's length transaction.

[168] Clearly the section 14 definition encompasses a wider range of persons than the definition in section 1(j) of the Act, indicating a focus on consumer protection. On the other hand, the calculation of trust holdbacks under section 14 now seeks to allow developers easier access to sufficient funds to complete a condominium project, while at the same time maintaining sufficient holdbacks to ensure the completion of the units and related common property for which purchase monies have already been paid.

[169] Prior to the 2000 Amendments, 50 percent of the money paid to a developer or a person acting on the developer's behalf was required to be held in trust until the unit and related common property was substantially complete. As such, this money was not available to the developer to finance the completion of the remainder of the condominium project.

[170] Under the current section 14, however, the required holdback has been modified, and now the developer (as newly defined) is required to hold in trust that amount of money that is sufficient, when combined with the unpaid portion of the purchase price, to substantially complete the unit in question and the related common property.

[171] This modified method of calculation makes available to the developer more of the money paid by purchasers of units in a condominium project in order to complete the project, or an additional phase, while still ensuring there are sufficient funds to complete the immediate unit and related common property to which those purchase monies apply. This exemplifies the balance struck in the legislation.

[172] The Legislature clearly intended a balance in section 14 of the Act. When debating the 2000 Amendments in the Legislative Assembly, one of the noted effects of the changes was "to protect the rights of the condominium owners while allowing the builders to finance their projects more easily": Alberta, Legislative Assembly, Hansard (3 April 2000) at 662 (Hon. Mr. Gibbons). As noted, one objective of section 14 is to expand the group of persons who are accountable to the purchasers of units in a new condominium project for the completion of the project.

[173] However, in my opinion, the Legislature did not intend to cast the net so wide as to include interim finance lenders, since doing so will undermine the other objective of section 14, namely, ensuring that construction financing is available and funds are accessible to allow developers to complete, with reasonable diligence, the construction of new condominium projects. Expanding section 14 to apply to interim construction lenders carrying on business in the ordinary course and through well-accepted and time-proven practices will doubtless have a detrimental effect on the availability of financing for new condominium developments. This cannot have been the intention of the Legislature when amending section 14.

[174] Of course, if the facts of a case are such that a lender clearly falls within the definition of a developer in section 14 – based on the particular financing arrangement or lending practices involved in that situation – the policy reasons just referred to will not be a sustainable basis for shielding that particular lender from the application of section 14. But where the lender has made use of commercially reasonable lending practices and one cannot reasonably fit the arrangement between the lender and the developer within the definition in section 14, these policy considerations support the conclusion that the definition should not be expanded unnecessarily to capture the interim lender in those circumstances.

[175] Based on the analysis above, and supported by the public policy considerations just articulated, I conclude there is no genuine issue as to whether MCAP is a developer within the meaning of section 14 of the Act. I would dismiss the appeal on this point.

Conclusion

[176] While I agree with the majority's conclusions that there is no genuine issue for trial based on a claim in negligence and that, on the particular facts of this case, there is a genuine issue for trial on a claim that MCAP knowing participated in a breach of a statutory trust and that MCAP was unjustly enriched, I am unable to agree with the balance of their conclusions. In my respectful opinion, there is no genuine issue for trial based on a claim in negligent misrepresentation, and there is no genuine issue with respect to whether MCAP qualifies as a "developer" within the meaning of section 14 of the Act. Accordingly, I would grant the appeal and allow to stand only the claims that MCAP knowingly participated in a breach of a statutory trust and that MCAP was unjustly enriched. I would dismiss the appeal on all other issues.

This is an application to stay the Order of the Court of Appeal for Ontario dated January 14, 1997. The order grants leave to the respondent Ernst & Young (E & Y) and George R. Albino et al. (appellants in the Court of Appeal) to assert a claim against the applicant Trustee in proceedings in Michigan brought by the respondent The Superintendent of Financial Institutions (Canada). The applicant has served and filed an application for leave to appeal from the Order referred to as well as from another order made the same day which allowed an appeal from an order disallowing proof of claim of the respondent E & Y in the bankruptcy proceedings.

The applicant's solicitor has requested an oral hearing in a letter to the Registrar but nothing in the material filed demonstrates why the usual practice in Rule 22(2) should not apply. The application for a stay is made pursuant to s. 65.1 of the Supreme Court of Canada Act (the Act) and Rule 27. By virtue of this recent amendment to the Act the court appealed from or a judge thereof is given concurrent jurisdiction. The rationale for this amendment was stated in Esmail v. Petro Canada (25095) (released February 8, 1996) as follows:

> The purpose of the amendment was to enable litigants to apply to the court that had recently dealt with the matter. Often the court appealed from is more conveniently located so as to permit the matter to be dealt with more expeditiously. It is only in special circumstances that successive applications to a judge of the court appealed from and a judge of this Court should be permitted.

For this reason a party applying in the first instance to a judge of this Court must provide a valid reason why the rationale for the new provision does not apply to the application.

In response to a query from the Registrar as to the absence of any such reasons in the material filed, the applicant responded in writing as follows:

(i) Firstly, in our stay motion we seek, by way of ancillary relief, an order expediting the hearing of the application for leave to appeal, and if leave is granted, the appeal itself. It does not appear that the Provincial Courts of Appeal have jurisdiction under the Supreme Court Act to grant that ancillary relief, whereas the Supreme Court certainly does. Further, it would not appear to be appropriate for a Provincial Court of Appeal to deal with a Supreme Court timetable.

(ii) Secondly, in the commentary to section 65.1 of the Supreme Court Act in Supreme Court of Canada Practice 1996, B. Crane and H. Brown, Carswell, 1995, the authors question (at page 115, first full paragraph) the likelihood of Provincial Court of Appeal issuing stays of their own orders "when a significant aspect of the decision is the likely merit in the proposed application for leave __ a matter the appeal courts have consistently held is for the Supreme Court of Canada to decide." It would seem somewhat strange for a court from which leave to appeal is being sought to be asked to say, or say inferentially, that it thinks that there is some merit in the application for leave to appeal its decision, i.e. this is not the same as seeking a stay where there is an unquestioned right of appeal and the sole question is the effect of the granting a stay.

With respect to the second point, this reasoning is at variance with the practice of this Court as set out in Esmail, supra. However, the applicant can be excused for not referring to the case since it appears not to have been reported. But I do not agree that the judges of the courts of appeal would not be objective in assessing whether an appeal raises a serious issue. There are numerous provisions which require judges to make a similar determination notwithstanding that a decision on the issue has already been made. For example, until comparatively recent times, leave to appeal to this Court was often granted by the court appealed from pursuant to s. 37 of the Act. That provision is still in the Act and fell into disuse because courts of appeal decided that this Court should determine its own workload and not by reason of any reluctance to reassess the merits for the purpose of identifying an issue fit to be decided by this Court.

The first reason referred to might in some circumstances be sufficient although there is usually no impediment to having the two applications proceed concurrently in different fora. In view of my disposition of the application, it is unnecessary to express any final conclusion on this point. I have concluded that the balance of convenience favours dismissal of the application subject to certain conditions. First, the hearing of the application for leave is to be expedited. I would grant the extension of time as requested. Second, the application for a stay is dismissed without prejudice to it being renewed before a judge of the Court of Appeal. Third, if leave to appeal is granted, the application may be renewed before me subject to any disposition that may have been made by a judge of the Court of Appeal.

In my opinion, the applicant will suffer no serious prejudice by the delay pending a decision on the application for leave. Unless the wheels of justice move much more quickly in Michigan than in Ontario, I doubt that the proceedings against the applicant will be advanced substantially pending a decision of this Court on the application for leave. In any event, if I am wrong in this respect, an application can be made to a judge of the Court of Appeal.

Accordingly, the application for a stay is dismissed and the applications for an expedited hearing of the application and for an extension of time with reference thereto are granted.

La version française:

Il s'agit d'une demande tendant à obtenir un sursis à l'exécution d'une ordonnance rendue par la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario le 14 janvier 1997. L'ordonnance autorise les intimés Ernst & Young ainsi que George R. Albino et autres (appelants en Cour d'appel) à présenter une demande contre le syndic requérant dans des procédures intentées au Michigan par l'intimé, le Commissioner of Insurance de l'État du Michigan. Le requérant a signifié et déposé une demande d'autorisation d'appel contre l'ordonnance en question et contre une autre ordonnance, rendue le même jour, par laquelle était accueilli l'appel formé contre une ordonnance rejetant une preuve de réclamation de l'intimée Ersnt & Young présentée dans les procédures de faillite.

Le procureur du requérant a demandé une audition orale dans une lettre adressée au registraire, mais les documents déposés n'indiquent pas pour quelles raisons la pratique usuelle prévue au paragraphe (2) de la Règle 22 ne devrait pas s'appliquer. La demande de sursis est présentée en vertu de l'art. 65.1 de la Loi sur la Cour suprême, L.R.C. (1985), ch. S-26 (mod. L.C. 1994, ch. 44, art. 101) et de la Règle 27. En vertu de la modification apportée récemment à la Loi, la juridiction inférieure ou l'un de ses juges exerce une compétence concurrente à celle de la Cour. Les raisons de cette modification ont été exposées dans l'arrêt Esmail c. Petro-Canada, no 25095, rendu le 8 février 1996, de la façon suivante :

> La modification visait à permettre aux plaideurs de présenter leur demande à la cour qui venait d'examiner l'affaire. Souvent, l'emplacement de la juridiction inférieure se prête mieux au jugement rapide de l'affaire. C'est seulement dans des circonstances spéciales qu'il devrait être permis de présenter successivement une demande à un juge de la juridiction inférieure et à un juge de notre Cour.

Pour cette raison, la partie qui présente d'abord une demande à un juge de notre Cour doit fournir des raisons valables pour justifier une dérogation à la nouvelle disposition.

En réponse à la question posée par le registraire quant à l'absence d'une telle explication dans les documents déposés, le requérant a répondu par écrit de la façon suivante :

(i) premièrement, dans notre requête, nous demandons, par la voie d'une mesure de redressement accessoire, une ordonnance hâtant l'audition de la demande d'autorisation d'appel, et si l'autorisation est accordée, celle du pourvoi lui-même. Les cours d'appel provinciales ne semblent pas avoir compétence en vertu de la Loi sur la Cour suprême pour accorder ce redressement accessoire, alors que la Cour suprême est certainement compétente. Par ailleurs, il n'apparaît pas judicieux qu'une cour d'appel provinciale prenne une décision ayant une incidence sur le calendrier des travaux de la Cour suprême.

(ii) deuxièmement, dans leur commentaire relatif à l'art. 65.1 de la Loi sur la Cour suprême,publié dans Supreme Court of Canada Practice 1996, Carswell, 1995, B. Crane et H. Brown mettent en doute (à la p. 115, premier paragraphe entier) la probabilité que les cours d'appel provinciales acceptent de surseoir à l'exécution de leurs propres ordonnances [traduction] lorsqu'un élément important de la décision est la vraisemblance du bien-fondé de la demande d'autorisation d'appel envisagée une question jugée de façon constante par les cours d'appel comme devant être tranchée par la Cour suprême. Il serait plutôt étrange de demander à la cour contre laquelle on cherche à se pourvoir qu'elle dise, ou statue implicitement, qu'elle croit que la demande d'autorisation d'appel présentée contre sa décision n'est pas dénuée de fondement; ce n'est pas comme si l'on cherchait à obtenir un sursis dans un cas où l'existence du droit d'appel est incontestable et que la seule question à trancher est celle de l'incidence de la décision d'accorder le sursis.

En ce qui concerne le deuxième point, ce raisonnement n'est pas conforme à la pratique de notre Cour telle qu'elle est énoncée dans l'arrêt Esmail, précité. Toutefois, on ne peut reprocher au requérant de ne pas renvoyer à cet arrêt, étant donné qu'il paraît ne pas avoir été publié. Mais je ne souscris pas à l'opinion voulant que les juges des cours d'appel saisis de la question de savoir si l'appel soulève une question sérieuse manqueront d'objectivité. De nombreuses dispositions exigent que les juges rendent des décisions semblables en dépit du fait que la question a déjà été tranchée. Par exemple, jusqu'à une époque relativement récente, l'autorisation d'interjeter appel devant notre Cour était souvent accordée par la juridiction inférieure en vertu de l'art. 37 de la Loi sur la Cour suprême. Cette disposition, demeurée dans la Loi, est tombée en désuétude parce que les cours d'appel ont décidé que notre Cour devait déterminer elle-même sa charge de travail, et non parce qu'elles étaient réticentes à réévaluer le bien-fondé d'une décision afin de déterminer si elle soulevait une question qui méritait d'être tranchée par notre Cour.

La première raison invoquée pourrait, dans certaines circonstances, suffire, bien qu'il n'y ait habituellement aucun empêchement à ce que les deux demandes soient traitées en même temps par des tribunaux différents. Compte tenu de la façon dont je statue sur la demande, toute conclusion définitive sur cette question est inutile. J'ai conclu que la balance des inconvénients favorisait le rejet de la demande sous réserve de certaines conditions. Premièrement, l'audition de la demande d'autorisation doit être hâtée. Je suis d'avis d'accorder la prorogation de délai demandée. Deuxièmement, la demande de sursis est rejetée, sous réserve du droit de la présenter à nouveau devant un juge de la Cour d'appel. Troisièmement, si l'autorisation d'appel est accordée, la demande peut m'être soumise à nouveau, sous réserve de toute décision rendue par un juge de la Cour d'appel.

mon avis, le requérant ne subira aucun préjudice grave en raison de la période qui s'écoulera avant que soit rendue la décision tranchant la demande d'autorisation. moins que les rouages de la justice n'aillent beaucoup plus vite au Michigan qu'en Ontario, je doute que les procédures intentées contre le requérant avancent de façon substantielle d'ici à ce que notre Cour se prononce sur la demande d'autorisation. De toute façon, si j'ai tort sur ce point, une demande peut être présentée à un juge de la Cour d'appel.

Par conséquent, la demande de sursis est rejetée et les demandes tendant à obtenir une audition hâtive de la demande et la prorogation du délai qui s'y rapporte sont accueillies.

ENDORSEMENT

Ernst & Young ("E&Y") filed a proof of claim, dated February 21st, 1996, with the trustee of the estate of Confederation Treasury Services Limited ("the trustee"). In one of several orders made on April 8th, 1996, Farley J. granted a motion by the trustee disallowing E&Y's proof of claim. No appeal was taken from this order until its significance became apparent during the argument of the appeal from another order made by Farley J. on the same day. In that appeal, E&Y and the former directors and officers of Confederation Life Insurance Company and Confederation Treasury Services Limited ("the directors and officers") sought an order that would entitle them to assert a claim against the trustee for relief arising out of their potential liability in an action now pending in Michigan. But only a creditor may seek such leave: see ss. 69 ff. of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.B-3 ("the BIA"). Section 2 of the BIA defines "creditor" to mean a person having a claim, preferred, secured or unsecured, provable as a claim under the Act, and defines "claim provable in bankruptcy", "provable claim" and "claim provable" to include any claim or liability provable in proceedings under the Act by a creditor. The trustee resisted the other appeal on a number of grounds, including the ground that, because E&Y's proof of claim had been disallowed, it was not a "creditor" entitled to the relief it sought.

E&Y immediately brought this motion for leave to extend the time to appeal from the order disallowing its proof of claim. The uncontradicted evidence of E&Y is that it always intended to appeal the whole of the disposition of Farley J. made on April 8th, 1996 which had the result of foreclosing its entitlement to assert a claim for contribution and indemnity from the trustee, and we are not satisfied that the trustee would suffer any prejudice from the granting of such leave. Leave to extend the time to appeal from the order disallowing the proof of claim is therefore granted.

We turn to the appeal itself. Section 121 of the BIA deems all debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt to be claims provable in proceedings under the Act. Section 121(2) makes specific reference to contingent claims and unliquidated claims. The claim of E&Y is, on its face, a contingent claim and, because E & Y is subject to a claim for treble damages in the Michigan proceedings, is not the same as the claim asserted against the trustee in Ontario by the Rehabilitator and exceeds that claim to the extent that any such damages may be awarded over and above the amount that may be awarded against the trustee.

In so far as the cases of Claude Resources Inc. (Trustee of) v. Dutton (1993), 22 C.B.R. (3d) 56 and Re Wiebe (1995), 30 C.B.R. (3d) 109, relied upon by the trustee, articulate as a test for a valid contingent claim the need for probability of liability arising from the court proceedings in question, we believe that they impose too high a threshold for the establishment of such a claim. While there may be claims so remote and speculative in nature that they could not properly be considered contingent claims, the claim of E&Y in the present case for contribution and indemnity in respect of the relief sought against it in the Michigan proceedings does not fall into that category and, in our view, constitutes a valid contingent claim within the contemplation of sec. 121 of the BIA.

Accordingly, the appeal from the order disallowing E&Y's proof of claim is allowed and, in its place, a declaration will issue that E&Y's contingent claim is a claim provable in the bankruptcy of Confederation Treasury Services Limited. Pursuant to s. 121(2) of the BIA, the matter is remitted to the Ontario Court (General Division) to value

E&Y's claim upon such evidence as may be adduced by the parties in respect of such valuation and E&Y's claim shall be deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.

It has been common ground throughout the argument of these appeals that the directors and officers, who have not yet filed a proof of claim with the trustee, fall into the same category as E&Y with respect to the relief sought against them in the Michigan proceedings. Such a proof of claim, as and when it is filed by the directors and officers, is to be treated in the same manner as we have directed in respect of E&Y's proof of claim.

Having regard to the circumstances out of which the appeal from the disallowance of E&Y's proof of claim arose, we order that there should be no costs of this appeal except the usual order for payment of the costs of the trustee out of the estate of Confederation Treasury Services Limited.

ENDORSEMENT

Introduction

[1] Crowe Soberman Inc. in its capacity as proposal trustee to the proposal to creditors of Conforti Holdings Ltd. (the "Company") under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act (Canada) (the "BIA") (the "Proposal Trustee") brings a motion for advice and directions.

[2] Moroccanoil, Inc. (Moroccanoil") has filed a proof of claim with the Proposal Trustee for a claim against the Company based on alleged breaches of a settlement agreement made in U.S. litigation. Litigation in the U.S. in respect of this claim was brought and is pending. The Company has brought a cross-motion in the U.S. litigation claiming damages from Moroccanoil.

[3] The Proposal Trustee seeks an order:

a. advising and directing the Proposal Trustee to not undertake the adjudication of the Moroccanoil proof of claim and the Company's cross-motion under the BIA and, specifically, s. 135.

b. As a corollary, lifting the stay of proceedings such that Moroccanoil may seek and obtain a determination of the Moroccanoil Claim before the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey (the "New Jersey Court"), provided that any enforcement remain stayed and subject to the BIA.

c. Approving the Proposal Trustee's Sixth Report dated February 24, and the activities of the Proposal Trustee set out therein.

[4] Moroccanoil opposes the Proposal Trustee's motion. It submits that the Proposal Trustee is required to value the proof of claim under s. 135(1.1) of the BIA.

[5] For the following reasons, I dismiss the Proposal Trustee's motion.

Facts

Background

[6] The Company's business was the operation of 52 hair salons. The Company became insolvent due to reduced business caused by the pandemic and imposed restrictions. It filed a notice of intention to make a proposal on September 28, 2020 and a proposal on March 13, 2021. The proposal is a holding proposal because the Company cannot formulate a final proposal in the uncertain and ongoing pandemic circumstances.

Moroccanoil's claim in New Jersey

[7] The Moroccanoil proof of claim arises from a claim against the corporate predecessor of the Company, Salon Distribution, Inc. ("SDI"), in relation to allege counterfeiting of Moroccanoil's trademark and exclusive beauty products by the Company. This claim was the subject of litigation in the New Jersey Court that commenced in 2011. The litigation was settled on July 15, 2015 after the parties entered into a settlement agreement on that date (the "Settlement Agreement").

[8] At the time the Settlement Agreement was executed, SDI had been amalgamated with Conforti Holdings Limited to form the Company.

[9] Moroccanoil asserts that the Company breached the Settlement Agreement by reselling large quantities of Moroccanoil products to an unauthorized retail store and by failing to maintain required records. As a result of the alleged breaches of the Settlement Agreement, Moroccanoil moved before the New Jersey Court to enforce the Settlement Agreement in April 2015.

[10] The Company and its principal, Tony Conforti, deny that they breached the Settlement Agreement. The Company is defending the New Jersey proceeding and has made a cross-motion claiming $4,430,000 against Moroccanoil (the "Cross-Motion") for economic loss including lost profits during and after the term of the Settlement Agreement due to alleged faults and breaches by Moroccanoil.

[11] Discovery and multiple motions by both parties in the New Jersey litigation have been ongoing since 2015.

2022 ONSC 3264 (CanLII)

Moroccanoil Proof of Claim

[12] Moroccanoil was not provided with notice of the NOI proceedings commenced by the Company in September 2020 for a number of months while the New Jersey litigation was ongoing. Moroccanoil discovered the existence of the NOI proceedings in or about June 2021 while its U.S. counsel was preparing for depositions in the New Jersey litigation.

[13] Upon discovering that the Company that commenced the NOI proceedings, Moroccanoil filed a proof of claim on August 19, 2021 in the amount of $2,807,478.12 (the Moroccanoil "Proof of Claim"). Moroccanoil alleges the following breaches of the Settlement Agreement:

a. Unfulfilled purchase obligations provided in the Settlement Agreement ($374,279.10).

b. The Company's diversion, that is, unauthorized sale, of Moroccanoil products, contrary to the Settlement Agreement ($860,000).

c. Legal fees under and related to the enforcement of the Settlement Agreement ($1,237,465).

d. Interest in accordance with New Jersey law ($336,013.12).

[14] Moroccanoil provided a documentary record in support of the Moroccanoil Proof of Claim.

[15] The Company provided the Proposal Trustee with a written response to the Moroccanoil Proof of Claim.

[16] In connection with the filing of the Moroccanoil Proof of Claim, Moroccanoil sought an order from the New Jersey Court staying the New Jersey litigation pending adjudication of the Moroccanoil Proof of Claim in the Canadian NOI proceedings. Moroccanoil's request for a stay was granted by the New Jersey Court on August 11, 2021, over the objection of the Company.

[17] Following receipt of the Moroccanoil Proof of Claim, the Proposal Trustee notified Moroccanoil that the Moroccanoil Proof of Claim will be valued at one dollar for the purposes of voting on the Company's request to extend the proposal proceedings.

[18] The Settlement Agreement provides that it is a New Jersey contract subject to and enforceable under New Jersey law and subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the New Jersey Court. The matter is under case management by one magistrate judge and a trial judge.

[19] The New Jersey Court dismissed a Moroccanoil motion for summary determination in 2015 as premature. A judge was then assigned to oversee discovery and the parties have conducted documentary discovery and depositions over six years. A second Moroccanoil motion for adjudication is pending before the New Jersey Court since November 2020.

Discovery and the New Jersey proceeding is now complete and the matter is ready to proceed to trial. Viva voce evidence from some witnesses (including expert witnesses) is likely to be necessary at trial.

[20] In a transcript of proceedings in the New Jersey court, the Magistrate advised the parties that the court intends to wait for adjudication of the proof of claim and, if it is referred back to the New Jersey Court for adjudication, a briefing schedule would be set on the motion to enforce settlement and the cross-motion, and that discovery would not be re-opened.

Documents submitted in relation to the Moroccanoil claim

[21] Moroccanoil relies upon documents that were provided with the Moroccanoil Proof of Claim consisting of a compilation of "certain evidence, briefs and other documents filed and/or obtained as part of the [New Jersey proceeding]", excluding some "marked for 'attorneys eyes only'" and some of which were sealed. Those documents include 17 Moroccanoil and Company briefs and memoranda, 10 declarations, 3 orders, 28 deposition transcripts, 63 "key documents", and one expert report.

[22] In connection with its response, the Company relies upon and has provided documents including for declarations, 3 orders, 2 transcripts of depositions, 59 "key documents", 4 expert reports, and 7 transcripts of court hearings in the New Jersey proceeding.

[23] The Moroccanoil documents amount to approximately 2,500 pages and the Company's documents represent another 2,500 pages, approximately.

[24] The Proposal Trustee served the Office of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy ("OSB") with its motion materials. The OSB has not appeared on this motion.

Analysis

[25] The issues on this motion are whether the Court has the jurisdiction to direct the Proposal Trustee to not undertake the determination and valuation of the Moroccanoil Claim under s. 135 of the BIA and, if so, whether such a direction should be given so that the Moroccanoil Claim and the Company's cross-motion would proceed to adjudication in the New Jersey proceeding.

[26] The Proposal Trustee submits that the circumstances at hand are such that the usual process in insolvency proceedings that claims be determined and valued in a single process should be displaced, and that a direction should be given that Moroccanoil's claim be determined by the New Jersey Court in the New Jersey litigation.

[27] The Moroccanoil proof of claim is a contingent or unliquidated claim in the Company's NOI proceedings.

[28] Subsection 121(2) of the BIA provides that such claim be determined as follows:

Contingent and unliquidated claims

> (2) The determination whether a contingent or unliquidated claim is a provable claim and the valuation of such a claim shall be made in accordance with section 135.

[29] The procedure for determining contingent or unliquidated claims applies not only in bankruptcies but in proposal proceedings under the BIA. See Re FEA Griffiths Corp, 1971 CarswellOnt 65, 15 C.B.R. (N.S.) 231 (Ont. S.C.).

[30] Section 135(1.1) of the BIA provides:

> Determination of provable claims
> (1.1) The trustee shall determine whether any contingent claim or unliquidated claim is a provable claim, and, if a provable claim, the trustee shall value it, and the claim is thereafter, subject to this section, deemed a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.

[31] The Proposal Trustee submits that notwithstanding the apparently mandatory language in s. 121(2) and s. 135(1.1) of the BIA through the inclusion of the word "shall", the Court has discretion to direct the Proposal Trustee not to adjudicate the Moroccanoil Proof of Claim, in appropriate circumstances.

[32] Moroccanoil responds that s. 135(1.1), plainly read and understood, mandates the Proposal Trustee to determine and value Moroccanoil's Proof of Claim. To do so, the Proposal Trustee must consider and determine the Company's claim against Moroccanoil as a necessary component.

[33] The Proposal Trustee submits that its motion is not dissimilar in substance to a motion by a creditor under s. 69.4 of the BIA for an order lifting the stay of proceedings under the BIA to allow a claim made in another court to proceed to adjudication in that court where the creditor applying is likely to be materially prejudiced by continuation of the stay of proceedings or it is equitable on other grounds to lift the stay. Where a claim proceeds in another court and is determined, the amount of the claim is then imported into the BIA proceedings.

[34] Where a creditor seeks to lift a stay under the BIA and allow a claim in another court to proceed, the Bankruptcy Court is not asked to relieve a trustee of its statutory obligation to determine a claim made in a bankruptcy. The court is asked to lift the stay, at the request of the creditor or other person affected by the stay of proceedings, to allow a claim to proceed to adjudication in another court so that the claim, as so determined, can be filed with the trustee. The effect of such an order is to suspend the trustee's obligation under s. 135(1.1) with respect to a contingent or unliquidated claim until the claim has been determined and valued by another court.

[35] In this case, there was no stay of proceedings that affected the New Jersey litigation when the NOI was filed. Moroccanoil, when it learned of the NOI proceeding, elected to file the Proof of Claim with the Proposal Trustee and it moved to stay the New Jersey action which, when granted, gave effect in New Jersey to the stay of proceedings under the BIA in Canada. Moroccanoil does not seek to lift a stay under the BIA. Section 69 of the BIA does not apply here and, in my view, the procedure that is available to a creditor to seek to lift a stay of proceedings does not assist me to decide the question of jurisdiction on this motion.

[37] In Graham, a privately appointed receiver and the trustee in bankruptcy of Graham Mining Ltd., a bankrupt, moved for advice and directions respecting the trustee's decision to settle, subject to court approval, lawsuits in which Graham was a plaintiff and defendant by counterclaim in one action and a defendant in another action. Four preferred and unsecured creditors moved to reverse the trustee's decision to settle the litigation, subject to court approval, and expunge or reduce the proofs of claim filed by two other creditors. Justice Cameron authorized the trustee and the receiver to enter into the proposed settlement.

[38] In Graham, Cameron J. addressed the trustee's obligation under s. 135 of the BIA to value every contingent or unliquidated claim. Cameron J. was satisfied that the cost of analyzing the claim and any set-off alleged by the objecting creditors would be substantial, where the claims were complex and turned on credibility. He held, at para. 69, that in view of various factors including the lack of funds in the estate to pursue the Graham claim, "any breach of the obligation under BIA s. 135(1) to value the claim is moot". Cameron J. was satisfied that the trustee had acted honestly and in good faith and in a commercially reasonable manner in accepting the settlement proposal and he authorized the trustee to enter into minutes of settlement accepting the proposal.

[39] The facts in Graham are materially different from those on this motion because in Graham, the trustee determined the claims by the general contractor and the performance bond issuer by making the settlement, subject to court approval. The objecting creditors were not seeking to have their own claims determined. They moved under s. 135(5) of the BIA to reverse the trustee's decision to determine and value claims by settling the litigation involving Graham. The Court found that in so doing, the trustee had acted in good faith and reasonably in the discharge of its obligation under s. 135 of the BIA. Graham is not a case where, as here, the trustee asked the court to relieve it of an obligation to determine and value a creditor's claim, and direct that this be performed by a civil court in another jurisdiction.

[40] The Proposal Trustee cites s. 183(1) of the BIA in support of its submission that there is jurisdiction for this court to give the requested direction. Section 183(1) provides that the Superior Court of Justice exercising its jurisdiction under the BIA is "invested with such jurisdiction at law and in equity as will enable [it] to exercise original, auxiliary and ancillary jurisdiction in bankruptcy and in other proceedings authorized by this Act ...".

[41] In Kingsway General Insurance Company v. Residential Warranty Company of Canada Inc. (Trustee of), 2006 ABCA 293 (CanLII), the Alberta Court of Appeal, at paras. 20 and 21, addressed the Bankruptcy Court's inherent jurisdiction at law and in equity under s. 183(1) of the BIA:

> Inherent jurisdiction is not without limits, however. It cannot be used to negate the unambiguous expression of legislative will and moreover, because it is a special and extraordinary power, should be exercised only sparingly and in a clear case: Baxter Student Housing Ltd. v. College Housing Cooperative Ltd., 1975 CanLII 164 (SCC), [1976] 2 S.C.R. 475 at 480; Wasserman Arsenault Ltd. v. Sone (2002), 2002 CanLII 41494 (ON CA), 33 C.B.R. (4th) 145 (Ont. CA).
> Further limitations are based on the nature of the BIA - it is a detailed and specific statute providing a comprehensive scheme aimed at ensuring the certainty of equitable distribution of a bankrupt's assets among creditors. In this context, there should not be frequent resort to the power. However, inherent jurisdiction has been used where it is necessary to promote the objects of the BIA: [citations omitted]. It has also been used where there is no other alternative available: [citations omitted].

[42] The regime under the BIA provides for a summary procedure for (i) determination by the trustee of whether a contingent or unliquidated claim is a provable claim and, if so, (ii) for the trustee to value it. The BIA provides for an appeal of the trustee's determination and, although the appeal may be made to the registrar in bankruptcy, a judge of this court may exercise this jurisdiction under. 192(2) of the BIA. Insolvency proceedings under the BIA are subject to court supervision, and the court is able to give directions for the timely and efficient determination of claims.

[43] Although Moroccanoil's claim was commenced in the New Jersey Court as an ordinary civil claim to enforce a settlement agreement, the claim is now being made in the context of an insolvency proceeding that was triggered by the Company's NOI filing. Before the commencement of the NOI proceedings, Moroccanoil's claim, and the cross-motion by the Company, were proceeding in accordance with the civil procedures under New Jersey law for the adjudication of ordinary civil claims. However, in an insolvency context, where an unsecured creditor is unlikely to recover its claim as proven, the full procedural opportunities of normal civil litigation are often inappropriate. For this reason, the statutory regime in Canada under the BIA for summary determination of claims differs materially from the procedural rules for adjudication of civil claims.

[44] I read s. 135(1.1) of the BIA as unambiguously providing that the Proposal Trustee is required to determine whether Moroccanoil's claim is a provable claim and, if it is, that the Proposal Trustee value it. In Re Nortel Networks Corporation et al., 2015 ONSC 1354,

Justice Newbould, at para. 35, held, in the context of an insolvency under the CCAA, that a court should not lightly lose control of the process whereby claims against the debtor are to be determined. The requirement for claims to be determined and valued through a single claims process under the supervision of a single Bankruptcy Court is consistent with the scheme and objects of the insolvency process under the BIA.

[45] I conclude that the inherent jurisdiction of this Court under s. 183(1) of the BIA does not extend to displacing the claims process mandated by s. 135(1.1) of the BIA.

[46] If I am in error in this regard, I address whether this is one of the clear cases where the court's inherent jurisdiction should be exercised to displace the process for valuation of claims provided for in the BIA.

[47] The Proposal Trustee submits that adjudication of the Moroccanoil Claim through the BIA proceedings would be impractical, unreasonable and unworkable. The Proposal Trustee contends that the valuation exercise would be one of disproportionate difficulty, scale, time, and cost, which would be borne by the estate of the Company rather than the litigants to the private disputes. The Proposal Trustee cites the complexity of the issues, the voluminous evidentiary record, the existence of issues of credibility, the choice of law and jurisdiction provisions in the settlement agreement, the likelihood of an appeal, the need to determine the Company's cross-motion, and the stage of the New Jersey litigation as factors that support the requested direction.

[48] Morrocanoil submits that any appeal of the Proposal Trustee's valuation of its claim should proceed to a judge of the Commercial List under s. 192(2) of the BIA to be heard as a trial of an issue by way of a streamlined process based on largely paper record and supplemented by viva voce evidence, as needed.

[49] I accept that valuation of the Moroccanoil Proof of Claim may be an exercise of some complexity. It is expected that there will be an appeal of the Proposal Trustee's valuation. Nevertheless, on the materials before me, I am not satisfied that the adjudication of Moroccanoil's Proof of Claim cannot be completed in this Court through process that, with the benefit of case management, will not be materially longer, less efficient, or more costly than continuing the civil proceedings in the New Jersey Court.

[50] If there is jurisdiction for this Court to give the requested direction, I am not satisfied that the Proposal Trustee has shown that this is one of the clear cases that justifies the exercise of discretion to depart from the usual process for valuation of claims under the BIA.

[51] I conclude that the Proposal Trustee is required to determine and value Moroccanoil's Proof of Claim pursuant to s. 135(1.1) of the BIA. I decline to give the requested direction.

Disposition

[52] For these reasons, the Proposal Trustee's motion for an order directing the Proposal Trustee to not undertake the adjudication of the Moroccanoil Claim and the Company's cross-motion under s. 135(1.1) of the BIA is dismissed.

2022 ONSC 3264 (CanLII)

[53] At the hearing of this motion, I did not receive oral submissions on the portion of the Proposal Trustee's motion for approval of the Sixth Report. I ask that counsel for the Proposal Trustee arrange an appointment before me to address this portion of the motion, which is adjourned.

[54] If the parties are unable to resolve costs, they may provide written submissions according to a schedule to be agreed upon and approved by me.

CORPORATION AGENCIES Ltd. v. HOME BANK OF CANADA.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, Viscounts Haldane and Finlay and Lords Wrenbury, Darling and Warrington. January 18, 1927.

The judgment of the Board was delivered by LORD WRENBURY: — The appellants, Corporation Agencies, Ltd. (hereinafter called the Company) are a limited company incorporated under the statutes of Canada. They carried on business in the City of Montreal as registrar and transfer agents for registering and transferring shares of the capital stock of certain commercial companies and agents and trustee and financial agents in reconstruction of certain companies. The Merchants Bank of Canada were their bankers. The president of the Company was one C. H. Cahan, Sr., one of His Majesty's counsel, a lawyer of wealth and position in Montreal. His son, C. H. Cahan, Jr., who was also one of His Majesty's counsel, was a director of the Company. One Bowler was secretary-treasurer. The respondents, the Home Bank of Canada, were the bankers of Cahan, Jr. Between the plaintiff Company and the defendant bank no relation, contractual, fiduciary or other, existed, save such as arose from the transactions presently mentioned.

This action was brought by the Company against the defendant bank, claiming payment of a sum of $209,028.12 (afterwards corrected to $205,960.37), being the amount of 94 cheques amounting to the sum last above-mentioned drawn upon the Company's account with the Merchants Bank, collected by the defendant bank through the Montreal Clearing House, and debited to the Company's account with the Merchants Bank. These 94 cheques were drawn at various dates between March 29, 1919, and December 20, 1919, and were as follows:—

" April, 1919—Three cheques	1,096.89
" May, 1919—Nine cheques	4,728.75
" June, 1919—Seven cheques	9,680.00
" July, 1919—One cheque	3,500.00
" Aug., 1919—Two cheques	1,850.00
" Sept., 1919—Ten cheques	14,668.96
" Oct., 1919—Twenty-one cheques	46,445.00
" Nov., 1919—Twenty-six cheques	79,220.27
To 20th Dec., 1919—Fourteen cheques	44,270.50
Total—Ninety-four cheques	$205,960.37

Cahan, Jr., who, as already stated, was a director of the Company, was during 1919 engaged in very extensive speculative dealings in stocks and shares on his own private account, and he in fraud of the Company made use of the Company's account with the Merchants Bank to assist his operations.

There is a device known in Canada as "kiting," which is described as follows:—"Kiting is a term used with regard to obtaining money by cheques passed through banks without value being deposited against the cheque—that is, kiting is an effort to obtain the use of money during the process of a cheque passing through one bank or through a clearing house to another, and perhaps through many more."

To this Bowler, who was examined as a witness for the defendant bank, adds that kiting is a means of getting credit for the time it takes to clear a cheque from one bank to another bank. Cheques are passed from one bank account to another, and credit is obtained at the bank into which they are paid, for which they are debited at the bank on which they are drawn.

During 1919 Cahan, Sr., was much engaged in business which took all his attention off the proceedings of the Company. Cahan, Jr. and Bowler were substantially in complete control of the Company's affairs, and it was in that state of things that the frauds of Cahan, Jr., which it is necessary to describe, were perpetrated.

The Company's by-laws contained a by-law as follows:—

"54. Contracts and engagements on behalf of the Company may be made, and cheques, bills of exchange, promissory notes, drafts and other negotiable paper may be made, drawn, accepted or endorsed by the Secretary-Treasurer acting jointly with the Manager or with any Director of the Company, or by the Manager acting jointly with any Director of the Company; or by any two Directors acting together; provided, however, that cheques, drafts, bills of exchange, promissory notes or other negotiable paper may be endorsed for deposit only in the Company's bank account by either the Manager or the Secretary-Treasurer acting alone."

The following is a copy of the first of the cheques in question, that of March 29, 1919:—

"No. 6080. Montreal, Mar. 29, 1919.

"Corporation Agencies, Limited.

"Pay to the order of C. H. Cahan, Junior, $500.00

"Five Hundred Dollars.

"Corporation Agencies, Limited.

"C. H. Cahan, Junior, Director.

"B. F. Bowler, Secretary-Treasurer.

"To the Merchants' Bank of Canada, Montreal."

Of the 94 cheques, 67, amounting to $146,429.87, were drawn as above; six, amounting to $16,530.50, were similar, except that they were drawn payable to the order of the defendant bank. The rest, 21 in number, amounting to $43,000, were drawn in the same way and were made payable to Cahan, Jr. or to agents of his, or to bearer. A few of the cheques, some 18 in number, were cashed over the counter. In all other cases the cheques were duly endorsed and were paid into Cahan Jr.'s account with the defendant bank, and were collected in ordinary course by the defendant bank through the Montreal Clearing House from the Merchants Bank. In the case of six cheques, "E. Wright, Director," instead of B. F. Bowler, was the second signature in addition to that of Cahan, Jr. No importance is attributed to this fact.

On the night of December 26-27, 1919, Cahan, Jr. absconded, and his whereabouts were subsequently unknown. The facts of the frauds he had committed then came to light.

Cahan, Jr. held a power of attorney from his father to draw upon three banking accounts which his father had, in each of which there was a substantial credit balance. He had also power to draw on the banking accounts of several companies. He was thus in a position to draw on some twelve banking accounts or more and to carry on "kiting" operations, and did so to a very large extent. The general effect of his operations may be described as follows:—He and Bowler (who was throughout a party to his proceedings) drew a cheque on the Merchants Bank. Cahan, Jr. paid it into his own private account at the defendant bank. At the moment when they drew that cheque there was in most cases no sufficient balance at the Merchants Bank to meet it. But on the same day Cahan, Jr. paid into that account a cheque drawn by him on some of the other accounts on which he had power to draw, with the result that the plaintiffs' account with the Merchants Bank was or at any rate became by the end of the day in credit to an amount sufficient to meet the cheque in his favour. An illustration may be given by taking the case of the first cheque, that of March 29, 1919, for $500. On March 29 the credit balance at the Merchants Bank was only $61.74. The cheque of March 29 was cleared on March 31. On March 29, $270 and on March 31 $250 were paid by Cahan, Jr. into the credit of the account, with the result that on March 31 there was enough to meet the cheque for $500 and to leave a credit balance of $81.74. This is a fair sample of what was done throughout. The 94 cheques were never met by monies of the plaintiffs. Cahan, Jr. simply paid in and drew out money which he was obtaining by fraud from his father's accounts or the other accounts which have been already mentioned. The plaintiffs' account with the Merchants Bank was never overdrawn except on one or two occasions to very small amounts. The cheques that came in and went out always offset each other. From March to December, 1919, no more than $5,890.34 was paid into the Merchants Bank and $8,402.35 drawn out in respect of the regular business of the Company. The difference between these two sums came out of the funds irregularly deposited by Cahan, Jr.

During the whole of that time the Company was practically dormant. All the rest of the payments into the account and the whole of the amount which was by the 94 cheques drawn out of the account had nothing to do with the Company's business or the Company's monies. The trial Judge, Duclos, J., (1925), 64 Que. S.C. 161, at p. 168, found as a fact that none of the 94 cheques were paid out of the Company's funds.

Having thus sketched the facts upon which the question arises, their Lordships go on to consider what is the law applicable to the case. The question here is whether the defendants had notice or knowledge. This is question of fact. In John v. Dodwell, [1918] A.C. 563, at p. 569, Lord Haldane, in delivering the judgment of this Board, said:—"When an agent is entrusted by his principal with property to be applied for the purposes of the latter, and to be accounted for on that footing, he is . . . . in a fiduciary position, and any third person taking from the agent a transfer of the property with knowledge of a breach of duty committed by him in making the transfer holds what has been transferred to him under a transmitted fiduciary obligation to account for it to the principal." And again at p. 570:—"If the appellants received such money with notice of the trust affecting it, they would be bound to account for it to the respondents." In John v. Dodwell, Williams, the manager for Dodwell & Co., who was authorized by Dodwell & Co., the plaintiffs (respondents) to draw, and who drew the cheques on the plaintiffs' account, employed the defendants (appellants) as his brokers and gave them cheques on the plaintiffs' account in payment for shares, and they received them with knowledge that Williams, without apparent authority, was drawing for his own purposes on the plaintiffs' funds. The case turned, as does the present case, on knowledge. If there was no knowledge, it has no application.

By virtue of art. 54 of the Company's by-laws Cahan, Jr. as a director, and Bowler as secretary-treasurer, were authorized to draw on the Company's account at the Merchants Bank, and they did so. Maclennan, J., the Judge before whom the action was first tried, considered, 57 D.L.R., at p. 356, that the form of the cheques on their face was notice of the fact that Cahan, Jr. was appropriating to his own use the Company's monies. Duff and Newcombe, JJ. (the minority Judges on the appeal), [1925] 4 D.L.R. 585, were of the same opinion. Their words (p. 595) are:—"Having notice, of which the cheques themselves were prima facie evidence, that Cahan, Jr., the defendant's endorser, was not entitled to the cheques." And again, at p. 602, " . . . . the cheque on its face is evidence of absence of authority, or the exercise of his powers for a purpose which is incompetent to him." Their Lordships do not agree. In their opinion Duclos, J., in the Superior Court was right in holding that the form of the cheques did not give notice and that the defendants had not notice.

For by way of illustration, take again the first cheque, that for $500, of March 29, 1919. When Cahan, Jr. paid that cheque into his account at the defendants' bank, suppose the bank had asked, "For what is this cheque given?" would he have been bound to answer? The cheque might have been for salary or for a sum due to Cahan, Jr. on any other account. The defendant bank had no duty to enquire as to the obligation in respect of which it was given. They would in ordinary course of business take the cheque and if on presentation to the Merchants Bank payment were refused, they would debit their customer with the amount.

During April three like cheques for $300, $498.74, and $298.15, were endorsed and handed to the defendant bank by Cahan, Jr. The practice of the Merchants Bank was not to issue a pass-book, but to render monthly accounts. Such monthly accounts were duly rendered for March and April, 1919, to the Company. These contained the cheques above referred to. Thus the plaintiffs knew (so far as the defendant bank had knowledge or reason to believe) that the March and April cheques, drawn as they were in favour of Cahan, Jr. were being accepted by the Company as being on their face in order. And so matters went on during the subsequent months, and a fortiori the defendant bank had every reason to believe, as successive monthly accounts were sent and no objection raised, that the cheques were legitimate and not in fraud of the Company. The Company were, unfortunately for them, in the hands of fraudulent agents, but the defendant bank had neither knowledge nor notice that that was so, and, in fact, from the unquestioned acceptance of the monthly accounts, were entitled to believe the contrary.

Moreover, the fact was that the plaintiffs' monies were not being appropriated and applied by Cahan, Jr. at all. His father's monies and the monies of the various companies on whose accounts he was entitled to draw and did draw were no doubt being misappropriated, but so far as the plaintiffs were concerned Cahan, Jr. was doing no more than paying into their account monies which did not belong to them and drawing out to the like amount monies with which the Company, in fact, had no concern. Neither the payments into nor the drawings out of the Company's account were authorized acts. The Company cannot repudiate the one and take the benefit of the other. They are, in fact, not concerned with either. The plaintiffs lost nothing by the kiting transactions. If they now recovered the $205,960.37 from the defendant bank they would be making that sum as a profit if they kept it, and if they did not keep it, but were compelled by action brought by those whom Cahan, Jr. defrauded to pay it over to Cahan, Sr. or others whom Cahan, Jr. defrauded, they would be giving effect to rights whose existence the Board cannot in this proceeding investigate or determine, and with which in this proceeding they have nothing to do, for Cahan, Sr. and the companies concerned are not parties to this litigation.

Upon both grounds, viz., that the defendant bank had not notice or knowledge and that, in fact, the Company have sustained no loss, their Lordships are of opinion that the majority in the Supreme Court are right, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

They will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Appeal dismissed.

APPEARANCES:

L. J. Boyd
for the Plaintiff

for the Defendants

W. Slemko
for the Third Party

2001 ABQB 412 (CanLII)

[1] This Special Chambers application is an appeal from the Master, who declined to grant the Defendants leave to issue a Third Party Notice after the expiry of the six-month period provided for by R. 66(4). The arguments have now expanded beyond those presented to the Master, and other related motions have been brought.

Background

[2] This action arises out of an incident that occurred on June 25, 1995. On that date the Plaintiff, Shannon Dean, was attempting to enter a wheelchair-accessible taxi by ascending a ramp designed for that purpose. As she went up the ramp, her wheelchair flipped over backwards, allegedly causing injury to her.

[3] The taxi in question was a van which had been converted to make it accessible for wheelchairs by the proposed Third Party, Creative Carriage Ltd. The taxi had been purchased by the City of Edmonton in about March of 1992, and from about October of 1992 and at the time of the incident was leased to one of the corporate Defendants for operation in the City. The Defendant, Stanley Kociniak, was operating the taxi on the date of the incident. For convenience, I will refer to Kociniak and the various corporate Defendants as the "Yellow Cab Defendants".

[4] Dean retained counsel, and a claim on her behalf was issued on March 19, 1997 against the Yellow Cab Defendants, the City of Edmonton, and the Province of Alberta. The claim has since been discontinued as against the Province.

[5] The Yellow Cab Defendants retained counsel, and filed a defence on June 5, 1997. No Third Party Notice was issued by them before December 5, 1997, which marked the end of the six-month period for doing so provided for in R. 66(4).

[6] The Yellow Cab Defendants now allege that shortly after the first round of examinations for discovery, which were held on December 11, 1997, (six days after the time for filing a Third Party Notice had expired) they began to suspect that there might be a defect in the design of the taxi. This meant that the proposed Third Party, Creative Carriage Ltd., might bear some responsibility for the damages alleged by Ms. Dean. The Yellow Cab Defendants sought out expert advice, and eventually were able to retain suitable experts in May of 1999. The wheelchair was inspected and tested on October 15, 1999, and the experts provided a written report dated November 27, 1999, apparently supporting the theory that the Third Parties might be liable.

[7] As a result of receiving the expert report, the Yellow Cab Defendants filed an application on December 14, 1999, seeking leave to issue a Third Party Notice against Creative Carriage Ltd., notwithstanding the expiry of the six-month limitation period in R. 66(4). The application first came before a Master on December 17, 1999, but was adjourned because the Yellow Cab Defendants had not served the proposed Third Party with the Notice of Motion. That service was effected, and the motion was finally argued on July 31, 2000. In a very short memorandum, the learned Master dismissed the application:

> As Ms. Boyd rightly points out, Yellow Cab had possession of the converted motor vehicle van at all times. Yellow Cab knew what the ramp was, physically, and if it thought that the ramp was not physically proper it had ample time to determine that and find out who the converter of the van was.
> Defendants cannot just lay by and later address a possible third party claim. The test is not as narrow as when the defendant in fact knows, but when the defendant should have known with reasonable diligence. Here the Plaintiff's pleading raises the physical aspects of the ramp as an issue so the Defendants should have been reasonably alerted at that time that the physical aspects of the ramp were in issue.
> The application is dismissed with costs to the Plaintiff and the proposed third party on Column 5. There will be no stay of the taxation and payment of those costs between the Plaintiff and the Defendants.

[8] Faced with this decision, the Yellow Cab Defendants did two things. Firstly, they filed an appeal against the decision of the Master, which is one of the applications presently under consideration. Secondly, on September 19, 2000, some of the Yellow Cab Defendants and the City of Edmonton issued a new Statement of Claim, being Action No. 0003-17884, claiming contribution and indemnity from Creative Carriage Ltd. with respect to any damages they might have to pay to Ms. Dean under the first action. The Yellow Cab Defendants apply now, in the alternative, to have the two actions heard together. Counsel for Creative Carriage Ltd. has brought a further application under R. 129, seeking to strike out this second claim on the basis that it discloses no cause of action.

[9] Both the appeal from the Master and the motion to strike were scheduled to be argued on December 20, 2000. Shortly before that date Mr. Justice Burrows suggested to the parties that the materials filed did not adequately deal with certain decisions of the Court of Appeal, and the impact of the various statutes of limitation on the proceedings. The parties were granted time to file further materials, and the applications came on for hearing on April 18, 2001.

Issues:

[11] The issues to be decided are, accordingly, the following:

1. Is the claim of the Yellow Cab Defendants for contribution and indemnity from Creative Carriage Ltd. barred by statute? If it is, there is no point in allowing a late Third Party Notice, as it would immediately be the subject of an application for summary dismissal. A preliminary issue is which limitations statute applies to the claim.

2. If the claim is not barred by statute, should the late issuance of a Third Party Notice be permitted at this time? Alternatively, should the two actions that have been commenced be consolidated or otherwise tried together?

The Pleadings:

[12] The action commenced by Ms. Dean is a conventional tort action. She alleges that the Yellow Cab Defendants and the City of Edmonton negligently operated the taxi and its wheelchair ramp in such a way as to cause her damage. Her Statement of Claim provides particulars of negligence which include the following:

> 10(d) Failing to warn users of the entrance ramp to the taxi of the steep and uneven surface of the entrance ramp,
> (f) Acquiring, designing or installing entrance ramp equipment in the taxi that was unsafe for its intended purpose.

The original claim, accordingly, contains some suggestion that the design of the ramp may have contributed to her injuries, but it did not specifically mention the transition plate between the ramp and the van itself.

[13] The Third Party Notice that the Yellow Cab Defendants and the City propose to issue is more detailed. It contains the following allegations:

> 4. The Third Parties owed a tortuous [sic] duty of care to the Plaintiff and these Defendants including converting and/or selling the taxi that had a safe ramp generally and specifically that the Taxi's ramp and/or transition plate was not too steep for the reasonable circumstances intended.
> 5. The Plaintiff's wheelchair fell over backwards as a result of, or was materially contributed by, the negligence of the Third Parties, particulars of which include:

(a) converting and/or selling the Taxi with an unsafe entry ramp for the wheelchair and specifically an unsafe transition plate between the ramp and the van;

(b) converting and/or selling the Taxi which did not meet CSA/CAN D409 standards, as amended, as represented by the Third Parties;

(c) converting and/or selling the Taxi which had a ramp and/or transition plate which was too steep for the circumstances reasonably intended;

(d) such further and other particulars as are known to the Third Parties.

7. In the alternative, the Third Parties breached an express or implied contract or warranty to the Defendant, The City of Edmonton, to convert and/or sell a wheelchair assessable [sic] van to it constructed in a workman-like manner, free from defects in materials, fit for reasonable use, free from major structural defects, and constructed in accordance with reasonable manufacturing or conversion practice including specifically those set out in CSA/CAN D409 standards, as amended.

The proposed Third Party Notice accordingly sounds primarily in tort, although the City of Edmonton also alleges in Paragraph 7 a cause of action based on breach of contract.

[14] The new Statement of Claim issued by certain of the Yellow Cab Defendants and the City of Edmonton against Creative Carriage Ltd. is largely to the same effect:

11. The City of Edmonton agreed to purchase the Taxi from Creative Carriage Ltd. based on certain representations including that the Taxi complied with CAS/CAN D409 standards, including a standard for the Ramp characteristics and specifications.

12. Creative Carriage Ltd. owed a tortious duty of care to Shannon Dean and the Plaintiffs in this Action which included that Creative Carriage Ltd. would manufacture and/or convert the Taxi so that it had a safe Ramp generally and specifically that the Taxi's Ramp and/or transition plate was not too steep for the circumstances intended.

13. In the alternative, Creative Carriage Ltd. had an express or implied contract or warranty with Shannon Dean and/or the Plaintiffs, or any of them, in this Action to manufacture, convert and/or sell the Taxi constructed in a workmanlike manner, free from defects in materials, fit for reasonable use, free from structural defects and constructed in accordance with reasonable manufacturing or conversation practice including specifically those set out in CSA/CAN D409 standards, as amended.

14. Shannon Dean's wheelchair tipped over backwards as a result of, or was materially contributed to by, the negligence and/or breach of contract or warranty of Creative Carriage Ltd. particulars of which include:

(a) Manufacturing and/or converting the Taxi with an unsafe Ramp for a wheelchair and/or a [sic] unsafe transition plate between the Ramp and the body of the Taxi;

(b) Manufacturing and/or converting the Taxi which did not meet CSA/CAN D409 standards, as amended, as represented by Creative Carriage Ltd.;

(c) Manufacturing and/or converting the Taxi which had a Ramp and/or transition plate which was too steep for the circumstances reasonably intended; and

(d) Such further and other particulars as are known to Creative Carriage Ltd.

[15] By Clause 11 the City of Edmonton alleges a claim in misrepresentation relating to the contract of purchase. Clauses 12 and 14 largely repeat the allegations in tort found in the proposed Third Party Notice. Clause 13 pleads a breach of contract. While this latter clause alleges that there might have been a contract with Ms. Dean or the Yellow Cab Defendants, the record is clear that the taxi was originally purchased by the City of Edmonton from Creative Carriage Ltd., and subsequently leased to the Yellow Cab Defendants. There is no suggestion of any contract between the Yellow Cab Defendants or Ms. Dean and Creative Carriage Ltd.

The Claim for Contribution and Statutes of Limitation

[16] There are, broadly speaking, two different kinds of claims for contribution and indemnity. The first kind is a claim for contribution and indemnity by one joint tort-feasor against another. This type of claim is purely a creation of statute. The other type of claim for contribution arises at common law where one person has a duty, usually contractual, to indemnify another.

[17] At common law, a Plaintiff who had been injured by the acts of a number of tort-feasors was under no obligation to sue all of them. The Plaintiff could sue any one of the tort-feasors, and recover 100 percent of his or her damages from that tort-feasor. The tort-feasor held liable then had no right to claim contribution from the other joint tort-feasors according to their relative responsibility. For example, a tort-feasor who was only 10 percent at fault might be found liable for 100 percent of the damages, but would then have no claim against the tort-feasor who was 90 percent at fault. All common-law jurisdictions have remedied this inequity by enacting statutes like the Alberta Tort-Feasors Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. T-6, which provide for a right of contribution. This right of contribution is purely statutory.

[18] Other rights of contribution or indemnity can arise at common law. They depend on circumstances where one of the potential defendants owes a duty recognized by the common law to identify or contribute to the other potential defendants. The duty to indemnify may arise by contract. For example, in this action it is alleged that the Yellow Cab Defendants by contract must indemnify the City of Edmonton for any damages suffered by the Plaintiff. A common-law right to indemnify can also arise where the tort-feasor being asked to contribute owes a duty to the other tort-feasor which is independent of the duty owed to the Plaintiff. For example, an auditor may owe a duty to its corporate client not to be negligent. It may also owe a duty to other persons, such as directors, shareholders, or bankers which is independent of its duty to its corporate client. In these circumstances, the duty to contribute does not depend on the Tort-Feasors Act: Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation v. Prisco, [1998] 3 W.W.R. 256, 54 Alta. L.R. (3d) 334, 206 A.R. 290 (C.A.) at paragraphs 7-8.

[19] From the pleadings quoted above, it is obvious that the claim of the Yellow Cab Defendants in both the Third Party Notice and the second action rest largely on the provisions of the Tort-Feasors Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. T-6 and largely on s. 3(1)(c) which reads as follows:

> 3(1) When damage is suffered by any person as a result of a tort, whether a crime or not,
> > (c) any tort-feasor liable in respect of that damage may recover contribution from any other tort-feasor who is or would, if sued, have been liable in respect of the same damage, whether as a joint tort-feasor or otherwise, but no person is entitled to recover contribution under this section from any person entitled to be indemnified by him in respect of the liability regarding which the contribution is sought.

This provision was interpreted by the Court of Appeal in another decision called Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. v. Prisco, [1996] 7 W.W.R. 30, 181 A.R. 161, 38 Alta. L.R. (3d) 97, which I will refer to hereafter as "Prisco". The Court determined that the rights created by s. 3(1)(c) are derivative, in the sense that the claim of a Defendant tort-feasor for contribution from a Third Party tort-feasor is derivative of the claim of the Plaintiff against that Third Party. If the Plaintiff has no possible claim against the Third Party, neither does the Defendant tort-feasor. This rule applies, for example, if the claim of the Plaintiff against the Third Party is barred by a statute of limitations; in that event the Defendant tort-feasor can make no claim for contribution against the Third Party tort-feasor.

[20] In Prisco, Kerans, J.A. made it clear that it is only claims for contribution under the Tort-Feasors Act that are derivative in nature. At paragraph 9 he pointed out that:

> The appellant Oland's third party notice pleads that those named by it as third parties share any duty Oland may have to the plaintiffs in this suit. The plaintiff's suit against Oland sounds in negligence, and he in his notice alleges that the third parties were fellow tortfeasors. This is not a case where the defendant invokes a duty owed by the third party to the defendants; it is only a claim by the defendant of a breach of a duty owed to the plaintiff. This > classification was made in an earlier order that was not the subject of appeal. I must now deal with the consequences of that classification.

> (emphasis added)

2001 ABQB 412 (CanLII)

This distinction must be kept in mind, because at least a portion of the claim for contribution and indemnity made by the City of Edmonton against Creative Carriage arises from contract, and not under the Tort-Feasors Act.

The Problem of the "Late Suing Plaintiff"

[21] As the Court of Appeal also pointed out in Prisco, the derivative nature of the claim for contribution under the Tort-Feasors Act can create a problem for tort-feasors, particularly when the Plaintiff sues very late in the limitation period. In these circumstances the tort-feasor might not find out about the claim against it, and therefore might not be in a position to advance the claim for contribution, until the limitation period has already expired. The law of Alberta formerly provided two solutions to this problem of the "late suing Plaintiff":

(a) Rule 66(4) provides that a Defendant can issue a Third Party Notice within six months of filing its defence. A claim for contribution in such a Third Party Notice is deemed by the law to be within time, even if the primary limitation which runs against the Plaintiff has expired. This is a general remedial provision which applies to all types of claims;

(b) in addition, s. 60 of the Limitation of Actions Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. L-15 provided specific relief as follows:

> 60(1) When an action to which this Part applies has been commenced, the lapse of time limited by this Part for bringing an action is no bar to
> (a) proceedings by counterclaim, including the adding of a new party as a defendant by counterclaim, or
>
> (b) third party proceedings,
> with respect to any claims relating to or connected with the subject matter of the action.

As can be seen, the relief in s. 60 only applies to claims covered by Part 9 of the Limitation of Actions Act which are essentially tort actions for personal injury and damage to property. In the Prisco case the tort claim was one for pure economic loss, and therefore not covered by Part 9. This meant that the longer six-year limitation applied to the Plaintiff's claim, but even that longer limitation had run by the time the application was brought. Since six months had elapsed since the defence was filed, and the primary limitation period against the Plaintiff had run, the Defendant tort-feasor in that action was unable to issue a Third Party Notice or a fresh claim for contribution. Since the claim for contribution was statute barred, there was no point in allowing a late Third Party Notice.

[22] A brief history of these two remedial provisions is appropriate, to put the provisions of the new Limitations Act in context. The first attempt to deal with the problem of the "late suing plaintiff" was found in s. 101(2) of the Vehicles and Highway Traffic Act, S.A. 1941, Chapter 5. That provision applied only to motor vehicle accidents, and accordingly left all other tort claims unaffected. Tort-feasors outside the motor vehicle context had no protection if the Plaintiff sued some only of the tort-feasors very late in the limitation period, thus effectively preventing the Defendant from claiming contribution against any unnamed tort-feasors. When Part 9 of the Limitation of Actions Act was enacted in 1966, the relief previously provided by the Vehicles and Highway Traffic Act was carried forward into s. 60 of the new Part 9. Relief was now available for all tort-feasors covered by Part 9, although some tort-feasors, such as those who had caused pure economic loss, still had no relief.

[23] The Third Party Rule was not always helpful in filling in these statutory gaps. Prior to the new Rules coming into force in 1969, the relevant parts of old R. 81 read as follows:

> 81. . . .Such notice shall be stamped with the seal with which statements of claim are sealed and a copy filed with the clerk, and the same shall be served within the time limited for delivering the defence.

Since the "time limited for delivering the defence" was 15 days after the service of the Statement of Claim, the Defendant had virtually no time in which to issue its Third Party Notice. Even if the Plaintiff indulged the Defendant and extended the time for filing a defence, that would not extend the time for filing a Third Party Notice. Rule 81 was largely procedural, not remedial.

[24] The 1969 Rules provided some relief in new R. 66(4):

> (4) A third-party notice should be sealed with the court's seal and shall, unless the court otherwise orders, be filed with the clerk of the court before the defendant has filed his defence or demand of notice, been noted in default, or has had judgment entered against him, and shall be served within 15 days from the filing.

The time for filing a Third Party Notice was now extended to when the Defendant actually defended. By extending the time to defend, the Plaintiff could effectively extend the time to claim contribution. This was the form of the rule considered in J.R. Paine & Assoc. Ltd. v. Strong, Lamb & Nelson Ltd., [1979] 6 W.W.R. 353, 103 D.L.R. (3d) 579, 18 A.R. 112, 11 C.P.C. 215 (C.A.).

[25] J.R. Paine was one of the early cases that confirmed the derivative nature of a claim for contribution under the Tort-Feasors Act. In that case the owner had retained Woolfenden Architects to design a building. Woolfenden retained sub-consultants, including J.R. Paine & Assoc., and the proposed Third Party, Strong, Lamb & Nelson Ltd. When problems arose, the owner sued Woolfenden, J.R. Paine & Assoc., and others, but not Strong, Lamb & Nelson. As Laycraft, J.A. noted, at p. 355:

> The action was commenced on April 12, 1977. . .Paine filed its statement of defence more than a year after the statement of claim was issued. A few days later it obtained a fiat permitting it to issue the third party notice out of time.

Under the rule then in effect, the Third Party Notice could not be filed once the defence was filed. The Court confirmed that the time for J.R. Paine & Assoc. to claim contribution from Strong, Lamb & Nelson ran from when time ran against the Plaintiff. Fortunately for J.R. Paine & Assoc., s. 60 of the Limitation of Actions Act applied to permit the late Third Party Notice.

[26] Shortly after J.R. Paine was decided (and perhaps as a result of it) R. 66(4) was amended to its present form by Alta. Reg. 313/81:

> (4) A third party notice shall be sealed with the Court seal, filed with the Clerk of the Court within 6 months from the time the defendant has filed his defence or demand of notice, but before he has been noted in default or has had judgment entered against him, and served within 30 days of filing.

The Defendant presently has six months from actually defending to issue a Third Party Notice.

[27] The trend in both the statutory provisions, and the Rules, has been to expand the relief available to tort-feasors in cases of "late suing plaintiffs".

The New Limitations Act and Claims for Contribution

[28] The new Limitations Act, S.A. 1996, c. L-15.1 came into force in Alberta on March 1, 1999. The new Act does not appear to affect the operation of R. 66(4), and accordingly claims for contribution can presumably still be brought within six months of the filing of the defence. (It is not necessary to decide in this case what effect the ten-year ultimate limitation in the new Act may have on R. 66.) Section 60 of the old Limitation of Actions Act is not carried forward. The new Act deals with the problem of a claim for contribution where the Plaintiff has sued late in the limitation period by the general application of the "discoverability" rule, and also in s. 6 which deals with "Claims Added to a Proceeding".

[29] The new Act creates a general limitation period (which I will refer to as the "primary" limitation) of two years from discoverability, with an "ultimate" limitation of ten years from when the claim arises, regardless of discoverability. The primary limitation period is set out in s. 3(1):

> 3(1) Subject to section 11, if a claimant does not seek a remedial order within
> (a) 2 years after the date on which the claimant first knew, or in the circumstances ought to have known,
>
> (i) that the injury for which the claimant seeks a remedial order had occurred,
>
> (ii) that the injury was attributable to conduct of the defendant, and
>
> (iii) that the injury, assuming liability on the part of the defendant, warrants bringing a proceeding,
> (b) 10 years after the claim arose.

[30] Before proceeding further, it is appropriate to make some comment about the terminology used in the new Limitations Act. The Act very sensibly uses the neutral term "claimant" to describe the person seeking a remedial order, as opposed to the technical terms "Plaintiff", "Applicant", "Petitioner", or "Appellant". The latter terms are all terms of art used in the Rules of Court. Unfortunately, the Act does use the word "defendant" to describe the person against whom the remedial order is sought. This terminology is unfortunate, because "Defendant" is also a technical term under the Rules of Court. Under the terms of the Limitations Act, the "defendant" can in fact be a "Defendant", "Third Party", "Defendant by Counterclaim", or "Respondent". This terminology is confusing in a case such as this one, where the Defendant (Yellow Cab et al) is really the "claimant" under the Act (i.e., the person seeking a remedial order), and the proposed Third Party (Creative Carriage) is the "defendant" as that term is used in the Act.

[31] The broad meaning of the term "defendant" can be seen in s. 1(c) of the Act, which states: "'defendant' means a person against whom a remedial order is sought." This is in accordance with Report No. 55 of the Alberta Law Reform Institute which lead to the passing of the new Act, which stated at p. 50: "The word 'defendant', defined in clause 1(c), would include third party defendants."

[32] The new Act does not provide any specific guidance with respect to when the primary limitation starts to run on a contribution claim. With respect to the ultimate limitation period, s. 3(3)(e) reads as follows:

> (e) A claim for contribution arises when the claimant for contribution is made a defendant in respect of, or incurs a liability through the settlement of, a claim seeking > to impose a liability upon which the claim for contribution can be based, whichever first occurs.

This provision relates to when the claim "arises" for the purposes of the ultimate limitation period. It specifically does not relate to the discoverability of such a claim, with respect to the primary limitation period. This is because the ten-year ultimate limitation does not depend on the discoverability of the claim, and indeed operates notwithstanding a lack of discoverability.

[33] Under the new Act, the primary limitation with respect to a claim for contribution depends on the general wording of s. 3(1)(a). To paraphrase, inserting the terminology as discussed in paragraph 30 (supra) the section would read as follows with respect to a contribution claim:

> If a defendant does not seek contribution within two years after the date on which the defendant first knew, or in the circumstances ought to have known, that the injury for which the defendant seeks a remedial order had occurred, then the third party is entitled to immunity from the claim for contribution.

The key is the definition of "the injury" in the case of a claim for contribution. Is a reference to "the injury" a reference to the injury suffered by the Plaintiff for which the Defendant now seeks contribution from the Third Party? Alternatively, is "the injury" the potential liability of the Defendant, which triggers the right to contribution from the Third Party?

> (f) "injury" means
>
> (i) personal injury,
>
> (ii) property damage,
>
> (iii) economic loss,
>
> (iv) non-performance of an obligation, or
> (v) in the absence of any of the above, the breach of a duty.

The definition is not too helpful in this context. If the word "injury" is read as meaning "personal injury", then it would suggest that the time begins to run from when the Defendant knew or ought to have known of the injury to the Plaintiff. However, if the "injury" is the non-performance of the obligation of the Third Party tort-feasor to contribute to the Defendant, or the breach of a duty of the Third Party tort-feasor in not contributing to the claim against the Defendant, that would suggest that the relevant time is when the Defendant knew or ought to have known that a claim had been advanced against him, and that the proposed Third Party tort-feasor was liable to contribute to any damages that might fall upon the Defendant.

[35] The first option, that the injury referred to is the injury to the Plaintiff, would appear to be consistent with the decision in Prisco. Prisco decided that the claim for contribution is merely derivative of the Plaintiff's claim against the proposed Third Party. Since the Limitations Act does not purport to amend the Tort-Feasors Act, such an interpretation is possible. It would mean, however, that every claim for contribution would have to be made within two years of the underlying incident in cases like this where the Plaintiff immediately "discovers" her injury. In other words, the problem of the late suing plaintiff identified in Prisco would occur in every case, without the ameliorating affects of s. 60 of the old Limitation of Actions Act. Defendants would have to rely exclusively on R. 66(4), and successful applications for late Third Party Notices would be rare.

[36] Assuming the new Act applied, this interpretation of the new Act would mean that the Yellow Cab claim for contribution would have to have been made: (a) within a separate action within two years of the incident, which would have meant before June 25, 1997, or (b) under R. 66(4) within six months of the Defence, which would have meant before December 5, 1997. As can be seen, both the new Yellow Cab action, and the proposed Third Party Notice are out of time on this interpretation.

> 6(1) Notwithstanding the expiration of the relevant limitation period, when a claim is added to a proceeding previously commenced, either through a new pleading or an amendment to pleadings, the defendant is not entitled to immunity from liability in respect of the added claim if the requirements of subsections 2, 3 or 4 are satisfied.
> (4) When the added claim adds or substitutes a defendant, or changes the capacity in which a defendant is sued,
>
> (a) the added claim must be related to the conduct, transaction of events described in the original pleading in the proceeding, and
>
> (b) the defendant must have received, within the limitation period applicable to the added claim plus the time provided by law for the service of process, sufficient knowledge of the added claim that the defendant will not be prejudiced in maintaining a defence to it on the merits.

If the claim for contribution is "derivative" and the "added claim" relates to the original injury to the Plaintiff, the Yellow Cab Defendants would only be entitled to add the Third Parties under s. 6 of the new Act if they could demonstrate that the proposed Third Parties had received knowledge of the claim within three years of the incident. To give an example, assume that a Plaintiff in a personal injury action issued the Statement of Claim a few days short of the two-year limitation period, naming only one tort-feasor as a Defendant. Assume further that for some reason the Plaintiff does not then serve the Statement of Claim on the named Defendant until the very end of the one-year period provided for in R. 11. The named Defendant might well first receive notice of the claim very shortly before the expiry of the three-year period provided for in s. 6, essentially making it impossible to assert any claim for contribution, except under R. 66. This example is not farfetched. Some Plaintiff's counsel deliberately delay issuing and serving the Statement of Claim as long as possible, as it allows them to control the medical records relating to the Plaintiff's condition for the first three years after the accident. A late service of the pleadings in this way prevents the Defendant from having access to the medical records of the Plaintiff, and from conducting any medical examinations under R. 217. Assuming that the new Act, and particularly s. 6, does not affect the operation of R. 66(4), the Defendant would still have six months from defending to claim contribution.

[38] Alternatively, one could argue that the real "injury", complained of by the Defendant is the failure of the proposed Third Party joint tort-feasor to contribute to the damages. It is this injury that warrants the Defendant bringing proceedings against the Third Party, and this interpretation fits more easily with the wording of Clause 3(1)(a)(iii) of the new Act. This does not mean that the new Act has amended the Tort-Feasors Act. The claim under the Tort-Feasors Act remains derivative. This interpretation simply means that the new Limitations Act operates more like R. 66(4), which allows the claim for contribution to be made even if the primary limitation has run against the Plaintiff. The new Act would effectively be read as providing in all cases the relief that old s. 60 provided only in some cases.

[39] The new Limitations Act arose from a report prepared by the Alberta Law Reform Institute on limitations. This report was issued in December 1989, several years before the decision of the Court of Appeal in Prisco. The Institute proceeded on the assumption that the "injury" in the case of a claim for contribution was the failure to contribute (not the injury to the Plaintiff) and that it would arise only when the Defendant was held liable to the Plaintiff. The Institute appears to have proceeded on the assumption (Report No. 55, page 72, paragraph 61 and page 87, paragraph 31(b)) that this was the existing state of the law, although as Prisco later confirmed, this was only the case in claims for contribution arising otherwise than under the Tort-Feasors Act. Of course, if the limitation on a claim for contribution does not arise until the Defendant is actually found liable to the Plaintiff, the Defendant will seldom, if ever, lose the claim for contribution to a limitation period even if the Plaintiff has commenced the action very late. It is for this reason that the Institute recommended (Report No. 55, page 71) the inclusion of Clause 3(3)(e), which I have set out in paragraph 32 above. This clause has the effect of starting the running of the ultimate limitation period somewhat earlier, and helps prevent the potential Third Party tort-feasor from being exposed to stale claims for contribution. The Institution's assumptions about the law also would mean that there was no particular reason to save a clause like s. 60 of the old Limitation of Actions Act, as the operation of a new Act would actually be quite generous to defendants who might seek contribution.

[40] This assumption by the Institute may also explain the apparently narrow scope of s. 6 of the new Limitations Act, which relates to "Claims Added to a Proceeding", and which I have set out in paragraph 37 above. This provision might well come into play in the situation that arose in the Prisco case, or indeed the circumstances of this case. When the time provided for in R. 66(4) has expired, and a Defendant wishes to make a claim for contribution, that claim might be advanced either by adding the unnamed tort-feasor as a Defendant, or else by issuing a late Third Party Notice against it. (It must be recalled that the term "defendant" as used in the Act includes a "third party"). In these situations, the claim for contribution will generally be related to the "conduct, transaction or events" which comprise the main claim, as required by s. 6(4)(a). The difficulty will generally be that the unnamed tort-feasor may not have acquired knowledge about the "added claim" during the primary limitation period (two years from discoverability) plus the time for service of process (one year, under R. 11). In this particular case it may have required that Creative Carriage, the proposed Third Party, have received knowledge about the claim within three years following the actual incident on June 25, 1995, assuming that the "added claim" is the derivative claim under the Tort-Feasors Act. If the "added claim " is the claim for contribution, time would run from discoverability of the claim for contribution. The Institute (Report No. 55, page 88, paragraph 31(b)) assumed the latter and so concluded that s. 6(4) would only be applicable, in practical terms, to a claim for contribution when the ten-year ultimate limitation was involved.

[41] The Limitations Act must of course be interpreted in accordance with its terms, using the traditional methods of statutory interpretation. The report of the Institute is a helpful guide, but it cannot affect the plain meaning of the words of the statute, even if the proper statutory meaning as interpreted by the Court differs from the meaning intended by the Institute: P.-A. Côté, The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada (3d ed.), at p. 418.

[42] I have concluded that the proper interpretation of the new Limitations Act as it applies to a claim for contribution is that the "injury" referred to in s. 3(1)(a) is the failure of the Third Party to contribute to the Defendant as called for in the Tort-Feasors Act. In other words, the limitation on the claim for contribution under the Tort-Feasors Act does not begin to run when the limitation begins to run as against the Plaintiff. The new Limitations Act operates instead the same way as R. 66(4).

[43] This is more consistent with the plain wording of the statute. To hold otherwise would deprive s. 3(3)(e), which sets out the ultimate limitation period for claims of contribution, of virtually any meaning, at least in the case of claims for contribution under the Tort-Feasors Act, as few claims would ever survive the primary limitation period. Under the interpretation I have found, there is still room for the operation of s. 6, which relates to adding claims to a proceeding. This section would still be effective where, for example, the Plaintiff sues "XYZ Ltd.", but it should have sued "XYZ Co.". In these misnomer cases, the real tort-feasor often has actual knowledge of the claim, and is relying on the limitation statute in a manner not intended. Section 6 will allow them to be added late. The section would also have some application where discussions are underway with a tort-feasor who is not a party to the action, but is fully aware of the claim. Such tort-feasors would not be entitled to immunity, even if they are not added to the proceedings in a timely way. Under the previous law, this situation was dealt with by arguing that the tort-feasor was estopped from relying on the limitation period, or that the tort-feasor had entered into a "standstill" agreement. (Of course, s. 6 would have no application if no claim whatsoever had been started against any tort-feasor, as it only applies to claims added to existing proceedings.)

[44] I also find this interpretation to be more consistent with the overall remedial intent of the new Act, as the opposite interpretation would exacerbate the previous problem of claims for limitation becoming statute barred before the Defendant even finds out he has a need to claim contribution. I have outlined above the history of R. 66 and s. 60 of the Limitation of Actions Act. The legislative history shows a trend towards making relief for the "late suing plaintiff" problem more general. The interpretation of the new Limitations Act that I have identified is consistent with this trend. I believe it would be inconsistent with the intention of the Legislature to adopt a narrower interpretation of the remedial provisions for this particular problem.

[45] This interpretation has the added advantage that the limitation period applicable to contribution claims at common law and under the Tort-Feasors Act would begin to run at the same point. The problem of the "late suing plaintiff" is most particularly a problem with the derivative claim for contribution under the Tort-Feasors Act. It did not arise with respect to contribution claims recognized by common law, because the previous law was that time did not run against such claims until judgment had been obtained against the Defendant seeking contribution. Under the new Act, time in all cases will run from when the Defendant knew or ought to have known that there was a claim for contribution. The philosophy of the new Act is to provide general limitation periods applicable to all circumstances; one of the objectives of the new Act was to sweep away the myriad limitation periods and exceptions to them found in the old statutory regime. It is consistent with that objective to find there is only one limitation period applicable to claims for contribution and indemnity of all kinds. I do not necessarily concur with the assumption of the Institute that the injury only arises when the Defendant is actually found liable to the Plaintiff (as opposed to when the Defendant knew or ought to know of the claim and the right to contribution), but I need not consider that point, and I make no further comment on it.

Which Act Applies?

[46] As the new Limitations Act deals with claims for contribution differently, it is necessary to examine which statute applies to these facts. The new Limitations Act was proclaimed in force on March 1, 1999. In s. 16 it provides that the Limitation of Actions Act is repealed. Section 2(1.1) of the Act provides for the transition between the old regime and the new regime.

> (1.1) Subject to sections 11 and 13, if, before this Act comes into force, the claimant knew, or in the circumstances ought to have known, of a claim and the claimant has not sought a remedial order before the earlier of
> (a) the time provided by the Limitation of Actions Act that would have been applicable but for this Act, or
> (b) 2 years after the coming into force of this Act, > the defendant, on pleading this Act as a defence, is entitled to immunity from liability in respect of the claim.

The section essentially says that a proposed claimant has to bring an action within the time limited by the old Limitation of Actions Act, or two years after the coming into force of the new Act, whichever is earlier. This provision had the effect of cutting short limitations under the old statute which might have extended beyond March 1, 2001.

[47] The new Act provides for its general scope of operation as follows:

> 2(1) This Act applies where a claimant seeks a remedial order in a proceeding commenced after this Act comes into force, whether the claim arises before or after the coming into force of this Act.

The new Act does not define what a "proceeding" would include. It would clearly seem to apply to any new action, such as the second action commenced by the Yellow Cab Defendants on September 19, 2000. That action is clearly governed by the provisions of the new Act.

[48] The first question is whether the Notice of Motion filed on November 14, 1999 to issue a Third Party Notice out of time, and presumably the resulting Third Party Notice, are "a proceeding commenced after this Act comes into force".

[49] The parties all assumed that the Third Party Notice was covered by the new Act, based on Manufacturers' Life Insurance Co. v. Husky Oil Marketing Co. (1999), 249 A.R. 305. This case involved damage caused by leakage from some underground gasoline storage tanks, which had been installed in approximately 1979. An action was commenced in 1996 as a result of this damage. Lands Happy Marts, one of the parties in this litigation, filed a Defence to Third Party Notice on January 18, 1998. It then issued a Fourth Party Notice on March 12, 1999 against Keller Construction Ltd. The Fourth Party Notice was issued more than six months after the Defence to Third Party Notice and Keller brought an application to strike it out on the basis that the Fourth Party proceedings were barred by the Limitation of Actions Act. The Court held, inter alia, that the Fourth Party Notice was a "proceeding" within the meaning of s. 2(1) of the new Limitations Act, without setting out the reasoning by which it came to this conclusion. This finding also appears to be obiter, because the Court determined that the action in question was governed by the old Limitation of Actions Act, as it fell within the transitional period provided for in s. 2(1.1)(a). As a result, the Court applied the six-year limitation period found in the old Act, and did not have to consider the impact of the "two year from discovery" limitation provided in the new Act. The Court also did not have to consider the impact that s. 6 of the new Act might have had on the Fourth Party Notice. Since the Third Party Notice in this action also falls in the transitional period, it is not necessary for me to consider this point further. Either the Third Party Notice is not a "proceeding" and so outside the new Act and covered by the old Act, or it is covered by the old Act because of the transitional provisions of the new Act.

[50] This leads to the interesting result that the new action commenced by the Yellow Cab Defendants is governed by the new Act, but the proposed Third Party Notice they wish to issue, and which covers essentially the same substantive claims, is governed by the old Act. This is a natural result of the operation of the transitional provisions in the new Act which on the facts of this case essentially provide that during the transitional period the old Act applies.

The Position Under the two Statutes

[51] To summarize, when the Limitation of Actions Act was in force, the claim of a Defendant for contribution under the Tort-Feasors Act was derivative of the Plaintiff's claim against the Third Party. When time ran against the Plaintiff, it also had run against the Defendant. While the general limitation period for personal injury was two years, s. 60(1) provided that the two-year limitation did not apply to Third Party proceedings. Since the time "limited by this Part" did not run, that brought into play the general six-year limitation found in s. 4(1)(g) of the statute. Accordingly, the Defendant had the ability to make a separate claim for contribution within six years of the Plaintiff's injury, or to add the joint tort-feasor as a Third Party within six months of filing its defence under R. 66(4).

[52] In this particular case, the Plaintiff's injury occurred and would have been discoverable on June 25, 1995. Six years from that date is June 25, 2001, which would have been the limitation period under the old s. 60, excepting that it was truncated to February 28, 2001 by the transitional provisions of the new Act. The application to add the Third Party was filed on December 14, 1999, and is within the statutory limitation, although the Third Party Notice is outside the six-month period in R. 66(4). As I have previously mentioned, one factor to be considered in allowing a late Third Party Notice is whether the underlying limitation period has expired. If it has, there is no point in permitting a late Third Party Notice, as it will be subject to summary dismissal. However, if the underlying limitation has not run, it is possible to permit a late Third Party Notice if the circumstances are otherwise suitable. I will discuss those circumstances later in these reasons. There is, however, no limitations impediment to a late Third Party Notice.

[53] The second action commenced by the Yellow Cab Defendants is governed by the new Act. Under the new Limitations Act, the time runs against the Defendant seeking contribution from when the Defendant knew or ought to have known that the injury had occurred, that the injury was attributable to the conduct of the proposed Third Party, and that the injury warranted the bringing of proceedings. The limitation period would be two years from that date.

[54] As I have previously outlined, the "injury" for the purposes of a claim for contribution is the time when the Defendant knew or ought to have known that the Third Party had a duty to contribute to any damages suffered by the Plaintiff, for which the Defendant might be held jointly liable with the proposed Third Party. On the facts of this case there are a number of dates when one might argue that the Yellow Cab Defendants "ought to have known" that Custom Carriage had a duty to contribute to the injuries of the Plaintiff:

(a) the very date of the incident, being June 25, 1995. Counsel for the Plaintiff argues that this is the date, because the Defendant, Kociniak noted that the wheelchair tipped over at the very top of the ramp where the transition plate is located. The Plaintiff argues that this should have identified defective design as being a possible cause of the accident. The Defendants note that Kociniak actually identified other factors as being the cause of the accident;

(b) a possible intermediate point between the date of the incident and the date of the service of the Statement of Claim. There is nothing on the record as it stands to indicate whether or not the possibility of defective design was brought to the attention of the Yellow Cab Defendants within this period. Since the Plaintiff was asserting a claim, the Defendants would at least have discovered in this period that the "injury [i.e. the duty to contribute] warranted" a claim for contribution.

(c) the date that the Statement of Claim was served on the Yellow Cab Defendants. The record is not entirely clear when this happened, although it appears that a courtesy copy of the Statement of Claim was sent to counsel for the Yellow Cab Defendants on March 19, 1997, the day that it was issued. The Plaintiff alleges that at the latest the Yellow Cab Defendants should have been aware of the possibility of defective design at this point, because of the paragraphs in the Statement of Claim that I have quoted in paragraph 12 above. The Defendants argue that such pleadings are rather pro forma in nature, and do not necessarily indicate that there is any evidence in support of them, and that the evidence from Kociniak pointed to other causes;

(d) the date of the first round of examinations for discovery, which was December 11, 1997. Counsel for the Yellow Cab Defendants acknowledges that at this time he began to suspect that the transition plate between the ramp and the body of the taxi may have caused or contributed to the injuries of the Plaintiff. Counsel's knowledge must obviously be attributed to his client, and vice versa, in deciding discoverability;

(e) November 27, 1999, which was the date that the expert retained by the Yellow Cab Defendants provided a report which substantiated the theory that the transition plate caused or contributed to the injuries. The Yellow Cab Defendants argue that time should not begin to run against them until this date, as to hold otherwise would encourage litigants to "sue first and investigate later". The other parties respond that the issuing of pleadings to stop a limitation is an accepted, prudent, and often necessary step, and that knowledge of or certainty as to legal liability is not a part of discoverability.

[55] It is not possible, on this record, to decide which of these five dates is applicable, and that issue will have to be tried, if necessary. The first four of the dates identified above passed before the new Act came into force. If any of those four possible dates are the date at which "the claimant knew, or in the circumstances ought to have known, of a claim", then the new action would fall into the transitional provisions in s. 2(1.1). This would mean that the new Yellow Cab action had to be issued on the earlier of the time prescribed in the old Limitation of Actions Act, and the end of the transitional period in the new Act. The new claim was clearly issued before the end of the transitional period. The limitation period under the old regime for claiming contribution is derivative of the claim of the Plaintiff against the Third Party. This limitation period is two years under Part 9 of the Limitation of Actions Act, unless that period is extended by s. 60. However, s. 60 by its terms only extends the limitation period with respect to counterclaims or "third party proceedings". The new action commenced by the Yellow Cab Defendants is not a "third party proceeding". The effect is that under the new Limitations Act the new Yellow Cab Statement of Claim had to be issued before June 25, 1997 (two years after the incident), over three years before when it was actually issued, if any of the first four identified dates are the date of discoverability.

[56] If the proper date of discoverability is the last one that I have identified, namely November 27, 1999, the date that the expert report was received, then the circumstances are different. Since this discoverability date is after the coming into effect of the new Limitations Act, then the general limitation period in s. 3(1)(a) would apply. The Yellow Cab Defendants would have had two years from November 27, 1999 to issue the second claim. The claim issued on September 19, 2000 is accordingly in time.

[57] The effect of this analysis is that the limitation period for issuing Third Party proceedings against Creative Carriage has not expired. On the other hand, there would appear to be some substantial risk that the limitation period for issuing the new action that was issued by the Yellow Cab Defendants had expired before that claim was issued. As a result, the Yellow Cab Defendants might successfully be able to pursue their claim for contribution under a late Third Party Notice, but not under the new action they have commenced. Therefore, if the Yellow Cab Defendants are not given leave to issue a late Third Party Notice, they may well suffer substantive prejudice, in that they will lose their right to contribution.

[58] The relative prejudice that will be suffered by the parties if a late Third Party Notice is allowed, is one of the factors that the Court considers in exercising its discretion to permit such a late pleading. A number of the cases dismiss applications for late Third Party Notices, on the basis that the Defendants are still at liberty to issue a new claim for contribution. Compare E.S.M. Transport Ltd. v. Western Mack Truck (Edmonton) Ltd. (1988), 59 Alta. L.R. (2d) 115, 90 A.R. 321, 28 C.P.C. (2d) 282 (C.A.) with Sherritt Gordon Ltd. v. Dresser Canada Inc., [1993] A.J. 600 (C.A.). If it appears that there is some risk that the Defendants have lost the right to commence a new action for contribution, that is a factor that the Court would consider in favour of allowing a late Third Party Notice. It is accordingly necessary to examine all of the facts and circumstances surrounding this action, to determine whether a late Third Party Notice should be permitted at this time.

Prejudice and Delay

[59] Since it appears that the claim to be asserted in the late Third Party Notice is not barred by statute, the last question is whether the Court should exercise its discretion in allowing the late issuance of the Third Party Notice.

[60] The Notice of Motion to issue the Third Party Notice was filed approximately 33 months after the Statement of Claim was issued, and approximately 30 months after the Yellow Cab Defendants filed their defence. This was approximately 4 ½ years after the incident in question. The Plaintiff accordingly argues that notwithstanding any limitation issue, the Defendants should not be permitted to issue a Third Party Notice at this time. The Plaintiff alleges prejudice, in that she suggests the eventual trial of her action will be delayed by the Third Party proceedings. She alleges further prejudice because the Third Party Notice will add new issues regarding the design of the taxi, which she alleges will lengthen the trial, and make it more complex.

[61] The Yellow Cab Defendants, on the other hand, argue that they will be prejudiced if they are not permitted to add their claim for contribution. Firstly, it appears that the Yellow Cab Defendants will lose their substantive right to advance a claim for contribution, because the second action they have commenced may well be out of time. Secondly, they allege that they cannot be faulted for the lateness of their application, as it was not reasonable for them to commence the Third Party proceedings until they had their expert report in hand. The Defendants also point to the desirability of having all the issues arising from this incident decided at once, thereby avoiding multiplicity of proceedings. The Defendants cite s. 8 of the Judicature Act, which reads:

> 8 The Court in the exercise of its jurisdiction in every proceeding pending before it has power to grant and shall grant, either absolutely or on any reasonable terms and conditions that seem just to the Court, all remedies whatsoever to which any of the parties thereto may appear to be entitled in respect of any and every legal or equitable claim properly brought forward by them in the proceeding, so that as far as possible all matters in controversy between the parties can be completely determined and all multiplicity of legal proceedings concerning those matters avoided.

[62] The learned Master did not discuss any of the limitations issues in his brief Memorandum of Decision. Because of the procedural history of this application, I assume that these arguments were not pressed before him. He accordingly decided against the issuance of the Third Party Notice primarily on the balance of convenience. He appears to have assumed that there were no limitation issues preventing the Defendants from making a claim for contribution in other proceedings. As such, he did not have to weigh the loss of the Defendants' substantive rights if a late Third Party proceeding was not allowed.

[63] In support of her position, the Plaintiff cited Kaptian v. Hardy (1999), 251 A.R. 291, 36 C.P.C. (4th) 49, 45 M.V.R. (3d) 19. This too was an application for issuing a late Third Party Notice. Moore, C.J.Q.B. set out the following test at paragraph 16:

> The length of any delay is relevant as it relates to: the reasonableness of an excuse for the delay, prejudice because of the delay, third party procedure benefits. The test can therefore be subsumed in two parts.
> 1. Reasonable Excuse
>
> A defendant has the burden of proof on an application to extend the time limit of Rule 66(4). The 6 month time frame open to a defendant to file a third party notice gives the defendant an opportunity to consider potential third parties. Any delay after the expiry of the 6 months requires a reasonable excuse. If a defendant has no reasonable excuse for the delay then leave to add a third party will be denied.
>
> 2. Prejudice
> If a defendant has a reasonable excuse for the delay, then the court must balance the potential prejudice to the third party and the plaintiff because of the delay against the benefits of adding the third party. If the prejudice outweighs the benefits of third party procedure, then leave to add a third party will be denied.

The Plaintiff argues that the Yellow Cab Defendants must meet this two-part test. Firstly, they must provide a reasonable explanation for the delay. If they cannot provide a reasonable explanation, leave should be denied. Only if some explanation for the delay is provided can the Court move on to consider prejudice. The Plaintiff argues that Kaptian merely applies the rule set out by the Court of Appeal in Lister v. Calgary (City) (1997), 47 Alta. L.R. (3d) 14.

[64] The Yellow Cab Defendants argue that the test is more fluid. They suggest that the length of the delay, the reason for the delay, and the relative prejudice should be considered concurrently before the Court exercises its discretion one way or the other.

[65] This issue was examined extensively by Moreau, J. in Flight v. Dillon, [2001] A.J. No. 329. Moreau, J. reviewed the case law on late Third Party Notices up to the decision in Kaptian v. Hardy, and noted at paragraph 18:

> It would appear that prior to Kaptian, supra, the approach to time extensions for third party proceedings was to weigh the nature of the delay, whether there was a reasonable excuse for it and prejudice, except in circumstances which might be described as the "worst cases" where the delay, as in Lister, supra, is significant and the need to establish a credible excuse becomes the single strongest consideration and actual proof of prejudice, given the passage of time, becomes superfluous. Kaptian, however, requires that any delay beyond the six month time frame must have a reasonable excuse before an extension of time can be considered.

Having considered the facts of that case, Moreau, J. went on at paragraph 28 to state:

> However, if I am in error in concluding that there was here a reasonable excuse for the delay, I am of the view that the proper test for an application to strike a third party notice is as suggested by the authorities which preceded Kaptian, supra, and that prejudice is still a factor to be weighed along with the nature of the delay and whether it can be reasonably excused, unless the delay is significant. In that event, the absence of a reasonable excuse for the delay effectively overpowers any need on the part of the third party to demonstrate actual prejudice.
> I therefore respectfully disagree with my former colleague that every case of delay beyond the six month time frame contemplated by Rule 66(4) requires the defendant to advance a reasonable excuse before any consideration of prejudice comes into play. I would agree with the approach taken in Grandwood Flooring, supra, namely that a short delay would result in a different weighing exercise, focusing primarily on the existence of any prejudice. As one moves further away from the six month deadline, the weighing exercise will focus more on whether the delay is excusable. In the case of a significant delay, as in Lister, supra, failure to advance a reasonable excuse for the delay will, without more, be fatal to an application to extend time.

[66] With respect, I agree with the decision in Flight v. Dillon that the sequential test set out in Kaptian v. Hardy is not inflexible. The length of the delay, the explanation for the delay, and the relative prejudice to the two parties are to be considered concurrently when the Court exercises its discretion to allow or reject a late Third Party claim. Obviously, the longer the delay, the more the Court might assume prejudice from the mere passage of time, as memories will tend to weaken, the litigation will tend to advance further, and the Third Party might increasingly be prejudiced by the passage of time. However, the mere fact that there is no satisfactory explanation for some or all of the delay is not fatal to the application.

[67] This litigation has proceeded at a rather leisurely pace. The Plaintiff chose not to issue her Statement of Claim until 21 months after the incident. She undoubtedly had tactical or other considerations for doing so, but having allowed the better part of two years to expire before the action was even commenced, she cannot now argue with much force that the matter is urgent.

[68] The Plaintiff argues that the Defendants should have been alerted to the condition of the ramp and the transition plate from the earliest moment, because the Defendant, Kociniak, noted that the accident happened at the point where the ramp met the van. This is true, but in fairness Kociniak's statement attributes the accident entirely to the speed at which the Plaintiff mounted the ramp. If anything, Kociniak's statement distracts attention from any problem with the ramp. Likewise, while it is true that the Plaintiff's pleading does mention negligent design, that does not appear to have been the major focus of her claim; rather she appears to claim that Kociniak should have warned her about the ramp or assisted her in entering the van. This is certainly not a case like E.S.M. Transport Ltd. v. Western Mack Truck (Edmonton) (supra) where the Defendants knew of the potential Third Party and made a deliberate tactical decision not to join them.

[69] While the first round of examinations for discovery were held on December 11, 1997, the Yellow Cab Defendants suggest that they are not yet completed, and that there are certain undertakings outstanding. All of the parties should bear some responsibility for allowing undertakings to remain outstanding for lengthy periods of time. The party who gave the undertaking has a duty to fulfill it, and the party who received the undertaking has an obligation to enforce it. Discoveries of the officers of some of the corporate Defendants have not yet taken place, apparently because the Plaintiff has not decided if she will pursue all of them.

[70] There were certainly delays experienced by the Yellow Cab Defendants in obtaining their expert report. Part of this delay is explained in that the Yellow Cab Defendants indicate that they had some difficulty identifying an expert in wheelchair ramps who was available to provide an opinion. There were also some delays in coordinating the Plaintiff's schedule, so as to allow a testing of the wheelchair. The Yellow Cab Defendants argue that it was not enough to have the ramp and the van in their possession; it was necessary to have the wheelchair as well to properly evaluate how the accident occurred. The testing occurred on October 15, 1999, and the expert provided his report in a timely way on November 27, 1999. However, counsel for the Yellow Cab Defendants admitted that he first became aware that there might be a design issue with the ramp at the discoveries on December 11, 1997. It appears that nothing was done about this until January of 1999, when the search for experts began. The entire 1998 calendar year appears to have slipped by without any progress having been made. The Defendants state that they had trouble identifying the manufacturer of the ramp and the van, but the record is clear that this information was readily available from the City of Edmonton. The Defendants must accept primary responsibility for this delay, for which no satisfactory explanation has been provided.

[71] The Court was also advised that the officer of the Yellow Cab Defendants who was produced for examinations for discovery has since died. This will not prejudice the Plaintiff, as she can still read-in from his transcript, while the Defendants are, of course, denied his testimony at trial. The Yellow Cab Defendants would have to produce another officer for examination by the proposed Third Party, if it is added. Any prejudice from the death of this party can be remedied by permitting the Third Party to read-in from his examinations for discovery, and to conduct an independent examination of a second officer of the Yellow Cab Defendants.

[72] At this time it would appear that the parties are not ready to sign a Certificate of Readiness. The production of documents by, and the examination for discovery of the Third Party will undoubtedly consume some time. However, given the leisurely pace that the parties have allowed in this litigation to date, I do not regard this as an overriding consideration, particularly when weighed against the possible loss of the substantive rights of the Defendants.

[73] The proposed Third Party did not file an affidavit alleging any prejudice by the delay in issuing the Third Party Notice.

[74] With respect to the suggestion that the Third Party proceedings will add to the complexity of the trial, this is undoubtedly true. However, I do not think it is safe to assume that without the Third Party proceedings the design issues will not be raised. On this application the Plaintiff took the position that her pleadings themselves raised the issue of negligent design. The Yellow Cab Defendants and the City of Edmonton might well raise the issue of negligent design in the main action, in order to show that they were wholly innocent of any negligence that caused or contributed to the Plaintiff's losses. Therefore, the issues about the design of the ramp are likely to arise whether or not the Third Party proceedings are added.

[75] On the other hand, it is highly desirable that the interlocking issues between the parties be decided in one action. In the first action, the responsibility of the various parties will have to be decided. This decision may encompass the contributory negligence of the Plaintiff, the negligence of the Yellow Cab Defendants, and the possible effect of negligent design. If separate proceedings for indemnity are to be prosecuted, those same issues will have to be tried again. This is to be avoided, because the possibility of inconsistent verdicts undermines confidence in the legal system. Having two trials on the same issue is also inefficient, and results in a waste of the resources of the legal system. The Yellow Cab Defendants may end up having to pay for two trials instead of one, although it can be argued that this is their own fault. Creative Carriage, the proposed Third Party, may well feel obliged to monitor the first trial, if only to assist in the defence of the second one.

[76] In balancing the prejudice, one overwhelming factor is that the Yellow Cab Defendants might well lose their right to contribution if the late Third Party Notice is not permitted. As I have indicated previously, there is a significant risk that the second action commenced by the Yellow Cab Defendants is statute barred. The proposed Third Party alleges no prejudice by reason of the lateness of the Third Party Notice. As between the Defendants and the Third Party, justice clearly favours permitting the late Third Party Notice. As between the Defendants and the Plaintiff, there may be some prejudice in the form of delay or added complexity, but these matters can be dealt with by the trial judge in an award of interest, or costs, or both.

[77] Having taken into account the explanations provided by the Defendants for at least part of the delay in bringing the Third Party proceedings, having reflected on the conduct of all the parties with respect to the urgency of this litigation, and having weighed the prejudice to the Plaintiff, the Defendants and the proposed Third Party, I have come to the conclusion that this is an appropriate case for the Court to exercise its discretion and permit the late filing of the Third Party proceedings. I do so on terms that the Third Party proceedings be issued and served on the proposed Third Party within 30 days of the date of these reasons. The Third Party may read-in from the discovery of the deceased officer of the Defendants, and also conduct its own examination of an officer.

[78] As I have allowed the late filing of the Third Party Notice, the second action commenced by the Yellow Cab Defendants becomes somewhat redundant. That action should be stayed until further order of the Court. It is, accordingly, unnecessary at this time to consider the application under R. 129 to strike out that Statement of Claim. It is also unnecessary to consider the application to have that action tried concurrently with the main action.

[79] Without making any specific directions or setting any specific deadlines, I note that the parties should speed up the pace of this litigation. They may resort to the Rules of Court or other procedures available to them as they may be advised.

[80] While the Yellow Cab Defendants have been largely successful in this application, the very need for this application is, to some considerable extent, their own fault. While I have concluded that the delay caused by the Defendants is not sufficient to disentitle them to the relief they seek, it is appropriate to grant that relief on terms. I therefore am inclined to deny the Defendants the costs they would otherwise be entitled to for this application and the application before the Master. However, if any party wishes to speak to costs, they may do so within 30 days of the date of these reasons.

HEARD on the 18th day of April, 2001.

REASONS FOR DECISION

IN THE MATTER OF the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act and an Admissibility Hearing concerning Harmeet Singh DHALIWAL.

2025 CanLII 49485 (CA IRB)

INTRODUCTION

[1] This is a record of reasons for a decision made under the provisions of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act ("the IRPA") concerning Harmeet Singh DHALIWAL ("Mr. Dhaliwal") following an admissibility hearing conducted pursuant to subsection 44(2) of IRPA.

[2] Mr. Dhaliwal entered Canada on December 23, 2016 and was issued a study permit upon entry.[1] He applied for and received extensions to this permit until the end of November of 2020, and was thereafter issued a work permit.[2] On September 20, 2021, Mr. Dhaliwal was reported under subsection 44(1) of the IRPA, for being inadmissible to Canada pursuant to subsection 37(1)(a) of the IRPA.[3] The report was referred to the Division on October 11, 2021.[4]

[3] The Minister submits the evidence establishes there are reasonable grounds to believe that Mr. Dhaliwal, as a foreign national, was a member of a criminal organization or engaged in activity that was part of a pattern of criminal activity with the organization. Specifically, they allege that Mr. Dhaliwal engaged in a "cheque kiting" scheme with at least 5 other individuals. This scheme involved taking advantage of the period between the time a cheque is deposited, and those funds are made available to the owner of the account, to when the bank verifies that there are sufficient funds to support that cheque. In this case, the Minister alleges Mr. Dhaliwal wrote several NSF cheques which were then deposited by various individuals, who dispersed these funds prior to the NSF cheques being flagged by Scotiabank, which resulted in a substantial financial loss to the bank. The Minister requests the Division to issue a deportation order against Mr. Dhaliwal.

[4] Mr. Dhaliwal submits that the Minister has not met their burden to establish that he is a person described under subsection 37(1)(a). He asks the Division to find he provided credible and reliable evidence that his cheque book was stolen by his former roommates, Mr. Pawandeep Dhindsa ("Mr.

Dhindsa") and Mr. Jaspreet Singh Khaira ("Mr. Khaira"), whom he submits were heavily involved in the scheme. Mr. Dhaliwal states he had no knowledge or acquaintance with the other individuals alleged to be part of the scheme, and that he was not involved in the writing of the NSF cheques. Mr. Dhaliwal therefore requests the Division to issue a favourable order.

DECISION

[5] After reviewing and carefully considering the totality of the evidence, submissions, and relevant jurisprudence and legislation, I do not find there are reasonable grounds to believe that Mr. Dhaliwal is a person described in subsection 37(1)(a) or the IRPA, thus I am issuing a favourable decision.

ISSUES

[6] Section 37(1)(a) of the IRPA reads as follows

> 37 (1) A permanent resident or a foreign national is inadmissible on grounds of organized criminality for
> (a) being a member of an organization that is believed on reasonable grounds to be or to have been engaged in activity that is part of a pattern of criminal activity planned and organized by a number of persons acting in concert in furtherance of the commission of an offence punishable under an Act of Parliament by way of indictment, or in furtherance of the commission of an offence outside Canada that, if committed in Canada, would constitute such an offence, or engaging in activity that is part of such a pattern;[5]

[7] For an inadmissibility finding to be made under s. 37(1)(a), the Minister must establish the following elements:

(i) That Mr. Dhaliwal is a permanent resident or a foreign national, not a Canadian citizen;

(ii) There existed an organization that was engaged in activity that is part of a pattern of criminal activity; and

[5] Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, S.C. 2001, c. 27, s. 37(1)(a) [IRPA].

(iii) That Mr. Dhaliwal was either a member of that organization OR that he was engaged in activity that is part of a pattern of criminal activity with that organization.

[8] Pursuant to section 33 of the IRPA, the facts that constitute inadmissibility are required to be proven on the standard of "reasonable grounds to believe that they have occurred, are occurring, or will occur".[6]

[9] This standard of proof has been described as something more than mere suspicion, but less than the civil standard of a balance of probabilities. The Supreme Court of Canada has stated that, "reasonable grounds will exist where there is an objective basis for the belief which is based on compelling and credible information".[7]

[10] Section 173(d) of the IRPA allows me to base my decision on evidence I find to be credible or trustworthy in the circumstances.[8]

[11] The evidence at the hearing consisted of Exhibits M-1 through M-4, Exhibit P-1, and the testimony of Detective Constable Valerie Sibley ("Detective Sibley"), Mr. Dhaliwal, and Mr. Bhupinder Singh Gurm ("Mr. Gurm").

ANALYSIS

Issue I: Is Mr. Dhaliwal a permanent resident or foreign national?

[12] Mr. Dhaliwal testified that he is neither a permanent resident of Canada, nor a Canadian citizen. He stated that he is a citizen of only India.[9] This testimony is supported by the documentary evidence, including the copy of his passport provided as part of Exhibit M-1.[10] Thus, I find there are reasonable grounds to believe that Mr. Dhaliwal is a foreign national, and citizen of India, not a Canadian citizen.

Issue II: Is there sufficient evidence of a criminal organization?

[13] The Minister submits that the evidence supports a finding of a criminal organization as there were more than three individuals involved in a pattern of criminal activity that was conducted over an extended period of time. They allege that at least six individuals, fitting the profile of international students in Canada on a temporary basis, were involved in writing and depositing "NSF" cheques and subsequently withdrawing those non-existent funds from their accounts.[11] They submit the manner in which this scheme was carried out necessitated planning and organization amongst the members of the group. The Minister submits these actions led to a direct financial benefit for the members of the group and resulted in a substantial loss to Scotiabank. The Minister thus argues that the evidence meets the definition of criminal organization under the Criminal Code of Canada, and guidance provided by the jurisprudence in the interpretation of this term under the IRPA.

[14] Mr. Dhaliwal does not contest that there was a criminal organization.

[15] The term "criminal organization" is not defined under the IRPA, but guidance has been provided by the Federal Court of Appeal as to how to interpret and apply this term.

[16] In Sittampalam, the Court stated that "organization" is to be given a broad and unrestricted interpretation in order to ensure that the purpose of the IRPA to protect the security of Canadians is upheld.[12] The Courts have found that the assessment must be conducted in a flexible manner, taking into consideration a number of factors that may assist in determining whether there is a criminal organization, such as identity, leadership, a loose hierarchy, basic organizational structure, occupied territory or regular meeting locations.[13] However, the Court emphasized that these factors are non-exhaustive and there is no one factor that is essential for the finding of a "criminal organization" to be made out.

[17] In 2015, the Supreme Court in the case of B010 considered the definition of "criminal organization" in the context of a s. 37(1)(b) human smuggling allegation. The Supreme Court of Canada stated that, while "organized criminality" and "criminal organization" as defined in the Criminal Code, are not identical phrases, "they are logically and linguistically related and absent countervailing considerations, should be given a consistent interpretation." Thus, the Court found that

"criminal organization" is to be interpreted harmoniously with the Criminal Code's definition, found in s. 467.1(1).[14]

[18] The Minister relies on the case of Danaj[15], a recent Federal Court decision that found the findings in B010 are not applicable to s. 37(1)(a). While I am bound by decisions made by the Federal Court, the Court itself has been split as to the applicability of B010 to s. 37(1)(a). For example, in Saif they found the findings from B010 apply equally to both subsections (a) and (b). In coming to their decision, the Court considered the underlying reasoning conducted by the Supreme Court of Canada and their finding that s. 37(1)(b) must be read in accordance with "organized criminality" due to the need to consider the section as a whole and not two separate and distinct parts.[16]

[19] The Honourable Justice Barnes in Saif quoted and assessed the Supreme Court of Canada's findings at paragraph 37 of B010, where the Court stated,

> The first contextual consideration is the relationship between s. 37(1)(b) and the rest of s. 37(1). Subsection (1) introduces the concept of inadmissibility on grounds of organized criminality. Paragraphs (a) and (b) are instances of organized criminality.
> Section 37(l)(a) makes membership in criminal organizations one ground of inadmissibility, while s. 37(1)(b) makes "engaging, in the context of transnational crime, in activities such as people smuggling, trafficking in persons or money laundering" another. Read in the context of s. 37(1) as a whole, it is clear that the focus of s. 37(l)(b), like that of s. 37(l)(a), is organized criminal activity.[17]

[20] If the entire section is to be read harmoniously, then it would be more legally sound for the term "organized criminality" to be applied in a consistent manner between the subsections. Respectfully, the Federal Court in Danaj did not engage in an assessment of the Supreme Court's decision and only distinguished the decision on the basis that it was made with respect to s. 37(1)(b), without considering the above-mentioned paragraph or overall reasoning of the Supreme Court. For these reasons, I prefer the reasoning and conclusion reached in Saif, that being that the Criminal Code definition of "criminal organization" applies to s. 37(1)(a) and should be used in assessing this element. However, I note that my finding that there are reasonable grounds to believe a criminal organization existed in this case would be the same under the Sittampalam principles.

[21] Section 467.1(1) of the Criminal Code defines "criminal organization" as a group, however organized, that (a) is composed of three or more persons in or outside of Canada; and (b) has as one of its main purposes or main activities the facilitation or commission of one or more serious offences that, if committed, would likely result in the direct or indirect receipt of a material benefit including a financial benefit by the group or by any of the persons who constitute the group. It does not include a group of persons that forms randomly for the immediate commission of a single offence.[18]

[22] "Serious offence" is defined as an indictable offence under an Act of Parliament for which the maximum term of imprisonment available is at least five years or is a prescribed offence.[19]

Credibility and Reliability of the Minister's Evidence

[23] The most significant portion of the evidence with respect to the cheque kiting scheme comes from Scotiabank. The Scotiabank Investigation Documents consist of a redacted affidavit with the accompanying bank statements and copies of cheques alleged to be part of the scheme.[20] They have also provided copies of video surveillance photos captured by their system.[21]

[24] While I note that the affidavit of the employee from Scotiabank is redacted to the point that there is no signature or name of the affiant or commissioner, I still find the accompanying documents, that being the bank account summaries and copies of cheques, to be credible and trustworthy evidence, with the few exceptions noted hereafter. The documents include on the bottom the link from which the document was printed, the account summaries include information identifying the individuals which correlates to the information provided in the Waterloo Regional Police Service reports, and the statements of account have the Scotiabank logo and contact information included therein.[22] The cheques also contain stamps indicating the date and time they were deposited and a printer ID, which further supports the credibility and reliability of these copies.[23]

[25] I also consider that Mr. Dhaliwal has provided copies of some of the cheques drawn from his account and his account statement which show similar characteristics as the documents provided by the Minister, and in some cases are the exact same.[24]

[26] Detective Sibley has extensive experience as a police officer as she has been employed with Waterloo Regional Police Service ("WRPS") for approximately 25 years. She also has significant experience in conducting fraud investigations as at the time of testimony she was working with the Organized Financial Crime Unit and prior to that worked with the Commercial Fraud unit, for a total of approximately five to six years.[25]

[27] Overall, I find Detective Sibley to have been a credible witness. However, I acknowledge that there appears to have been very little independent investigation conducted by the WRPS. According to the police report provided, the police were contacted by Scotiabank and advised of the cheque kiting scheme and provided copies of the relevant account documents and summaries through the Scotiabank investigation team. The only independent investigation that was conducted was identifying the citizenship and immigration status of the individuals, running an inquiry through MTO to obtain copies of their drivers' licences, and verifying through their systems whether any of the individuals were the subjects of other police reports.[26] After the decision was then made not to lay any criminal charges, the documents were passed on to CBSA to pursue inadmissibility investigations.[27]

[28] For these reasons, and given Detective Sibley's extension experience in fraud investigations, I find her evidence regarding the definition of cheque kiting, the overall scheme and the level of planning and modus operandi of the group to be credible and reliable. I place significant weight on this portion of her evidence in coming to my decision. With respect to any evidence provided by her regarding the description of the independent investigation that was conducted by Scotiabank, in which the WRPS was not directly involved, I place little weight and prefer the documentary evidence provided by Scotiabank.

Criminal Organization

[29] Based on the evidence I have found to be credible and trustworthy before me, I find there are reasonable grounds to believe a criminal organization existed. In the Scotiabank Investigation Documents, there is evidence of the involvement of more than three individuals in the depositing of cheques and distributing or receiving funds. The following individuals were identified, along with Mr. Dhaliwal, by Scotiabank as being involved in scheme through their account statements, summary of e-transfers, and copies of the deposited NSF cheques: Ajayveer Singh Bhatti ("Mr. Bhatti"), Sehaj Preet Dhillon ("Ms. Dhillon"), Bhavjeet Singh, Sehajbir Singh Walia ("Mr. Walia"), and Ashwani Singh.[28] As will be discussed in further detail, I accept Mr. Dhaliwal's evidence that Mr. Dhindsa and Mr. Khaira were involved in the scheme, as their names and emails are found throughout the disclosure both as recipients of some of the NSF cheques as well as recipients of some of the electronic money transfers ("EMTs") sent from the accounts the NSF cheques were deposited into.[29]

[30] While the organization does not appear to have a name, symbol, or formal organizational structure, I find the organization consists of individuals who committed the offences together on a well-established modus operandi. The evidence shows that one of the main purposes of the group was to conduct a cheque kiting scheme that resulted in a financial benefit to the persons who constituted the group. "Cheque kiting" was defined in the documentary evidence as,

> Carried out within the banking system, kiting typically involves passing a series of cheques at two or more banking institution, using accounts that have insufficient funds. Relying on the float time required for a cheque deposited at before the cheque clears, they then withdraw the funds from the second bank account and deposit the funds back into the first. The process may then be repeated in opposite order, sometimes repeatedly. The net result is a series of fraudulent withdrawals that rely on being a step ahead of the fraudulent cheque on which they are based having cleared.[30] (emphasis added)
> Cheque kiting consists of drawing cheques on an account in one bank and depositing them in an account in a second bank when neither account has sufficient funds to cover the amounts drawn. Just before the cheques are returned for payment to the first bank, the kiter covers them by depositing cheques drawn on the account in the second bank. Due to the delay created by the collection of funds by one bank

[31] The definition of cheque kiting and the evidence of how this scheme unfolded demonstrate that planning and organization was required for the commission of this offence to have been successful. The scheme involved several individuals coordinating the passing of cheques to each other, as well as the deposit and subsequent dispersion of the non-existent funds within a short period of time, prior to the bank catching the insufficient funds of the originating account. Detective Sibley agreed with the Minister that this type of fraud requires planning and organization and testified that, "organization and knowledge certainly go hand in hand in a fraud of this type. You need to know how the banking system works and organize the funds in such a way that it is not going to be immediately detected."[32]

[32] There was overlap between the individuals as Mr. Bhatti, Mr. Walia and Mr. Ajayveer Singh received cheques from Mr. Bhavjeet Singh, who had deposited cheques written from Mr. Dhaliwal's account.[33] There was also some evidence that Mr. Bhatti and Mr. Dhillon shared an address at the same time of the investigation, and this address had been associated at some point in time to Mr. Walia.[34]

[33] I find the activities engaged in by the parties constitute serious offences. While none of the individuals were charged with any criminal offences, the police reports indicate that the following offences would have been available to the police to charge them with based on the facts: (i) fraud over $5,000; (ii) conspiracy to commit an indictable offence; (iii) possession of proceeds of crime; (iv) possession of property obtained by crime; and (v) laundering proceeds of crime.[35] While Detective Sibley commented that she would not categorize these offences as serious, and would not have proceeded with laying a charge of "participating in a criminal organization" under the Criminal Code,[36] for the following reasons I am satisfied that the remaining offences are serious offences when considering the guiding principles and interpretation of s. 37(1)(a) under the IRPA.

[34] I agree with counsel that both the total loss amount, and the amount of loss attributable to each individual, provided by Scotiabank are unreliable. There is insufficient evidence as to how these amounts were calculated or reached, two of the documents provide different loss totals,[37] and Detective Sibley did not have any knowledge of how the total loss was calculated by Scotiabank or whether the total number provided is accurate, except to say that she believed it was well over $5,000.[38]

[35] However, I do not find the failure of the Minister to present credible and reliable evidence as to the exact amount of loss suffered by Scotiabank impacts the strength of the Minister's case, or undermines the overall investigation, as counsel has alleged it does. The Minister is not required to prove that Mr. Dhaliwal himself caused the loss to Scotiabank for a finding under s. 37(1)(a) to be made. If the individual is found to be a member or engaging in a pattern of activity with the criminal organization, it is sufficient for the Minister to show that serious offences were committed by the group and, as a result, a financial or material benefit was incurred by some of the members of the group.

[36] I find the evidence establishes that Scotiabank suffered a loss of over $5,000. The copies of the cheques and statements of account for all six accounts clearly show that a loss was suffered by Scotiabank, and it was not a nominal amount.[39] As I am satisfied that the total amount is over $5,000, the offences listed above are indictable offences each subject to maximum terms of imprisonment of more than five years and are thus considered serious offences.[40]

[37] Based on the number of transactions conducted and the time period over which these offences were committed (February 9, 2019 – June 17, 2019[41]), I do not find this group was formed randomly for the immediate commission of a single offence, rather it was formed to partake in an ongoing pattern of criminal activity. As emphasized recently by the Supreme Court,[42] there appears to have been a level of "structure and continuity" to these organized offences by the same or similar group of individuals over a period of time.

While I question the reliability or accuracy of the exact numbers that have been provided by Scotiabank, I accept that there are reasonable grounds to believe the total amount of loss suffered by Scotiabank was over $5,000. This is based on the copies of the cheques and account statements found in Exhibit M-3, which show the amount of money that was withdrawn or transferred from the accounts in question after the NSF cheques were deposited.

[38] For the reasons stated above, I find the Minister has established there are reasonable and probable grounds to believe a criminal organization existed for the purposes of s. 37(1)(a) of the IRPA.

Issue III: Was Mr. Dhaliwal a member of this organization, or engaged in activity that is part of a pattern with the organization?

[39] The Minister submits there are reasonable grounds to believe that Mr. Dhaliwal was a member of the organization and was engaged in the cheque kiting scheme with the five other individuals named above. They submit that there is ample evidence that Mr. Dhaliwal issued cheques from his account which had insufficient funds, and these were distributed to other individuals as part of the scheme. They allege that Mr. Dhaliwal meets the profile of the group, and at the very least, he was wilfully blind to the organization's criminal activities. The Minister further submits that Mr. Dhaliwal's evidence that he was a victim of the scheme, not a member, was neither credible nor trustworthy and no weight should be placed on it.

[40] Mr. Dhaliwal submits that he was a victim of the scheme as his former roommates, Mr. Dhindsa and Mr. Khaira, stole his cheque book and used the cheques within it for their criminal activity. Mr. Dhaliwal submits that he provided credible and reliable testimony and evidence to support his submissions that he did not write the cheques and does not know any of the other five individuals alleged to have been involved in the scheme. He submits that the Minister's evidence is not credible or reliable as there are evidentiary gaps in the investigation conducted by the WRPS and CBSA and asks the Division to find the Minister has not met their burden to prove that he is a member of the organization or engaged in any criminal activity with the organization.

Credibility and Reliability of Mr. Dhaliwal's evidence

[41] The Minister submitted that no weight should be placed on Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony that he was not a member of the organization and did not have knowledge of the activities of the group, including the use of his cheque book.

[42] The Minister asks the Division to find Mr. Dhaliwal not to be credible or reliable for the following reasons:

2025 CanLII 49485 (CA IRB)

- Mr. Dhaliwal has a direct and crucial interest in the outcome of the proceedings;
- The documentary evidence contradicts Mr. Dhaliwal's statement that the bank had not asked him about the other NSF cheques during their phone call in February 2019;
- Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony regarding how many cheques he removed from his cheque book changed throughout the hearing, demonstrating that his answers and explanations "seemed to evolve and broaden, and take up life of their own as the case progressed"[43];
- Mr. Dhaliwal's statement that he did not know the other "co-accused" is contradicted by the evidence that he had written cheques to Mr. Bhavjeet Singh;
- Mr. Dhaliwal's evidence that he does not change his signature, is contradicted by the documents contained in Exhibits M-1 and M-2, which show different signatures being used by him in the past;
- Mr. Dhaliwal's evidence regarding when he noticed the missing cheque book contradicts the evidence provided by Mr. Gurm on this point;
- Mr. Dhaliwal was unable to provide any documentary evidence, such as a police report, to support his evidence that he attended at the police station;
- The testimony regarding the confrontation with Mr. Himatveer Singh and Mr. Khaira's maternal uncle was vague, unclear, and inconsistent. They submit it is concerning that despite feeling threatened, he did not take any action to report these individuals; and
- Mr. Dhaliwal's evidence that he approached Scotiabank on multiple occasions is contradicted by the evidence from Scotiabank in Exhibit M-3, and in any event even if this did happen as Mr. Dhaliwal testified, the timing indicates that he only approached the bank once his role in the group was completed.

[43] Each of the concerns raised by the Minister will be discussed further below; however, I will first address two areas of the evidence I find to be significant in concluding that Mr. Dhaliwal was a credible, reliable and trustworthy witness. The first is with respect to the involvement of Mr. Khaira and Mr. Dhindsa in the scheme, and the second involves the obvious difference in handwriting in the cheques written from Mr. Dhaliwal's account that were alleged to be used in the scheme.

2025 CanLII 49485 (CA IRB)

Involvement of Mr. Khaira and Mr. Dhindsa

[44] I find Mr. Dhaliwal's evidence that Mr. Dhindsa and Mr. Khaira were involved in the scheme is amply supported throughout the documentary evidence. While the Minister did not initially allege that Mr. Dhindsa and Mr. Khaira were involved, and no investigation was conducted by the WRPS with respect to these two individuals, the Minister submitted that Mr. Dhindsa and Mr. Khaira were in fact part of the organization.[44]

[45] Mr. Dhaliwal testified that he resided with Mr. Dhindsa and Mr. Khaira until the second week of February. This was confirmed by Mr. Gurm in his testimony. He stated that his cheque book was kept in his soft-shell luggage bag, which did not contain a lock, along with his other paperwork. The suitcase was kept in the room he was renting, which both Mr. Khaira and Mr. Dhindsa had access to until he moved out.[45]

[46] The involvement of Mr. Dhindsa and Mr. Khaira does not preclude Mr. Dhaliwal from being involved as well. However, for the following reasons, I find Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony that Mr. Khaira and Mr. Dhindsa were perpetrators of the scheme is supported by the evidence presented by the Minister. Both Mr. Khaira and Mr. Dhindsa had access to Mr. Dhaliwal's cheque book prior to him moving and received benefits from using Mr. Dhaliwal's cheque book.

[47] The NSF cheques that were drawn from Mr. Dhaliwal's account were written out to Mr. Dhindsa, Mr. Khaira, Mr. Gurkirat Singh, Ms. Simranjeet Kaur, and Mr. Bhavjeet Singh.[46] Mr. Dhaliwal testified that Simranjeet Kaur was the name of Mr. Khaira's girlfriend.[47] Both Mr. Khaira and Mr. Dhindsa were the recipients, or intended recipients, of several electronic money transfers ("EMTs") that were sent from Mr. Bhavjeet Singh.[48] Mr. Dhindsa was the recipient of numerous EMTs from Mr. Bhatti and Mr. Ashwani Singh as well.[49]

[48] Additionally, Mr. Dhaliwal testified that the video surveillance photographs captured by Scotiabank show Mr. Dhindsa and Mr. Khaira conducting several transactions on the accounts of the other named individuals.[50] Mr. Dhaliwal also testified that the white vehicle that is seen in the photographs in Exhibit M-4 belongs to Mr. Dhindsa.[51] This evidence was uncontested as Detective Sibley testified that no positive identification was made with respect to the individuals depicted in the surveillance photos, nor of the vehicle that was captured by the system.[52] While Detective Sibley testified that there were reports of Mr. Bhatti operating a white Camero that was registered to Ms. Dhillon, these reports were not disclosed, nor was it confirmed by the police that the vehicle in the photographs was in fact Ms. Dhillon's vehicle, not Mr. Dhindsa's.[53] Detective Sibley could not exclude the possibility that it was Mr. Khaira and Mr. Dhindsa accessing the accounts in some of the photographs.[54] Furthermore, none of the surveillance videos and photographs showing the perpetrators engaged in the fraud were alleged to depict Mr. Dhaliwal.

[49] This makes Mr. Dhaliwal's evidence that Mr. Khaira and Mr. Dhindsa were the individuals using his cheque book to carry out this scheme plausible and reasonable on the evidence before me.

Handwriting on the cheques

[50] The evidence I consider to be very significant in supporting Mr. Dhaliwal's credibility, is that on examining the copies of the cheques, it is apparent that the handwriting and signatures on the cheques differ from each other, and importantly, from Mr. Dhaliwal's handwriting.[55]

[51] Mr. Dhaliwal did not present a handwriting expert, but I do not think one is necessary in this case for the panel to arrive at the following conclusions, as the difference in the handwriting and signatures is so plainly obvious on its face, as was acknowledged by Detective Sibley. In response to counsel's question as to whether a handwriting expert was employed to match the handwriting in the various cheques written from Mr. Dhaliwal's account, Detective Sibley testified that,

> So many of the signatures that have been compared, both from the original application and MTO, when looking at the cheques are clearly different. And any > reasonable person could see that, so I do not believe an expert would be necessary.[56]

[52] Detective Sibley agreed that it could therefore be possible that individuals other than Mr. Dhaliwal and more than one person were writing the cheques.[57]

[53] The handwriting on the cheques that were written to Mr. Bhavjeet Singh, Mr. Khaira, Mr. Dhindsa, Mr. Gurkirat Singh, and Ms. Kaur, are all written in various styles of handwriting. I note that Ms. Simranjeet Kaur's name is even spelled differently, as on cheque numbers 037 and 038, her name is spelled "Simranjit", versus cheque numbers 034, 035, 036, 039 and 041 where it is spelled "Simranjeet".[58] The fact that the two cheques it was spelled differently on fall in the middle of the other cheques in terms of numbering, supports the conclusion that these cheques were written by at least two different people who had access to Mr. Dhaliwal's cheque book at various times.

[54] I also note that the cheques were not used consecutively. For example, a cheque dated February 9, 2019, is numbered 028, while a cheque dated February 10, 2019, is numbered 004.[59]

[55] If Mr. Dhaliwal himself were in possession of his cheque book and involved in the fraud, it would stand to reason the cheques would all be written in more or less the same handwriting, and the signatures would more or less match each other and more or less match other provincial and federal government documents in which Mr. Dhaliwal's genuine signature appears. In fact, signature and handwriting matching is often a strong piece of corroborative evidence used in linking documents.

[56] In the immediate case, both the handwriting and signatures appearing on the cheques demonstrate the contrary. They evidence that the deposited cheques likely originated from multiple people, none of whose handwriting and seemingly forged signatures match that of Mr. Dhaliwal. This weighs heavily in support of Mr. Dhaliwal's version of events.

[57] Furthermore, if Mr. Dhaliwal was involved in the scheme himself, it is more likely he would have simply written and signed his own cheques himself. At a minimum, it would have behooved the group to ensure the signatures were at least a plausible or passable iteration of Mr. Dhaliwal's signature as it was in their interest for the cheques to be deposited without undue attention or suspicion. However, as it stands, it appears whoever signed the cheques had no knowledge of what Mr. Dhaliwal's true signature appears to be or even the name Mr. Dhaliwal uses to sign documents.

[58] Detective Sibley emphasized that Mr. Dhaliwal was in possession or control over an "intangible piece of property" and is thus presumed to be in constructive possession of his account.[60] While this is true with respect to his bank account, the cheque book itself is a tangible piece of property. The role Mr. Dhaliwal is alleged to have played by the Minister is that he, "allowed his account to have funds drawn upon."[61] This is a different modus operandi to the other individuals involved, as four of them were alleged to have used their accounts to deposit and disperse funds from, and one used their account to receive the fraudulent funds. Mr. Dhaliwal is the only individual for whom access to his bank account was not necessary for the offences to have been committed, the perpetrator only need have had access to Mr. Dhaliwal's physical cheque book.

Mr. Dhaliwal's vested interest in the outcome of the proceedings

[59] The Minister relied on the reasoning in the decision of Faryna v. Chorny to submit that Mr. Dhaliwal has a direct and crucial interest in the outcome of the admissibility hearing, and that should be taken into consideration in determining his credibility.

[60] In Faryna v. Chorny, the British Colombia Court of Appeal discussed that consideration should be taken of the interest a witness has in the outcome of the proceeding when assessing their overall credibility. The Court stated,

> The credibility of interested witnesses, particularly in cases of conflict of evidence, cannot be gauged solely by the test of whether the personal demeanour of the particular witness carried the conviction of truth. The test must reasonably subject his story to an examination of its consistency with the probabilities that surround the currently existing conditions. In short, the real test of the truth of the story of a witness in such a case must be its harmony with the preponderance of the probabilities which a practical and informed person would readily recognize as reasonable in that place and in those conditions.[62]

[61] Mr. Dhaliwal's self-interest in the outcome is not reason alone to discount his credibility. If this was the case, no person who is facing proceedings before the Immigration Division could be found to be credible as they all have an interest in the outcome of the proceedings. The Federal Court in the recent case of Tong discussed the application of Faryna v. Chorny in the context of IRB hearings, affirming that the Immigration Division ("the Division") is not authorized to undermine the credibility of a person subject to an allegation of inadmissibility solely because they have a "vested interest" in the outcome of the proceedings.[63] Rather, their evidence must be assessed with respect to the totality of the evidence before the Division, taking into consideration any self-interest, to determine whether it is credible and how much, if any, weight should be placed upon it. Thus, Mr. Dhaliwal's vested interest alone is not a reason to find him not credible or reliable but is one factor to consider when assessing the evidence on the record.

[62] Mr. Dhaliwal testified that around January 2019, he was residing with Mr. Dhindsa and Mr. Khaira in Brampton, Ontario. Around February 8, 2019, he attended a party with these two individuals where they got into an argument. He stated the argument was a result of him telling Mr. Dhindsa and Mr. Khaira that he was going to tell their parents that they were using illicit drugs. The next morning, they continued to argue, and Mr. Dhaliwal decided to move out of the residence he shared with them. He found a room with another friend that was available to rent and was advised by the landlord that he had to provide payment in cheque for the first and last months' rent and security deposit.[64]

[63] As Mr. Dhaliwal did not have the money for the rent at that time, he was planning to borrow the money from his friend, Mr. Gurm, whom he believed would e-transfer him $1595 he needed for the deposit.[65] Mr. Dhaliwal stated that he wished to transfer that money to his savings account to avoid that money being withdrawn for other purposes. He therefore wrote a cheque to himself from his chequing account in the amount of $1590 on February 10, 2019. He stated he accidentally deposited it into his chequing account on that same date as he was not familiar with the process of depositing cheques as he had never done so before.[66]

[64] Mr. Dhaliwal testified that he was contacted by a representative of Scotiabank on February 15, 2019, and asked about the cheque he deposited into his chequing account, which he explained was deposited into that account in error. He stated that he was not asked about any other NSF cheques that had been drawn against his account. This evidence is contradicted by the "Intralink Customer Notes" in Exhibit M-3, which show the bank representative did ask him this question.[67] I accept and prefer the Minister's evidence that Mr. Dhaliwal was asked about both his own cheque that was deposited into his chequing account along with the other NSF cheques that were deposited into other accounts during this phone call.[68] I accept as well that the bank employee found that Mr. Dhaliwal was not responsive to the question regarding the other cheques, and simply repeated his response with regards to his own cheque deposit being in error.[69]

[65] The Minister submits this speaks to Mr. Dhaliwal's lack of credibility in that it shows that he tailored his testimony to minimize his knowledge of the events and/or actions of the group. Although I accept the evidence of the bank, I do not find I can draw any negative credibility inference on this basis. His lack of response to the question by the bank with regards to the other NSF cheques is not evidence itself of guilt or culpability. The fact that he repeated what he had told the bank about his own cheque could support Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony that he was unaware of any other of his cheques being used and only recalls being asked about his own cheque. It could also, however, support the Minister's version that Mr. Dhaliwal was avoiding answering the bank. As it could reasonably be interpreted both ways, this point alone does not weigh heavily one way or the other.

Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony regarding the removal of cheques from his cheque book

[66] Mr. Dhaliwal initially testified that he removed two cheques, one for himself and one for the landlord, prior to leaving the cheque book with his items at the house he was residing in with Mr. Dhindsa and Mr. Khaira.[70] Later in his testimony, when asked why the cheque written to himself was numbered "003" if he only removed two cheques, he stated that the first cheque tore when removing it from the book, therefore he ripped it up and took out the following two cheques to use.[71] When asked about this discrepancy, Mr. Dhaliwal stated that he testified that, "when I took the cheques from my cheque book, I have only two (2) loose cheques. Apart from that, I do not have any other cheque."[72]

[67] I agree with the Minister that Mr. Dhaliwal's evidence on this issue changed in his testimony, however I do not agree that from this sole discretion the Division can infer that Mr. Dhaliwal's "answer and explanation for events seem to evolve and broaden and take up life of their own as the case progressed".[73] Rather, the evidence must be assessed in context of the totality of the evidence to determine whether it is in harmony with the preponderance of probabilities.

Mr. Dhaliwal's association with the other individuals identified by Scotiabank [68] The Minister submits that the cheques written to Mr. Bhavjeet Singh from Mr. Dhaliwal's account is evidence that contradicts Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony that he did not know any of the other five individuals named as part of the scheme. I find the evidence shows that Mr. Bhavjeet Singh was in receipt of cheques written from Mr. Dhaliwal's account; however, given Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony that he did not write these cheques, I cannot discredit Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony that he did not know Mr. Bhavjeet Singh by relying on cheques he testified he did not write.

[69] When examining the cheques written to Mr. Bhavjeet Singh, it is evident that the handwriting on these cheques differs greatly from Mr. Dhaliwal's handwriting as witnessed through Exhibit M-1, M-2, and from the cheque he acknowledged writing in Exhibit M-3.[74] The handwriting on all the cheques deposited by Mr. Bhavjeet Singh appears however to be consistent.[75]

[70] Additionally, I note that the cheques written to Mr. Bhavjeet Singh were dated in March 2019, and were numbered 008, 011, 013, 015, and 016.[76] On the other hand, the cheques written in February 2019, were numbered 004 through 007, 028, 031 through 039, and 041.[77] The difference in the handwriting of the cheques to Mr. Bhavjeet Singh versus those written to Mr. Dhindsa, Mr. Khaira, Mr. Gurkirat Singh, and Ms. Kaur, and the out-of-place numbering, suggests that these cheques may have been removed from the cheque book and provided to another individual to write.

[71] There is no other evidence on the record linking Mr. Dhaliwal to Mr. Bhavjeet Singh or the four other individuals noted by Scotiabank and the WRPS to have been involved in the scheme. I note Mr. Dhaliwal did not have any of the other five individuals on his e-transfer contact list, neither was he on any of theirs.[78] On the other hand, most of the other individuals do appear to have some connection between them. Mr. Bhavjeet Singh sent multiple e-transfers to an email address with Mr. Walia's name on it[79], Mr. Bhatti sent e-transfers to Ms. Dhillon[80], and Ms. Dhillon's contact list appears to contain both Mr. Bhatti's and Mr. Walia's e-mail addresses.[81]

[72] For these reasons, I do not find these cheques provide evidence that Mr. Dhaliwal knew of, or was associated with, Mr. Bhavjeet Singh.

Use of multiple signatures by Mr. Dhaliwal

[73] Detective Sibley in testimony, and the Minister in their submissions, pointed to the copy of Mr. Dhaliwal's passport, and the signatures contained in Exhibit M-2, to show that Mr. Dhaliwal has used different signatures in his legal documents in the past.[82] I accept the Minister's submissions that Mr. Dhaliwal had used two different signatures between his passport, immigration application, and CBSA form, as this can be seen in the documents in Exhibit M-2.[83] However, when asked about this Mr. Dhaliwal provided a reasonable explanation, that while he used two different signatures, one was his name written out, the other was done in a hurry, neither signature includes his last name "Dhaliwal", which he states he never uses when signing documents.[84] His testimony that these are the two signatures he uses is supported by the document entitled, "Authority to Release Personal Information to a Designated Representative" located in Exhibit M-2, which contains both of these signatures used together.[85]

[74] There are however multiple different signatures that were used to sign the backs of the cheques in dispute. These signatures either include "Dhaliwal", or only "Harmeet", or "Harry Dhaliwal". None of the signatures contain "Singh", which is the name Mr. Dhaliwal uses in his signatures. These signatures all significantly differ from Mr. Dhaliwal's signature on the documents referred to in Exhibit M-2 and the cheque he wrote in his own name, which is more akin to the signature depicted in his passport and immigration application form.[86] The signatures on the cheques as well as the handwriting will be discussed in further detail below.

Timing of discovering the missing cheque book

[75] The Minister submits that Mr. Gurm's evidence as to when Mr. Dhaliwal realized his cheque book was missing and began looking for it does not align with Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony that he discovered his cheque book was missing some time in March,[87] casting doubt on Mr. Dhaliwal's credibility. I do not find this submission is supported by the evidence. The Minister quoted Mr. Gurm's testimony where he stated, "So when he moved to our place, then he came to know that his cheque book is missing. And then, he started looking for his cheque book."[88] The Minister submits this must mean that it was only a short period of time after moving in with Mr. Gurm in mid-February that Mr. Dhaliwal began looking for his cheque book. If true, this would contradict Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony that he did not discover it missing until approximately mid-March.

[76] However, this is not a proper representation of Mr. Gurm's evidence on this point as he was asked further questions about this by both the panel and the Minister's counsel after providing the quoted response. In response to the panel's question, Mr. Gurm stated that he did not remember the date they began looking for the cheque book. However, when the Minister asked approximately how long it was in relation to when Mr. Dhaliwal moved in with him, he stated, "I think it is after almost one (1) month he started looking for the cheque book."[89] As Mr. Dhaliwal moved in with Mr. Gurm in mid-February 2019, this does in fact align with Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony.[90] Therefore, there is supporting evidence from Mr. Gurm that Mr. Dhaliwal did not discover his cheque book was missing until sometime in March.

Lack of a police report to corroborate his testimony that he attended the police station

[77] The Minister submits that Mr. Dhaliwal's evidence regarding the steps he took after discovering his missing cheque book and the usage of his account to be vague and lacking support in any documentary evidence. They rely on Detective Sibley's testimony that no police report or complaint was found in the system from him attending at the police station and submit Mr. Dhaliwal has not provided any credible evidence corroborating his testimony.[91] While Mr. Dhaliwal did not provide any corroborating evidence of his attendance at the police station, the impact of this, if any, needs to be viewed in the context of the entire situation.

[78] Mr. Dhaliwal testified that after he realized his cheque book was missing around mid-March, he attended the bank and the police station. He stated that when he went to the bank, he was told to lay a complaint with the police. However, when he attended at the police station, he stated he spoke with the receptionist who asked him whether he had lost any money, and he stated no. He testified he was told since he did not have any documents with him, they could not write a report, and he should go back to the bank and speak with them about cancelling his cheques.[92] Mr. Dhaliwal thus provided an explanation as to why he could not provide a copy of the report, being that since he had minimal information to provide the police with at that time, and had not suffered any loss, no report was written.

[79] Mr. Dhaliwal further testified that he followed the instructions of the police and went to the bank where he was provided with the copies of the cheques and his account statement. As will be discussed, Mr. Dhaliwal has provided corroborative evidence on this point.

[80] Mr. Dhaliwal stated he was told by Scotiabank when he went to speak with them on March 18, 2019, that they were conducting an investigation into this matter, that he need not take any action of his own, and they will advise if there was any amount owing by him.[93] He stated that he called them twice to follow up and they advised him both times that he did not owe them any money, and his account balance was $0.[94] Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony as to what he was advised by Scotiabank is supported by the other evidence on record.

[81] Specifically, the customer account summaries show that Mr. Dhaliwal's bank accounts were closed with the "amount due from customer" being $0.[95] Detective Sibley also stated in her testimony that the individuals were not asked to pay restitution, and it was not expected that any restitution would be made, which is one reason why criminal charges were not laid.[96]

[82] Detective Sibley testified that, "if somebody either suspects that their account has been compromised or they have been a victim of such offences as fraud, typically, you would contact your financial institution and/or police. You would contact Equifax or TransUnion and just ensure that your credit has not been affected" (emphasis added).[97]

[83] Mr. Dhaliwal did contact the financial institution, as Detective Sibley testified one would expect someone to do if their account was compromised or they were a victim of such an offence. He was advised that they were investigating the matter and ultimately, he was told that he did not owe the bank any money. If Mr. Dhaliwal was under the impression that the matter was taken care of by Scotiabank and there was no liability to him, I find it reasonable that he would not reattend at the police station to file a report. I note that neither CBSA nor the WRPS ever interviewed Mr. Dhaliwal, nor was he charged with any criminal offences in relation to this matter, thus any consequence of the misuse of the cheques was not made aware to him until July 28, 2023, when the inadmissibility package was mailed to him.[98]

Evidence of the confrontation with Mr. Himatveer Singh and Mr. Khaira's maternal uncle

[84] The Minister submits that Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony regarding the threat he received from Mr. Himatveer Singh and Mr. Khaira's maternal uncle is not credible. They submit his evidence is vague and not corroborated by any credible evidence, and further, that if Mr. Dhaliwal was in fact threatened, it is not credible that he would not have reported this event either to the police or his lawyer at the time.

[85] Mr. Dhaliwal testified that once he believed it was Mr. Dhindsa and Mr. Khaira who had taken his cheque book he tried to confront them, however he was unable to get a hold of them.[99] He therefore reached out to Mr. Khaira's cousin, Mr. Himatveer Singh, to discuss the matter and they decided to meet in a Tim Hortons.[100] Mr. Gurm as well as Mr. Khaira's maternal uncle were present for this conversation along with Mr. Dhaliwal and Mr. Himatveer Singh.[101] Mr. Dhaliwal testified the uncle advised him that if there are any losses that he suffers they would repay him the money, however if he tried to go to the police and place allegations on them, that they would retaliate.[102]

[86] Mr. Dhaliwal did not report this conversation to the police, nor did he advise his lawyer who was representing him on an unrelated matter.[103] When asked why he did do so, Mr. Dhaliwal stated he was concerned as he had an outstanding criminal matter in court and was worried about getting into further trouble.[104] He additionally testified, that he did follow up with the bank however, to ensure there was no loss or liability to him, which they confirmed.[105] For these reasons, Mr. Dhaliwal chose not to pursue this matter further.

[87] There is evidence from Mr. Gurm supporting Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony regarding this meeting. The Minister submits that Mr. Gurm's testimony should be given little weight as he was able to offer very little detail regarding his overall knowledge of the events.

[88] I respectfully disagree. I find Mr. Gurm to have been a credible and reliable witness with regards to the aspects of his evidence that he was present for and witnessed firsthand. I found that he testified in a straightforward manner and freely admitted when he did not have knowledge or was not present for an event, for example whether Mr. Dhaliwal spoke with the police or the bank.[106] Overall, I did not find that he embellished any portions of his evidence even where it would have benefited Mr. Dhaliwal for him to do so.

[89] I do not find the fact that Mr. Gurm knew very little about the overall scheme to be a negative factor, rather I find it to be positive, in that it suggests that Mr. Gurm did not tailor his testimony to reduce Mr. Dhaliwal's liability as he was not aware what the overall issue was at the admissibility hearing. I find it less likely that a third party who is a non-citizen would perjure themselves before the IRB, at the risk of criminal and potential immigration liability, solely to assist a friend. It is more likely that Mr. Grum testified credibly regarding the aspects of the case of which he had firsthand knowledge. This includes, most critically, the meeting with family members of Mr. Khaira and the threats that were issued at that time.

[90] Thus, I find Mr. Dhaliwal has provided some credible evidence of this meeting and what was discussed during it.

Mr. Dhaliwal's interactions with Scotiabank

[91] The Minister submits that the only documented interaction with Scotiabank is from February 15, 2019, per the "Intralink Customer Notes", thus Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony that he attended Scotiabank on other occasions is not credible or reliable.[107] However, this submission is contradicted by the evidence, as I find there is credible evidence that Mr. Dhaliwal attended at Scotiabank on March 18, 2019.

[94] The Minister submits that it was only after his involvement in the scheme was completed, that being after all the cheques had been deposited, that Mr. Dhaliwal attended at the bank.[110] While this is true, I note that the involvement of Mr. Dhaliwal's account was only for a period of five weeks, which is a relatively short period of time. Furthermore, I find it is less likely that someone who was actively engaged in a fraud scheme would present themselves to the bank to inquire about the fraud. It is more likely that a genuine victim would seek further information from the bank in person, than an offender would voluntarily return to the 'scene of the crime' as it were.

[95] I therefore find there is credible evidence corroborating Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony that he contacted Scotiabank on at least March 18, 2019, to address the concerns surrounding his bank account. This further supports his contention that he was in the dark regarding the use of his cheque book and attended the bank to inquire into the matter.

[96] In assessing Mr. Dhaliwal's evidence against all the credible and reliable evidence before me and taking into consideration his vested interest in the outcome of this proceeding, I find Mr. Dhaliwal to be a credible and reliable witness. Contrary to the Minister's submissions, there is credible evidence that supports the important aspects of Mr. Dhaliwal's version of events. Overall, I find his story is in "harmony with the preponderance of the probabilities which a practical and informed person would readily recognize as reasonable" based on the entire record before me. I therefore place significant weight on Mr. Dhaliwal's evidence in coming to my decision.

Membership in the organization

[97] In Chiau, the Federal Court of Appeal explained that the term "member" was not limited to a person who actively participated in criminal acts, or to one with a membership card whose name appeared on a membership list. Rather, it should be understood more broadly to mean simply a person who "belonged to" the criminal organization in question."[111] In Poshteh, the Court confirmed that "member" must be interpreted in a broad and unrestricted manner given the importance of public safety and national security in the underlying principles and purpose of the IRPA.[112]

[98] In Sinnaiah, the Court found that, "to establish 'membership' in an organization, there must at least be evidence of an 'institutional link' with, or 'knowing participation' in, the group's activities"[113] Section 37(1)(a) also encapsulates individuals who may not be found to be a "member" of the organization, but can be found to have "engaging in activity that is part of such a pattern".[114]

[99] I find the Minister has established that Mr. Dhaliwal's account was being used as part of the cheque kiting scheme. The Minister's evidence establishes that a total of 17 NSF cheques were written and deposited against Mr. Dhaliwal's bank account to various individuals between an eleven-day period from February 11, 2019 to February 22, 2019.[115] One of these NSF cheques was written by Mr. Dhaliwal to himself and was both withdrawn from, and deposited into, his chequing account.[116] Six cheques were also written from Mr. Dhaliwal's account and deposited by Mr. Bhavjeet Singh in March 2019.[117]

[100] Based on the Minister's evidence, there are reasonable grounds to believe that Mr. Dhaliwal's cheque book and bank account were being used to commit the offences listed above in conjunction with the organization. However, after assessing all the evidence I have found to be reliable and credible, I find Mr. Dhaliwal's explanations as to the misuse of his cheque book by individuals other than himself along with the evidence in support of that explanation, provide sufficient doubt to the Minister's allegations of Mr. Dhaliwal's involvement, such that they do not rise past a mere suspicion.

[101] For the reasons stated above, I accept Mr. Dhaliwal's testimony and find there is insufficient evidence before me to support reasonable grounds to believe that Mr. Dhaliwal wrote the NSF cheques to the individuals other than himself. There are significant deficiencies in the evidence presented by the Minister; most notably, this includes the fact the cheques that form the primary evidence against Mr. Dhaliwal contain various handwriting and signatures, none of which match that of Mr. Dhaliwal.

[102] The only cheque I can find reasonable grounds to believe was written by Mr. Dhaliwal is the one he testified to having written out to himself. As quoted above, cheque kiting "consists of drawing cheques on an account in one bank and depositing them in an account in a second bank when neither account has sufficient funds to cover the amounts drawn."[118] For this scheme to be successful, two different bank accounts are required. I consider that no loss would have been suffered by Scotiabank by the depositing and withdrawal of his own cheque to and from his own account, as Mr. Dhaliwal's own account would have been both debited and credited. During this time, Mr. Dhaliwal only transferred $50 to his savings account, then $20 from his savings back to his chequing account, and then withdrew that $20 from his chequing account.[119] This does not follow the pattern of the cheque kiting scheme and does not allow for any benefit to have been received by anyone.

[103] The Minister, relying on jurisprudence of the Federal Court, submits that, "even if actual knowledge is denied, it is sufficient that there be reasonable grounds to believe the person either knew of the criminal nature of the organization or of the criminal nature of the activities or was willfully blind to the criminal nature of the organization or activities."[120]

[104] Wilful blindness applies where the person is said to be a member of the organization, or having committed activities with the organization, but submits that they had no knowledge of the criminal activities or criminal nature of the organization. The cases cited by the Minister are significantly different on the facts to that before the panel. In Chung, the person concerned was a member of the Hells Angels organization, but argued, unsuccessfully, that he was not aware of the criminal nature of the organization.[121] In Chen, the person concerned was reported after the police raided a marijuana grow operation at the house which she was residing.[122] And finally, in Wang, the person concerned acknowledged having contributed to illicit activities while working for the immigration consultants who were found committing fraud.[123] She argued unsuccessfully that she was unaware of the fraudulent nature of her activities.

[105] I do not find the Minister has established on reasonable grounds to believe that there was an "institutional link" between Mr. Dhaliwal and the organization, or a "knowing participation in the group's activities", such that Mr. Dhaliwal would be found to be a member or engaging in a pattern of activity with the criminal organization. Thus, the question of whether Mr. Dhaliwal was aware of, or willfully blind to, the criminal nature of the organization is not applicable.

ORDER

[106] For the reasons stated, while I find Mr. Dhaliwal is a foreign national and that a criminal organization existed, I do not find the Minister has demonstrated reasonable grounds to believe that Mr. Dhaliwal was a member of, or engaged in a pattern of activity with, the criminal organization. I therefore find Mr. Dhaliwal is not a person described in s. 37(1)(a) and issue a favourable decision.

Dated the 15th day of December, 2020

(2020 ABQB 785, Docket: 1703 15571)

Memorandum of Judgment

The Court:

[1] The appellant The Driving Force obtained judgment against the corporate respondent I Spy-Eagle Eye Safety Inc. for amounts due under a number of vehicle leases: Driving Force Inc. v I Spy-Eagles Eyes Safety Inc., 2020 ABQB 785. It appeals the dismissal of its parallel claim against the individual respondent Juneau, the sole shareholder and director of I Spy. It also appeals the denial of its claim for the solicitor and client costs of the litigation.

[2] The respondents cross-appeal the findings of fact of the trial judge and his conclusions regarding the nature of the contractual arrangements between the parties.

Facts

[3] The Driving Force leased nine trucks to I Spy. It alleged that I Spy had stopped making payments on six of those trucks in August 2017 and had failed to return the trucks. It sued for the outstanding balances owed under the leases and for conversion of its trucks.

[4] The respondent Juneau is the sole shareholder and director of I Spy. She testified that she negotiated the leases on behalf of I Spy with Ms. Bergeron, a representative of The Driving Force. She testified that she had negotiated "leases to own" with Ms. Bergeron, and that after a 36-month lease term, I Spy had an option to buy the trucks for about $4,000. However, the respondents acknowledged that the lease documents signed with respect to the six disputed trucks had no such right to purchase in them. The trial judge found that the respondent Juneau was not a credible witness: reasons at para. 18. He concluded that there was no collateral agreement giving I Spy an option to purchase: reasons at paras. 38, 50.

[5] The trial judge found that I Spy was in breach of the six disputed lease agreements by failing to make the monthly payments after about August 2017, and by failing to return the trucks as required by the lease agreements. He rejected the respondents' arguments that their non-payment was justified a) by an agreement that one of the trucks was provided on a promotional basis, b) because I Spy was entitled to credit for "equity" it had built up in the trucks, or c) because The Driving Force had failed to provide adequate documentation respecting the leases: reasons at paras. 54, 60, 62. When I Spy failed to return the trucks at the end of the terms of the leases, The Driving Force continued to send monthly invoices, and the trial judge concluded that the leases had been extended on a month-to-month basis: reasons at para. 70.

[6] The trial judge concluded that I Spy was liable to The Driving Force in contract, but that it was also liable for the tort of conversion:

> [64] Driving Force also sues the Defendants for the tort of conversion.

2022 ABCA 25 (CanLII)

> [65] The tort of conversion involves a wrongful interference with the goods of another, such as taking, using, or destroying the goods in a manner inconsistent with the owner's right of possession. The tort is one of strict liability, and although the dispossession must arise as a result of the defendant's intentional act, it is no defence that the wrongful act was committed in all innocence (Boma Manufacturing Ltd. v. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, [1996] 3 SCR 727 at para. 31; 373409 Alberta Ltd. (Receiver of) v. Bank of Montreal, 2002 SCC 81 at para. 8). In Fleming's The Law of Torts (10th ed., 2011) at pp. 66-67, the following definition of conversion is found:
> > Conversion may be defined as an intentional exercise of control over a chattel which so seriously interferes with the right of another to control it that the intermeddler may justly be required to pay its full value.
> [66] In Clow v Gershman Transport International Ltd, 2000 ABQB 360 at para 13, Paperny J. (as she then was), adopted the following four essential features of conversion from G.H.L. Fridman, The Law of Torts in Canada, 3rd ed., (Toronto: Carswell, 1989) at p. 95: (1) a wrongful act; (2) involving a chattel; (3) consisting of handling, disposing or destruction of the chattel; (4) with the intention or effect of denying or negating the title of another person to such chattel.
> [67] I find that I Spy is liable to Driving Force in conversion. The conduct which constitutes the conversion is the same conduct which constitutes the breach of contract. By refusing to return the trucks beyond the cessation of its monthly rental payments, I Spy took and used the trucks in a manner inconsistent with Driving Force's right of possession. This exercise of control over the trucks has so seriously interfered with Driving Force's right to control the trucks that I Spy may justly be required to pay the trucks' full value. (Emphasis added)

The trial judge did not examine whether I Spy's right to have possession of the trucks under the leases constituted a defence to the claim in conversion.

[7] The trial judge concluded that the proper measure of damages in both contract and tort was the fair market value of the trucks on the date that they were not returned: reasons at paras. 70, 72. Neither party has appealed the somewhat unorthodox quantification of the damages.

[8] The Driving Force also sought judgment against the respondent Juneau, on the theory that as the sole shareholder and director of I Spy, she was equally complicit in the conversion of the trucks. The trial judge rejected this argument:

> [85] In the present case, it the requirements of the Kosmopolous [v Constitution Insurance Co, [1987] 1 SCR 2] test are not met. I Spy is not a sham corporation created to shield Ms. Juneau from personal liability. Rather, it is a company that > carried on business providing medical services to oilfield companies. Driving Force is a sophisticated commercial actor, and all of its documentation establishes that Driving Force understood that it was dealing with a corporation and not with Ms. Juneau in her personal capacity. Ms. Juneau's conduct, while intentional, was not fraudulent or deceitful. She mistakenly believed that I Spy was not required to pay the buyout prices demanded by Driving Force, and openly asserted those mistaken views to Driving Force.

The trial judge noted that the conduct said to constitute conversion (the failure to return the trucks at the end of the lease) was governed by the contracts between the parties: reasons at para. 89. This served to distinguish those cases where directors and officers of a corporation had been held liable for the torts of the corporation.

[9] The Driving Force claimed costs on a "solicitor and his own client basis", pursuant to a covenant in the lease agreements. The trial judge declined to award enhanced costs, meaning The Driving Force was only entitled to assessed costs on a party and party basis, doubled after the date certain offers were made: reasons at paras. 98-101; Driving Force Inc. v I Spy-Eagles Eyes Safety Inc., endorsement of Jan. 28, 2020. The Driving Force appeals the award of costs.

Issues and Standards of Review

[10] The standards of review are summarized in Housen v Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 SCR 235:

> (a) conclusions on issues of law are reviewed for correctness: Housen at para. 8,
>
> (b) findings of fact, including inferences drawn from the facts, are reviewed for palpable and overriding error: Housen at paras. 10, 23; see also H.L. v Canada (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 25 at para. 74, [2005] 1 SCR 401, and
> (c) findings on questions of mixed fact and law call for a "higher standard" of review, because "matters of mixed law and fact fall along a spectrum of particularity": Housen at paras. 28, 36. A deferential standard is appropriate where the decision results more from a consideration of the evidence as a whole, but a correctness standard can be applied when the error arises from the statement of the legal test: Housen at paras. 33, 36.

In this case, (a) the test for the tort of conversion, and (b) the test for when a director is concurrently liable for the torts of a corporation, present questions of law that are reviewed for correctness. The trial judge's findings of fact are entitled to deference, but whether those facts disclose, for example, the tort of conversion is a question of law reviewed for correctness. The decisions on other issues in this appeal are only reviewable for palpable and overriding error.

[11] The appeal raises two issues:

(a) Is the respondent Juneau jointly liable with the respondent I Spy for conversion? This raises the threshold question of whether the respondent I Spy is liable for conversion.

(b) Was The Driving Force entitled to solicitor and client costs?

[12] The cross appeal argues that the trial judge erred:

(a) by finding a series of unilateral contracts renewed month by month;

(b) by not drawing an adverse inference from the Appellant's failure to call Erin Bergeron and Brian Hogg at the trial;

(c) by misapprehending or overlooking the evidence of Ms. Juneau;

(d) by not finding a collateral agreement; and

(e) in the alternative, by not finding that I Spy was induced to contract on Ms. Bergeron's misrepresentations.

It is convenient to discuss the issues on the cross appeal first, as they go directly to the nature of the arrangements between the parties, something that underlies the other issues.

Challenges to the Findings of Fact

[13] The grounds of the cross-appeal to a large extent challenge the findings of fact made by the trial judge. Those findings will only be interfered with on appeal if they disclose palpable and overriding error.

[14] The Driving Force continued to send monthly invoices after the terms of the leases ended, and I Spy paid some of them. The trial judge found that when the trucks were not returned at the end of the terms of the leases, I Spy retained possession of them on a month-to-month basis. The respondents challenge this conclusion, but when I Spy retained possession of the trucks after expiry of the leases that must have been on the basis of some express or implied agreement or understanding. The exact legal characterization of that arrangement does not affect the outcome of this appeal. Where the parties continue to perform a contract after its expiry, including a lease, it is common and within reasonable commercial expectations to infer that the parties have treated the arrangement as continuing on a month-to-month basis. There was nothing unreasonable about this conclusion of the trial judge, and no reviewable error is shown.

[15] The respondents submitted at trial that an adverse inference should be drawn because The Driving Force failed to call two former employees as witnesses. Ms. Bergeron and Mr. Hogg were admittedly the local representatives for The Driving Force, and Juneau testified that Ms. Bergeron had agreed that the leases would include a right to purchase. Accordingly, I Spy argued that the failure to call her as a witness to rebut this evidence was significant. It is not clear if pre-trial questioning of these witnesses was undertaken or attempted by I Spy. By the time of the trial, The Driving Force could not locate Ms. Bergeron. Mr. Hogg, who had also left The Driving Force, was also not called. Whether an adverse inference should be drawn from the failure to call a witness is within the discretion of the trial judge, and the exercise of that discretion will not be interfered with on appeal unless it is unreasonable: Benhaim v St. Germain 2016 SCC 48 at paras. 42, 52, [2016] 2 SCR 352; Singh v Reddy, 2019 BCCA 79 at paras. 17-23, 23 BCLR (6th) 22; Pfeifer v Westfair Foods Ltd, 2004 ABCA 422 at para. 20, 361 AR 261. The respondents have not demonstrated any error in the trial judge's failure to draw an adverse inference, nor have they established that any adverse inference would have affected the outcome.

[16] The respondents note that the appellant did not give notice under R. 8.15 that it did not propose to call these two witnesses. The purpose of the notice would have been to allow the respondents to insist that the witnesses be called or to call the witnesses themselves. This rule, which is not mandatory, has little practical application in the case of witnesses who simply cannot be located. In any event, a failure to utilize the rule does not eliminate the trial judge's discretion over whether an adverse inference should be drawn.

[17] The respondents also argue that the trial judge "misapprehended or overlooked" the evidence of Ms. Juneau. This ground of appeal is not supported by the record. The trial judge extensively considered her evidence, but found that Ms. Juneau lacked credibility, and he therefore disregarded her evidence when it contradicted other evidence. No reviewable error has been shown.

[18] It follows that there was no reviewable error shown in the finding that there were no collateral "lease to own" agreements allowing I Spy to purchase the trucks at the end of the leases. The proof of those collateral agreements substantially depended on Ms. Juneau's evidence, which was disbelieved. Further, as the trial judge noted, the alleged collateral agreements involving a "lease to own" arrangement would have been inconsistent with the proven written agreements. No reviewable error has been shown.

[19] Finally, the cross-appeal asserts that the trial judge erred in not finding that I Spy entered into the lease agreements based on misrepresentations made by Ms. Bergeron. This allegation was not pleaded, and it was not discussed by the trial judge. Since this issue was not raised at trial, it was not an error for the trial judge not to discuss it, and on this record, it is not an issue that can be raised for the first time on appeal.

[20] In summary, the cross-appeal depends largely on challenges to the trial judge's fact findings. The findings of the trial judge regarding the arrangement between the parties do not disclose any palpable and overriding error. No other reviewable error is shown, and the cross-appeal is dismissed.

2022 ABCA 25 (CanLII)

The Liability of the Respondent Juneau

[21] The appellant argues that the respondent Juneau should have been found jointly liable with I Spy for the conversion of its trucks. This raises the following issues:

(a) Since the relationship between the parties is primarily grounded in contract, was The Driving Force entitled to sue in tort?

(b) Was the test for conversion met?

(c) When is a director of a corporation jointly liable for a tort of conversion committed on behalf of the corporation?

These three issues overlap in determining whether the respondent Juneau is liable to the appellant The Driving Force.

Concurrent Liability in Tort and Contract

[22] It is well established that when a party breaches a contract, that party might also be liable in tort. For example, when it is a term of the contract that a party will provide goods or services in a non-negligent manner, parallel obligations may arise under the tort of negligence: see e.g. Adeco Exploration Company Ltd. v Hunt Oil Company of Canada, Inc., 2008 ABCA 214, 437 AR 33, 94 Alta LR (4th) 270.

[23] However, in such situations, it is clear that the terms of the contract take primacy. The principles were confirmed in BG Checo International Ltd v British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, [1993] 1 SCR 12 at pp. 26-27:

> In our view, the general rule emerging from this Court's decision in Central Trust Co. v. Rafuse, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 147, is that where a given wrong prima facie supports an action in contract and in tort, the party may sue in either or both, except where the contract indicates that the parties intended to limit or negative the right to sue in tort. . . .
> Viewed thus, the only limit on the right to choose one's action is the principle of primacy of private ordering -- the right of individuals to arrange their affairs and assume risks in a different way than would be done by the law of tort. It is only to the extent that this private ordering contradicts the tort duty that the tort duty is diminished. The rule is not that one cannot sue concurrently in contract and tort where the contract limits or contradicts the tort duty. It is rather that the tort duty, a > general duty imputed by the law in all the relevant circumstances, must yield to the parties' superior right to arrange their rights and duties in a different way. . . .

BG Checo was a case where there was concurrent liability in contract and for the tort of negligent misrepresentation. The present appeal does not involve the tort of negligence, the most common ground of concurrent liability in contract and tort.

[24] This appeal, rather, essentially involves a matter of debt arising from a breach of contract. The amended statement of claim makes that clear:

> 8. As of November 2017, there remains due and owing from Eagles Eyes to TDF $57,175.00 for rental of the Vehicles under the Agreement. Eagles Eyes has failed or neglected to pay this amount and remains truly and justly indebted to TDF for that amount. Monthly Rent for the Vehicles continues to accrue at a rate of $11,445.00 per month. . . .
> Remedy Sought:
> 23. Judgment against Eagles Eyes and Ms. Juneau in the amount of $57,175.00 being rental arrear owing under the Agreement to November 2017 plus accruing rental arrears at a rate of $11,445 for every month Eagle Eyes and Ms. Juneau have possession of the Vehicles past November 2017; . . .

The claim in conversion was clearly secondary to the claim under the contract.

[25] The truck leases in this case were primarily a method of financing; rather than raising the capital to purchase trucks, I Spy was simply able to rent them. In this respect, the "private ordering" of the parties should be respected. This was in substance a debt transaction, and the remedies should prima facie be in contract and debt. If the rental payments were not made, or the trucks were not returned, the intention of the parties was that the remedy would be for breach of contract.

[26] The foundation of the parties' relationship in contract is important. It demonstrates and confirms that I Spy was lawfully entitled to possession of the trucks at the commencement of the leases, and recovery of them by The Driving Force was a matter of contractual right. This is not a situation where the alleged tortfeasor acquired possession of property without the consent of the owner of that property. Even though the respondents had a contractual obligation to return the trucks at the end of the lease, that does not mean that their possession after that point was tortious.

[27] There is another important consequence of the relationship between the parties being founded in contract. It is the absence of a covenant or contract of guaranty or indemnity. In this case, the parties to the lease agreements were The Driving Force and I Spy. Notably, Juneau is not a party to any of the six contested leases and did not provide a personal guarantee. The corporation I Spy is treated in law as a separate person, and the expectation in commercial dealings is that personal liability of the shareholders and directors of the corporation is engaged by getting a written guarantee. The attempt to find I Spy collaterally liable in conversion, even though this was primarily a debtor-creditor relationship, is to support a claim against the director Juneau. This has particular importance in determining whether Juneau is entitled to rely on the separate legal personality of the corporation, an issue discussed infra, paras. 50-59.

[28] In summary, the theoretical ability of The Driving Force to sue in tort is tempered by the fact that this was primarily a contractual relationship. A secured lender should not be able to engage the personal liability of the directors and shareholders of a corporate borrower simply by suing for tortious conversion of the collateral rather than in contract or debt.

The Tort of Conversion

[29] The Driving Force does not argue that Juneau could be directly liable for I Spy's breach of contract. The argument is that I Spy was not only liable for breach of contract but also for the tort of conversion, and that Juneau is jointly liable for that tort. This line of argument depends on I Spy being liable in conversion.

[30] In Boma Manufacturing Ltd. v Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, [1996] 3 SCR 727 at para. 31, the tort of conversion was described as "a wrongful interference with the goods of another, such as taking, using or destroying these goods in a manner inconsistent with the owner's right of possession". Kuwait Airways Corporation v Iraqi Airways Co (Nos 4 and 5), [2002] UKHL 19 at para. 39, [2002] 2 AC 883 stated:

> . . . Conversion of goods can occur in so many different circumstances that framing a precise definition of universal application is well nigh impossible. In general, the basic features of the tort are threefold. First, the defendant's conduct was inconsistent with the rights of the owner (or other person entitled to possession). Second, the conduct was deliberate, not accidental. Third, the conduct was so extensive an encroachment on the rights of the owner as to exclude him from use and possession of the goods. . . .

All the leading cases confirm that there is no universal test for the tort.

[31] One way of summarizing the test for conversion is found in Clow v Gershman Transport International Ltd, 2000 ABQB 360 at para. 13, 82 Alta LR (3d) 196, 265 AR 181:

(a) a wrongful act;

(b) involving a chattel;

(c) consisting of handling, disposing or destruction of the chattel;

> (d) with the intention or effect of denying or negating the title of another person to such chattel.

Although the liability of I Spy in conversion was not directly confronted by the parties, on this record the first and fourth components of this formulation of the test are not met.

[32] It is admitted that I Spy had possession of and exercised control over the trucks. However, finding that possession and control to be a "wrongful act" depends on finding that I Spy had no right to do so. The tort of conversion cannot be made out where the alleged tortfeasor is holding or dealing with the property with the consent of the owner: Raza Kayani LLP v Toronto-Dominion Bank, 2014 ONCA 862 at paras. 27-28, 378 DLR (4th) 729.

[33] The need for a wrongful act to make the conduct tortious was confirmed in 373409 Alberta Ltd. (Receiver of) v Bank of Montreal, 2002 SCC 81 at para. 9, [2002] 4 SCR 312:

>
> > It will be noted that the deprivation must be wrongful, for without the element of wrong no tort can be committed and conversion cannot occur; and to be wrongful, it must be wholly without the owner's sanction or assent, either express or implied. So, where the owner has given to another, or permitted him to have control of the property, no one can be held responsible in tort for its conversion who merely makes such use of the property or exercises such dominion over it as is warranted by the authority thus given. Otherwise expressed, it has been said that a rightful interference with the chattels of another cannot constitute a conversion. [Footnotes omitted.]
> The principle is reiterated in A. Grubb, ed., The Law of Tort (2002), at para. 11.170:
> > No action lies in conversion or trespass to chattels for consensual interferences with goods: the nature of these torts involves wrongful interference with goods and an interference that is consented to cannot be wrongful. Consent may be express, as in a contract or agreement for bailment or lease, or it may be implied from the circumstances. [Emphasis in original.]

While Boma Manufacturing at para. 31 described conversion as a tort of "strict liability", that only means that it is no defence that the deliberate wrongful act constituting the conversion was committed in all innocence as to the consequences of the act: L. Klar and C Jefferies, Tort Law, 6th ed, (Toronto: Thomson Reuters, 2017) at p. 118, fn 404. However, without a wrongful interference with the owner's rights, there is no tort.

[34] In this case, under the leases the respondents had the consent of the owner (The Driving Force) to possess the trucks. When the leases expired, The Driving Force treated them as month-to-month leases; implicitly the respondents had continuing consent to possess the trucks on a month-to-month basis. The Driving Force acknowledged at trial that its threat to report the trucks stolen was improper, again conceding that I Spy at least had a colour of right of possession.

[35] To be sufficient to constitute the tort of conversion, any "unlawful act" must somehow deny or negate the possession of the owner, The Driving Force. Merely breaching the lease agreements is not an "unlawful act" for the purpose of the tort of conversion, as the mere failure to make the rental payments does not terminate lawful possession. In this case, the respondents have done nothing with respect to the trucks other than to be in default of their obligations to make payments under the leases. This, the trial judge found, was as a result of their misunderstanding of their rights under those leases.

[36] The failure to make lease payments, however, does not render continuing possession of the chattel unlawful for the purposes of the tort of conversion, although it may entitle the lessor to a number of remedies. Nor does the mere possession of the trucks after the expiry of the leases itself make out a sufficient "wrongful act" to constitute the tort of conversion. The failure to return the trucks at the end of the lease, and at the end of the month-to-month arrangement, was ultimately found to be a breach of contract but did not amount to a "wrongful act" for the tort of conversion. The trial reasons err in the analysis at para. 67 that "The conduct which constitutes the conversion is the same conduct which constitutes the breach of contract".

[37] The appellant emphasizes that I Spy claimed a right of ownership to the vehicles, specifically that it was entitled to an option to purchase the vehicles at the end of the leases. With respect to some vehicles, I Spy alleged that it had paid all of its obligations. However, mere assertions of rights in the chattels are not "unlawful acts" for the purposes of the law of conversion. Even I Spy's "threats" to take the vehicles to the United States and sell them were mere words, insufficient to constitute a tort without some actual interference with The Driving Force's possession. Merely asserting a claim in the chattels, even if it could be described as "wrongful", does not sufficiently interfere with the possession of the owner to constitute conversion.

[38] The trial judge found that a legitimate dispute arose between the parties as to the respondents' rights to the trucks. In the end, the parties resorted to litigation to determine the issues between them, but asserting a defence in litigation to the owner's claim is not a wrongful act denying or negating the title of the owner: Sprung Instant Structures Ltd v Royal Bank of Canada, 2008 ABQB 30 at paras. 19-20, 87 Alta LR (4th) 111, 439 AR 334. Pleading claims or defences in litigation does not change the legal characterization of I Spy's possession. Other than resisting The Driving Force's claims, I Spy did nothing else with the trucks that negated The Driving Force's ultimately successful claim to the trucks.

[39] This is not to say that a lessee of chattels can never be liable for conversion. That, for example, would arise if the lessee does something wholly inconsistent with the rights of the owner, as, for example, if the lessee were to purport to sell the leased chattels to a third party without a right to do so: see CIT Financial Ltd v 1153461 Ontario Inc, [2004] OTC 700 at para. 61, 47 BLR (3d) 269; North General Wagon & Finance Co. Ltd. v Graham, [1950] 2 KB 7 (CA); BMW Financial Services (GB) Ltd. v Bhagwanani, [2007] EWCA Civ 1230. An element of deceit or dishonesty would also be sufficient. If the lessee were to assert ownership to a third party, who acted reasonably on that representation to the detriment of the true owner, that might in some circumstances amount to conversion. Likewise, once the trial judge determined that I Spy had no continuing right to possess the trucks, its claim to possession terminated, and if it thereafter exercised control over the trucks in defiance of the judgment that could possibly be seen as a conversion. As the trial judge found, there were no such acts involved in this case.

[40] The appellant particularly relies on CIT Financial, but that case is distinguishable based on its unusual facts. The trucks in question were jointly leased to a numbered company and its owner, Vander Heide. The parties that were ultimately found liable in conversion were the numbered company and R&R Trucking, which had taken over the business and the leases. The conversion, however, arose from the sale of the trucks to a third party following an insolvency, not merely from the failure to make the payments under the leases: reasons at para. 61. Merely transferring possession of the trucks to R&R Trucking was not a conversion, even though it was a breach of the leases: at para. 59. The facts underlying the present appeal are far removed from CIT Financial. In any event, even though the court found there had been a conversion, liability was not imposed on D'Amico, the controlling mind of R&R Trucking, because all of the dealings were on behalf of the corporation: reasons at para. 64.

[41] Defendants have been found liable in conversion in so many and varied fact situations that, as observed in Kuwait Airways at para. 39, "framing a precise definition of universal application is well nigh impossible". Despite that, there does not appear to be another reported case where a lessee in default of the covenants in a chattel lease has been found liable in conversion, as well as for breach of the lease. The absence of such a prior case is meaningful. The appellant relies on a number of decisions which recite the basic principles of the law of conversion, but they are all distinguishable on their facts.

[42] Clow v Gershman Transport, for example, involved a wrongful seizure. Even the seizure of Clow's truck, however, was not an act of conversion:

> 19 Interference on the basis of wrongful seizure has traditionally been viewed by the common law as an act of trespass for which the defendant may be answerable in damages (384238, supra, at p 685). Fridman [The Law of Torts in Canada, 3rd ed., (Toronto: Carswell, 1989)], at 96, states:

> "An unlawful distraint, or other wrongful seizure of goods, that deprives the plaintiff of possession without questioning the plaintiff's rights to such goods, may be trespass; it is not conversion."
> Later, at the same page, he explains that the distinction between the two is that trespass involves a simple interference with the plaintiff's possession whereas conversion requires the defendant to exercise rights of ownership over the goods.

Wrongful seizures have always been found to be answerable in tort but not necessarily conversion. Not every exercise of control over property, even if it is subsequently held to be unjustified, amounts to a denial of the title of the owner.

[43] There is a group of cases where landlords have been found liable in conversion for denying the tenant access to its chattels after the termination of the lease: Dean v Kotsopoulos, 2012 ONCA 143; 1384334 Alberta Ltd (cob Buster's Pizza) v Buster's Pizza Donair & Pasta Enterprises Ltd, 2020 ABQB 369 at paras. 88ff. These are not cases where a breach of a lease by failure to make the monthly payments has been found to result in conversion. In these cases, it is the landlord that is liable for conversion through wrongful seizure or distraint, not the lessee.

[44] There is another class of cases involving bills of exchange, such as cheques: 373409 Alberta Ltd.; Boma Manufacturing. Bills of exchange are treated as property which can be transferred from one person to another by negotiation. Since they are negotiable instruments, there is not always a contractual relationship between the drawer, the drawee, the payee, the collecting bank, and the endorsee of the cheque. Wrongful negotiation of cheques has therefore always been dealt with by the law of conversion. By a legal fiction, the cheque (which although it is a chattel is just a piece of paper) is deemed to have the value of the face amount of the cheque, allowing the court to give a meaningful remedy for any wrongful dealing with the piece of paper: Boma Manufacturing at paras. 36-37. These cases also depend on there being a "wrongful act" in the negotiating of the cheque; without such a wrongful act, there can be no conversion. But because of their unusual nature, cases concerning bills of exchange cannot automatically be applied in a different factual context.

[45] Another unusual fact situation arose in Freyberg v Fletcher Challenge Oil and Gas Inc, 2007 ABQB 353, 77 Alta LR (4th) 354 where the respondent oil company recovered natural gas from a formation under the honest but mistaken belief that it had a valid lease. The lease was ultimately found by the court to have terminated. The oil company, however, had captured a portion of the natural gas that belonged to the plaintiff: reasons at para. 101. The oil company was found to have converted the natural gas that belonged to the plaintiff, even though it had an honest belief in the validity of the lease. Freyberg, however, was not a situation where the damages in conversion were the equivalent of the failure to pay monthly amounts (royalties) due under the lease. The lease had in fact terminated in accordance with its terms, not because of a breach, and no further royalties were payable.

[46] In summary, the reasons under appeal incorrectly concluded that I Spy had converted the trucks owned by The Driving Force. As a general rule, the law of conversion should not be converted into a remedy for breaches of chattel leases, unless the lessee engages in some conduct with respect to the leased chattels that is completely inconsistent with any honest or legitimate assertion of the lessee's rights. In this case, I Spy was liable in contract, but liability in tort was not made out.

Potential Liability of the Respondent Juneau

[47] The asserted basis for finding the individual respondent Juneau liable to The Driving Force was primarily through the tort of conversion. However, since there was no conversion by I Spy, Juneau could not be jointly liable in tort. Alternatively, The Driving Force argued that the corporate veil should be lifted to make Juneau liable.

[49] This engages two separate but overlapping concepts. There are some occasions where the law will "lift the corporate veil", and find the directing minds behind the corporation responsible for the liabilities and obligations of the corporation. These situations are, however, an exception to the general rule that there is no personal liability for corporate obligations. The related concept is when the corporation and its human agents are concurrently liable in tort. When an individual is found to be concurrently liable for a tort committed in the name of a corporation, this is not truly an instance of "lifting the corporate veil". The liability of the individual is based on his or her breach of an individual duty owed in tort, not by lifting the corporate veil to impose the corporation's duty or liability on the individual. The arguments in this appeal did not always distinguish these two different concepts.

Lifting the Corporate Veil

[50] In this case the trial reasons initially treated the personal liability of Juneau as involving a lifting of the corporate veil: see supra, para. 8, quoting para. 85 of the reasons.

[51] The uncertainty surrounding "lifting the corporate veil" was identified in Kosmopoulos v Constitution Insurance Co, [1987] 1 SCR 2 at p. 10:

> As a general rule a corporation is a legal entity distinct from its shareholders: Salomon v. Salomon & Co., [1897] A.C. 22 (H.L.) The law on when a court may disregard this principle by "lifting the corporate veil" and regarding the company > as a mere "agent" or "puppet" of its controlling shareholder or parent corporation follows no consistent principle. The best that can be said is that the "separate entities" principle is not enforced when it would yield a result "too flagrantly opposed to justice, convenience or the interests of the Revenue": L.C.B. Gower, Modern Company Law (4th ed. 1979), at p. 112. (emphasis added)

Many subsequent cases have noted that stating that the test is whether the result is "too flagrantly opposed to justice, convenience or the interests of the Revenue" cannot be a workable test. It is more in the nature of a background principle or policy objective, to be balanced against the reluctance of the courts to undermine the concept of the separate corporate legal personality.

[52] In Prest v Petrodel Resources Ltd., 2013 UKSC 34 at para. 106, [2013] 2 AC 415 Lord Walker questioned whether "piercing the corporate veil" was a doctrine at all, or only a label or metaphor applied to cases not covered by other discrete principles, representing at best ". . . a small residual category in which the metaphor operates independently [where] no clear example has yet been identified". And as noted by Lord Walker, concurrent liability in tort does not, strictly speaking, invoke this concept.

[53] A frequently cited case is Transamerica Life Insurance Company of Canada v Canada Life Assurance Company (1996), 28 OR (3d) 423, aff'd [1997] OJ No 3754 (CA). It concluded at p. 431 that Kosmopoulos did not signal a departure from the traditional rule set out in Salomon v Salomon & Co., [1897] AC 22:

> There are undoubtedly situations where justice requires that the corporate veil be lifted. The cases and authorities already cited indicate that it will be difficult to define precisely when the corporate veil is to be lifted, but that lack of a precise test does not mean that a court is free to act as it pleases on some loosely defined "just and equitable" standard. . . . (at p. 433)

Transamerica confirms at pp. 433-34 that mere control, which in this context means "complete domination", is not sufficient to lift the corporate veil. There must additionally be some element of fraud, improper purpose, or improper activity which caused the plaintiff's loss: see Aubin v Petrone, 2020 ABCA 13 at paras. 23-26, 100 Alta LR (6th) 10; Yaiguaje v Chevron Corporation, 2018 ONCA 472 at paras. 67, 70, 141 OR (3d) 1, leave refused April 4, 2019, SCC #38183.

[54] In the absence of a unifying test, lifting-the-veil cases tend to be decided based on their own facts and circumstances: XY, LLC v Zhu, 2013 BCCA 352 at paras. 86-87, 366 DLR (4th) 443, leave refused [2014] 1 SCR xiii. For example, cases like Aubin v Petrone and Prest v Petrodel Resources are relevant in the specific context of matrimonial property disputes. They deal with the situation where the divisible matrimonial wealth is located in corporations that are controlled by one of the spouses, and they have little to offer outside that context. These decisions are often coloured by considerations of corporate oppression.

[55] It is sometimes said that the corporate veil will be lifted where the corporation is merely a "sham", or is just the "alter ego" of its controlling shareholders. This equally imprecise test is not often helpful, unless the corporation never, from the beginning, had any legitimate business or assets of its own and was merely being used as a pretext. As noted by Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC in VTB Capital plc v Nutritek International Corp., [2013] UKSC 5 at para. 124, [2013] 2 AC 337:

> 124. . . . Words such as "façade", and other expressions found in the cases, such as "the true facts", "sham", "mask", "cloak", "device", or "puppet" may be useful metaphors. However, such pejorative expressions are often dangerous, as they risk assisting moral indignation to triumph over legal principle, and, while they may enable the court to arrive at a result which seems fair in the case in question, they can also risk causing confusion and uncertainty in the law. . . .

In law, the corporation is a separate person, not an alter ego. In this appeal, at a factual level I Spy was not merely an alter ego, because it clearly had real business interests separate from those of its shareholder.

[56] One thing is clear. It is an error of principle to equate "control" of the corporation with the corporation merely being the alter ego of the shareholders. The Alberta Business Corporations Act, RSA 2000, c. B-9, permits "one person corporations" and gives them a separate legal personality just like any other corporation. It is an error to conclude that the corporation has no "real" independent existence simply because one person, being the sole shareholder and director, controls the corporation and is the ultimate beneficiary of any economic value within the corporation. Kosmopoulos at p. 11 cautioned against recognizing an "indefensible distinction" between single person corporations and other corporations.

[57] This point was made in the seminal case Salomon v Salomon & Co., where the corporation was controlled by Aron Solomon, and was incorporated expressly to carry on the business he previously carried on personally. The House of Lords disagreed that the corporation was merely an agent or alias for Aron Solomon, even though he clearly controlled it. As noted, this principle was adopted in Canada in Kosmopoulos, and was recently affirmed in England in VTB Capital at paras. 118-43.

[58] One highly relevant factor in determining whether the corporate veil should be lifted is whether the plaintiff voluntarily dealt with a limited liability corporation, knowing the consequences. The Driving Force operated a nation-wide leasing service, and was undoubtedly aware of the implications of dealing with limited liability corporations, and that the way to engage the personal liability of shareholders and directors was by insisting on joint covenants or personal guarantees. In fact, Juneau was a co-lessee on some leases that are not the subject of this appeal. In those circumstances, absent unusual circumstances or fraud, The Driving Force cannot argue that respecting the corporate veil is "flagrantly opposed to justice".

[59] In the circumstances of this case, there was no basis to lift the corporate veil. The Driving Force voluntarily contracted with I Spy, a properly incorporated entity with a separate legal personality. I Spy had its own business operations, and was entitled to, and did, incur its own obligations. Juneau was not a party to any of the six disputed leases, and did not sign a personal guarantee. These are strong indications that this is not a situation where the corporate personality was being misused, or that limiting The Driving Force's remedies to I Spy would be "flagrantly opposed to justice or convenience". There was no basis to lift the corporate veil to, in effect, make Juneau a co-covenantor on the leases: VTB Capital at para. 139.

Concurrent Liability in Tort

[60] The second basis on which Juneau might be personally liable would be as a concurrent tortfeasor with I Spy for the conversion of the leased chattels. The trial reasons at paras. 86, 89, 91 analyzed this as a type of "lifting of the corporate veil", although, as noted, it is conceptually different.

[61] The trial reasons primarily declined to find Juneau personally liable because there was no basis to "lift" or "pierce" the corporate veil. The parties' relationship was grounded in contract, and the principle of "primacy of private ordering" meant that "Driving Force may not avoid its agreements by the expedient of framing its claim in both contract and conversion": reasons at para. 91. The trial reasons concluded that since the facts founding liability in tort were the same as those founding liability in contract, there should not be concurrent liability in tort. The appellant argues that the trial judge erred, and that the principle of concurrent liability in tort should have entitled it to a judgment against Juneau for conversion.

> These cases demonstrate that when an individual chooses to convert property belonging to a third party and that property is in the possession of a company which he controls, the individual as well as the company is liable in tort . . .

There is a similar unqualified statement in Buster's Pizza at para. 94.

[63] The trial judge, however, preferred the analysis in CIT Financial Ltd. v 1153461 Ontario Inc. (2004), 47 BLR (3d) 269 (Ont SCJ). CIT Financial concluded that many of the cases relied on in Shibamoto dealt with fraudulent or sham transactions, and that "such a broad and unnuanced statement is not in accordance with the authorities." Shibamoto itself was based on a finding at p. 238 that the director was "the primary actor, not merely a secondary participant who was acting on behalf of the defendant companies".

[64] While it is recognized that corporations can only act through their human agents, and often a corporate tort will involve those human agents, concurrent liability is not always appropriate.

There is no fixed rule that a tort by a corporation always involves a concurrent tort by one of its human agents. Further, "control" of the corporation does not necessarily mean there was personal involvement in the tort. However, to date no unifying test has been identified for determining when concurrent personal liability will be imposed for corporate torts: Hall v Stewart, 2019 ABCA 98 at para. 18, 82 Alta LR (6th) 233, citing Hogarth v Rocky Mountain Slate Inc., 2013 ABCA 57 at paras. 112-3, 75 Alta LR (5th) 295, 542 AR 289; S. O'Byrne, Y. Philip, K. Fraser, The Tortious Liability of Directors and Officers to Third Parties in Common Law Canada (2017), 54:4 Alta L Rev 871 at pp. 871, 875; M. Khimji, C. Nicholls, Piercing the Corporate Veil Reframed as Evasion and Concealment (2015), 48 UBC L Rev 401 at paras. 1-3.

[65] Hall v Stewart at para. 18 extracted a number of factors that have been considered when determining if human agents should be concurrently liable for corporate torts. Omitting the citations of the supporting authorities, the identified factors are:

(a) Whether the tortious act was committed while engaged in the business of the corporation, and whether the tort of the employee was contemporaneous with that of the corporation;

(b) Whether the individual was pursuing any personal interest beyond the corporate interest;

(c) Whether the director or corporate representative owed a separate and distinct duty of care towards the injured party;

(d) That the conduct was "in the best interests of the company";

(e) Whether the plaintiff voluntarily dealt with the limited liability corporation, or had the corporate relationship "imposed" on it;

(f) The expectations of the parties, specifically whether it was reasonable for the plaintiff to think that the individuals involved would be personally responsible for any damage that resulted;

(g) Whether the tort was "independent". The cases sometimes say that the employee or individual is liable for his or her "independent" torts, implying that there are some torts which are so closely identified with corporate activity that they are not fairly categorized as "individual torts" as well;

(h) The case law clearly recognizes the rule in Said v Butt, [1920] 3 KB 497, respecting claims that individuals induced a breach of a corporate contract, which is not a situation of concurrent liability because the corporation is not liable in tort;

(i) The nature of the tort, and particularly whether it was an intentional tort;

(j) Whether the damage was physical or economic.

In light of the authorities, the trial judge was correct in declining to apply a universal and categorical rule that individual human agents of corporations are invariably concurrently liable for corporate torts.

[66] Which of the identified factors will prevail in any particular case depends heavily on the factual circumstances. It would be an error to draw a straight line between "control" and personal liability. Concurrent liability is more likely to be found in cases of intentional torts, particularly those causing physical damage, and any tort involving an element of deceit or dishonesty. The identified factors should always be weighed and applied having regard to the generalized concern about the effect that individual liability can have on the viability and efficacy of corporate structures.

[67] In the present circumstances, concurrent liability would be inappropriate. To the extent that the trucks were retained in breach of the leases, it was clearly a part of the business operations of the corporation I Spy. Whatever her involvement may have been, Juneau was only acting on behalf of the corporation, and had no "independent" or personal interest beyond that. The parties' relationship was in contract, and The Driving Force knew that it was dealing with I Spy, a corporation. It had no reasonable expectation that Juneau would be personally liable for the way that I Spy dealt with the leased trucks. The alleged tort of conversion was identical to the breaches of the leases. The claimed "damages" were economic in nature and were essentially a claim in debt. In short, concurrent liability for any corporate tort would be inappropriate on this record.

Summary

[68] In summary, there is no basis on this record to lift or pierce the corporate veil. Further, to the extent that there is even a corporate tort involved, it would be inappropriate to find the director Juneau concurrently liable for the tort, even though she controlled the corporation's operations. As a result, the appellant has failed to show any reviewable error in the dismissal of its claim against Juneau.

Costs

[69] The leases provided that in the case of default The Driving Force could terminate the leases, and repossess the trucks. As an additional remedy, they provided:

> Any repossession or other action DF may take shall not prejudice DF's right to recover in full any loss or damages together with the cost of any legal proceedings to enforce the terms of this Agreement, including costs on a solicitor and his own client basis.

2022 ABCA 25 (CanLII)

The appellant argues that, based on this provision, it was entitled to solicitor and client costs of the trial.

[70] The trial judge declined to award enhanced costs because:

(a) The clause in question did not contain a covenant to pay enhanced costs. It was a "non-waiver" clause that merely said that repossession of the trucks "shall not prejudice" The Driving Force's right to recover solicitor and client costs;

(b) A representative of The Driving Force had improperly threatened to report to the police that the trucks were stolen; and

(c) No proper effort had been made by The Driving Force to edit, select and organize the documents that were placed before the Court, making the resolution of the claim significantly more difficult than necessary.

On appeal the appellant challenges this conclusion.

[71] Costs awards are highly discretionary in nature, and a trial judge's award of costs will not be overruled on appeal unless it is based on an error of principle, or it is wholly unreasonable: Hamilton v Open Window Bakery Ltd, 2004 SCC 9 at paras. 24-7, [2004] 1 SCR 303; Kretschmer v Terrigno, 2012 ABCA 345 at paras. 1, 46, 539 AR 212. The trial judge's interpretation of the covenant on costs is itself entitled to deference: Sattva Capital Corp. v Creston Moly Corp., 2014 SCC 53 at paras. 50-54, [2014] 2 SCR 633.

[72] Even if there is a binding covenant to pay solicitor and client costs, the trial judge has a discretion to depart from that covenant having regard to the way the litigation was conducted, the proportionality of the expense related to the amounts in issue, the degree of success achieved, and other relevant factors: 3058354 Nova Scotia Co. v On*Site Equipment Ltd., 2011 ABCA 168 at para. 101, 48 Alta LR (5th) 404, 505 AR 289; Canadian Natural Resources Ltd v Wood Group Mustang (Canada) Inc, 2018 ABCA 305 at para. 107, 76 Alta LR (6th) 1.

[73] The appellant correctly points out that solicitor and client costs should not be awarded for misconduct that is unrelated to the prosecution of the action: Polar Ice Express Inc v Artic Glacier Inc, 2009 ABCA 20 at para. 21, 99 Alta LR (4th) 203, 446 AR 295; Pillar Resource Services Inc v PrimeWest Energy Inc, 2017 ABCA 19 at paras. 5-10, 46 Alta LR (6th) 224. This case concerns the denial of solicitor and client costs for similar reasons. While there are clearly some distinctions between the two situations, costs awards should be related to the conduct of the litigation. That may include anomalous situations where the misconduct actually caused the litigation, such that without that misconduct there would have been no dispute, but that is not the situation here. Costs awards are intended to indemnify the successful party for its expenses, and serve to encourage settlement and proportionate litigation. They are not intended to be a mechanism for rewarding or punishing the general character, conduct, or motivations of the litigants. There are other suitable mechanisms that serve that purpose: Smithies Holdings Inc v RCV Holdings Ltd, 2017 BCCA 177 at para. 134, 97 BCLR (5th) 88.

[74] While the costs award should not have been based on pre-litigation misconduct, the finding that there was no contractual right to solicitor and client costs was itself sufficient to justify the award. The trial judge's interpretation of the contract does not disclose any reviewable error. Absent a contractual provision, solicitor and client costs are exceptional. In this case the costs awarded to the appellant included enhanced costs to recognize its reasonable efforts to settle the litigation. Considered overall, the appellant has not been able to demonstrate any reviewable error in the award of costs.

[75] Of course, even if I Spy had covenanted to pay solicitor and client costs, that would not be binding on Juneau, who is not a party to any of the leases. Further, the covenant at its highest relates to "enforcing the terms of this Agreement". To the extent that The Driving Force was pursuing an independent claim in conversion, including an unsuccessful claim against the individual respondent Juneau, that would not obviously be litigation that would fall within the covenant.

[76] In summary, no reviewable error has been demonstrated in the award of costs.

Conclusion

[77] In conclusion, the appellant has failed to demonstrate any reviewable error, and the appeal is dismissed. For the reasons given, the cross-appeal is also dismissed.

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DE LA COLOMBIE-BRITANNIQUE

Preuve — Norme de preuve — Allégations d'agression sexuelle formulées dans une instance civile — Contradictions dans le témoignage du demandeur — La Cour d'appel a-t-elle eu tort de conclure que la juge du procès aurait dû appliquer une norme de preuve plus stricte que celle de la prépondérance des probabilités?

2008 SCC 53 (CanLII)

Evidence — Corroborative evidence — Allegations of sexual assault in a civil case — Whether victim must provide independent corroborating evidence.

Appeals — Standard of review — Applicable standard of appellate review on questions of fact and credibility.

From 1966 to 1974, H was a resident of the Sechelt Indian Residential School in British Columbia, an institution operated by the Oblates of Mary Immaculate and funded by the Canadian government. M was an Oblate Brother at the school and also the junior and intermediate boys' supervisor from 1965 to 1969. H claimed to have been sexually assaulted by M in the supervisors' washroom when he was approximately 10 years of age. These assaults were alleged to have occurred when the children were lined up and brought, one by one, into the washroom to be inspected by the supervisors for cleanliness. H told no one about the assaults until 2000, when he confided in his wife. He then commenced this action against the respondents. Despite inconsistencies in his testimony as to the frequency and gravity of the sexual assaults, the trial judge found that H was a credible witness and concluded that he had been anally raped by M on four occasions during the 1968-69 school year. In addition, she found that M had physically assaulted H by strapping him on numerous occasions. A majority of the Court of Appeal overturned the decision with respect to the sexual assaults on the grounds that the trial judge had failed to consider the serious inconsistencies in H's testimony in determining whether the alleged sexual assaults had been proven to the standard of proof that was "commensurate with the allegation", and had failed to scrutinize the evidence in the manner required.

Held: The appeal should be allowed and the trial judge's decision restored.

There is only one standard of proof in a civil case and that is proof on a balance of probabilities. Although there has been some suggestion in the case law that the criminal burden applies or that there is a shifting standard of proof, where, as here, criminal or morally blameworthy conduct is alleged, in Canada, there are no degrees of probability within that civil standard. If a trial judge expressly states the correct standard of proof, or does not express one at all, it will be presumed that the correct standard was applied unless it can be demonstrated that an incorrect standard was applied. Further, the appellate court must ensure that it does not substitute its own view of the facts with that of the trial judge in determining whether the correct standard was Preuve — Corroboration — Allégations d'agression sexuelle formulées dans une instance civile — Le témoignage de la victime doit-il faire l'objet d'une corroboration indépendante?

Appels — Norme de contrôle — Norme de contrôle applicable en appel aux questions de fait et de crédibilité.

De 1966 à 1974, H a été pensionnaire au Pensionnat indien de Sechelt, en Colombie-Britannique, un établissement dirigé par les Oblats de Marie Immaculée et financé par l'État canadien. Frère oblat au pensionnat, M a été surveillant des garçons les plus jeunes et de ceux d'âge intermédiaire de 1965 à 1969. H a prétendu qu'à l'âge d'environ 10 ans, M l'avait agressé sexuellement dans les toilettes des surveillants. Selon son témoignage, les enfants formaient des rangs et étaient emmenés à tour de rôle dans les toilettes pour que le surveillant s'assure de leur propreté : c'est alors qu'ils étaient agressés sexuellement. H n'a révélé les agressions subies qu'en 2000, se confiant alors à son épouse. Il a ensuite intenté son action contre les intimés. Malgré les contradictions de son témoignage quant à la fréquence et à la gravité des agressions sexuelles, la juge du procès a conclu à sa crédibilité en tant que témoin et déterminé que M l'avait sodomisé quatre fois pendant l'année scolaire 1968-1969. Elle a par ailleurs conclu que M avait agressé H physiquement en le frappant avec une lanière en cuir à de nombreuses occasions. Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont infirmé sa décision quant aux agressions sexuelles au motif qu'elle avait omis de prendre en compte les contradictions importantes du témoignage de H pour déterminer si les agressions sexuelles avaient été prouvées suivant la norme de preuve « proportionnée à l'allégation » et qu'elle n'avait pas examiné la preuve aussi attentivement qu'elle l'aurait dû.

Arrêt : Le pourvoi est accueilli et la décision de la juge de première instance est rétablie.

Dans une instance civile, une seule norme de preuve s'applique, celle de la prépondérance des probabilités. Bien que la jurisprudence ait donné à penser que la norme pénale ou une norme variable s'applique lorsque, comme en l'espèce, un comportement criminel ou moralement répréhensible est allégué, au Canada, la norme de preuve civile ne comporte pas de degrés de probabilité. Lorsque le juge du procès énonce expressément la bonne norme de preuve ou qu'il ne renvoie à aucune, il est présumé avoir appliqué la bonne, sauf preuve du contraire. Aussi, lorsqu'elle détermine si la bonne norme a été appliquée, la cour d'appel doit veiller à ne pas substituer sa propre interprétation des faits à celle du juge du procès. Dans toute instance civile, le applied. In every civil case, a judge should be mindful of, and, depending on the circumstances, may take into account, the seriousness of the allegations or consequences or inherent improbabilities, but these considerations do not alter the standard of proof. One legal rule applies in all cases and that is that the evidence must be scrutinized with care by the trial judge in deciding whether it is more likely than not that an alleged event has occurred. Further, the evidence must always be clear, convincing and cogent in order to satisfy the balance of probabilities test. In serious cases such as this one, where there is little other evidence than that of the plaintiff and the defendant, and the alleged events took place long ago, the judge is required to make a decision, even though this may be difficult. Appellate courts must accept that if a responsible trial judge finds for the plaintiff, the evidence was sufficiently clear, convincing and cogent to that judge that the plaintiff satisfied the balance of probabilities test. In this case, the Court of Appeal erred in holding the trial judge to a higher standard of proof. This is sufficient to decide the appeal. [30] [40] [44-46] [49] [53-54]

In finding that the trial judge failed to scrutinize H's evidence in the manner required by law, in light of the inconsistencies in his evidence and the lack of support from the surrounding circumstances, the Court of Appeal also incorrectly substituted its credibility assessment for that of the trial judge. Assessing credibility is clearly in the bailiwick of the trial judge for which he or she must be accorded a heightened degree of deference. Where proof is on a balance of probabilities, there is no rule as to when inconsistencies in the evidence of a plaintiff will cause a trial judge to conclude that the plaintiff's evidence is not credible or reliable. The trial judge must not consider the plaintiff's evidence in isolation, but should consider the totality of the evidence in the case, and assess the impact of any inconsistencies on questions of credibility and reliability pertaining to the core issue in the case. It is apparent from her reasons that the trial judge recognized this obligation upon her, and while she did not deal with every inconsistency, she did address in a general way the arguments put forward by the defence. Despite significant inconsistencies in his testimony concerning the frequency and severity of the sexual assaults, and the differences between his trial evidence and answers on previous occasions, the trial judge found that H was nevertheless a credible witness. Where a trial judge demonstrates that he or she is alive to the inconsistencies but still concludes that the witness was nonetheless credible, in the absence of palpable and overriding error, there is no basis for interference by the appellate court. Here, the Court of Appeal juge doit avoir présentes à l'esprit — et, selon les circonstances, il peut les prendre en compte — la gravité des allégations ou de leurs conséquences, ou encore, l'improbabilité intrinsèque, mais ces considérations ne modifient pas la norme de preuve. Une seule règle de droit vaut dans tous les cas : le juge du procès doit examiner attentivement la preuve pour décider si, selon toute vraisemblance, l'événement allégué a eu lieu. En outre, la preuve doit toujours être claire et convaincante pour satisfaire au critère de la prépondérance des probabilités. Dans le cas d'une allégation grave comme celle considérée en l'espèce, lorsque la preuve consiste essentiellement dans les témoignages du demandeur et du défendeur, et que les faits allégués se sont produits longtemps auparavant, aussi difficile que puisse être sa tâche, le juge doit trancher. Lorsqu'un juge consciencieux ajoute foi à la thèse du demandeur, la cour d'appel doit tenir pour acquis que la preuve était suffisamment claire et convaincante pour qu'il conclue au respect du critère de la prépondérance des probabilités. En l'espèce, la Cour d'appel a statué à tort que la juge du procès aurait dû appliquer une norme plus stricte. Cette conclusion suffit pour statuer sur le présent pourvoi. [30] [40] [44-46] [49] [53-54]

En concluant que la juge du procès avait omis d'examiner le témoignage de H aussi attentivement qu'elle l'aurait dû légalement, à la lumière des contradictions du témoignage et de l'absence d'élément circonstanciel le corroborant, la Cour d'appel a également substitué à tort son appréciation de la crédibilité à celle de la juge du procès. Il incombe clairement au juge du procès d'apprécier la crédibilité d'un témoin, de sorte que sa décision à cet égard justifie une grande déférence. Lorsque la norme de preuve applicable est celle de la prépondérance des probabilités, il n'y a pas de règle quant aux circonstances dans lesquelles les contradictions relevées dans le témoignage du demandeur amèneront le juge du procès à conclure que le témoignage n'est pas crédible ou digne de foi. En première instance, le juge ne doit pas considérer le témoignage du demandeur en vase clos. Il doit plutôt examiner l'ensemble de la preuve et déterminer l'incidence des contradictions sur les questions de crédibilité touchant au cœur du litige. Il appert de ses motifs que la juge du procès a reconnu cette obligation, et bien qu'elle n'ait pas considéré chacune des contradictions, elle a examiné de façon générale les arguments de la défense. Malgré les contradictions importantes du témoignage de H sur la fréquence et la gravité des agressions sexuelles, ainsi que les divergences entre son témoignage au procès et les réponses données précédemment, la juge du procès a estimé que H était un témoin digne de foi. Lorsque le juge du procès est conscient des contradictions, mais qu'il arrive quand même à la conclusion que le témoin identified no such error. [52] [58-59] [70] [72-73] [75-76]

In addition, while it is helpful and strengthens the evidence of the party relying on it, as a matter of law, in cases of oath against oath, there is no requirement that a sexual assault victim must provide independent corroborating evidence. Such evidence may not be available, especially where the alleged incidents took place decades earlier. Also, incidents of sexual assault normally occur in private. Requiring corroboration would elevate the evidentiary requirement in a civil case above that in a criminal case. Trial judges faced with allegations of sexual assault may find that they are required to make a decision on the basis of whether they believe the plaintiff or the defendant and as difficult as that may be, they are required to assess the evidence and make their determination without imposing a legal requirement for corroboration. In civil cases in which there is conflicting testimony, the judge must decide whether a fact occurred on a balance of probabilities, and provided the judge has not ignored evidence, finding the evidence of one party credible may well be conclusive of the result on an important issue because that evidence is inconsistent with that of the other party. In such cases, believing one party will mean explicitly or implicitly that the other party was not believed on an important issue. That may be especially true where a plaintiff makes allegations that are altogether denied by the defendant, as in this case. Here, the Court of Appeal was correct in finding that the trial judge did not ignore M's evidence or marginalize him, but simply believed H on essential matters rather than M. [77] [80-81] [86] [96]

Finally, an unsuccessful party may well be dissatisfied with the reasons of a trial judge, especially where he or she was not believed. Where findings of credibility must be made, it must be recognized that it may be very difficult for the trial judge to put into words the process by which the decision is arrived at, but that does not make the reasons inadequate. Nor are reasons inadequate because in hindsight, it may be possible to say that the reasons were not as clear and comprehensive as they might have been. The Court of Appeal found that the trial judge's reasons showed why she arrived at her conclusion that H had been sexually assaulted by M. Its conclusion that the trial judge's reasons were adequate should not be disturbed. [100-101] était digne de foi, sauf erreur manifeste et dominante, rien ne justifie l'intervention de la cour d'appel. En l'espèce, la Cour d'appel n'a pas relevé pareille erreur. [52] [58-59] [70] [72-73] [75-76]

Par ailleurs, même si la corroboration indépendante est utile et étoffe la preuve offerte, elle ne s'impose pas légalement lorsque, dans une affaire d'agression sexuelle, c'est la parole de la victime contre celle du défendeur. Il est possible qu'il ne puisse y avoir de corroboration, surtout lorsque les faits allégués se sont produits quelques décennies auparavant. Sans compter que les agressions sexuelles ont généralement lieu en privé. Exiger la corroboration rendrait la norme de preuve en matière civile plus stricte que celle appliquée en matière pénale. Dans une affaire d'agression sexuelle, la décision du juge du procès peut dépendre du fait qu'il ajoute foi au témoignage du demandeur ou à celui du défendeur, mais malgré ce dilemme, le juge doit apprécier la preuve et se prononcer sans exiger de corroboration. Au civil, lorsque les témoignages sont contradictoires, le juge est appelé à se prononcer sur la véracité du fait allégué selon la prépondérance des probabilités. S'il tient compte de tous les éléments de preuve, sa conclusion que le témoignage d'une partie est crédible peut fort bien être décisive, ce témoignage étant incompatible avec celui de l'autre partie. Croire une partie suppose alors explicitement ou non que l'on ne croit pas l'autre sur le point important en litige. C'est particulièrement le cas lorsque, comme en l'espèce, le demandeur formule des allégations que le défendeur nie en bloc. La Cour d'appel a eu raison de conclure que la juge du procès n'avait pas ignoré le témoignage de M ni marginalisé ce dernier, mais qu'elle avait simplement cru H plutôt que M sur des points importants. [77] [80-81] [86] [96]

Enfin, la partie qui n'a pas gain de cause peut juger insuffisants les motifs du juge du procès, surtout s'il ne l'a pas crue. Il faut reconnaître qu'il peut être très difficile au juge appelé à tirer des conclusions sur la crédibilité des témoins de préciser le raisonnement qui est à l'origine de sa décision, mais ses motifs ne sont pas insuffisants pour autant. Les motifs ne sont pas non plus insuffisants parce que, avec le recul, on peut dire qu'ils ne sont pas aussi clairs et exhaustifs qu'ils auraient pu l'être. La Cour d'appel a conclu que les motifs de la juge du procès expliquaient les raisons pour lesquelles elle avait conclu que H avait été agressé sexuellement par M. Les motifs de la juge du procès étaient suffisants et ils ne doivent pas être modifiés. [100-101]

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

[1] ROTHSTEIN J. — The Supreme Court of British Columbia found in a civil action that the respondent, Ian Hugh McDougall, a supervisor at the Sechelt Indian Residential School, had sexually assaulted the appellant, F.H., while he was a student during the 1968-69 school year. A majority of the British Columbia Court of Appeal allowed the respondent's appeal in part, and reversed the decision of the trial judge. I would allow the appeal to this Court and restore the judgment of the trial judge.

I. Facts

[2] The Sechelt Indian Residential School was established in 1904 in British Columbia. It was funded by the Canadian government and operated by the Oblates of Mary Immaculate. F.H. was a resident student at the school from September 1966 to March 1967 and again from September 1968 to June 1974. Ian Hugh McDougall was an Oblate Brother until 1970 and was the junior and intermediate boys' supervisor at the school from 1965 to 1969.

[3] The school building had three stories. Dormitories for junior and senior boys were located on the top floor. A supervisors' washroom was also located on the top floor and was accessible through a washroom for the boys. The intermediate boys' dormitory was on the second floor. McDougall had a room in the corner of that dormitory.

Version française du jugement de la Cour rendu par

[1] LE JUGE ROTHSTEIN — Dans le cadre d'une poursuite au civil, la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique a conclu que pendant l'année scolaire 1968-1969, l'intimé Ian Hugh McDougall, surveillant au Pensionnat indien de Sechelt, avait agressé sexuellement l'appelant, F.H., un ancien élève de l'établissement. Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique ont accueilli en partie l'appel de l'intimé et infirmé la décision de la juge du procès. Je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi et de rétablir le jugement de première instance.

I. Faits

[2] Le Pensionnat indien de Sechelt a vu le jour en Colombie-Britannique en 1904. Son financement était assuré par l'État canadien, et sa direction, par les Oblats de Marie Immaculée. F.H. y a séjourné de septembre 1966 à mars 1967, ainsi que de septembre 1968 à juin 1974. Frère Oblat jusqu'en 1970, Ian Hugh McDougall y a été surveillant des garçons les plus jeunes et de ceux d'âge intermédiaire de 1965 à 1969.

[4] F.H. claims to have been sexually assaulted by McDougall in the supervisors' washroom when he was approximately 10 years of age. At trial, he testified that McDougall sexually abused him on four occasions. The trial judge set out his evidence of these incidents at paras. 34-38 of her reasons:

As to the first occasion, F.H. had been in the dormitory with others. The defendant asked four boys to go upstairs to the main washroom where they were to wait before going to the supervisors' washroom for an examination. F.H. was the last to go into the washroom to be examined. When he went in, he was asked to remove his pyjamas and while facing the defendant, he was checked from head to toe. His penis was fondled. The defendant then turned him around, asked him to bend over and put his finger in his anus. He removed his clothing, grabbed F.H. around the waist, pulled him onto his lap and raped him. The defendant had put the cover of the toilet down and was using it as a seat. After the defendant ejaculated, he told the plaintiff to put on his pyjamas and leave the room.

F.H. was shocked. He did not cry or scream, nor did he say anything. When he went to the main communal washroom, he could see that he was bleeding. The next morning, he noticed blood in his pyjamas. He went downstairs to the boys' washroom and changed. The bloody pyjamas were rinsed and placed in his locker.

The second incident was approximately two weeks after the first. F.H. was in the dormitory getting ready for bed when the defendant asked him to go to the supervisors' washroom so he could do an examination. There were no other boys present. F.H. was asked to remove his pyjamas and again, he was raped. He went to the communal washroom to clean himself up. In the morning, he realized that his pyjamas were bloody. As it was laundry day, he threw his pyjamas in the laundry bin with the sheets.

The third incident occurred approximately one month later. F.H. testified that once again he was asked to go to the supervisors' washroom, remove his pyjamas and turn around. Again, the defendant grabbed him by the waist and raped him. He was bleeding, but could not recall whether there was blood on his pyjamas.

The fourth incident occurred approximately one month after the third. As he was getting ready for bed, the defendant grabbed him by the shoulder and took

[4] F.H. prétend qu'à l'âge d'environ 10 ans, M. McDougall l'a agressé sexuellement dans les toilettes des surveillants. Au procès, il a dit avoir subi quatre agressions. La juge du procès relate son témoignage aux par. 34-38 de ses motifs :

[TRADUCTION] La première fois, F.H. se trouvait dans le dortoir avec d'autres garçons. Le défendeur a demandé à quatre d'entre eux de se rendre aux toilettes principales à l'étage supérieur et d'attendre avant d'aller dans les toilettes des surveillants pour un examen. F.H. a été le dernier à s'y présenter. Le défendeur lui a demandé de retirer son pyjama et, alors que F.H. était de face, il l'a examiné des pieds à la tête. Il a caressé son pénis. Le défendeur l'a ensuite retourné, lui a demandé de se pencher et a inséré son doigt dans son anus. Le défendeur a enlevé ses vêtements, a empoigné F.H. par la taille, l'a mis sur ses genoux et l'a violé. Il avait rabattu le couvercle de la toilette, sur lequel il s'était assis. Après avoir éjaculé, il a dit au demandeur de remettre son pyjama et de quitter la pièce.

F.H. était sous le choc. Il n'a ni pleuré ni crié; il est demeuré silencieux. Lorsqu'il s'est rendu aux toilettes communes principales, il a constaté qu'il saignait. Le lendemain matin, il a remarqué la présence de sang dans son pyjama. Il est descendu aux toilettes des garçons et il s'est changé. Il a rincé son pyjama et l'a rangé dans son casier.

La deuxième agression s'est produite environ deux semaines plus tard. F.H. se trouvait dans le dortoir et se préparait à aller au lit lorsque le défendeur lui a dit de se rendre aux toilettes des surveillants pour un examen. Aucun autre garçon n'était présent. Il a demandé à F.H. d'enlever son pyjama, puis il l'a encore une fois violé. F.H. s'est rendu aux toilettes communes pour se laver. Le lendemain matin, il a constaté que son pyjama était taché de sang. Comme c'était jour de lessive, il a déposé son pyjama dans le panier à linge avec les draps.

La troisième agression a eu lieu environ un mois plus tard. Dans son témoignage, F.H. a dit qu'on lui avait une fois de plus demandé d'aller dans les toilettes des surveillants, d'enlever son pyjama et de se retourner. Encore une fois, le défendeur l'avait empoigné par la taille et l'avait violé. Il avait saigné, mais il ne se souvient pas s'il y avait des taches de sang sur son pyjama.

La quatrième agression est survenue environ un mois après la troisième. Alors que F.H. se préparait à aller au lit, le défendeur l'a saisi par les épaules et l'a emmené à him upstairs to the supervisors' washroom. Another rape occurred.

[5] F.H. did not tell anyone about the assaults until approximately the year 2000. He and his wife were having marital difficulties. She had learned of his extra-marital affair. He testified that because of the problems in his marriage he felt he had to tell his wife about his childhood experience. At his wife's recommendation, he sought counselling.

[6] F.H. commenced his action against the respondents on December 7, 2000, approximately 31 years after the alleged sexual assaults. In British Columbia there is no limitation period applicable to a cause of action based on sexual assault and the action may be brought at any time (see Limitation Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 266, s. 3(4)(l)).

II. Judgments Below

A. British Columbia Supreme Court, [2005] B.C.J. No. 2358 (QL), 2005 BCSC 1518

[7] F.H.'s action was joined with the action of R.C., another former resident of the school who made similar claims against the same parties. The parties agreed to have a trial on the following discrete issues of fact:

(1) Was either plaintiff physically or sexually abused while he attended the school?

(2) If the plaintiff was abused

(a) by whom was he abused?

(b) when did the abuse occur? and

(c) what are the particulars of the abuse?

[8] The trial judge, Gill J., began her reasons by noting that the answer to the questions agreed to by the parties depended on findings as to credibility and reliability. Few issues of law were raised. She referred to H.F. v. Canada (Attorney General), [2002] B.C.J. No. 436 (QL), 2002 BCSC 325, in l'étage supérieur dans les toilettes des surveillants. Un autre viol a été commis.

[5] F.H. n'a révélé les agressions subies que vers l'année 2000. Il vivait à ce moment des difficultés conjugales après que son épouse eut appris son infidélité. Il a témoigné qu'il avait alors ressenti le besoin de confier ce qu'il avait vécu enfant. Sur les conseils de son épouse, il a consulté une thérapeute.

II. Les décisions des juridictions inférieures

A. Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique, [2005] B.C.J. No. 2358 (QL), 2005 BCSC 1518

[TRADUCTION]

(1) L'un ou l'autre des demandeurs a-t-il été agressé physiquement ou sexuellement alors qu'il était pensionnaire?

(2) Dans l'affirmative,

a) qui l'a agressé,

b) à quel moment et

c) dans quelles circonstances?

[8] Après avoir présidé le procès, la juge Gill a d'abord fait remarquer dans ses motifs que la réponse à ces questions dépendait de la crédibilité attribuée aux témoignages. Peu de questions de droit étaient en cause. Elle a cité la décision H.F. c. Canada (Attorney General), [2002] B.C.J.

which the court stated that in cases involving serious allegations and grave consequences, the civil standard of proof that is "commensurate with the occasion" applied (para. 4).

[9] The trial judge then went on to review the testimony of each plaintiff, McDougall and others who worked at the school or were former students. McDougall denied the allegations of sexual abuse and testified that he could not recall ever strapping F.H. He also denied ever conducting physical examinations of the boys and gave evidence that boys were not taken into the supervisors' washroom.

[10] In determining whether F.H. was sexually assaulted, the trial judge dealt with the arguments of the defence that F.H.'s evidence was neither reliable nor credible. Gill J. rejected the defence's position that F.H.'s inability to respond to certain questions should lead to an adverse conclusion regarding the reliability of his evidence. She found F.H.'s testimony credible while acknowledging that the commission of the assaults in the manner described by F.H. would have carried with it a risk of detection. Gill J. also rejected the contention of defence counsel that F.H.'s motive to lie must weigh heavily against his credibility. Rather she agreed with counsel for F.H. that the circumstances surrounding his disclosure were not suggestive of concoction.

[11] The trial judge pointed out areas of consistency and inconsistency between F.H.'s testimony and that of the other students at the school. She also noted that there were significant discrepancies in the evidence given by F.H. as to the frequency of the abuse. At trial, F.H. said there were four incidents. On previous occasions, he said the abuse occurred every two weeks or ten days. Despite these inconsistencies, the trial judge concluded F.H. was a credible witness and stated that his evidence about "the nature of the assaults, the location and the times they occurred" had been consistent (para. 112). She concluded that F.H. had been sexually abused by McDougall, the sexual assaults

No. 436 (QL), 2002 BCSC 325, établissant que dans un cas d'allégations graves aux conséquences sérieuses, il y avait lieu d'appliquer la norme de preuve civile qui est [TRADUCTION] « proportionnée aux circonstances » (par. 4).

being four incidents of anal intercourse committed during the 1968-69 school year.

[12] In relation to the issue of physical abuse, the trial judge limited herself to deciding whether the plaintiffs had proved that they were strapped while at school. To answer this question, the trial judge reviewed the evidence of McDougall and the testimony of another Brother employed at the school as well as the testimony of several of F.H.'s fellow students. She concluded that strapping was a common form of discipline and that it was not used only in response to serious infractions. She concluded that F.H. was strapped by McDougall an undetermined number of times while at the school.

[13] With respect to the claims made by R.C., the trial judge found that he had not proven that he had been sexually assaulted, but found that he had been strapped by a person other than McDougall.

B. British Columbia Court of Appeal (2007), 68 B.C.L.R. (4th) 203, 2007 BCCA 212

[14] The decision of the Court of Appeal was delivered by Rowles J.A., with Southin J.A. concurring. Ryan J.A. dissented.

(1) Reasons of Rowles J.A.

[15] Rowles J.A. concluded that McDougall's appeal from that part of the order finding that he had sexually assaulted F.H. should be allowed; however his appeal from that part of the order finding that he had strapped F.H. should be dismissed.

[16] Rowles J.A. found that it was obvious that the trial judge was aware of the case authorities that have considered the standard of proof to be applied in cases where allegations of morally blameworthy conduct have been made, i.e. proof that is "commensurate with the occasion". However, in her view, the trial judge was bound to consider the serious inconsistencies in the evidence of F.H. in determining whether the alleged sexual assaults had been proven to the standard "commensurate with the allegation". She found that the trial judge did à quatre reprises pendant l'année scolaire 1968-1969.

(1) Motifs de la juge Rowles

[15] La juge Rowles a conclu qu'il y avait lieu d'accueillir l'appel interjeté par M. McDougall quant à la conclusion qu'il avait agressé sexuellement F.H., mais non quant à celle qu'il l'avait frappé avec une lanière en cuir.

not scrutinize the evidence in the manner required and thereby erred in law.

[17] In allowing the appeal in respect of the sexual assaults alleged by F.H., Rowles J.A. was of the opinion that in view of the state of the evidence on that issue, no practical purpose would be served by ordering a new trial.

(2) Concurring Reasons of Southin J.A.

[18] In her concurring reasons, Southin J.A. discussed the "troubling aspect" of the case — "how, in a civil case, is the evidence to be evaluated when it is oath against oath, and what is the relationship of the evaluation of the evidence to the burden of proof?" (para. 84).

[19] Southin J.A. held that it was of central importance that the gravity of the allegations be forefront in the trier of fact's approach to the evidence. It was not enough, in her view, to choose the testimony of the plaintiff over that of the defendant. Instead, "[t]o choose one over the other . . . requires . . . an articulated reason founded in evidence other than that of the plaintiff" (para. 106). Moreover, Southin J.A. found that Cory J.'s rejection in R. v. W. (D.), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 742, of the "either/or" approach to evaluating evidence of the Crown and the accused as to the conduct of the accused in criminal cases also applied to civil cases.

[20] In the end, she could not find in the trial judge's reasons a "legally acceptable articulated reason for accepting the plaintiff's evidence and rejecting the defendants' evidence" (para. 112).

(3) Dissenting Reasons of Ryan J.A.

[21] While sharing the concerns of the majority about "the perils of assigning liability in cases where the events have occurred so long ago", Ryan J.A. disagreed with the conclusion that the trial judge did not apply the proper standard of proof to her assessment of the evidence (para. 115).

preuve aussi attentivement qu'elle l'aurait dû, d'où l'erreur de droit.

(2) Motifs concordants de la juge Southin

(3) Motifs dissidents de la juge Ryan

[21] Même si elle partage les préoccupations des juges majoritaires concernant [TRADUCTION] « le risque d'imputer une responsabilité pour des faits survenus il y a aussi longtemps », la juge Ryan se refuse à conclure que la juge du procès n'a pas appliqué la bonne norme de preuve (par. 115).

[22] Ryan J.A. noted that the trial judge set out the test — a standard of proof commensurate with the occasion — early in her reasons. "Having set out the proper test, we must assume that she properly applied it, unless her reasons demonstrate otherwise" (para. 116).

[23] In the view of Ryan J.A., alleging that the trial judge misapplied the standard of proof to her assessment of the evidence was to say that the trial judge erred in her findings of fact. To overturn the trial judge's findings of fact, the appellate court must find that the trial judge made a manifest error, ignored conclusive or relevant evidence or drew unreasonable conclusions from it.

[24] Ryan J.A. was of the view that the trial judge had made no such error. The trial judge had acknowledged the most troubling aspect of F.H.'s testimony — that it was not consistent with earlier descriptions of the abuse — and decided that at its core, the testimony was consistent and truthful. The inconsistencies were not overlooked by the trial judge.

[25] Having found no error in the reasons for judgment, Ryan J.A. was of the view that the Court of Appeal should have deferred to the conclusions of the trial judge. Accordingly, she would have dismissed the appeal.

III. Analysis

A. The Standard of Proof

(1) Canadian Jurisprudence

[26] Much has been written as judges have attempted to reconcile the tension between the civil standard of proof on a balance of probabilities and cases in which allegations made against a defendant are particularly grave. Such cases include allegations of fraud, professional misconduct, and criminal conduct, particularly sexual assault against minors. As explained by L. R. Rothstein, R. A. Centa and E. Adams, in "Balancing Probabilities: The Overlooked Complexity of the Civil Standard

III. Analyse

A. La norme de preuve

(1) La jurisprudence canadienne

of Proof" in Special Lectures of the Law Society of Upper Canada 2003: The Law of Evidence (2004), 455, at p. 456:

These types of allegations are considered unique because they carry a moral stigma that will continue to have an impact on the individual after the completion of the case.

[27] Courts in British Columbia have tended to follow the approach of Lord Denning in Bater v. Bater, [1950] 2 All E.R. 458 (C.A.). Lord Denning was of the view that within the civil standard of proof on a balance of probabilities "there may be degrees of probability within that standard" (p. 459), depending upon the subject matter. He stated:

It does not adopt so high a degree as a criminal court, even when it is considering a charge of a criminal nature, but still it does require a degree of probability which is commensurate with the occasion. [p. 459]

[28] In the present case the trial judge referred to H.F. v. Canada (Attorney General), at para. 154, in which Neilson J. stated:

The court is justified in imposing a higher degree of probability which is "commensurate with the occasion": . . . .

[29] In the constitutional context, Dickson C.J. adopted the Bater approach in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103. In his view a "very high degree of probability" required that the evidence be cogent and persuasive and make clear the consequences of the decision one way or the other. He wrote at p. 138:

Having regard to the fact that s. 1 is being invoked for the purpose of justifying a violation of the constitutional rights and freedoms the Charter was designed to protect, a very high degree of probability will be, in the words of Lord Denning, "commensurate with the occasion". Where evidence is required in order to prove the constituent elements of a s. 1 inquiry, and this will generally be the case, it should be cogent and persuasive and make clear to the Court the consequences of imposing or not imposing the limit.

Probabilities : The Overlooked Complexity of the Civil Standard of Proof », dans Special Lectures of the Law Society of Upper Canada 2003 : The Law of Evidence (2004), 455, p. 456 :

[27] Les tribunaux de la Colombie-Britannique se sont généralement rangés à l'avis exprimé par lord Denning dans l'arrêt Bater c. Bater, [1950] 2 All E.R. 458 (C.A.), à savoir que la norme civile de la prépondérance des probabilités [TRADUCTION] « peut comporter des degrés de probabilité » (p. 459), selon l'objet du litige. Voici ce qu'il a dit :

[TRADUCTION] [Une cour civile] n'adopte pas une norme aussi sévère que le ferait une cour criminelle, même en examinant une accusation de nature criminelle, mais il reste qu'elle exige un degré de probabilité proportionné aux circonstances. [p. 459]

[TRADUCTION] La cour est justifiée d'exiger un degré de probabilité plus élevé qui soit « proportionné aux circonstances » : . . .

[29] Dans l'arrêt R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103, portant sur une question d'ordre constitutionnel, le juge en chef Dickson s'est rallié à l'approche formulée dans l'arrêt Bater. À son avis, un « degré très élevé de probabilité » exigeait que la preuve soit forte et persuasive et qu'elle fasse ressortir nettement les conséquences de la décision quelle qu'elle soit (p. 138) :

Compte tenu du fait que l'article premier est invoqué afin de justifier une violation des droits et libertés constitutionnels que la Charte vise à protéger, un degré très élevé de probabilité sera, pour reprendre l'expression de lord Denning, « proportionné aux circonstances ». Lorsqu'une preuve est nécessaire pour établir les éléments constitutifs d'une analyse en vertu de l'article premier, ce qui est généralement le cas, elle doit être forte et persuasive et faire ressortir nettement à la cour les conséquences d'une décision d'imposer ou de ne pas imposer la restriction.

[30] However, a "shifting standard" of probability has not been universally accepted. In Continental Insurance Co. v. Dalton Cartage Co., [1982] 1 S.C.R. 164, Laskin C.J. rejected a "shifting standard". Rather, to take account of the seriousness of the allegation, he was of the view that a trial judge should scrutinize the evidence with "greater care". At pp. 169-71 he stated:

> Where there is an allegation of conduct that is morally blameworthy or that could have a criminal or penal aspect and the allegation is made in civil litigation, the relevant burden of proof remains proof on a balance of probabilities. . . .
> . . . There is necessarily a matter of judgment involved in weighing evidence that goes to the burden of proof, and a trial judge is justified in scrutinizing evidence with greater care if there are serious allegations to be established by the proof that is offered. . . .
> I do not regard such an approach (the Bater approach) as a departure from a standard of proof based on a balance of probabilities nor as supporting a shifting standard. The question in all civil cases is what evidence with what weight that is accorded to it will move the court to conclude that proof on a balance of probabilities has been established.

[31] In Ontario Professional Discipline cases, the balance of probabilities requires that proof be "clear and convincing and based upon cogent evidence" (see Heath v. College of Physicians & Surgeons (Ontario) (1997), 6 Admin. L.R. (3d) 304 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.)), at para. 53).

(2) Recent United Kingdom Jurisprudence

[32] In the United Kingdom some decisions have indicated that depending upon the seriousness of the matters involved, even in civil cases, the criminal standard of proof should apply. In R (McCann) v. Crown Court at Manchester, [2003] 1 A.C. 787, [2002] UKHL 39, Lord Steyn said at para. 37:

> . . . I agree that, given the seriousness of matters involved, at least some reference to the heightened civil

> Chaque fois qu'il y a une allégation de conduite moralement blâmable ou qui peut revêtir un aspect criminel ou pénal et que l'allégation se présente dans le cadre d'un litige civil, le fardeau de la preuve qui s'applique est toujours celui de la preuve suivant la prépondérance des probabilités. . .
> . . . L'appréciation des éléments de preuve se rapportant au fardeau de la preuve implique nécessairement une question de jugement, et un juge de première instance est fondé à examiner la preuve plus attentivement si la preuve offerte doit établir des allégations sérieuses. . .
> Je n'estime pas que ce point de vue [celui de l'arrêt Bater] s'écarte du principe d'une norme de preuve fondée sur la prépondérance des probabilités ni qu'il appuie une norme variable. La question dans toutes les affaires civiles est de savoir quelle preuve il faut apporter et quel poids lui accorder pour que la cour conclue qu'on a fait la preuve suivant la prépondérance des probabilités.

[31] Suivant les décisions ontariennes rendues en matière de discipline professionnelle, la norme de la prépondérance des probabilités exige que la preuve soit [TRADUCTION] « claire et persuasive et qu'elle se fonde sur des éléments solides » (voir Heath c. College of Physicians & Surgeons (Ontario) (1997), 6 Admin. L.R. (3d) 304 (C. Ont. (Div. gén.)), par. 53).

(2) La jurisprudence britannique récente

[32] Au Royaume-Uni, il appert de certaines décisions que, selon la gravité des questions en jeu, la norme de preuve pénale s'applique même dans une affaire civile. Dans l'arrêt R (McCann) c. Crown Court at Manchester, [2003] 1 A.C. 787, [2002] UKHL 39, lord Steyn s'exprime comme suit au par. 37 :

> [TRADUCTION] . . . je conviens qu'en raison de la gravité des questions en jeu, il serait normalement nécessaire standard would usually be necessary: In re H (Minors) (Sexual Abuse: Standard of Proof) [1996] AC 563, 586 D-H, per Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead. For essentially practical reasons, the Recorder of Manchester decided to apply the criminal standard. The Court of Appeal said that would usually be the right course to adopt. Lord Bingham of Cornhill has observed that the heightened civil standard and the criminal standard are virtually indistinguishable. I do not disagree with any of these views. But in my view pragmatism dictates that the task of magistrates should be made more straightforward by ruling that they must in all cases under section 1 apply the criminal standard.

[33] Yet another consideration, that of "inherent probability or improbability of an event" was discussed by Lord Nicholls in In re H. (Minors) (Sexual Abuse: Standard of Proof), [1996] A.C. 563 (H.L.), at p. 586:

. . . the inherent probability or improbability of an event is itself a matter to be taken into account when weighing the probabilities and deciding whether, on balance, the event occurred. The more improbable the event, the stronger must be the evidence that it did occur before, on the balance of probability, its occurrence will be established.

[34] Most recently in In re B (Children), [2008] 3 W.L.R. 1, [2008] UKHL 35, a June 11, 2008 decision, the U.K. House of Lords again canvassed the issue of standard of proof. Subsequent to the hearing of the appeal, Mr. Southey, counsel for the Attorney General of Canada, with no objection from other counsel, brought this case to the attention of the Court.

Some confusion has however been caused by dicta which suggest that the standard of proof may vary with the gravity of the misconduct alleged or even the seriousness of the consequences for the person concerned. The cases in which such statements have been made fall into three categories. First, there are cases in which the court has for one purpose classified the proceedings as civil (for example, for the purposes of article 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms) but nevertheless thought that, because of the serious consequences of the de faire appel, dans une certaine mesure, à la norme de preuve civile plus stricte : In re H (Minors) (Sexual Abuse : Standard of Proof) [1996] AC 563, 586 D-H, lord Nicholls of Birkenhead. Essentiellement pour des raisons d'ordre pratique, le recorder de Manchester a décidé d'appliquer la norme pénale. La Cour d'appel a indiqué que ce choix est opportun dans la plupart des cas. Lord Bingham of Cornhill a fait remarquer que la norme civile plus stricte est presque identique à la norme appliquée au pénal. Je ne rejette aucun de ces points de vue. Mais à mon avis, le pragmatisme commande de faciliter la tâche des tribunaux en leur enjoignant d'appliquer la norme pénale dans toute affaire relative à l'article premier.

[35] Lord Hoffmann y fait état de la « confusion » qui règne au sein des tribunaux britanniques sur le sujet (par. 5) :

proceedings, the criminal standard of proof or something like it should be applied. Secondly, there are cases in which it has been observed that when some event is inherently improbable, strong evidence may be needed to persuade a tribunal that it more probably happened than not. Thirdly, there are cases in which judges are simply confused about whether they are talking about the standard of proof or about the role of inherent probabilities in deciding whether the burden of proving a fact to a given standard has been discharged.

[36] The unanimous conclusion of the House of Lords was that there is only one civil standard of proof. At para. 13, Lord Hoffmann states:

I think that the time has come to say, once and for all, that there is only one civil standard of proof and that is proof that the fact in issue more probably occurred than not.

However, Lord Hoffmann did not disapprove of application of the criminal standard depending upon the issue involved. Following his very clear statement that there is only one civil standard of proof, he somewhat enigmatically wrote, still in para. 13:

I do not intend to disapprove any of the cases in what I have called the first category, but I agree with the observation of Lord Steyn in McCann's case, at p. 812, that clarity would be greatly enhanced if the courts said simply that although the proceedings were civil, the nature of the particular issue involved made it appropriate to apply the criminal standard.

[37] Lord Hoffmann went on to express the view that taking account of inherent probabilities was not a rule of law. At para. 15 he stated:

I wish to lay some stress upon the words I have italicised ["to whatever extent is appropriate in the particular case"]. Lord Nicholls [In re H] was not laying down any rule of law. There is only one rule of law, namely that the occurrence of the fact in issue must be proved to have been more probable than not. Common sense, not law, requires that in deciding this question, regard should be had, to whatever extent appropriate, to inherent probabilities.

[38] In re B is a child case under the United Kingdom Children Act 1989. While her comments on standard of proof are confined to the 1989 Act, Baroness Hale explained that neither the seriousness of the allegation nor the seriousness of the la deuxième catégorie, le tribunal opine que lorsqu'un événement est intrinsèquement improbable, de solides éléments de preuve peuvent être nécessaires pour le convaincre qu'il est plus probable que l'événement se soit produit que le contraire. Dans la troisième catégorie, le juge confond simplement la norme de preuve et le rôle de la probabilité intrinsèque pour décider si une partie s'est acquittée ou non du fardeau de la preuve au regard de la norme applicable.

[TRADUCTION] Je pense que le temps est venu d'affirmer une fois pour toutes qu'il n'y a en matière civile qu'une seule norme de preuve : il doit être plus probable que le fait allégué s'est produit que le contraire.

Or, lord Hoffmann n'a pas désapprouvé l'application de la norme pénale selon la question en jeu. Après avoir très clairement énoncé qu'une seule norme de preuve s'appliquait en matière civile, il poursuit au par. 13 en tenant des propos plutôt énigmatiques :

[37] Lord Hoffmann ajoute que la prise en compte de la probabilité intrinsèque ne constitue pas une règle de droit (par. 15) :

[TRADUCTION] J'insiste sur les mots que j'ai mis en italiques [« dans la mesure où cela est indiqué dans les circonstances »]. Lord Nicholls [dans In re H] n'a pas énoncé une règle de droit. Il n'existe qu'une seule règle de droit : il faut prouver qu'il est plus probable que le fait a eu lieu que le contraire. Le sens commun — et non le droit — exige, pour trancher à cet égard, qu'on tienne compte, dans la mesure où cela est indiqué, de la probabilité intrinsèque.

[38] L'arrêt In re B a été rendu sous le régime de la Children Act 1989 du Royaume-Uni. Bien que ses observations sur la norme de preuve applicable ne valent que pour cette loi, la baronne Hale explique que ni la gravité de l'allégation ni celle consequences should make any difference to the standard of proof to be applied in determining the facts. At paras. 70-72, she stated:

My Lords, for that reason I would go further and announce loud and clear that the standard of proof in finding the facts necessary to establish the threshold under section 31(2) or the welfare considerations in section I of the 1989 Act is the simple balance of probabilities, neither more nor less. Neither the seriousness of the allegation nor the seriousness of the consequences should make any difference to the standard of proof to be applied in determining the facts. The inherent probabilities are simply something to be taken into account, where relevant, in deciding where the truth lies.

As to the seriousness of the consequences, they are serious either way. A child may find her relationship with her family seriously disrupted; or she may find herself still at risk of suffering serious harm. A parent may find his relationship with his child seriously disrupted; or he may find himself still at liberty to maltreat this or other children in the future.

As to the seriousness of the allegation, there is no logical or necessary connection between seriousness and probability. Some seriously harmful behaviour, such as murder, is sufficiently rare to be inherently improbable in most circumstances. Even then there are circumstances, such as a body with its throat cut and no weapon to hand, where it is not at all improbable. Other seriously harmful behaviour, such as alcohol or drug abuse, is regrettably all too common and not at all improbable.

(3) Summary of Various Approaches

[39] I summarize the various approaches in civil cases where criminal or morally blameworthy conduct is alleged as I understand them:

(1) The criminal standard of proof applies in civil cases depending upon the seriousness of the allegation;

(2) An intermediate standard of proof between the civil standard and the criminal standard commensurate with the occasion applies to civil cases;

(3) No heightened standard of proof applies in civil cases, but the evidence must be scrutinized with greater care where the allegation is serious;

des conséquences possibles ne devraient modifier la norme de preuve appliquée pour établir les faits. Voici ce qu'elle dit aux par. 70-72 :

Pour ce qui est des conséquences, elles sont toujours sérieuses quelle que soit l'issue de l'instance. L'enfant peut voir sa relation avec sa famille sérieusement compromise ou s'exposer encore à un préjudice important. À l'inverse, le père ou la mère peut voir sa relation avec l'enfant sérieusement compromise ou avoir encore la possibilité de maltraiter cet enfant ou un autre.

Pour ce qui est de la gravité de l'allégation, il n'y a pas de lien logique ou nécessaire entre gravité et probabilité. Le comportement gravement préjudiciable — comme le meurtre — est suffisamment rare pour être la plupart du temps intrinsèquement improbable. Malgré cela, lorsque, par exemple, on découvre un corps à la gorge tranchée, mais aucune arme à proximité, le meurtre est loin d'être improbable. D'autres comportements gravement préjudiciables, comme l'alcoolisme ou la toxicomanie, sont malheureusement trop répandus et loin d'être improbables.

(3) Résumé des différentes approches

(1) La norme de preuve pénale s'applique selon la gravité de l'allégation.

(2) Une norme de preuve intermédiaire se situant entre la civile et la pénale, proportionnée aux circonstances, s'applique.

(3) Lorsque l'allégation est grave, la norme de preuve n'est pas plus stricte, mais la preuve doit faire l'objet d'un examen plus attentif.

(4) No heightened standard of proof applies in civil cases, but evidence must be clear, convincing and cogent; and

(5) No heightened standard of proof applies in civil cases, but the more improbable the event, the stronger the evidence is needed to meet the balance of probabilities test.

(4) The Approach Canadian Courts Should Now Adopt

[40] Like the House of Lords, I think it is time to say, once and for all in Canada, that there is only one civil standard of proof at common law and that is proof on a balance of probabilities. Of course, context is all important and a judge should not be unmindful, where appropriate, of inherent probabilities or improbabilities or the seriousness of the allegations or consequences. However, these considerations do not change the standard of proof. I am of the respectful opinion that the alternatives I have listed above should be rejected for the reasons that follow.

[41] Since Hanes v. Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Co., [1963] S.C.R. 154, at pp. 158-64, it has been clear that the criminal standard is not to be applied to civil cases in Canada. The criminal standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt is linked to the presumption of innocence in criminal trials. The burden of proof always remains with the prosecution. As explained by Cory J. in R. v. Lifchus, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 320, at para. 27:

First, it must be made clear to the jury that the standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt is vitally important since it is inextricably linked to that basic premise which is fundamental to all criminal trials: the presumption of innocence. The two concepts are forever as closely linked as Romeo with Juliet or Oberon with Titania and they must be presented together as a unit. If the presumption of innocence is the golden thread of criminal justice then proof beyond a reasonable doubt is the silver and these two threads are forever intertwined in the fabric of criminal law. Jurors must be reminded that the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt

(4) La norme de preuve n'est pas plus stricte, mais la preuve doit être claire et convaincante.

(5) La norme de preuve n'est pas plus stricte, mais plus l'événement est improbable, plus la preuve doit être solide pour satisfaire au critère de la prépondérance des probabilités.

(4) L'approche qui devrait désormais être celle des cours de justice canadiennes

Premièrement, il faut indiquer clairement au jury que la norme de la preuve hors de tout doute raisonnable a une importance vitale puisqu'elle est inextricablement liée au principe fondamental de tous les procès pénaux : la présomption d'innocence. Ces deux concepts sont pour toujours intimement liés l'un à l'autre, comme Roméo et Juliette ou Oberon et Titania, et ils doivent être présentés comme formant un tout. Si la présomption d'innocence est le fil d'or de la justice pénale, alors la preuve hors de tout doute raisonnable en est le fil d'argent, et ces deux fils sont pour toujours entrelacés pour former la trame du droit pénal. Il faut that the accused committed the crime rests with the prosecution throughout the trial and never shifts to the accused.

[42] By contrast, in civil cases, there is no presumption of innocence. As explained by J. Sopinka, S. N. Lederman and A. W. Bryant, The Law of Evidence in Canada (2nd ed. 1999), at p. 154:

Since society is indifferent to whether the plaintiff or the defendant wins a particular civil suit, it is unnecessary to protect against an erroneous result by requiring a standard of proof higher than a balance of probabilities.

It is true that there may be serious consequences to a finding of liability in a civil case that continue past the end of the case. However, the civil case does not involve the government's power to penalize or take away the liberty of the individual.

[43] An intermediate standard of proof presents practical problems. As expressed by Rothstein, Centa and Adams, at pp. 466-67:

As well, suggesting that the standard of proof is "higher" than the "mere balance of probabilities" inevitably leads one to inquire: what percentage of probability must be met? This is unhelpful because while the concept of "51 percent probability," or "more likely than not" can be understood by decisionmakers, the concept of 60 percent or 70 percent probability cannot.

[44] Put another way, it would seem incongruous for a judge to conclude that it was more likely than not that an event occurred, but not sufficiently likely to some unspecified standard and therefore that it did not occur. As Lord Hoffmann explained in In re B at para. 2:

If a legal rule requires a fact to be proved (a "fact in issue"), a judge or jury must decide whether or not it happened. There is no room for a finding that it might have happened. The law operates a binary system in which the only values are zero and one. The fact either happened or it did not. If the tribunal is left in doubt, the doubt is resolved by a rule that one party or the other rappeler aux jurés que le fardeau de prouver hors de tout doute raisonnable que l'accusé a commis le crime incombe à la poursuite tout au long du procès, et qu'il ne se déplace jamais sur les épaules de l'accusé.

[42] À l'opposé, dans une affaire civile, nulle présomption d'innocence ne s'applique. L'explication en est donnée dans J. Sopinka, S. N. Lederman et A. W. Bryant, The Law of Evidence in Canada (2e éd. 1999), p. 154 :

[TRADUCTION] Comme il importe peu à la société que le demandeur ou le défendeur ait gain de cause dans une instance civile, il n'y a pas lieu de prévenir un jugement erroné en appliquant une norme de preuve plus stricte que celle de la prépondérance des probabilités.

Il est vrai qu'une conclusion de responsabilité tirée dans une affaire civile peut avoir des conséquences sérieuses qui continuent de se faire sentir après l'instance. Mais il demeure qu'une affaire civile ne fait pas intervenir le pouvoir de l'État de punir une personne ou de la priver de sa liberté.

[44] Autrement dit, il semblerait incongru qu'un juge conclue qu'il est probable, mais pas assez probable suivant une norme non précisée, qu'un événement ait eu lieu et, par conséquent, que cet événement ne s'est pas produit. Comme l'explique lord Hoffmann dans l'arrêt In re B, par. 2 :

[TRADUCTION] Lorsqu'une règle de droit exige la preuve d'un fait (le « fait en litige »), le juge ou le jury doit déterminer si le fait s'est ou non produit. Il ne saurait conclure qu'il a pu se produire. Le droit est un système binaire, les seules valeurs possibles étant zéro et un. Ou bien le fait s'est produit, ou bien il ne s'est pas produit. Lorsqu'un doute subsiste, la règle selon laquelle carries the burden of proof. If the party who bears the burden of proof fails to discharge it, a value of zero is returned and the fact is treated as not having happened. If he does discharge it, a value of one is returned and the fact is treated as having happened.

In my view, the only practical way in which to reach a factual conclusion in a civil case is to decide whether it is more likely than not that the event occurred.

[45] To suggest that depending upon the seriousness, the evidence in the civil case must be scrutinized with greater care implies that in less serious cases the evidence need not be scrutinized with such care. I think it is inappropriate to say that there are legally recognized different levels of scrutiny of the evidence depending upon the seriousness of the case. There is only one legal rule and that is that in all cases, evidence must be scrutinized with care by the trial judge.

[46] Similarly, evidence must always be sufficiently clear, convincing and cogent to satisfy the balance of probabilities test. But again, there is no objective standard to measure sufficiency. In serious cases, like the present, judges may be faced with evidence of events that are alleged to have occurred many years before, where there is little other evidence than that of the plaintiff and defendant. As difficult as the task may be, the judge must make a decision. If a responsible judge finds for the plaintiff, it must be accepted that the evidence was sufficiently clear, convincing and cogent to that judge that the plaintiff satisfied the balance of probabilities test.

[47] Finally there may be cases in which there is an inherent improbability that an event occurred. Inherent improbability will always depend upon the circumstances. As Baroness Hale stated in In re B, at para. 72:

Consider the famous example of the animal seen in Regent's Park. If it is seen outside the zoo on a stretch of greensward regularly used for walking dogs, then of course it is more likely to be a dog than a lion. If it is le fardeau de la preuve incombe à l'une ou l'autre des parties permet de trancher. Lorsque la partie à laquelle incombe la preuve ne s'acquitte pas de son obligation, la valeur est de zéro et le fait est réputé ne pas avoir eu lieu. Lorsqu'elle s'en acquitte, la valeur est de un, et le fait est réputé s'être produit.

À mon avis, la seule façon possible d'arriver à une conclusion de fait dans une instance civile consiste à déterminer si, selon toute vraisemblance, l'événement a eu lieu.

[46] De même, la preuve doit toujours être claire et convaincante pour satisfaire au critère de la prépondérance des probabilités. Mais, je le répète, aucune norme objective ne permet de déterminer qu'elle l'est suffisamment. Dans le cas d'une allégation grave comme celle considérée en l'espèce, le juge peut être appelé à apprécier la preuve de faits qui se seraient produits de nombreuses années auparavant, une preuve constituée essentiellement des témoignages du demandeur et du défendeur. Aussi difficile que puisse être sa tâche, le juge doit trancher. Lorsqu'un juge consciencieux ajoute foi à la thèse du demandeur, il faut tenir pour acquis que la preuve était à ses yeux suffisamment claire et convaincante pour conclure au respect du critère de la prépondérance des probabilités.

[47] Enfin, il peut arriver que le fait soit intrinsèquement improbable. L'improbabilité intrinsèque dépend toujours des circonstances. Comme le dit la baronne Hale dans l'arrêt In re B, par. 72 :

seen in the zoo next to the lions' enclosure when the door is open, then it may well be more likely to be a lion than a dog.

[48] Some alleged events may be highly improbable. Others less so. There can be no rule as to when and to what extent inherent improbability must be taken into account by a trial judge. As Lord Hoffmann observed at para. 15 of In re B:

Common sense, not law, requires that in deciding this question, regard should be had, to whatever extent appropriate, to inherent probabilities.

It will be for the trial judge to decide to what extent, if any, the circumstances suggest that an allegation is inherently improbable and where appropriate, that may be taken into account in the assessment of whether the evidence establishes that it is more likely than not that the event occurred. However, there can be no rule of law imposing such a formula.

(5) Conclusion on Standard of Proof

[49] In the result, I would reaffirm that in civil cases there is only one standard of proof and that is proof on a balance of probabilities. In all civil cases, the trial judge must scrutinize the relevant evidence with care to determine whether it is more likely than not that an alleged event occurred.

[50] I turn now to the issues particular to this case.

B. The Concerns of the Court of Appeal Respecting Inconsistency in the Evidence of F.H.

[51] The level of scrutiny required in cases of sexual assault was central to the analysis of the Court of Appeal. According to Rowles J.A. at para. 72, one of the issues was "whether the trial judge, in light of the standard of proof that had to be applied in a case such as this, failed to consider chien que d'un lion. S'il est vu à l'intérieur du zoo, près de l'enclos des lions, dont la porte est ouverte, il se peut fort bien qu'il soit plus vraisemblable qu'il s'agisse d'un lion que d'un chien.

[TRADUCTION] Le sens commun — et non le droit — exige, pour trancher à cet égard, qu'on tienne compte, dans la mesure où cela est indiqué, de la probabilité intrinsèque.

Il revient au juge du procès de décider dans quelle mesure, le cas échéant, les circonstances donnent à penser que le fait allégué est intrinsèquement improbable et, s'il l'estime indiqué, il peut en tenir compte pour déterminer si la preuve établit que, selon toute vraisemblance, l'événement s'est produit. Or, aucune règle de droit ne saurait le lui imposer.

(5) Conclusion sur la norme de preuve

[50] Je passe maintenant aux questions particulières que soulève le présent pourvoi.

B. Les préoccupations de la Cour d'appel concernant les contradictions relevées dans le témoignage de F.H.

[51] La rigueur de l'examen qui s'impose dans une affaire d'agression sexuelle est au cœur de l'analyse de la Cour d'appel. Selon la juge Rowles, celle-ci devait notamment déterminer [TRADUCTION] « si la juge du procès, compte tenu de la norme de preuve applicable dans une affaire de cette nature, the problems or troublesome aspects of [F.H.]'s evidence". The "troublesome aspects" of F.H.'s evidence related to, amongst others, inconsistencies as to the frequency of the alleged sexual assaults as between F.H.'s evidence on discovery and at trial, as well as to an inconsistency between the original statement of claim alleging attempted anal intercourse and the evidence given at trial of actual penetration.

[52] In the absence of support from the surrounding circumstances, when considering the evidence of F.H. on its own, the majority of the Court of Appeal concluded that the trial judge had failed to consider whether the facts had been proven "to the standard commensurate with the allegation" and had failed to "scrutinize the evidence in the manner required and thereby erred in law" (para. 79).

[53] As I have explained, there is only one civil standard of proof — proof on a balance of probabilities. Although understandable in view of the state of the jurisprudence at the time of its decision, the Court of Appeal was in error in holding the trial judge to a higher standard. While that conclusion is sufficient to decide this appeal, nonetheless, I think it is important for future guidance to make some further comments on the approach of the majority of the Court of Appeal.

[54] Rowles J.A. was correct that failure by a trial judge to apply the correct standard of proof in assessing evidence would constitute an error of law. The question is how such failure may be apparent in the reasons of a trial judge. Obviously in the remote example of a trial judge expressly stating an incorrect standard of proof, it will be presumed that the incorrect standard was applied. Where the trial judge expressly states the correct standard of proof, it will be presumed that it was applied. Where the trial judge does not express a particular standard of proof, it will also be presumed that the correct standard was applied:

> Trial judges are presumed to know the law with which they work day in and day out.
> (R. v. Burns, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 656, at p. 664, per McLachlin J. (as she then was)) a omis de prendre en compte les lacunes du témoignage de [F.H.] ou ses aspects préoccupants » (par. 72). Ces « aspects préoccupants » englobaient les déclarations contradictoires de F.H. à l'interrogatoire préalable et au procès concernant la fréquence des agressions sexuelles alléguées, de même que la divergence entre l'allégation initiale de tentative de relation anale et l'affirmation au procès qu'il y avait eu pénétration.

> Les juges du procès sont censés connaître le droit qu'ils appliquent tous les jours.

Whether the correct standard was expressly stated or not, the presumption of correct application will apply unless it can be demonstrated by the analysis conducted that the incorrect standard was applied. However, in determining whether the correct standard has indeed been applied, an appellate court must take care not to substitute its own view of the facts for that of the trial judge.

[55] An appellate court is only permitted to interfere with factual findings when "the trial judge [has] shown to have committed a palpable and overriding error or made findings of fact that are clearly wrong, unreasonable or unsupported by the evidence" (H.L. v. Canada (Attorney General), [2005] 1 S.C.R. 401, 2005 SCC 25, at para. 4 (emphasis deleted), per Fish J.). Rowles J.A. correctly acknowledged as much (para. 27). She also recognized that where there is some evidence to support an inference drawn by the trial judge, an appellate court will be hard pressed to find a palpable and overriding error. Indeed, she quoted the now well-known words to this effect in the judgment of Iacobucci and Major JJ. in Housen v. Nikolaisen, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, 2002 SCC 33, at para. 27 of her reasons (para. 22 of Housen).

[56] Rowles J.A. was satisfied that the trial judge was aware of the standard of proof that had heretofore been applied in cases of moral blameworthiness. At para. 35 of her reasons she stated:

> From her reasons it is obvious that the judge was aware of the case authorities that have considered the standard of proof to be applied in cases where allegations of morally blameworthy conduct have been made.

That should have satisfied the Court of Appeal that the trial judge understood and applied the standard of proof they thought to be applicable to this case.

C. The Inconsistency in the Evidence of F.H.

[57] At para. 5 of her reasons, the trial judge had regard for the judgment of Rowles J.A. in R. v. R.W.B. (1993), 24 B.C.A.C. 1, at paras. 28-29, dealing with the reliability and credibility of witnesses in the case of inconsistencies and an absence of Que la norme applicable ait été précisée ou non, on présume qu'elle a été appliquée, sauf lorsque l'analyse révèle le contraire. Toutefois, lorsqu'elle détermine si la bonne norme a effectivement été appliquée, la cour d'appel doit prendre garde de ne pas substituer son interprétation des faits à celle du juge du procès.

Cela aurait dû convaincre la Cour d'appel que la juge du procès avait compris et appliqué la norme de preuve qu'elles tenaient pour applicable en l'espèce.

C. Les contradictions du témoignage de F.H.

supporting evidence. Although R.W.B. was a criminal case, I, like the trial judge, think the words of Rowles J.A. are apt for the purposes of this case:

> In this case there were a number of inconsistencies in the complainant's own evidence and a number of inconsistencies between the complainant's evidence and the testimony of other witnesses. While it is true that minor inconsistencies may not diminish the credibility of a witness unduly, a series of inconsistencies may become quite significant and cause the trier of fact to have a reasonable doubt about the reliability of the witness' evidence. There is no rule as to when, in the face of inconsistency, such doubt may arise but at the least the trier of fact should look to the totality of the inconsistencies in order to assess whether the witness' evidence is reliable. This is particularly so when there is no supporting evidence on the central issue, which was the case here. [para. 29]

[58] As Rowles J.A. found in the context of the criminal standard of proof, where proof is on a balance of probabilities there is likewise no rule as to when inconsistencies in the evidence of a plaintiff will cause a trial judge to conclude that the plaintiff's evidence is not credible or reliable. The trial judge should not consider the plaintiff's evidence in isolation, but must look at the totality of the evidence to assess the impact of the inconsistencies in that evidence on questions of credibility and reliability pertaining to the core issue in the case.

[59] It is apparent from her reasons that the trial judge recognized the obligation upon her to have regard for the inconsistencies in the evidence of F.H. and to consider them in light of the totality of the evidence to the extent that was possible. While she did not deal with every inconsistency, as she explained at para. 100, she did address in a general way the arguments put forward by the defence.

[60] The trial judge specifically dealt with some of what the Court of Appeal identified as the troublesome aspects of F.H.'s evidence. For example, Rowles J.A. stated at para. 77 that F.H.'s evidence with respect to inspections in the supervisors' washroom was not consistent with the testimony of other witnesses:

preuve n'étaye pas par ailleurs. Même si la juge Rowles se prononçait dans le contexte pénal, à l'instar de la juge du procès, j'estime que ses remarques sont pertinentes dans le cas présent :

> [TRADUCTION] En l'espèce, il existait un certain nombre de contradictions dans le témoignage de la plaignante de même qu'entre son témoignage et celui d'autres témoins. Bien que de légères contradictions n'entachent pas indûment la crédibilité d'un témoin, une suite de contradictions peut constituer un facteur non négligeable et semer un doute raisonnable dans l'esprit du juge des faits quant à la crédibilité du témoignage. Aucune règle ne permet de déterminer dans quels cas des contradictions susciteront un tel doute, mais le juge des faits doit à tout le moins les examiner dans leur ensemble pour déterminer si le témoignage en question est digne de foi. C'est particulièrement vrai en l'absence de corroboration sur la principale question en litige, comme c'était le cas en l'espèce. [par. 29]

There was no corroborative evidence from the witnesses who had been students at the School of other boys having lined up and being examined by McDougall in the supervisor[s'] washroom so as to lend support to the respondent's recollection of events. In fact, the defence evidence was to the opposite effect, that is, the boys did not line up outside the staff washroom for any reason or at any time.

[61] However, Gill J. dealt with the washroom inspections as well as the inconsistent recollection of the witnesses regarding these inspections. She also made a finding of fact that inspections were performed and were routine at the school. At para. 106 of her reasons she stated:

> It was argued that the evidence of F.H. was not consistent with the evidence of others. No inspections were done in the supervisors' washroom or in the way that F.H. described. I agree that no other witness described inspections being done in the supervisors' washroom. However, evidence about inspections was given by defence witnesses. I have already referred to the evidence of Mr. Paul. I accept that inspections were done in the manner he described. The boys were sometimes inspected on shower days and supervisors regularly checked to ensure that they had washed themselves thoroughly. Admittedly, Mr. Paul did not say that the defendant had conducted such examinations, but he described the inspections as a routine of the school. In fact, Mr. Paul's evidence is not consistent with the evidence of the defendant, who stated that the only examination of the boys was for head lice and it was done by the nurse.

[62] In this passage of her reasons, the trial judge dealt with the inconsistency between the evidence of F.H. and other witnesses. She also considered McDougall's testimony in light of other evidence given by witnesses for the defence. From the evidence of Mr. Paul she concluded that examinations were routinely carried out. She found that Mr. Paul's evidence about examinations was not consistent with that of McDougall who had testified that examinations were only for head lice and were carried out by the nurse. The necessary inference is that she found McDougall not to be credible on this issue.

[63] The majority of the Court of Appeal was also concerned with the testimony of F.H., that each time he was sexually assaulted by McDougall,

[62] Dans ce passage de ses motifs, la juge du procès relève la divergence entre le témoignage de F.H. et ceux des autres témoins. Elle examine aussi le témoignage de M. McDougall à la lumière de ceux des autres témoins de la défense. Elle conclut du témoignage de M. Paul que des inspections avaient lieu couramment. Elle constate que son témoignage n'est pas compatible avec celui de M. McDougall selon lequel les inspections visaient seulement la détection de poux et relevaient de l'infirmière. Il s'ensuit nécessairement qu'à son avis, le témoignage de M. McDougall n'était pas digne de foi sur ce point.

he would go upstairs from his dorm to the supervisors' washroom. At para. 77 of her reasons, Rowles J.A. stated:

> However, [F.H.] was a junior boy rather than an intermediate one at the relevant time and his dorm would have been on the top floor. Based on the evidence of where the boys slept, [McDougall] could not have taken [F.H.] "upstairs" from his dorm.

Counsel for F.H. points out that in his evidence at trial, F.H. testified that he was an intermediate boy when the sexual assaults occurred and that as an intermediate boy he would have to go upstairs to the supervisors' washroom. Although there was contradictory evidence, there was evidence upon which F.H. could have been believed.

[64] It is true that Gill J. did not deal with F.H.'s inconsistency as to the frequency of the inspections inside the supervisors' washroom as identified by Rowles J.A. at para. 75:

> The respondent also told Ms. Stone that the young boys regularly lined up outside the staff washroom, which they referred to as the "examination room", every second week in order to be examined. At trial he testified this lining up only happened the first time he was sexually assaulted. Again, this is a substantial change in the respondent's recounting of events.

Nor did Gill J. specifically address the change in the allegations of attempted anal intercourse and genital fondling in the original statement of claim and the evidence of F.H. at trial of actual penetration. Rowles J.A. stated at para. 76:

> The respondent's original statement of claim only alleged attempted anal intercourse and genital fondling. There was no allegation about the appellant actually inserting his finger in F.H.'s anus or having forced anal intercourse. The respondent's evidence at trial was of actual penetration. As the trial judge found, the respondent acknowledged that he had reviewed the statement of claim, including the paragraphs which particularized the alleged assaults, and that he was aware of the difference between actually doing something and attempting to do something.

sexuellement par M. McDougall, il s'était rendu aux toilettes des surveillants situées à l'étage supérieur de son dortoir. La juge Rowles dit ce qui suit au par. 77 :

> [TRADUCTION] Or, [F.H.] faisait alors partie des plus jeunes garçons et non de ceux d'âge intermédiaire, de sorte que son dortoir aurait dû se situer à l'étage supérieur. Vu la preuve relative au lieu où dormaient les garçons, [M. McDougall] ne pouvait pas « faire monter » [F.H.].

L'avocat de l'appelant fait observer qu'au procès, F.H. a déclaré qu'il faisait partie des garçons d'âge intermédiaire lors des agressions sexuelles et que, par conséquent, il devait monter pour se rendre aux toilettes des surveillants. Malgré les contradictions, des éléments de preuve permettaient d'ajouter foi au témoignage de F.H.

[64] Il est vrai que la juge Gill ne traite pas de l'incohérence du témoignage de F.H. concernant la fréquence des inspections dans les toilettes des surveillants, contrairement à la juge Rowles qui la relève au par. 75 :

> [TRADUCTION] L'intimé a aussi dit à Mme Stone que, toutes les deux semaines, les jeunes garçons se plaçaient à l'extérieur des toilettes des surveillants, qu'ils appelaient la « salle d'examen », pour y être examinés. Au procès, il a témoigné que la mise en rang n'avait eu lieu que lors de la première agression sexuelle. Encore une fois, il s'agit d'une modification importante de sa relation des événements.

La juge Gill ne mentionne pas expressément le fait que les allégations de tentative de relation anale et d'attouchement des organes génitaux figurant dans la déclaration initiale différaient du témoignage de F.H. au procès selon lequel il y avait eu pénétration. La juge Rowles dit au par. 76 :

[65] However, at paras. 46 and 48 of her reasons, Gill J. had recounted these inconsistencies as raised in cross-examination. Her reasons indicate she was aware of the inconsistencies.

[66] As for the inconsistency relating to the frequency of the sexual assaults, Rowles J.A. stated at para. 73:

> At his examination for discovery the respondent said that the sexual assaults took place "weekly", "frequently", and "every ten days or so" over the entire time he was at the School. The respondent admitted at trial that he had said on discovery that he had told the counsellor, Ms. Nellie Stone, that the sexual assaults by the appellant had taken place over the entire time he was at the School, while he was between the ages of eight and fourteen years. At trial, the respondent testified that the sexual assaults occurred on only four occasions over a period of two-and-a-half months. [Emphasis added.]

[67] Counsel for F.H. points out that F.H.'s evidence was that he was subjected to physical and sexual abuse while he was at the residential school perpetrated by more than one person, that the question to which he was responding mixed both sexual and physical abuse and that the majority of the Court of Appeal wrongly narrowed F.H.'s statement only to assaults perpetrated by McDougall. Counsel says that F.H. was commenting on all of the physical and sexual abuse he experienced at the school which involved more than McDougall and took place over his six years of attendance.

[68] The Court of Appeal appears to have interpreted his evidence on discovery that he was sexually assaulted by McDougall over the entire time he was at the school, while in his evidence at trial it was only four times over two and a half months. Although the evidence is not without doubt, it is open to be interpreted in the way counsel for F.H. asserts and that there was no inconsistency between F.H.'s evidence on discovery and at trial.

> [TRADUCTION] À l'interrogatoire préalable, l'intimé a déclaré que les agressions sexuelles s'étaient produites « chaque semaine », « fréquemment » et « environ tous les dix jours » pendant toute la durée de son séjour au pensionnat. Au procès, il a reconnu avoir déclaré à l'interrogatoire préalable qu'il avait dit à sa thérapeute, Mme Nellie Stone, que les agressions sexuelles perpétrées par l'appelant avaient eu lieu pendant toute la durée de son séjour au pensionnat, de l'âge de huit à quatorze ans. Or, au procès, il a précisé que les agressions sexuelles ne s'étaient produites qu'à quatre occasions sur une période de deux mois et demi. [Je souligne.]

[68] La Cour d'appel semble conclure que F.H. a témoigné à l'interrogatoire préalable que M. McDougall l'avait agressé sexuellement pendant toute la période qu'il avait été pensionnaire, alors qu'il a dit au procès qu'il y avait eu quatre agressions sur une période de deux mois et demi. Bien que le témoignage ne soit pas sans soulever de doute, il est possible de l'interpréter de la manière prônée par l'avocat de F.H. et de conclure à l'absence de contradiction entre le témoignage à l'interrogatoire préalable et celui offert au procès.

ignore inconsistencies in the evidence of F.H. In spite of the inconsistencies, she found him to be credible. At para. 112 of her reasons, she stated:

> There are, however, some inconsistencies in the evidence of F.H. As the defence has also argued, his evidence about the frequency of the abuse has not been consistent and there are differences between what he admittedly told Ms. Stone, what he said at his examination for discovery and his evidence at trial. At trial, he said there were four incidents. On previous occasions, he said that this occurred every two weeks or ten days. That is a difference of significance. However, his evidence about the nature of the assaults, the location and the times they occurred has been consistent. Despite differences about frequency, it is my view that F.H. was a credible witness.

[70] The trial judge was not obliged to find that F.H. was not credible or that his evidence at trial was unreliable because of inconsistency between his trial evidence and the evidence he gave on prior occasions. Where a trial judge demonstrates that she is alive to the inconsistencies but still concludes that the witness was nonetheless credible, in the absence of palpable and overriding error, there is no basis for interference by the appellate court.

[71] All of this is not to say that the concerns expressed by Rowles J.A. were unfounded. There are troubling aspects of F.H.'s evidence. However, the trial judge was not oblivious to the inconsistencies in his evidence. The events occurred more than 30 years before the trial. Where the trial judge refers to the inconsistencies and deals expressly with a number of them, it must be assumed that she took them into account in assessing the balance of probabilities. Notwithstanding its own misgivings, it was not for the Court of Appeal to second guess the trial judge in the absence of finding a palpable and overriding error.

[72] With respect, I cannot interpret the reasons of the majority of the Court of Appeal other than that it disagreed with the trial judge's credibility assessment of F.H. in light of the inconsistencies in his evidence and the lack of support from the surrounding circumstances. Assessing credibility la juge du procès tient compte des contradictions dans le témoignage de F.H, mais elle ajoute tout de même foi à celui-ci (par. 112) :

> [TRADUCTION] Des contradictions entachent toutefois le témoignage de F.H. Comme l'a aussi fait valoir la défense, son témoignage sur la fréquence des agressions n'a pas été invariable et il y a des différences entre ce qu'il a reconnu avoir dit à Mme Stone, son témoignage en interrogatoire préalable et ce qu'il a affirmé au procès. Pendant le procès, il a déclaré qu'il y avait eu quatre agressions. Auparavant, il avait affirmé que les agressions se produisaient toutes les deux semaines ou tous les dix jours. C'est là une différence importante. Toutefois, son témoignage concernant la nature des agressions, ainsi que le lieu et les moments où elles se sont produites n'a pas varié. Malgré les divergences quant à la fréquence des agressions, je suis d'avis que F.H. était un témoin digne de foi.

[70] La juge du procès n'avait pas à conclure à la non-crédibilité de F.H. ou à la non-fiabilité de son témoignage au procès parce que celui-ci contredisait ses déclarations antérieures. Lorsque le juge du procès est conscient des contradictions, mais qu'il arrive quand même à la conclusion que le témoin était digne de foi, sauf erreur manifeste et dominante, rien ne justifie l'intervention de la cour d'appel.

is clearly in the bailiwick of the trial judge and thus heightened deference must be accorded to the trial judge on matters of credibility. As explained by Bastarache and Abella JJ. in R. v. Gagnon, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 621, 2006 SCC 17, at para. 20:

> Assessing credibility is not a science. It is very difficult for a trial judge to articulate with precision the complex intermingling of impressions that emerge after watching and listening to witnesses and attempting to reconcile the various versions of events. That is why this Court decided, most recently in H.L., that in the absence of a palpable and overriding error by the trial judge, his or her perceptions should be respected.

[73] As stated above, an appellate court is only permitted to intervene when "the trial judge is shown to have committed a palpable and overriding error or made findings of fact that are clearly wrong, unreasonable or unsupported by the evidence" (H.L., at para. 4 (emphasis deleted)). The Court of Appeal made no such finding. With respect, in finding that the trial judge failed to scrutinize F.H.'s evidence in the manner required by law, it incorrectly substituted its credibility assessment for that of the trial judge.

D. Palpable and Overriding Error

[74] Notwithstanding that the Court of Appeal made no finding of palpable and overriding error, the Attorney General of Canada submits that the trial judge did indeed make such an error. This argument is based entirely on the inconsistencies in the evidence of F.H. The Attorney General says that in light of these inconsistencies, the trial judge was clearly wrong in finding F.H. credible.

[75] I do not minimize the inconsistencies in F.H.'s testimony. They are certainly relevant to an assessment of his credibility. Nonetheless, the trial judge was convinced, despite the inconsistencies, that F.H. was credible and that the four sexual assaults alleged to have been committed by McDougall did occur. From her reasons, it appears that the trial judge's decision on the credibility of the witnesses was made in the context of the evidence as a whole.

clairement au juge du procès d'apprécier la crédibilité, de sorte que sa décision à cet égard justifie une grande déférence. Comme l'ont expliqué les juges Bastarache et Abella dans l'arrêt R. c. Gagnon, [2006] 1 R.C.S. 621, 2006 CSC 17, par. 20 :

> Apprécier la crédibilité ne relève pas de la science exacte. Il est très difficile pour le juge de première instance de décrire avec précision l'enchevêtrement complexe des impressions qui se dégagent de l'observation et de l'audition des témoins, ainsi que des efforts de conciliation des différentes versions des faits. C'est pourquoi notre Cour a statué — la dernière fois dans l'arrêt H.L. — qu'il fallait respecter les perceptions du juge de première instance, sauf erreur manifeste et dominante.

[73] Je le répète, une cour d'appel ne peut intervenir que « lorsqu'il est établi que le juge de première instance a commis une erreur manifeste et dominante ou tiré des conclusions de fait manifestement erronées, déraisonnables ou non étayées par la preuve » (H.L., par. 4 (soulignement omis)). La Cour d'appel n'a pas opiné en ce sens. En toute déférence, en concluant que la juge du procès avait omis d'examiner le témoignage de F.H. aussi attentivement qu'elle l'aurait dû légalement, la Cour d'appel a substitué à tort son appréciation de la crédibilité à celle de la juge du procès.

D. Erreur manifeste et dominante

She considered the layout of the school and the fact that the manner in which F.H. described the assaults as taking place would have carried with it the risk of detection. She also considered whether F.H.'s evidence about inspections taking place in the supervisors' washroom and the availability of sheets and pyjamas was consistent with evidence of other witnesses. She acknowledged that F.H. had a motive to lie to save his marriage and decided that the circumstances surrounding disclosure were not suggestive of concoction. She also factored into her analysis the demeanor of F.H.: that "[he] was not a witness who gave detailed answers, often responding simply with a yes or no, nor did he volunteer much information" (para. 110), and that "[w]hen [he] testified, he displayed no emotion but it was clear that he had few, if any, good memories of the school" (para. 113).

[76] In the end, believing the testimony of one witness and not the other is a matter of judgment. In light of the inconsistencies in F.H.'s testimony with respect to the frequency of the sexual assaults, it is easy to see how another trial judge may not have found F.H. to be a credible witness. However, Gill J. found him to be credible. It is important to bear in mind that the evidence in this case was of matters occurring over 30 years earlier when F.H. was approximately 10 years of age. As a matter of policy, the British Columbia legislature has eliminated the limitation period for claims of sexual assault. This was a policy choice for that legislative assembly. Nonetheless, it must be recognized that the task of trial judges assessing evidence in such cases is very difficult indeed. However, that does not open the door to an appellate court, being removed from the testimony and not seeing the witnesses, to reassess the credibility of the witnesses.

E. Corroboration

[77] The reasons of the majority of the Court of Appeal may be read as requiring, as a matter of law, that in cases of oath against oath in the context of sexual assault allegations, that a sexual assault victim must provide some independent compte de l'aménagement du pensionnat et du fait que la perpétration des agressions de la manière décrite par F.H. était susceptible de détection. Elle s'est également demandé si le témoignage de F.H. concernant les inspections effectuées dans les toilettes des surveillants et l'accès aux draps et aux pyjamas concordait avec celui d'autres témoins. Elle a reconnu que F.H. avait intérêt à mentir pour préserver son mariage, mais elle a statué que les circonstances de la révélation ne suggéraient pas la fabrication. Dans son analyse, la juge du procès a aussi pris en considération l'attitude de F.H., à savoir qu'[TRADUCTION] « [il] ne s'agissait pas d'un témoin offrant des réponses détaillées, qu'il répondait souvent par un simple oui ou non, sans devancer les questions » (par. 110) et que « [p]endant son témoignage, il n'a manifesté aucune émotion, mais il était clair qu'il avait peu de bons souvenirs du pensionnat, voire aucun » (par. 113).

[76] En fin de compte, ajouter foi à un témoignage et non à un autre est affaire de jugement. Vu les contradictions du témoignage de F.H. au sujet de la fréquence des agressions sexuelles, on conçoit aisément qu'un autre juge n'aurait peut-être pas conclu que F.H. était un témoin digne de foi. Cependant, la juge Gill l'a trouvé crédible. Il importe de se rappeler que le témoignage portait sur des événements survenus plus de 30 ans auparavant et qu'à l'époque F.H. avait environ 10 ans. Pour des raisons de principe, le législateur de la Colombie-Britannique a cessé d'assujettir à un délai de prescription la poursuite pour agression sexuelle. Il lui était loisible de le faire. Néanmoins, il faut reconnaître que la tâche du juge du procès appelé à apprécier la preuve dans une affaire de cette nature est particulièrement ardue. Mais une cour d'appel qui n'a pas entendu les témoignages ni observé les témoins n'a pas pour autant le droit de réévaluer la fiabilité de ceux-ci.

E. Corroboration

corroborating evidence. At para. 77 of her reasons, Rowles J.A. observed:

> There was no corroborative evidence from the witnesses who had been students at the School of other boys having lined up and being examined by McDougall in the supervisor[s'] washroom so as to lend support to [F.H.]'s recollection of events.

At para. 79 she stated:

> No support for [F.H.]'s testimony could be drawn from the surrounding circumstances.

[78] In her concurring reasons at para. 106, Southin J.A. stated:

> To choose one over the other in cases of oath against oath requires, in my opinion, an articulated reason founded in evidence other than that of the plaintiff.

[79] The impression these passages may leave is that there is a legal requirement of corroboration in civil cases in which sexual assault is alleged. In an abundance of caution and to provide guidance for the future, I make the following comments.

[80] Corroborative evidence is always helpful and does strengthen the evidence of the party relying on it as I believe Rowles J.A. was implying in her comments. However, it is not a legal requirement and indeed may not be available, especially where the alleged incidents took place decades earlier. Incidents of sexual assault normally occur in private.

[81] Requiring corroboration would elevate the evidentiary requirement in a civil case above that in a criminal case. Modern criminal law has rejected the previous common law and later statutory requirement that allegations of sexual assault be corroborated in order to lead to a conviction (see Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, s. 139(1), mandating the need for corroboration and its subsequent amendments removing this requirement (Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 125), contre celle du défendeur. La juge Rowles fait observer au par. 77 :

Elle ajoute (par. 79) :

[78] La juge Southin affirme pour sa part (par. 106, motifs concordants) :

> [TRADUCTION] Préférer un témoignage à un autre exige, à mon avis, qu'un motif convaincant fondé sur un autre élément de preuve que le témoignage du demandeur le justifie.

[80] Un élément de corroboration est toujours utile et étoffe la preuve offerte. C'est à mon avis ce que voulait dire la juge Rowles. Or, il ne s'agit pas d'une exigence juridique, car il est possible qu'un tel élément n'existe pas, surtout lorsque les faits se sont produits quelques décennies auparavant. Sans compter que les agressions sexuelles ont généralement lieu en privé.

[81] Exiger la corroboration rendrait la norme de preuve en matière civile plus stricte que celle appliquée en matière pénale. Le droit criminel moderne a écarté l'exigence, d'abord établie par la common law puis par la loi, qu'une allégation d'agression sexuelle soit corroborée pour qu'il puisse y avoir déclaration de culpabilité (voir Code criminel, S.R.C. 1970, ch. C-34, par. 139(1), prévoyant la nécessité d'une corroboration et ses modifications subséquentes supprimant cette exigence (Loi modifiant le Code criminel en matière d'infractions sexuelles et d'autres infractions contre la personne et apportant des modifications corrélatives as well as the current Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 274, stipulating that no corroboration is required for convictions in sexual assault cases). Trial judges faced with allegations of sexual assault may find that they are required to make a decision on the basis of whether they believe the plaintiff or the defendant and as difficult as that may be, they are required to assess the evidence and make their determination without imposing a legal requirement for corroboration.

F. Is W. (D.) Applicable in Civil Cases in Which Credibility Is in Issue?

[82] At paras. 107, 108 and 110 of her reasons, Southin J.A. stated:

> It is not enough for the judge to say that I find the plaintiff credible and since he is credible the defendant must be lying.
>
> What I have said so far is, to me, no more than an application to civil cases of R. v. W. (D.), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 742 (S.C.C.).
>
> . . .
> I see no logical reason why the rejection of "either/or" in criminal cases is not applicable in civil cases where the allegation is of crime, albeit that the burden of proof on the proponent is not beyond reasonable doubt but on a balance of probabilities.

[83] W. (D.) was a decision by this Court in which Cory J., at p. 758, established a three-step charge to the jury to help the jury assess conflicting evidence between the victim and the accused in cases of criminal prosecutions of sexual assaults:

> First, if you believe the evidence of the accused, obviously you must acquit.
>
> Second, if you do not believe the testimony of the accused but you are left in reasonable doubt by it, you must acquit.
> Third, even if you are not left in doubt by the evidence of the accused, you must ask yourself whether, on the basis of the evidence which you do accept, you are à d'autres lois, S.C. 1980-81-82-83, ch. 125), ainsi que la version actuelle du Code criminel, L.R.C. 1985, ch. C-46, art. 274, portant que la corroboration n'est pas nécessaire pour déclarer une personne coupable d'agression sexuelle). Dans une affaire d'agression sexuelle, la décision du juge du procès peut dépendre du fait qu'il ajoute foi au témoignage du demandeur ou à celui du défendeur, mais malgré ce dilemme, il doit apprécier la preuve et se prononcer sans exiger de corroboration.

F. L'arrêt W. (D.) s'applique-t-il au civil en matière de crédibilité?

> [TRADUCTION] Le juge ne peut se contenter de dire qu'il trouve le demandeur crédible et, de ce fait, que le défendeur ment nécessairement.
>
> Jusqu'ici mes motifs ne font qu'appliquer l'arrêt R. c. W. (D.), [1991] 1 R.C.S. 742 (C.S.C.), au contexte civil.
>
> Je ne vois aucun motif rationnel de ne pas rejeter l'alternative en matière civile, tout comme en matière pénale, lorsque l'acte reproché constitue un acte criminel, même si la norme de preuve applicable est celle de la prépondérance des probabilités, et non celle de l'absence de tout doute raisonnable.

[83] Dans l'arrêt W. (D.), par la voix du juge Cory, notre Cour a établi un exposé à trois volets afin d'aider le jury à évaluer les témoignages contradictoires de la victime et de l'accusé dans le cadre d'une poursuite criminelle pour agression sexuelle (p. 758) :

> Premièrement, si vous croyez la déposition de l'accusé, manifestement vous devez prononcer l'acquittement.
> Deuxièmement, si vous ne croyez pas le témoignage de l'accusé, mais si vous avez un doute raisonnable, vous devez prononcer l'acquittement.
>
> Troisièmement, même si vous n'avez pas de doute à la suite de la déposition de l'accusé, vous devez vous demander si, en vertu de la preuve que vous acceptez, convinced beyond a reasonable doubt by that evidence of the guilt of the accused.

[84] These charges to the jury are not sacrosanct but were merely put in place as guideposts to the meaning of reasonable doubt, as recently explained by Binnie J. in R. v. J.H.S., [2008] 2 S.C.R. 152, 2008 SCC 30, at paras. 9 and 13:

Essentially, W. (D.) simply unpacks for the benefit of the lay jury what reasonable doubt means in the context of evaluating conflicting testimonial accounts. It alerts the jury to the "credibility contest" error. It teaches that trial judges are required to impress on the jury that the burden never shifts from the Crown to prove every element of the offence beyond a reasonable doubt.

. . . In R. v. Avetysan, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 745, 2000 SCC 56, Major J. for the majority pointed out that in any case where credibility is important "[t]he question is really whether, in substance, the trial judge's instructions left the jury with the impression that it had to choose between the two versions of events" (para. 19). The main point is that lack of credibility on the part of the accused does not equate to proof of his or her guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

[85] The W. (D.) steps were developed as an aid to the determination of reasonable doubt in the criminal law context where a jury is faced with conflicting testimonial accounts. Lack of credibility on the part of an accused is not proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

[86] However, in civil cases in which there is conflicting testimony, the judge is deciding whether a fact occurred on a balance of probabilities. In such cases, provided the judge has not ignored evidence, finding the evidence of one party credible may well be conclusive of the result because that evidence is inconsistent with that of the other party. In such cases, believing one party will mean explicitly or implicitly that the other party was not believed on the important issue in the case. That may be especially true where a plaintiff makes allegations that vous êtes convaincus hors de tout doute raisonnable par la preuve de la culpabilité de l'accusé.

Essentiellement, l'arrêt W. (D.) explique tout simplement au bénéfice des jurés profanes en quoi consiste un doute raisonnable dans le contexte de l'évaluation de témoignages contradictoires. Il attire l'attention des jurés sur l'erreur consistant à procéder à un « concours de crédibilité ». Il explique que les juges de première instance sont tenus de bien faire comprendre aux jurés que le ministère public n'est jamais dispensé du fardeau de prouver tous les éléments de l'infraction hors de tout doute raisonnable.

. . . Dans R. c. Avetysan, [2000] 2 R.C.S. 745, 2000 CSC 56, le juge Major qui s'exprimait au nom des juges de la majorité a souligné que, dans toutes les causes où la question de la crédibilité revêt de l'importance, « [c]e qu'il importe vraiment de déterminer, c'est essentiellement si les directives du juge du procès ont donné au jury l'impression qu'il devait choisir entre les deux versions des événements » (par. 19). L'essentiel c'est que le manque de crédibilité de l'accusé n'équivaut pas à une preuve de sa culpabilité hors de tout doute raisonnable.

are altogether denied by the defendant as in this case. W. (D.) is not an appropriate tool for evaluating evidence on the balance of probabilities in civil cases.

G. Did the Trial Judge Ignore the Evidence of McDougall?

[87] In an argument related to W. (D.), the Attorney General of Canada says, at para. 44 of its factum, that "[s]imply believing the testimony of one witness, without assessing the evidence of the other witness, marginalizes that other witness" since he has no way of knowing whether he was disbelieved or simply ignored.

[88] The Attorney General bases his argument on the well-known passage in Faryna v. Chorny, [1952] 2 D.L.R. 354 (B.C.C.A.), which concludes at p. 357:

> . . . a Court of Appeal must be satisfied that the trial Judge's finding of credibility is based not on one element only to the exclusion of others, but is based on all the elements by which it can he tested in the particular case.

[89] Thus, the Attorney General contends, at para. 47 of its factum, that:

> In a civil proceeding alleging a sexual assault, if the trier of fact accepts the plaintiff's evidence and simply ignores the defendant's evidence, that conclusion would breach the requirement described in Faryna, that every element of the evidence must be considered.

[90] I agree that it would be an error for the trial judge to ignore the evidence of the defendant and simply concentrate on the evidence submitted by the plaintiff. But that is not the case here.

[91] The trial judge described the testimony given by McDougall with respect to his vocational beliefs, his subsequent marriage, his role at the school, the routine at the school, the laundry procedure and his denials as to having sexually assaulted either R.C. or F.H. She also dealt with the defence arguments demandeur formule des allégations que le défendeur nie en bloc. La démarche préconisée dans l'arrêt W. (D.) ne convient pas pour évaluer la preuve au regard de la prépondérance des probabilités dans une instance civile.

G. La juge du procès a-t-elle ignoré le témoignage de M. McDougall?

> [TRADUCTION] . . . une cour d'appel doit être convaincue que la conclusion sur la crédibilité tirée en première instance repose non pas sur un seul élément de preuve, à l'exclusion de tout autre, mais bien sur l'ensemble des éléments permettant d'apprécier la crédibilité dans le cas considéré.

[89] Le procureur général soutient donc au par. 47 de son mémoire :

[90] Je conviens que le juge du procès qui considère le seul témoignage du demandeur, à l'exclusion de celui du défendeur, commet une erreur. Or, ce n'est pas ce qui s'est passé en l'espèce.

with respect to the credibility and reliability of the testimony of R.C. and F.H. regarding the sexual assaults. Indeed, she found that R.C. did not prove he was sexually assaulted by McDougall.

[92] In determining whether McDougall had ever strapped R.C. or F.H., she summarized McDougall's evidence as follows at para. 131:

> As stated, it was the defendant's evidence that during his years at the school, he administered the strap to only five or six intermediate boys. He did so as punishment for behaviour such as fighting or swearing. It was always to the hand and was always done in the dorm. He denied the evidence of Mr. Jeffries that he had frequently disciplined him for the reasons Mr. Jeffries described. He denied going to his grandmother's home or mocking him about wanting to visit his grandmother. He denied the evidence of F.H.

> It is also my view that the defendant minimized his use of the strap as a form of discipline. Further, while he testified that no child was ever strapped in his room, when testifying about one specific incident, he said that he brought the boy "upstairs to my room and I administered the strap three times to his right hand".

Although McDougall later "corrected himself" to say that he had strapped the boy in the dorm and not in his room, it was open to the trial judge to believe his first statement and not his "correction".

[94] And as earlier discussed, at para. 106 of her reasons, she pointed out inconsistency between the evidence of McDougall and one of the defence witnesses, Mr. Paul, on the issue of routine physical inspections of the students.

[95] At para. 66 of her reasons for the majority of the Court of Appeal, Rowles J.A. stated:

R.C. et F.H. Elle s'est également penchée sur les prétentions de la défense au sujet de la crédibilité des témoignages de R.C. et de F.H. concernant les agressions sexuelles. Elle a d'ailleurs conclu que R.C. n'avait pas prouvé que M. McDougall l'avait agressé sexuellement.

[92] Pour déterminer si M. McDougall avait jamais frappé R.C. ou F.H. avec une lanière en cuir, elle a résumé son témoignage comme suit (par. 131) :

> [TRADUCTION] Ainsi, selon le témoignage du défendeur, pendant les années qu'il a passées au pensionnat, il n'aurait frappé avec une lanière en cuir que cinq ou six garçons d'âge intermédiaire. Il l'aurait fait parce qu'ils s'étaient battus ou qu'ils avaient blasphémé. Il visait toujours les mains et la correction était toujours administrée dans le dortoir. Il a rejeté le témoignage de M. Jeffries selon lequel il l'avait fréquemment puni pour les motifs précisés par M. Jeffries. Il a nié être allé chez la grand-mère de M. Jeffries ou s'être moqué de lui parce qu'il voulait rendre visite à sa grand-mère. Il a nié les allégations de F.H.

[93] Elle a par ailleurs relevé une contradiction dans le témoignage de M. McDougall (par. 135) :

> [TRADUCTION] Je suis aussi d'avis que le défendeur a minimisé son recours à la lanière en cuir pour corriger les pensionnaires. Par ailleurs, bien qu'il ait déclaré n'avoir jamais infligé ce châtiment dans sa chambre, lorsqu'il a témoigné sur un incident en particulier, il a dit avoir « fait monté le garçon dans [sa] chambre et l'avoir frappé à la main droite trois fois avec une lanière en cuir ».

M. McDougall avait ensuite rectifié les faits : il avait dit avoir frappé le garçon dans le dortoir, et non dans sa chambre. Or, il était loisible à la juge du procès d'ajouter foi à la première version plutôt qu'à la seconde.

[95] Au nom des juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, la juge Rowles indique ce qui suit (par. 66) :

2008 SCC 53 (CanLII)

From the reasons the trial judge gave for finding that the appellant had strapped the respondent, one can infer that the judge did not accept the appellant's evidence on that issue. Disbelief of a witness's evidence on one issue may well taint the witness's evidence on other issues but an unfavourable credibility finding against a witness does not, of itself, constitute evidence that can be used to prove a fact in issue.

[96] I agree with Rowles J.A. However, the trial judge's unfavourable credibility findings with respect to McDougall's strapping evidence together with her belief in Paul's evidence in preference to that of McDougall with respect to routine physical inspections, indicates that she did not ignore McDougall's evidence or marginalize him. She simply believed F.H. on essential matters rather than McDougall.

H. Were the Reasons of the Trial Judge Adequate?

[97] The Attorney General alleges that the reasons of the trial judge are inadequate. The same argument was not accepted by the Court of Appeal. At para. 61, Rowles J.A. stated:

Generally speaking, if a judge's reasons reveal the path the judge took to reach a conclusion on the matter in dispute, the reasons are adequate for the purposes of appellate review. To succeed in an argument that the trial judge did not give adequate reasons, an appellant does not have to demonstrate that there is a flaw in the reasoning that led to the result. In this case, the judge's reasons are adequate to show how she arrived at her conclusion that the respondent had been sexually assaulted.

Where the Court of Appeal expresses itself as being satisfied that it can discern why the trial judge arrived at her conclusion, a party faces a serious obstacle to convince this Court that the reasons are nonetheless inadequate.

[TRADUCTION] On peut inférer des motifs qu'elle invoque pour conclure que l'appelant a frappé l'intimé avec une lanière en cuir que la juge du procès n'a pas ajouté foi au témoignage de l'appelant sur ce point. Le fait de ne pas croire un témoin sur un point peut bien ternir son témoignage sur un autre sujet, mais une conclusion sur la crédibilité qui est défavorable à un témoin ne saurait à elle seule établir un fait en litige.

[96] Je suis d'accord avec la juge Rowles. Toutefois, les conclusions défavorables tirées par la juge du procès sur la crédibilité du témoignage de M. McDougall au sujet du recours à la lanière en cuir et le fait qu'elle a ajouté foi au témoignage de M. Paul plutôt qu'à celui de M. McDougall au sujet des inspections corporelles périodiques montrent qu'elle n'a pas ignoré le témoignage de M. McDougall et qu'elle ne l'a pas marginalisé. Elle a simplement cru F.H. plutôt que M. McDougall sur des points importants.

H. Les motifs de la juge du procès étaient-ils suffisants?

[97] Le procureur général soutient que les motifs de la juge du procès ne sont pas suffisants. La Cour d'appel a rejeté cette prétention (par. 61, la juge Rowles) :

[TRADUCTION] De façon générale, lorsque le juge précise le raisonnement à l'issue duquel il a tiré sa conclusion sur la question en litige, ses motifs sont suffisants aux fins d'un examen en appel. Pour qu'ils soient jugés insuffisants, point n'est besoin d'établir qu'un vice entache le raisonnement ayant mené à la conclusion. En l'espèce, les motifs de la juge permettent de comprendre comment elle est arrivée à la conclusion que l'intimé avait été agressé sexuellement.

Dans la mesure où la Cour d'appel dit pouvoir discerner les raisons pour lesquelles la juge du procès a tiré sa conclusion, la partie qui souhaite convaincre notre Cour que les motifs sont néanmoins insuffisants doit surmonter un obstacle de taille.

(1) To justify and explain the result;

(2) To tell the losing party why he or she lost;

(3) To provide for informed consideration of the grounds of appeal; and

(4) To satisfy the public that justice has been done.

[99] However, an appeal court cannot intervene merely because it believes the trial judge did a poor job of expressing herself. Nor, is a failure to give adequate reasons a free standing basis for appeal. At para. 20 of Walker, Binnie J. states:

> Equally, however, Sheppard holds that "[t]he appellate court is not given the power to intervene simply because it thinks the trial court did a poor job of expressing itself" (para. 26). Reasons are sufficient if they are responsive to the case's live issues and the parties' key arguments. Their sufficiency should be measured not in the abstract, but as they respond to the substance of what was in issue. . . . The duty to give reasons "should be given a functional and purposeful interpretation" and the failure to live up to the duty does not provide "a free-standing right of appeal" or "in itself confe[r] entitlement to appellate intervention" (para. 53).

[100] An unsuccessful party may well be dissatisfied with the reasons of a trial judge, especially where he or she was not believed. Where findings of credibility must be made, it must be recognized that it may be very difficult for the trial judge to put into words the process by which the decision is arrived at (see Gagnon). But that does not make the reasons inadequate. In R. v. R.E.M., [2008] 3 S.C.R. 3, 2008 SCC 51, released at the same time as this decision, McLachlin C.J. has explained that credibility findings may involve factors that are difficult to verbalize:

> While it is useful for a judge to attempt to articulate the reasons for believing a witness and disbelieving another in general or on a particular point, the fact remains that the exercise may not be purely intellectual and may involve factors that are difficult to verbalize. Furthermore, embellishing why a particular witness's evidence is rejected may involve the judge in saying

(1) justifier et expliquer le résultat;

(2) indiquer à la partie qui n'a pas gain de cause pourquoi elle a perdu;

(3) permettre un examen éclairé des moyens d'appel;

(4) convaincre le public que justice a été rendue.

[99] Cependant, une cour d'appel n'est pas admise à intervenir au seul motif que le juge du procès s'est mal exprimé. L'omission de fournir des motifs suffisants ne constitue pas non plus un motif d'appel distinct. Au par. 20 de l'arrêt Walker, le juge Binnie dit ce qui suit :

> L'arrêt Sheppard établit toutefois que « [l]a cour d'appel n'est pas habilitée à intervenir simplement parce qu'elle estime que le juge du procès s'est mal exprimé » (par. 26). Les motifs sont suffisants s'ils répondent aux questions en litige et aux principaux arguments des parties. Leur suffisance doit être mesurée non pas dans l'abstrait, mais d'après la réponse qu'ils apportent aux éléments essentiels du litige. [. . .] L'obligation de fournir des motifs « devrait recevoir une interprétation fonctionnelle et fondée sur l'objet » et l'inobservation de cette obligation n'a pas pour effet de créer « un droit d'appel distinct » ou de conférer « en soi le droit à l'intervention d'une cour d'appel » (par. 53).

[100] La partie qui n'a pas gain de cause peut juger insuffisants les motifs du juge du procès, surtout s'il ne l'a pas crue. Il faut reconnaître qu'il peut être très difficile au juge appelé à tirer des conclusions sur la crédibilité des témoins de préciser le raisonnement qui est à l'origine de sa décision (voir l'arrêt Gagnon). Ses motifs ne sont pas insuffisants pour autant. Dans l'arrêt R. c. R.E.M., [2008] 3 R.C.S. 3, 2008 CSC 51, rendu concurremment avec la présente décision, la juge en chef McLachlin explique que les conclusions relatives à la crédibilité peuvent faire intervenir des éléments difficiles à exprimer :

> Bien qu'il soit utile que le juge tente d'exposer clairement les motifs qui l'ont amené à croire un témoin plutôt qu'un autre, en général ou sur un point en particulier, il demeure que cet exercice n'est pas nécessairement purement intellectuel et peut impliquer des facteurs difficiles à énoncer. De plus, pour expliquer en détail pourquoi un témoignage a été écarté, il se peut unflattering things about the witness; judges may wish to spare the accused who takes the stand to deny the crime, for example, the indignity of not only rejecting his evidence in convicting him, but adding negative comments about his demeanor. In short, assessing credibility is a difficult and delicate matter that does not always lend itself to precise and complete verbalization. [para. 49]

Nor are reasons inadequate because in hindsight, it may be possible to say that the reasons were not as clear and comprehensive as they might have been.

[101] Rowles J.A. found that the reasons of the trial judge showed why she arrived at her conclusion that F.H. had been sexually assaulted by McDougall. I agree with her that the reasons of the trial judge were adequate.

IV. Conclusion

[102] I am of the respectful opinion that the majority of the Court of Appeal erred in reversing the decision of the trial judge. The appeal should be allowed with costs. The decision of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia should be set aside and the decision of the trial judge restored.

Appeal allowed with costs.

que le juge doive tenir des propos peu flatteurs sur le témoin. Or, le juge voudra peut-être épargner à l'accusé, qui a témoigné pour nier le crime, la honte de subir des commentaires négatifs sur son comportement, en plus de celle de voir son témoignage écarté et d'être déclaré coupable. Bref, l'appréciation de la crédibilité est un exercice difficile et délicat qui ne se prête pas toujours à une énonciation complète et précise. [par. 49]

De même, les motifs ne sont pas insuffisants parce que, avec le recul, on peut dire qu'ils ne sont pas aussi clairs et exhaustifs qu'ils auraient pu l'être.

[101] La juge Rowles a conclu que les motifs de la juge du procès expliquaient les raisons pour lesquelles elle avait conclu que F.H. avait été agressé sexuellement par M. McDougall. Je conviens avec elle que les motifs de la juge du procès étaient suffisants.

IV. Conclusion

[102] En toute déférence, je suis d'avis que les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont eu tort d'annuler la décision de la juge du procès. Le pourvoi est accueilli avec dépens. La décision de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique est annulée, et celle de la juge du procès rétablie.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

OF THE

HONOURABLE MADAM JUSTICE DILLON

Counsel for the Plaintiff	Michael P. Carroll, Q.C.
Counsel for the Defendant	Richard R. Sugden, Q.C.
Dates and Place of Hearing:	December 12 & 13, 2000 Vancouver, B.C.

[1] The plaintiff claims contribution against the defendant for half of the amount that the plaintiff paid to settle a breach of confidence claim previously brought by Cadbury Schweppes Inc. (“Cadbury”) against both parties. This trial proceeded by agreed statement as to all facts with the addition of some discovery evidence read in by the plaintiff. Various judgments also form the background to this case. Third party proceedings between the defendant and Cadbury are left for another day, depending on the outcome of this trial.

Facts

[2] Cadbury successfully sued the plaintiff and defendant for breach of confidence arising from the wrongful use by the plaintiff and defendant of confidential information in the production of a clam and tomato cocktail in competition with Cadbury’s own product known as “Clamato”. Cadbury was awarded judgment on May 25, 1994 (93 B.C.L.R. (2d) 318 (B.C.S.C.)) against the parties to this action and Lawrence Kurlender (“Kurlender”) for damages in the amount that FBI Foods Ltd. (“FBI”) or Caesar Canning Ltd. would have paid to develop a product to compete in the tomato cocktail market in Canada. The defendant was found personally liable in the action as a director of Caesar Canning Ltd., the company that originally secured the licence to manufacture and market Clamato cocktail

in Canada, because he knew or should have known that his company did not have licence to copy the Clamato recipe and was “alive to the peril of what his company was doing under his direction” (at 341 and 335). The plaintiff was vicariously liable through its employee, Kurlender, who knew the facts constituting the breach of confidence and indifferently assumed the risk. Although counsel spent much time at this trial explaining the facts that gave rise to the breach of confidence, these facts are detailed in the reasons for judgment at trial and need not be repeated here. Damages were to be assessed on taxation but the parties subsequently agreed that this amount was $29,761.20 based on the amount that was paid to an expert to figure out the formula for Clamato and basically copy it without containing any clam or seafood product.

[3] In this action, the defendant admitted on discovery that he copied the recipe for “Clamato” without the clam and with different seasonings. The original licence agreement had prohibited the use of clams in any product. When the licence was terminated, all parties initially thought that the restriction against clams was the only operating restriction. However, when the plaintiff and defendant developed a product that was basically the same without the clams based upon the "Clamato" recipe, Cadbury sued for breach of confidentiality.

[4] Cadbury appealed the Supreme Court decision, claiming damages for lost profit and royalties as well as an injunction to prevent these parties from selling products derived from the Clamato recipe. The plaintiff and defendant cross-appealed, seeking dismissal of the award against them. The defendant prepared a draft factum but never filed it. Instead, the defendant settled Cadbury's claim against him just prior to hearing of the appeal. The terms of this settlement were not made known to the plaintiff until recently.

[5] The settlement between Cadbury and the defendant was in the form of a covenant by Cadbury not to sue and contained the following provision:

> FOR AND IN CONSIDERATION of the sum of ONE DOLLAR ($1.00), and other good and valuable consideration, the receipt and sufficiency whereof is hereby acknowledged, the undersigned hereby jointly and severally promise, covenant and agree to and with IRVING GLASSNER, his heirs, executors, administrators, agents and assigns, that neither we, or either of us, nor anyone claiming through us, will hereafter bring, commence, prosecute or maintain, or cause or permit to be brought, commenced, prosecuted or maintained, any suit or action, either at law or in equity for any claim or right of action now existing, against IRVING GLASSNER, either personally or in his capacity as a former officer and director of CAESAR CANNING LTD., and that neither we, nor either of us, nor anyone claiming through us, will enforce, prosecute or

> recover upon, or attempt to enforce, any claim or right of action whatsoever now existing, which we, or either of us, or anyone claiming through us, may now have or may hereafter assert. (My italics)

[6] Cadbury was successful against the plaintiff in the British Columbia Court of Appeal on August 15, 1996 and obtained damages for lost profits for one year plus an injunction (23 B.C.L.R. (3d) 325 (B.C.C.A.)). The one year represented the 'head start time' that a company would have needed to produce a competitive tomato cocktail on the market without the confidential information misused by the plaintiff and defendant. Caesar Beverages Inc., a company owned 50% by the plaintiff and 50% by Caesar Canning Ltd. (a company owned by the defendant and his wife), produced and sold the products during this head start period in eastern Canada. A wholly owned subsidiary of the plaintiff produced the product in the west after purchasing the assets of Caesar Canning Ltd. from a receiver in 1986, but was immune from liability for damages because this involvement was after the head start period. The defendant's appeal against Cadbury was dismissed as abandoned.

[7] Following the judgment of the Court of Appeal, the plaintiff informed the defendant that it reserved its right to claim against the defendant for contribution and indemnity for at least 50% of whatever costs or damages it was obliged to pay Cadbury as a result of the judgment. It also informed the defendant that it intended to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

[8] On January 28, 1999, the Supreme Court of Canada gave its judgment in the matter (Cadbury Schweppes Inc. v. FBI Foods Ltd. (1999), 59 B.C.L.R. (3d) 1 (S.C.C.)). Liability for breach of confidence was not contested so the Supreme Court was concerned primarily with remedies. The appropriate remedy was fact driven and intended to restore Cadbury's lost opportunity. The court disallowed the injunction and referred the matter back to the British Columbia Supreme Court for assessment of damages upon proper principles. This was to be based upon lost profits from lost market opportunity over the twelve months that it would otherwise have taken the defendants to develop their own product.

[9] The plaintiff immediately informed the defendant that it was examining whether it could claim contribution from the defendant and subsequently informed the defendant that it would be seeking contribution. The defendant was invited to comment upon settlement negotiations that were progressing between Cadbury and the plaintiff but the defendant declined to do so. The defendant was specifically informed about the settlement offer of $300,000 and was asked to contribute 50%. The defendant declined to do so.

[10] In the settlement negotiations, Cadbury outlined the value of its claim in excess of $1,000,000 as related only to lost sales attributable to the plaintiff and not to Caesar Canning Ltd.. The eventual settlement agreement of December 21, 1999 was for payment of $300,000 to Cadbury in settlement of all claims including the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada. It included the following payment term:

> The said sum of $300,000.00 will be payable in two equal installments of $150,000.00. The first such installment will be paid on or before December 31, 1999. The second installment will be payable on the earlier of the date that FBI receives a payment by way of contribution and indemnity from Irving Glassner pursuant to proceedings instituted by FBI against Irving Glassner in the Supreme Court of British Columbia, Vancouver Registry Action No. C995160, or June 1, 2000.

The defendant was not a party to this agreement. The plaintiff now claims contribution for half of that settlement based upon the 50% interest held by Caesar Canning Ltd. in Caesar Beverages Ltd., the company that produced the offending product in the east. The defendant acknowledges ownership of Caesar Canning Ltd. and does not contest the percentage of attribution.

Issues

[11] The plaintiff states that its claim for equitable contribution arose once all appeals had been completed and settlement accomplished. The defendant, however, states that the plaintiff has not proven that any portion of the settlement was paid on behalf of the defendant. He also states that third party proceedings should have been brought in the original actions and delay in doing so has prejudiced the defendant. Further, judicial discretion should be exercised to prevent the claim being advanced at this stage as an abuse of process.

[12] The following questions are to be decided. When did the plaintiff's claim for equitable contribution arise? Has the plaintiff proven that it paid for a portion of the loss for the defendant? Does issue estoppel prevent the plaintiff from proceeding with this claim because it should have brought third party proceedings in the earlier action? Should this claim not be allowed to proceed as an abuse of process?

Analysis

[13] It should be noted from the outset that the plaintiff's claim is for equitable contribution in the nature of unjust enrichment and is not brought under the Negligence Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 333. There is no tort involved. The difference between the principle of common law liability and the principle of liability in equity was stated in Bonner v. Tottenham and Edmonton Permanent Investment Building Society [1899] 1 Q.B. 161 (C.A.) at 174:

> There is a common law principle of liability, and also a principle of liability in equity, and these two principles differ. The common law principle requires a common liability to be sued for that which the plaintiff had to pay, and an interest of the defendant in the payment in the sense that he gets the benefit of the payment, either entirely, as in the case of the assignee of a lease, or pro tanto, as in the case of a surety who has paid, and has his action for contribution against his co-surety. The principle in equity seems wide enough to include cases in which there is community of interest in the subject-matter to which the burden is attached, which has been enforced against the plaintiff alone, coupled with benefit to the defendant, even though there is no common liability to be sued. In such a case it seems to me a plaintiff may recover in equity, although there is no common liability to be sued.

The equitable principle requires that the burden borne by one for the benefit of others associated with him in interest, whether borne because of election by a plaintiff of choice of parties or by requirement of law as to parties to actions, be shared equally (supra at 175-176). From this, it is clear that it is not necessary for equitable recovery that the beneficiary be sued in the first action in order for a plaintiff to recover a benefit paid. This is different from contribution at law wherein liability must be established in

[14] The rule of equity that allows a right of contribution is that if two persons are equally liable to be sued for one sum, and one is compelled to pay, he has a right of contribution against the other person liable which is measured by the benefit which that person has received by the payment (Moxham v. Grant, [1900] 1 Q.B. 88 (C.A.)). The principle found early expression in surety cases where equity provided some relief to common law that said that the surety could not sue until he had actually paid more that his portion of the debt. In equity, the claim could be advanced earlier if judgment had been obtained against the surety for more than his portion. Burnyeat,J. recently restated the doctrine in Clayburn Industries v. Recor Services (2000), 78 B.C.L.R. (3d) 19 at 25-26; 2000 BCSC 1069 as follows:

> Originally, the right to contribution was only available as between co-sureties for the same debt. The following description is given for the contribution between co-sureties in Snells's Principles of Equity, Sweet & Maxwell Ltd., 1982, 28th ed.:
> > Where there are two or more sureties for the same debts, and one of them pays the whole debt or more than his proportion of it, he has a right to contribution from his co-surety or co-

> sureties if he cannot obtain indemnity from the principle debtor. (at p.469)
>
> No action for contribution could be brought at law until the surety had actually paid more than his proportion of the debt. In equity, however, even before payment it has always been possible for a surety to bring an action in the nature of quia timet against his co-sureties if judgment has been obtained against him by the creditor for more than his proportion, or perhaps if he is merely threatened by the creditor with an action for more than his proportion. (at p.470)
> The principle of contribution is based on the concept of unjust enrichment and, because it is general in nature, it is not restricted to surety cases. Although the application of the doctrine generally arises in the context of co-sureties or guarantors, the rules extend in general to persons who, in one way or another, incur a common liability where one of them has discharged more than his or her proportionate share of that mutual obligation. The principles of contribution have been extended to cases involving co-insurers, co-mortgagors, co-trustees, corporate directors and partners and other co-obligors but the right to contribution at common law does not apply among joint tortfeasors: Merryweather v. Nixan (1799), 8 T.R. 186.

[15] Section 53(3) of the Law and Equity Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 253 sets out the principles of contribution between persons jointly liable. But, these same principles are in effect between several concurrent wrongdoers so that once it is determined that the respective wrongs have caused the same damage for which both parties are liable, any difference in the initial wrongs is irrelevant (Clayburn Industries v. Recor Services, supra at 26-27).

[16] Here, the plaintiff and defendant are concurrent wrongdoers, severally liable because there were different wrongs committed based upon different participation in the breach of confidence. It is conceded that in order for the plaintiff to have an equitable claim against the defendant, it must have borne a burden for the benefit of the defendant. The defendant contests in several ways that any benefit was received.

[17] The defendant says that the amount paid by the plaintiff to Cadbury was for lost profits and royalties and because the defendant was found not liable to Cadbury for lost profits at trial and then settled against Cadbury, the plaintiff cannot seek contribution. While this may be the case at common law (see Krusel v. Firth, supra at 397; Sylte v. Jackson Bros. Logging Co. (1988), 27 B.C.L.R. (2d) 357 (B.C.S.C.) at 363-4); but contra see Tucker (Public Trustee of) v. Asleson (1993), 102 D.L.R. (4th) 518 (B.C.C.A.),78 B.C.L.R. (2d) 173), it is not so in equity where there need be no finding of liability and contribution will ensue as long as a benefit has been paid on the defendant's behalf.

[18] The defendant then argued that the covenant not to sue the defendant given in settlement extinguished the defendant's liability to Cadbury. As such, Cadbury could not have recovered the whole of its loss from the plaintiff and only recovered that portion attributable to the plaintiff. This is very similar to the argument above and is answered the same as it applies to equity. However, in Tucker, Madam Justice Southin found that release of a tortfeasor severally liable with another did not preclude a claim in contribution from the other tortfeasor severally liable for the excess that it had to pay regardless that the liability of the tortfeasor released was not disputed at trial. She said at 576:

> ... if the person suffering the damage or loss has released his cause of action against one, that one is not liable to contribute to the other".
> To my mind that does not make sense. I think the right of contribution and indemnity among several concurrent tortfeasors is independent of what the injured person does if, in fact, damage or loss has been caused by the fault of two or more. A finding in an action between the person suffering the loss and one of the several concurrent tortfeasors that the latter has caused some part of the damage by his fault, makes that person liable to the person suffering the loss for the whole of the loss, subject to deduction for what that person has received from the released tortfeasor, but does not prevent the tortfeasor who was sued from maintaining his claim for contribution, whether in that action or a separate action. In the first action, it is quite unnecessary for the court to make any division of fault but in the proceedings for contribution it must do so in order to implement the statute.

By analogy, this reasoning applies in this case.

[19] The defendant then refined his argument even further and said that the damages paid by the plaintiff were attributable exclusively to FBI Foods. In British Columbia Ferry Corp. v. T&N plc (1993), 86 B.C.L.R.(2d) 353 (B.C.S.C.), Tucker was distinguished because the plaintiff ferry corporation sought only that portion of damage actually caused by the defendant tortfeasor in the action and had agreed not to seek any portion of the losses claimed against the third party against whom contribution was then sought.

[20] Throughout the original action, Cadbury pursued the whole of its loss that it suffered through wrongful copying and use of the Clamato formula without distinction between the defendants when it came to damages. The trial judge found a common liability between the plaintiff and defendant through the joint venture and the conduct of the defendant and Kurlender in wrongfully copying and using the Clamato formula. Damages flowed from that. The sole separation of the defendants in damages occurred in the Court of Appeal in respect of FBI Brands only. FBI Brands was the corporation operating in the west that had taken over after the receivership of Caesar’s Canning Ltd. and after the head start period. There was no attempt at trial or in the Court of Appeal to separate causation or to apportion damages between the defendants, except as already stated. The damages as agreed between Cadbury and the plaintiff were for lost profits in eastern Canada as arose through Caesar Beverages Inc.. In the Supreme Court of Canada, Cadbury did not contest the separation out of FBI Brands. In settlement correspondence, Cadbury made it clear that it sought damages for lost sales only within the FBI area and not the area of Caesar's Canning. By FBI 'area' was meant eastern Canada as indicated in tables to the settlement letters. This situation is different from B.C. Ferry Corp. v. T&C plc. where the plaintiff elected to claim from one defendant only that portion of loss caused by that defendant alone.

[21] The benefit derived here was payment by FBI of damages for the lost profits and royalties from the eastern market which was operated through the eastern production and distribution company, Caesar Beverages Ltd., which was owned equally by FBI and Mr. Glassner through his company, Caesar Canning Inc.. That equal ownership would give rise to benefit of 50 percent in a settlement was not, in itself, contested.

[22] The claim for contribution does not arise until the payor has paid more than his share. There is no equity to receive a contribution until a disproportionate share of the loss has been paid (Hawrish v. Peters, [1982] 1 S.C.R. 1083 at 1086-1088). In the case of co-sureties, ascertainment of the right to contribution may be made prospectively but is then a different right than that which accrues upon actual payment (Hawrish, supra at 1090).

[23] As between several concurrent tortfeasors, the right of contribution and indemnity is independent from the loss suffered by the injured person. It is a separate and distinct cause of action that does not arise until the judgment or settlement in the original action (Cristovao v. Doran's Beverages Inc. (1983), 143 D.L.R. (3d) 641 at 648 (Ont.H.C.); Tucker v. Asleson, supra at 576). Procedurally, it is open to claim for contribution by third party action in the first action or in a separate action after liability is determined in the first action.

[24] The negligence cases are helpful to decide that it is not necessary to bring third party proceedings in the first action in order to found a claim in contribution. In fact, it really should be brought in a separate action after the settlement or judgment in the first action has been paid. While the claim can be brought in the earlier action, the right does not accrue until payment of a disproportionate amount on behalf of the defendant. The negligence cases clearly suggest that the party who recognizes that there may be a claim in contribution at the end of the day has an option. While this may appear to go against the general principle of res judicata that litigants should bring forward their entire case in one action and avoid carving up a controversy that should be resolved in one action (Lim v. Lim (1999), 180 D.L.R. (4th) 87 at 92-93; 1999 BCCA 596), judicial economy is not always the overriding principle, especially when the cause of action does not arise until after judgment or settlement in the first action and a disproportionate share of the loss has been paid. In Lim, Mr. Justice Hall recognized that this principle of judicial economy should be followed "to the extent possible" (at 92). He acknowledged that there were limits to the principle and that the interests of justice must always be regarded. He found the decision of the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal in Hoque v. Montreal Trust Co.(1997), 162 N.S.R. (2d) 321 at 338 (N.S.C.A.) helpful in that regard. There, the court said that the test was not whether the issue could have been raised in the first action, but whether it should have been raised depending on a number of factors. Cromwell, J.A. said at 338:

> My review of these authorities shows that while there are some very broad statements that all matters which could have been raised are barred under the principle of cause of action estoppel, none of the cases actually demonstrates this broad principle. In each case, the issue was whether the party should have raised the point now asserted in the second action. That turns on a number of considerations, including whether the new allegations are inconsistent with matters actually decided in the earlier case, whether it relates to the same or a distinct cause of action, whether > there is an attempt to rely on new facts which could have been discovered with reasonable diligence in the earlier case, whether the second action is simply an attempt to impose a new legal conception on the same facts or whether the present action constitutes an abuse of process.

These considerations support a flexible approach so that litigation is not shut out except after scrupulous examination of all of the circumstances and where reasonable diligence would have caused the matter to be raised earlier (Yat Tung Investment Co. v. Dao Heng Bank, [1975] A.C. 581 at 590 (H.L.); Hoque supra at 331; British Columbia (Minister of Forests) v. Bugbusters Pest Management Inc. (1998), 50 B.C.L.R. (3d) 1 at 11 (B.C.C.A.)).

[25] The defendant agrees with these principles and that the plaintiff had an option to wait. However, he stated that the plaintiff should have brought the issue as third party proceedings in the first action based upon the Hoque factors. The new allegation is not inconsistent with matters actually decided in the first action: however, the cause of action did not arise until the first action was settled. It is a separate cause of action. It would not have been practicable to bring the action for contribution in the first action when the parties were of one interest in that action. It is not a simple situation such as an action for debt where there are co-sureties so that the amount of contribution is clear from the start. The plaintiff could not have ascertained the amount of the settlement with due diligence in the first action which was hard fought. Therefore, it does not follow as a matter of principle that this action should be barred. Issue estoppel is not appropriate.

[26] Further and separately, the defendant stated that it is an abuse of process to allow the action now because the defendant has been prejudiced by failure to raise the matter in the first action. The delay in bringing an action against the defendant has prevented the defendant from putting forward a defence, namely, that the corporate veil should not have been pierced at trial in the first action. When the defendant did not proceed with his appeal, he did not pursue the alleged error of the trial judge in attributing responsibility for Caesar Canning Ltd. to the defendant. Instead, he settled with Cadbury for undisclosed terms and did not participate further in the appeals. He did not seek to settle with the plaintiff. It was not until after judgment from the British Columbia Court of Appeal that the plaintiff advised the defendant that it was going to claim contribution. The defendant says that it is unfair and an abuse of process to allow the plaintiff’s action to proceed in these circumstances when the defendant could have been completely absolved of liability.

[27] An action can be struck out as an abuse of process when res judicata is not available. The res judicata rule in Henderson v. Henderson (1843), 67 E.R. 313 as quoted in Lim supra at 92 is also a rule of public policy (Vervaeke v. Smith, [1982] 2 All E.R. 144 at 152 (H.L.)). This rule requires parties to bring forward their whole case in one action. Lyons, J.A. recognized that it is possible to get beyond the hard and fast rules of issue estoppel in Solomon v. Smith (1987),45 D.L.R.(4th)266 at 275:

> I agree ... that a plea of issue estoppel is not available. However to permit the statement of claim to proceed would be an abuse of process and that is the principle applicable. In considering this doctrine, it seems to me prudent to avoid hard and fast, institutionalized rules such as those which attach to the plea of issue estoppel. By encouraging the determination of each case on its own facts against the general principle of the plea of abuse, serious prejudice to either party as well as to the proper administration of justice can best be avoided. ... we must be vigilant to ensure that the system does not become unnecessarily clogged with repetitious litigation of the kind here attempted. There should be an end to this litigation. To allow the plaintiff to retry the issue of misrepresentation would be a classic example of abuse of process — a waste of time and resources of litigants and the court and erosion of the principle of finality so crucial to the proper administration of justice.

Abuse of process has been invoked in this way to prevent the regurgitation of issues and actions that had already been decided in another jurisdiction and that were continued in a course of conduct intended to harass (420093 B.C.Ltd. v. Bank of Montreal (1995), 128 D.L.R.(4th)488 at 504-6 (Alta. C.A.)). This wider sense of the doctrine in Henderson has been said to be reserved for "special circumstances" where justice demands non-application of the rule (Yat Tung Investment Co. supra at 590). The policy is aimed at preventing fresh litigation between the same parties over the same subject matter (Nesbitt Thomson Deacon Inc. v. Everett (1989) 37 B.C.L.R. (2d) 341 at 343 (B.C.C.A.)).

[28] This is not the type of repetitious litigation as seen in 420093 B.C. Ltd.. Nor is it an obvious waste of time or an attempt to re-litigate an issue. In fact, the defendant does not argue this. He states that the defence has been prejudiced by not having the opportunity on appeal to absolve the defendant of liability. This, however, ignores the reality that the cause of action did not arise until after settlement monies were paid on behalf of the defendant and that, in equity, it is unnecessary for a beneficiary to even be sued in the first action in order for a plaintiff to recover a benefit paid. The plaintiff was entitled to wait and see whether it would be held liable in the Supreme Court of Canada. Neither party requested adjudication of third party claims in the first action. In Nesbitt Thomson Deacon Inc. supra at 343, Hutcheon, J.A. considered it clearly without merit to argue that third party proceedings should have been brought in the first action when the second action was to recover monies paid to settle the first action. Although invited by the defendant to distinguish this case on the facts, I find that I am unable to do so.

[29] This leaves the matter of prejudice. In Tucker (albeit a negligence case), fault had to be borne by Tucker even though her liability was not disputed at trial and she did not appeal (at 573). Findings in the first action do not prevent a claim in contribution unless the plaintiff in the first action elected to claim only from one for loss caused by that one (see British Columbia Ferry Corp. v. T & C plc supra at 356 and above). It cannot be said that serious prejudice has resulted here. The defendant chose to settle early on favourable terms that were not communicated to the plaintiff. He then chose to abandon his appeal when the possibility of the plaintiff claiming contribution was still possible. He ignored offers to participate in settlement discussions. It is unnecessary for me to weigh the likelihood of success of the defendant’s forgone appeal argument.

Conclusion

[30] There is no reason to bar the plaintiff's claim. There were no arguments advanced against the quantum of the contribution in this situation. The defendant shall pay the plaintiff $150,000. Interest is payable pursuant to the Court Order Interest Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 79. The plaintiff is entitled to costs on the scale of three.

Gardner v. Newton

Mathers, C. J. K. B.

Judgment: February 28, 1916

Counsel: I. Pitblado, K. C., and C. H. Locke, for plaintiff.
W. A. T. Sweatman, and W. L. McLaws, for defendant.

Mathers, C. J. K. B.*:

1 On November 5, 1912, the plaintiff by indenture of lease made pursuant to The Short Forms of Indenture Act, "in consideration of the rents, covenants and agreements" therein contained, demised and leased to The Clothes Shop, Ltd., the corner store in the Carlton Building on the southeast corner of Portage Avenue and Carlton Street in this city for a term of four years and ten months to be computed from December 1, 1912, and ending on September 13, 1917. The rent reserved was $73,300, payable in monthly instalments of $1,150 from December 1, 1912, to November 30, 1915, and $1,450 from December 1, 1915, to September 30, 1917, each in advance on the first day of every month of the said term and the lessee was also to pay business tax, electric light, gas and water charges.

2 The lessee covenanted to pay rent and to pay business tax, electric light, gas and water charges and if it made default in payment of such charges they should be construed as rent and the lessor should be at liberty to distrain therefor.

3 The lease also contained a covenant by the lessee to repair, provided that if the demised premises should at any time prior to or during the term be burned down or damaged by fire, lightning or tempest so as to render the same unfit for the purposes of the lessee, then and so often as the same should happen the rent reserved or a proportionate part thereof according to the nature and extent of the injury sustained and all remedies for recovering the same should be suspended and abated until the premises should be rebuilt or made fit for the the purposes of the lessee, provided that the lessor, in the event of such destruction or partial destruction might terminate the term demised by mailing a notice to that effect to the lessee at Winnipeg.

> Provided further that, notwithstanding anything herein contained the lessor shall not under any circumstances be obliged to rebuild or repair the premises in the event of loss or damage by fire or any of the causes hereinbefore mentioned, rendering them unfit for occupation, nor shall the lessees under any circumstances have the right to rebuild or repair the said demised premises in the event of such loss or damage except at their own charge and expense and with written consent of the lessor first had and obtained, provided always that rent shall cease from the time of such destruction or partial destruction.

4 The indenture provides for a number of events such as default in paying rent or the making of an assignment for the benefit of creditors or in case the premises should be abandoned or should become and remain vacant for a period of ten days, on the happening of any of which a sum equivalent to three months' rent should immediately become due and payable as rent and the lease should at the option of the lessor cease and be void and the term granted expire and be at an end and the lessor should have a right to re-enter and release the premises.

5 It also contained the usual proviso for re-entry by the lessor for non-payment of rent or non-performance of covenants.

6 The lessor on his part covenanted for quiet enjoyment and to heat the demised premises when necessary during the term.

7 The Clothes Shop, Ltd., entered into possession under the lease and continued in possession until April 28, 1915. On April 8, 1915, the lessee transferred by bill of sale bearing that date all its goods and chattels in connection with its store business carried on in the demised premises, and also its book accounts to the defendant Newton. The bill of sale recited that

> Whereas the bargainer is indebted to certain creditors whose names are set out in the schedule hereto annexed and marked with the leter "A," and has agreed to sell and transfer to the bargainee the goods and chattels and other assets hereinafter mentioned for the purpose of selling and disposing of the same, and distributing the proceeds thereof pro rata among the creditors set out in the said schedule.

8 The plaintiff was named as one of the creditors in the schedule referred to.

9 At the same time The Clothes Shop, Ltd., executed under its seal the following document, to which also was attached as schedule "A" the said list of creditors:

> This agreement made in duplicate this eighth day of April, A.D. 1915; Between The Clothes Shop, Limited, hereinafter called "the debtor," of the First Part; and Charles Henry Newton, of the City of Winnipeg, in the Province of Manitoba, Official Assignee, hereinafter called "the Trustee," of the Second Part.
> Whereas the debtor is indebted to certain creditors whose names are set out in the Schedule hereto annexed and marked with the letter "A."
>
> And Whereas under and by virtue of a certain bill of sale, bearing date herewith and made between the parties hereto, the said debtor has sold and transferred to the said trustee certain goods and chattels stock-in-trade, fixtures and fittings and book accounts mentioned in said bill of sale;
>
> And Whereas it is agreed that the said bill of sale is executed by the debtor and received by the said trustee on the terms and conditions hereinafter mentioned, viz.:
>
> 1. The said trustee shall be and is hereby declared to be the trustee for and on behalf of the creditors of the said debtor, whose names are set out in the said Schedule "A."
>
> 2. The said trustee shall have the right to sell and dispose of the said stock-in-trade, fixtures and fittings, book accounts, promissory notes, bills receivable, and other goods and chattels referred to or described in the said bill of sale, or which comes otherwise in his possession or power, either by public auction or private sale or for cash or upon terms of credit with or without security as the said trustee shall deem advisable or expedient, and shall pay and distribute the proceeds realized from and out of any such sale or sales, and out of the collection of book accounts, promissory notes, bills receivable in the manner following:
>
> First: In payment of his costs, charges and expenses for and in connection with the sale and realization of such assets and the distribution hereinafter mentioned together with the solicitors' charges of and in connection with the said bill of sale and this agreement, and
>
> Secondly: The claims of preferred creditors, if any, and
>
> Thirdly: In payment pro rata among the general creditors mentioned in the said Schedule.
> 3. And it is distinctly understood and agreed between the parties hereto that the said trustee shall not be liable to the said debtor or the said creditors, for any moneys, excepting such as are actually received by him, and shall not be liable for any loss or damage done to or any shrinkage of the said goods and chattels or other assets, or any part thereof, nor for any act or omission on the part of the said trustee, excepting such acts or omissions as shall amount to gross negligence, and that the said trustee shall have power to make any compromise or other settlement in respect of any of the book accounts, promissory notes, bills receivable, or choses-in-action which he may deem advisable or expedient.

4. It is further distinctly understood and agreed that neither the bill of sale or this agreement shall be deemed to be in any way a satisfaction of or settlement of the existing liability of the said debtor to the said creditors, or any of them, nor shall the same prejudice or affect the present or accruing rights of the said creditors in respect of their claims against the said debtor, nor operate as a merger thereof, nor prejudice or affect any security or securities now or hereafter held by the said creditors, or by any of them, but the said debtor shall remain liable to the said creditors for the amount of his existing indebtedness to them, unaffected by these presents, or by the said bill of sale.

5. It is further agreed between the parties hereto that the said trustee may nominate, constitute or appoint any other person, firm or corporation to act as his attorney or attorneys, to carry out the provisions, terms or trusts contained in this agreement, or to act in any way in his place and stead in connection with this agreement, or the said bill of sale as the said trustee shall deem advisable or expedient.

6. In order that the said trustee may know the exact amount of the claims of the various creditors set out in the Schedule "A" each creditor as required by the trustee shall forthwith make a statutory declaration verifying his claim against the debtor, and the debtor hereby acknowledges that no creditor holds any security in connection with his claim, other than the landlord of the debtor, W. H. Gardner, who has the right to distrain for three month's rent.

10 Both bill of sale and trust agreement were delivered to the defendant Newton.

11 He assumed the burden of the trust and took possession of the goods and book accounts, for which purpose he went upon the demised premises. On April 28 he sold the goods and they were on that day removed from the premises by the purchaser. He has received the proceeds from such sale and now holds same for distribution in accordance with the trust agreement.

12 The plaintiff received notice of this transfer and agreement and on May 19, 1915, he sent to the trustee a statutory declaration made by himself proving his claim under the lease. In it he claimed as rent overdue up to and including April, 1915, the sum of $5,800, and of this he claimed that the sum of $4,600 was a preferred claim. He also claimed the further sum of $38,800, being the balance still unpaid of the total rent reserved for the entire term, less the said $5,800 overdue.

13 On June 22, 1915, the assignee notified the plaintiff that under the advice of his solicitors he would not admit plaintiff's claim for $38,800, and that he proposed to divide the moneys in his hands immediately unless the plaintiff entered an action to establish his right.

14 This action was then brought by the plaintiff against the assignee and The Clothes Shop, Ltd., for a declaration that he is entitled to receive his distributive share of the $38,800 as well as upon the portion of the claim admitted by the assignee.

15 It is admitted that The Clothes Shop, Ltd., vacated the premises on April 28, 1915, in the sense that it no longer carried on business there; but it has since that time authorized other people to go into and use the premises.

16 The lease is still subsisting and the term demised still remains vested in the lessees, The Clothes Shop, Ltd. It was not contended that there had been any surrender of the lease either by act of the parties or by operation of law. The plaintiff has declined to exercise the option contained in the lease of declaring the same void because of the lessee's assignment for the benefit of creditors and has declined to re-enter or release the premises.

17 The question to be decided is whether the plaintiff is a "creditor" in respect of rent which had not become due and payable by effluxion of time when the trust for creditors was created within the meaning of the documents creating the trust.

18 Creditors under The Assignments Acts of Ontario with which the Manitoba Act is in pari materia are those only whose claims are debitum in presenti, although they may be solvendum in futuro. For this reason a person having a claim for unliquidated damages not reduced to a judgment at the time of the assignment, whether arising out of tort: Ashley v. Brown, 17 A.R. 500, Gurofski v. Harris, 27 O.R. 201, or breach of contract: Grant v. West, 23 A.R. 533, Magann v. Ferguson, 29 O.R. 235, is not a creditor within the meaning of these acts. One of the reasons which influenced the courts in arriving at this conclusion was that The Assignments Acts make no provision whereby a person claiming unliquidated damages may substantiate his claim against the estate.

19 In Grant v. West, supra, Chief Justice Hagarty said arguendo, in answer to the argument that the claim for damages was groundless —

> The objection to the right to rank seems to me to be far deeper. There does not seem to be any provision in The Assignments Act allowing a person claiming damages to substantiate that claim against the estate.

20 In his judgment he states that in his opinion the word "creditor" is used in the act as meaning one to whom a debt is owing — correlative to debtor. Mr. Justice Osler begins his judgment with the statement that:

> The point taken by the learned Chief Justice on the argument is in my opinion fatal to the appeal.

21 Farther on he refers to the fact that

> A claim for damages is nowhere in terms mentioned in the Act. Wherever a claimant is referred to the language seems to point to a claim against one who is a debtor, a word which does not aptly describe one who is only sought to be made liable for unliquidated damages.

22 Not only are unliquidated damages excluded from proof under these Acts, but so also are contingent claims, that is, a claim which may or may not ever ripen into a debt, according as some future event does or does not happen.

23 In Mail Printing Co. v. Clarkson, 25 A.R. 1, the judgment turned upon the fact that at the date of the assignment the contract was still wholly executory. There was no absolute certainty that the Printing Company would ever publish any portion of the advertising matter contracted for. It might under the terms of the contract refuse all the matter tendered, or before any space had been used and before the expiration of the year over which the contract extended the newspaper might have suspended publication. In either event the company would have no claim. Upon these considerations the court held that the company was not a creditor entitled to rank on the estate.

24 In Clapperton v. Mutchmor, 30 O.R. 595, the right to rank was denied to the plaintiff by Boyd, C., because at the date of the assignment his position was that he held the debtor's guarantee for the payment of certain promissory notes still current at the time of the assignment made by a company also in liquidation, of which the debtor was president. The learned Chancellor said:

> There was no debt in this case at the time of the assignment. There would be no debt until the notes matured and default arose in their payment by the company. Though this time has now elapsed and all the notes are overdue and unpaid still I do not think that the status of creditor obtained after the assignment can entitle the plaintiff to rank with those who were creditors at the date of the assignment.

25 There the only contingency which might intervene to prevent the plaintiff's claim becoming a debt payable by the assignor was the possibility that the maker of the notes guaranteed — a company which went into liquidation three days after the assignment — would pay them when they became due.

26 In Carswell v. Langley, 3 O.L.R. 261, it was held that an annuitant to whom an annuity of $100 per quarter had been granted during her natural life was not a creditor having a right to rank for future quarterly payments upon the estate of the grantor of the annuity under The Assignments Act. Whether or not there would ever be a debt due from the grantor to the grantee of the annuity depended upon the contingency of the grantee living until the next quarterly payment matured.

27 Before the amendment of the English Winding Up Act permitting a petition to be presented by a creditor including any contingent or prospective creditor, it was held that the word "creditor" as then used in the Act did not include a person having a claim for unliquidated damages and that such a person was not entitled to present a petition notwithstanding that under another section of the Act

all claims against the company, present or future, certain or contingent, ascertained or sounding only in damages

28 were admissible to proof. In re Pen-y-Van Colliery Co., 6 Ch. D. 477. It was further held that a guarantor of a debt of the company who had not paid the claim was not a creditor: In re Vron Colliery Co., 20 Ch. D. 442, 51 L. J. Ch. 389, nor was a landlord such a creditor for accruing rent not yet payable: Re United Club and Hotel Co., Ltd., 60 L. T. (N. S.) 665.

29 The earlier bankruptcy laws contained no provision admitting contingent debts and those sounding in damages to proof, and the existence of such claims, it was held, did not constitute the claimant's creditors entitled to rank on the bankrupt's estate: Hamond v. Toulman, 7 Term. R. 612, 101 E.R. 1159. Robson on Bankruptcy, 273. To remedy this defect in the law Acts were passed, 6 Geo. IV., 1849, 1861, 1869, 1883. Now all debts and liabilities present or future, certain or contingent are provable, including unliquidated damages arising out of breach of contract or trust, and provision is made for valuing such claims.

30 The above cases all deal with the definition of the words "debtor" and "creditor" in particular statutes. They show that in the absence of anything to indicate that a more comprehensive meaning was intended that which is ascribed to them in every day usage is to be applied. In its largest sense "creditor" is one who has a right to require the fulfilment of an obligation or contract; but its general and almost universal meaning is a person to whom a debt is payable. Stroud, Judicial Dictionary, p. 423, Nicolin v. Weiland, 56 N. W. R. at p. 588, and all argument from analogy to the Bankruptcy, Assignment and Winding Up Acts is opposed to giving the word a larger meaning than that which ordinary usage attaches to it.

31 The definition of "creditor" as here used does not depend upon the construction of a statute. I must construe the deeds by which this trust was created according to their express terms in the light of all the circumstances and not strain them to bring them within the alleged intention of any of these statutes.

32 The plaintiff by the lease divested himself of the right to the possession of the premises for the whole term subject to the right of re-entry on default of the lessee. The contract was completely executed on his part when he executed the lease. In this respect this case differs from Mail v. Clarkson, supra. It is true he covenanted for quiet enjoyment and to heat the premises, but a breach by the landlord of either covenant would not terminate the lease; it would but give the tenant a right of action for the breach. The tenant on its part covenants to pay the whole rent by monthly instalments on the first of each month in advance. The tenant has ceased to carry on business on the premises, but there has been no surrender of the lease, and there is no evidence that the tenant is not able to pay the monthly instalments of rent as they fall due or that the same cannot be collected from it by suit. The premises still belong to the tenant and it may either leave them vacant or resume possession. If there had been no trust for creditors created by the tenant it is clear that the landlord's only right would be to sue for the gales of rent as they come due. He would have no right to sue at once for the whole unpaid portion of the rent reserved, even if the tenant had declared that it had given up the premises and would pay no more rent: Connolly v. Coon, 23 A.R. 37. The contention of the plaintiff is that the tenant has, however, conferred upon him the right to prove for, and in that way possibly recover, all the unpaid rent at once, without waiting for the expiration of the times fixed for payment by the lease. There was no evidence that the tenant is insolvent or unable to pay its debts in full or that the estate is not sufficient to pay in full all the creditors named including the disputed claim of the plaintiff. If that be so, the plaintiff, if allowed to rank upon the estate, will receive the whole rent reserved long before he would have been entitled to it if there had been no assignment by the tenant. There is no contract or agreement in the lease on which a claim to payment of the whole rent in advance could be based.

33 Then, is there anything in the deeds to indicate that such was the intention of the tenant? The bill of sale recites that The Clothes Shop, Limited, is "indebted" to certain "creditors" and has agreed to sell and transfer the goods named to the trustee for the purpose of selling the same and distributing the proceeds pro rata amongst the creditors named. In the trust deed The Clothes Shop, Limited, is designated "the debtor," throughout and Newton is referred to as the trustee for the "creditors." He is empowered to sell the goods and to distribute the proceeds first in payment of costs and charges; secondly, in payment of preferred claims, and thirdly, "in payment pro rata amongst the general creditors mentioned in the schedule."

34 By s. 4 the agreement is not to be deemed a satisfaction of the "existing liability" of the debtor to the creditors nor affect "present or accruing rights" of the creditors in respect of their "claims" against the "debtor," but the "debtor" shall "remain liable to the said creditors for the amount of his existing indebtedness to them." By s. 6 that the "trustee may know the exact amount of the claims" of the "creditors" each creditor is to make a statutory declaration verifying his "claim" against the "debtor."

35 Nothing can be inferred from the fact that the plaintiff's name was inserted in the schedule, because there was a large sum due and payable for rent already accrued in respect of which he was properly named as a creditor.

36 The documents contain no provision such as that found in The Assignments Act for ascertaining the present value of a debt not yet accrued by deducting interest or such as that found in the Bankruptcy Acts and the Winding Up Acts for ascertaining the present value of a contingent claim or one sounding in damages. Hagarty, C.J. and Osler, J. in Grant v. West, supra, thought the omission from The Assignments Act of a provision allowing a claim for damages to be substantiated indicated an intention that such a claim should not be allowed to rank. A similar inference might be drawn from the omission of such a provision from these deeds.

37 I can see nothing to indicate that the word "creditor" in these documents was used other than in its popular sense — correlative to "debtor" but much to indicate that such was the intention of the parties. The trust agreement speaks from the date of its execution. At that time no part of the disputed claim had accrued due nor was there any absolute certainty that any future rent would ever accrue. The lease provides that if the building should burn down or be rendered unfit for the purposes of the lessee, the rent and all remedies for recovering it shall be at once suspended until the premises are rebuilt. Whether or not in the event of injury the premises shall be rebuilt or repaired depends upon the unfettered will of the plaintiff. The plaintiff relies upon the company's covenant to pay the rent, but the covenant would at once cease to be enforceable if the premises were destroyed by fire. In view of the possibility of that event happening it would, it seems to me, be highly unjust and contrary to the contract of the parties that the plaintiff should be admitted to prove now for the full rent. The very most he would be entitled to do would be to prove for the present value of his claim. But how is that value to be arrived at even if the trust instruments made provision for assessing it? The premises might have been destroyed the next day or they may remain intact until the expiration of the lease. No tribunal, however wide its powers, could possibly name a sum which will certainly accrue to the plaintiff. It seems to me quite impossible to say that a man is a "creditor" even using the word in its largest sense, in respect of a sum of money not one penny of which may ever become payable.

38 I have found no authority directly in point, but King v. Malcott, 9 Hare, 692, is somewhat analogous. In that case premises were leased for 99 years at a rent of £450 per annum. The lease contained a covenant on the part of the lessee himself, his heirs and executors to pay the rent. The lessee died when only a small fraction of the term had elapsed, having previously assigned the demised premises to another, leaving a will charging his debts upon his real and personal estate. The lessor brought an action against the executors for administration and to have a sufficient part of the proceeds of the estate set apart and invested as a due provision for the payment of the rent then due or thereafter to accrue due on the lease. It was not claimed as here that there was an immediate right to rank as a creditor upon the estate; all that was asked was that a sufficient portion of the estate be empounded to provide for future rent accruing and being unpaid by the assignment of the lease. In that case as the Vice Chancellor pointed out, not only was there no rent due, but there was no certainty that anything ever would be due on the covenant, for, if the rent was paid when due no action would ever lie, and the action was dismissed.

39 King v. Malcott was applied in In re Haytor Granite Co., L.R. 1 Eq. 11, where a very similar application was made under The Winding-Up Act. There a company which had become the lessee of a granite quarry for a term of years at an annual rent which it had covenanted to pay was ordered to be wound up, while several years of the term still remained. The landlord took out a summons to be admitted to prove for the future rent. As in the previous case the Company had assigned the lease but its liability upon its covenant to pay still remained. The application was based upon s. 158 of The Winding-Up Act 1862, under which all claims present or future, certain or contingent, ascertained or sounding only in damages were admissible to proof, a just estimate being made as far as possible of the value of all claims, subject to a contingency or sounding only in damages. The Master of the Rolls held that it was impossible to estimate the chance of the present or some future owner of the lease not paying the rent, the result of which would only be that the landlord would get back the property in the state it then was and refused the application. On appeal, L.R. 1 Ch. 77, 35 L.J. Ch. 154, the order of the Master of the Rolls was varied but only to this extent that the landlord was permitted to enter a claim for the whole rent but only to prove for rent actually accrued due.

40 The next case in which the question is discussed, In re London and Colonial Co. (Horsey's Claim), L.R. 5 Eq. 561, 37 L.J. Ch. 393, is distinguished from the Haytor Case by the fact that the lease had not been assigned but remained with the liquidator. The landlord on the authority of the Haytor Case had been permitted to enter a claim for the entire future rent, but as there was then nothing in arrears he could prove for nothing. The liquidator declared several dividends and the landlord applied for an order directing the liquidator to pay into court a sum representing the dividends which would have been payable to him upon his total estimated rent for the unexpired portion of the term to secure his dividends as his claim matured. The Vice Chancellor held that such a claim for future rent was not within s. 158 of The Winding-Up Act, and refused the application. He said:

> From the terms of this section it follows either that the claimant has a right to immediate proof and payment or ... that he has no present right at all. I am of opinion that he is entitled to no present right at all; or in other words, that the section does not apply to the case of a lessor who has the lease always as an absolute security — a continual remedy by distress — a remedy by re-entry if he desires it — who has been paid all arrears of rent which have accrued due since the winding-up — and with respect to whom it must be said that the chances of any future breaches of covenant or of there being or not being a sufficient distress cannot be the subject of calculation.
> It would be strange too if his proof should be admitted and that such a proof and payment in competition with the other creditors should not be taken as a satisfaction of his remedies by covenant, distress or re-entry — no matter what the amount of the dividend might be; and yet there is no provision in the Act providing for his giving up those rights, nor am I aware as at present advised that the court could impose any such terms on him.

41 The reasoning of that case is distinctly against the plaintiff's right to prove in this case. If a claim for future rent cannot be admitted to proof in a winding-up proceeding, notwithstanding the very wide terms of s. 158 of The Winding-Up Act, it follows that it cannot be admitted to proof under the terms of an agreement which contains nothing equivalent to that section.

42 The Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10, made the Bankruptcy rules "as to debts and liabilities provable" applicable to winding-up proceedings. In two cases afterwards decided, viz., Hardy v. Fothergill, 13 App. Cas. 351, 58 L.J.Q.B. 44, and Midland Coal and Coke Co., In re Craig's Claim, [1895] 1 Ch. 267, 64 L.J. Ch. 279, it was intimated but not decided that this change altered the law and that therefore a landlord's right to prove for future rent must be conceded. A few months after the decision in Craig's Claim, the point arose again in In re New Oriental Corpn., [1895] 1 Ch. 753, 64 L.J. Ch. 439, and Vaughan Williams, L.J. held that these two cases had no application to a case where the lease is still subsisting and adopting the principle of Haytor Granite Co. and Horsey's Claim, he allowed a claim to be entered for the whole future rent, but only to prove for what was overdue, although the company was insolvent. This case was followed in In re Panther Lead Co., [1896] 1 Ch. 978, 65 L.J. Ch. 499, the facts of which were practically identical with the Oriental Bank Case, with this exception, that in the latter case the lease was still subsisting and the lessor refused to accept a surrender, whereas in the Panther Lead Case the lessor offered to do so on terms of his being allowed to prove for the loss thereby sustained, and Romer, J. intimated his opinion that the liquidator should accept the offer and left it to the parties to carry out an arrangement to that effect. The learned judge said if the lessor had as in the Oriental Bank Case refused to accept a surrender he would have found great difficulty in doing more than was done by Vaughan Williams, L.J. in that case.

43 While these cases were decided under The Winding-Up Act, they are of assistance in determining the plaintiff's rights in so far as they enunciate general principles of justice. They lay down this guiding principle that a lessor cannot "have both the rent and possession," that is, cannot prove for future rent and retain his reversion with the rights of distress, action on the covenant and re-entry incident to it: Emden on Winding-Up of Companies, 7th ed. 168.

44 I have therefore come to the conclusion, notwithstanding the very able argument of Mr. Pitblado, that upon the proper construction of the documents creating this trust, as well as upon principle and authority, the plaintiff's claim cannot be maintained.

45 The action will be dismissed with costs.

Action dismissed with costs.

Memorandum of Judgment

The Court:

INTRODUCTION

[1] The appellants, David Fuss and Rhonda Thuna, appeal a trial judgment which found they committed the tort of unlawful conduct conspiracy against the respondent bank and awarded damages of $1,761,901.14 against them: 2011 ABQB 748. Applying the five elements of the tort set out in Agribrands Purina Canada Inc v Kasamekas, 2011 ONCA 460, 106 OR (3d) 427 at para 26, the trial judge found:

> 1. the appellants, along with Cameron Kendrick (not a party to the appeal), acted by agreement to divert business activities from 828326 Alberta Ltd. (828) to other companies, Electronics Wholesale (Edmonton) Ltd. (EWE) and 1100336 Alberta Ltd. (1100);
> 2. the appellants' conduct was unlawful;
>
> 3. the appellants' conduct was directed at the respondent because the scheme would defeat the respondent's attempt to recover the funds it loaned 828;
>
> 4. injury to the respondent was likely to result if 828's assets were stripped; and
> 5. the appellants' conduct caused injury to the respondent because it could not recover the loaned funds from 828.

[2] The appellants advance three grounds of appeal. First, they argue the trial judge misapplied the law of unlawful conduct conspiracy. They say the trial judge could not find a conspiracy because he concluded the appellants were not aware of the fraud perpetrated by Kendrick. They also say the trial judge failed to deal with causation and that no acts or omissions on their part caused the respondent's loss. Second, they argue the trial judge misapplied the law relating to a director's statutory duties. Third, they argue the trial judge erred in calculating damages. They say they should not be liable for damages calculated pursuant to the terms of a general security agreement (GSA) between 828 and the respondent.

FACTS

[3] The respondent began providing financing to 828 through an operating line of credit in 2001. 828 executed a GSA which provided that any money collected or received by 828 was subject to a trust in favour of the respondent. At that time, Kendrick was 828's only director and shareholder.

2013 ABCA 235 (CanLII)

828 operated under the name Electronics Wholesale and was a wholesale and retail distributor of satellite systems and other electronics.

[4] Fuss was a director of two Ontario corporations that were suppliers of 828, Ariza Technology Inc. (Ariza) and Incredible Electronics Inc. (Incredible). He was also a director of HBC Business Credit Inc. (HBC), a third Ontario corporation that became a 50% shareholder of 828.

[5] When HBC became a 50% shareholder of 828, Thuna, Fuss' wife, was made a director of 828. Thuna was also a director of Ariza and HBC. EWE was incorporated in July 2003. Thuna was a director of that corporation as well.

[6] During 2003, 828 often exceeded the limit of its operating line of credit with the respondent. On January 29, 2004, the respondent returned some of 828's cheques for insufficient funds and notified 828 that further cheques would be dishonoured. On February 4, the respondent began dishonouring all of 828's cheques.

[7] Kendrick and Fuss decided to continue the business of 828 by opening an account with TD Canada Trust (TD). That account was opened, in EWE's name, on February 4, 2004. Kendrick and the appellants were signing officers for the account. All receivables coming to 828, and proceeds from the sale of 828's inventory, were deposited in the TD account.

[8] The respondent was advised of the TD account but was not advised that 828's business was operating under EWE or that the TD account belonged to that corporation. Over $1.2 million was deposited in the TD account by the end of May 2004. None of the funds went to 828 or the respondent.

[9] On March 8, 2004, the respondent made a demand for payment. The principal amount owing by 828 was $690,747.58. Between March 17 and May 7, $202,350.82 was paid to Ariza from EWE's TD account.

[10] 1100 was incorporated on April 1, 2004. Fuss and Kendrick's father were the directors of that corporation. 1100 took over the operation of 828's business, including its stock, receivables and employees. The respondent was not advised of 1100's involvement with 828's business.

[11] In June 2004, the respondent appointed Price Waterhouse Coopers to serve as the privately appointed receiver and manager of the business and undertakings of 828.

[12] In July 2004, the respondent petitioned 828 into bankruptcy. Its recovery was negligible. 828's remaining stock had little value and its electronic records had been destroyed. In September, the respondent sued Kendrick, Fuss, Thuna and the corporations they controlled alleging they conspired to prevent it from realizing the debt owing by 828. 1100 ceased operation in 2005.

THE TRIAL DECISION

[13] The trial judge did not find the appellants to be credible witnesses. He concluded Fuss was dishonest about certain things and Thuna attempted to minimize her knowledge and participation in the scheme.

[14] The trial judge found that 828's property and operations were transferred to EWE and 1100 and that the transfers were not for fair market value. He concluded that EWE's business, and the funds in the TD account, actually belonged to 828 and that EWE's role was merely a front under which 828's business was continued while Fuss and Kendrick set up 1100. Once 1100 was set up, it received 828's remaining property, employees and business activities.

[15] The trial judge concluded that the transfers from 828 to 1100, and the use of EWE's TD account, were an intentional and deliberate process designed to sequester 828's assets in 1100 and leave 828 with the liability to the respondent. Put another way, he concluded the plan was to leave the respondent with a right to advance its claim on an empty, worthless corporation. He held that 1100 had no legitimate business purpose and was created solely for the purpose of defeating the respondent's claim.

[16] The trial judge found that Kendrick was responsible for producing misleading or incorrect financial information for 828 and destroying that corporation's electronic records. He found this was fraudulent conduct. Although he did not find that the appellants were aware of Kendrick's fraud, the trial judge concluded they were aware of, endorsed and participated in the transfer of 828's business to 1100.

[17] The trial judge found that Fuss was a full participant in the effort to move 828's business and assets to a new corporate shelter. He said, while Fuss may not have known the details of how that plan was executed, he was aware of Kendrick's overall intentions and cooperated to that end. The trial judge accepted that Thuna was generally directed by Fuss but found she was more involved in the plan than she claimed to be.

[18] The trial judge considered whether each of the elements of the unlawful conduct conspiracy tort had been proven. He concluded Kendrick and the appellants acted by agreement after making several findings. He found that Fuss assisted in the formation of 1100 and its receipt of 828's business and assets and that, during that process, he knew 1100 did not receive those things for fair market value. He found that Kendrick and Fuss agreed to: prevent the respondent from recovering 828's receivables by depositing them in EWE's TD account, and later in 1100; continue the business of 828 under the EWE "flag of convenience"; transfer 828's business and assets to 1100, with no apparent intention of having 1100 repay 828's debts; and repay some of the debt to Ariza in preference to making any payments to the respondent. He found that Thuna was well aware that 828 was in trouble and that its business was taken over by EWE and then transferred to 1100. He found she participated in the agreement by willingly carrying out Fuss' instructions, knowing their effect. The trial judge found the common scheme was to divert 828's business activities to EWE and then 1100, regardless of whether this would benefit 828.

[19] In considering whether the conduct of Kendrick and the appellants was unlawful, the trial judge found that the intention of those directing minds was to defeat the respondent's claim and sink 828 with its debt. He said that was unlawful conduct.

[20] The trial judge also considered a director's duties under s. 122(1) of the Business Corporations Act, RSA 2000, c B-9. He concluded that Kendrick's fraud, and efforts to defeat the respondent's legitimate interest, breached the statutory duty of care he owed to the respondent (as a creditor of 828) and the statutory fiduciary duty he owed to 828. He also concluded that Thuna and Fuss breached the statutory fiduciary duties they owed to 828 and 1100, respectively. The trial judge found the appellants adopted a strategy that doomed 828 to bankruptcy. He said Thuna had a director's duty to take steps to meet 828's obligation to the respondent and that the transfer of 828's business and assets to 1100 was not only against 828's interests, it sabotaged any possibility that 828 would ever meet its obligation. He said Fuss would have breached the director's duty he owed to 1100 if he authorized it to take 828's business and assets where the transfer had no legitimate business purpose and was, in effect, a knowing appropriation of another's trust property. The trial judge held that the appellants' unlawful conduct flowed from their failure to discharge their obligations to 828, and the creation of 1100.

[21] The trial judge said the incorporation of 1100, and the transfer of 828's business and assets to that corporation, satisfied him that the conduct of Kendrick and the appellants was directed towards the respondent. He said it was evident that a very significant purpose of the actions of Kendrick and Fuss was to prevent the respondent from realizing on its security. He made no specific finding against Thuna in his discussion of this element of the tort.

[22] The trial judge concluded that Kendrick and the appellants knew that, in the circumstances, injury to the respondent was likely to result. He said, through the operation of EWE and 1100, which stripped 828 of its assets, Kendrick and the appellants would have known that the respondent would sustain very substantial loss. He said that loss was not only likely and foreseeable but a necessary consequence of the conspirators' objective.

[23] The trial judge found that, as a result of the conduct of Kendrick and the appellants, the respondent suffered injury because it was unable to recover the funds it loaned 828.

[24] The trial judge found that the respondent had established prima facie proof that, in early February 2004, there were sufficient assets available to pay the respondent's claim in full. He awarded the respondent $1,761,901.14, representing the principal amount owing on the operating line of credit and amounts owing pursuant to the GSA, including insurance costs, interest, receiver costs and legal fees.

STANDARDS OF REVIEW

[25] The standard of review on questions of law is correctness. The application of a correct legal principle to the facts is a question of mixed fact and law subject to the palpable and overriding error standard. Fact findings and inferences drawn from the facts are also reviewed on the palpable and overriding error standard: Housen v Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 SCR 235 at paras 8, 25 and 37.

ANALYSIS

[26] It is common ground that the trial judge stated the correct test for unlawful conduct conspiracy.

Agreement

[27] The defendants must act in combination, that is, in concert, by agreement or with a common design: Agribrands at para 26. They must know the facts of the alleged agreement and intend to be a party to the combining: Maguire v Calgary (City) (1983), 146 DLR (3d) 350, 43 AR 268 at para 12 (CA); Mraiche Investment Corp v McLennan Ross LLP, 2012 ABCA 95, 524 AR 151 at para 43. Often, direct evidence of the agreement is not available and resort must be had to circumstantial evidence: Capital Estate Planning Corp v Lynch, 2011 ABCA 224, 510 AR 244 at para 81.

[28] The appellants argue that, in order for them to act in combination, they would have to have agreed to participate in Kendrick's fraud. As the trial judge did not find that they were aware of, or involved in, Kendrick's fraud, he erred in concluding they acted in combination with Kendrick. This argument misconceives the trial judge's findings. The agreement the trial judge found was not based on Kendrick's fraud. It was based on the common design to divert 828's business and assets firstly to EWE and then to 1100 and, thereby, deprive the respondent of the ability to recover 828's debt. The trial judge found that the effect of this agreement was that Fuss and Kendrick also agreed to repay some of the debt to Ariza in preference to making any payments to the respondent. He found that Thuna knew that 828 was in trouble and that its business was taken over by EWE and then transferred to 1100. He found that she participated in the common design by willingly carrying out Fuss's instructions, knowing their effect. These fact findings and inferences are supported by the evidence and owed deference. They establish the first element of the tort of unlawful conduct conspiracy.

Unlawful conduct

[29] The conspirators' conduct must be unlawful. Unlawful conduct encompasses acts that are wrong in law. Unlawful conduct need not be actionable. Highly competitive commercial activity does not qualify as unlawful conduct provided it is not otherwise unlawful: Agribrands at paras 26 and 38.

[30] The appellants say the trial judge erred in finding that Thuna breached the statutory fiduciary duty she owed to 828. They say he erred in finding that, as a director of 828, Thuna was obliged to ensure that 828 repaid its debt to the respondent. They also assert that the trial judge erred in finding that Fuss breached the statutory fiduciary duty he owed to 1100.

[31] It is unnecessary for us to analyze the trial judge's conclusions on directors' duties because he attributed other conduct to the appellants which was clearly unlawful. The appellants, along with Kendrick, were the directing minds of corporations involved in a series of transactions. Thuna was a director of 828, which transferred its business and assets to EWE and 1100. The transfers were facilitated by the opening of the TD account in the name of EWE. Thuna was a director of EWE and the appellants were signing authorities on the TD account. The business and assets of 828 were ultimately transferred to 1100, in which Fuss was a director. The transfer of 828's property was not for fair market value. Therefore, the appellants committed unlawful conduct by converting the property of 828: Boma Manufacturing Ltd v Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, [1996] 3 SCR 727 at para 31.

[32] Moreover, substantial funds were paid from the TD account to Ariza for invoices that pre-dated the opening of the TD account. The appellants were directors of Ariza. The trial judge found that an effect of their actions was that some of 828's debt to Ariza was paid in preference to making payments to the respondent. This is a clear finding of a preference which also establishes unlawful conduct on the part of the appellants. The finding is consistent with long-standing principles relating to preferences in the context of bankruptcy and insolvency law and is factually supported on the record: Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, RSC 1985, c B-3, s 95; GS & D Construction Ltd (Trustee of) v Benallack, [1976] 2 SCR 168.

Directed towards the respondent

[33] The conspirators' conduct must be directed towards the plaintiff: Agribrands at para 26. The appellants say, if their conduct was unlawful, the trial judge erred in finding that it was directed at the respondent. They argue they owed their statutory fiduciary duties to the companies in which they were directors, not to the respondent. Therefore, breaches of those duties could not be directed at the respondent. The trial judge found as a fact that a very significant purpose of the actions of Kendrick and Fuss was to prevent the respondent from realizing on its security. Although he made no specific finding against Thuna in his discussion of this element of the tort, it is clear from his decision as a whole that the trial judge found that Thuna willingly participated in the common scheme knowing its effect. The trial judge also found that it was the intention of Kendrick and the appellants to defeat the respondent's claim and sink 828 with its debt. He found that the use of EWE's TD account, and the transfer of 828's business and assets to 1100, was a deliberate scheme to defeat the respondent's debt interest. These fact findings and inferences are supported on the record and are entitled to deference. They establish that the appellants' conduct was directed at the respondent.

Knowledge

[34] The conspirators should know that, in the circumstances, injury to the plaintiff is likely to result: Agribrands at para 26. This element requires a finding of constructive intent: Golden Capital Securities Ltd v Holmes, 2004 BCCA 565, 205 BCAC 54 at para 62. The trial judge concluded that Kendrick and the appellants knew that, through the operation of EWE and 1100, which stripped 828 of its assets, the respondent would sustain a very substantial loss. This conclusion is unassailable on the facts found by the trial judge.

Injury

[35] The conspirators' conduct must cause injury to the plaintiff: Agribrands at para 26. The appellants argue the trial judge failed to consider whether the respondent's loss was caused by the conspiracy. They say the loss was caused by Kendrick's fraud and the respondent's decision to overextend its loan to 828, rather than any unlawful conduct on their part. The trial judge found that the respondent suffered substantial injuries from the actions of Kendrick and the appellants. He found that, in early February 2004, there were sufficient assets available to 828 to allow it to pay the respondent in full. The trial judge further found that Kendrick and the appellants participated in a scheme to transfer those assets and 828's business to EWE and 1100, with no apparent intention of repaying 828's debt. The respondent was not advised that the TD account was opened in the name of EWE nor that 828's business and assets were transferred to EWE and 1100. Accordingly, but for the conduct of the conspirators, the respondent would have been paid in full. In these circumstances, it cannot seriously be argued that the loss was caused by Kendrick's failure to provide accurate accounting information or the respondent's decision to overextend the loan. The trial judge's fact findings are supported on the record and clearly establish that the respondent's injury was caused by the conspirators' conduct.

Damages

[36] The appellants argue the trial judge erred in calculating damages based on the terms of the GSA, a contract to which they were not parties. They assert that the respondent failed to adduce evidence to establish that 828 had sufficient assets to pay the debt to the respondent. They argue that 828 was insolvent and would have been placed into receivership in any event. Therefore, if the respondent suffered a loss, it was not attributable to their conduct. They also assert that the trial judge's damages award cannot be sustained given the paucity of evidence on the record. They say the respondent should have taken steps to obtain evidence from 828, EWE and 1100 to establish the state of 828's business and the amount that would have been available to satisfy the respondent's claim had 828's business and assets not been transferred to EWE and 1100.

[37] The difficulty facing the respondent and the trial judge was that some of 828's documents had been destroyed and others were inaccurate. The trial judge noted that 828's documents showed inventory and accounts receivable of between $1.5 million and $2 million. This finding is supported by documentation showing that, in November 2003, 828 reported that it had accounts receivable and inventory of approximately $2 million. The trial judge also noted that over $1.2 million passed through the TD account. This is supported by the TD account records. The trial judge concluded the respondent had established prima facie proof that there were sufficient assets available to pay the respondent's claim in full in early February 2004 had 828 been permitted to do so. It is no answer to the respondent's damages claim to argue that 828 was insolvent at that time and would have been placed into receivership in any event. The respondent was a secured creditor with priority over the inventory and receivables which were enough to satisfy its claim in full. It is noteworthy that the appellants' own company, HBC, also held a GSA over the assets of 828 (however subordinate to the respondent's) which provided for the recovery of the very sort of legal and other enforcement costs that were awarded by the trial judge to the respondent under the terms of its GSA.

[38] Although it would have been preferable for the trial judge to have detailed evidence of the state of the business and assets of 828, EWE and 1100, the failure to lead that evidence is largely attributable to a lack of records from entities controlled by the appellants. In these circumstances, the trial judge was entitled to assess damages on the basis of the available evidence. On that evidence, he concluded the respondent was entitled to $690,747.58, the principal amount owing by 828. Based on the liability imposed by the security documents, he calculated the total claimed, with unpaid interest, insurance premiums, costs paid to the receiver and legal fees, at $1,761,901.14 and allowed judgment accordingly. In essence, he found that, it was reasonably foreseeable that the respondent would not recover the funds it loaned 828 if 828 was stripped of its business and assets. The costs and fees incurred in placing 828 into bankruptcy and pursuing the respondent's claim under the GSA were foreseeable and directly attributable to the conspirators' tortious conduct. We find no reviewable error in the trial judge's calculation of damages.

Memorandum of Judgment

The Court:

I. Overview

[1] The defendants/appellants, collectively "Dynasty", appeal an order of a special chambers judge made June 14, 2021 granting partial summary disposition of certain claims of oppression brought by the plaintiffs/respondents, collectively "JBRO" and "JDFA", arising out of a series of shareholder disputes. It is alleged that Dynasty operated in a manner that was oppressive, unfairly prejudicial to, or unfairly disregarded the interests of JBRO and JDFA as minority shareholders.

[2] In particular, the special chambers judge ordered that JBRO and JDFA be granted partial summary judgment against Dynasty Property, Dynasty California, and their directors Allan Cho and Gaurav Sharma. JBRO and Jason Brown were awarded indemnity costs for litigation involving a cash call, as against Dynasty Property, Mr Cho, and Mr Sharma, jointly and severally. JDFA and Mr Brown were awarded indemnity costs for litigation involving voiding of shares, as against Dynasty California, Mr Cho, and Mr Sharma, jointly and severally.

[3] The shares in Dynasty California were ordered to be reinstated to JDFA retroactive to the date they were improperly voided, March 13, 2017, and JDFA was directed to release the subscription price currently held in trust to Dynasty California. JDFA was entitled to all dividends that ought to have been paid to it but for the oppressive conduct of Dynasty California, Mr Cho, and Mr Sharma, and was entitled to release of previous amounts held in trust, including dividends paid by Dynasty North America in the amounts of $237,641.51 CAD and $466,981.13 USD, plus interest.

[4] JBRO and JDFA were entitled to the release of dividends declared by Dynasty Power and held in trust pursuant to an order of Master Robertson dated June 19, 2018 in the amount of $98,000.

[5] JBRO and Mr Brown were entitled to access all documents, records, and financial statements of Dynasty Property. JDFA and Mr Brown were entitled to access all documents, records, and financial statements of Dynasty North America and Dynasty California. Mr Brown was entitled to receive written notice of all meetings of directors of Dynasty Property, and the meetings of directors and shareholders of Dynasty Property were to be recorded.

[6] Finally, the applications of JBRO or JDFA for interim costs, appointment of an inspector, and removal of Mr Cho and Mr Sharma as directors of Dynasty Property, Dynasty North America, and Dynasty California were dismissed. The court reserved for a future date the relief sought against Michelle Bullas and AIM Law Group. The reasons also acknowledged that there were many issues yet to be determined between the parties, and said the "next step should be a procedural order that [ensures] that the JBRO group interests in the Dynasty group can be bought out in a fair and reasonable manner".

[7] The parties seek to admit new evidence on appeal.

[8] Dynasty's application to admit new evidence is dismissed. JBRO and JDFA's application to admit new evidence is dismissed. The appeal is allowed in part.

II. Facts

[9] The present action is one of three related actions. The other two are Mr Brown's wrongful dismissal action, Queen's Bench Action 1801-01651, and his litigation against Ms Bullas and AIM Law Group, corporate counsel for Dynasty, Queen's Bench Action 1901-01850. It is appropriate to set out only those facts relevant to this action.

[10] The parties are engaged in the trading of electricity and power contracts in Canada and the United States.

[11] Mr Brown, Mr Cho, Mr Sharma, and others, met in their previous roles in the energy marketing industry initially at TransAlta Corporation and Twin Cities Power-Canada ULC between 2005 and 2010. In February 2011 Twin Cities closed its Calgary offices and Mr Brown, Mr Cho, Mr Sharma, and others incorporated Dynasty Power. On March 2, 2011, Mr Brown invested $175,000 in exchange for 10.38% of the shares in Dynasty Power. In 2012 those shares were converted and assigned to JBRO. The parties entered into a unanimous shareholders' agreement in Dynasty Power on July 1, 2013. Mr Brown served as a director and chief financial officer of Dynasty Power from its inception until September 28, 2016, and again as a director from April 25, 2017 until December 20, 2017.

[12] In November 2013 the parties established a "sister company", Dynasty Property, and entered into a second unanimous shareholders' agreement. Shares were issued on March 2, 2014, and a dividend was declared by Dynasty Power on March 21, 2014 so the proceeds could be used by shareholders to fund the Dynasty Property issuance. JBRO is a shareholder of this company.

[13] In 2015 Dynasty Power expanded its trading operations through incorporation of Dynasty North America and Dynasty California to participate in the American energy markets. On April 10, 2015, 275,000 class A shares were issued by Dynasty California to JDFA, a company wholly owned by Mr Brown.

[14] On April 18, 2016 Dynasty Power declared a further dividend for the purpose of funding the Dynasty California share issuance. All shareholders, but for Mr Brown through JDFA, paid for the shares from this distribution by June 2016. At some time, JDFA provided a bank draft to its lawyer as trust property in the necessary amount to pay for the shares.

[15] On September 28, 2016 Mr Brown's employment with Dynasty Power was terminated allegedly for cause and Mr Brown was removed as a director of Dynasty Power. Mr Brown says it was his understanding that JDFA's shares in Dynasty California would be addressed in the negotiations over his departure from Dynasty Power.

[16] On February 10, 2017, during post-termination discussions with Mr Cho, Mr Brown was asked to execute a revised unanimous shareholders' agreement for Dynasty Power which he thought substantially impaired his rights, including his ability to nominate a director, and which made revisions to the definition of the fair market value of shares. He refused to sign the agreement.

[17] On March 13, 2017 Mr Brown was removed as director of Dynasty California and Dynasty cancelled JDFA's shares in Dynasty California on the basis that they had not been paid for. Mr Brown was not advised of that cancellation until May 17, 2017. It was this unilateral cancellation of shares that the chambers judge found to be the first instance of oppression.

[18] In April 2017 Dynasty issued a shotgun buy/sell notice to JBRO under which they proposed to acquire JBRO's shares for $1,919,500 or to sell the shares of all other shareholders to JBRO for $16,572,793. JBRO rejected the buy/sell on the basis that it did not comply with the terms of the unanimous shareholders' agreement.

[19] On May 11, 2017 Dynasty Power initiated legal proceedings seeking a declaration that the buy/sell notice had been properly issued and was binding upon JBRO.

[20] On June 15, 2017 Dynasty North America transferred the majority of its trading assets to Dynasty California for consideration of $788,000 USD.

[21] In December 2017 Mr Brown received dividends from Dynasty North America in respect of JBRO's shareholdings in the amounts of $466,981.13 USD and $237,641.51 CAD, currently held in trust.

[22] On December 20, 2017 Dynasty discontinued the May 2017 application seeking to compel the acquisition of JBRO interests and, using a power of attorney contemplated in the unanimous shareholders' agreement, closed the buy/sell thereby acquiring JBRO's shares for $2,033,979.39 plus outstanding dividends from Dynasty Property of $98,000, also currently held in trust.

[23] On January 10, 2018 despite Mr Brown having nominated himself for a director position for Dynasty Property, a right granted pursuant to the terms of the unanimous shareholders' agreement, he was not elected as a director.

[24] On December 19, 2018 the annual general meeting of Dynasty Property proposed a cash call in Mr Brown's absence and without it being noted on the meeting agenda. He received the notice of cash call on December 20, 2018. On January 3, 2019 Mr Brown deposited the amount that JBRO Investments was to pay pursuant to the cash call in trust with his counsel. Mr Brown protested that the cash call did not comply with the Dynasty Property unanimous shareholders' agreement, absent a special meeting and notice to shareholders.

[25] On January 14, 2019, the chambers judge granted an interlocutory injunction enjoining Dynasty Property or its shareholders from taking any steps against JBRO pursuant to the Dynasty Property unanimous shareholders' agreement, directing Dynasty Property to produce specified information to JBRO for the purposes of evaluating the notice of cash call and requiring JBRO to pay the cash call amount into trust.

[26] In March 2019 the Dynasty cash call was rescinded and funds paid into trust were returned to Mr Brown. The issuance of the cash call by Dynasty Property was the second instance of oppression cited by the chambers judge.

[27] On December 18, 2019 the chambers judge heard the application and on June 14, 2021 made the order from which this appeal is taken.

III. New Evidence Applications

[28] Dynasty, and JBRO and JDFA apply to admit new evidence on appeal.

[29] Dynasty seeks to admit six new affidavits:

(a) the affidavit of Milan Kandic sworn July 16, 2021;

(b) the affidavit of Jeff Pellarin sworn July 16, 2021;

(c) the affidavit of Michelle Bullas sworn July 19, 2021;

(d) the affidavit of Kirk Lamb sworn October 21, 2021;

(e) the second affidavit of Jeff Pellarin sworn October 26, 2021; and

(f) the affidavit of Katie Osleeb sworn December 17, 2021.

[30] In response JBRO and JDFA seek to admit three new affidavits and three transcripts from cross-examination on affidavits:

(a) the affidavit of Jason Brown sworn October 4, 2021;

(b) the affidavit of Don Newell sworn September 24, 2021;

(c) the affidavit of Peter Letal affirmed October 1, 2021;

(d) transcript of the cross-examination on affidavit of Michelle Bullas dated October 27, 2021, with answers to undertakings;

(e) transcript of the cross-examination on affidavit of Milan Kandic dated October 27, 2021; and

(f) transcript of the cross-examination on affidavit of Jason Brown dated October 28, 2021.

[31] The test for admission of new evidence is set out in Palmer v The Queen, [1980] 1 SCR 759, 775, 106 DLR (3d) 212:

> (a) the evidence should generally not be admitted if, by due diligence, it could have been adduced at trial (here, the application of December 18, 2019 and subsequent further written and oral submissions), provided that this general principle will not be applied as strictly in a criminal case as in civil cases;
> (b) the evidence must be relevant in the sense that it bears upon a decisive or potentially decisive issue in the trial (here, the application of December 18, 2019 and subsequent further written and oral submissions);
>
> (c) the evidence must be credible in the sense that it is reasonably capable of belief; and
> (d) it must be such that if believed it could reasonably, when taken with the other evidence adduced at trial (here, the application of December 18, 2019 and subsequent further written and oral submissions), be expected to have affected the result.

[32] The overriding consideration in application of these principles must be the interests of justice: Palmer, 775.

(a) Dynasty application

[33] The chambers judge received extensive oral and written submissions, and correspondence from the parties, including affidavits of Mr Brown of June 14, 2018; January 8, 11 and 14, 2019; May 29, 2019; June 4, 2019 and December 11, 2019; affidavits of Mr Cho of January 11, 2019 and May 2, 2019; and transcripts of questioning of Mr Brown and Mr Cho on their affidavits and responses to undertakings. The chambers judge also received the written submissions of the parties filed January 9 and 14, 2019; December 9, 12, and 18, 2019; October 2, 15, and 22, 2020; and correspondence from the parties dated December 20, 2019; January 3, 8 and 13, 2020. She heard further oral submissions from the parties on September 22, 2020, received further written submissions in response to a request from the court dated March 12, 2021, and updated factual information from the parties dated March 19, 22, 25, and 31, 2021; April 7, 14 and 15, 2021.

[34] In her reasons, the chambers judge referenced this "flurry of correspondence" and briefs which she said included "re-argument and new arguments", and "new evidence".

[35] The chambers judge had extensive evidence before her that canvassed the facts set out above. The proposed new evidence of Dynasty includes further affidavits on matters dating from mid-2015 to late 2019, including share subscriptions and payment for shares in Dynasty California, dividends by Dynasty Power, directors' resolutions on share purchases, minute book entries, and particulars with respect to the wrongful dismissal litigation and Bullas litigation. That information was largely available and certainly could have been available to the chambers judge by June 14, 2021.

[36] In particular, Dynasty says as to the affidavits of Jeff Pellarin sworn July 16 and October 26, 2021, and the affidavit of Kirk Lamb sworn October 21, 2021, that this proposed expert evidence on financial and tax consequences should be admitted because the reason it was not before the chambers judge is that the remedy granted, retroactive reinstatement of JDFA's shares in Dynasty California, was not sought. However, as discussed below, JDFA specifically requested in para 7(a) of its application filed January 11, 2019 "an Order …. reinstating the shares of JDFA ... in [Dynasty California] in exchange for delivery of the subscription price for those shares". Additionally, it would be exceptional for proposed new expert evidence to be before this Court when it was not before the special chambers judge in this form.

(b) JBRO and JDFA application

[38] JBRO and JDFA participated in the oral submissions, written briefs, and correspondence set out above, all before the chambers judge.

[39] A review of the proposed new evidence of JBRO and JDFA shows that it covers the period from April 2015 to April 2019. It addresses the issuance of the class A voting shares in Dynasty California, payment requirements with respect to those shares, minute book entries in Dynasty California, communications with respect to the Dynasty California shares, and the notice of the meeting of Dynasty California shareholders of March 13, 2017. As with the Dynasty proposed new evidence, virtually all of that material, in one form or another, was or could have been before the chambers judge. The JBRO and JDFA application likewise fails on the first and fourth Palmer criteria, and it is dismissed.

[40] JBRO and JDFA also seek to admit new proposed expert evidence of Peter Letal, an affidavit affirmed October 1, 2021, in response to the proposed expert evidence sought to be introduced by Dynasty. As Dynasty's application to adduce expert evidence is dismissed, so must the JBRO and JDFA application to adduce such evidence be dismissed, for the same reasons.

IV. Grounds of Appeal

[41] Dynasty says the chambers judge erred:

(a) by failing to consider the relevant test for a partial summary judgment;

(b) in finding that the Dynasty Property cash call and rescission were oppressive;

(c) in finding that the Dynasty California voiding of JDFA's shares, without notice to Mr Brown, was oppressive, including by failing to consider s 27(3) of the Business Corporations Act, RSA 2000, c B-9, and the business judgment rule, and by finding that Mr Brown reasonably expected he would be given advance notice of any intention to void the shares; and

(d) ordering a remedy that created res judicata and issue estoppel implications on the valuation date issue, was not specifically sought by the parties, has significant unintended consequences for non-parties to the litigation, and went beyond merely remedying the conduct complained of.

V. Standard of Review

[43] Decisions involving summary disposition are discretionary and absent an error of law are reviewed for reasonableness. Absent palpable and overriding error, a chambers judge's assessment of the facts, the application of the law to those facts, and the ultimate determination as to whether summary disposition is appropriate, is entitled to deference: Baim v North Country Catering Ltd, 2017 ABCA 206, para 8, citing Pyrrha Design Inc v Plum and Posey Inc, 2016 ABCA 12, para 6.

[45] Statutory interpretation is a question of law, reviewable on the correctness standard: Geophysical Service Incorporated v EnCana Corporation, 2017 ABCA 125, para 75, 51 Alta LR (6th) 259. Failure to consider a relevant statutory provision is an error of law.

[46] The business judgment rule is a common law rule of deference to business decisions, applicable to the court's evaluation of the reasonableness of directors' decisions: Peoples Department Stores Inc (Trustee of) v Wise, 2004 SCC 68, paras 64-65, [2004] 3 SCR 461, quoting

Maple Leaf Foods Inc v Schneider Corp (1998), 113 OAC 253, para 36, 42 OR (3d) 177 (CA). When the rule is applicable, the failure to consider it, or the misapplication of the doctrine is an error of law reviewable on the standard of correctness.

VI. Analysis

(a) Partial summary judgment

[47] Dynasty submits that although the chambers judge reviewed the test for summary disposition (Hyrniak v Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, para 49, [2014] 1 SCR 87; Weir-Jones Technical Services Inc v Purolator Courier Ltd, 2019 ABCA 49, para 47, [2019] 6 WWR 567), she failed to reference or apply the more stringent test for a partial summary disposition. They say it should be considered a rare procedure where the issues addressed can be bifurcated from remaining issues without resulting in overlapping evidence that could lead to inefficient duplication or material risk of inconsistent findings or outcomes.

[48] JBRO and JDFA say it was apparent from the chambers judge's reasons that she properly accounted for all considerations relevant to an application for partial summary judgment, and was satisfied it was appropriate in the context of the whole litigation and would serve the objectives of proportionality, efficiency, and cost effectiveness. They say that since 2016 Dynasty has elected to proceed separately, in multiple applications, on the various issues raised.

[49] Under r 7.3(1), a party may apply for summary judgment in respect of all or part of a claim. Partial summary judgment is expressly contemplated by the words of the rule. Provided the issue can be decided discretely and fairly, partial summary judgment may be granted: Baim, paras 10-11.

[50] While partial summary judgment (for example, granting summary judgment against a single defendant) may run the risk of duplicative proceedings or inconsistent findings of fact, resolution of an important claim against a key party could significantly advance access to justice, and be the most proportionate, timely and cost effective approach: Hryniak, para 60. It must be demonstrated that partial summary judgment would achieve a just result: see Stankovic v 1536679 Alberta Ltd, 2019 ABCA 187, para 54, 88 Alta LR (6th) 1.

[51] If the record allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact and apply the law, then the summary procedure should be used unless there is a substantive reason to conclude that summary disposition would not achieve a just result: Weir-Jones, para 25.

[52] The chambers judge was satisfied on the basis of relevant uncontested admissible evidence that the issues respecting the allegations of oppression could be resolved summarily. She found that JBRO and JDFA had established there was no merit or defence on the basis of the uncontested facts, and Dynasty had not demonstrated there was a genuine issue requiring a trial. Significantly, the chambers judge concluded that deciding the issues before her would better equip the parties to proceed to resolve the remaining issues.

[53] The chambers judge applied the proper test for summary disposition. Her ultimate determination that partial summary disposition was appropriate is entitled to deference, and we see no basis to interfere.

(b) Oppression findings

[54] Oppression is an equitable corporate remedy that seeks to ensure fairness, justice, and equity in the context at hand and in regard to the relationships at play: BCE v 1976 Debentureholders, 2008 SCC 69, paras 58, 59, 71, [2008] 3 SCR 560. It is inherently fact-specific: BCE, paras 59, 62, 71.

[55] "Oppression" describes conduct that is coercive, abusive, or in bad faith. "Unfair prejudice" denotes a "less culpable state of mind" that nevertheless has unfair consequences, and "unfair disregard" of interests extends the remedy to ignoring an interest as being unimportant, all of which describe ways in which corporate actors may fail to meet the reasonable expectations of stakeholders: BCE, para 67.

[56] Where oppressive conduct is made out, the Court may intervene. Section 242(2) of the Business Corporations Act provides:

> (2) If, on ... application …, the Court is satisfied that in respect of a corporation or any of its affiliates
> (a) any act or omission of the corporation or any of its affiliates effects a result,
>
> (b) the business or affairs of the corporation or any of its affiliates are or have been carried on or conducted in a manner, or
> that is oppressive or unfairly prejudicial to or that unfairly disregards the interests of any security holder, creditor, director or officer, the Court may make an order to rectify the matters complained of.

[57] The Court's powers are delineated in s 242(3), and allow the Court to make any interim or final order it thinks fit to rectify the matters subject to complaint: Toor v 1176520 Alberta Ltd, 2019 ABCA 334, para 30; Connelly v Connelly-McKinley Ltd, 2010 ABQB 515, para 12.

2022 ABCA 140 (CanLII)

[58] The test for determining whether conduct is oppressive, unfairly prejudicial or unfairly disregards security holders' interests has two elements:

(a) does the evidence support a reasonable expectation asserted by the claimant?

(b) does the evidence establish that the reasonable expectation was violated by conduct falling within the terms "oppression," "unfair prejudice" or "unfair disregard" of a relevant interest?

The claimant bears the burden of establishing the asserted expectation, the reasonableness of the expectation, and the violation of the expectation by conduct that was oppressive, unfairly prejudicial or that unfairly disregarded a relevant interest: BCE, paras 56, 68, 119, 137; 1216808 Alberta Ltd, para 39.

[59] To determine whether a stakeholder's expectation is reasonable, the Court may consider "general commercial practice; the nature of the corporation; the relationship between the parties; past practice; steps the claimant could have taken to protect itself; representations and agreements; and the fair resolution of conflicting interests between corporate stakeholders": BCE, para 72.

[60] The Supreme Court has provided guidance on remedies. The court's broad discretion is not limitless; it must be exercised within legal bounds, and as a starting point, within the bounds expressly delineated by the statute. The purpose of the oppression remedy is corrective, and an order should go no further than necessary to correct the injustice or unfairness between the parties: Wilson v Alharayeri, 2017 SCC 39, [2017] 1 SCR 1037, paras 26-27 (referring to CBCA equivalent sections).

[61] As such, where oppressive conduct is made out, the court must intervene in as minimal a way as possible in the circumstances to address the imbalance or the conduct which is the subject of complaint. The ultimate test requires an assessment of the best interests of the corporation, its shareholders, directors and officers. It involves a balancing of competing interests: Toor, para 32; Caron v Canadian Energy Inc, 2017 ABQB 767, para 51; Melin v Melin, 2018 ABQB 1056, para 69.

(i) The cash call

[62] Dynasty submits that the Dynasty Property cash call and its subsequent rescission did not constitute oppression. In their view, because the cash call of December 19, 2018 was rescinded in March 2019, there was no wrongful conduct or causation, and JBRO suffered no compensable injury, although it did incur legal expenses for which it has been awarded indemnity costs. JBRO responds that compensable injury is not a prerequisite to a finding of oppression, and that the court is entitled to rectify an unjust situation even when monetary loss is not an issue, with the goal of preventing ongoing misconduct.

[64] The chambers judge observed that the notice of annual meeting of Dynasty Property for December 19, 2018 did not contemplate a cash call. Mr Brown asked for and received confirmation that the notice set out all of the business to be discussed at the meeting. He sent an email asking that his name be put forward as a director, despite his inability to attend due to a family emergency. Mr Brown was not elected as a director, nor did he receive notice of the cash call. The cash call itself was not in accordance with the provisions of the Dynasty Property unanimous shareholders' agreement.

[65] The remaining shareholders and directors of Dynasty Property acted to the exclusion of Mr Brown, as indicated by the chambers judge, "in order to acquire his shares at a discount pursuant to the default provisions of the USA".

[66] Mr Brown and JBRO reasonably expected that Dynasty Property would comply with the provisions of the unanimous shareholders' agreement, and provide appropriate notice that a cash call was to be discussed at the meeting. The chambers judge found the cash call was made in breach of Mr Brown's and JBRO's reasonable expectations, was unfairly prejudicial to them, and unfairly disregarded their interests. Having come to that conclusion, she determined they were entitled to a remedy in oppression.

[67] We see no error in the chambers judge's conclusion as to the cash call. There is no reason to interfere with that decision, to which deference is owed.

(ii) The voiding of shares

[68] Dynasty submits it was appropriate for Dynasty California to void the shares of JDFA for non-payment. It says the shares were issued on April 10, 2015 and it still had not received payment by the date of cancellation, March 13, 2017. It relies on s 27(3) of the Business Corporations Act which prohibits the issuance of shares in a corporation unless they have been paid in full. It says that is a complete answer to JDFA's claim for the Dynasty California shares.

[69] JDFA responds that the issuance of a share certificate is nothing more than evidence of a share transaction, is not definitive that the transaction has or has not occurred, and is irrelevant to a party's rights in the claim for relief from oppression. Additionally, JDFA says it was the usual business practice of Dynasty companies to issue shares, have them funded by distributions from Dynasty Power, and receive payment thereafter.

[70] Mr Brown says he planned to pay the subscription price due in September 2016, but on August 23, 2016 learned that Dynasty Power had set in motion steps to terminate his employment. As a result, he assumed the outstanding subscription price would become one of the issues discussed in respect of his termination from Dynasty Power. Mr Cho conceded that payment of the subscription price for the shares was discussed during the settlement negotiations.

2022 ABCA 140 (CanLII)

[71] None of Dynasty California, Mr Cho nor Mr Sharma notified Mr Brown of their intention to void his shares. The chambers judge said it was a reasonable expectation that as a director and shareholder he would first be given a demand for payment and later notice of intention to void his shares. Additionally, given the transfer of the majority of the trading assets of Dynasty North America to Dynasty California, the only distinguishing factor between the shareholders of Dynasty California and Dynasty North America was that "Mr. Brown's holding company [was] not now a shareholder of Dynasty California", the operating company.

[72] In finding that the voiding of the shares was oppressive, the chambers judge said Dynasty California and its directors "acted in bad faith" with an intention "to deprive the JBRO group from any profit arising from the Dynasty California trading operations".

[73] We see no error in the chambers judge's conclusion as to the voiding of these shares.

(iii) The business judgment rule

[74] With respect to the voiding of the Dynasty California shares without advance notice to Mr Brown, Dynasty invokes the business judgment rule, described above. See Peoples Department Stores, para 65; BCE, paras 40, 99.

[75] In Caron, para 50, commenting on the rule, the court said:

> Business disputes or business decisions are at the root of many oppressive conduct claims. Courts are not in the business of telling people how to run their businesses, what investments to make, or what opportunities to pursue or forego. Courts are in the business of telling directors, officers and shareholders what they cannot do, which is to unfairly disregard the legitimate interests of other stakeholders.

[76] Dynasty says that even though it did not make an express demand for Mr Brown to pay for the Dynasty California shares, nor was there any notice that the shares were to be voided, it was not reasonable for him to believe that JDFA could hold shares for which it had not paid.

[77] However, JDFA responds that a corporation cannot hide behind the business judgment rule as a means of justifying conduct that is inconsistent with the reasonable expectations of shareholders and which have no corporate purpose. It says the failure to make a demand for payment and provide no notice of intent to void was "clearly not done in good faith" and had no business purpose.

[78] Under appropriate circumstances, it may have been warranted to void the shares of JDFA in Dynasty California, but that was done without formal demand and reasonable notice. That was the finding of the chambers judge. These were not reasonable business decisions with a justifiable business purpose. Therefore the business judgment rule does not protect Dynasty from scrutiny and a finding of oppression: see 2082825 Ontario Inc v Platinum Wood Finishing Inc (2009), 248 OAC 266, paras 29-30, 310 DLR (4th) 754 (Sup Ct).

(c) Minimally intrusive remedy

[79] Dynasty submits the special chambers judge failed to fashion an appropriate remedy because the remedy ordered has res judicata implications on the outstanding valuation date issue. They say in finding that JDFA is entitled to payment of dividends from the voiding of the Dynasty California shares, she implicitly set a valuation date for those shares. They also say she ordered a retroactive reinstatement of the shares, for which the tax ramifications and financial consequences are unknown.

[80] The chambers judge did say, and JDFA concedes, that the appropriate valuation date of any buyout in the future is a matter still to be determined. But the chambers judge held the appropriate relief was to reinstate JDFA's shares in Dynasty California, retroactive to the date they were improperly voided, March 13, 2017, and for the subscription price to be released to Dynasty California within three business days thereafter. It is clear the reinstatement was to be effected at a date certain and the purchase price to be paid in the amount determined as at that date.

[81] On whether JDFA had requested the remedy of reinstatement of its shares in Dynasty California as at the voiding date, as indicated above JDFA specifically requested in para 7(a) of its application filed January 11, 2019 "an Order …. reinstating the shares of JDFA ... in [Dynasty California] in exchange for delivery of the subscription price for those shares". That is what the chambers judge ordered, and she set a date for that to occur. There is no merit to any claim that this remedy was not requested of the court.

[83] However, a review of the evidence before the special chambers judge demonstrates she did not have the necessary evidentiary record before her, particularly with respect to the tax ramifications and financial consequences to all parties of the determination that the shares in Dynasty California were to be reinstated to JDFA retroactive to the date they were improperly voided. Nor was she advised of the full effect of JDFA dividend payments that ought to have been paid but for the oppressive conduct of Dynasty California, or JDFA being entitled to release of previous amounts held in trust pursuant to the order of Master Robertson.

[84] Without that essential information, the special chambers judge could not craft the minimally intrusive remedy for all parties or craft a remedy that would "go no further than necessary to correct the injustice or unfairness between the parties". In light of the test for a remedy in an oppression action, she should have been provided with evidence and submissions about all ramifications of the remedy. Therefore, we allow the appeal only as to remedy. We return this proceeding to the court below to determine the appropriate remedy.

VII. Conclusion

[85] Dynasty's application to admit new evidence is dismissed. JBRO and JDFA's application to admit new evidence is dismissed. The appeal is allowed in part. The special chambers judge's grant of partial summary judgment is upheld; her finding that the Dynasty Property cash call was oppressive is upheld; and her finding that the Dynasty California voiding of JDFA's shares was oppressive is upheld. The appeal is allowed only as to the remedy crafted. This matter is returned to the court below to grant an appropriate remedy to address the imbalance and oppressive conduct found.

[1] This judgment will decide one question only: Can the proceeds from a cheque kiting scheme constitute property of the bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy?

[2] Admittedly, a number of sub-questions further characterizing the issue will be posed, but they are primarily questions of law regarding which the Court will be required to make choices on the basis of the positions defended by the parties involved.

2012 QCCS 211 (CanLII)

[3] To set up an illegal cheque kiting scheme, more than one financial institution must be involved. The perpetrator of the fraud must also choose to involve one or more moral persons (companies) who use the rotating advances (rotating lines of credit) granted by banks for the day-to-day management of business affairs.

THE ACTORS INVOLVED

[4] The administrators of Jean-Marc Brissette inc. ("JMB") and Location Bristar Idealease inc. ("Bristar" or, collectively, "Bristar") implemented a cheque kiting scheme through their companies.

[5] In this case, the illegal financial procedure relied on shell companies that were originally solvent borrowers who had gained the confidence of financial backers. There can be little doubt financial problems the administrators believed to be temporary gave rise to the temptation to simulate regular banking operations.

[6] Three banks were involved:

5.1 The Royal Bank of Canada ("RBC")

5.2 The Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce ("CIBC")

5.3 The Laurentian Bank of Canada ("LBC")

TERMINOLOGY

[7] Essentially, the illegal practice of "cheque kiting" begins when a cheque is issued from a bank account whose balance is insufficient to cover it. To create confusion, money is recorded in more than one bank account at one moment in time. In most cases, the money is in transit or quite simply fictitious. The circulation of cheques between various accounts is jointly controlled. Here, the scheme was operated by the administrators of Bristar and JMB.

[8] Thus, cheques and registered funds are circulated from one bank to another and from one account to another, in a manner that maintains fictitious bank balances in some accounts while depositing the very same amounts in other accounts.

[9] Obviously, masterminds who undertake this type of fraud take advantage of the clearance periods that are inherent to cheque processing in the banking system.

[10] Cheques are circulated so quickly that an account at one banking institution is debited one day and credited the next. Over time, the false increase in bank balances varies from one bank to another, until one of the banks involved realizes that it is part of a kiting scheme and denounces the fraud. The system then collapses and any amounts credited are frozen. This is how, on May 31, 2010, LBC put an end to this illegal commercial scheme. At the time, an amount of $804,725 was credited to Bristar's account.

was the ultimate loser because it had been the primary contributor to the amount credited to Bristar's account ($805,725) on June 1, 2010, the day the music stopped.

[12] The time that elapses between the moment a cheque is deposited into a first bank account and the moment that same cheque is recorded in, or deducted from, the bank account from which it is drawn is known as the "float time".

[13] The float time permits a depositor—in this case the bankrupt debtors—to withdraw the money deposited before the cheque is cleared by the bank from which the money was drawn. This is how dishonest persons are able to profit from the deception.

[14] The simultaneous presence of duplicate amounts in two different bank accounts at the same time creates what is referred to as "float". The float represents the over-evaluation of the balance of a bank account as the result of suspicious transactions at a specific moment in time, if the signs of kiting are identifiable.

[15] It is all quite sophisticated. Indeed, the imagination and thievery of such fraudsters know no bounds. Fortunately, banks have developed effective methods to curb and prevent this kind of scam.

FACTS

[16] Two corroborating expert reports are conclusive. They are, respectively, the report by PriceWaterHouseCoopers Inc. ("PWC"), which was presented to the Court with rigour and objectivity by expert forensic accountant Benoît Legault ("Legault"), and that by James Dickson ("Dickson"), retained by RBC and also a specialist in forensic accounting. Both experts testified frankly, answering the questions in the manner befitting experts, so as to provide the judge with a better understanding.

[17] The expert analyses reveal that all of the inter-account transactions recorded in the LBC accounts between April 14 and June 1, 2010, were suspicious transactions indicating a kiting scheme.

[18] The expert reports also state that, on May 7, 2010, the fluctuation of the credit granted by CIBC reached the C$1 million limit.

[19] The reports further reveal that, between April 14 and May 31, 2010, all of the inter-account transactions recorded in the LBC bank accounts were equally suspicious.

[20] LBC discovered abnormal activity in Bristar's bank accounts on May 25, 2010. On that same date, LBC returned all of the cheques in circulation, putting an end to the scheme. As a result, on May 28, 2010, the date the bank accounts were closed, LBC had $804,725 in the client accounts (of Bristar and JMB), after its advances had been reimbursed.

[21] The evidence reveals that the $804,725 credited to Bristar at LBC was almost entirely (except for a few thousand dollars) from a single source, namely, cheques drawn from RBC accounts and deposited at the LBC after May 12, 2010.

[22] Hence RBC's seizure in revendication of the amounts deposited in the special account created by LBC when Bristar's account was closed. This seizure was preceded by a notice of claim of money, as permitted by section 437(1) of the Bank Act.[1]

[23] On June 4, 2010, Bristar made an assignment in bankruptcy pursuant to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act ("BIA").[2] PWC was appointed the trustee in bankruptcy by the official receiver.[3]

[24] RBC filed a proof of claim with PWC in accordance with its status of unsecured creditor for an amount of $1,677,877.75.[4]

[25] CIBC also filed a proof of claim with PWC as an unsecured creditor for the amount of $1,267,982.66.[5]

[26] RBC and CIBC both claim the $804,725 held by LBC but on different legal grounds. RBC argues that it should receive the entire amount because the proceeds from the kiting scheme are constituted primarily by cheques drawn from RBC and deposited at LBC. CIBC, for its part, argues that the $804,725 held by LBC should be shared between itself and RBC, prorated to their respective claims. Both conclude that ownership of this asset, acquired by means of fraud perpetrated by the administrators of Bristar, is not vested in the trustee. In the view of both RBC and CIBC, it would be commercially immoral and contrary to the requirements of good faith for the Court to allow the amount held by LBC ($804,725) to be considered property of the bankrupt.

[27] General Electric Canada Equipment Finance, G.P. ("G.E.") is also an unsecured creditor in the bankruptcy of Bristar and JMB. It does not see the matter in the same light as RBC and CIBC. According to G.E. and the trustee PWC, the money from Bristar's client account at the LBC is, despite everything, the property of the bankrupt, who must pay out to the body of creditors, which includes RBC, CIBC, and G.E.

LEGAL POSITIONS OF THE PARTIES

(A) The position of RBC

[28] RBC claims the money held by LBC, relying on section 437(2) of the Bank Act.[6] Essentially, RBC argues that the amount held by LBC consists of the proceeds of fraud committed at its expense. According to RBC, the proceeds of fraud should not benefit the body of creditors because the trustee has no more right to them than the bankrupt debtors did (Bristar and JMB).

[29] Of course, RBC is of the view that the proceeds of the kiting scheme are not the property of the bankrupt within the meaning of section 67 BIA.[7] In its main argument,

7 Supra note 2. Section 67 of the BIA is reproduced in Schedule A.

2012 QCCS 211 (CanLII)

RBC invokes unjust enrichment associated with the common law notion of constructive trust. In the view of RBC, the money held by LBC was held in constructive trust for RBC, who was the victim of the fraud. It claims that it is justified in challenging the trustee's claims to the amounts in dispute rather than being required to file a claim for property under section 81 BIA.[8] According to RBC, a bankruptcy trustee has no right to the proceeds of crime and must waive them.[9]

[30] RBC urges the Court to apply the common law rule in Ex parte James to find that the trustee cannot claim a right to take possession of the proceeds of fraud.

[31] Put succinctly, the legal rule enunciated in Ex parte James[10] is based on equity. According to this common law concept, the trustee, as an officer of the court, should act equitably. Although the trustee may have a right to certain property, the bankruptcy court should not permit it to exercise this right if, in doing so, it would be violating the rules of natural justice.

[32] According to RBC, the principles of commercial morality dictate that the property vested in the trustee and, consequently, in the body of creditors, should not be enriched to the detriment of the creditor who was the victim of the fraud.

[33] The concept of constructive trust enables the bankruptcy court to draw on the accessory notion of tracing to the extent necessary. That is why RBC sought to show that the money held by LBC came primarily from cheques drawn from RBC.

[34] Finally, RBC argues that a fiduciary obligation may arise from the obligation to act in good faith within the meaning of articles 6, 7, 1375, and 1376 of the Civil Code of Québec (CCQ).[11] Hence the possibility of tracing the illegally appropriated money and returning it to the victim.

(B) The position of CIBC

[35] RBC and CIBC come together on a few points of law. First, CIBC submits that the money held by LBC is the proceeds of illegitimate operations by Bristar and JMB. If not for the bankruptcy, they would have no right to claim this money.

[36] According to CIBC, the rights of the trustee are no greater than those of Bristar and JMB.[12] It also cites R. v. Martino,[13] an Ontario criminal case which decided that a trustee could not claim the proceeds of a crime committed by the bankrupt.

[37] The template for CIBC's argument differs, however, when it comes to the application of the notions of equity and constructive trust that RBC would import from the common law. According to CIBC, since the enactment of the Federal Law – Civil Law Harmonization Act, No. 1,[14] Quebec courts no longer have the jurisdiction to apply the common law notion of equity. Ultimately, according to CIBC, the civilian approach provides a legal equivalent in the form of the requirements of good faith (articles 6 and 7 CCQ), the duty to act fairly, the principle of fin de non-recevoir, and that of unjust enrichment.

[38] According to CIBC, the bankruptcy court should exercise its judicial discretion to apply these civilian principles. Once these parameters are imposed, the Court may prevent the trustee from exercising its right to claim, if such a right exists, the amounts held by LBC.

[39] Finally, CIBC favours the distribution of the money, prorated to the losses suffered by the victims of the fraud.

[40] In the eyes of CIBC, RBC cannot invoke a property right in or a right to trace the money at issue here. Without a trust, the traceability of the funds would be a non-issue. According to CIBC, the concepts of constructive trust and tracing do not apply in Quebec.[15] Moreover, CIBC is of the opinion that the money paid by RBC and credited to LBC cannot be traced because the money deposited is fungible property.

[41] In short, CIBC opines that, while RBC cannot claim to have a property right in or right to trace the money held by LBC, this credit item remains the proceeds of fraud, which should benefit the victims in proportion to their losses.

(C) The positions of the trustee and of G.E.

[42] At the outset, it should be pointed out that the trustee, while supporting G.E.'s position, displayed a degree of neutrality that is appropriate to an officer of the bankruptcy court.

[43] It falls primarily to G.E. to demonstrate that the disputed money meets the definition of property of a bankrupt. To do so, G.E. invokes several arguments, including the very purpose of the BIA, which is to ensure the proper administration of the property of the bankrupt so as to ensure an equitable sharing of the bankrupt's assets among its creditors, subject to the priorities set out in section 136 BIA.

[44] According to G.E., the mechanism whereby creditors must argue their claim before the trustee in bankruptcy seeks to prevent all ranks of creditors from competing for the bankrupt's assets. This includes victims of a fraud whose claims are not excluded by section 67 BIA but are otherwise protected with respect to the discharge under section 178 BIA.

[45] G.E. argues that, in the event of bankruptcy, the property belonging to the bankrupt debtor passes to the trustee (section 71 BIA). All of the bankrupt’s assets are immediately and without distinction vested in the trustee. Thus, the role of the trustee is not limited to representing the bankrupt; it also includes ensuring the proper administration of the bankrupt's property Beyond this role, the trustee also represents the creditors on behalf of whom it is responsible for the forced sale of the bankrupt's assets and the orderly distribution of the proceeds of the winding-up. The rights and obligations of the trustee and creditors should be assessed with this dual role in mind.[16]

[46] Relying on section 70 BIA,[17] G.E. is of the view that the seizure before judgment by RBC is invalid because of the precedence conferred on the bankruptcy. According to G.E., this reflects Parliament's intent to favour single control in bankruptcy matters.

[47] G.E. goes on to argue that the disputed amount should be vested in the trustee since it was part of Bristar's property on the day of its bankruptcy (section 71 BIA).

[48] According to G.E., the disputed amount falls within the definition of section 67 BIA, which specifies what does and does not comprise "property of the bankrupt". G.E. maintains that, oddly, the amount held by LBC before the bankruptcy was subject to the power of Bristar in or over this property, within the meaning of paragraph 67 BIA.

[49] G.E. advocates a broad interpretation of "property of the bankrupt" in order to include the disputed amount.

[50] G.E. characterizes the legal relationship between Bristar and LBC in light of the amount recorded in the bank account at issue as a claim. In its view, this is also a claim that RBC has against Bristar, one that should be the object of a proof of claim in the bankruptcy proceedings. This characterization, it submits, applies even in cases where cheques are drawn from an account with insufficient funds.[18]

[51] G.E. asks the Court to find that all the money advanced to Bristar should become its property, and that this is the case for the money coming from RBC and credited to Bristar at LBC.

[52] Moreover, G.E. considers the money advanced to Bristar by RBC to be fungible property that cannot be traced because it has since been deposited and merged with the total money supply of LBC, who is the debtor of Bristar for that amount. LBC's only obligation is to return an equivalent amount of money to Bristar, as creditor of that amount.

[53] Stated clearly, G.E. argues that RBC has no right to trace the money advanced to Bristar. Rather, it has a personal remedy that should now be presented by means of a proof of claim in Bristar's bankruptcy proceedings.

[54] Thus, G.E. concludes that the disputed amount should be collected by the trustee as "property of the bankrupt" and distributed according to the order of priority established in the BIA.

[55] In the same vein, G.E. suggests that RBC, through its proceedings, is attempting to change this order of priority by attributing to itself a priority that it is not granted under the Act.

[56] Finally, G.E. argues that there is no legislative vacuum for victims of fraud because, in section 178 BIA, Parliament has provided that a bankrupt debtor who has committed fraud cannot be discharged from his victim's claim. On the basis of this argument, G.E. urges prudence in the Court's exercise of judicial discretion. In its view, the bankruptcy court may not exercise its inherent jurisdiction if Parliament has already provided an appropriate remedy.

ANALYSIS AND ANSWER TO THE QUESTION

[57] To resolve the ultimate issue as to whether the proceeds of a kiting scheme may constitute "property of the bankrupt", a few questions of law raised by the parties must be answered:

(A) Does section 437 of the Bank Act[19] establish a right to trace?

(B) Is it still possible to apply the principles of constructive trust and tracing in Quebec?

(C) Is the foundation of equity underlying the common law precedent in Ex parte James[20] applicable in this case?

(D) Does Quebec law contain the equivalent of equity?

(E) How should the amount held by LBC be characterized?

(F) What rights can be argued by RBC and CIBC?

(G) Do the amounts at issue meet the definition of "property of the bankrupt" within the meaning of section 67 BIA?

(H) Did the trustee comply with the principles of good faith, fairness, and commercial morality when exercising its right to take possession of the proceeds of the kiting scheme?

(A) Does section 437 of the Bank Act[21] establish a right to trace?

[58] The only thing that section 437 Bank Act[22] permits RBC to do is characterize itself as a claimant of the money held by LBC. If such a claim is made as part of judicial proceedings brought by RBC, LBC may pay the disputed amounts to the depositor (Bristar, or in this case the trustee in bankruptcy) only if it has the consent of the claimant RBC. Conversely, to pay RBC the amount, it would require authorization from Bristar or the trustee.

[59] This does not indicate a right to trace on the claimant's part. Where there is no claim, however—which is not the case here—the bank may pay the principal and interest to the depositor or to the order of the depositor. This is how LBC was able set off its own debt with the money originating primarily from RBC before the court proceedings initiated by RBC and before the bankruptcy, even though it already suspected a kiting scheme was in operation.

[60] Section 437(2) makes it possible for a claimant to raise this exception, thereby preventing a bank from depositing the money claimed without its consent or, it goes without saying, judicial authorization.

[61] The Court is of the view that section 437(2) does not negate section 70(1) BIA in the event of a bankruptcy. There is no doubt that the bankruptcy proceeding takes priority over every other proceeding against the property of a bankrupt, including the seizure before judgment carried out by RBC along with a notice pursuant to section 437(2) of the Bank Act.[23]

[62] In short, section 437(2) of the Bank Act[24] confers no right in the thing and no right to trace. Without the attendant judicial proceedings, it is of no use to RBC. In any event, the bankruptcy takes precedence over the judicial proceedings brought by RBC against the bankrupt debtors (Bristar and JMB).

(B) Is it still possible to apply the principles of constructive trust and tracing in Quebec?

[63] The Civil Code of Québec (CCQ), enacted in 1994, does not contemplate implied trusts, resulting trusts, or constructive trusts.[25] As the commentaries of the Minister of Justice on the enactment of article 1262 C.C.Q. make clear, the legislature consciously sought to preclude the creation of an implied trust in Quebec law.[26]

[64] The constructive trust is not a recognized concept in our civil law.[27]

[65] The notion of tracing, which generally requires the existence of a trust or a common law fiduciary relationship,[28] is frequently used in cases involving claims, whether under the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure (CCP) or a claim for property under section 81 BIA.

[66] The principle remains the same in any event: for property to be claimable, it must be identifiable.[29] Indeed, this is the source of the difficulty of tracing fungible property such as money deposited into a bank account.

[67] The process of tracing is practically inapplicable in the case of a monetary loan. The lender is deemed to have parted with the money loaned, over which he or she will only have a right of claim. The borrower becomes owner in title of the money and, if this money is deposited in the bank, the bank then becomes the owner and the money is merged with the bank's money supply. In such a situation, the depositor becomes creditor of the amount deposited, and the debtor bank has the obligation to return to the depositor the equivalent of the money deposited. Money is most assuredly fungible property that loses its identity when deposited in a bank account.[30]

[68] In short, the constructive trust is not a part of Quebec law. As for the principle of tracing, it applies in cases involving claims. It does not apply to the facts of the case before us, however, because of the fungible nature of the property claimed (money).

(C) Is the foundation of equity underlying the common law precedent in Ex parte James[31] applicable in this case?

[69] Before the amendments brought by the F*ederal Law – Civil Law Harmonization Act, No. 1*,[32] section 183(1) BIA conferred on courts of justice sitting in bankruptcy jurisdiction in law and in equity, while making no distinction between civil law jurisdiction and common law jurisdiction. Section 183(1)(b) was repealed and replaced by section 183(1.1) BIA, which struck out the words "at law and in equity" to describe the jurisdiction conferred on the Quebec Superior Court in bankruptcy matters.

[70] In Ontario, the notion of equity is incorporated through section 96 of the Courts of Justice Act.[33] In Quebec, it is not—or at least not through a specific statute.

[71] James J. of the Chancery Courts of England[34] was applying the law of equity when he wrote the following.

> The Court, then, finding that he [the trustee, in his capacity as officer of the court] has in his hands money which in equity belongs to some one else, ought to set an example to the word by paying it to the person really entitled to it. In my opinion the Court of Bankruptcy ought to be as honest as other people.

34 In England, the creation of the Chancery Courts can be explained by the gaps in the common law (Bijuralism and Drafting Support Services Group, Legislative Services Branch, Department of Justice Canada and Corporate and Insolvency Law Policy Directorate, Industry Canada, "Some Legislative Policy Issues").

[72] This rule is typical of the principles of the law of equity.[35] It is based on the court's prerogative to prevent a trustee from exercising a right that is otherwise technically well founded. In Ex parte James, the principles of natural justice prevailed over the trustee's right to take possession of money that, in equity, belonged to another.

[73] According to the federal rules of interpretation, when it is necessary to refer to civil law rules, principles, or concepts, reference must be made to the rules, principles, and concepts in force in each province.[36] The law of equity is not part of the civil law of Quebec.[37] There is no specific act incorporating it into our legal system.

[74] In Microtec,[38] the Court of Appeal confirmed that the principle of equity and the rule set out in 1874 in Ex parte James[39] are not recognized in the civil law.

[75] This therefore answers that question.

(D) Does Quebec law contain the equivalent of equity?

[76] The objective of equity is to remedy shocking situations resulting from the regular application of a convention or law and that offend justice.

[77] As the late Claude Masse wrote: [TRANSLATION] "...good faith includes the principle of equity, and in our view, by the combined effect of this inclusion and the enshrinement of the general principle of good faith in articles 6 and 1375 CCQ, equity also became a general principle in Quebec law".[40]

[78] Drawing inspiration from these concepts, Guthrie, J., of the Superior Court, reproached a trustee for ignoring a counter-letter attributing the undivided share of a 35 The 1873-1875 Judicature Acts created a veritable merger of the ordinary courts with the Chancery Courts as part of a large-scale judicial reorganization with a view to establishing the High Court of Justice. Following this reorganization, the judges of the High Court of Justice were empowered to make rulings under both the common law and equity. In Ontario, where the first Chancery Court was not created until 1837, a judicial reorganization in the late nineteenth century, at the same time as in England, established the High Court of Justice, whose judges were empowered to make rulings under both the common law and equity (Bijuralism and Drafting Support Services Group, Legislative Services Branch, Department of Justice Canada and Corporate and Insolvency Law Policy Directorate, Industry Canada, "Some Legislative Policy Issues").

36 Sections 8.1 and 8.2 of the Interpretation Act, RSC 1985, c. I-21.

37 Indeed, the Court of Common Pleas, later the King's Bench and then the Superior Court of Quebec, has always been an ordinary court, similar in many respects to the ordinary courts in British law. Unlike common law jurisdictions, however, Quebec courts have never undergone a judicial reorganization resulting in the merger of jurisdictions in equity and in common law, as was done under the Judicature Acts. Indeed, there is reason to wonder whether this could even have happened in Quebec, where equitable jurisdiction, exercised by Chancery Court judges between 1765 and 1774, first fell into disuse following the coming into force of the Quebec Act and then completely disappeared (Bijuralism and Drafting Support Services Group, Legislative Services Branch, Department of Justice Canada and Corporate and Insolvency Law Policy Directorate, Industry Canada, "Some Legislative Policy Issues").

valuable immovable to a third party and not to the bankrupt. This is how our esteemed colleague expressed himself:

> [66] The only effect of this motion presented by the trustee is to disguise reality, deny the respondent's rights, and cause the unjust enrichment of the debtor's creditors and ultimately, of the debtor himself. Indeed, if the motion is granted, the respondent will be evicted from his home and his estate will be impoverished by approximately $999,000—and the debtor will become richer than ever!
> [67] Pursuant to articles 7 and 1375 CCQ, the Court is of the view that, in the present case, the trustee is attempting to exercise its rights "excessively, unreasonably, and thereby in a manner contrary to the requirements of good faith" and even in a manner inconsistent with natural justice.
> ...[41]

[79] Thus, it may be observed that the result arrived at by James, J. of the Chancery Court in 1874 may be reached by applying the principles of civil law.

[80] It is important, however, to note that Guthrie J. was considering the undivided share of an immovable, not fungible property. Moreover, he was not asked to decide whether the immovable was initially the property of the bankrupt within the meaning of section 67 BIA. This was the result of the dismissal of the application for partition and licitation that excluded the immovable from the bankrupt's estate, not a question of whether the property became vested in the trustee. This is a significant distinction between the facts of that case and those of the case before us.

[81] We must conclude, therefore, that there is an equivalent in the civil law to the principles stated in Ex parte James.[42]

(E) How should the amount held by LBC be characterized?

[82] Before the date of the bankruptcy, the disputed amount constituted a claim by Bristar against LBC up to the amount credited to the bank account.

[83] Of course, most of this money came from RBC and was credited without legal justification, but the fact nevertheless remains that Bristar had the power of a creditor in regard to that amount. Before the kiting scheme came to light, Bristar could have used this money for its own benefit.

[84] Even after the kiting scheme was exposed—but before the bankruptcy—LBC paid itself back for the amount of the advances given to Bristar, thus setting off its debt with money coming primarily from RBC. This was a legal set-off between two claims that were liquid and exigible that were operated by LBC. This was not contested at the hearing.

[85] Thus, the banking system recognizes the beneficiary of the kiting scheme as a creditor, despite the fraud.

[86] Under banking law, any bank account overdraft is characterized as the client's debt to the bank. Let us see what the author M.H. Ogilvie has to say on the subject:

> When an account is in funds, the customer is the creditor of the bank, but when there is a negative balance in the account, or an overdraft, the customer becomes the debtor of the bank. An overdraft is legally characterized as a loan granted to a customer by the bank, and as such, a privilege accorded to certain customers either from time to time or on an on-going basis. An overdraft privilege may be granted by contract or by course of dealing by which customers have been permitted overdrafts. When granted by contract, the overdraft privilege is usually for a stipulated sum for a stipulated period of time at a stipulated rate of interest. Where a bank has permitted overdrafts in the absence of a contract, the course of dealing is established when the customer draws a cheque and thereby creates a debit in the account. This is characterized as a request for an overdraft which has been granted.
> ...[43]

[87] Consequently, even when there is no money, the drawee bank may agree to pay a cheque, or it may do so in error. In such situations, it is deemed to have granted a loan to its client.

[88] This is the position in which RBC found itself on May 29, 2010, when LBC closed Bristar's account with $804,725 credited to it.

[89] Thus, RBC is Bristar's creditor, and it was correct to file proof of claim in the bankruptcy for the amount of its loss.

[90] On the date of the bankruptcy, Bristar was itself a creditor against LBC for an amount of $804,725. This amount was deemed to have been loaned to LBC, contingent on its reimbursing the equivalent plus usual interest.

(F) What rights can be argued by RBC and CIBC?

[91] Having been characterized as lenders, the banks have a claim against Bristar for the amount of the loan. No fiduciary obligation arose from the circulation of cheques. Therefore, the right that may be exercised by RBC and CIBC is personal.

[92] Obviously, the banks may also claim unjust enrichment, but again this is a personal right to be exercised against Bristar. In the case of a bankruptcy, this claim is expressed as a proof of claim.

[93] The banks also have an extracontractual remedy against the administrators of Bristar and JMB. If the administrators are also bankrupt, as the Court understands them to be, the banks may oppose their discharge insofar as fraud is demonstrated.

(G) Does the money in dispute meet the definition of "property of the bankrupt"?

[94] The definition of the concept of "property" in section 2 BIA,[44] taken together with that of "property of the bankrupt" in section 67 BIA,[45] reveals the legislative scope of what may constitute "property of the bankrupt" vested in the trustee in the event of bankruptcy.

[95] It is a relatively flexible notion that takes its meaning from the context and that should be interpreted harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament.[46]

[97] The precedence given to the bankruptcy process results in a stay of proceedings and single management and prevents competition for the assets of the insolvent person. Once these parameters have been established, it is then possible to proceed with an ordered liquidation of the bankrupt's assets and their distribution in a manner consistent with the order of priority set out in the BIA (section136).[48]

[98] The clear purpose of the BIA grounds the conclusion that Parliament intended for a broad and liberal application of this statute to every kind of insolvency situation requiring an arrangement or an ordered liquidation of the assets of the insolvent person.

[99] This explains how the BIA is applicable even after the discovery of large-scale fraud of the kind that has made headlines in Quebec in recent years. Simply imagine the floodgates that would open if every single defrauded person launched proceedings to claim fraudulently appropriated money. The competition for assets would be unmanageable.

[100] If every defrauded person claimed his or her property, how would the distribution be carried out? What order of priority would govern the distribution of property or the proceeds of realization? The law does not contemplate such a situation in any context other than through the application of the BIA.

48 Century Services Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [2010] 3 SCR 379.

[101] The disagreement between RBC and CIBC regarding the distribution of the disputed amount between them has revealed a legal vacuum. One party, RBC, claims to be the sole victim, while the other, CIBC, asserts that it is entitled to the amount in proportion to the respective losses of the fraud victims. On what legal basis should this issue be decided? The BIA presents a legislative solution from which the Court must not deviate.

[102] In this case, the disputed amount represents a claim that was part of Bristar's assets on the date of its bankruptcy. Excluding the proceeds from the kiting scheme would have the effect of granting the banks the status of priority creditor, which they do not have under the law. Moreover, it can be considered that, shortly before the discovery of the kiting scheme by LBC, Bristar had power over the disputed amount within the meaning of paragraph 67(d) BIA.[49] Could it not then exercise this power for its own benefit, within the meaning of this inclusion in the definition of "property of the bankrupt" in section 67 BIA? In the view of the Court, this approach is consistent with the scheme of the Act.

[103] Excluding the proceeds of the kiting scheme would be tantamount to adding a restriction that section 67 BIA does not contemplate. It is not for the Court to create new legal restrictions. That is the role of Parliament.

[104] In this case, neither LBC nor Bristar may be considered to be a trustee of the amount disputed between the parties. On the date of the bankruptcy, Bristar had a claim against LBC. This claim was "property of the bankrupt". RBC and CIBC have a claim that they may raise in the bankruptcy proceedings.

(H) Did the trustee comply with the principles of good faith, fairness, and commercial morality when it exercised its right to take possession of the proceeds of the kiting scheme?

[105] It hardly bears repeating that, under the banking system, LBC was permitted to reimburse itself for the advances it had granted Bristar even after the discovery of the kiting scheme. Commercial ethics were thus safeguarded.

[106] The principles of good faith and fairness always depend on context. The Court understands quite well that Guthrie, J., of the Superior Court, reproached the trustee for having exercised its rights excessively, unreasonably, and in a manner contrary to the requirements of good faith.[50] The context was very different, however. In that bankruptcy case, the trustee refused to recognize the effects of a counter-letter because it was published after the date of the bankruptcy. Guthrie, J., correctly concluded that the trustee was seeking to disguise the truth and cause unjust enrichment, while causing the bankrupt's former de facto spouse to be unjustly deprived of the immovable in dispute. The facts of the case before us are clearly different from that case. Here, the trustee is in good faith.

[50] Supra note 41.

[107] The application of the principles of good faith and fairness is also frequently a matter of judicial discretion when the court is faced with a shocking situation in the event of the strict application of the law. A consideration of the facts reveals that this is not the case here.

[108] RBC and CIBC may share in the distribution of the proceeds from the liquidation of the assets of the bankrupts Bristar and JMB, as may all of the bankrupts' unsecured creditors. This is a very fair solution.

[109] The exercise of judicial discretion must yield to the application of statutory provisions (BIA) when the very purpose of the statute is to settle situations of insolvency such as the one before us. This time, the enrichment of the body of creditors is fully justified through the application of the BIA.

[110] As the Court of Appeal stated in Parent v. Delage:[51]

> ...
>
> I do not believe that I am required to rule on the argument that the bankrupt obtained the loan through fraud or false representations. Nor could that change the legal nature of the relationship between the lender and the borrower. Moreover, even if the transaction could have been voided, it would not have authorized the bankrupt, after its assignment in bankruptcy, to return property vested in the trustee to its creditor.
>

CONCLUSION

[111] In summary, the Court finds that the specific context of the case favours an affirmative response to the substantive issue. Here, the proceeds of the kiting scheme implemented by Bristar constitute "property of the bankrupt" that is vested in the trustee. The solution provided by the bankruptcy is clearly more appropriate to the facts of the case than any of the solutions proposed by the banks.

[112] Counsel for CIBC hoped for a judicial intervention, an Ex parte Lalonde based on the requirements of good faith, the principle of fairness, and judicial discretion. Regrettably, in the circumstances of the present case, that would be inappropriate.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT:

Auditors — Failure to Detect Defalcations — Negligence — Damages.

The defendants, a firm of auditors, were employed by the plaintiff to audit its books from 1936 to the beginning of 1939. During the period of the defendants' audits one I., a trusted employee of the plaintiff, was carrying on systematic defalcations, which were covered by "kiting cheques. The defendants failed to discover these defalcations due to a lack of thoroughness in checking the plaintiff's bank statements, deposit slips and other records. One of the defendants' employees engaged in the 1936 audit had given the defendants a memorandum indicating that there was a possibility that "kiting" of cheques was going on. The defendants failed to follow up this suggestion and investigate whether there had been any "kiting." Had such an investigation been made I.'s defalcations would have been discovered.

Held that the defendants had performed their duties in a negligent manner. An auditor is not required to commence his audit in a spirit of suspicion toward the employees, but if anything of a suspicious nature appears it is his duty to probe it to the bottom. In re Kingston Cotton Mill Co. (No. 2) [1896] 2 Ch. 279, 65 L.J. Ch. 673; London Oil Storage Co. v. Seear & Co. (1904) (reported in Dicksee on Auditing, 11th ed., at pp. 785 and 786) followed. In failing to investigate thoroughly after a suspicion had arisen that "kiting" of cheques was going on defendants were therefore guilty of negligence. They were further negligent in not properly checking the bank statements, deposit slips and other original records. Guardian Insur. Co. of Canada v. Sharp [1941] S.C.R. 164, referred to.

With regard to the question of damage, held that the defendants were liable in damages for the amount of I.'s defalcations after the completion of the 1936 audit; since, if the defendants had properly carried out the 1936 audit, I.'s frauds would have been exposed at that time and his subsequent defalcations would have been avoided.

The plaintiff having asked that the defendants be required to return the auditors' fees paid them by the plaintiff, held that since the defendants had been required to make good the damages resulting from their negligence, they should not be required to return the remuneration for their services.

[1] MACLEAN, J. — The plaintiff is a company incorporated in this province, carrying on a chain-store business in groceries and allied commodities, with its head office or chief place of business and several retail stores in Regina, and several other retail stores in various towns in Southern. Saskatchewan. The plaintiff operates about 40 or more stores.

[2] The defendants are chartered accountants and auditors, practising their profession in Regina, and elsewhere in the province of Saskatchewan.'

[3] Some time in August, 1936, the plaintiff engaged the defendants as auditors of the plaintiff's books of business. The contract between the plaintiff and the defendants was verbal—a conversation between E. W. Fisher, the office manager and secretary of the plaintiff, and R. R. Thomas, the second member of the defendant partnership.

[4] While at trial there was some argument and questioning as to the exact nature of the contract, there is practically no difference between the Thomas version of the conversation and Fisher's version. The difference is in the form of words rather than in the substance. I accept Thomas' version. His version includes all that was said in reference to the contract by Fisher. Thomas said in his examination for discovery: "Mr. Fisher told me that they wanted a shareholders' type of audit" Next answer "Yes—he mentioned that it was really for the shareholders, that they were in the States." Later another answer by Thomas:

> "But it was distinctly mentioned as a shareholders audit in compliance with the Companies Act, that the chief shareholders were in the States, and they had to have an auditors' course. It was also mentioned that they would like to have quarterly visits. He [referring to Fisher] did not know whether any of the audit had been done for 1936 or not, he was not sure about that, and that they were not to go behind the previous auditors' statement signed as of December 31, '35. There was no necessity to go behind that."

[5] The previous auditors were highly spoken of as being competent in their profession. Their working papers for three or four previous audits were available to the defendants. The defendants were expected to carry on their work in the general manner in which the work had been carried on by their predecessors; but I take it from the evidence, and so find, that in conducting their work the defendants were not limited to doing what their predecessors considered it advisable to be done, but while being guided by the general method of their predecessors, they (the defendants) were required or expected to do anything in addition which might occur to them as being necessary.

[6] The audit reports prepared by the defendants during the period of employment are obviously made to conform with the requirements of an auditor's report under The Companies Act, R.S.S., 1940, ch. 113. I find that the contract between the plaintiff and defendants was not limited to being a balance sheet audit (a term of indefinite meaning); the only limitation was in respect to the inventory of merchandise — it was not required of the defendants to report on merchandise excepting as shown by the certificate of the directors. The defendants were expected to make quarterly examinations of the books of records of the plaintiff, but that precaution was largely for the purpose of expediting the work of preparing the annual audit at the end of the fiscal year. The defendants, that is, Rooke and Thomas, were not themselves expected to do the actual work, but they were particularly cautioned against sending inexperienced students or employees, and Thomas assured Fisher that the men placed on the work would be competent men who were either chartered accountants or well on their way toward that status. Subject to that provision selection of the men sent to the plaintiff's office to do the work was entirely a matter for the defendants. There was some evidence put in at trial that the defendants had not been appointed auditors at a shareholders' meeting. The remuneration was agreed upon by Fisher and Thomas. In the following year a further arrangement between the same two men took place and the defendants' services were continued. The defendants accepted the position, performed the services and accepted the remuneration. The mere fact that the contract was not confirmed at a shareholders' meeting does not seem to me to affect the merits of this case.

[7] Early in 1939 some circumstances in connection with the auditing moved one Campbell, a competent employee of the defendants, to suggest that original bank deposit slips and other bank statements should be inspected. This could only be done with the consent of the plaintiff, and the consent was readily given. Fisher accompanied Campbell to the bank, and from the inspection made it became evident that a trusted employee of the plaintiff, one Ingram, had been stealing the plaintiff's moneys. Immediately a special investigation of Ingram's dealings was instituted, which investigation was expedited to some extent by conversations between Ingram and the defendants. This investigation disclosed that during the years Ingram had been in the employ of the plaintiff, that is, a number of years before the defendants became auditors, and during the time the defendants were auditors, Ingram had stolen something over $14,000.

[8] Another firm of auditors, Read, Smith and Co., were engaged to make a special audit in respect to Ingram. Ingram had been bonded in the sum of $5,000 and this later special audit was for the purpose (among others) of satisfying the bonding company as to Ingram's defalcations. This special audit, compared with the investigation made by the defendants, showed only a very few dollars difference in the results arrived at by the two audit firms. For the purpose of this action I take the defendants' own findings and conclusions as to the extent of Ingram's default. The investigation also showed what Ingram's defalcations amounted to in each of the years 1936, 1937, 1938 and a few months of 1939. The bonding company paid the plaintiff the amount of the bond, $5,000, less $1,250. Why this sum is not quite clear, and in so far as this action is concerned it is immaterial. There was no subrogation to the bond company.

[9] The plaintiff now brings action against the defendants, alleging that the defendants were negligent, careless and unskilful in the performance of their work; that as a result of such negligence, carelessness and unskilfulness the defendants failed to discover the irregularities, false entries and other evidence of Ingram's thefts; and that the failure of the defendants through such negligence, carelessness and unskilfulness to discover Ingram's thefts earlier in their work, resulted in further losses to the plaintiff. That raises of course the question as to the duties of the defendants as auditors to the plaintiff.

[10] The outstanding judicial pronouncements on this question are collected and reviewed in the recent judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in Guardian Insur. Co. of Canada v. Sharp [1941] S.C.R. 164. The conclusion I derive from the authorities there collected is that auditors should bring into their work such reasonable degree of care and skill that is usually required of professional men engaged as they were to conduct a general, but a thorough, examination of the plaintiff's books and records of business — a degree of care and skill perhaps less onerous than if they were called upon to make a special investigation of some particular phase, as in the case where the firm of Read and Smith were called upon to investigate the defalcations of a certain employee. It is not required of auditors that they should approach their work with the suspicion that someone employed or having charge of the plaintiff's business has been dishonest. Although the auditor is not required to suspect dishonesty on the part of any employee, and although he is not engaged to carry on the duties of a detective, yet he should enter upon the duties leading up to verification of books and records in the attitude of not taking for granted anything that he himself can ascertain or confirm through books and records. In other words, instead of taking the verbal statement of some employee as to what is being recorded in some book or record, he should peruse such book or record and get his knowledge first hand. Under this particular contract the auditor was relieved from examining or inquiring into purchase of merchandise as well as stock on hand. There by the terms of his contract he is permitted to take the certificate of the directors as to what is contained.

[11] But although the auditor is not required to commence his work with suspicion, yet if, in the carrying on of his work circumstances arouse or excite his suspicion, then there is undoubtedly a duty upon him to investigate thoroughly until he satisfies himself as to whether there are or are not grounds for that suspicion, and to report to the shareholders accordingly. In In re Kingston Cotton Mill Co. (No. 2) [1896] 2 Ch. 279, at 288-9, 65 L.J. Ch. 673, Lopes, L.J. says he is entitled to assume that they (the employees of the company in whom confidence is placed) are honest. If there is anything calculated to incite suspicion he should "probe it to the bottom," and Lord Alverstone, C.J. in London Oil Storage Co. v. Seear & Co. (1904) reported in Dicksee on Auditing, 11th ed., at pp. 785 and 786, uses these words:

> "If circumstances of suspicion arise it is the duty of the auditor in so far as these circumstances relate to the financial position of the Company, to probe them to the bottom."

[12] Apart from his legal duties it appears that the duty of an auditor on commencing his duties with any client is to familiarize himself with the system of bookkeeping conducted by his client. In doing so he should get his information from direct examination of the books, with such explanation from employees in charge of records as may be required to supplement that examination, as may be necessary for proper examination of the bookkeeping system. The auditor should ascertain in his examination of the bookkeeping system whether the bookkeeping operates as an internal check, whether it is so intended to operate, and, if it is so intended to operate as an internal check, then the extent and thoroughness of that internal check; the auditor having ascertained where the internal check, if any, ends, should begin his audit from that point on. If there were no internal check he should have to commence his work from the earliest point, perhaps the cash register. If an efficient internal check carries on further, the audit should begin where that ends.

[13] Here, the plaintiff did have a system of bookkeeping which was supposed to operate as an internal check, and probably a reasonably efficient check. The defendants, in familiarizing themselves with that form of internal check, seem to have taken too much for granted. They did not commence where the internal check as explained to them should require a commencement.

[14] Part of the plaintiff's records consisted of a set of sheets headed "Daily Cash Recap." The several representatives of the defendant who carried on that work testified that they had never seen those sheets. In the internal bookkeeping of the company, at least three different employees in addition to Ingram perused those recap, sheets daily, during which time of course at least one sheet would be for some time on the desk of someone of the three employees. The sheets were kept by Ingram. There is no definite evidence that he attempted to conceal them, although undoubtedly as it turned out it would be in his interest to do so. The strange fact is that during nearly three years the defendants' representatives never saw those sheets, which were an important part of the plaintiff's bookkeeping system. I accept of course as correct the evidence of the defendants and their employees. At this point, although there was no evidence put in, I think I can take the opportunity of stating what is very generally known, that the defendants, in this province, enjoy a high reputation as competent and reliable auditors.

[15] Now, wherein have the defendants been negligent, careless or unskilful, if at all, in carrying on their work? Among the exhibits filed there are the working papers of the defendants in respect to preparing their audit reports for 1936 and also for 1937.

[16] In preparing for the first audit the defendants assigned two men to do the work. One left the defendants' employ early in 1937, before the auditors' report was issued. He is a chartered accountant holding a responsible position in the province. The other left the defendants' employ some time later. He also is a chartered accountant holding a responsible position in some other part of Canada. On the margin of one of those work sheets, p. 20 in Ex. P. 2, there is a memorandum in pencil, "Possibility of kiting." There is evidence that that memorandum is in the handwriting of one of the employees doing the audit work. That memorandum must have been made during the period when the books were being examined and the annual report prepared. There is no memorandum showing that the matter was inquired into or that anything was done about it. On the several work sheets there are several memoranda suggesting that some matter should be looked into, and near by there is usually another memorandum indicating that the matter has been looked into or explained. There is no such memorandum in regard to the kiting. In Thomas' examination for discovery and referring to this memorandum of the possibility of kiting, he said in answer to question:

> "Yes, there is no doubt that was mentioned to Mr. Fisher as well.
>
> "Q. You took that up with Mr. Fisher, the possibility of kiting? A. I am saying that this note was given to me and these notes were given to me as reference and I would refer to them all and cover it very fully. I am not prepared to swear that I took that particular thing up with Mr. Fisher, but it seems to me quite logical that I would point out the possibility of kiting. It is a natural sequence that there was that possibility."

[17] From which I conclude and find that the matter of the possibility of kiting was not taken up. It does not necessarily follow that the possibility of kiting in the mind of him who made the memorandum was the instance of kiting referred to shortly hereafter, for as it subsequently developed there were numerous instances of kiting. As it turned out, there were good grounds for that suspicion of kiting, for Ingram had on December 31, indulged in kiting as between the plaintiff's bank at Moose Jaw and the plaintiff's bank at Regina to the extent of $5,400. Here it appears that there were circumstances which properly justified the suspicion on the part of the auditor, and yet nothing was done about it. I think I am justified in saying that nothing was done about it, for if anything had been done, the first natural step in investigation would have disclosed the kiting. The plaintiff's fiscal year, up to 1936, ended on the last day of the calendar year, that is, December 31. Some time late in 1936 the directors decided to end their fiscal year on the Saturday nearest December 31. The fiscal year therefore ended not on December 31, 1936, but on January 2, 1937. Ingram on December 31, 1936, had deposited with the plaintiff's bank at Regina two requests for transfer of money, one for $4,000 and one for $1,400. These transfers of money were simply requests by the plaintiff to one of the many banks with which they had accounts to transfer from the plaintiff's funds at the one bank a specified sum to the plaintiff's credit in the account at the principal bank, which is in Regina. The depositing of those transfers with the bank in Regina, and credited then in the ordinary course to the plaintiff's account in Regina, showed that additional $5,400 to the plaintiff's credit at that bank; yet because January 1 was a bank holiday those transfers were not debited to the plaintiff's account at Moose Jaw until January 2.' The defendants in preparing their audit, and having received in fact verifications from all the banks with which the plaintiff dealt, took those verifications for the purpose of their audit as of December 31, except from the bank at Regina. The audit was prepared as for the state of the plaintiff's business on January 2, 1937, consequently these two transfer items totalling $5,400 appeared to the plaintiff's credit in two different banks (Regina and Moose Jaw) at the same time. Had the defendants required bank verifications as for January 2, 1937, the day for which the audit was prepared, it would immediately appear that there had been some irregularity, and on Very slight examination it would appear that Ingram had indulged in kiting. In other words, there were circumstances which aroused the suspicion of the auditors as to the irregularity of kiting, and nothing has been done, for the first step to be taken would have disclosed real grounds for the suspicion. Had that been done, Ingram's irregularities would have been discovered then, early in January, or early in February, 1937. It is I think reasonable to assume that Ingram's services would have been dispensed with then, as they were dispensed with when his irregularities were discovered in April of 1939. And with the dismissal of Ingram in January or February of 1937 there would not have been further defalcations through 1937, 1938 and a few months of 1939. Given that, it seems to me very obvious that the defendants through their chosen representatives or employees were careless and unskilful to a degree that amounted to negligence, particularly in preparing the audit report for as of the end of business on January 2, 1937, based on bank verifications as of December 31, 1936.

[18] The defendants in carrying on their work, it seems to me, failed to make a thorough examination of the plaintiff's system of bookkeeping, or in any event failed to commence their audit where that internal check as explained to them required a commencement. I accept their several statements that they had never seen the recap. sheets. It is obvious therefore that a hiatus existed between their audit and the plaintiff's internal check system without the recap. sheets.

[19] During the trial one Hessford was called on behalf of the defendants to give expert and opinion evidence on auditing. In several places in his testimony it is quite obvious that Hessford is at pains to soften his implied criticism of the defendants. Hessford on being asked:

> "Now, had you been conducting an audit like that, would you have inquired whether there were recap. sheets? A. I think eventually I would. I mean, I would not.
> "Q. How long would it take you to get around to it? A. Oh that depends how smoothly the other tie-up was going.
>
> "Q. Yes? A. It might have been months."

1941 CanLII 198 (SK KB)

[20] Eventually the witness Hessford qualified his answer down, that it might have taken him two years to find out.

[21] Bearing in mind the manner of Hessford in softening the effect of his answers, it is quite clear that his opinion is that there was a hiatus between the point at which the audit commenced and where it should have commenced, assuming that the defendants had concluded their knowledge of the bookkeeping system as it would have existed without recap. sheets.

[22] In conducting their audit the defendants paid practically no attention to the credit side of the cash book; and some of them contended that it was not necessary to do so. Hessford under some pressure admitted the credit side of the cash book should be examined. On the other hand, Smith, who was called as an expert for the plaintiff, and who assisted in the special investigation in respect to Ingram, maintained that the credit side of the cash book is the important side and that on this investigation particularly the credit side of the cash book is the point of issue. More important still, the witness Campbell, an employee of the defendants, the one who suggested the inspection at the bank in April, 1939, says in answer to a question: "If we had been checking the credit side of the cash book and looking up the adjustments, there is no doubt about it." ("It" there refers to discovering Ingram's defalcations.) Then later at the end of March or beginning of April, 1939, when practically the same circumstances existed in the plaintiff's office in respect to bookkeeping as existed during all the time the defendants were engaged as auditors, Campbell suggested the investigation already referred to being made at the bank. I do not know that anything unusual existed then that did not exist in January or February, 1937, and there was the additional circumstance in 1937 of the suspicion of the kiting. Had the defendants' representative then acted as Campbell did in 1939, there is no question the defalcation would have been discovered, and Campbell was only doing what a reasonably competent auditor should always do, with probably less ground for doing it than the two representatives had in January and February, 1937.

[23] It seems to me that the defendants in not following up the suspicion of kiting, in beginning their audit at a point too far removed from the internal check system as they understood it, and in not making occasional inspections of original deposit slips in the bank, were falling far short of their duties as auditors. I do not include here their failure to discover the recap. sheets, for it was in Ingram's interest to keep them out of sight, and at the beginning there was no reason why they should suspect Ingram or any other employee.

[24] Now arises the question as to whether the defendants are liable for damages to the plaintiff. The defendants themselves, in their special investigation undertaken at the request of the plaintiff, showed that Ingram's defalcations during 1937 amounted to $1,366.79, and in 1938, to $2,088.90, and from January 3 to April 1, 1939, to $523.04, a total of $3,978.73.

[25] A direction to a jury by Lord Alverstone in the London Oil Storage Co. case, supra, speaking on an auditor's liability, said:

> "Was he guilty of a breach of duty, and if so, what loss was occasioned to the Company by that breach of duty? You must not put upon him the loss by reason of theft occurring afterwards or before, but you must put upon him such damages as you consider in your opinion were really caused by his not having fulfilled his duty as auditor of the Company."

[26] In that case the jury awarded five guineas against the auditors, although the loss to the company was a very very much larger sum.

[27] The failure of the defendants to "probe to the bottom" the circumstances as to the suspicion of kiting seems to me to have been a breach of duty. Not only were the circumstances not probed to the bottom, but they were not even probed beneath the surface, for the first step in probing beneath the surface, the simple step of comparing the bank statement at Moose Jaw with the bank statement at Regina for December, 1936, and January, 1937, would have disclosed immediately Ingram's irregularities — that in addition to many irregularities during the time the defendants had been in charge of the audit. There were very many instances where the defendant auditors in conducting their audit were on the verge of disclosing irregularities, yet they failed to take the next step that would have shown these irregularities. It is not necessary for me now to review the very many instances where Ingram took advantage of money transfers from country stores to head office — from country bank transfers to head office or to Regina bank, and where through bills payable he was covering up his petty thefts. The consequence of that breach of duty was that Ingram was allowed to continue in the plaintiff's employ; and the kiting incident at the close of December, 1936, was necessary on his part to cover up some of his defalcations which had then amounted to nearly $10,000.

[28] The negligence here is negligence of omission rather than negligence of commission. In most of the cases of negligence of omission involving auditors there appears to be great difficulty in determining the auditor's liability, but under all the authoritative decisions since Hadley v. Baxendale (1854) 9 Ex. 341, 23 L.J. Ex. 179, with the numerous qualifications of the rule in that case, it seems to be clear that liability for negligence follows closely on the principle stated in that decision. When the defendants neglected their duty in not probing the possible circumstances of kiting they must be taken to have known that if any employee had been guilty of kiting he would not be dismissed from his employment because they, the defendants, had not reported what they suspected, and it follows it seems to me quite logically that they should know that that employee would continue his kiting, and also as auditors they should know that kiting on the part of an employee certainly meant the covering up of thefts.

[29] I hold therefore that the natural consequence of the defendants' breach of duty, which amounted to negligence, resulted in the plaintiff's loss of Ingram's defalcations in 1937, 1938 and a few months in 1939. It is not definite what Ingram's defalcations in 1937 amounted to before say the first of February the date which I fix for the defendants' first definite breach of duty, but I fix that roughly at $100 as the amount of Ingram's defalcations up to February 1, 1937 (which is taken roughly as the date on which I can say that the defendants were suspicious of kiting). It seems to me the loss or damage to the plaintiff flowing from the defendants' negligence is the amount of Ingram's defalcations from January 1, 1937, until he was dismissed in April, 1939 — this is the only logical measure of damages which occurs to me. It is not a case for nominal damages — I do not think it to be a case for exemplary damages, but I should take the loss subject to a rough calculation of Ingram's defalcations between January 1, 1937, and February 1, 1937, as $100 and I deduct that from the total amount of his defalcations for 1937, 1938 and 1939, leaving $3,878.73.

[30] It may be asked why previous auditors, who have been spoken of as competent, should not have discovered his defalcations, which at the end of 1935 amounted to $8,700. Well, that question is not being investigated, but it does not follow, because defalcations escaped the attention of one set of competent auditors, that that is a defence for other auditors such as the defendants in failing to make the inquiries and investigations which circumstances arising in the course of their duty required them to do.

[31] Plaintiffs also claim for return of the remuneration paid to the defendants, and also for payment of a sum equal to that paid to the special investigators, Read and Smith. I do not think the plaintiffs are entitled to the latter sum. That was a matter of separate contract beween the plaintiff and the other auditors, and that special audit was needed to satisfy the bonding company. In respect to the claim for fees paid to the defendants, I think that when the defendants are called upon to make good damages resulting from negligence, they should not at the same time be asked to return their remuneration for their work. The audit excepting in regard to Ingram's defalcations was of value to the plaintiff and there was much more to the plaintiff's business than the defalcation of one employee. The claims for the fees paid to Read and Smith and for the return of the fees paid to the defendants are refused.

[32] There will be judgment in favour of the plaintiff for the sum of $3,878.73 with costs. There will be. a stay of execution for 30 days, during which time I shall fix counsel fees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR QUEBEC

Commercial law — Corporations — Oppression — Reasonable expectations of shareholder — Shareholder resigning as officer and director of corporation — Whether resignation extended to shareholder status and shares transferred accordingly — Whether evidence supported reasonable expectation asserted by shareholder of being treated as such and, if so, whether reasonable expectation was violated — Whether shareholder unlawfully deprived of shareholder status as a result of corporation's conduct — Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-44, s. 241.

In 2004, M and R, two friends, discussed the possibility of creating a road transportation company. M would contribute the money to start up the business while R would bring skills to ensure its success. R had the company incorporated on July 13, 2004, and that same day, the company's board of directors passed a resolution to accept notices of subscription to securities by R and M and to issue 51 shares to R and 49 shares to M. Both the notices of subscription and the resolution were signed by R alone. Thereafter, R and M rarely complied with the requirements of the Canada Business Corporations Act ("CBCA") and almost never put anything in writing. They had neither a partnership nor a shareholders' agreement, and there was no written contract or any other legal formality relating to M's advances of substantial amounts of money to R.

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DU QUÉBEC

Droit commercial — Sociétés par actions — Abus — Attentes raisonnables de l'actionnaire — Démission d'un actionnaire à titre de dirigeant et d'administrateur d'une société — La démission valait-elle également pour la qualité d'actionnaire et, dans l'affirmative, les actions ont-elles de ce fait été transférées? — La preuve étaye-t-elle l'allégation selon laquelle l'actionnaire s'attendait raisonnablement à être traité comme tel et, dans l'affirmative, cette attente raisonnable a-t-elle été frustrée? — Le comportement de la société a-t-il eu pour effet de dépouiller illégalement l'actionnaire de sa qualité d'actionnaire? — Loi canadienne sur les sociétés par actions, L.R.C. 1985, c. C-44, art. 241.

En 2004, deux amis, M et R, ont envisagé la possibilité de créer une entreprise de transport routier. M devait avancer les fonds de démarrage et R, mettre à contribution ses compétences pour assurer la réussite de l'entreprise. Le 13 juillet 2004, R a constitué la société et, le même jour, le conseil d'administration de cette dernière a adopté une résolution à l'effet d'accepter les avis de souscription de valeurs mobilières de R et de M et d'émettre 51 actions à R et 49 à M. Tant les avis de souscription que la résolution n'ont été signés que par R. Subséquemment, R et M n'ont que rarement observé les exigences de la Loi canadienne sur les sociétés par actions (« LCSA ») et n'ont presque jamais rien consigné par écrit. Ils n'ont pas non plus conclu de contrat de société ou de convention d'actionnaires, et les avances de fonds substantielles consenties par M à R n'ont pas fait l'objet d'un contrat écrit ou de quelque autre formalité juridique.

On May 25, 2005, M sent a letter to the corporation in which he indicated that he was resigning as an officer and director of the company. M asserts that he never intended to stop being a shareholder, but the corporation contends that M also resigned as a shareholder and accordingly transferred his shares to R. Claiming that the corporation and R unduly and wrongfully stripped him of his status as a shareholder, M applied for an oppression remedy pursuant to s. 241 of the CBCA.

The trial judge dismissed M's oppression claim based on the factual finding that M had undertaken to remain a shareholder only so long as he was willing to guarantee the corporation's debts and later was no longer willing to do so. A majority of the Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal.

Held (Côté J. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Abella, Cromwell, Karakatsanis, Wagner, Gascon and Brown JJ.: The trial judge's factual findings are not reviewable on appeal because no palpable and overriding error is present here. M's oppression claim must accordingly be approached on the basis of the trial judge's factual findings to the effect that from May 25, 2005 onwards, M did not want to be a shareholder, did not want to be treated as such and, as a result, transferred his shares to R.

There are two elements of an oppression claim. The claimant must first identify the expectations that he or she claims have been violated and establish that the expectations were reasonably held. Then the claimant must show that those reasonable expectations were violated by conduct falling within the statutory terms, that is, conduct that was oppressive, unfairly prejudicial to or unfairly disregarding of the interests of any security holder.

In the present case, M's oppression claim is groundless. M could have no reasonable expectation of being treated as a shareholder: he no longer was and expressly demanded not to be so treated. As against the corporation, the most that can be said is that it failed to carry out M's wishes as a result of not observing certain necessary corporate formalities. But in light of these findings, it cannot be said that the corporation acted oppressively or that it illegally stripped him of his status as a shareholder. What happened is that the corporation failed to make sure that all the legal formalities were complied with before registering the transfer of shares to R. The acts of the corporation which M claims to constitute oppression were in fact taken, albeit imperfectly, in accordance with his express wishes.

Le 25 mai 2005, M a fait parvenir à la société une lettre dans laquelle il démissionnait à titre de dirigeant et d'administrateur de l'entreprise. Il affirme n'avoir jamais eu l'intention de cesser d'être actionnaire, mais la société soutient qu'il a également démissionné à titre d'actionnaire et transféré de ce fait ses actions à R. En application de l'art. 241 de la LCSA, M a intenté un recours pour abus, alléguant que la société et R l'avaient dépouillé indûment et illégalement de sa qualité d'actionnaire.

Le juge de première instance a rejeté le recours pour abus après avoir conclu des faits que M ne s'était engagé à demeurer actionnaire que tant qu'il serait disposé à garantir le passif de la société et que, à un moment ultérieur, il n'avait plus été disposé à le faire. Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont rejeté l'appel.

Arrêt (la juge Côté est dissidente) : Le pourvoi est rejeté.

Les juges Abella, Cromwell, Karakatsanis, Wagner, Gascon et Brown : Les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance ne sont pas susceptibles de révision en appel car elles ne sont entachées d'aucune erreur manifeste et dominante. Il faut donc statuer sur le recours pour abus de M à partir des conclusions de fait du juge de première instance selon lesquelles, à compter du 25 mai 2005, M n'a plus voulu être actionnaire, n'a plus voulu être traité comme tel et a de ce fait transféré ses actions à R.

Deux choses incombent à celui qui allègue l'abus. D'abord, il doit préciser quelles attentes ont censément été frustrées et en établir le caractère raisonnable. Ensuite, il doit démontrer que ces attentes raisonnables ont été frustrées par un comportement que vise le libellé de la loi, à savoir le fait d'abuser des droits d'un détenteur de valeurs mobilières ou de se montrer injuste à son égard en lui portant préjudice ou en ne tenant pas compte de ses intérêts.

Dans la présente affaire, le recours pour abus est sans fondement. M ne pouvait pas raisonnablement s'attendre à être traité comme un actionnaire : il ne l'était plus et il avait expressément demandé à ne plus être traité comme tel. On peut tout au plus reprocher à la société de ne pas avoir donné suite au vœu de M en omettant d'observer certaines formalités requises de sa part. Cependant, on ne saurait affirmer au vu de ces conclusions qu'elle a agi abusivement à l'égard de M ou qu'elle l'a dépouillé illégalement de sa qualité d'actionnaire. En fait, la société a omis de s'assurer de l'observation de toutes les formalités d'ordre juridique avant d'inscrire le transfert des actions à R. Les mesures de la société que M tient pour abusives ont en fait été prises, bien que de manière imparfaite, selon la volonté qu'il avait exprimée.

The fact that a corporation fails to comply with the requirements of the CBCA does not, on its own, constitute oppression. What may trigger the remedy is conduct that frustrates reasonable expectations, not simply conduct that is contrary to the CBCA. In the present case, the failure to observe the corporate formalities in removing M as a shareholder in accordance with his express wishes to be so removed cannot be characterized as an act unfairly prejudicial to the extent that this omission deprived him of his status as a shareholder. The corporation failed to observe the formalities of carrying out his wish not to be a shareholder. Nor can the failure to properly remove him as a shareholder in accordance with his express wishes make it just and equitable for him to regain his status as a shareholder.

Regarding the issue of whether the share transfer could have been retroactively cancelled, it is not possible to do so by way of simple oral consent. An issuance of shares can be cancelled only if (a) the corporation's articles are amended or (b) the corporation reaches an agreement to purchase the shares, which requires that the directors pass a resolution, that the shareholder in question gives his or her express consent and that the tests of solvency and liquidity be met. Meeting the requirements with respect to the maintenance of share capital cannot be optional, given that it is the share capital that is the common pledge of the creditors and is the basis for their acceptance of doing business with the corporation.

It is common ground that the shares that were transferred were not endorsed by M. Therefore it is true that the corporation proceeded to register a transfer that did not meet all of the criteria stated in the CBCA. Since this was an important formality required by law, it was to be observed on pain of nullity of the transfer. But there is no doubt about the fact that M knew that this formality was not complied with when the company proceeded to register the transfer in the corporate books, and that he was aware that he had not endorsed his share certificate when the shares were transferred to R as the trial judge found. As he was aware of the situation of which he now complains more than three years prior, his claim in that regard was and is still prescribed. Even if the transfer was subject to nullity, it did not mean that it was inexistent.

Finally, regarding the possibility of a conditional issuance of the shares, the condition at issue was a result of an agreement between M and R that the former would be a shareholder only if he guaranteed the corporation's debts. This agreement was reached by M and R; the corporation was not a party to this agreement. Accordingly, it does not attract the corporate formalities applicable to a conditional issuance of shares.

L'inobservation des formalités de la LCSA par une société ne constitue pas en soi de l'abus. Peut ouvrir droit au recours pour abus le comportement qui frustre l'attente raisonnable, mais pas celui qui est seulement contraire à la LCSA. En l'espèce, l'inobservation des formalités nécessaires au retrait de M à titre d'actionnaire, conformément à la volonté qu'il avait exprimée, ne saurait constituer un acte injustement préjudiciable à son égard en ce qu'elle le prive de sa qualité d'actionnaire. La société a omis d'observer les formalités requises pour donner suite à sa volonté de cesser d'être actionnaire. L'omission d'effectuer régulièrement son retrait à titre d'actionnaire, selon la volonté qu'il avait exprimée, ne saurait non plus rendre juste et équitable la réintégration de M au sein de l'actionnariat.

Quant à savoir si le transfert des actions aurait pu être annulé rétroactivement, une telle mesure n'aurait pu intervenir sur simple consentement verbal. Il ne peut y avoir annulation d'une émission d'actions que a) par modification des statuts de la société ou b) par achat de gré à gré des actions par la société, ce qui requiert une résolution des administrateurs, le consentement exprès de l'actionnaire en cause et le respect des critères de solvabilité et de liquidité. La conformité aux exigences relatives au maintien du capital-actions ne saurait être facultative puisque le capital-actions constitue le gage commun des créanciers en fonction duquel ces derniers acceptent de faire affaire avec la société.

Nul ne conteste que les actions transférées n'ont pas été endossées par M. La société a donc bel et bien inscrit un transfert qui ne respectait pas toutes les conditions prévues par la LCSA. S'agissant d'une formalité légale importante, son inobservation exposait l'opération à la nullité. Or, il ne fait aucun doute que M savait que cette formalité n'avait pas été accomplie lorsque la société a inscrit le transfert dans ses registres et que son certificat n'était pas endossé lors du transfert de ses actions à R, comme l'a conclu le juge de première instance. Puisque, plus de trois ans auparavant, il connaissait la situation qu'il déplore aujourd'hui, son recours était et demeure prescrit. Même s'il était susceptible d'annulation, le transfert existait tout de même.

Enfin, en ce qui concerne la possibilité que les actions aient été émises conditionnellement, la condition en cause résultait d'un accord entre M et R selon lequel le premier ne serait actionnaire que s'il se portait garant du passif de la société. L'accord est intervenu entre M et R, et la société n'y est pas partie. Il ne requérait donc pas l'observation des formalités liées à une émission conditionnelle d'actions.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Moldaver J.: It is not necessary to determine whether there was an effective transfer of M's shares to R. This appeal can be disposed of on the basis that M has failed to show a reasonable expectation that he would not be removed as a shareholder from the corporation's books given that he asked to be removed as a shareholder. This is confirmed by the fact that subsequently M ceased to conduct himself as an equity shareholder and advanced money as loans. The trial judge's finding of fact is supported by the evidence. Consequently, the trial judge did not err in denying M's oppression claim.

Per Côté J. (dissenting): Two key principles are deeply rooted in Canadian corporate law and cannot simply be disregarded or ignored: the principle that a corporation's legal personality is distinct from that of its shareholder or shareholders, and the principle or rule of the maintenance of capital. The formalities provided for in corporate legislation are imposed to give effect to these principles, and they are necessary to protect the corporation's patrimony, the common pledge of its creditors.

These principles cannot be variable. The principle that a corporation has a distinct legal personality and the maintenance of capital principle are just as important in the case of a small company as in that of a large one, if not more so. Although expectations may vary from one shareholder to another in the case of a closely held corporation, this does not diminish the importance of these principles. The same is true of the formalities provided for by law to ensure that they are adhered to.

It follows that the conclusion that shares were issued conditionally in this case or that the agreement between the two shareholders regarding M's shares was cancelled retroactively, simply by their consenting to its being cancelled, and that this cancellation had some effect on the corporation even though the necessary formalities were not observed, jeopardizes important pillars of Canadian corporate law.

Along the same lines, the fact that one shareholder claims he and his fellow shareholder entered into an agreement for the transfer of shares does not relieve the corporation of its legal duty to make the necessary inquiries before passing a resolution approving that transfer of shares and registering the transfer in its registers. The CBCA imposes some very strict requirements to be met before a transfer of shares is registered, including that the security be endorsed and that the transfer be rightful. The corporation's

La juge en chef McLachlin et le juge Moldaver : Point n'est besoin de décider s'il y a effectivement eu transfert des actions de M à R. On peut statuer sur le pourvoi à partir du fait que M n'a pas démontré qu'il pouvait raisonnablement s'attendre à ce que les registres de la société continuent de faire état de sa qualité d'actionnaire puisqu'il avait demandé à ne plus être actionnaire. Cela est d'ailleurs confirmé par le fait qu'il a cessé par la suite d'agir comme actionnaire participatif et a avancé des fonds sous forme de prêts. La conclusion de fait du juge de première instance trouve appui dans la preuve. Il n'a donc pas eu tort de rejeter le recours pour abus intenté par M.

La juge Côté (dissidente) : Deux grands principes sont profondément enracinés en droit canadien des sociétés par actions et ne peuvent simplement être écartés ou ignorés : il s'agit du principe de la personnalité juridique distincte de la société par rapport à celle de son ou ses actionnaires, et du principe ou de la règle du maintien du capital. Les formalités prévues par les lois relatives aux sociétés par actions sont imposées en raison de ces principes et elles sont nécessaires à la protection du patrimoine de la société, gage commun de ses créanciers.

Ces principes ne peuvent être à géométrie variable. Le principe de la personnalité juridique distincte de la société et celui du maintien du capital sont tout aussi importants — sinon plus — dans le cas d'une petite société que dans celui d'une grande. Bien que les attentes des actionnaires puissent varier de l'un à l'autre dans le cas d'une société par actions à capital fermé, l'importance de ces principes n'est pas pour autant diminuée. Il en va de même des formalités prévues par la loi pour faire respecter ces principes.

Il s'ensuit que la conclusion selon laquelle il y a eu en l'espèce émission conditionnelle d'actions ou encore celle selon laquelle il y a eu en l'espèce annulation rétroactive de l'entente entre les deux actionnaires quant aux actions de M sur simple consentement de ceux-ci et que cette annulation a eu quelque effet que ce soit sur la société, en dépit de l'absence du formalisme requis, mettent en péril des piliers importants du droit canadien des sociétés.

Dans le même sens, la prétention d'un actionnaire suivant laquelle une entente de transfert d'actions est intervenue entre lui et son coactionnaire ne libère pas la société en cause de son devoir légal de faire les vérifications requises avant d'entériner par résolution ce transfert d'actions et de l'inscrire dans ses registres. La LCSA soumet l'inscription d'un transfert d'actions à des conditions préalables très strictes, dont l'endossement du titre et le caractère régulier du transfert. L'omission de telles failure to make such inquiries in this case was in itself a form of oppression.

M did not, by expressing an intention to withdraw from the corporation as a shareholder, extinguish any reasonable expectations he may have had as regards his remaining on the company's books as a shareholder. To conclude the opposite would amount to saying that the mere expression of an intention to withdraw from a corporation as a shareholder would also extinguish the reasonable expectation that the corporation in question will act in accordance with the law and with its articles and by-laws and will make the necessary inquiries before depriving a person of his or her shareholder status, and would thereby defeat the oppression remedy. However, the CBCA itself does not limit access to the oppression remedy in such a manner and, what is more, shareholders are entitled to expect a corporation to act in accordance with its articles and by-laws and, more generally, with the law. These are, so to speak, presumed expectations.

The question of reasonable expectations is of greater relevance to the determination of a shareholder's rights that are not specifically provided for in the legislation and in the corporation's articles and by-laws. Where, as in this case, a corporation is alleged to have acted unlawfully, the focus of the analysis is not so much on the question of reasonable expectations as on that of whether the corporation's conduct was in fact unlawful and, therefore, oppressive. Mere irregularities that are not oppressive or unfairly prejudicial will not be sufficient to justify granting the remedy to the complainant. On the other hand, a failure to comply with a mandatory legislative provision or with the requirements set out in the corporation's articles and by-laws that relate to the very recognition of shareholder status may justify granting the oppression remedy.

In this case, several aspects of the corporation's conduct are problematic. The evidence shows that the share certificate in question was not endorsed. It also shows that the corporation made no inquiries before passing the resolution to transfer M's shares, and that the resolution was passed retroactively and was signed by a single shareholder (namely the majority shareholder). The corporation's conduct in this regard, which violated express provisions of the legislation and of its own articles and by-laws, was prejudicial to M: that conduct unlawfully stripped him of his status as a shareholder. It is difficult to imagine how a business corporation could act more oppressively toward a shareholder than by depriving him or her of that status.

En exprimant l'intention de se retirer de la société à titre d'actionnaire, M ne mettait fin à toutes attentes raisonnables qu'il pouvait avoir de demeurer dans les registres de la société en tant qu'actionnaire. Conclure le contraire revient à dire que la simple expression de l'intention de se retirer d'une société en tant qu'actionnaire mettrait également fin à l'attente raisonnable que la société en question agisse en conformité avec la loi et ses statuts et règlements et qu'elle procède aux vérifications requises avant de priver une personne de son statut d'actionnaire, faisant ainsi échec au recours pour abus. Or, la LCSA elle-même ne limite pas ainsi l'accès au recours pour abus et, de plus, les actionnaires sont en droit de s'attendre à ce que la société agisse en conformité avec ses statuts et règlements et, plus généralement, avec la loi. Il s'agit pour ainsi dire d'attentes présumées.

La question des attentes raisonnables a une plus grande pertinence lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer les droits d'un actionnaire au-delà de ce qui est spécifiquement prévu dans la loi et les statuts et règlements de la société. Lorsque l'illégalité de la conduite de la société est alléguée, comme c'est le cas en l'espèce, l'analyse ne porte pas tant sur la question des attentes raisonnables que sur celle visant à déterminer si la conduite de la société est effectivement illégale et, partant, abusive. De simples irrégularités, qui ne constituent pas pour autant un abus ou un acte injustement préjudiciable, ne seront pas suffisantes pour donner ouverture au recours du plaignant. À l'inverse, l'omission de se conformer à une disposition impérative de la loi ainsi qu'aux exigences prévues par les statuts et règlements de la société en ce qui concerne la reconnaissance même du statut d'actionnaire pourra donner ouverture au recours pour abus.

En l'espèce, plusieurs aspects de la conduite de la société posent problème. La preuve révèle que le certificat d'actions en cause n'a pas été endossé. Elle révèle également que la société n'a fait aucune vérification avant d'adopter la résolution de transfert des actions de M, et que c'est rétroactivement et avec la signature d'un seul actionnaire (c'est-à-dire l'actionnaire majoritaire) que la résolution a été adoptée. Cette conduite de la société, qui contrevient à des dispositions expresses de la loi, de ses statuts et de ses règlements, a été préjudiciable à M : elle l'a dépouillé illégalement de son statut d'actionnaire. Et il est difficile d'imaginer conduite plus abusive d'une société par actions à l'endroit d'un actionnaire que celle de le priver de ce statut.

The conduct of a corporation that approves a transfer of shares without making any inquiries and that confuses its interests with those of its majority shareholder, as if it were a mere puppet, is not less oppressive simply because another shareholder at some point expressed an intention to withdraw from the corporation without there being any agreement on the terms of such a withdrawal.

Furthermore, the trial judge did not find that the corporation's shareholders had agreed on a transfer of shares. The interpretation to the effect that he did so find denotes a fragmented reading of the trial judge's reasons and distorts his conclusions. The trial judge instead concluded that, given that M's shares had been issued on condition that he guarantee the corporation's debts, the intention he expressed of withdrawing from the corporation was sufficient for him to be stripped of his status as a shareholder. It is inaccurate to say that the trial judge's finding that the shares had been transferred was independent of their having been issued conditionally.

The parties characterized the agreement that was alleged to have been entered into by the corporation's shareholders in several different ways, at times as a conditional issuance of shares, at times as a retroactive cancellation and at times as a contract of sale or a contract of gift. This reflects a more fundamental problem, namely that, without some speculation, no intention in this regard can be found in the evidence. Indeed, the difficulty the courts below had in characterizing the alleged agreement resulted from the fact that there was no evidence of the juridical operation contemplated by the corporation's shareholders on May 25, 2005 that allegedly resulted in the transfer of M's shares.

Moreover, it is impossible to find, as a matter of law, that M transferred his shares on May 25, 2005. Whatever conclusion might be reached about the credibility of the witnesses in this regard, the intention expressed by M of withdrawing from the corporation had no effect on his rights as a shareholder. In this case, the intention expressed by M was at most an invitation to contract.

The analysis that is required in the circumstances cannot disregard the interplay between Quebec civil law and the CBCA. It is contrary to basic principles of Quebec civil law to argue that the intention expressed by M in this case resulted in an agreement of wills even though there was no agreement on the juridical operation being contemplated. To conclude that the expression of such an intention bars M's claim for oppression — thereby approving after the fact the transfer registered by the corporation in

Par ailleurs, le premier juge n'a pas conclu que les actionnaires de la société s'étaient entendus afin de procéder à un transfert d'actions. Cette interprétation dénote une lecture parcellaire du jugement de première instance et en dénature les conclusions. Le juge de première instance a plutôt conclu que l'intention exprimée par M de se retirer de la société, dans la mesure où ses actions avaient été émises conditionnellement à ce qu'il garantisse le passif de la société, était suffisante pour le dépouiller de son statut d'actionnaire. Il n'est pas exact en l'espèce d'affirmer que le juge de première instance a conclu à la cession des actions, indépendamment du caractère conditionnel de leur émission.

Les parties ont qualifié l'entente qui serait intervenue entre les actionnaires de la société de maintes façons, y voyant tantôt une émission conditionnelle, tantôt une annulation rétroactive, tantôt un contrat de vente ou de donation. Cela traduit un problème plus fondamental : le fait que, sauf conjecture, aucune intention à cet effet ne ressort de la preuve. En fait, la difficulté éprouvée par les juridictions inférieures à qualifier la prétendue entente résulte du fait que la preuve est muette sur l'opération juridique qui aurait été envisagée par les actionnaires de la société le 25 mai 2005 et qui aurait eu comme résultat le transfert de ses actions.

Il est d'ailleurs impossible de conclure en droit que M a transféré ses actions le 25 mai 2005. En effet, peu importe la conclusion quant à la crédibilité des témoins à cet égard, l'intention manifestée par M de se retirer de la société était sans effet sur ses droits en tant qu'actionnaire. En l'espèce, l'intention exprimée par M constituait tout au plus une invitation à contracter.

L'analyse qui s'impose dans les circonstances ne peut ignorer l'interaction du droit civil québécois avec la LCSA. Soutenir que l'intention exprimée par M en l'espèce donnait lieu à un accord de volontés, et ce, malgré l'absence d'entente quant à l'opération juridique projetée, va à l'encontre de principes élémentaires du droit civil québécois. Conclure que l'expression d'une telle intention constitue une fin de non-recevoir au recours pour abus de M — avalisant ainsi a posteriori le transfert its registers — is contrary to the law, to fairness and to common sense.

In addition to having no basis in law, the finding that M had expressed his intention of withdrawing as a shareholder and had transferred his shares in May 2005 is not supported by the evidence and is thus based on palpable and overriding errors. The trial judge erred in rejecting M's testimony in this regard, since he did so on the basis of an unreasonable interpretation of several pieces of evidence in the record. At most, the evidence shows that M expressed an intention to divest himself of his shares, but no agreement was reached on how he would dispose of them.

Finally, the prescription period applicable to a claim under s. 241 of the CBCA will depend on the basis for the claim. Where — as in this case — the complainant has been acknowledged to be a shareholder at some point and is claiming to have been unlawfully stripped of shareholder status by the corporation, the claim is therefore imprescriptible.

La conclusion suivant laquelle M aurait exprimé son intention de se retirer en tant qu'actionnaire et aurait transféré ses actions en mai 2005, en plus de n'avoir aucun fondement en droit, ne trouve aucune assise dans la preuve et repose donc sur des erreurs manifestes et dominantes. Lorsque le juge de première instance rejette le témoignage de M à cet égard, il commet une erreur puisqu'il le fait en s'appuyant sur une interprétation déraisonnable de plusieurs pièces versées au dossier. Tout au plus, la preuve démontre qu'une intention de se départir de ses actions a été exprimée par M, sans toutefois qu'il n'y ait eu d'entente quant à la façon dont il disposerait de ses actions.

Enfin, le délai de prescription applicable au recours exercé en application de l'art. 241 de la LCSA dépendra du fondement du recours. Lorsque le statut d'actionnaire a été à un moment reconnu au plaignant — comme c'est le cas en l'espèce —, et que celui-ci prétend que la société l'en a illégalement dépouillé, le recours est alors imprescriptible.

I. Introduction

[1] In this oppression proceeding under the Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-44 ("CBCA"), the underlying question is whether, as the appellant, Johnny Mennillo, alleges, the business or affairs of Intramodal inc. were carried on or conducted in a manner that was oppressive or unfairly prejudicial to or unfairly disregarded Mr. Mennillo's interests: s. 241(2) CBCA.

[2] The informal manner in which the parties dealt with each other and their lack of attention to proper documentation gave rise to some technical points of corporate law including how a share transfer can be properly registered and how a share

LE JUGE CROMWELL —

I. Introduction

[1] La question qui, aux fins du présent pourvoi, sous-tend le recours pour abus intenté sur le fondement de la Loi canadienne sur les sociétés par actions, L.R.C. 1985, c. C-44 (« LCSA »), est celle de savoir si, comme l'allègue l'appelant, Johnny Mennillo, Intramodal inc. a abusé des droits de ce dernier ou s'est montrée injuste à son égard en lui portant préjudice ou en ne tenant pas compte de ses intérêts, par la façon dont elle a conduit ses activités commerciales ou ses affaires internes (par. 241(2) de la LCSA).

[2] Le caractère informel des rapports entre les parties et le peu d'attention que ces dernières ont porté à l'établissement des documents requis soulèvent certains points techniques du droit des sociétés, notamment en ce qui concerne la manière dont transfer may be cancelled. However, the answer to the fundamental question of whether Mr. Mennillo was oppressed in the corporate law sense turns on which of two sharply different versions of the facts — one supported by Mr. Mennillo and the other by Intramodal's controlling shareholder, Mario Rosati — ought to be accepted.

[3] Mr. Mennillo claims that he was oppressed because he was an investor in Intramodal who was frozen out of equity participation by Mr. Rosati. Intramodal denies this and says that Mr. Mennillo, far from having been frozen out of the corporation, wanted to be removed as a director and shareholder and transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati.

[4] The trial judge completely rejected Mr. Mennillo's version of events and substantially accepted Intramodal's. The judge found that Mr. Mennillo agreed that he would remain a shareholder only so long as he was willing to guarantee the corporation's debts. He ultimately decided that he did not wish to do so and transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati. The failure to observe the formalities necessary to complete the transfer of the shares, the judge found, resulted from an error or oversight on the part of Mr. Rosati's lawyer.

[5] If the trial judge's findings of fact are accepted, as in my view they ought to be, Mr. Mennillo's oppression claim is groundless. The critical finding is that Mr. Mennillo did not wish to remain a shareholder and told Mr. Rosati to have him removed as such. On those findings, all the corporation can be accused of is sloppy paperwork. But sloppy paperwork on its own does not constitute oppression. Neither does the corporation and its controlling shareholder treating Mr. Mennillo exactly as he wanted to be treated. While some errors were made in the courts below on some points of corporate law, Mr. Mennillo's oppression claim was properly dismissed and I would dismiss his appeal.

un transfert d'actions peut être inscrit régulièrement ou annulé. Toutefois, la question fondamentale de savoir si M. Mennillo a fait l'objet d'un abus au sens du droit des sociétés dépend de la version des faits que l'on retient entre les deux, nettement différentes, offertes par M. Mennillo et Mario Rosati, l'actionnaire contrôlant d'Intramodal.

[4] Le juge de première instance rejette en bloc la version des faits de M. Mennillo et retient essentiellement celle d'Intramodal. À son avis, M. Mennillo a convenu qu'il ne demeurerait actionnaire que tant qu'il serait disposé à garantir le passif de la société. Finalement, M. Mennillo y a renoncé et a transféré ses actions à M. Rosati. De l'avis du juge, ce serait une erreur ou un oubli de la part de l'avocat de M. Rosati qui expliquerait l'inobservation des formalités nécessaires pour mener à bien le transfert des actions.

[5] Si les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance sont justes, comme j'estime qu'elles le sont, le recours pour abus de M. Mennillo est sans fondement. Selon la conclusion cruciale, M. Mennillo n'a pas souhaité demeurer actionnaire et a demandé à M. Rosati de faire en sorte qu'il ne le soit plus. Partant, la seule chose que l'on peut reprocher à la société est de ne pas avoir observé les formalités. Or, cette inobservation ne saurait en soi constituer de l'abus. La façon dont la société et son actionnaire contrôlant ont considéré M. Mennillo, c'est-à-dire exactement comme il le voulait, ne saurait non plus constituer de l'abus. Bien que les juridictions inférieures aient commis des erreurs sur des points touchant au droit des sociétés, j'estime que l'allégation d'abus a été rejetée à raison et je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

II. Overview of the Legal Context, Parties' Positions and Issues

A. Legal Context

[6] To understand the facts and issues, it is important to understand the legal framework in which they must be considered.

[7] All of the relief requested by Mr. Mennillo is based solely on his claim of oppression under s. 241 of the CBCA. Other claims that he might have made, but did not make, are irrelevant to this appeal and cannot be considered. That section provides:

241 (1) A complainant may apply to a court for an order under this section.

(2) If, on an application under subsection (1), the court is satisfied that in respect of a corporation or any of its affiliates

(a) any act or omission of the corporation or any of its affiliates effects a result,

(b) the business or affairs of the corporation or any of its affiliates are or have been carried on or conducted in a manner, or

that is oppressive or unfairly prejudicial to or that unfairly disregards the interests of any security holder, creditor, director or officer, the court may make an order to rectify the matters complained of.

[8] The Court set out the nature and constituent elements of an oppression claim in BCE Inc. v. 1976 Debentureholders, 2008 SCC 69, [2008] 3 S.C.R. 560, at paras. 53-94. The oppression remedy is inspired by the principles of equity: it gives courts a

II. Aperçu du contexte juridique, des thèses des parties et des questions en litige

A. Contexte juridique

[6] Pour bien comprendre les faits et les questions en litige, il importe de préciser le contexte juridique dans lequel ils doivent être examinés.

[7] Le redressement demandé par M. Mennillo prend entièrement appui sur son allégation d'abus formulée en application de l'art. 241 de la LCSA. Les autres allégations qu'il aurait pu formuler, mais qu'il n'a pas formulées, sont sans pertinence et ne peuvent être prises en compte. Voici le texte de cette disposition :

241 (1) Tout plaignant peut demander au tribunal de rendre les ordonnances visées au présent article.

(2) Le tribunal saisi d'une demande visée au paragraphe (1) peut, par ordonnance, redresser la situation provoquée par la société ou l'une des personnes morales de son groupe qui, à son avis, abuse des droits des détenteurs de valeurs mobilières, créanciers, administrateurs ou dirigeants, ou, se montre injuste à leur égard en leur portant préjudice ou en ne tenant pas compte de leurs intérêts :

a) soit en raison de son comportement;

b) soit par la façon dont elle conduit ses activités commerciales ou ses affaires internes;

c) soit par la façon dont ses administrateurs exercent ou ont exercé leurs pouvoirs.

[8] Dans l'arrêt BCE Inc. c. Détenteurs de débentures de 1976, 2008 CSC 69, [2008] 3 R.C.S. 560, par. 53-94, la Cour fait état de la nature de l'allégation d'abus et de ses composantes. Le recours pour abus s'inspire des principes d'equity : le tribunal se broad jurisdiction to enforce "not just what is legal but what is fair" (para. 58; see also Premier Tech ltée v. Dollo, 2015 QCCA 1159, leave to appeal refused, 2016 CanLII 21792 (S.C.C.)). Whether there has been oppression is judged according to "business realities" not "narrow legalities": BCE, at para. 58. Furthermore, "[w]hat is just and equitable is judged by the reasonable expectations of the stakeholders in the context and in regard to the relationships at play": para. 59.

[9] There are two elements of an oppression claim. The claimant must first "identify the expectations that he or she claims have been violated . . . and establish that the expectations were reasonably held": BCE, at para. 70. Then the claimant must show that those reasonable expectations were violated by conduct falling within the statutory terms, that is, conduct that was oppressive, unfairly prejudicial to or unfairly disregarding of the interests of any security holder: para. 68; s. 241(2) CBCA.

[10] According to the trial judge's findings of fact, Mr. Mennillo agreed that he would remain a shareholder of the corporation on the condition that he guarantee its debts. He decided that he no longer wished to guarantee those debts and transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati. He could, therefore, have no reasonable expectation of being treated as a shareholder thereafter. He also could be thought to reasonably expect the corporation to ensure that the corporate formalities to register this arrangement would be observed. But the failure to do so (i.e. the conduct that "violated" those expectations) cannot be characterized as "oppressive, unfairly prejudicial or unfairly disregarding" of his interests. This was a two-person, private company in which the dealings between the parties were marked by extreme informality. As this Court said in BCE, "[c]ourts may accord more latitude to the directors of a small, closely held corporation to deviate from strict formalities than to the directors of a larger public company": para. 74. In substance, Mr. Mennillo was not oppressed but treated as he wanted the corporation to treat him. The failure of the company's lawyer to voit conférer le vaste pouvoir d'imposer « le respect non seulement du droit, mais [aussi] de l'équité » (par. 58; voir aussi Premier Tech ltée c. Dollo, 2015 QCCA 1159, autorisation de pourvoi refusée (2016 CanLII 21792 (C.S.C.)). L'existence d'un abus tient à la « réalité commerciale », pas seulement aux « considérations strictement juridiques » (BCE, par. 58). En outre, le tribunal détermine ce qui est juste et équitable « selon les attentes raisonnables des parties intéressées en tenant compte du contexte et des rapports en jeu » (par. 59).

[9] Deux choses incombent à celui qui allègue l'abus. D'abord, il doit « préciser quelles attentes ont censément été frustrées [. . .] et en établir le caractère raisonnable » (BCE, par. 70). Ensuite, il doit démontrer que ces attentes raisonnables ont été frustrées par un comportement visé par le libellé de la loi, à savoir le fait d'abuser des droits d'un détenteur de valeurs mobilières ou de se montrer injuste à son égard en lui portant préjudice ou en ne tenant pas compte de ses intérêts (par. 68; par. 241(2) de la LCSA).

[10] Suivant les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance, M. Mennillo avait convenu qu'il demeurerait actionnaire de la société à la condition d'en garantir le passif. Il avait ensuite fait savoir qu'il ne souhaitait plus être garant de ce passif et il avait cédé ses actions à M. Rosati. Il ne pouvait donc pas raisonnablement s'attendre à être considéré comme un actionnaire par la suite. Il était par contre concevable qu'il s'attende raisonnablement à ce que la société s'assure de l'observation des formalités alors requises pour inscrire l'accord. Mais l'omission de la société de s'en assurer (soit le comportement par lequel elle a « frustré » les attentes de l'intéressé) ne saurait être assimilée au fait d'abuser des droits de M. Mennillo ou de se montrer injuste à son égard en lui portant préjudice ou en ne tenant pas compte de ses intérêts. La société en cause était une société fermée constituée de deux personnes dont les rapports entre elles se caractérisaient par une absence totale de formalisme. Comme le dit la Cour dans BCE, « [i]l est possible que les tribunaux accordent une plus grande latitude pour déroger à des formalités strictes aux administrateurs d'une comply with the corporate law requirements to give effect to that intention is not oppression.

[11] Contrary to what my colleague Justice Côté concludes, the fact that a corporation fails to comply with the requirements of the CBCA does not, on its own, constitute oppression: paras. 166 and 195. The oppression remedy is a discretionary one that is equitable in nature: D. S. Morritt, S. L. Bjorkquist and A. D. Coleman, The Oppression Remedy (loose-leaf), at p. 5-10.4; D. H. Peterson and M. J. Cumming, Shareholder Remedies in Canada (2nd ed. (loose-leaf)), at p. 17-14. What may trigger the remedy is conduct that frustrates reasonable expectations, not simply conduct that is contrary to the CBCA. As I see it, my colleague's approach not only represents a significant departure from our jurisprudence, but as applied here permits Mr. Mennillo to use oppression proceedings as an instrument of oppression rather than as a remedy for it.

B. Parties' Positions

[12] Mr. Mennillo submits that he was unlawfully removed from the list of shareholders of the corporation through an amended declaration filed with the Registraire des entreprises of Quebec ("REQ") on July 18, 2005. He also argues that as a shareholder, he had the right to access the corporate records of the company during the usual business hours, a right which was denied to him until the fourth day of the trial in the Superior Court. Simply put, his oppression claim is that he is a shareholder and investor who was frozen out of the corporation.

[13] For its part, Intramodal says that Mr. Mennillo resigned as a director, asked not to be a shareholder and transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati. His advances of funds were fully repaid with a healthy bonus. Putting the corporation's position in its simplest terms, Mr. Mennillo did not want to be an equity shareholder and, as we shall see, he is no longer one.

petite société fermée qu'à ceux d'une société ouverte de plus grande taille » (par. 74). En somme, M. Mennillo n'a pas été victime d'abus, mais a été traité par la société comme il l'avait souhaité. Le fait que l'avocat de celle-ci n'a pas observé les formalités du droit des sociétés pour donner effet à cette volonté ne constitue pas de l'abus.

[11] Contrairement à ce que conclut ma collègue la juge Côté, l'inobservation des formalités de la LCSA par une société ne constitue pas en soi de l'abus (par. 166 et 195). Le recours pour abus est de nature discrétionnaire et a pour assise l'equity (D. S. Morritt, S. L. Bjorkquist et A. D. Coleman, The Oppression Remedy (feuilles mobiles), p. 5-10.4; D. H. Peterson et M. J. Cumming, Shareholder Remedies in Canada (2e éd. (feuilles mobiles)), p. 17-14). Peut ouvrir droit au recours le comportement qui frustre l'attente raisonnable, mais pas celui qui est seulement contraire à la LCSA. J'estime que non seulement l'approche de ma collègue rompt sensiblement avec la jurisprudence de la Cour, mais aussi que, en l'espèce, elle permet à M. Mennillo de faire du recours pour abus un instrument d'abus plutôt que de redressement.

B. Thèses des parties

[12] M. Mennillo soutient qu'Intramodal a illégalement rayé son nom de la liste des actionnaires dans une déclaration modificative déposée auprès du Registraire des entreprises du Québec (« REQ ») le 18 juillet 2005. Il prétend par ailleurs que, en tant qu'actionnaire, il avait le droit de consulter les registres de la société pendant les heures normales de bureau, mais qu'on lui a refusé l'exercice de ce droit jusqu'au quatrième jour du procès en Cour supérieure. Autrement dit, il s'agirait d'un actionnaire et investisseur qu'on aurait évincé de la société.

[13] Intramodal rétorque que M. Mennillo a démissionné de son poste d'administrateur, qu'il a demandé à ne plus être actionnaire et qu'il a cédé ses actions à M. Rosati. Il y a eu remboursement intégral des sommes avancées par M. Mennillo et versement d'une prime généreuse à ce dernier. L'entreprise soutient en somme que M. Mennillo ne voulait pas être un actionnaire participatif et, comme nous le verrons, qu'il ne l'est plus.

C. Issues

[14] Putting aside questions of prescription and remedy, Mr. Mennillo raises two legal points and one factual point on appeal.

[15] In relation to the law, he maintains:

(a) The trial judge erred in finding that he had transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati when no such transfer was validly effected in law (2012 QCCS 1640); and

(b) The majority of the Court of Appeal erred in concluding that a share subscription could be retroactively cancelled by simple verbal agreement and without complying with the required legal formalities (2014 QCCA 1515).

[16] In relation to the facts, Mr. Mennillo relies on the conclusions of the dissenting judge in the Court of Appeal and says that the trial judge erred in rejecting his claim that he is a shareholder of the corporation.

[17] I agree with Mr. Mennillo in relation to the second legal point relating to corporate law. However, this point has no impact on the result of the oppression proceedings. The trial judge found that in May 2005, Mr. Mennillo did not want to remain a shareholder because he no longer wanted to be guarantor of all Intramodal's debts. Some corporate formalities of the transfer of shares from Mr. Mennillo to Mr. Rosati were not completed as a result of an error or oversight on the part of Mr. Rosati's lawyer. From that date, Mr. Mennillo agreed to be simply a lender to his friend Mr. Rosati. As of May 25, 2005, Mr. Mennillo ceased to be a shareholder in the corporation. That is exactly how the corporation treated him. In my view, the dissenting justice in the Court of Appeal was wrong to overturn these findings of fact. There was, to be sure, some very sloppy paperwork. But in light of the key findings of fact, the corporation in substance simply treated Mr. Mennillo as he wanted to be treated and he was repaid all of the money he had loaned with a substantial bonus.

C. Questions en litige

[14] M. Mennillo soulève en appel deux points de droit et un point de fait sur lesquels je me penche sans égard aux questions de prescription et de redressement.

[15] S'agissant du droit, il fait valoir ce qui suit :

a) Le juge de première instance conclut à tort qu'il a cédé ses actions à M. Rosati alors qu'aucun transfert valable en droit n'a été effectué (2012 QCCS 1640);

b) Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont tort de conclure qu'il est possible d'annuler rétroactivement une souscription d'actions par simple entente verbale, sans accomplir les formalités juridiques requises (2014 QCCA 1515).

[16] S'agissant des faits, M. Mennillo invoque les conclusions du juge dissident de la Cour d'appel et soutient que le juge de première instance rejette à tort sa prétention selon laquelle il est actionnaire de l'entreprise.

[17] Je donne raison à M. Mennillo quant au deuxième point qui touche au droit des sociétés, mais cela n'a aucune incidence sur l'issue du recours pour abus. Le juge de première instance conclut que, en mai 2005, M. Mennillo ne souhaitait plus être actionnaire, car il ne voulait plus être garant de la totalité du passif d'Intramodal. Certaines des formalités nécessaires au transfert des actions de M. Mennillo à M. Rosati n'ont pas été accomplies à cause d'une erreur ou d'un oubli de la part de l'avocat de M. Rosati. Dès ce moment, M. Mennillo a consenti à n'être qu'un simple prêteur vis-à-vis de son ami, M. Rosati. Le 25 mai 2005, M. Mennillo a cessé d'être actionnaire de la société et c'est exactement ainsi que la société l'a traité. À mon avis, le juge dissident de la Cour d'appel a tort d'infirmer ces conclusions de fait. Il y a certes eu un grand manque de formalisme, mais à la lumière de ces conclusions de fait cruciales, la société a pour l'essentiel simplement traité M. Mennillo comme il avait souhaité l'être et ce dernier a été remboursé de toutes les sommes prêtées en plus de toucher une prime substantielle.

III. Analysis

A. The Factual Issue

(1) Preliminary Observations

[18] The main question on which the outcome of the appeal depends is whether the trial judge made a reviewable error in finding that in May 2005, Mr. Mennillo did not wish to remain a shareholder because he no longer wanted to be the guarantor of all of Intramodal's debts and transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati. If these factual findings stand, Mr. Mennillo's oppression action is groundless: it was not oppressive, unfairly prejudicial to, or unfairly disregarding of his interests for the corporation to treat Mr. Mennillo as he himself asked to be treated. I recall that, as the Court said in BCE, in considering a claim in oppression, the courts should look at business realities not merely narrow legalities: para. 58.

[19] The appeal also raises some points of corporate law and of the law of prescription. These legal points, however, have no bearing on the ultimate disposition of the appeal. I will briefly address them after I set out my reasons for affirming the trial judge's fundamental conclusions.

(2) Overview of the Basic Facts

[20] In the winter of 2004, Messrs. Johnny Mennillo and Mario Rosati, two friends, discussed the possibility of creating a company. Mr. Mennillo would contribute the money to start up the business while Mr. Rosati would bring skills to ensure the success of a road transportation company. Mr. Rosati reserved the name "Intramodal" in April 2004.

[21] Mr. Rosati had the company incorporated on July 13, 2004. That same day, Intramodal's board of directors passed a resolution to accept notices of subscription to securities by Mr. Rosati and Mr. Mennillo and to issue 51 class "A" shares to Mr. Rosati and 49 shares of the same class to Mr. Mennillo. Both the

III. Analyse

A. Le litige factuel

(1) Remarques préliminaires

[18] L'objet principal du pourvoi est de savoir si le juge de première instance commet une erreur susceptible de contrôle lorsqu'il conclut que, en mai 2005, M. Mennillo ne souhaitait plus être actionnaire, car il ne voulait plus être garant de la totalité du passif d'Intramodal, de sorte qu'il a cédé ses actions à M. Rosati. Si ces conclusions de fait demeurent, le recours pour abus exercé par M. Mennillo est sans fondement : la société n'a pas abusé des droits de M. Mennillo et elle ne s'est pas montrée injuste à son égard en lui portant préjudice ou en ne tenant pas compte de ses intérêts puisqu'elle l'a traité comme il l'avait demandé. Rappelons que, comme le dit la Cour dans BCE, le tribunal saisi d'une allégation d'abus doit tenir compte de la réalité commerciale et pas seulement des considérations strictement juridiques (par. 58).

(2) Aperçu des faits essentiels

[20] À l'hiver 2004, deux amis, MM. Mennillo et Rosati, ont envisagé la création d'une entreprise. M. Mennillo devait avancer les fonds de démarrage et M. Rosati, mettre ses compétences à contribution pour assurer la réussite d'une société de transport routier. En avril 2004, M. Rosati a réservé la dénomination « Intramodal ».

[21] Le 13 juillet 2004, M. Rosati constituait Intramodal en personne morale. Le même jour, le conseil d'administration d'Intramodal adoptait une résolution par laquelle les avis de souscription d'actions de MM. Rosati et Mennillo étaient acceptés et 51 actions de catégorie « A » étaient émises à M. Rosati, notices of subscription and the resolution were signed by Mr. Rosati alone.

[22] It is worth mentioning at this point that many of the legal difficulties in this case have arisen as a result of the virtually complete lack of formality that accompanied the parties' business dealings. They rarely complied with the requirements of the CBCA and in fact almost never put anything in writing. They had neither a partnership nor a shareholders' agreement. They rarely or never exchanged emails or letters. Before Intramodal was incorporated, the roles that Messrs. Mennillo and Rosati respectively intended to fulfill in the company were agreed upon by a simple handshake. Once Intramodal was incorporated (on July 13, 2004), they became its directors and shareholders, but neither of them paid for their shares, contrary to the requirements of s. 25(3) CBCA and Mr. Mennillo's share certificate was never signed as required by s. 49(4)(a) CBCA.

[23] There was no written contract or indeed any other legal formality relating to Mr. Mennillo's advances of substantial amounts of money to Mr. Rosati. As evidence of the money provided for Intramodal by Mr. Mennillo, there are only two sheets of a Rolodex, marked up by Mr. Mennillo and initialed by Mr. Rosati.

[24] On May 25, 2005, Mr. Mennillo sent a letter to Intramodal in which he indicated that he was resigning as an officer and director of the company. He and Mr. Rosati give different accounts as to the reasons for and extent of his resignation. Whereas Intramodal argues that Mr. Mennillo transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati, Mr. Mennillo asserts that he never intended to stop being a shareholder of the company. On July 18, 2005, Daniel Ovadia, Intramodal's lawyer, filed an amending declaration with the REQ to indicate that Mr. Mennillo had been removed as a director and shareholder of the company.

[25] Between September 2005 and December 5, 2005, Mr. Mennillo advanced $145,000 to 49 à M. Mennillo. Tant les avis de souscription que la résolution n'ont été signés que par M. Rosati.

[23] Les avances de fonds substantielles de M. Mennillo à M. Rosati n'ont été constatées par aucun contrat écrit et n'ont d'ailleurs fait l'objet d'aucune autre formalité juridique. La preuve des sommes ainsi versées à Intramodal se résume à deux fiches de Rolodex annotées par M. Mennillo et paraphées par M. Rosati.

[25] Du mois de septembre 2005 au 5 décembre de la même année, M. Mennillo a avancé 145 000 $

Mr. Rosati. Intramodal began operating in December 2005, and Mr. Mennillo continued to advance money to Mr. Rosati. The amounts he advanced totalled $440,000, which included the $145,000 that had been paid in 2005. The two men met on two occasions in July 2007, and they do not agree about what took place at those meetings.

[26] According to Mr. Mennillo, he was with Mr. Rosati and another friend at the Rib'N Reef restaurant on July 14, 2007 when he noted that Intramodal was thriving and Mr. Rosati was now living very well. Upset about this, Mr. Mennillo complained that he was not sharing in the company's success. At a second meeting, on July 21, 2007, Mr. Mennillo asked that the amounts of his loans be repaid and that he receive his share of the profits generated by Intramodal. He rejected at that time an offer to transfer his shares to Mr. Rosati.

[27] According to Mr. Rosati, following the July 14 meeting, Mr. Mennillo was quite unhappy about having received no return on his $440,000 investment that had resulted in the start-up of a lucrative business. Mr. Rosati suggested that they meet a week later to resolve their differences. At that meeting, Mr. Rosati asked Mr. Mennillo what amount might satisfy him in order to put an end to their dispute. Mr. Mennillo fixed the amount at $150,000, which meant that the total debt amounted to $690,000, including interest at the annual rate of 10 percent and a bonus of $100,000.

[28] In October 2007, Mr. Rosati and Mr. Mennillo met several times together with Antoine Papadimitriou, Mr. Mennillo's accountant. According to Mr. Mennillo, the purpose of these meetings was to fix a price for the redemption of his shares. He claimed that it was at these meetings that his advisers had suggested that his advances ($440,000) be repaid using false invoices. Mr. Papadimitriou had also suggested that the $440,000 principal amount be increased by approximately 35 percent because the tax owing on it would be paid by Mr. Mennillo's management company, 147488 Canada Inc. This would raise the amount of the repayment to $690,000.

à M. Rosati. Les activités d'Intramodal ont débuté en décembre 2005, et M. Mennillo a continué de verser des sommes à M. Rosati. Au total, il aura avancé 440 000 $, ce qui comprend les 145 000 $ déjà versés en 2005. En juillet 2007, les deux hommes se sont rencontrés deux fois, mais conservent chacun un souvenir différent de ces rencontres.

[26] Selon la version de M. Mennillo, c'est lors d'un repas avec M. Rosati et un autre ami, le 14 juillet 2007, au restaurant Rib'N Reef, qu'il aurait constaté qu'Intramodal était devenue prospère et que M. Rosati menait un grand train de vie. Contrarié par la situation, il se serait plaint de ne bénéficier aucunement de la réussite de l'entreprise. Lors de la seconde rencontre, le 21 juillet 2007, il aurait demandé le remboursement des sommes prêtées et le versement de sa part des profits d'Intramodal. Il aurait alors rejeté l'offre de transférer ses actions à M. Rosati.

[27] Selon la version de M. Rosati, après la rencontre du 14 juillet, M. Mennillo se serait montré assez mécontent de l'absence de rendement de son investissement de 440 000 $, qui avait permis le démarrage d'une entreprise lucrative. M. Rosati aurait proposé une rencontre une semaine plus tard pour régler le différend puis, lors de cette rencontre, il aurait demandé à M. Mennillo de lui indiquer quel montant pourrait le satisfaire et mettre fin à la mésentente. M. Mennillo aurait alors fixé ce montant à 150 000 $ de sorte que la créance totale s'élève à 690 000 $, y compris l'intérêt au taux annuel de 10 p. 100 et une prime de 100 000 $.

[28] En octobre 2007, de nombreuses rencontres ont eu lieu entre MM. Rosati et Mennillo et le comptable de ce dernier, Antoine Papadimitriou. Selon M. Mennillo, ces rencontres avaient pour but de fixer le prix de rachat de ses actions. Il prétend que c'est à l'occasion de ces rencontres que ses conseillers lui ont proposé d'obtenir le remboursement de ses avances (440 000 $) au moyen de fausses factures. M. Papadimitriou aurait en outre proposé de majorer d'environ 35 p. 100 le capital de 440 000 $ puisque cette somme serait imposée entre les mains de la société de gestion de M. Mennillo, 147488 Canada inc. Suivant ce scénario, le montant du remboursement se serait élevé à 690 000 $.

[29] As for Mr. Rosati, he claims to have attended these meetings alone. He also claims that the purpose of the negotiations was instead to increase the amount of the repayment that had previously been agreed upon in July 2007. He maintains that Paolo Carzoli, a tax specialist, suggested that, to enable Mr. Mennillo to claim the capital gains exemption, the company's books be corrected such that Mr. Mennillo would receive 49 common shares, which he would then sell to Mr. Rosati. Mr. Rosati rejected this.

[30] The money Mr. Mennillo had advanced to Mr. Rosati was repaid in its entirety between July 2006 and December 7, 2009. This was done by means of cheques issued by Intramodal for the payment of false invoices issued by 147488 Canada Inc. for "consultation fees" or "management fees". The total amount paid by Intramodal to Mr. Mennillo's management company was $690,000.

[31] On December 7, 2009, at a meeting in a restaurant, Mr. Rosati gave Mr. Mennillo a cheque for $40,000 marked "Full and Final Payment". A few days later, Mr. Mennillo consulted his lawyer, Israel Kaufman, about this note. According to Mr. Mennillo, that was when he first understood that he was no longer a shareholder of Intramodal.

[32] On February 25, 2010, Mr. Kaufman sent Intramodal a demand letter. Claiming that Intramodal and Mr. Rosati had unduly and wrongfully stripped him of his status as a shareholder, Mr. Mennillo applied for an oppression remedy against Intramodal on September 7, 2010.

(3) Findings of Fact at First Instance

[33] Poirier J. began by stating that the case before him essentially turned on the credibility of the witnesses. He then rejected Mr. Mennillo's version of the facts in its entirety. He concluded that as of May 25, 2005, Mr. Mennillo

[29] M. Rosati dit pour sa part s'être présenté seul à ces rencontres et que les négociations visaient plutôt à augmenter le montant du remboursement déjà convenu en juillet 2007. Afin que M. Mennillo puisse profiter de la déduction pour gains en capital, un avocat fiscaliste, Me Paolo Carzoli, lui aurait conseillé de rectifier les registres de la société de façon qu'il reçoive 49 actions ordinaires et les vende à M. Rosati, ce que ce dernier aurait refusé.

[30] Les avances de fonds de M. Mennillo à M. Rosati ont été entièrement remboursées entre le mois de juillet 2006 et le 7 décembre 2009. Le remboursement s'est fait par chèques d'Intramodal sur présentation de fausses factures établies par 147488 Canada inc. pour des « consultations » (« consultations fees ») ou de la « gestion » (« management fees »). La somme totale versée par Intramodal à la société de gestion de M. Mennillo se monte à 690 000 $.

[31] Le 7 décembre 2009, lors d'une rencontre dans un restaurant, M. Rosati a remis à M. Mennillo un chèque de 40 000 $ portant la mention « Full and Final Payment » (règlement total et définitif). Quelques jours plus tard, M. Mennillo a consulté son avocat, Me Israel Kaufman, au sujet de cette mention. C'est alors qu'il aurait compris qu'il n'était plus actionnaire d'Intramodal.

[32] Le 25 février 2010, Me Kaufman a fait parvenir une mise en demeure à Intramodal. Le 7 septembre 2010, M. Mennillo a intenté contre Intramodal un recours pour abus dans le cadre duquel il alléguait qu'Intramodal et M. Rosati l'avaient dépouillé indûment et illégalement de sa qualité d'actionnaire.

(3) Conclusions de fait tirées en première instance

[33] Le juge Poirier affirme d'abord que l'issue de l'affaire dont il est saisi repose essentiellement sur la crédibilité des témoins, puis il rejette en bloc la version de M. Mennillo. Il conclut que, à compter du 25 mai 2005, M. Mennillo

[TRANSLATION] refused to participate in this venture [that is, to be an equity shareholder in Intramodal] and asked to be removed from the company as a shareholder and a director effective May 25, 2005. As of that date, Mennillo agreed only to be a lender of $440,000 to his friend Rosati. The failure to complete the transfer of Mennillo's shares to Rosati resulted from an error or oversight on the part of Rosati's lawyer.

Since May 25, 2005, Mennillo has no longer been a shareholder or director of Intramodal. [paras. 74-75 (CanLII)]

[34] It is clear from a careful reading of the trial judge's reasons that he understood that Mr. Mennillo would cease to be a shareholder as a result of transferring his shares to Mr. Rosati. In the judge's view, Mr. Mennillo had more than a mere intention of being removed from the company; he found that Mr. Mennillo transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati and ceased to hold any shares in Intramodal. There was a basis for this conclusion in the evidence notwithstanding that the evidence was admittedly confused and confusing. However, the critical finding for the purposes of the substance of the oppression claim was that as of May 25, 2005, Mr. Mennillo did not wish to be a shareholder and asked to be removed. On that point, Mr. Rosati's evidence was unshaken and accepted by the trial judge.

[35] The judge's conclusions and his rejection of Mr. Menillo's version of events were based on the following findings of fact:

(i) The reason given by Mr. Mennillo for his resignation as a director of Intramodal (i.e. that Mr. Rosati didn't want a potential client, namely Labatt Breweries ("Labatt"), to know that Mr. Mennillo was involved in the corporation) was false.

(ii) The funds advanced by Mr. Mennillo, starting before Intramodal had been incorporated, were loans and were not advanced as investments in the corporation.

(iii) The figure 250,000 appearing on the "Rolodex record", which also showed all the amounts a refusé cette aventure [soit le fait d'être actionnaire participatif d'Intramodal] et a demandé son retrait de la compagnie à titre d'actionnaire et d'administrateur à compter du 25 mai 2005. À compter de cette date, [M.] Mennillo a accepté de n'être que le prêteur d'une somme de 440 000 $ à son ami [M.] Rosati. Le fait que la cession des actions de [M.] Mennillo à [M.] Rosati n'ait pas été complétée résulte de l'erreur ou l'oubli de la part de l'avocat de [M.] Rosati.

Depuis le 25 mai 2005, [M.] Mennillo n'est plus détenteur d'aucune action ni administrateur de Intramodal. [par. 74-75 (CanLII)]

[34] Il ressort de la lecture attentive de ses motifs que, pour le juge, M. Mennillo cessait d'être actionnaire dès le transfert de ses actions à M. Rosati. À son avis, M. Mennillo n'a pas seulement eu l'intention de se retirer de la société, mais a cédé ses actions à M. Rosati et cessé d'être actionnaire d'Intramodal. Cette conclusion a une assise dans la preuve même si, de l'avis de tous, cette dernière est confuse et source de confusion. Toutefois, selon la conclusion cruciale sur le bien-fondé de l'allégation d'abus, en date du 25 mai 2005, M. Mennillo ne souhaitait plus être actionnaire et a demandé son retrait. Sur ce point, le témoignage de M. Rosati demeure constant, et le juge y ajoute foi.

[35] Les conclusions du juge et le rejet par ce dernier de la version de M. Mennillo reposent sur le constat des faits suivants :

(i) Le motif invoqué par M. Mennillo pour démissionner à titre d'administrateur d'Intramodal (à savoir que M. Rosati ne voulait pas que La Brasserie Labatt (« Labatt »), un client éventuel, sache que M. Mennillo avait des intérêts dans la société) était faux.

(ii) Les sommes avancées par M. Mennillo avant la constitution en société d'Intramodal étaient des prêts, non des investissements dans la société.

(iii) Le montant de 250 000 $ qui figure sur le Rolodex, lequel fait état de toutes les sommes advanced by Mr. Mennillo, corresponded to the amount that Mr. Mennillo and Mr. Rosati had agreed on in July 2007 and that had served to establish the amount of the final payment ($440,000 + $250,000 = $690,000).

(iv) Two documents relating to an insurance policy taken out on the lives of Mr. Mennillo and Mr. Rosati, the beneficiary of which was Intramodal, proved, first, that Mr. Rosati believed as of August 15, 2006 that he was the sole shareholder and director of Intramodal and, second, that Mr. Mennillo was only a creditor of the company.

(v) In a letter from Mr. Kaufman, Mr. Mennillo's lawyer, dated October 31, 2007, no mention was made of financing for the purchase of shares, as what was referred to was instead the acknowledgment of a debt.

(vi) In a memorandum dated November 26, 2007, Mr. Carzoli, a tax adviser retained by Mr. Papadimitriou (Mr. Mennillo's accountant), described the ownership of shares in Intramodal as of the fall of 2007 and concluded from it that Mr. Mennillo was no longer a shareholder of the company at that time.

(vii) The demand letter sent to Intramodal by Mr. Kaufman on February 25, 2010 showed that Mr. Mennillo knew he was no longer a shareholder and that this had been the case since May 2005, when he had resigned as a director and transferred his shares.

(viii) As could be seen in Intramodal's books, there was a common shares certificate in Mr. Mennillo's name. However, it was not signed, and the same was true on the share transfer form on the back, which contained only the nominative information. These books also contained a resolution dated May 25, 2005 concerning the transfer of the shares from Mr. Mennillo to Mr. Rosati. If the transfer was not completed, this was the result of an error or oversight on the part of Mr. Rosati's lawyer.

avancées par M. Mennillo, correspond à la somme dont ont convenu MM. Mennillo et Rosati en juillet 2007 et qui a servi à établir le montant du remboursement total (440 000 $ + 250 000 $ = 690 000 $).

(iv) Les deux documents relatifs à l'assurance contractée sur la vie de M. Mennillo et celle de M. Rosati et dont le bénéficiaire était Intramodal établissent, d'une part, que M. Rosati se croyait, depuis le 15 août 2006, seul actionnaire et administrateur d'Intramodal et, d'autre part, que M. Mennillo n'était que créancier de la société.

(v) Dans une lettre de l'avocat de M. Mennillo, Me Kaufman, datée du 31 octobre 2007, il n'est nullement fait mention du financement d'un éventuel achat d'actions, mais plutôt d'une reconnaissance de dette.

(vi) Dans un mémorandum en date du 26 novembre 2007, Me Carzoli, un avocat fiscaliste dont M. Papadimitriou (le comptable de M. Mennillo) retenait les services, décrit l'actionnariat d'Intramodal à l'automne 2007 et conclut que M. Mennillo n'est plus, à ce moment, actionnaire de la société.

(vii) La mise en demeure transmise par Me Kaufman à Intramodal le 25 février 2010 montre que M. Mennillo savait qu'il n'était plus actionnaire, et ce, depuis mai 2005, lorsqu'il avait démissionné à titre d'administrateur et transféré ses actions.

(viii) Les registres d'Intramodal révèlent l'existence d'un certificat d'actions ordinaires au nom de M. Mennillo. Or, celui-ci n'est pas signé, non plus que le formulaire de transfert d'actions figurant à l'endos, qui ne contient que des renseignements nominatifs. Par ailleurs, ces registres contiennent une résolution datée du 25 mai 2005 portant sur le transfert des actions de M. Mennillo à M. Rosati. Si le transfert des actions de M. Mennillo à M. Rosati n'a pas été effectué, c'est à cause d'une erreur ou d'un oubli de la part de l'avocat de M. Rosati.

(ix) An out-of-court examination of Mr. Mennillo on October 28, 2010 supported the view that he had acknowledged that he no longer wanted to be a shareholder of Intramodal as of May 2005. He mentioned several times in the course of that examination that he had removed himself as a shareholder of Intramodal, but then corrected himself to say that he had only resigned as a director. Moreover, the date he gave as the one at which he had learned he was no longer a shareholder was not the one specified in his motion to institute proceedings and also differed from the one specified in his affidavit of July 29, 2010. The trial judge found that a revelation as important as that should have made an impression on Mr. Mennillo.

(4) Mr. Mennillo's Position With Respect to These Findings

[36] Mr. Mennillo relies on the conclusions of the dissenting judge who found a number of errors in the reasoning of the trial judge which justified setting aside his findings of fact. I will consider each in turn.

(a) The Reason Mr. Mennillo Gave for Resigning as a Director

[37] The trial judge found that Mr. Mennillo's explanation of why he had resigned as a director in May 2005 was false.

[38] Mr. Mennillo's version was that Labatt wished to review Intramodal's books and to visit its premises. He said that his involvement with the company would not be favourable in Labatt's eyes because of his activities in hydroponic greenhouses and the sale of tobacco products. Mr. Mennillo placed this visit by Labatt at a time when Intramodal was acquiring important transportation equipment and he referred repeatedly in his testimony to the fact that Labatt would come to visit the premises.

[39] The trial judge found, however, that Mr. Mennillo's resignation could not have been linked to

(ix) L'interrogatoire préalable de M. Mennillo le 28 octobre 2010 confirme l'opinion selon laquelle ce dernier a reconnu avoir souhaité ne plus être actionnaire d'Intramodal à partir du mois de mai 2005. Lors de cet interrogatoire, il a mentionné à quelques reprises qu'il avait démissionné comme actionnaire d'Intramodal, pour se reprendre ensuite et affirmer que cette démission n'était qu'à titre d'administrateur. De plus, la date à laquelle il dit avoir appris qu'il n'était plus actionnaire ne correspond pas à celle indiquée dans sa requête introductive d'instance et diffère également de celle qui figure dans son affidavit du 29 juillet 2010. Selon le juge de première instance, le moment de cette révélation si importante aurait dû imprégner la mémoire de M. Mennillo.

(4) Thèse de M. Mennillo sur ces conclusions

a) Le motif invoqué par M. Mennillo pour démissionner à titre d'administrateur

[37] Le juge de première instance conclut que le motif invoqué par M. Mennillo pour démissionner à titre d'administrateur en mai 2005 était faux.

[38] Selon M. Mennillo, Labatt voulait examiner les registres d'Intramodal et visiter ses locaux. Il dit que Labatt aurait vu d'un mauvais œil sa participation dans l'entreprise à cause de ses activités dans le domaine des serres hydroponiques et celui de la vente de produits du tabac. Il fait coïncider la visite des représentants de Labatt avec l'acquisition d'équipements de transport importants par Intramodal et il mentionne plusieurs fois dans son témoignage la visite des locaux d'Intramodal par Labatt.

[39] Le juge de première instance conclut cependant que la démission de M. Mennillo ne peut avoir

the examination of Intramodal's books by representatives of Labatt because at the time, Intramodal had no equipment or premises. In any case, Mr. Mennillo's explanation made no sense because his resignation as a director would not make him disappear from the corporation's books if, as he claimed, he was a shareholder. The judge also referred to the inconsistencies in Mr. Mennillo's evidence in relation to this resignation.

[40] The dissenting judge in the Court of Appeal found that the trial judge had erred by setting aside Mr. Mennillo's version of events. He reasoned that although Intramodal did not have any equipment, it was engaging in some public relations activities at the time of the proposed visit. He also thought that Mr. Mennillo's explanation made sense in light of the fact that Labatt would not likely be concerned if Mr. Mennillo's involvement was only as a minority shareholder and, in any event, the problem could have been resolved by Mr. Mennillo transferring his shares to his management company.

[41] Respectfully, there was no basis for the dissenting judge to set aside the trial judge's rejection of Mr. Mennillo's explanation of why he had resigned as a director. As the majority of the Court of Appeal pointed out, Mr. Mennillo linked Labatt's visit to a time when Intramodal was acquiring transportation equipment. But it was clear that Intramodal was not doing so in the time leading up to Mr. Mennillo's resignation in May 2005. I would add that Mr. Mennillo also linked the visit to a time when Labatt could visit the premises. But this made no sense because Intramodal had no premises as of the date of Mr. Mennillo's resignation as a director. Moreover, the trial judge made no error in concluding that if Mr. Mennillo stayed on as a shareholder, his involvement would be obvious not only from the books of the corporation but also from the public register.

été liée à l'examen des registres d'Intramodal par les représentants de Labatt, car Intramodal ne possédait alors ni équipements ni locaux. Quoi qu'il en soit, l'explication de M. Mennillo ne se tient pas, car sa démission à titre d'administrateur n'aurait pas fait disparaître son nom des registres de la société si, comme il le prétend, il était demeuré actionnaire. Le juge invoque également les incohérences de son témoignage sur sa démission.

[42] Le juge de première instance ne commet aucune erreur manifeste et déterminante sur ce point.

(b) The Life Insurance Documents

[43] The dissenting judge took issue with the trial judge's reliance on documents relating to a life insurance in which Mr. Rosati indicated that he was the sole shareholder of the corporation. The dissenting judge thought that these statements needed to be treated with caution as they originated with Mr. Rosati and, in addition, it was hard to understand why, if Mr. Mennillo was simply a creditor, Intramodal would insure his life. However, as the majority of the Court of Appeal pointed out, Mr. Rosati was dealing with a broker who had done business with Mr. Mennillo for more than 20 years. The trial judge was entitled to take into account that in September 2006, Mr. Rosati was openly claiming, in dealings with Mr. Mennillo's insurance broker, that Mr. Mennillo was not a shareholder in the corporation. The trial judge could well conclude that such behaviour on Mr. Rosati's part enhanced the credibility of his theory. There was certainly no basis to interfere with the trial judge's findings in this regard.

(c) The Carzoli Memorandum

[44] The dissenting judge was also of the view that the trial judge had misinterpreted a memo prepared by Mr. Carzoli, a tax specialist retained by Mr. Mennillo's accountant, Mr. Papadimitriou.

[45] The trial judge noted that, in a memo prepared after a meeting with Mr. Mennillo's accountant, Mr. Carzoli wrote that "[t]he minute book of the company indicates that the shares are owned by only one shareholder . . . . The other shareholder . . . was only an investor in the company": para. 50. The judge took this as some evidence that Mr. Mennillo did not believe himself to be a shareholder as of the date of the memorandum (i.e. November 26, 2007).

[46] The dissenting judge thought that this was an erroneous inference because Mr. Carzoli explained in the rest of the memorandum that the register needed correction in order to reflect the reality that Mr. Mennillo was in fact a shareholder.

b) Les documents relatifs à l'assurance-vie

[43] Le juge dissident reproche au juge de première instance de se fonder sur des documents d'assurance-vie dans lesquels M. Rosati dit être l'unique actionnaire de la société. Il estime que cette affirmation doit être considérée avec circonspection dans la mesure où M. Rosati en est l'auteur. De plus, on comprend mal pourquoi Intramodal aurait assuré la vie de M. Mennillo s'il n'avait été qu'un simple créancier. Toutefois, comme le font observer les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, M. Rosati retenait les services d'un courtier qui faisait affaire avec M. Mennillo depuis plus de 20 ans. Le juge de première instance pouvait donc tenir compte du fait que, en septembre 2006, M. Rosati affirmait ouvertement, lorsqu'il avait affaire au courtier d'assurance de M. Mennillo, que ce dernier n'était pas actionnaire de la société. Il pouvait très bien conclure que le comportement de M. Rosati ajoutait à la véracité de sa thèse. Il n'y avait assurément aucune raison valable d'intervenir à l'égard des conclusions du juge sur ce point.

c) Le mémorandum de Me Carzoli

[44] Le juge dissident est également d'avis que le juge de première instance interprète mal le mémorandum de Me Carzoli, un avocat fiscaliste dont le comptable de M. Mennillo, M. Papadimitriou, retenait les services.

[45] Le juge de première instance indique que, dans un mémorandum rédigé après sa rencontre avec le comptable de M. Mennillo, Me Carzoli écrit : [TRADUCTION] « [l]e registre des procès-verbaux de la société indique que les actions n'appartiennent qu'à un seul actionnaire [. . .] L'autre actionnaire [. . .] n'est qu'un investisseur de l'entreprise » (par. 50). Cet élément prouve selon lui que M. Mennillo ne se croyait pas actionnaire à la date du mémorandum (soit le 26 novembre 2007).

[46] Le juge dissident estime qu'il s'agit d'une inférence erronée, car dans le reste de son mémo, Me Carzoli explique que le registre doit être rectifié afin de constater que M. Mennillo est en fait actionnaire. Il conclut également du mémorandum que

The dissenting judge was also of the view that the memorandum showed that Mr. Carzoli's strategy was based on the premise that Mr. Mennillo was a shareholder.

[47] However, as the majority in the Court of Appeal pointed out, the statement that there was only one shareholder was made to Mr. Mennillo's accountant and yet passed in silence. Moreover, as the trial judge and the majority further noted, the memorandum was inconsistent with Mr. Mennillo's testimony that he had only learned that he was not a shareholder in winter of 2009 given that the memorandum was dated roughly two years before.

[48] Once again, the trial judge's reliance on the Carzoli memorandum did not provide an appropriate basis for appellate intervention in relation to the trial judge's rejection of Mr. Mennillo's evidence.

(d) The October 31, 2007 Letter

[49] The dissenting judge also took issue with the trial judge's reliance on an October 31, 2007 letter from Mr. Mennillo's lawyer, Mr. Kaufman. In the dissenting judge's view, a careful reading of that letter showed that it was not contrary to Mr. Mennillo's position.

[50] The trial judge noted that while Messrs. Kaufman and Mennillo took the position that this letter was directed at putting in place financing to permit Mr. Rosati to buy Mr. Mennillo's shares, the letter itself said nothing about a share purchase but rather was drafted in terms of an acknowledgment of debt. The majority of the Court of Appeal saw nothing wrong with the trial judge's treatment of this letter and nor do I. It was open to the judge to infer from the letter, and particularly the absence of any mention of share purchase in it, that it would be unlikely to omit mention of that element in light of Mr. Mennillo's contention that he had never withdrawn as a shareholder.

la stratégie proposée par Me Carzoli supposait que M. Mennillo soit actionnaire.

[47] Toutefois, comme le signalent les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, la déclaration selon laquelle il n'y a qu'un seul actionnaire a été faite au comptable de M. Mennillo, mais elle a pourtant été passée sous silence. Qui plus est, comme le font observer le juge de première instance et les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, le témoignage de M. Mennillo selon lequel il n'aurait appris qu'à l'hiver 2009 qu'il n'était pas actionnaire ne concorde pas avec le fait que le mémorandum a été rédigé environ deux ans auparavant.

[48] Encore une fois, ce n'est pas parce que le juge de première instance s'appuie sur le mémorandum de Me Carzoli que la Cour d'appel est admise à intervenir quant à sa décision d'écarter le témoignage de M. Mennillo.

d) La lettre du 31 octobre 2007

[49] Le juge dissident déplore aussi le fait que le juge de première instance se fonde sur une lettre de l'avocat de M. Mennillo, Me Kaufman, datée du 31 octobre 2007. Selon lui, une lecture attentive révèle que cette lettre ne va pas à l'encontre de la thèse de M. Mennillo.

[50] Le juge de première instance fait remarquer que même si Me Kaufman et M. Mennillo ont fait valoir que cette lettre visait un montage financier qui aurait permis à M. Rosati d'acheter les actions de M. Mennillo, la lettre comme telle ne fait pas mention d'un achat d'actions et revêt plutôt la forme d'une reconnaissance de dette. Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel n'ont rien à redire, et moi non plus, sur ce que le juge de première instance conclut de la lettre. Il lui était loisible d'en inférer, surtout en l'absence de toute mention d'un achat d'actions, que l'omission d'une telle mention était invraisemblable au vu de la prétention de M. Mennillo selon laquelle il n'avait jamais renoncé à sa qualité d'actionnaire.

(e) The February 25, 2010 Letter

[51] Finally, the dissenting judge was of the view that the trial judge had drawn erroneous inferences from the demand letter dated February 25, 2010 sent to Intramodal by Mr. Mennillo's lawyer, Mr. Kaufman. This letter referred to the alleged request that Mr. Mennillo "resign from the company" because of the interest on the part of Labatt and alleged that his share of the company had not been remitted to him following his resignation as promised.

[52] The trial judge used this letter to support the inference that, as of May 2005 when he submitted his resignation as a director, Mr. Mennillo knew that he was no longer a shareholder and, as well, to infer the date at which Mr. Mennillo stopped being a shareholder.

[53] The dissenting judge in the Court of Appeal was of the view that this letter did not support these inferences. In his opinion, the use by a lawyer (Mr. Kaufman) of the phrase "resign from the company" could not refer to anything but Mr. Mennillo's resignation as a director; it could not be understood to encompass Mr. Mennillo's shareholder status. Moreover, the letter insisted that Mr. Mennillo was a 50 percent partner in the corporation. The dissenting judge saw in this letter a clear expression that [TRANSLATION] "Mennillo still considered himself a shareholder of (partner in) Intramodal, holding almost 50% of the shares, and as such he was entitled to a share of the profits in the same proportion": para. 110 (CanLII).

[54] Once again, however, there was no basis for appellate intervention with respect to the trial judge's reliance on this letter. I agree with the reasons of the majority of the Court of Appeal for rejecting the dissenting judge's contention:

[TRANSLATION] It may be possible to disagree about how to interpret this letter, but the Judge's interpretation does not seem to me to be "clearly wrong"; indeed, it is easy to defend. Mennillo is claiming $1M, inter alia,

e) La mise en demeure du 25 février 2010

[51] Enfin, le juge dissident estime que le juge de première instance tire des conclusions erronées de la mise en demeure du 25 février 2010 que l'avocat de M. Mennillo, Me Kaufman, a fait parvenir à Intramodal. Le document fait mention de la demande qui aurait été faite à M. Mennillo de [TRADUCTION] « démissionner de la société » à cause de l'intérêt manifesté par Labatt et ajoute que la participation de M. Mennillo dans l'entreprise ne lui a pas été rendue après sa démission comme on le lui avait promis.

[52] Le juge de première instance s'appuie sur ce document non seulement pour conclure qu'en mai 2005, lorsqu'il a présenté sa démission à titre d'administrateur, M. Mennillo savait qu'il n'était plus actionnaire, mais aussi pour inférer la date à laquelle M. Mennillo a cessé de l'être.

[53] Le juge dissident de la Cour d'appel estime que la mise en demeure n'étaye pas ces conclusions. À son avis, employée par un avocat (Me Kaufman), la formule [TRADUCTION] « démissionner de la société » ne pouvait viser que la qualité d'administrateur de M. Mennillo, à l'exclusion de sa qualité d'actionnaire. De surcroît, la mise en demeure souligne que M. Mennillo est associé à raison de 50 p. 100 dans l'entreprise. Le juge dissident y voit la manifestation claire du fait que « [M.] Mennillo se considérait toujours actionnaire (partner) d'Intramodal à près de 50 % et, à ce titre, [qu']il avait le droit au partage des profits (share of the profits) dans la même proportion » (par. 110 (CanLII)).

[54] Mais, encore une fois, le fait que le juge de première instance s'appuie sur cette mise en demeure ne justifie pas une intervention en appel. Je souscris aux motifs pour lesquels les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel rejettent l'affirmation de leur collègue dissident :

On peut différer d'opinion sur l'interprétation à donner au texte de cette [mise en demeure], mais celle du Juge ne me paraît pas « manifestement erronée », elle se défend même aisément. [M.] Mennillo réclame 1 M$,

2016 SCC 51 (CanLII)

"for failing to remit to him his share of the company". One cannot claim something one already owns. His claim implies that he is not a shareholder of Intramodal, given that he wants to become one. [para. 184]

(f) Conclusion Concerning the Trial Judge's Findings of Fact

[55] The trial judge's factual findings are only reviewable on appeal if they constitute an error that is both palpable and overriding: Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, at para. 10; Stein v. The Ship "Kathy K", [1976] 2 S.C.R. 802, at p. 808; Ingles v. Tutkaluk Construction Ltd., 2000 SCC 12, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 298, at para. 42. I agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal that no such error is present here. While the dissenting judge preferred a different interpretation of some of the evidence than that adopted by the trial judge, he was not entitled to substitute his view absent a palpable and overriding error. When we examine the trial judge's conclusions in light of the record, we find that there was no such error.

[56] We must, therefore, approach the case on the basis that, from May 25, 2005 onwards, Mr. Menillo did not want to be a shareholder, did not want to be treated as such and, as a result, transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati.

[57] On these findings of fact, Mr. Mennillo's oppression claim is groundless. He could have no reasonable expectation of being treated as a shareholder: he no longer was and expressly demanded not to be so treated. As against Intramodal, the most that can be said is that the corporation failed to carry out his wishes as a result of not observing certain necessary corporate formalities. But in light of these findings, it cannot be said that the corporation acted oppressively or that it illegally stripped him of his status as a shareholder as Justice Côté concludes: para. 198. What happened is that the corporation failed to make sure that all the legal formalities were complied with before registering the transfer. The acts of the corporation which Mr. Mennillo claims to constitute oppression were in fact taken, albeit imperfectly, entre autres, « for failing to remit to him his share of the company » [[TRADUCTION] « pour omission de lui rendre sa participation dans l'entreprise »]. On ne saurait réclamer quelque chose que l'on détient déjà. Sa réclamation implique qu'il n'est pas actionnaire d'Intramodal puisqu'il veut le devenir. [par. 184]

f) Conclusion sur les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance

[55] Les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance ne sont susceptibles de révision en appel que si elles sont entachées d'une erreur manifeste et dominante (Housen c. Nikolaisen, 2002 CSC 33, [2002] 2 R.C.S. 235, par. 10; Stein c. Le navire « Kathy K », [1976] 2 R.C.S. 802, p. 808; Ingles c. Tutkaluk Construction Ltd., 2000 CSC 12, [2000] 1 R.C.S. 298, par. 42). Je conviens avec les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel qu'il n'y a aucune erreur de la sorte en l'espèce. Le juge dissident voit certes dans certains éléments de preuve autre chose que le juge de première instance, mais il ne peut pour autant faire primer son opinion, sauf erreur manifeste et dominante. Au vu du dossier, nous estimons que les conclusions du juge ne sont pas entachées d'une telle erreur.

[56] Nous devons donc considérer que, dès le 25 mai 2005, M. Mennillo ne voulait plus être actionnaire et qu'il ne souhaitait pas être tenu pour tel, d'où le transfert de ses actions à M. Rosati.

[57] Eu égard à ces conclusions de fait, le recours pour abus est sans fondement. M. Mennillo ne pouvait pas raisonnablement s'attendre à être traité comme un actionnaire : il ne l'était plus et avait expressément demandé à ne plus être considéré comme un actionnaire. Tout au plus peut-on dire d'Intramodal qu'elle n'a pas donné suite à son vœu du fait qu'elle a omis d'observer certaines formalités requises de sa part. Cependant, on ne saurait affirmer au vu de ces conclusions que la société a agi abusivement à l'égard de M. Mennillo ou qu'elle l'a dépouillé illégalement de son statut d'actionnaire, comme le conclut la juge Côté (par. 198). En fait, la société a omis de s'assurer de l'observation de toutes les formalités d'ordre juridique avant d'inscrire le transfert. Les mesures de la société que M. Mennillo in accordance with his express wishes. But it cannot be unfairly prejudicial to Mr. Mennillo for the corporation to register a transfer of shares that he wished to happen, and that, as I will discuss later, he can no longer attack. As a consequence, all of Mr. Mennillo's claims must fail.

[58] The failure to observe the corporate formalities in removing Mr. Mennillo as a shareholder in accordance with his express wishes to be so removed cannot, in my respectful view, be characterized as an act unfairly prejudicial to the extent that this omission deprived him of his status as a shareholder: Côté J., at para. 207. The corporation failed to observe the formalities of carrying out his wish not to be a shareholder. Nor can the failure to properly remove him as a shareholder in accordance with his express wishes make it just and equitable for him to regain his status as a shareholder: para. 204.

B. Corporate Law Points

[59] Although it is not strictly speaking necessary to do so, I will address three points of corporate law because some clarification of them will be useful: whether the share transfer could have been retroactively cancelled as the majority of the Court of Appeal thought; the consequence of the failure to observe the formalities prescribed by the CBCA; and whether the shares could have been issued conditionally.

(1) The Possible Retroactive Cancellation of the Share Transfer

[60] Before the trial judge and the Court of Appeal, Mr. Mennillo argued that he has been a shareholder of Intramodal from its incorporation and remained as such. Before the trial judge, Intramodal presented two different theories in response to Mr. Mennillo's argument. The first one is that Mr. Mennillo would have become a shareholder had he accepted to financially support the corporation and to be the guarantor of the entirety of its debts, but he declined or neglected to do so and tient pour abusives ont en fait été prises, bien que de manière imparfaite, selon la volonté qu'il avait exprimée. La société ne peut donc pas s'être montrée injuste à son égard en lui portant préjudice du fait qu'elle a inscrit le transfert d'actions qu'il avait lui-même voulu et, comme je l'explique plus loin, qu'il ne peut plus contester. En conséquence, les allégations de M. Mennillo doivent toutes être rejetées.

[58] Soit dit en tout respect, l'inobservation des formalités nécessaires au retrait de M. Mennillo à titre d'actionnaire, conformément à la volonté qu'il avait exprimée, ne saurait constituer un acte injustement préjudiciable [à son égard] dans la mesure où elle le prive de son statut d'actionnaire (la juge Côté, par. 207). La société a omis d'observer les formalités requises pour donner suite à sa volonté de cesser d'être actionnaire. L'omission d'effectuer régulièrement le retrait à titre d'actionnaire, selon la volonté exprimée par M. Mennillo, ne saurait non plus rendre juste et équitable sa réintégration en qualité d'actionnaire (par. 204).

B. Points relevant du droit des sociétés

[59] Même si, à strictement parler, ce n'est pas nécessaire, je me penche sur trois points du droit des sociétés, car certains éclaircissements à leur sujet seront utiles : le transfert d'actions aurait-il pu être annulé rétroactivement comme le prétendent les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, quelles sont les conséquences de l'omission d'observer les formalités prescrites par la LCSA et les actions auraient-elles pu être émises conditionnellement?

(1) La possibilité d'annuler rétroactivement le transfert d'actions

[60] En première instance et en Cour d'appel, M. Mennillo a soutenu qu'il était devenu actionnaire d'Intramodal dès sa constitution en société et qu'il l'était toujours. En première instance, Intramodal a fait valoir deux théories différentes pour réfuter la thèse de M. Mennillo. Elle a d'abord prétendu que M. Mennillo serait devenu actionnaire s'il avait accepté d'appuyer financièrement l'entreprise et de se porter garant de la totalité de son passif, mais qu'il avait refusé ou négligé de le faire, de sorte qu'il

consequently never became a shareholder. The second one is that Mr. Mennillo resigned as a director of Intramodal and transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati. Intramodal focused on its second theory before the Court of Appeal and argued that the shares were transferred from Mr. Mennillo to Mr. Rosati on May 25, 2005.

[61] The trial judge concluded that Mr. Mennillo agreed that he would remain a shareholder only so long as he was willing to guarantee the corporation's debts and that Mr. Mennillo ultimately decided that he did not wish to do so and transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati. In the Court of Appeal, the majority concluded as follows on this issue:

> [TRANSLATION] . . . Can it be concluded that there was a genuine transfer of the shares from Mennillo to Rosati? It seems to me, rather, that they quite simply agreed on May 25, 2005 to retroactively cancel their agreement to associate with one another that they had originally entered into in 2004. The agreement had been reached informally, as was the cancellation thereof. [para. 225]

[62] It is worth highlighting that this theory of the retroactive cancellation of the agreement was neither adopted by the trial judge nor pleaded by the parties.

[63] Contrary to what the majority of the Court of Appeal suggested, I am of the opinion that it is not possible to retroactively cancel an issuance of shares by way of simple oral consent. As Mr. Mennillo points out, an issuance of shares can be cancelled only if (a) the corporation's articles are amended or (b) the corporation reaches an agreement to purchase the shares, which requires that the directors pass a resolution, that the shareholder in question gives his or her express consent and that the tests of solvency and liquidity be met. Can such an act by the corporation be valid even though these requirements of the CBCA have not been met? I do not think so.

[64] The commentators agree that meeting the requirements with respect to the maintenance of share capital cannot be optional, given that it is the share capital that is the common pledge of the creditors and is the basis for their acceptance of doing n'était jamais devenu actionnaire. Elle a ensuite soutenu que M. Mennillo avait démissionné de son poste d'administrateur et qu'il avait transféré ses actions à M. Rosati. En Cour d'appel, Intramodal a mis l'accent sur sa deuxième théorie et soutenu que M. Mennillo avait cédé ses actions à M. Rosati le 25 mai 2005.

[61] Selon le juge de première instance, M. Mennillo a convenu qu'il ne demeurerait actionnaire que tant qu'il serait disposé à garantir le passif de la société. M. Mennillo a finalement décidé de ne pas se porter ainsi garant et a transféré ses actions à M. Rosati. Voici ce qu'opinent les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel sur ce point :

> . . . peut-on conclure qu'il y a eu véritablement cession des actions de [M.] Mennillo à [M.] Rosati? Il me semble plutôt que, tout simplement, ils conviennent le 25 mai 2005 d'annuler rétroactivement leur entente d'association convenue au départ en 2004. L'entente avait été conclue sans aucun formalisme, de même son annulation. [par. 225]

[62] Il convient de souligner que cette thèse de l'annulation rétroactive de l'entente n'est pas retenue par le juge de première instance, ni défendue par l'une ou l'autre des parties.

[63] Contrairement à ce que laissent entendre les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, on ne peut selon moi annuler rétroactivement une émission d'actions sur simple consentement verbal. Comme le souligne M. Mennillo, il ne peut y avoir annulation d'une émission d'actions que a) par modification des statuts de la société ou b) par achat de gré à gré des actions par la société, ce qui requiert une résolution des administrateurs, le consentement exprès de l'actionnaire en cause et le respect des critères de solvabilité et de liquidité. Un tel acte de la société peut-il être valide malgré le non-respect de ces conditions de la LCSA? J'estime que non.

[64] Les auteurs reconnaissent que le respect des exigences relatives au maintien du capital-actions ne saurait être facultatif puisque le capital-actions constitue le gage commun des créanciers en fonction duquel ces derniers acceptent de faire affaire

[65] Furthermore, certain American commentators point out that strict protection of a corporation's capital stock is necessary in a context in which the liability of shareholders is, for its part, limited:

> Strong entity shielding and limited liability are highly complementary; the presence of one generally calls for the other. . . .
>
> . . . limited liability generally requires strong entity shielding, largely because limited liability increases the incentive for owners to withdraw from the firm when its prospects are doubtful. That incentive, in turn, creates the threat of a run on the firm's assets, which would destroy going-concern value to the detriment of both the firm's creditors and its owners. By denying owners the power to withdraw unilaterally, strong entity shielding prevents such runs. [Footnote omitted.]

(H. Hansmann, R. Kraakman and R. Squire, "The New Business Entities in Evolutionary Perspective", [2005] U. Ill. L. Rev. 5, at pp. 11-12)

[66] More concretely, why would the law establish strict requirements primarily to protect creditors' interests if such requirements could validly be ignored? I am unable to find a satisfactory answer to this question, and it is my opinion that the respondent has also failed to provide one.

(2) The Consequence of Non-Compliance With the Formalities of the CBCA

[67] The trial judge held that Mr. Mennillo was no longer a shareholder of Intramodal as of May 25, 2005 and that [TRANSLATION] "[t]he failure to complete the transfer of Mennillo's shares to Rosati resulted from an error or oversight on the part of Rosati's lawyer": para. 74.

Rousseau, Droit des sociétés par actions (3e éd. 2011), p. 550-552; F. W. Wegenast, The Law of Canadian Companies (1979 (réédition de l'éd. de 1931)), p. 313).

>
> . . . la responsabilité limitée exige généralement la protection stricte de l'entité, surtout parce qu'elle est de nature à inciter des propriétaires à quitter l'entreprise lorsque son avenir est incertain. À son tour, cette incitation expose le capital-actions à des retraits massifs, lesquels sont susceptibles de réduire à néant la valeur de l'entreprise au détriment de ses créanciers et de ses propriétaires. En refusant aux propriétaires le droit de se retirer unilatéralement, la protection stricte de l'entité empêche de tels retraits. [Note en bas de page omise.]

(H. Hansmann, R. Kraakman et R. Squire, « The New Business Entities in Evolutionary Perspective », [2005] U. Ill. L. Rev. 5, p. 11-12)

(2) Les conséquences de l'inobservation des formalités prescrites par la LCSA

[67] Le juge de première instance conclut que M. Mennillo a cessé d'être actionnaire d'Intramodal le 25 mai 2005 et que « [l]e fait que la cession des actions de [M.] Mennillo à [M.] Rosati n'ait pas été complétée résulte de l'erreur ou l'oubli de la part de l'avocat de [M.] Rosati » (par. 74).

[68] Needless to say, there is no evidence in writing of such transfer between Mr. Mennillo and Mr. Rosati. But for the reasons I set out at length above, the trial judge made no palpable and overriding error when he rejected Mr. Mennillo's version of events and substantially accepted Intramodal's. For this reason, I accept his finding that Mr. Mennillo refused to take on the role of Intramodal's guarantor and transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati. The evidence on the transfer point is conflicting and inconsistent. The judge adopted a view of the evidence that was open to him given the extreme informality of the parties' dealings and their virtually complete inattention to corporate formalities. As I read his reasons, there was an onerous contract between Mr. Mennillo and Mr. Rosati for the transfer of the shares, a view supported by the evidence: Martin v. Dupont, 2016 QCCA 475; art. 1381 Civil Code of Québec ("C.C.Q").

[68] Il va sans dire qu'aucun écrit n'atteste cette cession. Mais pour les motifs détaillés qui précèdent, le juge de première instance ne commet aucune erreur manifeste et dominante lorsqu'il rejette la version des faits de M. Mennillo et qu'il retient essentiellement celle d'Intramodal. C'est pourquoi je fais mienne sa conclusion voulant que M. Mennillo ait refusé de se porter garant du passif d'Intramodal et transféré ses actions à M. Rosati. La preuve relative au transfert des actions est contradictoire et incohérente. Son interprétation par le juge Poirier est légitime compte tenu du caractère extrêmement informel des rapports entre les parties et de l'inobservation par ces dernières de la quasi-totalité des formalités requises d'une société. Suivant mon interprétation de ses motifs, un contrat à titre onéreux liait MM. Mennillo et Rosati concernant le transfert des actions, ce qui est étayé par la preuve (Martin c. Dupont, 2016 QCCA 475; art. 1381 du Code civil du Québec (« C.c.Q. »)).

[69] It is uncontested that Intramodal did not ascertain whether some of the corporate formalities of the CBCA were complied with by Mr. Mennillo and Mr. Rosati when it registered the transfer of shares, but that cannot in and of itself invalidate any transfer between them: Inspecteur général des institutions financières v. Assurances funéraires Rousseau et frère Ltée, [1990] R.R.A. 473 (C.A.); Martel, at pp. 16-28 to 16-30.

[70] À cet égard, l'art. 76 de la LCSA dispose ce qui suit :

76 (1) Where a security in registered form is presented for transfer, the issuer shall register the transfer if

(a) the security is endorsed by an appropriate person as defined in section 65;

(b) reasonable assurance is given that that endorsement is genuine and effective;

(c) the issuer has no duty to inquire into adverse claims or has discharged any such duty;

(d) any applicable law relating to the collection of taxes has been complied with;

76 (1) L'émetteur doit procéder à l'inscription du transfert d'une valeur mobilière nominative lorsque les conditions suivantes sont réunies :

a) la valeur mobilière est endossée par une personne compétente au sens de l'article 65;

b) des assurances suffisantes sur l'authenticité et la validité de cet endossement sont données;

c) il n'est pas tenu de s'enquérir de l'existence d'oppositions ou il s'est acquitté de cette obligation;

d) les lois relatives à la perception de droits ont été respectées;

2016 SCC 51 (CanLII)

(e) the transfer is rightful or is to a bona fide purchaser; and

(f) any fee referred to in subsection 49(2) has been paid.

(2) Where an issuer has a duty to register a transfer of a security, the issuer is liable to the person presenting it for registration for loss resulting from any unreasonable delay in registration or from failure or refusal to register the transfer.

[71] In this case, the requirements of s. 76(1)(a) CBCA are not fulfilled. It is common ground that the shares that were transferred were not endorsed by Mr. Mennillo. Therefore it is true that Intramodal proceeded to register a transfer that did not meet all of the criteria stated in the CBCA. But this is of no assistance to Mr. Mennillo under the circumstances. It is not as a result of an improper registration of this share transfer that Mr. Mennillo is no longer the holder of any shares in Intramodal. It is rather as a result of his transfer of these shares to Mr. Rosati, as found by the trial judge.

[72] In that regard, the endorsement of the shares was required to complete the transfer itself between Mr. Mennillo and Mr. Rosati. It was required for the shares to be delivered, which, in turn, was necessary to complete the share transfer: ss. 60(1) and 65(3) CBCA. Since this was an important formality required by law, it was to be observed on pain of nullity of the transfer: arts. 1414 and 1416 C.C.Q.; Martel, at pp. 16-26 et seq.

[73] With that being said, there is no doubt about the fact that Mr. Mennillo knew that this formality was not complied with when the company proceeded to register the transfer in the corporate books, some time in 2007. There is also no doubt that he was aware that he had not endorsed his share certificate when the shares were transferred to Mr. Rosati as the trial judge found.

[74] While it might have been possible for Mr. Mennillo to attack the transfer on the basis of the non-compliance with this required formality of the CBCA, no such claim was or could have been advanced when he instituted his proceedings in

e) le transfert est régulier ou est effectué au profit d'un acheteur de bonne foi;

f) les droits prévus au paragraphe 49(2) ont été acquittés.

(2) L'émetteur tenu de procéder à l'inscription du transfert d'une valeur mobilière est responsable, envers la personne qui la présente à cet effet, du préjudice causé par tout retard indu ou par tout défaut ou refus.

[72] L'endossement des actions était nécessaire pour mener à bien le transfert de M. Mennillo à M. Rosati. Il était requis pour la livraison des actions, laquelle s'imposait à son tour pour qu'il y ait transfert (par. 60(1) et 65(3) de la LCSA). S'agissant d'une formalité légale importante, son inobservation exposait l'opération à la nullité (art. 1414 et 1416 C.c.Q.; Martel, par. 16-91 et suiv.).

[74] M. Mennillo aurait pu contester le transfert en invoquant l'inobservation de cette formalité exigée par la LCSA, mais il ne l'a pas fait et n'aurait pas pu le faire au moment d'intenter son recours en septembre 2010. Puisque, plus de trois ans auparavant,

September 2010. As he was aware of the situation of which he now complains more than three years prior, his claim in that regard was and is still prescribed: art. 2925 C.C.Q. Even if the transfer was subject to nullity, it did not mean that it was inexistent. In Quebec civil law, the sanction of nullity needs to be pronounced by a tribunal: S. Gaudet, "Inexistence, nullité et annulabilité du contrat: essai de synthèse" (1995), 40 McGill L.J. 291, at pp. 331-35; J.-L. Baudoin and P.-G. Jobin, Les obligations (7th ed. 2013), by P.-G. Jobin and N. Vézina, at para. 386; D. Lluelles and B. Moore, Droit des obligations (2nd ed. 2012), at para. 1101. Only once nullity is judicially pronounced is a purported contract "deemed never to have existed": art. 1422 C.C.Q. Indeed, a "contract which does not meet the necessary conditions of its formation may be [as opposed to is] annulled": art. 1416 C.C.Q. This judicial intervention must be sought within three years of becoming aware of the cause of nullity: arts. 2925 and 2927 C.C.Q.

il connaissait la situation qu'il déplore aujourd'hui, son recours était et demeure prescrit (art. 2925 C.c.Q.). Même s'il était susceptible d'annulation, le transfert existait tout de même. En droit civil québécois, la sanction qu'est la nullité doit être prononcée par le tribunal (S. Gaudet, « Inexistence, nullité et annulabilité du contrat : essai de synthèse » (1995), 40 R.D. McGill 291, p. 331-335; J.-L. Baudoin et P.-G. Jobin, Les obligations (7e éd. 2013), par P.-G. Jobin et N. Vézina, par. 386; D. Lluelles et B. Moore, Droit des obligations (2e éd. 2012), par. 1101). Ce n'est qu'une fois la nullité prononcée par une cour de justice que le contrat « est réputé n'avoir jamais existé » (art. 1422 C.c.Q.). En effet, le « contrat qui n'est pas conforme aux conditions nécessaires à sa formation peut [et non pas doit] être frappé de nullité » (art. 1416 C.c.Q.). La mesure judiciaire doit être demandée au plus tard trois ans après que l'intéressé a eu connaissance de la cause de nullité (art. 2925 et 2927 C.c.Q.).

(3) The Conditional Issuance of the Shares

[75] In the Court of Appeal, the dissenting judge read the trial judge's reasons as holding that the issuance of the shares to Mr. Mennillo had been conditional on his remaining a guarantor. The dissenting judge went on to say that this conditional status is not set out in the CBCA and in any event, even if it were, such status would also have needed to be specified in the books of the company. The dissenting judge also expressed the view that this sort of conditional shareholder status could not depend on an informal agreement between two individuals.

[76] I am in substantial agreement with the dissenting judge about the law on this point. Conditions attaching to the shares need to be specified in the articles of the corporation and in the securities register. Also, the resolution authorizing the issuance of the shares to Mr. Mennillo would have needed to specify their conditional status: ss. 24(4), 49(13) and 50(1)(c) CBCA. These formalities were not fulfilled.

(3) L'émission conditionnelle des actions

[75] Le juge dissident de la Cour d'appel conclut des motifs du juge de première instance que les actions ont été émises à M. Mennillo à la condition qu'il demeure garant du passif. Il ajoute que la LCSA ne prévoit pas un tel actionnariat conditionnel et que, de toute manière, s'il avait été possible, il aurait fallu qu'il soit indiqué dans les registres de la société. Toujours selon lui, un tel actionnariat conditionnel ne saurait tenir à un accord informel entre deux personnes.

[76] Je suis d'accord pour l'essentiel avec le juge dissident quant au droit applicable sur ce point. La condition dont une action est assortie doit être précisée dans les statuts de la société et dans son registre des valeurs mobilières. De même, la résolution autorisant l'émission des actions à M. Mennillo aurait dû préciser qu'elles étaient assorties d'une condition (par. 24(4) et 49(13) et al. 50(1)c) de la LCSA). Ces formalités n'ont pas été accomplies.

[77] But in my respectful view, the dissenting judge misread the trial judge's reasons. None of the parties argued that they intended the shares to be issued conditionally and in my view the trial judge did not intend to and did not say that any condition was attached to the shares themselves. Rather, when we read his reasons in light of the evidence, we see that he was of the view that the condition to which the trial judge referred was a result of an agreement between Messrs. Mennillo and Rosati that the former would be a shareholder only if he guaranteed Intramodal's debts. This agreement was reached by Messrs. Mennillo and Rosati; Intramodal was not a party to this agreement. Accordingly, it does not attract the corporate formalities applicable to a conditional issuance of shares. Understood in this way, there is no legal error in the trial judge's approach to this issue.

C. Prescription and Remedy

[78] The trial judge found that Mr. Mennillo's oppression claim was prescribed. He reasoned that the three-year period in art. 2925 C.C.Q. applied and that time began to run in May 2005 when, in his view, Mr. Mennillo knew that he would not be treated as a shareholder. The majority of the Court of Appeal did not deal with this issue. But the dissenting judge found that time had not started to run until December 2009 and in any event that the acts of oppression were continuing. Before this Court, Mr. Mennillo adopts, in a single paragraph of his factum, the reasoning of the dissenting judge on this point. Intramodal adopts the position of the trial judge.

[79] Given the limited judicial consideration of these points in the reasons of the Superior Court and the Court of Appeal, and the conclusion that Mr. Mennillo's oppression claim is groundless on its merits, I prefer not to venture a final opinion on this precise point in the context of this appeal.

[80] As a result of my proposed disposition of the appeal in relation to the dismissal of the oppression claim, it is not necessary for me to address what

C. Prescription et mesure de redressement

[78] Le juge de première instance arrive à la conclusion que le recours pour abus de M. Mennillo est prescrit. Il explique que le délai de trois ans imparti à l'art. 2925 du C.c.Q. s'applique et qu'il a commencé à courir en mai 2005, soit au moment où, selon lui, M. Mennillo a appris qu'il ne serait plus traité comme un actionnaire. Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ne se prononcent pas sur la question. Le juge dissident estime cependant que le délai n'a commencé à courir qu'en décembre 2009 et que, de toute façon, l'abus s'était poursuivi. Devant notre Cour, M. Mennillo reprend à son compte, dans un même paragraphe de son mémoire, le raisonnement du juge dissident sur ce point. Quant à Intramodal, elle se range à l'avis du juge de première instance.

[79] Étant donné le peu d'attention que la Cour supérieure et la Cour d'appel accordent à ces questions, et la conclusion selon laquelle le recours pour abus intenté par M. Mennillo doit être rejeté sur le fond, je préfère ne pas me prononcer sur ce point précis de manière définitive dans le cadre du pourvoi.

[80] Vu la manière dont je propose de statuer en l'espèce sur le rejet du recours pour abus, point n'est besoin de me prononcer sur les mesures de remedies would be appropriate in the event oppression had been established.

IV. Disposition

[81] I would dismiss the appeal with costs and affirm the costs orders made by the Superior Court and the Court of Appeal.

The reasons of McLachlin C.J. and Moldaver J. were delivered by [82] THE CHIEF JUSTICE — I would dismiss the appeal for the following reasons.

[83] This is an action for oppression. Mr. Mennillo complains that Intramodal inc. acted oppressively in removing him as shareholder from the books of the company.

[84] To establish oppression, the shareholder must show: (1) a reasonable expectation that the corporation would treat him in a certain way; and (2) that the corporation breached that reasonable expectation (BCE Inc. v. 1976 Debentureholders, 2008 SCC 69, [2008] 3 S.C.R. 560, at para. 68). The action is an equitable action to protect reasonable and legitimate shareholder expectations — the "cornerstone of the oppression remedy" (BCE, at para. 61). Evidence of shareholder expectations is essential to whether conduct has been oppressive in a particular case (BCE, at para. 59; P. Martel, Business Corporations in Canada: Legal and Practical Aspects (loose-leaf), at p. 31-67; D. H. Peterson and M. J. Cumming, Shareholder Remedies in Canada (2nd ed. (loose-leaf)), at §§ 17.41 to 17.43; D. S. Morritt, S. L. Bjorkquist and A. D. Coleman, The Oppression Remedy (loose-leaf), at p. 3-2).

[85] I do not find it necessary to determine whether there was an effective transfer of Mr. Mennillo's shares in Intramodal inc. to Mr. Rosati. Suffice it to say that among other things, assessing the nature of the prestations that the parties decided to provide each other under an "onerous contract" — Mr. Rosati gets Mr. Mennillo's shares in exchange

[83] M. Mennillo a intenté un recours pour abus. Il reproche à Intramodal inc. d'avoir agi de façon abusive en le dépouillant de sa qualité d'actionnaire dans les registres de la société.

[84] Pour établir l'abus, l'actionnaire doit prouver (1) qu'il s'attendait raisonnablement à ce que la société le traite d'une certaine manière et (2) que la société a frustré cette attente raisonnable (BCE Inc. c. Détenteurs de débentures de 1976, 2008 CSC 69, [2008] 3 R.C.S. 560, par. 68). Issu de l'equity, le recours vise à protéger les attentes raisonnables et légitimes de l'actionnaire, lesquelles constituent la « pierre angulaire [du recours] pour abus » (BCE, par. 61). La preuve des attentes de l'actionnaire est essentielle pour qualifier un comportement d'abusif dans une situation donnée (BCE, par. 59; P. Martel, La société par actions au Québec, vol. I, Les aspects juridiques (feuilles mobiles), par. 31-197 et 31-198; D. H. Peterson et M. J. Cumming, Shareholder Remedies in Canada (2e éd. (feuilles mobiles)), § 17.41 à 17.43; D. S. Morritt, S. L. Bjorkquist et A. D. Coleman, The Oppression Remedy (feuilles mobiles), p. 3-2).

[85] Je n'estime pas nécessaire de décider s'il y a effectivement eu transfert à M. Rosati des actions de M. Mennillo dans Intramodal inc. Je me contente de dire que, entre autres choses, la question de la nature des prestations que les parties se sont consenties l'une à l'autre par voie de « contrat à titre onéreux » — M. Rosati obtenant les actions de M. Mennillo of Intramodal inc. relieving Mr. Mennillo of his obligation to guarantee Intramodal inc.'s debts — is an issue that leaves me somewhat perplexed (a point made by Côté J. at para. 229 of her dissenting reasons).

[86] Be that as it may, in my view, this appeal can be disposed of on the basis that Mr. Mennillo has failed to show a reasonable expectation that he would not be removed as a shareholder from Intramodal inc.'s books. The trial judge found that Mr. Mennillo agreed that his shares should be transferred to Mr. Rosati: [TRANSLATION] "Mennillo refused to participate in this venture [that is, to be an equity shareholder in Intramodal] and asked to be removed from the company as a shareholder and director as of May 25, 2005" (2012 QCCS 1640, at para. 74 (CanLII)).

[87] Having asked to be removed as a shareholder, Mr. Mennillo had no reasonable expectation that he would remain on the books as a shareholder. This is confirmed by the fact that subsequently Mr. Mennillo ceased to conduct himself as an equity shareholder and advanced money as loans. The trial judge's finding of fact is supported by the evidence.

[88] Mr. Mennillo has failed to establish a reasonable expectation that he would remain a shareholder in Intramodal inc. It follows that his action for oppression must fail. Consequently, the trial judge did not err in denying Mr. Mennillo's claim.

[89] I would dismiss the appeal.

I. Introduction

[90] It is sometimes essential to go back to the basics of the law to render the decision that is appropriate in the circumstances. It is just as essential to recall some of those basics.

en contrepartie de la libération de ce dernier par Intramodal inc. de son obligation de garantir le passif de la société — me laisse quelque peu perplexe (le point est soulevé par la juge Côté au par. 229 de ses motifs dissidents).

[86] Quoi qu'il en soit, le fait que M. Mennillo n'a pas démontré qu'il pouvait raisonnablement s'attendre à continuer de figurer à titre d'actionnaire dans les registres d'Intramodal inc. permet de statuer sur le pourvoi. Le juge de première instance conclut que M. Mennillo a accepté que ses actions devaient être cédées à M. Rosati : « [M.] Mennillo a refusé cette aventure [c'est-à-dire être actionnaire participatif d'Intramodal] et a demandé son retrait de la compagnie à titre d'actionnaire et d'administrateur à compter du 25 mai 2005 » (2012 QCCS 1640, par. 74 (CanLII)).

[87] Ayant demandé à ne plus être actionnaire, M. Mennillo ne pouvait pas raisonnablement s'attendre à ce que les registres de la société continuent de faire état de sa qualité d'actionnaire. Cela est d'ailleurs confirmé par le fait qu'il a cessé par la suite d'agir comme actionnaire participatif et a avancé des fonds sous forme de prêts. Cette conclusion de fait du juge de première instance trouve appui dans la preuve.

[89] Je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

LA JUGE CÔTÉ (dissidente) —

I. Introduction

[90] Il est parfois essentiel de revenir aux fondements du droit afin de rendre la décision qui s'impose dans certaines circonstances. Il est tout aussi essentiel de rappeler certains de ces fondements.

[91] Two key principles are deeply rooted in Canadian corporate law and cannot simply be disregarded or ignored: the principle that a corporation's legal personality is distinct from that of its shareholder or shareholders, and the principle or rule of the maintenance of capital.

[92] In my view, both the trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal completely disregarded these two principles in their analysis.

[93] With respect, the analysis that is required in the circumstances cannot disregard the interplay between Quebec civil law and the Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-44 ("CBCA"), and must neither weaken the strict formal requirements of corporate law — in this area, forma dat esse rei — nor confuse the business corporation with the partnership. Care must be taken not to assume that the registration of a transfer of shares means that there was a contract for the transfer of shares. Like the trial judge's assertion that shares can be issued conditionally without the corporation approving the issuance and that of the majority of the Court of Appeal that a share issuance may be cancelled retroactively without any formalities, the solution proposed by the majority cannot, in my view, be reconciled with the basic principles of corporate law and the civil law.

[95] The appellant, Johnny Mennillo, objects to a resolution passed by the respondent corporation, Intramodal Inc., and to its registration in its registers of a transfer of his shares to its majority shareholder, Mario Rosati. Although Intramodal initially argued, with a supporting affidavit, that the appellant had never been one of its shareholders, it now acknowledges that he was indeed a shareholder, but it refuses, contrary to the law and to its own articles and by-laws, to recognize that he now has that

[94] Je ne puis donc me résoudre à souscrire à l'opinion de la majorité.

status and is entitled to the advantages associated therewith.

[96] It is also important to be clear that this is a proceeding brought by the appellant against Intramodal under s. 241 CBCA. Contrary to what my colleague seems to be suggesting, this is not a case in which one shareholder sues another over the ownership of his or her shares in a company. Mr. Rosati is not a party to this litigation.

[97] In his claim, the appellant asked that the resolution passed by the respondent company be revoked and that its registers be rectified. This means that, although he brought this claim under s. 241 CBCA, he could also have done so under s. 243 CBCA (rectification of registers) or s. 247 CBCA (failure by a corporation to comply with the legislation or with its articles or by-laws). The appellant submitted that Intramodal had breached its legal duties by passing the resolution in question and registering the transfer of his shares although none of the formalities required by law had been observed. He argued that the respondent company's conduct in refusing to recognize his status as a shareholder was oppressive and that a remedy was appropriate under s. 241 CBCA. In addition to a declaration that he had always remained a shareholder of the company, the appellant asked, as a consequence, that the resolution approving the transfer of his shares be revoked and that the company's registers be rectified accordingly.

[98] The trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal found that the appellant's claim was without merit on the ground that he had, in their view, expressed an intention in May 2005 to withdraw from the respondent company both as a director and officer and as a shareholder. It was therefore open to Intramodal to register the transfer of the appellant's shares to Mr. Rosati despite the fact that there had been no exchange of wills with regard to the terms of the appellant's withdrawal and even though the principal formalities required by law for the transfer of shares had not been observed. The dissenting judge found that his colleagues were disregarding the formal requirements of corporate law.

[97] Dans le cadre de son recours, l'appelant demande l'annulation de la résolution adoptée par la société intimée et la rectification de ses registres. En ce sens, son recours, bien que tombant sous le coup de l'art. 241 LCSA, aurait également pu être entrepris en vertu des art. 243 LCSA (rectification des registres) ou 247 LCSA (inobservation par la société de la loi ou de ses statuts ou règlements). L'appelant soutient qu'Intramodal a manqué à ses obligations légales en adoptant ladite résolution et en procédant à l'inscription du transfert de ses actions, alors qu'aucune des formalités requises par la loi n'avait été accomplie. La conduite de la société intimée, par son refus de reconnaître son statut d'actionnaire, est selon lui abusive et un redressement s'impose en vertu de l'art. 241 LCSA. En sus d'une déclaration selon laquelle il est toujours demeuré actionnaire de la société, l'appelant demande donc l'annulation de la résolution avalisant le transfert de ses actions de même que la rectification des registres de la société en conséquence.

[99] According to the trial judge, the majority of the Court of Appeal and my colleagues, the fact that a shareholder expresses an intention to withdraw from a business corporation bars the shareholder from bringing any oppression proceeding for the express purpose of seeking recognition of his or her status as a shareholder. My colleague Cromwell J. finds that, in the civil law of Quebec, the expression of such an intention is equivalent to a transfer of shares. In other words, it is sufficient to cause a person to lose his or her status as a shareholder.

[100] With respect, I am of the view that the fact that one shareholder claims he and his fellow shareholder entered into an agreement for the transfer of shares does not relieve the corporation of its legal duty to make the necessary inquiries before passing a resolution approving that transfer of shares and registering the transfer in its registers. It is clear from the evidence that Intramodal did not discharge any of its legal duties in this regard. If the respondent company had made the proper inquiries, it would have discovered that the appellant's share certificate (Intramodal share certificate No. 2) had not been endorsed, contrary to the requirements of the CBCA and to the transfer restrictions set out on the share certificate itself and in the company's articles. It should then have refrained from registering the transfer in its registers. As well, the impugned resolution should not have been passed.

[101] In my opinion, Intramodal instead confused its interests with those of its majority shareholder, took a disturbingly lax approach in preparing its corporate documents and displayed wilful blindness as regards its legal duties. That confusion was particularly obvious — to say the least — in each of the courts below, and in this Court, where Intramodal vigorously defended the interests of its majority shareholder, who did not even see fit to intervene in the case but instead used Intramodal as his puppet. Intramodal could of course have defended itself on the allegations made against it, but it chose instead to expend its energy on defending an alleged agreement to which it was not even a party without even

[101] À mon avis, Intramodal a plutôt confondu ses intérêts avec ceux de son actionnaire majoritaire et fait preuve d'un laxisme troublant dans la préparation de sa documentation corporative, ainsi que d'aveuglement volontaire quant au respect de ses obligations légales. Cette confusion a été plus qu'apparente — pour dire le moins — devant chacune des juridictions inférieures, et devant notre Cour, où Intramodal s'est employée à défendre vigoureusement les intérêts de son actionnaire majoritaire, lequel n'a même pas jugé bon d'intervenir au litige, utilisant plutôt Intramodal comme sa marionnette. Intramodal pouvait certainement se défendre des reproches formulés à son endroit, bothering to determine its scope or verify that it was genuine.

[102] By focusing solely on the scope of the alleged agreement between the appellant and Mr. Rosati without considering the respondent company's conduct, its failure to discharge its legal duties and the consequences of that failure, the trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal disregarded the company's distinct legal personality as well as the basic requirements of corporate law. Rather than punishing the respondent company's unlawful conduct, they chose to endorse its actions.

[103] In addition, the trial judge made palpable and overriding errors and disregarded key evidence in arriving at the conclusion that Mr. Mennillo had transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati in May 2005.

[104] Finally, I find that the trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal also erred in concluding that the appellant's claim was prescribed. In this Court, the parties agreed that the appellant was, at least at some point, a shareholder of Intramodal. By challenging the respondent company's decision for unlawfully depriving him of his status, the appellant is exercising a remedy that, by its very nature, relates to his right of ownership in his shares. Neither the CBCA nor the Civil Code of Québec ("C.C.Q.") provides that extinctive prescription applies in such a case. As I will explain below, the ownership of shares, as opposed to the rights conferred by them, is not subject to extinctive prescription in Quebec. As a result, the three-year prescription period provided for in art. 2925 C.C.Q. cannot be set up against the appellant's claim for oppression.

[105] For these reasons, I am of the opinion that the appeal should be allowed.

mais elle a plutôt choisi de consacrer ses énergies à la défense d'une prétendue entente à laquelle elle n'était même pas partie et dont elle ne s'était même pas donné la peine de déterminer l'étendue et de vérifier l'authenticité.

[102] Le juge de première instance et les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, en s'attachant uniquement à la portée de la prétendue entente conclue entre l'appelant et M. Rosati, sans égard à la conduite de la société intimée, au non-respect de ses obligations légales et aux conséquences de ce non-respect, ont fait fi de la personnalité juridique distincte de celle-ci ainsi que des prescriptions élémentaires du droit des sociétés. Plutôt que de sanctionner la conduite illégale de la société intimée, ils ont choisi de cautionner ses agissements.

II. Facts

[106] In 2004, the appellant and his long-time friend, Mr. Rosati — who worked for Canvec Logistics at the time — discussed the possibility of forming a road transportation company. They agreed that the appellant would provide the start-up financing and that Mr. Rosati would contribute his skills and contacts.

[107] In April 2004, the name "Intramodal" was reserved with Quebec's Enterprise Registrar ("REQ"). The respondent company was incorporated on July 13, 2004. Its certificate of incorporation and its registers confirm that Mr. Rosati and Mr. Mennillo were appointed directors and officers and that Mr. Rosati held 51 and Mr. Mennillo 49 (share certificates No. 1 and No. 2) of the 100 Class "A" common shares that were issued for $1 each.

[108] On May 25, 2005, Mr. Mennillo resigned as a director and officer of Intramodal. A notice of resignation prepared by Daniel Ovadia, acting as Intramodal's lawyer, was sent to Mr. Mennillo, who signed it and faxed it back to Mr. Ovadia. The notice in question did not mention Mr. Mennillo's status as a shareholder but referred only to his removal as a director and officer. The reasons for the resignation were in dispute at trial, as Mr. Mennillo and Mr. Rosati offered conflicting interpretations of the events.

[109] Intramodal remained inactive for several months. The evidence shows that on July 18, 2005, Mr. Ovadia filed an amending declaration with the REQ that specified that the appellant had been removed as a director and officer, and as a shareholder. The declaration in question was signed by Mr. Ovadia, but not by the appellant.

[110] On August 5, 2005, Mr. Rosati ceased working for Canvec Logistics. He then dedicated himself full time to getting Intramodal off the ground. In the

II. Les faits

[106] Au cours de l'année 2004, l'appelant et son ami de longue date, M. Rosati — qui travaille alors chez Canvec Logistique —, discutent de la possibilité de créer une société œuvrant dans le domaine du transport routier. Ils conviennent que l'appelant en financera le démarrage et que M. Rosati y contribuera par le biais de ses compétences et de ses contacts.

[107] En avril 2004, le nom d'Intramodal est réservé auprès du Registraire des entreprises du Québec (« REQ »). La société intimée est constituée le 13 juillet 2004. Le certificat de constitution et les registres de la société confirment que MM. Rosati et Mennillo en sont nommés administrateurs et dirigeants et qu'ils détiennent respectivement 51 pour M. Rosati et 49 pour M. Mennillo (certificats d'actions nº 1 et nº 2) des 100 actions ordinaires de catégorie « A » émises au prix d'un dollar chacune.

[109] Intramodal demeurera inactive pendant plusieurs mois. La preuve révèle que le 18 juillet 2005, Me Ovadia a déposé auprès du REQ une déclaration modificative prévoyant le retrait de l'appelant à titre d'administrateur et de dirigeant, ainsi que d'actionnaire. La déclaration en question porte la signature de Me Ovadia. Nulle part toutefois n'y apparaît celle de l'appelant.

[110] Le 5 août 2005, M. Rosati cesse de travailler pour Canvec Logistique. Il s'investit alors à temps plein dans le démarrage d'Intramodal. À fall of 2005, money was advanced by Mr. Mennillo. Intramodal officially began operating in December. Mr. Mennillo continued advancing money, which was used to finance the company's operations. As advances were made by Mr. Mennillo, the loaned amounts were recorded on cards of a Rolodex initialled by Mr. Rosati. A total of $440,000 was advanced in that way between June 2004 and October 2006.

[111] That amount was repaid in full by Intramodal between July 3, 2006 and December 7, 2009 by means of cheques marked "consultation fees" or "management fees". During that period, Mr. Mennillo was thus paid $690,000, which included interest and a premium, plus the applicable taxes.

[112] By 2006, the company founded by Mr. Mennillo and Mr. Rosati had become very successful.

[113] On March 24, 2006, Mr. Rosati filed with the REQ an annual declaration dated February 8, 2006 in which Mr. Mennillo was still listed as a shareholder of the company.

[114] In July 2007, at a dinner among friends, an argument broke out when Mr. Mennillo learned of the company's success. That same year (the exact date is not in evidence), Intramodal passed a retroactive resolution acknowledging Mr. Mennillo's resignation as a director and officer and approving the transfer of his shares to Mr. Rosati. That resolution, which is at the heart of this litigation and which shows that Mr. Mennillo was a shareholder of the company, at least before the transfer, was not signed by Mr. Mennillo. Nor did he ever endorse his share certificate, which remained in Intramodal's possession at all times and was never delivered to the purported transferee.

l'automne 2005, des sommes d'argent sont avancées par M. Mennillo. En décembre, les activités d'Intramodal débutent officiellement. M. Mennillo continue d'avancer des sommes d'argent qui sont utilisées pour financer les activités de la société. Au fur et à mesure que M. Mennillo fait ces avances, les sommes prêtées sont consignées sur les fiches d'un Rolodex avec les initiales de M. Rosati. Au total, 440 000 $ seront ainsi avancés entre juin 2004 et octobre 2006.

[111] Ce montant sera remboursé en totalité par Intramodal au cours de la période du 3 juillet 2006 au 7 décembre 2009, et ce, au moyen de chèques portant la mention [TRADUCTION] « frais de consultation » ou « frais de gestion » (« consultation fees » ou « management fees »). Une somme de 690 000 $, incluant les intérêts et une prime à laquelle s'ajoutent les taxes applicables, est donc versée à M. Mennillo durant cette période.

[114] En juillet 2007, lors d'un souper entre amis, la discorde éclate alors que M. Mennillo prend conscience du succès de l'entreprise. En 2007 (la date exacte n'est pas établie par la preuve), Intramodal adopte une résolution avec effet rétroactif qui reconnaît la démission de M. Mennillo à titre d'administrateur et de dirigeant et qui entérine le transfert de ses actions à M. Rosati. Cette résolution, qui est au cœur du présent litige et qui atteste que, à tout le moins avant le transfert, M. Mennillo était actionnaire de la société, n'est pas signée par lui. Par ailleurs, le certificat d'actions de M. Mennillo ne sera jamais endossé par lui non plus. Il demeurera en tout temps entre les mains d'Intramodal et ne sera jamais délivré à son prétendu cessionnaire.

Papadimitriou, an accountant who was retained by several of the appellant's businesses, Paolo Carzoli, a tax lawyer who had been consulted by Mr. Papadimitriou for the occasion, and Israel Kaufman, a commercial lawyer consulted by the appellant to structure the proposed transaction. The appellant and Mr. Rosati also gave different accounts of the purpose of those discussions: according to the appellant, the purpose of the discussions was to determine a price for the redemption of his shares, while Mr. Rosati claimed that their purpose was to increase the amount of the repayment to be made to the appellant. The appellant's version was corroborated in this regard by Mr. Papadimitriou, Mr. Carzoli and Mr. Kaufman.

suivantes : Antoine Papadimitriou, comptable dont les services sont retenus par plusieurs entreprises de l'appelant, Me Paolo Carzoli, avocat fiscaliste consulté par M. Papadimitriou pour l'occasion et Me Israel Kaufman, avocat commercialiste consulté par l'appelant pour le montage de l'opération projetée. L'appelant et M. Rosati offrent également des versions différentes quant à l'objet de ces discussions : selon l'appelant, ces discussions ont pour but de fixer le prix pour le rachat de ses actions, alors que selon M. Rosati, elles visent à augmenter le montant du remboursement à verser à l'appelant. La version de l'appelant est toutefois corroborée sous ce rapport par M. Papadimitriou, Me Carzoli et Me Kaufman.

[116] Le 22 décembre 2008, Intramodal modifie ses statuts en supprimant tous les droits et privilèges afférents aux actions de catégories « A » à « G » de son capital pour les remplacer par de nouveaux droits et privilèges afférents aux actions de catégories « A » à « I ». De nouvelles actions sont émises à Fiducie Intra 4 (une fiducie créée par M. Rosati) et à M. Rosati lui-même.

[117] On December 7, 2009, the appellant met Mr. Rosati at a restaurant and Mr. Rosati gave him a $40,000 cheque from Intramodal marked "Full and Final Payment". A few days after that payment, the appellant consulted his lawyer, who then checked the "CIDREQ" reports available online and obtained copies of the declarations filed with the REQ by Intramodal. Noting that the appellant was no longer listed as a shareholder, the lawyer told him about this discovery.

[117] Le 7 décembre 2009, l'appelant rencontre M. Rosati dans un restaurant et ce dernier lui remet un chèque de 40 000 $ tiré par Intramodal, sur lequel apparaît la mention [TRADUCTION] « règlement total et définitif » (« Full and Final Payment »). Quelques jours après ce paiement, l'appelant consulte son avocat, qui examine alors les rapports « CIDREQ » disponibles en ligne et obtient copie des déclarations déposées par Intramodal auprès du REQ. Il constate que l'appelant n'apparaît plus comme actionnaire et l'informe de sa découverte.

[118] On February 25, 2010, Mr. Kaufman sent Intramodal a formal notice. The appellant filed a claim for oppression against the respondent company on September 7, 2010.

[118] Le 25 février 2010, Me Kaufman envoie une mise en demeure à Intramodal. L'appelant intente un recours pour abus contre la société intimée le 7 septembre 2010.

[119] The appellant's version of the events that led to the dispute differs from Mr. Rosati's.

[119] La version de l'appelant et celle de M. Rosati diffèrent quant aux événements ayant mené au différend en cause.

[120] Mr. Rosati maintains that in the initial agreement, the appellant undertook to finance the respondent company and guarantee its debts. At trial, he testified that his relationship with the appellant had begun to deteriorate in July 2004. According to Mr. Rosati, the appellant expressed serious doubts at that time about his ability to successfully implement their plan. Mr. Mennillo discussed this with Mr. Rosati and told him that he intended to withdraw from the company. Mr. Rosati acknowledges that he and Mr. Mennillo at no time formally established the terms of such a withdrawal. According to Mr. Rosati, the company had not yet started operating at the time of their discussion on this subject. Mr. Rosati insisted that the appellant continue financing him, and the appellant agreed to provide him with $300,000.

[121] The appellant categorically denies that he ever expressed an intention to withdraw from the company as a shareholder. He also denies that there was an agreement on his withdrawal as a shareholder. He admits withdrawing solely as a director and an officer, as is confirmed by his notice of resignation, and says that he did so at his friend's request. According to the appellant, a few weeks before May 25, 2005, Mr. Rosati told him that people from the Labatt Brewing Company Ltd. — a potential client — wanted to look at Intramodal's registers. Mr. Mennillo testified that Mr. Rosati told him at that time that it would be better that he withdraw while the necessary verifications were being carried out. According to Mr. Mennillo's own testimony, he resigned as a director and officer only after being promised that he would be reinstated. It was Mr. Rosati, through his lawyer, who sent the appellant a letter of resignation, which the appellant signed immediately.

[122] More specifically, the appellant's and Mr. Rosati's versions of the following events are diametrically opposed:

– With regard to a meeting at a restaurant on July 14, 2007, Mr. Rosati maintains that the appellant told him he was dissatisfied with the return on his loan. The two of them then decided to schedule a meeting to determine the amount to which the appellant was entitled in order to settle their dispute. According to Mr. Rosati, le financement de la société intimée et à garantir son passif. Au procès, il a témoigné que sa relation avec l'appelant avait commencé à se détériorer à partir de juillet 2004. Toujours selon M. Rosati, l'appelant aurait alors exprimé de sérieux doutes quant à sa capacité à mener à bien leur projet. M. Mennillo en a discuté avec M. Rosati et lui a fait part de son intention de se retirer de la société. M. Rosati reconnaît que lui et M. Mennillo n'ont jamais formellement établi les modalités d'un tel retrait. Leur discussion à cet égard survient, toujours selon M. Rosati, alors que les activités de la société n'ont pas encore débuté. M. Rosati insiste pour que l'appelant continue de le financer, ce qu'il convient de faire à hauteur de 300 000 $.

[121] L'appelant, pour sa part, nie catégoriquement avoir manifesté, à quelque moment que ce soit, son intention de se retirer de la société comme actionnaire. Il nie de plus qu'il y ait eu entente visant son retrait comme actionnaire. Il admet s'être retiré uniquement à titre d'administrateur et de dirigeant, comme le confirme son avis de démission, et ce, à la demande de son ami. L'appelant affirme que quelques semaines avant le 25 mai 2005, ce dernier lui aurait indiqué que des gens de La Brasserie Labatt Ltée — un client potentiel — souhaitaient consulter les registres d'Intramodal. M. Mennillo témoigne que M. Rosati lui a alors indiqué qu'il valait mieux qu'il se retire le temps que les vérifications nécessaires soient faites. Selon son propre témoignage, M. Mennillo n'aurait démissionné comme administrateur et dirigeant que sous promesse d'être rétabli dans ses fonctions. C'est M. Rosati qui, par l'entremise de son avocat, lui fait parvenir une lettre de démission que l'appelant signe immédiatement.

– Concernant une rencontre au restaurant le 14 juillet 2007, M. Rosati soutient que l'appelant lui a indiqué qu'il était insatisfait du rendement de son prêt. Tous les deux ont alors décidé de fixer une rencontre afin de déterminer le montant auquel l'appelant a droit et mettre fin à leur différend. Les rencontres subséquentes the purpose of the subsequent meetings in 2007 was to increase the amount on which they had already agreed.

– The appellant maintains that it was on July 14, 2007 that he realized Intramodal was doing very well. A meeting was scheduled not only to agree on the repayment of the loans, but also to determine a price for the redemption of his shares. Discussions on this subject took place on several occasions in 2007, but they were unsuccessful. It was not until December 2009, as a result of Mr. Kaufman's inquiries, that the appellant learned he was no longer a shareholder of Intramodal.

[123] However, Mr. Rosati and Mr. Mennillo agree on one point. There was no mention whatsoever on May 25, 2005 of the sale, exchange or gift of shares. At most, according to Mr. Rosati, because the appellant expressed an intention to withdraw from Intramodal whereas his shares had been issued to him on condition that he finance the company and guarantee its debts, he lost his status as a shareholder at that time. This is the version of the facts that was accepted by the trial judge.

III. Decisions of the Courts Below

A. Quebec Superior Court, 2012 QCCS 1640 (Poirier J.)

[124] The trial judge was of the view that the outcome of this case depended entirely on the credibility of the witnesses. He stated that the appellant's testimony and that of Mr. Rosati were contradictory with respect to three events in particular, namely:

– the appellant's resignation as a director and an officer of Intramodal on May 25, 2005;

– the meeting of July 14, 2007 at the restaurant and the meeting between the appellant and Mr. Rosati on July 21, 2007; and ayant eu lieu en 2007 visaient, toujours selon M. Rosati, à augmenter le montant déjà convenu.

– L'appelant soutient que c'est le 14 juillet 2007 qu'il a réalisé qu'Intramodal avait le vent dans les voiles. Une rencontre est fixée, non seulement pour convenir du remboursement des prêts, mais également pour déterminer le prix de rachat de ses actions. Des discussions à ce sujet auront lieu à plusieurs reprises en 2007, mais avorteront. Ce n'est qu'en décembre 2009, suite aux vérifications de Me Kaufman, qu'il apprendra qu'il n'est plus actionnaire d'Intramodal.

[123] MM. Rosati et Mennillo s'entendent toutefois sur un point. Le 25 mai 2005, il n'a jamais été question de vente, d'échange ou de donation d'actions. Tout au plus, selon M. Rosati, l'appelant ayant manifesté son intention de se retirer d'Intramodal alors que ses actions lui avaient été émises conditionnellement à ce qu'il finance la société et en garantisse le passif, il a alors perdu son statut d'actionnaire. C'est cette version des faits qui a été retenue par le juge de première instance.

III. Décisions antérieures

A. Cour supérieure du Québec, 2012 QCCS 1640 (le juge Poirier)

[124] Le juge de première instance estime que l'issue de la présente affaire repose entièrement sur la crédibilité des témoins. Il indique que le témoignage de l'appelant et celui de M. Rosati sont contradictoires quant à trois événements en particulier, à savoir :

– la démission de l'appelant à titre d'administrateur et de dirigeant d'Intramodal en date du 25 mai 2005;

– la rencontre du 14 juillet 2007 au restaurant ainsi que celle entre l'appelant et M. Rosati le 21 juillet 2007;

– the series of meetings with the appellant's accountant between October and December 2007.

[125] On the first of those events, the trial judge found that the reason for the appellant's withdrawal as a director and an officer [TRANSLATION] "cannot be linked to the visit to Intramodal's premises and the examination of the company's books by representatives of Labatt", thus rejecting the appellant's claim that Mr. Rosati had asked him to resign to reassure that potential client (para. 29 (CanLII)). The trial judge rejected the appellant's version with respect to the other events as well.

[127] He concluded from the evidence as a whole that the appellant had held 49 common shares on condition that he finance Intramodal's operations and guarantee all of its debts once it began operating as a business. He also found that the shares had been distributed as follows when the respondent company was incorporated: 51 percent to Mr. Rosati and 49 percent to the appellant.

[128] More importantly, the trial judge found that it was the appellant who had asked to be removed from the company (both as a director and officer and as a shareholder) effective May 25, 2005. As of that date, in the trial judge's view, the appellant became merely a lender of $440,000 to Intramodal's sole shareholder, namely Mr. Rosati. In other words, because the appellant's shares had been issued on condition that he finance Intramodal's operations and guarantee its debts, those shares were transferred to Mr. Rosati when the appellant expressed a wish to be relieved of his obligations to Intramodal. The appellant nevertheless continued financing Intramodal's operations after May 25, 2005. The trial judge added that [TRANSLATION] "[t]he failure to complete the transfer of [the appellant's] shares to Rosati resulted from an error or oversight on the part of Rosati's lawyer" (para. 74).

– la série de rencontres avec le comptable de l'appelant, d'octobre à décembre 2007.

[127] Il retient de l'ensemble de la preuve que l'appelant a détenu 49 actions ordinaires conditionnellement à ce qu'il finance les activités d'Intramodal et garantisse l'ensemble de son passif dès que débuteraient les activités de l'entreprise. Il retient également que, lors de la constitution de la société intimée, les actions ont été réparties de la façon suivante : 51 p. 100 pour M. Rosati et 49 p. 100 pour l'appelant.

[128] Plus important encore, le juge de première instance retient que c'est l'appelant qui a demandé son retrait de la société (tant à titre d'administrateur et de dirigeant que d'actionnaire) à compter du 25 mai 2005. Selon lui, à partir de ce jour, l'appelant devenait simple prêteur d'une somme de 440 000 $ au seul actionnaire d'Intramodal, à savoir M. Rosati. En d'autres termes, dans la mesure où l'émission des actions de l'appelant était conditionnelle à ce que celui-ci finance les activités d'Intramodal et garantisse son passif, les actions ont été cédées à M. Rosati lorsque l'appelant a exprimé le souhait d'être libéré de ses obligations à l'égard d'Intramodal. L'appelant a pourtant continué à financer les activités d'Intramodal après le 25 mai 2005. Le juge de première instance ajoute que « [l]e fait que la cession des actions de [l'appelant] à Rosati n'ait pas été complétée résulte de l'erreur ou l'oubli de la part de

In short, in his opinion, the appellant was no longer a shareholder, director or officer of Intramodal, which meant that his claim had to be dismissed.

B. Quebec Court of Appeal, 2014 QCCA 1515

(1) Reasons of the Majority (Vézina and St-Pierre JJ.A.)

[129] The majority of the Court of Appeal, per Vézina J.A., agreed with the trial judge that the outcome of this case depended on the credibility of the witnesses. In the majority's view, the trial judge had not made any palpable and overriding error that warranted the intervention of the Court of Appeal. Moreover, his assessment of the facts, including the finding that the appellant had been excluded from Intramodal as a shareholder at his own request, necessarily led to the conclusion that the claim had to be dismissed.

[130] Furthermore, the majority found that little weight should be given to the business records in this case, because the relevant documents had been prepared in a sloppy manner. They gave some examples of this, noting that, [TRANSLATION] "[c]learly, neither the parties nor their professional advisers were concerned about paperwork and formalities" and that it was therefore not surprising that the appellant's removal as a shareholder had not been properly registered (para. 216 (CanLII)). The majority added that [TRANSLATION] "[t]his lack of duly completed and reliable documents means that it will be necessary to look to the evidence as a whole, including the depositions, in order to determine what really happened in this case and what the parties actually agreed to" (para. 219).

[131] After considering the evidence relating to the three events analyzed by the trial judge, the majority of the Court of Appeal concluded as follows:

[TRANSLATION] Counsel for Mennillo argues that Mennillo cannot have both been a shareholder and not been a shareholder. Rosati admits that he was one, so it is up to him to prove that he ceased to be one. Hence the issue of the $49 discussed above.

l'avocat de Rosati » (par. 74). Bref, selon lui, l'appelant n'est plus détenteur d'aucune action ni administrateur ou dirigeant d'Intramodal. Son recours doit par conséquent être rejeté.

B. Cour d'appel du Québec, 2014 QCCA 1515

(1) Motifs des juges majoritaires (les juges Vézina et St-Pierre)

Selon son avocat, Mennillo ne peut avoir été actionnaire et ne pas l'avoir été. Or, Rosati admet qu'il l'a été, donc c'est à lui de prouver qu'il a cessé de l'être. D'où la question des 49 $, ci-dessus traitée.

In my opinion, and this is the only point on which I have any doubt with respect to the judgment: Can it be concluded that there was a genuine transfer of the shares from Mennillo to Rosati? It seems to me, rather, that they quite simply agreed on May 25, 2005 to retroactively cancel their agreement to associate with one another that they had originally entered into in 2004. The agreement had been reached informally, as was the cancellation thereof.

In this sense, it can be said that Mennillo was a shareholder of Intramodal and that he never was one. This is the case for any contract that is annulled ab initio (from the start). The owner of an immovable who applies for annulment remains the owner until the judgment, but the next day is deemed never to have been the owner. If a marriage contract is annulled, the marriage is nonetheless a putative marriage. The spouse in good faith was never married, but it is as if he or she were, as that spouse benefits from the effects of marriage.

Ultimately, it does not matter how Mennillo's removal from the company on May 25, 2005 occurred, since the parties themselves did not see fit to clarify this and observe the formalities. Whether their initial agreement was cancelled or the shares were redeemed, the fact is that only Rosati remained in the company, and he subsequently developed his business for himself and his family. [Emphasis added; paras. 224-27.]

[132] In short, although the majority did not intervene with respect to the trial judge's findings of fact, they did express doubts about his conclusion that the appellant's shares had been transferred to Mr. Rosati. There was no evidence that the terms of the appellant's removal as a shareholder had been discussed. In the majority's view, even though the two men had in fact agreed on the appellant's removal, they had not seen fit to specify how this was to occur. Vézina and St-Pierre JJ.A. held that insofar as the initial agreement had been entered into without any formalities, it could be cancelled in the same way.

(2) Reasons of the Dissenting Judge (Gagnon J.A.)

[133] Gagnon J.A. would have allowed the appeal on the basis that the trial judge's reasons contained

À mon avis, et c'est le seul point où j'ai un doute par rapport au jugement : peut-on conclure qu'il y a eu véritablement cession des actions de Mennillo à Rosati? Il me semble plutôt que, tout simplement, ils conviennent le 25 mai 2005 d'annuler rétroactivement leur entente d'association convenue au départ en 2004. L'entente avait été conclue sans aucun formalisme, de même son annulation.

Et en ce sens, on peut affirmer que Mennillo a été actionnaire d'Intramodal et qu'il ne l'a jamais été. C'est le cas dans tout contrat annulé ab initio (depuis le début). Le propriétaire d'un immeuble qui en demande l'annulation demeure propriétaire jusqu'au jugement, le lendemain il est réputé ne jamais l'avoir été. Si un contrat de mariage est annulé, ce n'en est pas moins un mariage putatif, et l'époux de bonne foi n'a jamais été marié, mais c'est tout comme, il (ou elle) bénéficie des effets du mariage.

Enfin, peu importe comment s'est effectué le retrait de Mennillo de l'entreprise le 25 mai 2005 puisque les intéressés n'ont pas jugé bon eux-mêmes de le préciser et d'y mettre les formes. Que ce soit par annulation de leur entente initiale ou par rachat d'actions, le fait est que seul Rosati est demeuré dans la société et, par la suite, il a développé son entreprise pour lui et les siens. [Je souligne; par. 224-227.]

(2) Motifs du juge dissident (le juge Gagnon)

[133] Le juge Gagnon aurait pour sa part accueilli l'appel au motif que le jugement de première

errors of law and palpable and overriding errors of fact. Among other things, he faulted the trial judge, and the majority, for disregarding the law and the respondent company's articles and by-laws by reducing the case to no more than one of credibility.

[134] In Gagnon J.A.'s view, the trial judge was wrong to find that the appellant's ownership of 49 common shares of Intramodal was [TRANSLATION] "conditional" (para. 32). The legislation does not provide for conditional shareholder status, he said. Moreover, there was nothing in the respondent company's registers to support such a position.

[135] Gagnon J.A. added that [TRANSLATION] "status as a shareholder cannot depend on an informal agreement between individuals and on whether one of them chooses to resiliate it or not to resiliate it" (para. 32). He expressed the opinion that the evidence adduced at trial concerning the appellant's status as a shareholder for the period from July 13, 2004 to May 25, 2005 was indisputable. In his view, there was no doubt that the appellant was one of Intramodal's two founding shareholders. The only issue was therefore whether he ceased to be a shareholder at some point and, if so, how.

[136] On the question of a possible transfer of the appellant's shares to Mr. Rosati, Gagnon J.A. found that the onus was on Mr. Rosati to show that he was the duly registered transferee of the appellant's shares pursuant to s. 53(d) CBCA.

[137] In response to the respondent company's argument that the appellant's failure to make good on his undertaking to guarantee the company's debts amounted to the price paid by Mr. Rosati to acquire his shares, Gagnon J.A. observed that this confused the company's interests with those of its majority shareholder and also disregarded their distinct legal personalities.

[138] Gagnon J.A. also rejected the respondent company's alternative theory that the appellant had "given" his shares to Mr. Rosati. He relied on art. 1824 C.C.Q., which provides that a gift of instance est entaché d'erreurs de droit ainsi que d'erreurs de fait manifestes et dominantes. Il reproche entre autres au juge de première instance et aux juges majoritaires de faire abstraction de la loi ainsi que des statuts et des règlements de la société intimée lorsqu'ils réduisent le litige à une simple affaire de crédibilité.

[134] Selon le juge Gagnon, le juge de première instance ne pouvait conclure que la détention par l'appelant de 49 actions ordinaires d'Intramodal était « conditionnelle » (par. 32). Le caractère conditionnel du statut d'actionnaire, dit-il, n'est pas prévu par la loi. D'ailleurs, rien dans les registres de la société intimée n'appuie cette thèse.

[135] Le juge Gagnon ajoute que « la qualité d'actionnaire ne peut dépendre d'une entente informelle intervenue entre des individus, selon que l'un d'eux choisit ou pas de la résilier » (par. 32). Il estime que la preuve présentée en première instance relativement à la qualité d'actionnaire de l'appelant pour la période du 13 juillet 2004 au 25 mai 2005 est incontestable. Il ne fait selon lui aucun doute que l'appelant était l'un des deux actionnaires fondateurs d'Intramodal. La seule question qui se pose est donc de savoir si, à un moment ou à un autre, il a cessé de l'être et, si oui, comment.

[136] Sur la question d'un possible transfert des actions de l'appelant à M. Rosati, le juge Gagnon considère qu'il appartenait à M. Rosati de démontrer qu'il était le cessionnaire dûment inscrit des actions de l'appelant en vertu de l'al. 53d) LCSA.

[137] À l'argument de la société intimée selon lequel le défaut de l'appelant de respecter son engagement de garantir le passif de la société équivaudrait au prix payé par M. Rosati pour l'acquisition de ses actions, le juge Gagnon rétorque que c'est confondre l'intérêt de la société avec celui de son actionnaire majoritaire, en plus de ne pas tenir compte de leurs personnalités juridiques distinctes.

[138] Le juge Gagnon rejette également l'hypothèse avancée subsidiairement par la société intimée et selon laquelle l'appelant aurait « donné » ses actions à M. Rosati. Il s'appuie sur l'art. 1824 C.c.Q., movable property must be made by notarial act en minute, with one exception: where consent to a gift of such property is accompanied by delivery and immediate possession of the property. Gagnon J.A. noted that, in the instant case, Intramodal had not received any notarial contract in which Mr. Mennillo transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati. He added that the evidence did not show a manual gift from the appellant to Mr. Rosati accompanied by delivery of the instrument.

[139] Gagnon J.A. ended his reasons on this point by noting that, to have the claim dismissed, the respondent company had to show that Mr. Rosati was the actual transferee of the shares in question, which required that his share certificate be endorsed in accordance with s. 64 CBCA. Moreover, Intramodal's articles provided that no share could be transferred unless the board of directors passed a resolution consenting to the transfer. In the circumstances, it was quite simply not open to Intramodal to disregard these requirements and approve a transfer of shares to Mr. Rosati.

[140] Gagnon J.A. was also of the view that the trial judge should not have rejected the appellant's version of the facts and that there were palpable and overriding errors in his analysis in this regard.

[141] Finally, Gagnon J.A. also rejected the argument that the claim was prescribed.

IV. Issues

[142] The main issues are as follows:

– Did the respondent company, by passing the resolution approving the transfer of the appellant's shares to its majority shareholder and registering that transfer in its registers, contrary to the applicable legislation and to its own articles and by-laws, create an oppressive situation that satisfies the conditions for making a claim for oppression under s. 241 CBCA?

qui prévoit que la donation d'un bien meuble s'effectue par acte notarié en minute, sauf dans le seul cas où le consentement à la donation d'un tel bien s'accompagne de la délivrance et de la possession immédiate du bien. Le juge Gagnon souligne que, en l'espèce, Intramodal ne s'est vu remettre aucun contrat notarié dans lequel M. Mennillo transférait ses actions à M. Rosati. Il ajoute que la preuve ne révèle pas un don manuel de l'appelant à M. Rosati accompagné de la délivrance du titre.

[139] Le juge Gagnon termine ses motifs sur ce point en soulignant que, pour obtenir le rejet du recours, la société intimée devait démontrer que M. Rosati était le véritable cessionnaire des actions en cause, ce qui nécessitait l'endossement de son certificat d'actions, le tout conformément à l'art. 64 LCSA. De plus, les statuts d'Intramodal prévoient qu'aucune action ne peut être transférée sans le consentement du conseil d'administration exprimé par voie de résolution. Dans ces circonstances, Intramodal ne pouvait tout simplement pas faire fi de ces exigences et ratifier un transfert d'actions à M. Rosati.

[140] Le juge Gagnon est par ailleurs d'avis que le juge de première instance n'aurait pas dû écarter la version des faits de l'appelant et que son analyse, sur ce point, est entachée d'erreurs manifestes et dominantes.

[141] Enfin, le juge Gagnon rejette également l'argument selon lequel le recours est prescrit.

IV. Questions en litige

[142] Les principales questions en litige sont les suivantes :

– La société intimée, en adoptant la résolution entérinant le transfert des actions de l'appelant au bénéfice de son actionnaire majoritaire et en inscrivant ce transfert dans ses registres, en contravention de la législation applicable et de ses propres statuts et règlements, a-t-elle provoqué une situation d'abus qui satisfait aux conditions d'ouverture du recours pour abus prévu à l'art. 241 LCSA?

2016 SCC 51 (CanLII)

– Can the fact that the appellant expressed an intention to withdraw from the respondent company be raised against him as a bar to such a claim?

– Did the trial judge make palpable and overriding errors in assessing the evidence?

– Is the appellant's claim prescribed?

V. Analysis

A. Importance of Formalism in Corporate Law

[143] As I mentioned above, the analysis of the issues requires a review of some basic principles. While it is true that the appellant and Mr. Rosati did not make the effort to prepare complete documents setting out the exact terms of their business relationship and that they took a rather lax approach in preparing their corporate documents, there is no question that a corporation was indeed formed under the CBCA on July 13, 2004 and that the appellant was a shareholder from that date until at least May 25, 2005.

[144] A number of arguments have been advanced in this case with respect to the appellant's shares and, more specifically, to his status as a shareholder, including that the appellant was never a shareholder of the respondent company, that he agreed to transfer the shares to Mr. Rosati, that his ownership of the shares was conditional, and that the shares in question were cancelled retroactively.

[145] With regard to the cancellation of the shares, counsel for the appellant correctly noted at the hearing, in response to the reasons of the majority of the Court of Appeal, that such a cancellation can be effected only in accordance with the law, that is, by amending the corporation's articles or, if the shares have already been paid for, by redeeming them.

[146] The CBCA regulates the cancellation of a corporation's shares in order to ensure the integrity of the corporation's share capital and to preserve the common pledge of its creditors. It does so in – L'appelant peut-il se voir opposer l'expression de son intention de se retirer de la société intimée comme fin de non-recevoir à un tel recours?

– Le juge de première instance a-t-il commis des erreurs manifestes et dominantes dans son appréciation de la preuve?

– Le recours de l'appelant est-il prescrit?

V. Analyse

A. Importance du formalisme en droit des sociétés

[143] Tel que mentionné plus avant, l'analyse des questions en litige exige un rappel de certains principes de base. S'il est vrai que l'appelant et M. Rosati se sont peu souciés de transposer dans des écrits complets les modalités exactes de leurs relations d'affaires et qu'ils ont fait preuve d'un certain laxisme dans la préparation des documents relatifs à la société, il est incontestable qu'une société a bel et bien été formée en vertu de la LCSA le 13 juillet 2004 et que l'appelant a été actionnaire du 13 juillet 2004 jusqu'au moins le 25 mai 2005.

[144] Le sort réservé aux actions de l'appelant en l'espèce et, en l'occurrence, à sa qualité d'actionnaire, a donné lieu à plusieurs thèses, entre autres celles suivant lesquelles l'appelant n'aurait jamais été actionnaire de la société intimée, il aurait convenu de les transférer à M. Rosati, il aurait été un actionnaire conditionnel, ou encore les actions en cause auraient été annulées rétroactivement.

[146] La LCSA encadre l'annulation des actions de la société dans le but de garantir l'intégrité du capital-actions et de préserver le gage commun des créanciers, le tout conformément à la règle du accordance with the maintenance of capital rule, which is of particular importance in corporate law:

> Although the trust fund doctrine does not completely apply to our corporate law, it nonetheless constitutes the basis of a rule which appears in the law today: the maintenance of capital rule.
>
> This rule is inferred from statutory provisions prohibiting or submitting to solvency (federally) or accounting tests various transactions directly or indirectly having an effect on the paid-up capital of a corporation, such as the reduction of issued capital, declaration of dividends, acquisition by a corporation of its shares, issue of shares at a discount, transfer of shares not fully paid, etc. In the Quebec Business Corporations Act, it is telling that most of these provisions are found in a section entitled "Maintenance of share capital".
>
> The paid-up capital of a corporation must be maintained and safeguarded in the interest of the creditors: to this extent we can say that the trust fund doctrine is present, especially when we consider that all the above-mentioned transactions can lead to the personal liability of the directors.
> The principle, which essentially comes from doctrine and case law respecting paid-up capital, is the following: a corporation is not allowed to "traffic in" its capital. The statutory provisions we have referred to merely define the limits of this principle by creating certain exceptions to the prohibition against a corporation drawing on its paid-up capital. Any action which does not fall within the scope of these exceptions infringes the maintenance of capital rule and is therefore unlawful. [Emphasis added; footnotes omitted.]

(P. Martel, Business Corporations in Canada: Legal and Practical Aspects (loose-leaf), at pp. 12-17 and 12-18)

[147] It should be borne in mind that, although a business corporation is similar to a partnership in some respects, as is true, for example, of relationships between the shareholders of a closely held corporation, it differs from a partnership in several ways, including the fact that it requires a stricter adherence to formalities to ensure its independent existence.

maintien du capital, laquelle est au cœur du droit des sociétés :

> Même si la doctrine du Trust fund ne s'applique pas intégralement dans notre droit des sociétés, elle n'en constitue pas moins un fondement d'une règle qui, elle, se manifeste dans les lois actuelles : la règle du maintien du capital.
>
> Cette règle se déduit des dispositions statutaires interdisant ou soumettant à des tests de solvabilité, au fédéral, ou comptables, diverses opérations ayant pour conséquence directe ou indirecte d'affecter le capital souscrit de la société, comme par exemple la réduction du capital émis, la déclaration de dividendes, l'acquisition de ses propres actions par la société, l'émission d'actions à escompte, le transfert d'actions impayées, etc. Dans la Loi sur les sociétés par actions, il est significatif que la plupart de ces dispositions soient regroupées dans une section, intitulée « Maintien du capital ».
>
> Le capital souscrit de la société doit être maintenu, sauvegardé, et ce dans l'intérêt des créanciers : dans cette mesure, on peut parler d'une manifestation de la doctrine du Trust fund, surtout quand on constate que toutes les opérations mentionnées plus haut engagent la responsabilité personnelle des administrateurs.
>
> À la base, le principe dégagé par la doctrine et la jurisprudence en matière de capital souscrit est le suivant : la société n'a pas le droit de « trafiquer » dans son capital. Les dispositions statutaires auxquelles nous avons fait allusion ne viennent que préciser les limites de ce principe, en créant certaines exceptions à cette défense pour la société de toucher à son capital souscrit. Tout geste qui n'entre pas dans le cadre de ces exceptions contrevient à la règle du maintien du capital et est de ce fait illégal. [Je souligne; notes en bas de page omises.]

(P. Martel, La société par actions au Québec, vol. I, Les aspects juridiques (feuilles mobiles), par. 12-79 à 12-82)

[147] Rappelons que la société par actions, malgré qu'elle comporte certaines similitudes avec la société de personnes, notamment en ce qui concerne les rapports entre les actionnaires dans le cas d'une société par actions à capital fermé, s'en distingue à plusieurs égards, notamment par le fait qu'elle requiert un formalisme plus grand visant à assurer son existence autonome.

[148] A business corporation is not merely the product of an agreement between associates. As Martel notes, "[a] corporation is a 'joint stock corporation' incorporated through the intervention of the State, not by contract, and as such it is not subject to the partnership rules in the Civil Code" (p. 27-32 (footnote omitted)).

[149] By choosing a business corporation as their legal vehicle for carrying on business, a company's founders and shareholders voluntarily decide to be subject to a scheme that, although it does involve numerous formalities, also has a number of advantages, including the limited liability of directors for the corporation's debts, which is an advantage that flows directly from the corporation's distinct legal personality.

[150] In the case at bar, if Mr. Mennillo and Mr. Rosati had wanted consensualism to take precedence over formalism in the conduct of their affairs, they could easily have opted for a partnership, but they did not do so. Since they instead chose to create a business corporation, they cannot enjoy the advantages of such a corporation without complying with the stricter rules that apply to it.

[151] A business corporation is a legal person established for a private interest that has a distinct legal personality and patrimony: R. Crête and S. Rousseau, Droit des sociétés par actions (3rd ed. 2011), at para. 51. In principle, it expresses itself through the resolutions of its board of directors. Decisions of the board of directors must be made at meetings that are lawfully called, although it is also possible for all the directors to sign a given resolution in writing, in which case the resolution is as valid as if it had been passed at a meeting: s. 117(1) CBCA.

[152] The shareholders may exercise the management powers of the board of directors only if they enter into a unanimous shareholder agreement pursuant to s. 146 CBCA. Moreover, several of the many powers conferred on the board of directors may not be delegated and require authorization from the board itself: ss. 121(a) and 115(3) CBCA. In the

instant case, no unanimous shareholder agreement was entered into.

[153] Once the shareholders have in fact subscribed for shares, the invested amounts belong to the corporation. That capital is locked in in such a way that shareholders cannot recover their investments unilaterally or liquidate some or all of the corporation's assets at the expense of its creditors. This is the maintenance of capital principle.

[154] This principle also implies that the shareholders cannot agree among themselves to authorize one of them to require the corporation to redeem his or her shares and thus to withdraw from the corporation without its intervening.

[155] Various statutes place considerable value on corporate documents as a way to protect third parties (including creditors) that rely on them to assess the corporation's situation. One such statute is Quebec's Act respecting the legal publicity of enterprises, CQLR, c. P-44.1.

[156] The formalities provided for in corporate legislation are not merely a matter of "form" as suggested by the trial judge, the majority of the Court of Appeal and my colleague Cromwell J. Rather, the observance of such formalities must be viewed as conditions for the validity of the acts of the corporation, its directors and its shareholders. They are imposed to give effect to the principle that a corporation has a distinct legal personality and to the maintenance of capital principle, and they are necessary to protect the corporation's patrimony, the common pledge of its creditors.

[157] Furthermore, these principles cannot be variable. The principle that a corporation has a distinct legal personality and the maintenance of capital principle are just as important in the case of a small company as in that of a large one, if not more so. Although expectations may vary from one shareholder to another in the case of a closely held autorisation du conseil lui-même : al. 121a) et par. 115(3) LCSA. On notera que, en l'espèce, aucune convention unanime des actionnaires n'a été signée.

corporation, this does not diminish the importance of these principles. The same is true of the formalities provided for by law to ensure that they are adhered to.

[158] In light of the above, the conclusion of the majority of the Court of Appeal that the agreement between the two shareholders regarding the appellant's shares was cancelled retroactively, simply by their consenting to its being cancelled, and that this cancellation had some effect on the company even though the necessary formalities were not observed, jeopardizes important pillars of Canadian corporate law.

[159] Assuming that Mr. Mennillo and Mr. Rosati did in fact enter into an agreement concerning a specific juridical operation in order to terminate or change the terms of their business association — which the evidence in no way shows — that agreement could not be set up against the respondent company in respect of the shares in question unless the necessary formalities were performed.

[160] The appellant argues, as did the dissenting Court of Appeal judge, that the majority of the Court of Appeal erred in completely disregarding the CBCA's mandatory formalities for redeeming and transferring shares. In my view, the appellant is right. The reasoning of the majority of the Court of Appeal amounts to equating a business corporation with a partnership and seriously undermines the principle that a corporation has a distinct legal personality and the maintenance of capital principle, thereby creating uncertainty with respect to transactions involving the share capital of corporations.

[161] With respect, the fact that the appellant and Mr. Rosati themselves disregarded the necessary formalities in the way they conducted their affairs did not authorize the Superior Court and the majority of the Court of Appeal to do the same.

[162] As Idington J. of this Court noted in Smith v. Gow-Ganda Mines, Ltd. (1911), 44 S.C.R. 621, at p. 624, it is true that shareholders can enter into cas d'une société par actions à capital fermé, l'importance de ces principes n'est pas pour autant diminuée. Il en va de même des formalités prévues par la loi pour faire respecter ces principes.

[159] À supposer qu'une entente sur une opération juridique précise soit effectivement intervenue entre MM. Mennillo et Rosati afin de mettre fin à leur association d'affaires ou d'en changer les modalités — ce que la preuve ne révèle d'aucune façon —, pour que cette entente puisse être opposable à la société intimée eu égard aux actions en cause, les formalités requises devaient être accomplies.

[162] Comme le souligne le juge Idington de notre Cour dans l'arrêt Smith c. Gow-Ganda Mines, Ltd. (1911), 44 R.C.S. 621, p. 624, les actionnaires various agreements as part of their business relationship, but for such agreements to be binding on the corporation, it is imperative that the statutory formalities be observed.

B. Significance of Formalism in Corporate Law

[163] In their respective reasons, the trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal relied heavily, to justify dismissing the appellant's claim for oppression, on his having expressed an intention to withdraw from the respondent company as a director, officer and shareholder. They were of the view that the only issue in this case was one of credibility.

[164] With respect, this conclusion completely disregards the formalism that is required in corporate law. It also completely disregards the respondent company's distinct legal personality. By focusing solely on whether the appellant had expressed an intention to withdraw from the respondent company, the trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal sidestepped the main issue: whether the respondent company's conduct was oppressive.

[165] Section 76 CBCA could not be any clearer. A corporation may not register a transfer of shares in its registers without first making certain inquiries. The legislation imposes some very strict requirements to be met before a transfer of shares is registered, including that the security be endorsed and that the transfer be rightful:

76 (1) Where a security in registered form is presented for transfer, the issuer shall register the transfer if

(a) the security is endorsed by an appropriate person as defined in section 65;

(b) reasonable assurance is given that that endorsement is genuine and effective;

(c) the issuer has no duty to inquire into adverse claims or has discharged any such duty;

peuvent certes, dans le cadre de leur relation d'affaires, conclure différentes ententes, mais pour que ces ententes engagent la société, les formalités prévues par la loi doivent impérativement être respectées.

B. Portée du formalisme en droit des sociétés

[163] Dans leurs motifs respectifs, le juge de première instance et les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel insistent abondamment sur l'intention exprimée par l'appelant de se retirer de la société intimée à titre d'administrateur, de dirigeant et d'actionnaire pour justifier le rejet de son recours pour abus. Ils sont d'avis que la présente affaire ne soulève qu'une simple question de crédibilité.

76 (1) L'émetteur doit procéder à l'inscription du transfert d'une valeur mobilière nominative lorsque les conditions suivantes sont réunies :

a) la valeur mobilière est endossée par une personne compétente au sens de l'article 65;

b) des assurances suffisantes sur l'authenticité et la validité de cet endossement sont données;

c) il n'est pas tenu de s'enquérir de l'existence d'oppositions ou il s'est acquitté de cette obligation;

2016 SCC 51 (CanLII)

(d) any applicable law relating to the collection of taxes has been complied with;

(e) the transfer is rightful or is to a bona fide purchaser; and

(f) any fee referred to in subsection 49(2) has been paid.

[166] The CBCA and the respondent company's articles and by-laws required the company to make certain minimal inquiries before registering the transfer, one of which involved ensuring that the appellant's share certificate had been endorsed. The respondent company's failure to make such inquiries in this case was in itself a form of oppression. This conclusion is even more valid where, as here, this requirement is set out in black and white on the share certificate.

[167] It is contrary to basic principles of Quebec civil law to argue, as the respondent company does, that the intention expressed by the appellant in this case resulted in an agreement of wills even though there was no agreement on the juridical operation being contemplated. If the appellant and Mr. Rosati did not actually agree, on May 25, 2005, on the terms of the appellant's withdrawal from the respondent company as a shareholder, the intention the appellant expressed in this regard was at most an offer to contract. To conclude that the expression of such an intention bars the appellant's claim for oppression — thereby approving after the fact the transfer registered by the respondent company in its registers — is contrary to the law, to fairness and to common sense.

C. Oppression Remedy

[168] For the purposes of my analysis on the oppression remedy, I will deal in turn with: (1) the conditions for making a claim for oppression, (2) the duties owed by the respondent company

d) les lois relatives à la perception de droits ont été respectées;

e) le transfert est régulier ou est effectué au profit d'un acheteur de bonne foi;

f) les droits prévus au paragraphe 49(2) ont été acquittés.

[166] La LCSA de même que les statuts et les règlements de la société intimée exigeaient que cette dernière fasse un minimum de vérifications, notamment s'assurer que le certificat d'actions de l'appelant avait été endossé, avant de procéder à l'inscription du transfert. L'omission de telles vérifications par la société intimée en l'espèce constituait en soi une forme d'abus. Pareille conclusion est d'autant plus justifiée lorsque, comme dans la présente affaire, cette exigence figure en toutes lettres dans le certificat d'actions.

[167] Soutenir, comme le fait la société intimée, que l'intention exprimée par l'appelant en l'espèce donnait lieu à un accord de volontés, et ce, malgré l'absence d'entente quant à l'opération juridique projetée, va à l'encontre de principes élémentaires du droit civil québécois. Si l'appelant et M. Rosati ne se sont effectivement pas entendus le 25 mai 2005 sur les modalités du retrait de l'appelant à titre d'actionnaire de la société intimée, l'intention exprimée par l'appelant à cet égard constituait tout au plus une offre de contracter. Conclure que l'expression d'une telle intention constitue une fin de non-recevoir au recours pour abus de l'appelant — avalisant ainsi a posteriori le transfert inscrit par la société intimée dans ses registres — heurte la loi, l'équité et le sens commun.

C. Recours pour abus

in registering a transfer of shares and the oppression that resulted from its failure to discharge them, (3) the alleged agreement between the appellant and Mr. Rosati regarding the shares in question and, finally, (4) the question whether the claim is prescribed.

(1) Conditions for Making a Claim for Oppression

[169] Section 241(2) CBCA provides that a complainant may apply to a court to rectify matters resulting from a corporation's conduct where

> (a) any act or omission of the corporation . . . effects a result,
>
> (b) the business or affairs of the corporation . . . are or have been carried on or conducted in a manner, or
> (c) the powers of the directors of the corporation . . . are or have been exercised in a manner that is oppressive or unfairly prejudicial to or that unfairly disregards the interests of any security holder, creditor, director or officer . . . .

[170] In Budd v. Gentra Inc. (1998), 111 O.A.C. 288, the Ontario Court of Appeal described the purpose of the oppression remedy and the nature of the relevant conduct as follows:

> Section 241 provides a statutory means whereby corporate stakeholders may gain redress for corporate conduct which has one of the effects described in s. 241(2). The section serves as a judicial brake against abuse of corporate powers, particularly, but not exclusively, by those in control of a corporation and in a position to force the will of the majority on the minority. Section 241 enables the court to intercede in the affairs and operation of a corporation and to effectively override the decisions of those charged with the responsibility of corporate governance. [para. 32]

[171] The oppression remedy introduced by the reform of corporate law that began in the 1970s

transfert d'actions et la situation d'abus provoquée par son omission de s'en acquitter, (3) la prétendue entente entre l'appelant et M. Rosati quant aux actions en cause et, enfin, (4) la question de la prescription du recours.

(1) Les conditions d'ouverture du recours pour abus

[169] Le paragraphe 241(2) LCSA prévoit qu'un plaignant peut demander au tribunal de redresser toute situation provoquée par la société lorsqu'elle > abuse des droits des détenteurs de valeurs mobilières, créanciers, administrateurs ou dirigeants, ou, se montre injuste à leur égard en leur portant préjudice ou en ne tenant pas compte de leurs intérêts :

>
> a) soit en raison de son comportement;
>
> b) soit par la façon dont elle conduit ses activités commerciales ou ses affaires internes;
> c) soit par la façon dont ses administrateurs exercent ou ont exercé leurs pouvoirs.

[170] La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario, dans l'affaire Budd c. Gentra Inc. (1998), 111 O.A.C. 288, décrit ainsi l'objet du recours pour abus et la nature de la conduite visée :

> [TRADUCTION] L'article 241 [de la LCSA] permet à un intéressé dans la société d'obtenir une ordonnance pour remédier au comportement de la société qui a l'un des effets mentionnés au par. 241(2). Il constitue un frein judiciaire à l'abus des pouvoirs de la société, en particulier, mais pas seulement, par les actionnaires majoritaires susceptibles d'infléchir la volonté des actionnaires minoritaires. L'article 241 permet au tribunal de s'immiscer dans les affaires et dans l'exploitation d'une société et d'annuler les décisions des personnes auxquelles incombe la régie de l'entreprise. [par. 32]

[171] Le recours pour abus introduit par la réforme du droit des sociétés amorcée dans les années

gives the courts significant powers in respect of the internal affairs of the corporation in question. It is an equitable remedy that, inter alia, allows a corporation's directors, officers and shareholders to resolve their disputes in a case involving oppression.

[172] Shareholders of a closely held corporation sometimes find it unnecessary to enter into a detailed agreement to govern their internal relationships. However, a shareholder may have legitimate expectations that go beyond what is specifically provided for in the corporation's articles and by-laws; an oppression remedy such as the one provided for in s. 241 CBCA is therefore all the more justified.

[173] As this Court noted in BCE Inc. v. 1976 Debentureholders, 2008 SCC 69, [2008] 3 S.C.R. 560, s. 241 CBCA is extremely broad in scope. The broad powers this section confers on a court enable the court, inter alia, to prevent a corporation from arguing that, because its actions were lawful, the oppression remedy is not available to a complainant: Crête and Rousseau, at paras. 1576-77.

[174] In some circumstances, where an alleged illegality is also oppressive or unfairly prejudicial, the oppression remedy will also make it possible to sanction a corporation for failure to discharge its legal duties, although proof of such a failure is not a prerequisite under s. 241 CBCA:

> . . . the oppression remedy does not turn on legal rights as much as on concepts of fairness and equity. Conduct may be oppressive even if it is "legal" in the sense that it is based on the exercise of a legal right. The remedy gives the court broad, equitable jurisdiction to enforce not just what is legal but what is fair. Although some courts have tied oppression relief to the establishment of some type of common legal claim, the oppression remedy is not simply a codification of the common law. The weight of jurisprudence holds that, although a breach of a legal duty will constitute oppression, it is not a prerequisite to a finding of oppression. As a result, a finding of oppression does not require the applicant to

> [TRADUCTION] . . . le recours pour abus repose moins sur des droits reconnus par la loi que sur des notions d'équité et de justice. Une conduite peut être abusive même si elle est "légale" au sens où elle résulte de l'exercice d'un droit reconnu par la loi. L'exercice du recours confère au tribunal le pouvoir général, fondé sur l'equity, de faire respecter non seulement ce qui est légal, mais aussi ce qui est juste. Certains tribunaux ont subordonné leur intervention à l'établissement d'une quelconque réclamation en common law, mais le recours pour abus n'est pas seulement le résultat de la codification de la common law. Il appert de la jurisprudence que même si le manquement à une obligation légale constitue un abus, establish conduct that is subject to redress at law. When determining whether conduct is oppressive, courts have been admonished to look at business realities and not narrow legalities. [Emphasis added; footnotes omitted.]

(M. Koehnen, Oppression and Related Remedies (2004), at pp. 78-79)

[175] According to the analytical approach set out in BCE, a court must proceed in two stages in considering a claim under s. 241 CBCA. First, the court must determine whether the evidence shows that the complainant had a reasonable expectation having regard to the facts of the case before it. Then, it must determine whether the conduct contrary to that expectation was oppressive or unfairly prejudicial within the meaning of s. 241 CBCA: BCE, at para. 68.

[176] If the court concludes that there was oppressive conduct on the corporation's part, it then has a broad discretion to decide what remedial order to make. Section 241 CBCA contains a non-exhaustive list of orders that can be made; the contemplated order must take the parties' mutual interests into account.

[177] At the first stage, that of the reasonable expectation, the court can consider various factors, as this Court noted in BCE (at para. 72):

Factors that emerge from the case law that are useful in determining whether a reasonable expectation exists include: general commercial practice; the nature of the corporation; the relationship between the parties; past practice; steps the claimant could have taken to protect itself; representations and agreements; and the fair resolution of conflicting interests between corporate stakeholders.

[178] I cannot subscribe to the view that, by expressing an intention to withdraw from the respondent company as a shareholder, Mr. Mennillo extinguished any reasonable expectations he may il n'est pas requis pour que l'on puisse conclure à l'abus. Partant, pour prouver l'abus, le demandeur n'a pas à établir l'existence d'une conduite qui justifie un redressement en droit. On a exhorté les tribunaux appelés à se prononcer sur le caractère abusif d'une conduite à tenir compte de la réalité commerciale et non des considérations strictement juridiques. [Je souligne; notes en bas de page omises.]

(M. Koehnen, Oppression and Related Remedies (2004), p. 78-79)

[177] À la première étape axée sur l'attente raisonnable, le tribunal peut prendre en compte différents facteurs, comme l'a rappelé notre Cour dans BCE (par. 72) :

Des facteurs utiles pour l'appréciation d'une attente raisonnable ressortent de la jurisprudence. Ce sont notamment les pratiques commerciales courantes, la nature de la société, les rapports entre les parties, les pratiques antérieures, les mesures préventives qui auraient pu être prises, les déclarations et conventions, ainsi que la conciliation équitable des intérêts opposés de parties intéressées.

[178] Je ne puis souscrire à l'opinion selon laquelle en exprimant l'intention de se retirer de la société intimée à titre d'actionnaire, M. Mennillo mettait fin à toutes attentes raisonnables qu'il pouvait have had as regards his remaining on the company's books as a shareholder, or that the expression of that intention barred his claim for oppression. By that logic, the mere expression of an intention to withdraw from a corporation as a shareholder would also extinguish the reasonable expectation that the corporation in question will act in accordance with the law and with its articles and by-laws and will make the necessary inquiries before depriving a person of his or her shareholder status, thereby defeating the oppression remedy. I cannot accept this reasoning for the reasons that follow.

[179] First, the CBCA itself does not limit access to the oppression remedy in such a manner. Section 238 provides that a complainant (including one who makes a claim for oppression) may be a registered holder of a security but may also be a former registered holder of a security of a corporation. The s. 241 remedy is therefore available to a former shareholder, not only one who has allegedly expressed an intention to cease to be a shareholder, but also one who has allegedly completed a specific juridical operation by which he or she effectively transferred his or her shares.

[180] Next, where the complainant's expectations are based on strict legal rules and the corporation's impugned conduct is alleged to have been unlawful, it is my view that the question of reasonable expectations plays an extremely limited role, or even no role at all. This is readily understandable, since shareholders are entitled to expect a corporation to act in accordance with its articles and by-laws and, more generally, with the law. These are, so to speak, presumed expectations:

> It is submitted that the shareholders' reasonable expectations analysis is the most appropriate theory to determine whether the interests of a shareholder have been unfairly prejudiced or unfairly disregarded in the context of a closely-held corporation. The analysis goes to the heart of the unfairness on an intuitive level. It also defines the standard of unfairness in a manner that is conducive to a principled application at law.
> Of course other circumstances can attract the remedial scope of the oppression remedy. Corporate action which

avoir de demeurer dans les registres de la société en tant qu'actionnaire, ni que l'expression de cette intention constituait une fin de non-recevoir à son recours pour abus. Selon cette logique, la simple expression de l'intention de se retirer d'une société en tant qu'actionnaire mettrait également fin à l'attente raisonnable que la société en question agisse en conformité avec la loi et ses statuts et règlements et qu'elle procède aux vérifications requises avant de priver une personne de son statut d'actionnaire, faisant ainsi échec au recours pour abus. Je ne peux souscrire à ce raisonnement pour les raisons qui suivent.

> D'autres situations peuvent évidemment justifier le prononcé d'une ordonnance pour remédier à un abus.

is contrary to the constitution of the corporation, or which constitutes a breach by the directors of their duties to the corporation, may be considered to be oppressive, or to unfairly prejudice or unfairly disregard the interests of the shareholders. In these situations, an analysis of shareholders' reasonable expectations is arguably of little substantive importance. To say that shareholders have a reasonable expectation that corporate action will be taken lawfully, or that directors will act in accordance with their duties, is a rather banal statement. The conclusion that unlawful conduct should give rise to relief under the oppression remedy could be reached on the basis of an alternative theory. [Emphasis added.]

(J. A. Campion, S. A. Brown and A. M. Crawley, "The Oppression Remedy: Reasonable Expectations of Shareholders", in Law of Remedies: Principles and Proofs (1995), 229, at p. 249)

[181] In my view, the question of reasonable expectations is of greater relevance to the determination of a shareholder's rights that are not specifically provided for in the legislation and in the corporation's articles and by-laws. Indeed, this Court observed in BCE that "[the] oppression [remedy] gives a court broad, equitable jurisdiction to enforce not just what is legal but what is fair" (para. 58).

[182] As a result, where, as in the instant case, a corporation is alleged to have acted unlawfully, the focus of the analysis is not so much on the question of reasonable expectations as on that of whether the corporation's conduct was in fact unlawful and, therefore, oppressive: Martel, at p. 31-80.

[183] While it is true, as the Court noted in BCE, that "[t]he size, nature and structure of the corporation are relevant factors in assessing reasonable expectations" and that "[c]ourts may accord more latitude to the directors of a small, closely held corporation to deviate from strict formalities than to the directors of a larger public company" (para. 74), that latitude depends, of course, on the nature of the alleged violation.

L'acte de la société qui va à l'encontre de ses statuts constitutifs ou qui constitue un défaut, par les administrateurs, de respecter leurs obligations envers la société peut être considéré comme un abus des droits de l'actionnaire ou comme une mesure injuste lui causant préjudice ou ne tenant pas compte de ses intérêts. Dans de telles situations, on pourrait soutenir que l'analyse fondée sur les attentes raisonnables de l'actionnaire a peu de pertinence. Que l'actionnaire s'attende raisonnablement à ce que la société agisse en toute légalité ou à ce que les administrateurs agissent conformément à leurs obligations est plutôt évident. La conclusion selon laquelle une conduite illégale devrait permettre un redressement dans le cadre d'un recours pour abus pourrait être tirée par application d'une autre théorie. [Je souligne.]

(J. A. Campion, S. A. Brown et A. M. Crawley, « The Oppression Remedy : Reasonable Expectations of Shareholders », dans Law of Remedies : Principles and Proofs (1995), 229, p. 249)

[184] In sum, mere irregularities that are not oppressive or unfairly prejudicial will not be sufficient to justify granting the remedy to the complainant. On the other hand, a failure to comply with a mandatory legislative provision or with the requirements set out in the corporation's articles and by-laws that relate to the very recognition of shareholder status may justify granting the oppression remedy. In my view, this is particularly important for the protection of a minority shareholder in a closely held corporation like Intramodal. Otherwise, what remedy would be available to a shareholder who claims to have been unlawfully dispossessed?

(2) Oppressive Conduct on the Respondent Company's Part

[185] In this case, several aspects of the respondent company's conduct are problematic.

[186] First of all, there is the impugned resolution, which was passed in 2007, retroactive to 2005. There is nothing more specific in the evidence as regards the date it was passed. The resolution, of which the appellant learned only after he had brought his claim, reads as follows:

IT WAS RESOLVED THAT:

5. The Corporation also hereby approves and accepts the transfer by Johnny MENNILLO of the Forty-Nine (49) Class "A" Shares registered in his name, represented by Certificate number 2 unto Mario ROSATI.

6. In view of said transfer of Shares, it is hereby confirmed that effective this day Mario ROSATI is the Sole Shareholder of the Corporation, having One Hundred (100) Class "A" Shares registered in his name.

Each and every of the foregoing six (6) Resolutions is hereby consented to by the Sole Director and Sole Shareholder of the Corporation entitled to vote on such Resolutions pursuant to the Canada Business Corporations [184] En somme, de simples irrégularités, qui ne constituent pas pour autant un abus ou un acte injustement préjudiciable, ne seront pas suffisantes pour donner ouverture au recours du plaignant. À l'inverse, l'omission de se conformer à une disposition impérative de la loi ainsi qu'aux exigences prévues par les statuts et règlements de la société en ce qui concerne la reconnaissance même du statut d'actionnaire pourra donner ouverture au recours pour abus. Je suis d'avis que cela est particulièrement important pour la protection de l'actionnaire minoritaire dans une société fermée telle qu'Intramodal. Sinon, quel recours serait à la disposition de l'actionnaire qui se prétend illégalement évincé?

(2) La situation d'abus provoquée par la société intimée

[186] Il y a d'abord la résolution attaquée, qui a été adoptée en 2007, avec effet rétroactif en 2005. La preuve n'est pas plus précise quant à la date de son adoption. Cette résolution, dont l'appelant n'a eu connaissance qu'une fois son recours entrepris, est libellée comme suit :

[TRADUCTION]

IL A ÉTÉ RÉSOLU QUE :

5. Par la présente, la Société approuve et accepte la cession par Johnny MENNILLO à Mario ROSATI de quarante-neuf (49) actions de catégorie « A » immatriculées à son nom, tel qu'attesté par le certificat numéro 2.

6. En raison de cession d'actions, il est confirmé par la présente, avec effet immédiatement, que Mario ROSATI est l'unique actionnaire de la Société, cent (100) actions de catégorie « A » étant immatriculées à son nom.

Chacune des six (6) résolutions qui précèdent est par la présente approuvée par l'unique administrateur et actionnaire de la Société ayant droit de vote à l'égard de telles résolutions suivant la Loi canadienne sur les sociétés

2016 SCC 51 (CanLII)

Act as evidenced by his signature hereto this 25th day of May, 2005 10.00 a.m. [Underlining added; bold in original.]

(A.R., vol. VIII ("Minutes Book of Intramodal"), at p. 118)

[187] Next, the evidence shows that the respondent company registered the transfer referred to in the resolution in its registers. Under the CBCA, the company could not register such a transfer unless the security was endorsed, which was not the case here.

[188] Section 60(1) CBCA provides that it is only on "delivery" of a security, that is, at the time of the voluntary transfer of possession, that the purchaser acquires the rights in the security that the transferor had or had authority to convey:

(1) On delivery of a security the purchaser acquires the rights in the security that the transferor had or had authority to convey, except that a purchaser who has been a party to any fraud or illegality affecting the security or who as a prior holder had notice of an adverse claim does not improve their position by taking from a later bona fide purchaser.

[189] Furthermore, the purchaser of a security may become a bona fide purchaser only as of the time of its endorsement: s. 64 CBCA. It is worth nothing that s. 65(3) CBCA says the following about an endorsement for the purposes of the assignment or transfer of a security:

(3) An endorsement of a security in registered form is made when an appropriate person signs, either on the security or on a separate document, an assignment or transfer of the security or a power to assign or transfer it, or when the signature of an appropriate person is written without more on the back of the security.

[190] Endorsement is a condition that must be met for a contract entered into by two shareholders with respect to the purchase of a security to have any legal effect on the corporation. Moreover, if the necessary endorsements are not on or with the security and the corporation registers the transfer of the security anyway, it is liable for any loss incurred as a result of the registration: s. 79(1)(a) CBCA. And as par actions, ce qui est attesté par sa signature apposée en ce 25e jour de mai 2005, à 10 heures. [Je souligne; en caractères gras dans l'original.]

(d.a., vol. VIII (les « registres d'Intramodal »), p. 118)

[187] Ensuite, la preuve révèle que la société intimée a inscrit dans ses registres le transfert auquel la résolution réfère. Or, en vertu de la LCSA, la société ne pouvait procéder à l'inscription d'un tel transfert que si la valeur mobilière était endossée, ce qui n'est pas le cas en l'espèce.

(1) Dès livraison de la valeur mobilière, les droits transmissibles du cédant passent à l'acquéreur, mais le fait de détenir une valeur d'un acheteur de bonne foi ne saurait modifier la situation du cessionnaire qui a participé à une fraude ou à un acte illégal mettant en cause la validité de cette valeur ou qui, en tant qu'ancien détenteur, connaissait l'existence d'une opposition.

[189] Qui plus est, l'acquéreur d'une valeur mobilière ne devient acquéreur de bonne foi qu'après son endossement : art. 64 LCSA. Il est à noter que le par. 65(3) LCSA précise ce qui suit au sujet de l'endossement aux fins de cession ou de transfert d'une valeur mobilière :

(3) L'endossement d'une valeur mobilière nominative aux fins de cession ou de transfert se fait par l'apposition, soit à l'endos de cette valeur sans autre formalité, soit sur un document distinct ou sur une procuration à cet effet, de la signature d'une personne compétente.

[190] L'endossement constitue une condition sine qua non pour qu'un contrat intervenu entre deux coactionnaires quant à l'acquisition d'une valeur mobilière puisse avoir quelque effet juridique sur la société. D'ailleurs, si la valeur mobilière n'est pas assortie des endossements requis, et que la société procède tout de même à l'inscription de son transfert, elle est responsable du préjudice causé par une

I mentioned above, s. 76 CBCA expressly provides that a corporation may not register a transfer in its records and registers without first making certain inquiries, one of which relates to the required endorsements.

[191] In the instant case, the company's articles expressly imposed other restrictions, including that the company could not register a transfer of shares in its registers unless the share certificate had been duly endorsed and all requirements with respect to transfers had been met:

C. TRANSFER OF SECURITIES

133. Registration of transfers. Subject to the Act and to the provisions of paragraph 135 below, no transfer of securities or of warrants shall be registered in the securities' register of the Corporation unless:

(a) the security certificate has been duly endorsed by the proper person;

(b) a reasonable assurance has been given to the effect that the endorsement is genuine;

(c) every act or statute in Canada or in a province or territory of Canada with respect to the collection of income tax, sales taxes or charges, duties or fees has been complied with;

(d) any restriction on its issue, on its transfer or on the holding thereof as authorized by the articles has been complied with; and

(e) any lien on the securities as provided for in paragraph 131 above has been reimbursed. [Bold in original.]

(Minutes Book of Intramodal, at pp. 94-95)

[192] Clearly, endorsement of the share certificate, as a precondition to the registration of a transfer telle inscription : al. 79(1)a) LCSA. De plus, tel que mentionné précédemment, l'art. 76 LCSA prévoit expressément qu'une société ne peut inscrire un transfert d'actions dans ses livres et registres sans d'abord procéder à certaines vérifications, y compris quant aux endossements requis.

[191] En l'espèce, d'autres restrictions s'appliquaient expressément en vertu des statuts de la société, notamment celle voulant que cette dernière ne puisse inscrire un transfert d'actions dans ses registres que si le certificat d'actions a été régulièrement endossé et que toutes les exigences relatives au transfert ont été respectées :

C. CESSION DE VALEURS MOBILIÈRES

133. Inscription d'une cession. Sous réserve de la Loi et du paragraphe 135, la cession d'une valeur mobilière ou d'un bon de souscription ne peut être inscrite au registre des valeurs mobilières de la Société que si :

(a) le certificat d'action est dûment endossé par la personne habilitée à le faire;

(b) des assurances raisonnables sont données que la signature ainsi apposée est authentique;

(c) les exigences de toute loi canadienne, y compris d'une province ou d'un territoire du Canada, relative à la perception de l'impôt sur le revenu, de la taxe de vente ou de frais ou de droits ont été respectées;

(d) toute restriction applicable à son émission, à sa cession ou à sa détention autorisées par les statuts a été respectée;

(e) toute sûreté réelle grevant la valeur mobilière comme le prévoit le paragraphe 131 a été levée. [En caractères gras dans l'original.]

(registres d'Intramodal, p. 94-95)

[192] De toute évidence, l'endossement du certificat d'actions, à titre de condition préalable à of shares, was important enough for the respondent company's founders to consider it appropriate to include an express provision to this effect in their articles, in addition to mentioning it on the share certificates.

[193] The following note appears on the appellant's certificate: "Only the person whose name appears on the front of this certificate or his duly authorized agent or representative may validly transfer the shares represented by this certificate" (Minutes Book of Intramodal, at p. 170).

[194] The very existence of a legal duty that the respondent company make the necessary inquiries before registering a transfer of shares created a reasonable expectation for the company's shareholders. It is clear that the respondent company failed to discharge this duty and that its failure to do so was more than a mere irregularity.

[195] The appellant had a reasonable expectation that the respondent company would act in accordance with the law and with its articles and by-laws. He had a reasonable expectation that the respondent company would make the necessary inquiries before depriving him of his status as a shareholder. The failure to do so was unfairly prejudicial to the appellant insofar as it deprived him of that status.

[196] The evidence shows that the share certificate in question was not endorsed. It also shows that the respondent company made no inquiries before passing the resolution to transfer the appellant's shares, and that the resolution was passed retroactively and was signed by a single shareholder (namely Mr. Rosati). The respondent company's lawyer admitted on cross-examination that his job was to do what Intramodal's majority shareholder, Mr. Rosati, asked and nothing more:

Q. So, if you're told by a client to remove a shareholder without a signed document, will you do it?

l'inscription d'un transfert d'actions, était suffisamment important pour que les fondateurs de la société intimée jugent pertinent d'inclure une disposition expresse à cet effet dans leurs statuts, en plus d'en faire mention sur les certificats d'actions.

[193] Sur le certificat de l'appelant, on peut en effet lire la mention suivante : [TRADUCTION] « Seule la personne dont le nom figure au recto du présent certificat ou son mandataire ou son représentant dûment autorisé peut valablement céder les actions dont la détention est attestée par le présent certificat » (registres d'Intramodal, p. 170).

[194] L'obligation légale de la société intimée de procéder aux vérifications requises avant d'inscrire le transfert d'actions créait ipso facto une attente raisonnable chez ses actionnaires. Il est manifeste que la société intimée n'a pas respecté cette obligation et que son défaut dépasse le cadre d'une simple irrégularité.

[195] L'appelant avait l'attente raisonnable que la société intimée agisse en conformité avec la loi et ses statuts et règlements. Il avait l'attente raisonnable que la société intimée, avant de le priver de son statut d'actionnaire, procède aux vérifications requises. L'omission de ce faire constitue un acte injustement préjudiciable à l'appelant dans la mesure où elle le prive de son statut d'actionnaire.

[196] La preuve révèle que le certificat d'actions en cause n'a pas été endossé. Elle révèle également que la société intimée n'a fait aucune vérification avant d'adopter la résolution de transfert des actions de l'appelant, et que c'est rétroactivement et avec la signature d'un seul actionnaire (c'est-à-dire M. Rosati) que la résolution a été adoptée. L'avocat de la société intimée a reconnu en contre-interrogatoire que sa tâche consistait à obtempérer aux demandes de l'actionnaire majoritaire d'Intramodal, M. Rosati, sans plus :

Q. Donc, si un client vous dit de supprimer le nom d'un actionnaire sans vous remettre un document signé à l'appui, le faites-vous?

2016 SCC 51 (CanLII)

A. If I have instructions, I will do what the instructions are.

[197] Despite all the emphasis placed on the appellant's expressed intention to withdraw from Intramodal, the fact is that Intramodal had no way of knowing that such an intention had actually been expressed, since, by its own admission, it did not make the required inquiries in this regard, which it considered unnecessary.

[198] To conclude that there was oppression in the circumstances is not to allow Mr. Mennillo to use the oppression remedy provided for in s. 241 CBCA as an instrument of oppression, but simply to recognize the obvious: Mr. Rosati used his position as majority shareholder to strip Mr. Mennillo of his status as a shareholder. To paraphrase the Ontario Court of Appeal in Budd, it was to put a brake on this very type of conduct that Parliament thought it necessary to introduce the oppression remedy provided for in s. 241 CBCA.

[199] If the respondent company had made the necessary inquiries, it would not have registered the transfer of shares. Assuming that there was in fact an agreement between the appellant and Mr. Rosati in this regard, the parties to the agreement would therefore have had to meet again to take the necessary steps to record the agreement and ensure that the legislated conditions were met. If Mr. Mennillo had in fact agreed to transfer his shares, it would have been a simple matter to ask him to sign Intramodal's resolution in 2007. In the event of a disagreement, Intramodal's majority shareholder could then have taken the necessary action to require the appellant to endorse his share certificate and sign the relevant corporate documents:

> The law requires that the transferor provide the purchaser with any "requisite necessary to obtain registration" of the transfer, and states that if he does not comply with the demand within a reasonable time, the purchaser may reject the transfer or consider the transfer contract to be rescinded. [Footnote omitted.]

R. Si on me donne des instructions, j'agis conformément à ces instructions.

[197] Malgré toute l'insistance mise sur l'intention manifestée par l'appelant de se retirer d'Intramodal, le fait est qu'Intramodal n'avait aucun moyen de savoir qu'une telle intention avait effectivement été exprimée car, de son propre aveu, elle n'a pas fait les vérifications requises à cet égard, estimant que de telles vérifications n'étaient pas nécessaires.

[198] Conclure à l'abus dans les circonstances ne revient pas à permettre à M. Mennillo d'instrumentaliser le recours pour abus prévu par l'art. 241 LCSA, mais tout simplement à reconnaître l'évidence : M. Rosati a utilisé sa position d'actionnaire majoritaire pour dépouiller M. Mennillo de son statut d'actionnaire. Pour paraphraser la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario dans l'affaire Budd, c'est précisément afin de mettre un frein à ce genre de conduite que le législateur a cru nécessaire d'introduire le recours pour abus prévu à l'art. 241 LCSA.

> La loi impose au cédant l'obligation de fournir à l'acquéreur les pièces nécessaires à l'inscription du transfert, et précise que s'il ne se conforme pas à toute demande à cet effet dans un délai raisonnable, l'acquéreur peut refuser le transfert ou en demander la rescision. 2016 SCC 51 (CanLII)

[200] A conclusion that Intramodal's conduct in this regard was prejudicial to the appellant does not require a lengthy explanation: that conduct unlawfully stripped him of his status as a shareholder. It is difficult to imagine how a business corporation could act more oppressively toward a shareholder than by depriving him or her of that status.

[201] The conduct of a corporation that approves a transfer of shares without making any inquiries and that confuses its interests with those of its majority shareholder, as if it were a mere puppet, is not less oppressive simply because another shareholder at some point expressed an intention to withdraw from the corporation without there being any agreement on the terms of such a withdrawal. To suggest otherwise would amount to encouraging a corporation's shareholders to refrain from participating in any kind of discussions or negotiations about a possible transfer of shares.

[202] The instant case concerns a complainant who was originally recognized as a shareholder, who alleges that the corporation has committed clear violations of the law and of its articles and by-laws, and who has applied for an oppression remedy under s. 241 CBCA. The oppressive situation created by the corporation can indeed be remedied by means of a claim for oppression, or of an application to rectify registers under s. 243 CBCA or an application under s. 247 CBCA to compel the corporation to discharge its duties, provided that the conditions for the chosen remedy are met, which is the case here. It should be noted that, independently of ss. 243 and 247 CBCA, s. 241(3)(k) gives the courts the power to order the rectification of registers and to sanction unlawful conduct on the corporation's part.

[203] The classic example of this situation can be found in Journet v. Superchef Food Industries Ltd., [1984] C.S. 916, at p. 925, in which the Superior Court found the conduct of the corporation in question to be oppressive on the basis of several unlawful and fraudulent acts it had committed. The evidence that the acts were unlawful was considered sufficient

[202] En l'espèce, il est question d'un plaignant dont le statut d'actionnaire a été initialement reconnu, qui reproche à la société des violations claires de la loi et de ses statuts et règlements, et qui intente un recours pour abus en vertu de l'art. 241 LSCA. La situation abusive provoquée par la société peut effectivement être corrigée par le truchement d'un tel recours, ou d'un recours en rectification des registres fondé sur l'art. 243 LCSA, ou encore d'un recours fondé sur l'art. 247 LCSA visant à contraindre la société à se conformer à ses obligations, pour autant que les conditions du recours choisi soient satisfaites, ce qui est le cas en l'espèce. Rappelons que l'al. 241(3)k), indépendamment des art. 243 et 247 LCSA, octroie au tribunal le pouvoir d'ordonner la rectification des registres et permet de sanctionner la société pour l'illégalité de sa conduite.

to meet the conditions for the oppression remedy, and no additional evidence was required.

[204] In my view, the same reasoning applies in the case at bar. With respect for those who disagree, I find that the appellant has discharged his burden of proving the validity of his claim for oppression. The evidence shows that the company's actions, namely passing the resolution to transfer the appellant's shares, registering that transfer in its registers and subsequently filing declarations to the same effect, constituted violations of express provisions of the legislation and the company's articles and by-laws. This evidence was sufficient to justify a finding that the company's conduct was oppressive and prejudicial and that it warranted revocation of the company's resolution and the rectification of its registers.

[205] The purpose of the appellant's application is to obtain a conclusion that the company failed to discharge its legal duties and an order that its registers be rectified accordingly. As I mentioned above, the appellant could very well have brought an application under s. 243 or 247 CBCA. Had he done so, he would have been successful. In view of the liberal interpretation that has been given to s. 241 CBCA and the nature of the remedy being sought, it would not be very pragmatic to dismiss his claim simply because it was made under s. 241 rather than s. 243 or 247 CBCA. Raymonde Crête and Stéphane Rousseau comment as follows in this regard:

[TRANSLATION] A review of the case law shows that, in some cases, claimants apply for the oppression remedy even where the alleged acts are in fact clear violations of the rules that could easily give rise to alternative recourses under the legislation. Despite those alternatives, judges take a pragmatic approach in this regard and agree to intervene on the basis of the oppression remedy even though, in this context, proof of the unlawful acts limits the usefulness of interventions based on fairness involving the oppression remedy. We note, however, that there is nothing to prevent a claimant from joining to his or her claim other recourses provided for in the legislation with respect to business corporations or flowing from general law principles, such as a derivative action or an application for an investigation, a mandatory or d'ouverture du recours pour abus et aucune preuve additionnelle n'a été exigée.

[204] À mon avis, le même raisonnement s'applique en l'espèce. J'estime, avec égards pour l'opinion contraire, que l'appelant s'est déchargé de son fardeau de preuve quant au bien-fondé de son recours pour abus. La preuve démontre que les actes commis par la société, soit l'adoption de la résolution de transfert des actions de l'appelant, l'inscription de ce transfert dans les registres et les déclarations subséquentes au même effet, constituent des violations des dispositions expresses de la loi, de ses statuts et de ses règlements. Il s'agit d'une preuve suffisante pour conclure à une conduite abusive et préjudiciable justifiant l'annulation de la résolution adoptée par la société et la rectification de ses registres.

L'examen de la jurisprudence montre que, dans certains cas, les demandeurs font appel au recours en cas d'abus même si les actes reprochés constituent en fait des violations claires de la réglementation qui peuvent aisément donner lieu à des recours alternatifs conformément à la loi. Malgré la présence de ces mesures alternatives, les juges adoptent en cette matière une approche pragmatique et acceptent d'intervenir sur la base du recours pour abus bien que, dans ce contexte, la preuve des actes illégaux réduise l'utilité des interventions fondées sur l'équité en vertu du recours en cas d'abus. Notons, par ailleurs, que rien n'empêche un demandeur de joindre à sa demande d'autres recours prévus dans la loi sur les sociétés par actions ou dans les principes de droit commun, notamment en y joignant un recours de nature oblique

negatory order, the rectification of registers or even liquidation of the corporation. [Emphasis added; footnote omitted; para. 1629.]

[206] Section 241 CBCA is extremely broad in scope and gives a court broad powers: BCE, at para. 58. This extremely broad scope of the oppression remedy means that it is appropriate in the instant case to consider the recourse relating to rectification of registers (s. 243 CBCA) or the one relating to failure by the corporation to comply with the legislation or with its articles or by-laws (s. 247 CBCA).

[207] In any event, the conclusion that the respondent company unlawfully deprived the appellant of his status as a shareholder leads inescapably to the conclusion that its conduct in this case was oppressive. Indeed, what could be more oppressive than being unlawfully stripped of one's status as a shareholder?

[208] In my view, this conclusion is sufficient to dispose of the merits of the case. Nonetheless, in light of the importance attached by the parties to the agreement that is alleged to have been entered into by Mr. Mennillo and Mr. Rosati on May 25, 2005, and of my colleague's remarks in this regard, which could have serious consequences going beyond the scope of this case, I think it is important to discuss that issue.

(3) Alleged Agreement Between the Appellant and Mr. Rosati

(a) Nature of the Alleged Agreement

[209] My reading of the trial judge's reasons differs from that of the majority. In my view, the trial judge did not find that the appellant and Mr. Rosati had agreed on a transfer of shares. That interpretation, advanced by the respondent company, denotes a fragmented reading of the trial judge's reasons and distorts his conclusions. The trial judge instead concluded that, given that the appellant's shares had been issued on condition that he guarantee the respondent company's debts, the intention he ou une demande en vue d'obtenir une enquête, une ordonnance mandatoire ou négatoire, la rectification des registres ou même la liquidation de la société. [Je souligne; note en bas de page omise; par. 1629.]

[207] À tout événement, la conclusion selon laquelle la société intimée a illégalement privé l'appelant de son statut d'actionnaire mène irrémédiablement à la conclusion qu'il y a eu abus en l'espèce. En effet, quelle forme plus grave d'abus y a-t-il que celle de se faire dépouiller illégalement de son statut d'actionnaire?

[208] Cette conclusion suffit à mon avis pour statuer sur le fond de l'affaire. Néanmoins, vu l'importance accordée par les parties à la question et vu les propos de mon collègue sur celle-ci, lesquels pourraient avoir de lourdes conséquences dépassant le cadre du présent litige, j'estime important d'aborder la prétendue entente qui serait intervenue entre MM. Mennillo et Rosati le 25 mai 2005.

(3) La prétendue entente entre l'appelant et M. Rosati

a) Nature de la prétendue entente

expressed of withdrawing from the company was sufficient for him to be stripped of his status as a shareholder:

[TRANSLATION] The Court concludes that Mennillo held 49 common shares issued by Intramodal on condition that he guarantee all of Intramodal's debts once it began operating. Mennillo refused to participate in this venture and asked to be removed from the company as a shareholder and a director effective May 25, 2005. As of that date, Mennillo agreed only to be a lender of $440,000 to his friend Rosati. The failure to complete the transfer of Mennillo's shares to Rosati resulted from an error or oversight on the part of Rosati's lawyer.

Since May 25, 2005, Mennillo has no longer been a shareholder or director of Intramodal. [Emphasis added; paras. 74-75.]

[210] These remarks are not open to differing interpretations. There is no doubt that deference is owed to the trial judge's findings of fact in the absence of a palpable and overriding error, and an appellate court does not have carte blanche to take isolated passages from the trial judge's reasons and give them a meaning they do not have. The trial judge's findings of fact must be considered as they are, and as a whole. In short, it is, in my respectful opinion, inaccurate to say that the trial judge's finding that the shares had been transferred was independent of their having been issued conditionally.

[211] My colleague's reasoning strikes me as contradictory. He is of the view that the trial judge accepted as a finding of fact that "Mr. Mennillo agreed that he would remain a shareholder only so long as he was willing to guarantee the corporation's debts" (reasons of Cromwell J., at paras. 4 and 61 (emphasis added)) and that "Mr. Mennillo agreed that he would remain a shareholder of the corporation on the condition that he guarantee its debts" (para. 10 (emphasis added)). Yet the rest of the trial judge's statement to the effect that the occurrence of the suspensive condition resulted in a transfer of où ses actions avaient été émises conditionnellement à ce qu'il garantisse le passif de la société intimée, était suffisante pour le dépouiller de son statut d'actionnaire :

Le Tribunal arrive à la conclusion que Mennillo a détenu 49 actions ordinaires émises par Intramodal, le tout conditionnellement à ce que ce dernier garantisse l'ensemble des créances de Intramodal dès que cette dernière débute ses activités. Mennillo a refusé cette aventure et a demandé son retrait de la compagnie à titre d'actionnaire et d'administrateur à compter du 25 mai 2005. À compter de cette date, Mennillo a accepté de n'être que le prêteur d'une somme de 440 000 $ à son ami Rosati. Le fait que la cession des actions de Mennillo à Rosati n'ait pas été complétée résulte de l'erreur ou l'oubli de la part de l'avocat de Rosati.

Depuis le 25 mai 2005, Mennillo n'est plus détenteur d'aucune action ni administrateur de Intramodal. [Je souligne; par. 74-75.]

[211] Le raisonnement de mon collègue me paraît contradictoire. Il est d'avis que le juge de première instance a accepté comme conclusion de fait que « M. Mennillo a convenu qu'il ne demeurait actionnaire que tant qu'il serait disposé à garantir le passif de la société » (motifs du juge Cromwell, par. 4 et 61 (je souligne)) et que « M. Mennillo [a] convenu qu'il demeurerait actionnaire de la société à condition d'en garantir le passif » (par. 10 (je souligne)). Or, le reste de l'affirmation du juge de première instance selon laquelle la réalisation de la condition suspensive aurait donné lieu à une cession shares cannot be considered in isolation. Moreover, my colleague Cromwell J. finds that the evidence supports the trial judge's conclusion even though, in his view, that evidence is "confused and confusing" (para. 34), and "conflicting and inconsistent" (para. 68). I will return to the trial judge's assessment of the evidence below. For now, I note that my colleague acknowledges that there was no condition attached to the issuance of the shares in the case at bar and that it is wrong in law to say the opposite (para. 76), but he nevertheless finds that "the condition to which the trial judge referred was a result of an agreement between Messrs. Mennillo and Rosati that the former would be a shareholder only if he guaranteed Intramodal's debts" (para. 77). With respect, I do not see how it is possible both to accept the trial judge's conclusion that Mr. Mennillo held 49 common shares issued by Intramodal on condition that he guarantee all of its debts and to postulate that, in law, Mr. Mennillo could not be a conditional shareholder in this case.

d'actions ne peut être considéré en vase clos. De plus, mon collègue le juge Cromwell est d'avis que la preuve appuie la conclusion du juge de première instance, malgré que cette preuve soit, selon lui, « confuse et source de confusion » (par. 34) et « contradictoire et incohérente » (par. 68). Je reviendrai plus loin sur la question de l'appréciation de la preuve par le juge de première instance. Je note pour l'instant que mon collègue reconnaît qu'aucune condition n'était rattachée à l'émission des actions en l'espèce et qu'il est erroné en droit de prétendre le contraire (par. 76), mais qu'il conclut néanmoins que « la condition dont [le juge de première instance] fait mention résulte d'un accord entre MM. Mennillo et Rosati selon lequel le premier ne serait actionnaire que s'il se portait garant du passif d'Intramodal » (par. 77). Avec égards, je vois mal comment on peut à la fois accepter la conclusion du juge de première instance voulant que M. Mennillo ait détenu 49 actions ordinaires émises par Intramodal conditionnellement à ce qu'il garantisse l'ensemble des créances de celle-ci et postuler que M. Mennillo ne pouvait pas, en droit, être actionnaire conditionnel en l'espèce.

[212] The majority of the Court of Appeal also concluded that the appellant no longer had the status of a shareholder, but for another reason, namely that the intention he had expressed of withdrawing from the respondent company had resulted in the retroactive cancellation of his shares.

[213] The parties characterized the agreement that was alleged to have been entered into by Mr. Mennillo and Mr. Rosati in several different ways, at times as a conditional issuance of shares, at times as a retroactive cancellation and at times as a contract of sale or a contract of gift. This reflects a more fundamental problem, namely that, without some speculation, no intention in this regard can be found in the evidence. Indeed, the difficulty the courts below had in characterizing the alleged agreement resulted from the fact that there was no evidence of the juridical operation contemplated by Mr. Rosati and Mr. Mennillo on May 25, 2005 that allegedly resulted in the transfer of Mr. Mennillo's shares. The same is true in this Court.

[214] The CBCA provides, as a general rule, that the cancellation of shares held by a shareholder can happen in only two ways: by an amendment to the corporation's articles or by redemption of the shares by the corporation. In the case of redemption, two types are possible: unilateral redemption by the corporation and redemption by mutual agreement.

[215] In the instant case, the respondent company did not amend its articles at any time before May 25, 2005. Regarding the possibility that it redeemed the appellant's shares unilaterally, such a redemption would have had to be provided for in the company's articles, which was not the case for the Class "A" shares held by the appellant. The company's articles did give it a right of unilateral redemption, but only for Class "G" shares.

[216] As for a redemption by mutual agreement, it is subject to a number of formalities, including the passage of a directors' resolution to that effect and, under s. 34 CBCA, tests of solvency and liquidity.

[217] Even more importantly, the CBCA provides that such a redemption, whether unilateral or by mutual agreement, results in cancellation of the acquired shares:

(6) Shares or fractions thereof of any class or series of shares issued by a corporation and purchased, redeemed or otherwise acquired by it shall be cancelled or, if the articles limit the number of authorized shares, may be restored to the status of authorized but unissued shares of the class.

[218] In the case at bar, even assuming that the appellant did in fact consent to the redemption of his shares — which he disputes — it must be acknowledged that none of the formalities applicable to such a redemption were performed, which means that it cannot be said that the appellant's shares were cancelled by way of redemption.

[214] La LCSA prévoit, en règle générale, que l'annulation des actions d'un actionnaire n'est possible que selon deux modalités, soit la modification des statuts de la société, soit le rachat des actions par la société. En cas de rachat, deux formes peuvent être envisagées : le rachat unilatéral par la société ou le rachat de gré à gré.

(6) Les actions ou fractions d'actions de toute catégorie ou série de la société émettrice acquises par elle, notamment par achat ou rachat, sont annulées; elles peuvent reprendre le statut d'actions autorisées non émises de la catégorie dont elles relèvent, au cas où les statuts limitent le nombre d'actions autorisées.

[218] Or, en l'espèce, même en tenant pour acquis qu'il y a effectivement eu consentement du principal intéressé du rachat de ses actions — ce que ce dernier conteste —, force est d'admettre qu'aucune des formalités applicables à un tel rachat n'a été accomplie, si bien que l'on ne peut prétendre que les actions de l'appelant ont été annulées par rachat.

[219] Indeed, the respondent company indicates in its factum that the stated capital was never reduced. Nor was any resolution passed to approve the company's redemption of the shares. As I will explain below, the only resolution at issue apparently concerned a transfer of shares between the appellant and Intramodal's majority shareholder, Mr. Rosati.

[220] What is more, it is difficult to see how the tests of liquidity and solvency could have been met given that, by the respondent company's own admission, it had no assets at the time.

[221] In short, the argument that the appellant's shares were cancelled retroactively by way of redemption fails not because of mere technical irregularities in the corporate documents, but on the basis of the legal requirements applicable to the redemption of shares and, hence, to their cancellation.

[222] The trial judge's conclusion — which the majority of the Court of Appeal rejected — that the appellant's shares were issued on condition that he would guarantee the respondent company's debts, and that the desire he expressed to cease guaranteeing those debts had the effect of depriving him of his status as a shareholder, is also contrary to the provisions of the CBCA.

[223] As I mentioned above, the trial judge referred to this possibility at para. 74 in writing that [TRANSLATION] "Mennillo held 49 common shares issued by Intramodal on condition that he guarantee all of Intramodal's debts once it began operating" (emphasis added).

[224] Finally, it can be seen from the respondent company's registers that no suspensive condition related to the issuance of the appellant's shares was set out in the resolution of the board of directors that authorized their issuance. For such a suspensive condition to have any effect, it would also have had to appear in the respondent company's registers. Otherwise, there would be no way for creditors to

[219] La société intimée, dans son mémoire, affirme d'ailleurs que le capital déclaré n'a en aucun temps été réduit. De plus, aucune résolution n'a été adoptée pour approuver le rachat de ses actions par la société. En fait, la seule résolution en cause vise, comme nous le verrons plus loin, un transfert d'actions qui serait intervenu entre l'appelant et l'actionnaire majoritaire d'Intramodal, M. Rosati.

[220] Qui plus est, on voit mal comment les critères de liquidité et de solvabilité auraient pu être satisfaits étant donné que la société intimée ne comptait alors, de son propre aveu, aucun actif.

[222] La conclusion du juge de première instance — écartée par les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel — selon laquelle les actions de l'appelant auraient été émises conditionnellement à ce qu'il garantisse le passif de la société intimée, le souhait exprimé par l'appelant de ne plus garantir celui-ci ayant eu pour effet de le priver du statut d'actionnaire, va également à l'encontre des dispositions de la LCSA.

[223] Comme mentionné précédemment, le juge de première instance réfère à cette possibilité au par. 74 lorsqu'il écrit que « Mennillo a détenu 49 actions ordinaires émises par Intramodal, le tout conditionnellement à ce que ce dernier garantisse l'ensemble des créances de Intramodal dès que cette dernière débute ses activités » (je souligne).

[224] Enfin, à la lecture des registres de la société intimée, on constate qu'aucune condition suspensive liée à l'émission des actions de l'appelant n'est prévue dans la résolution du conseil d'administration autorisant l'émission de celles-ci. Pour qu'une telle condition suspensive puisse produire quelque effet, encore aurait-il fallu qu'elle apparaisse dans les registres de la société intimée, sans quoi il n'y know that the company's share capital could be affected at any time.

(b) Effect of the Alleged Agreement

[225] I also agree with the appellant and the dissenting judge of the Court of Appeal that it is impossible to find, as a matter of law, that the appellant transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati on May 25, 2005. Whatever conclusion might be reached about the credibility of the witnesses in this regard, the intention expressed by the appellant of withdrawing from the respondent company had no effect on his rights as a shareholder.

[226] Though governed by the CBCA, a transfer of shares remains subject to the conditions of formation of a contract.

[227] My colleague Cromwell J. states that the appellant transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati by means of an onerous contract, but he does not specify the nature of that contract, its essential elements and what prestation Mr. Mennillo received in return from Mr. Rosati. However, [TRANSLATION] "[t]he fact that a contract is innominate does not mean that it is subject to no legislative scheme": D. Lluelles and B. Moore, Droit des obligations (2nd ed. 2012), at para. 136.

[228] The Civil Code of Québec defines a contract as "an agreement of wills by which one or several persons obligate themselves to one or several other persons to perform a prestation" (art. 1378). Where there is no meeting of the minds between the parties — unlike where the conditions of formation of a contract are not met, which results in the nullity of the contract — it cannot be found that a contract even exists: V. Karim, Les obligations (4th ed. 2015), at para. 507; see also para. 642. The proposal must be firmly directed toward the completion of a specific juridical operation: Lluelles and Moore, at para. 275.

[229] The respondent company submits that the appellant transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati and that, in return, he was relieved of his obligation to avait aucun moyen pour les créanciers de savoir que son capital-actions pouvait à tout moment être affecté.

b) Effet de la prétendue entente

[225] Je partage par ailleurs l'avis de l'appelant et du juge dissident en Cour d'appel qu'il est impossible de conclure en droit que l'appelant a transféré ses actions à M. Rosati le 25 mai 2005. En effet, peu importe la conclusion à laquelle nous pouvons arriver sur la crédibilité des témoins à cet égard, l'intention manifestée par l'appelant de se retirer de la société intimée était sans effet sur ses droits en tant qu'actionnaire.

[226] Bien qu'il soit régi par la LCSA, le transfert d'actions demeure assujetti aux conditions de formation d'un contrat.

[227] Mon collègue le juge Cromwell dit que l'appelant a transféré ses actions à M. Rosati par le biais d'un contrat à titre onéreux, mais il omet de préciser quelle serait la nature du contrat, quels sont ses éléments essentiels et quelle prestation M. Mennillo aurait reçue en retour de la part de M. Rosati. Or, « [l]e caractère innommé d'un contrat ne signifie pas pour autant qu'il échappe à tout régime législatif » : D. Lluelles et B. Moore, Droit des obligations (2e éd. 2012), par. 136.

[228] Le Code civil du Québec définit le contrat comme « un accord de volonté, par lequel une ou plusieurs personnes s'obligent envers une ou plusieurs autres à exécuter une prestation » (art. 1378). L'absence de rencontre des volontés des parties, contrairement au non-respect des conditions de formation du contrat qui, lui, entraîne la nullité, empêche de conclure à l'existence même du contrat : V. Karim, Les obligations (4e éd. 2015), par. 507; voir aussi par. 642. La proposition doit tendre de manière ferme à la conclusion d'une opération juridique précise : Lluelles et Moore, par. 275.

[229] La société intimée soutient que l'appelant a transféré ses actions à M. Rosati et qu'il était libéré, en contrepartie, de son obligation de financer finance Intramodal's operations and guarantee its debts. In my view, this is not a valid prestation. This submission by the respondent company, once again, confuses the company's distinct legal personality with that of its shareholder or shareholders.

[230] The intention expressed by the appellant in this case was at most an invitation to contract. The fact that a transfer of shares was registered by the respondent company where Mr. Rosati had spent no money to acquire the appellant's shares certainly does not prove that the appellant transferred his shares. To conclude from the respondent company's registration of a transfer of shares that a contract was formed is to engage in circular reasoning: because a transfer was registered, a contract was formed, and because the contract was formed, the transfer is necessarily valid.

[231] The parties also referred to the possibility that the alleged agreement of May 2005 was a contract of gift, but it is clear that there was no gift in the case at bar. There is a presumption in the civil law that acts are normally by onerous title. Two things must thus be proved before a gift can be found to exist: an absence of consideration and [TRANSLATION] "a deliberate intent to impoverish oneself" (Martin v. Dupont, 2016 QCCA 475, at paras. 26-31 (CanLII)). In its factum, the respondent company states that [TRANSLATION] "[the appellant] wants just one thing: to receive '. . . money for the rest of [his] life, till [he dies]'" (para. 30). On the face of it, this seems to me to be the exact opposite of an intent to impoverish oneself. Moreover, and this is not insignificant, neither the respondent company nor the appellant is arguing that the shares were given to Mr. Rosati on May 25, 2005. The former states in its factum that the alleged contract between the parties was [TRANSLATION] "anything but a gratuitous contract" (para. 77), while the latter denies the very existence of an exchange of wills but, in an alternative argument, responds to the fact that no valid consideration was received by reiterating the requirements for a gift under the Civil Code of Québec and the legal consequences of a failure to satisfy those requirements.

les opérations d'Intramodal et de garantir le passif de la société. À mon avis, cela ne constitue pas une prestation valide. Cette prétention de la société intimée confond, encore une fois, la personnalité juridique distincte de la société avec celle de son ou ses actionnaires.

[231] Les parties ont également évoqué la possibilité que la prétendue entente du mois de mai 2005 constitue un contrat de donation. Or, il est clair qu'il n'y a pas eu de donation en l'espèce. En effet, il existe en droit civil une présomption selon laquelle un acte est normalement à titre onéreux. Deux éléments doivent alors être établis pour conclure à la donation : l'absence de contrepartie et « la volonté réfléchie de s'appauvrir » (Martin c. Dupont, 2016 QCCA 475, par. 26-31 (CanLII)). Dans son mémoire, la société intimée écrit qu'« [u]ne seule volonté [. . .] anime [l'appelant] : de recevoir [TRADUCTION] "(…) de l'argent [s]a vie durant, jusqu'à [s]on décès" » (par. 30). Cela me semble, a priori, l'antithèse d'une volonté de s'appauvrir. Par ailleurs, et ce n'est pas anodin, ni la société intimée ni l'appelant ne prétendent que les actions ont été données à M. Rosati le 25 mai 2005. La première indique dans son mémoire que le prétendu contrat intervenu entre les parties est « tout sauf un contrat à titre gratuit » (par. 77). Le second nie l'existence même d'un échange de volontés, mais répond subsidiairement à l'absence de contrepartie valide en rappelant les exigences du Code civil du Québec en matière de donation et les conséquences du non-respect de telles exigences en droit.

[232] Article 1824 C.C.Q. reads as follows:

1824. The gift of movable or immovable property is made, on pain of absolute nullity, by notarial act en minute, and shall be published.

These rules do not apply where, in the case of the gift of movable property, the consent of the parties is accompanied by delivery and immediate possession of the property.

[233] In the absence of a published notarial act en minute, a gratuitous contract must be consistent with the definition of a manual gift, according to which either the donee must be put in immediate possession of the property or all hindrances must be removed so that the donee can take possession of the property (art. 1825 C.C.Q.). If the contract does not meet the conditions for a manual gift, it is absolutely null: Paré v. Paré (Succession de), 2014 QCCA 1138.

[234] Furthermore, s. 65(3) of the CBCA imposes a second requirement for possession in the case of a manual gift: the share certificate for the transferred shares must, at a minimum, be endorsed by the transferor (Grusk v. Sparling (1992), 44 C.A.Q. 219).

[235] In the instant case, not only did the appellant never express an intention to make a gift of his shares, but it is clear that these conditions were not met.

[236] In short, I cannot accept the proposition that the onus was on the appellant to seek a conclusion that the alleged agreement of May 25, 2005 was null after inferring that a contract existed from the fact that a transfer had been registered even though there had been no exchange of wills on that date concerning a specific juridical operation and even though the appellant did not know that the transfer had been registered in the respondent company's registers until he had instituted this proceeding.

(4) Trial Judge's Assessment of the Evidence

[232] L'article 1824 C.c.Q. se lit ainsi :

1824. La donation d'un bien meuble ou immeuble s'effectue, à peine de nullité absolue, par acte notarié en minute; elle doit être publiée.

Il est fait exception à ces règles lorsque, s'agissant de la donation d'un bien meuble, le consentement des parties s'accompagne de la délivrance et de la possession immédiate du bien.

[234] Dans la même veine, pour qu'il y ait possession aux fins d'un don manuel, la LCSA, à son par. 65(3), prévoit une seconde exigence : le certificat d'actions constatant les actions cédées doit au minimum être endossé par le cédant (Grusk c. Sparling (1992), 44 C.A.Q. 219).

[235] En l'espèce, non seulement l'appelant n'a jamais exprimé l'intention de donner ses actions, mais il est évident que ces conditions n'ont pas été satisfaites.

[236] En somme, je ne puis souscrire à la thèse qu'il appartenait à l'appelant de soulever la nullité de la prétendue entente du 25 mai 2005, après avoir inféré qu'il y avait eu contrat parce qu'un transfert avait été inscrit, alors qu'il n'y avait pas eu, à ce jour-là, d'échange de volontés sur une opération juridique précise et que l'appelant n'a eu connaissance de l'inscription du transfert dans les registres de la société intimée qu'à une fois le présent recours intenté.

(4) Appréciation de la preuve par le juge de première instance

[237] Dans le cadre de son recours, l'appelant reproche à la société intimée sa conduite fautive, à that it failed to discharge its legal duties and that it registered a transfer of shares without having observed the necessary formalities.

[238] However, insofar as my colleague Cromwell J. accepts the trial judge's finding of fact that the appellant had expressed his intention of withdrawing from Intramodal as a shareholder and had transferred his shares to Mr. Rosati in May 2005, and given that my colleague bases his analysis on that finding, I believe it is important to point out the errors the trial judge made in assessing the evidence. In addition to having no basis in law, that finding by the trial judge is not supported by the evidence and is thus based on palpable and overriding errors. I therefore agree with the dissenting judge of the Court of Appeal that the trial judge's analysis on this point contained errors warranting appellate intervention: Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235.

[239] The finding that the appellant told Mr. Rosati he wanted to withdraw from Intramodal as a shareholder on May 25, 2005 is based solely on Mr. Rosati's testimony. The trial judge erred in rejecting the appellant's testimony, since, as the dissenting judge of the Court of Appeal rightly noted, he did so on the basis of an unreasonable interpretation of several pieces of evidence in the record.

[240] First, there is the letter of resignation signed by the appellant on May 25, 2005, which speaks for itself. The appellant withdrew from the company as a director and officer at that time. That letter prepared by the respondent company's lawyer — who, according to the evidence, was following the majority shareholder's instructions — could easily have provided for more if that had been the parties' intention. But it did not.

[241] Next, there are various documents relating to life insurance taken out on the appellant and Mr. Rosati, of which the respondent was the beneficiary. One of those documents stated that savoir l'omission de se conformer à ses obligations légales et l'inscription d'un transfert d'actions sans le respect des formalités requises.

[238] Toutefois, dans la mesure où mon collègue le juge Cromwell accepte la conclusion de fait du juge de première instance selon laquelle l'appelant aurait exprimé son intention de se retirer d'Intramodal en tant qu'actionnaire et aurait transféré ses actions à M. Rosati en mai 2005, et puisqu'il en fait le fondement de son analyse, j'estime qu'il est important de souligner les erreurs commises par le juge de première instance dans son appréciation de la preuve. En effet, en plus de n'avoir aucun fondement en droit, cette conclusion du juge de première instance ne trouve aucune assise dans la preuve et repose donc sur des erreurs manifestes et dominantes. Je partage ainsi l'avis du juge dissident de la Cour d'appel selon lequel l'analyse du juge de première instance sur ce point comporte des erreurs justifiant l'intervention en appel : Housen c. Nikolaisen, 2002 CSC 33, [2002] 2 R.C.S. 235.

[239] La conclusion selon laquelle l'appelant aurait indiqué à M. Rosati qu'il voulait se retirer en tant qu'actionnaire d'Intramodal le 25 mai 2005 s'appuie exclusivement sur le témoignage de ce dernier. Lorsque le juge de première instance rejette le témoignage de l'appelant, il commet une erreur puisque, comme le souligne à juste titre le juge dissident de la Cour d'appel, il le fait en s'appuyant sur une interprétation déraisonnable de plusieurs pièces versées au dossier.

[241] Il y a aussi les divers documents relatifs à la souscription d'une assurance-vie sur les personnes de l'appelant et de M. Rosati et dont l'intimée était la bénéficiaire. L'un de ces documents indique que

Mr. Rosati was the respondent company's sole shareholder. Yet the policy in question was on the lives of both the appellant and Mr. Rosati. What insurable interest did Intramodal have in the appellant's life if he was no longer a shareholder? To ask the question is to answer it.

[242] As for the letter written by Mr. Kaufman on October 31, 2007 that was sent to the appellant, I also agree with the dissenting judge of the Court of Appeal that it could not reasonably lead to an inference that the appellant was, by insisting on being repaid his investment, relinquishing his shares.

[243] Nor could the formal notice of February 25, 2010 prepared by Mr. Kaufman lead to any negative inference. In it, the appellant claimed to be entitled to receive 50 percent of the respondent company's profits and to continue his partnership with Rosati. But by February 25, 2010, it had become clear that the appellant was no longer a shareholder in the respondent company's registers. According to his testimony and that of his professional advisers, the purpose of the letter was to have the situation remedied, failing which $1,000,000 would be claimed from Mr. Rosati.

[244] Finally, another ground advanced by the trial judge for rejecting the appellant's version was that, in his opinion, the reason the appellant gave for his withdrawal as a director and officer, namely the visit to Intramodal's premises and the examination of the company's books by representatives of Labatt, was false. Yet the dissenting judge of the Court of Appeal noted that, even though the company had not been active at the time, the appellant's assertion that meetings had taken place with representatives of Labatt had not been contradicted. Moreover, amounts were advanced before December 2005 and continued to be advanced until October 2006.

[245] In short, in my view, the evidence does not support the conclusion that the two shareholders entered into an agreement under which the appellant withdrew from the company as a shareholder. In arriving at that conclusion, the trial judge made

M. Rosati est le seul actionnaire de la société intimée. Pourtant, ladite police couvre tant la vie de l'appelant que celle de M. Rosati. Quel intérêt assurable Intramodal détenait-elle sur la vie de l'appelant si celui-ci n'était plus un actionnaire? Poser la question, c'est y répondre.

[242] Quant à la lettre rédigée par Me Kaufman le 31 octobre 2007 et transmise à l'appelant, je suis également d'accord avec le juge dissident en Cour d'appel pour dire qu'on ne pouvait raisonnablement en inférer que l'appelant, en insistant pour se faire rembourser son investissement, renonçait par le fait même à ses actions.

[243] La mise en demeure du 25 février 2010 rédigée par Me Kaufman ne permettait pas non plus de tirer d'inférence négative. L'appelant y revendique son droit à 50 p. 100 des profits de la société intimée et son partenariat avec M. Rosati. Or, en date du 25 février 2010, il était devenu clair que l'appelant n'était plus actionnaire dans les registres de la société intimée. Selon son témoignage et celui de ses représentants professionnels, la lettre visait à faire corriger la situation à défaut de quoi une somme de 1 000 000 $ serait réclamée à M. Rosati.

[245] Bref, à mon avis, la conclusion selon laquelle une entente est intervenue entre les deux actionnaires en vertu de laquelle l'appelant s'est retiré de la société intimée en tant qu'actionnaire n'est pas étayée par la preuve. Pour arriver à cette palpable and overriding errors and disregarded key aspects of the evidence. At most, the evidence shows that the appellant expressed an intention to divest himself of his shares, but no agreement was reached on how he would dispose of them.

(5) Prescription of the Claim

[246] In the alternative, the respondent company argues that the appellant's claim must be dismissed on the ground that it is prescribed. The trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal agreed with that argument.

[247] The CBCA does not specify the prescription period that applies to the oppression remedy, although it does provide for a two-year prescription period for other remedies, two examples of which can be found in ss. 118(7) and 119(3) CBCA. It can therefore be assumed, at least where this remedy is concerned, that Parliament intended to defer to general civil law principles where a claim for oppression is made in Quebec: Martel, at pp. 31-191 to 31-192.

2925. An action to enforce a personal right or movable real right is prescribed by three years, if the prescriptive period is not otherwise determined.

[249] A claim under s. 241 CBCA is normally brought to enforce a personal right. This is the case, for example, where the complainant alleges that a corporation's majority shareholder has acted in disregard of minority shareholders' interests (Bénard v. Gagnon, 2002 CanLII 23768 (Que. Sup. Ct.), aff'd by 2004 CanLII 73057 (Que. C.A.)) or where what is described as oppression consists of acts committed by the directors, who are alleged to have misled and unfairly treated certain shareholders in the same class (Regroupement des marchands actionnaires inc. v. Métro Inc., 2011 QCCS 2389). An oppression claim can also be made to enforce a real right where, for example, the corporation in question refuses to pay conclusion, le juge a commis des erreurs manifestes et dominantes et a fait abstraction d'éléments clés de la preuve. Tout au plus, la preuve démontre qu'une intention de se départir de ses actions a été exprimée par l'appelant, sans toutefois qu'il n'y ait eu d'entente quant à la façon dont il disposerait de ses actions.

(5) Prescription du recours

[246] Subsidiairement, la société intimée fait valoir que le recours de l'appelant doit être rejeté au motif qu'il est prescrit. Le juge de première instance et les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont également conclu en ce sens.

[247] Le délai de prescription applicable au recours pour abus n'est prévu nulle part dans la LCSA. Celle-ci prévoit pourtant, pour d'autres recours, un délai de prescription de deux ans. C'est le cas des par. 118(7) et 119(3) LCSA. On peut donc supposer, dans le cas de ce recours du moins, que le législateur fédéral entendait s'en remettre aux principes généraux du droit civil lorsqu'un tel recours est intenté au Québec : Martel, par. 31-482.

[248] À cet égard, l'art. 2925 C.c.Q. prévoit ce qui suit :

2925. L'action qui tend à faire valoir un droit personnel ou un droit réel mobilier et dont le délai de prescription n'est pas autrement fixé se prescrit par trois ans.

[249] Le recours fondé sur l'art. 241 LCSA tend normalement à faire valoir un droit personnel. C'est le cas notamment lorsque le plaignant allègue que l'actionnaire majoritaire d'une société agit sans tenir compte des intérêts des actionnaires minoritaires (Bénard c. Gagnon, 2002 CanLII 23768 (C.S. Qc), conf. par 2004 CanLII 73057 (C.A. Qc)), ou lorsque l'abus s'entend d'actes des administrateurs qui auraient induit en erreur et traité inéquitablement certains actionnaires d'une même catégorie (Regroupement des marchands actionnaires inc. c. Métro Inc., 2011 QCCS 2389). Le recours pour abus peut également tendre à faire valoir un droit réel lorsque, par exemple, la société en cause refuse dividends owed to the complainant despite acknowledging the complainant's status as a shareholder.

[250] Sometimes, as in the case at bar, the claim is instead premised on the complainant's ownership of shares and on the corporation's refusal to acknowledge the complainant's status as a shareholder. In such cases, a claim under s. 241 CBCA is brought not to enforce a real right but to have it acknowledged.

[251] In the civil law, the right of ownership (in this case the right of ownership of a security) is perpetual, which means that it is not lost either by non-use or by the mere passage of time:

[TRANSLATION] The right of ownership is perpetual. This does not mean that the right remains forever attached to the same patrimony or that it can be transmitted perpetually; it means that it is not lost through non-use (supra, at No. 18). However, an owner can destroy (corporeal) property, in which case the right will disappear with the property, which explains why the right is identified with the property. The owner can also renounce the right (the abandoned property then becomes a thing without an owner — arts. 934 et seq. C.C.Q.) or transfer the property to a trust patrimony without an owner (art. 1261 C.C.Q.), or the right may be acquired by a third party possessor through acquisitive prescription . . . . [Emphasis in original; footnote omitted.]

[252] Professor Pierre-Claude Lafond states the following on this same subject:

[TRANSLATION] One characteristic of the right of ownership is that it is not lost by way of extinctive prescription (see supra, at 3.1.2.4). Since an action in revendication sanctions the right of ownership, it too is therefore imprescriptible, unlike other types of actions to enforce a real right, which are prescribed by ten years (art. 2923 C.C.Q.) or by three years (art. 2925 C.C.Q.), depending on whether the right is immovable or movable. In our view, those two provisions cannot apply, given that the purpose of a petitory action is not to enforce a right but to have it acknowledged (art. 912 C.C.Q.).

[250] Il arrive, comme c'est le cas en l'espèce, que le recours se fonde plutôt sur la prémisse que le plaignant est propriétaire d'actions et qu'on reproche à la société de refuser de lui reconnaître le statut d'actionnaire. Le recours fondé sur l'art. 241 LCSA vise alors non pas à faire valoir un droit réel, mais à le faire reconnaître.

[251] Or, le droit civil reconnaît le caractère perpétuel du droit de propriété (en l'occurrence un droit de propriété portant sur une valeur mobilière), ce qui signifie que celui-ci ne se perd ni par le non-usage ni par le simple écoulement du temps :

Le droit de propriété est perpétuel. Cela signifie non pas que le droit demeure attaché à perpette au même patrimoine ou qu'il est transmissible perpétuellement, mais qu'il ne se perd pas par le non-usage (supra, n° 18). Cependant, le propriétaire peut détruire son bien (corporel), le droit disparaissant avec celui-ci, ce qui permet de comprendre l'identification du droit au bien. Il peut encore renoncer à son droit (le bien abandonné devenant un bien sans maître — 934 et s. C.c.Q.), transférer son bien à un patrimoine fiduciaire dépourvu de propriétaire (1261 C.c.Q.), ou le droit peut se prescrire acquisitivement au bénéfice d'un tiers possesseur . . . [En italique dans l'original; note en bas de page omise.]

[252] Sur ce même point, le Professeur Pierre-Claude Lafond s'exprime ainsi :

Une des caractéristiques du droit de propriété est qu'il ne se perd pas par l'effet de la prescription extinctive (voir supra, 3.1.2.4). Puisque l'action en revendication sanctionne le droit de propriété, elle est donc aussi imprescriptible, et ce contrairement aux autres espèces d'actions qui visent à faire valoir un droit réel, lesquelles se prescrivent par dix ans (art. 2923 C.c.Q.) ou trois ans (art. 2925 C.c.Q.), selon qu'il s'agit d'un droit immobilier ou mobilier. À notre avis, ces deux dispositions ne peuvent s'appliquer, car l'action pétitoire ne vise nullement à faire valoir un droit, mais plutôt à le faire reconnaître (art. 912 C.c.Q.).

In practice, this imprescriptibility may be defeated where acquisitive prescription is claimed by a possessor (arts. 2917 to 2919 C.C.Q.) (see infra, at 6.3.3.3.2), although this does not change the principle that the right of ownership cannot be lost by reason of the passage of time. [Emphasis added; citations omitted.]

(Précis de droit des biens (2nd ed. 2007), at para. 1205)

[253] Thus, extinctive prescription cannot be set up against a person seeking to have his or her ownership of property acknowledged.

[255] As a result, the prescription period applicable to a claim under s. 241 CBCA will depend on the basis for the claim. Where — as in this case — the complainant has been acknowledged to be a shareholder at some point and is claiming to have been unlawfully stripped of shareholder status by the corporation, the claim is therefore imprescriptible.

[256] This was the conclusion reached by the Quebec Court of Appeal in Greenberg v. Gruber, 2004 CanLII 14882 (Que. C.A.).

[257] In that case, the complainant submitted that shares in several corporations were being held for him by the respondents as prête-noms (nominees). He argued that he actually owned a third of the shares of those corporations, and he requested, inter alia, that the registers be rectified and that a share certificate be delivered to him.

[258] The respondents sought to set up extinctive prescription against the claim. The trial judge held that prescription was applicable but that the claim

En pratique, cette imprescriptibilité peut cependant être mise en échec par l'effet d'une prescription acquisitive réclamée d'un possesseur (art. 2917 à 2919 C.c.Q.) (voir infra, 6.3.3.3.2), ce qui ne change rien au principe que le droit de propriété ne saurait se perdre par l'écoulement du temps. [Je souligne; références omises.]

[253] Ainsi, la personne qui cherche à se voir reconnaître la propriété d'un bien ne peut se faire opposer la prescription extinctive.

[254] L'action d'une société constitue un droit réel sur lequel l'actionnaire peut demander que son droit de propriété soit reconnu : « Pour l'actionnaire, la propriété des actions est un droit réel, et non un droit personnel, ce qui peut rendre irrecevable au Québec un recours intenté pour se faire déclarer propriétaire d'actions dont le situs est hors du Québec » (Martel, par. 12-42 (je souligne; notes en bas de page omises)).

[255] Suivant ce raisonnement, le délai de prescription applicable au recours exercé en application de l'art. 241 LCSA dépendra du fondement du recours. Lorsque le statut d'actionnaire a été à un moment reconnu au plaignant — comme c'est le cas en l'espèce — et que celui-ci prétend que la société l'en a illégalement dépouillé, le recours est alors imprescriptible.

[258] En réponse à ce recours, les intimés ont tenté d'opposer la prescription extinctive. Le juge de première instance ayant conclu que la prescription was not prescribed, and the respondents appealed that decision. The issue before the Quebec Court of Appeal was whether, in such a case, extinctive prescription can be relied on [TRANSLATION] "in order to argue that a shareholder has lost the right of ownership in his shares because of his failure to act in a timely manner" (Greenberg, at para. 6). If the answer was yes, the Court of Appeal also had to determine which prescription period was applicable, that of 10 years under art. 2922 C.C.Q. or that of three years under art. 2925 C.C.Q.

[259] The Court of Appeal accepted the complainant's argument that extinctive prescription cannot be raised where, in the case of a claim under s. 241 CBCA, the complainant seeks to assert a right of ownership or seeks acknowledgment of his or her status as a shareholder in connection with that right.

[260] More specifically, the Court of Appeal reached the conclusion that [TRANSLATION] "the fact that [the complainant] failed to contest the 'denial' of his status as a shareholder within three years (or any other period) does not mean that he can no longer assert his right of ownership in the shares" (Greenberg, at para. 43). To terminate the complainant's right of ownership, the respondents would have had to show that they had acquired the shares by way of acquisitive prescription, but they were not making that argument. The Court of Appeal added that, "[a]s an owner, the [complainant] certainly cannot be prevented from asserting his right of ownership by someone who simply refuses to acknowledge that right" (Greenberg, at para. 44).

[261] I am in complete agreement with that reasoning.

[262] Like the respondents in Greenberg, the respondent company in the case at bar is not arguing that it became the owner of the appellant's shares by way of acquisitive prescription. It is simply refusing to acknowledge the appellant's status as a shareholder, and its argument is that its majority shareholder, Mr. Rosati, now owns his shares as a result of an alleged informal verbal agreement between the appellant and Mr. Rosati. However, I était applicable mais que le recours n'était pas prescrit, les intimés ont fait appel de la décision. La question dont la Cour d'appel du Québec était saisie était de savoir si, dans un tel cas, la prescription extinctive pouvait être invoquée « pour prétendre qu'un actionnaire a perdu le droit de propriété de ses actions vu son défaut d'agir en temps utile » (Greenberg, par. 6). Dans l'affirmative, la Cour d'appel devait également déterminer quel délai de prescription était applicable, celui de 10 ans prévu à l'art. 2922 C.c.Q. ou celui de trois ans prévu à l'art. 2925 C.c.Q.

[259] La Cour d'appel a fait droit à la prétention du plaignant selon laquelle la prescription extinctive ne pouvait être invoquée lorsque, dans le cadre d'un recours fondé sur l'art. 241 LCSA, un plaignant cherche à faire valoir son droit de propriété ou demande que, en lien avec ce droit, le statut d'actionnaire lui soit reconnu.

[260] Plus particulièrement, la Cour d'appel est arrivée à la conclusion que « ce n'est pas parce que [le plaignant] a omis de contester la "négation" de son statut d'actionnaire à l'intérieur d'un délai de trois ans (ou de tout autre délai) qu'il ne peut plus faire valoir son droit de propriété sur les actions » (Greenberg, par. 43). Pour mettre fin au droit de propriété du plaignant, les intimés devaient démontrer qu'ils avaient acquis les actions par voie de prescription acquisitive, ce qu'ils ne soutenaient pas. Toujours selon la Cour d'appel, « [e]n tant que propriétaire, [le plaignant] ne peut certainement pas être empêché de faire valoir son droit de propriété par quelqu'un qui refuse simplement de reconnaître ce droit » (Greenberg, par. 44).

[261] Je souscris entièrement à ce raisonnement.

[262] En l'espèce, tout comme dans affaire Greenberg, la société intimée ne prétend pas être devenue propriétaire des actions de l'appelant par application de la prescription acquisitive. Elle refuse tout simplement de reconnaître à l'appelant son statut d'actionnaire et soutient que c'est son actionnaire majoritaire, M. Rosati, qui est dorénavant propriétaire de ses actions en raison d'une prétendue entente verbale et intervenue informellement entre would stress once again that the situation in this case differs from the one in Greenberg, as Mr. Rosati is not a party to the litigation and therefore cannot claim acquisitive prescription in relation to the shares. Nor can the respondent company do so on his behalf.

VI. Conclusion

[263] For all these reasons, I would allow the appeal, revoke the resolution to transfer the appellant's shares and order that the respondent company's registers be rectified to reflect the appellant's status as a shareholder, with costs throughout.

Appeal dismissed with costs, CÔTÉ J. dissenting.

l'appelant et M. Rosati. Or, contrairement à la situation dans l'affaire Greenberg, et j'insiste une fois de plus sur ce point, M. Rosati n'est pas partie au litige et ne peut par conséquent revendiquer la prescription acquisitive des actions. La société intimée ne peut non plus le faire pour lui.

VI. Conclusion

[263] Pour tous ces motifs, je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi, d'annuler la résolution de transfert des actions de l'appelant et d'ordonner la rectification des registres de la société intimée afin de refléter le statut d'actionnaire de l'appelant, le tout avec dépens devant toutes les cours.

PERELL, J.

REASONS FOR DECISION

A. Introduction

[1] In 2008, Midwest Amusement Park, LLC sued Robert Cameron, Cameron Motorsports

Inc., Malcolm McMaster, MMG Financial Corp., and Team Hurricane Inc. for fraud (the 2008-action).

[2] In 2010, Midwest Amusement and Dr. Samanta Roy Institute of Science and Technology (the "Institute") sued Mr. Cameron for another fraud (the 2010-action).

[3] In the 2008-action, Midwest Amusement now moves for summary judgment against Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports for the equivalent in Canadian dollars of $386,281.93 (USD). Midwest Amusement also requests a lift of the stay of proceedings against Cameron Motorsports, which a few days ago made an assignment into bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.[1]

[4] In the 2010-action, Midwest Amusement and the Institute now move for summary judgment against Mr. Cameron for $5 million plus the equivalent in Canadian dollars of $175,000 (USD), plus punitive damages of $500,000.

[5] For the reasons that follow:

- I lift the stay of proceedings in the 2008-action brought about by the assignment into bankruptcy of Cameron Motorsports.
- In the 2008-action, I grant Midwest Amusement a judgment against Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports for: (a) the equivalent in Canadian dollars of $386,281.93 (USD), plus post-judgment interest at 2%; and (b) costs of $40,000 on a substantial indemnity basis.
- In the 2010-action, I grant Midwest Amusement and the Institute a judgment against Mr. Cameron for: (a) the equivalent in Canadian dollars of $175,000 (USD) plus pre-judgment and post-judgment interest at 2% per annum from November 1, 2008; (b) damages at large of $500,000 with post-judgment interest at 2% per annum; (c) punitive damages of $500,000 plus post-judgment interest at 2% per annum; and (d) costs of $40,000 on a substantial indemnity basis.

B. Evidentiary Background

[6] In support of the two summary judgment motions, Midwest Amusement and the Institute relied on the affidavit of Naomi Isaacson dated April 3 2018 and on the affidavit of Kathy Stubits dated April 3, 2018. The Plaintiffs also relied on the transcripts from the examinations for discovery and form the cross-examinations on summary judgment motions in the 2008-action and in the 2010-action.

[7] Ms. Isaacson, who is the manager of Midwest Amusement and the Chief Executive Officer of the Institute, was not cross-examined. Ms. Stubits, who is a law clerk at McCarthy Tétrault LLP, lawyers for Midwest Amusement and for the Institute, was not cross-examined.

[8] Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports did not file any evidence on the summary judgment motions and neither defendant appeared at the hearing of the summary judgment motions.

[1] R.S.C., 1985, c. B-3.

[9] Late during the course of the argument of the motion, I was advised that Mr. Cameron was in transit from Hamilton to the courthouse in Toronto. He did not arrive before the argument was completed, and I reserved judgment.

[10] Cameron Motorsports' trustee-in-bankruptcy was aware of the summary judgment motion but did not appear, although duly served.

C. Facts

[11] Midwest Amusement is a limited liability corporation incorporated pursuant to the laws of Wisconsin, U.S.A. It operated USA International Raceway, a go-kart race track located in Shawano, Wisconsin on lands owned by a subsidiary of the Institute.

[12] Midwest Amusement is owned by the Institute, which is a not-for-profit corporation pursuant to the laws of Delaware, U.S.A. The Institute owns a group of corporations that operate a variety of business including amusement parks, hotels, land development, and resource development.

[13] Mr. Cameron is an Ontario resident and is the principal of Cameron Motorsports, an Ontario corporation that carried on the business of distributing go-karts and go-kart accessories. Mr. Cameron and, or his wife are the owners of Cameron Motorsports.

[14] Malcolm McMaster is or was an Ontario resident and is the principal of MMG Financial, an Ontario corporation that carried on the business of a financing purchase transactions. It was alleged that MMG Financial was the financial arm of Cameron Motorsports. Mr. Cameron and Mr. McMaster were business associates or partners until there was a falling out between them.

[15] Team Hurricane is an Ontario corporation. Team Hurricane was owned and controlled by some combination of Messrs. Cameron and McMaster, Cameron Motorsports, and MMG Financial. Team Hurricane was a shell company.

[17] As a result of these meetings, Midwest Amusement was induced to enter into an oral agreement pursuant to which it agreed to purchase 24 go-karts, a service and maintenance service, and also rights to the "Arrive and Drive Program," an apparently very successful turnkey racing program to operate go-cart race tracks for amateur competitors. Midwest Amusement was to receive the rights to use the program and a distributorship to licence the program to other race tracks across the U.S.

[18] To induce Midwest Amusement to purchase the go-karts and the Arrive and Drive Program, Messrs. Cameron and McMaster, Cameron Motorsports, MMG Financial, and Team Hurricane misrepresented the quality of the go-karts, the services that would be provided, the distributorship program, the forecasts of profits, and their own intention to perform their promises.

[19] Midwest Amusement was also induced to enter into an oral loan agreement with MMG Financial. Under this arrangement, MMG Financial agreed to finance Midwest Amusement's purchase of goods and services from Cameron Motorsports and Team Hurricane. MMG Financial agreed to pay on Midwest Amusement's behalf the cost of the goods and services. The payment was to be a $190,000 (USD) loan to be repaid by Midwest Amusement with interest at 2% per month.

[20] It is unknown whether MMG Financial actually advanced the $190,000 (USD). Mr. McMaster said that it did. However, Cameron Motorsports denies every being paid for the go-karts and the associated goods and services. The breakup of the business relationship between Mr. Cameron and Mr. McMaster may have had something to do with this dispute about what happened to the $190,000 (USD).

[21] In any event, in the late summer of 2005, Team Hurricane, which was a shell company, delivered the go-karts to Midwest Amusement. The delivery was late, and the go-carts were unassembled, defective, and dangerous and inoperable when assembled. The engines of twelve go-carts exploded during a test run, and the remaining twelve go-karts were inoperable. The material for the Arrive and Drive Program was never delivered.

[22] Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports later admitted that they never intended to provide the goods and services that they had represented and promised to Midwest Amusement.

[23] As a result of not receiving the goods and services from Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports, Midwest Amusement reneged on making any payments to MMG Financial.

[24] In August 2006, MMG Financial responded by bringing an action against Midwest Amusement in the District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin for repayment of its $190,000 (USD) loan.

[25] In September 2008, MMG Financial's action was successful. A jury of the U.S. District Court granted MMG Financial a judgment for $386,281.93 (USD) for breach of contract.

[26] On August 29, 2008, by notice of action (the 2008-action), Midwest Amusement sued Cameron Motorsports, Mr. Campbell, MMG Financial, Mr. McMaster and Team Hurricane for fraud.

[27] On September 26, 2008, Midwest Amusement delivered its Statement of Claim.

[28] Following the commencement of the 2008-action, Mr. Cameron persuaded Midwest Amusement and the Institute that Mr. McMaster was to blame for all the problems. Mr. Cameron said that he would help Midwest Amusement and the Institute if they discontinued the 2008-action against him and his company. Thus, in October 2008, notwithstanding the delivery of its Statement of Claim, in the 2008-action, Midwest Amusement entered into a Loan Agreement and a Business Agreement with Mr. Cameron. Under these agreements, Mr. Cameron agreed to provide consulting services to ensure that Midwest Amusement would realize weekly revenues of $50-70,000 (USD) during the 2009 racing season, and he agreed to lend or to arrange a loan to Midwest Amusement and the Institute of $10 million (USD) for their ongoing operations.

[29] In order to induce Midwest Amusement and the Institute to enter into the Business Agreement and the Loan Agreement, Mr. Cameron fabricated documents indicating that international wire transfers of funds had been arranged. On his examination for discovery, Mr. Cameron admitted that he fabricated all of the banking and financial information that he provided to Midwest Amusement and the Institute.

[30] Midwest Amusement and the Institute were fooled. Around November 1, 2008, in performance of the Business Agreement, Midwest Amusement and the Institute agreed to pay Mr. Cameron a consulting fee of $250,000 (USD), and they paid $175,000 (USD) as an advance payment to Mr. Cameron.

[31] After receiving the $175,000 (USD), Mr. Cameron stated that he had never intended to honour the Loan and Business Agreement and that he had tricked Midwest Amusement in order to receive the monies that he alleged were never paid for the go-karts pursuant to the 2005 agreement.

[32] On his examinations in these proceedings, Mr. Cameron admitted that he never intended to fulfill his obligations under the Business and Loan Agreements and that he had fraudulently induced Midwest Amusement and the Institute to transfer $175,000 (USD) as the first instalment of the consulting fee. He confessed that he faked the Swiss bank and the financial records that he sent to Midwest Amusement and the Institute as assurance that $10 million was available for a loan. On his examination for discovery, Mr. Cameron testified as follows:

> Q. 769 Generally one of the things that you were in discussion with my client about doing during this September/October time frame of 2008 was being a consultant for them whereby you would set up an arrive and drive program, lend them go-karts, promote certain events and get their racetrack in the black, if you will, in terms of turning a profit, right?
> A. Correct.
>
> Q. 770 And there's a contract that was signed in that regard, wasn't there?
>
> A. Uh-huh.
>
> Q. 771 We'll come to it.
>
> MR. HENDERSON: Is that the business agreement that you're referring to?
>
> BY MR. TAIT:
>
> Q. 772 Yes, and we'll come to it, but I'm right, and I know we've talked about this before, you never had any intention of living up to that?
>
> A. No. I never had intentions living up to any of the things that I agreed to do for them.
>
> Q.773. You just wanted them to pay you some money because you felt they owed you money for the go-karts?
>
> A. Yes, they owed me money for the go-karts.
>
> Q.774 How much did they owe you for the go-karts?
>
> A. I don't know offhand, but when they went to court, I think they lost 190,000, so if I would have asked for 190, I would look too suspicious, so I asked for 350. I think it was or something like that and 175,000 up front, and then the last whatever 100 and something thousand once I got all the stuff done.
>
> Q. 775 Expecting only to ever get the 175?

2018 ONSC 4549 (CanLII)

A. That's correct.

[….]

Q. 796 And is it your evidence that this contract entitled Loan and Business Agreement Between USA International Raceway Inc. and Robert Cameron of October 23rd, 2008 reflects the terms of the consultancy agreement that was being negotiated and entered into at the time?

A. To be honest with you, I never read this agreement. It didn't matter what it said. I sent them a different agreement, and this is what they sent back.

Q.797 And you were fine with it?

A. Like I said, it didn't matter what it said. It could have said anything. I was signing it. It didn't matter.

Q.798 One of the aspects, the idea, the concept, was that you were going to be a consultant. They were going to pay you I think you said 300 and some odd thousand dollars with 175,000 up front, right?

A. Uh-huh.

Q.799 Then, as part and parcel of that, you were going to lend my clients ten million as a mortgage on the racetrack. Is that correct?

A. It had nothing to do with -- I guess it was ten million, and in return I guess whatever collateral they could put up for that kind of money. Like I said, it's --

Q. 800 What was the ten million for clause No. 3?

A. They needed money. Ten million was to --

Q. 801 You were supposed to wire ten million?

A. Yes.

Q. 802 And of course you never did?

A. I never did. Where would I get ten million? Where would I get half a million dollars?

Q. 803 You don't have ten million?

A. No, I don't have ten million. If -- no.

Q. 804 But you told my clients that you did?

A. Your clients told me a lot of things too.

Q. 805 That's not the question, sir.

A. So, I lied just like they lied, and I did whatever I could do in accordance even to the police when they found out the money that I got and they saw the wire transfers. They lied to me right from day one, and I just did whatever I said to get my money back.

Q.806 Is it fair to call it a setup?

A. I'm sorry?

Q. 807 Can we call it a setup?

A. Yes, I think they set me up.

Q. 808 No, no, what you did to them.

A. No. What I did to them was in retaliation, sir, to their setup.

2018 ONSC 4549 (CanLII)

[33] Retaliation was not enough for Mr. Cameron. He felt horribly wronged by Midwest Amusement and the Institute. He wanted revenge. In his lust for blood, he concocted and published to the media a story that the Institute had paid him $175,0000 (USD) to arrange a contract killing of 60 residents of Shawano, Wisconsin including its mayor and virtually every other town official. For example, on December 23, 2008, Mr. Cameron was interviewed on a CBS Evening News. During the broadcast, a video of which I viewed, he said that he had received $175,000 (USD) in wire transfers from the Institute along with a list of 60 names of persons marked for assignation. Mr. Cameron said that he had only approached the Institute to recover the money owed him for go-karts, but they hired him to arrange murders.

[34] In November 2008, Mr. Cameron set numerous threatening, racist, sexist, and repulsive text and phone messages to Ms. Isaacson, members of her family, and to others associated with Midwest Amusement and the Institute. Examples are set out below:

> Text: 11/23/2008 - I hope your sister enjoyed the pork she ate while in jail. Does she look or sound like the dirty pig she is?
>
> Text: 11/23/2008 - Tomorrow I will be releasing all our taped conversations to all media and the people you guys have been emailing shit about me.
>
> Text 11/23/2008 - u just signed the end to [the Institute] I will not stop until everyone of you are dead and behind bars and I have more supporters than u have cult members.
>
> Text: 11/23/2008 - Your son Gad is going hunting - I hope he is safe in North Dakota
>
> Text: 11/23/2008 - u r about 2 go to jail 4 along time, bitch
>
> Text: 11/23/2008- U have to be the ugliest bitch I ever seen.
>
> Phone Message: Hey Darlene, I hope all you guys are fucking tape-recording all these messages. Especially you. I am gonna fuck with you and yours. You don't understand you got a big fucking mouth. And you're gonna keep talking about my family, me, my business and your emailing everybody. You know what? Now its time to talk about you, you little bitch. I heard you're an old bitch, but you're an old bitch that wants everybody. You know, what the fuck, I'm talking about you know who the fuck I am. I'm coming after you two fucking pieces of shit.
>
> Phone Message: Hey bitch, website, email and everything else. Shut your fucking hole. I hear everything about you fucking people. Gonna be all over the fucking Internet. I'm gonna email everybody in fucking Wisconsin. You are fucked, bitch. You, and your fucking sister and all your fucking religion. You fucking cock sucking people are all gonna be paying for what you did to me. You cunt. You slimy bitch.
>
> Phone Message: Did the Doc tell you about your sister Naomi? I'll get her number tomorrow from the telephone company. I know where you guys live. I know whom the companies you guys are associated with. I know everything now. I am gonna find a little bit more out each fucking day. You guys are in a lot of fucking trouble. I'm fucking coming. I'm telling you, you think your sister got it bad, you're gonna get it good. You fucking bitch.

[44] On April 1, 2011, Master Hawkins dismissed Mr. McMaster's and MMG Financial's motion for a summary judgment in the 2008-action.

[45] On April 28, 2011, Mr. Cameron was examined for discovery in the 2008-action and in the 2010-action in his own behalf and as the representative of Cameron Motorsports.

[46] In December 2011, Midwest Amusement set the 2008-action down for trial. It is not clear to me precisely when, but the 2010-action was also set down for trial.

[47] Between August 2012 and February 2014, Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports changed counsel several times and the parties were unable to agree about scheduling the trial or trials. Eventually, the trial in the 2010-action was scheduled for March 10, 2014 and the trial in the 2008-action was scheduled for June 23, 2014.

[48] On March 7, 2014, days before the commencement of the trial in the 2010-action, Mr. Cameron advised counsel for the Plaintiffs that he had declared bankruptcy on September 4, 2013. As a result, the actions against him were automatically stayed pursuant to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

[49] On March 10, 2014, Justice Stinson ordered that the automatic stay against Mr. Cameron be lifted for the sole purpose of making an order as to costs against Mr. Cameron for the wasted preparation for the trial in the 2010-action. The stay was then reinstated, including enforcement of the costs award just made, pending further order of the court. The costs award of $8,000 was never paid.

[50] On April 25, 2014, there was a pre-trial conference in the 2008-action. Justice Chiapetta ordered that the scheduled trial not proceed as Mr. McMaster and MMG Financial could not be located. The 2008-action was struck off the list, and a pre-trial conference was scheduled for October 29, 2014.

[51] The October 29, 2014 pre-trial was abortive as Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports failed to attend.

[52] On November 13, 2014, Mr. McMaster and MMG Financial were noted in default.

[53] On October 8, 2015, Mr. Cameron was discharged from bankruptcy. Pursuant to s.168.1(1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, Mr. Cameron was discharged and released from all debts, except those matters referred to in s.178(1) of the Act. Section 178 (1) of the Act states:

> Debts not released by order of discharge
>
> 178 (1) An order of discharge does not release the bankrupt from
>
>
> (d) any debt or liability arising out of fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity or, in the Province of Quebec, as a trustee or administrator of the property of others;
>
> (e) any debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation, other than a debt or liability that arises from an equity claim;
>
> [...]
> (h) any debt for interest owed in relation to an amount referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (g.1).

[54] The result of Mr. Cameron's discharge from bankruptcy was that the stay of the action was terminated and Midwest Amusement and the Institute were at liberty to sue him for fraud, which was a debt not discharged by his discharge from bankruptcy.

[55] Meanwhile, on November 27, 2015, Justice Diamond awarded Midwest Amusement a default judgment against Mr. McMaster and MMG Financial for the equivalent in Canadian dollars of $386,281.93 (USD) plus pre and post-judgment interest at 2% per annum.

[56] Mr. McMaster and MMG Financial have not paid the judgment, and the U.S. courts have declined to recognize the Ontario court's default judgment to offset the U.S. judgment.

[57] On September 7, 2016, as a result of correspondence with the trustee-in-bankruptcy, Midwest Amusement and the Institute learned for the first time that Mr. Cameron had been discharged from bankruptcy.

[58] On April 26, 2017, Master Abrams made a procedural order and ordered, among other things, that summary judgments or trials in the 2008-action and the 2010-action be heard together.

[59] In early 2018, Midwest Amusement in the 2008-action and Midwest Amusement and the Institute in the 2010-action brought motions for summary judgment.

[60] On February 27, 2018, Justice Firestone issued a scheduling order requiring Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports to deliver its responding material by April 27, 2018. No material was delivered.

[61] On April 26, 2018, Cameron Motorsports filed an assignment in Bankruptcy and it delivered a notice of stay of proceedings pursuant to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

[62] Notwithstanding the notice, Midwest Amusement and the Institute continued with their motions for summary judgment and on this motion, they ask for the additional relief of an order lifting the stay against Cameron Motorsports in the 2008-action.

[63] On its motion for summary judgment in the 2008-action, Midwest Amusement seeks the equivalent in Canadian dollars of $386,281.93 (USD) to offset the judgment of the Wisconsin District Court.

[64] On its motion for a summary judgment in the 2010-action, Midwest Amusement and the Institute submit that as a result of the frauds perpetrated by Mr. Cameron: (a) they lost the expected profits of approximately $33 million (USD) between 2009 and 2013 from the Business and Loan Agreement; (b) in the alternative, they lost the expected profits of approximately $7 million (USD) from the loan portion of the agreement; (c) they lost the $175,000 (USD), which was taken by false pretences; (d) they lost approximately $21.5 million in investments in seven properties that were lost through foreclosures; and (e) in the alternative, they lost approximately $2.3 million in equity on the properties lost due to the foreclosures. In consequence of the various losses, they claim $5 million, which they submit very conservatively approximates the position they would have been in had the fraudulent agreements been performed.

[65] On its motion for a summary judgment in the 2010-action, Midwest Amusement and the Institute claim punitive damages of $500,000.

D. Discussion

1. Introduction

[66] There are five issues to determine on these two summary judgment motions; namely: (1) Should the stay of proceedings against Cameron Motorsports be lifted? (2) Are the cases appropriate for a summary judgment? (3) Should Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports be found liable for deceit, fraudulent misrepresentation, and for obtaining property by false pretences? (4) What is the quantum of damages? and (5) Are Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports liable for punitive damages?

2. Lifting the Stay of Proceedings

[67] Section 69 (1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act provides for a stay of proceedings against a person, which includes a corporation, that makes an assignment into bankruptcy. Section 69 (1) states:

> Stay of proceedings — notice of intention
>
> 69 (1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3) and sections 69.4, 69.5 and 69.6, on the filing of a notice of intention under section 50.4 by an insolvent person,
>
> (a) no creditor has any remedy against the insolvent person or the insolvent person's property, or > shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings, for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy,

2018 ONSC 4549 (CanLII)

[68] Section 69.4 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act empowers the court to lift the stay in certain circumstances.

> Court may declare that stays, etc., cease
>
> 69.4 A creditor who is affected by the operation of sections 69 to 69.31 or any other person affected by the operation of section 69.31 may apply to the court for a declaration that those sections no longer operate in respect of that creditor or person, and the court may make such a declaration, subject to any qualifications that the court considers proper, if it is satisfied
>
> > (a) that the creditor or person is likely to be materially prejudiced by the continued operation of those sections; or
> > (b) that it is equitable on other grounds to make such a declaration.

[69] Courts have a wide discretion based on the particular facts of the particular case to lift a stay of proceedings brought about by a bankruptcy.[2] In Advocate Mines Ltd. (Re),[3] Registrar Ferron held that the court may remove the stay of proceedings in a variety of circumstances including: (1) where the action is against a bankrupt for a debt to which a discharge would not be a defence; (2) where the action is in respect of a contingent or unliquidated debt, the proof of which and the valuation of which has a degree of complexity that makes the summary procedure prescribed under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act inappropriate; (3) where there are other parties and the action is one in which the bankrupt is a necessary party for the complete adjudication of the matters at issue; (4) where the action is brought to establish judgment against the bankrupt to enable the plaintiff to recover under a contract of insurance or indemnity or under compensatory legislation; and (5) where the action at the date of bankruptcy has progressed to a point where logic dictates that the action be permitted to continue to judgment.

[70] Registrar Ferron's decision has been used and approved of in a variety of cases.[4] Applying it to the circumstances of the immediate case, the stay should be lifted because the case against Cameron Motorsports falls within criteria (1), (2), (3), and (5). In the immediate case, it may also be noted that the trustee-in-bankruptcy did not appear to oppose the lifting of the stay.

[71] In Lincoln Trust and Savings Co. v. Wagman,[5] the court lifted the stay in action in which the plaintiff sued the bankrupt for fraud.

[72] In Royal Bank of Canada v. Société Générale (Canada),[6] Justice Ground held that that the stay will be lifted in circumstances where the claims against the Bankrupt are for debts which would not be released by an order of discharge; for example, where the claim is about a [73] I conclude that the stay of proceedings against Cameron Motorsports should be lifted.

3. Are the Cases Appropriate for a Summary Judgment?

[74] Rule 20.04(2)(a) of the Rules of Civil Procedure provides that the court shall grant summary judgment if: "the court is satisfied that there is no genuine issue requiring a trial with respect to a claim or defence." With amendments to Rule 20 introduced in 2010, the powers of the court to grant summary judgment have been enhanced. Rule 20.04 (2.1) states:

> 20.04 (2.1) In determining under clause (2)(a) whether there is a genuine issue requiring a trial, the court shall consider the evidence submitted by the parties and, if the determination is being made by a judge, the judge may exercise any of the following powers for the purpose, unless it is in the interest of justice for such powers to be exercised only at a trial:
> 1. Weighing the evidence.
>
> 2. Evaluating the credibility of a deponent.
> 3. Drawing any reasonable inference from the evidence.

[75] In Hryniak v. Mauldin[7] and Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. v. Hryniak,[8] the Supreme Court of Canada held that on a motion for summary judgment under Rule 20, the court should first determine if there is a genuine issue requiring trial based only on the evidence in the motion record, without using the fact-finding powers introduced when Rule 20 was amended in 2010. The analysis of whether there is a genuine issue requiring a trial should be done by reviewing the factual record and granting a summary judgment if there is sufficient evidence to fairly and justly adjudicate the dispute and a summary judgment would be a timely, affordable and proportionate procedure.

[76] If, however, there appears to be a genuine issue requiring a trial, then the court should determine if the need for a trial can be avoided by using the powers under rules 20.04 (2.1) and (2.2). As a matter of discretion, the motions judge may use those powers, provided that their use is not against the interest of justice. Their use will not be against the interest of justice if their use will lead to a fair and just result and will serve the goals of timeliness, affordability, and proportionality in light of the litigation as a whole. To grant summary judgment, on a review of the record, the motions judge must be of the view that sufficient evidence has been presented on all relevant points to allow him or her to draw the inferences necessary to make dispositive findings and to fairly and justly adjudicate the issues in the case.[9]

[77] Hryniak v. Mauldin does not alter the principle that the court will assume that the parties have placed before it, in some form, all of the evidence that will be available for trial. The court is entitled to assume that the parties have advanced their best case and that the record contains all the evidence that the parties will present at trial.[10] Thus, if the moving party meets the evidentiary burden of producing evidence on which the court could conclude that there is no genuine issue of material fact requiring a trial, the responding party must either refute or counter the moving party's evidence or risk a summary judgment.[11]

[78] In my opinion, the cases at bar are appropriate for summary judgments.

[79] With Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports delivering no responding material and not appearing to resist the summary judgment motions, the motions were more like a default judgment motion than a summary judgment motion, but in any event, the court was in a position to decide the matter summarily and there would be little to nothing to be achieved by prolonging this thirteen-year saga that began in the winter of 2005 by deferring the matter to a trial.

[80] Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports are the only remaining defendants, and having regard to Mr. Cameron's admissions - more like spiteful confessions - there are no genuine issues requiring a trial.

[81] If there were genuine issues requiring a trial (and there are none), there is a large and ample evidentiary record of documents and transcripts of examinations from which the court can decide the issues and there is no need for a trial.

[82] In the 2008-action and the 2010-action, the court has all it needs to fairly and justly decide the 2008-action and the 2010-action, and it is in the interests of justice that it do so.

4. Liability for Deceit, Fraudulent Misrepresentation, Obtaining Property by False Pretences

[83] Should Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports be found liable for deceit, fraudulent misrepresentation, and for obtaining property by false pretences?

[84] To defraud a person is to deprive a person dishonestly of something which is his or of something to which he is or would or might but for the perpetration of the fraud, be entitled.[12] The elements of a claim of fraudulent misrepresentation are: (1) a false statement by the defendant; (2) the defendant knowing that the statement is false or being indifferent to its truth or falsity; (3) the defendant having an intent to deceive the plaintiff; (4) the false statement being material and the plaintiff having been induced to act; and, (5) the plaintiff suffering damages.[13]

[85] All of the elements of a claim for deceit, fraudulent misrepresentation, and for obtaining property by false pretences are factually present in the 2008-action and in the 2010-action.

[86] Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports mounted no defence because they have none.

[87] Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports should be and are liable for deceit, fraudulent misrepresentation, and for obtaining property by false pretences.

2018 ONSC 4549 (CanLII)

5. Quantum of Damages

[88] Turning to the matter of the quantification of damages, in the 2008-action, Midwest Amusement seeks to be placed in the same position it would have been in had the Defendants' fraud not induced it to enter into the contract to purchase go-karts.

[90] In the 2010-action, Midwest Amusement and the Institute Midwest seek damages of $5 million, which they submit very conservatively approximates the position they would have been in had the fraudulent agreements been performed. They also seek the equivalent in Canadian dollars an additional $175,000 (USD) on account of the consulting fees obtained by Mr. Cameron deceitfully and by false pretences in the fall of 2008.

[91] In an action in deceit or fraudulent misrepresentation, plaintiffs are entitled to be put in the same position they would have been in if the representations had not been made, but not to be put in the position they would have been if the representations had been true.[14]

[92] The measure of damages for fraudulent misrepresentation or deceit is the tort measure, not the measure used for breach of contract. In Todd Family Holdings Inc. v. Gardiner, the Court of Appeal stated:

> 25. We agree with counsel for the appellants' submission that the measure of damages for deceit requires that the injured party be placed in the position it would have been in had the misrepresentation not been made. Damages for deceit are not calculated on the assumption that the injured party is entitled to enforce the agreement entered into as a result of the misrepresentation. […]

[93] Thus, I have no difficulty in the 2008-action in awarding Midwest Amusement the equivalent in Canadian dollars of $386,281.93 (USD).

[94] In the 2010-action, with the exception of the claim seeking the equivalent in Canadian dollars of $175,000 (USD) on account of the consulting fees obtained by Mr. Cameron deceitfully and by false pretences, all of Midwest Amusement's and the Institute's claims for damages are essentially based on the notion that they lost profits and investments that would not have been lost had Mr. Cameron performed the Loan and Business Agreement. These alleged pecuniary losses underlie Midwest Amusement's and the Institute's claim for $5 million.

[95] I have no difficult in the 2010-action in awarding Midwest Amusement and the Institute the equivalent in Canadian dollars of $175,000 (USD), which is a genuine loss for which compensation is required to place them in the position they would have been had they not been fraudulently deceived. The $5 million claim, however, is not recoverable, because damages for deceit are not calculated on the basis that the injured party is entitled to enforce the agreement entered into as a result of the misrepresentation. That is the contract measure of pecuniary losses not the tort measure for deceit or fraudulent misrepresentation.

[96] That said, Midwest Amusement and the Institute are not limited only to a claim of the equivalent in Canadian dollars of $175,000 (USD).

[97] Damages at large may be awarded in cases of intentional torts in circumstances where there has been injury to the plaintiff's reputation and associated economic loss.[15] In the immediate case, I award Midwest Amusement and the Institute $500,000 for damages at large.

[98] Damages at large are a matter of impression, and unlike pecuniary damages, damages at large are not capable of precise measurement.[16] The principles for calculating damages at large are: (1) damages at large include compensation for loss of reputation, injured feelings, or victimization from the defendant's bad conduct; (2) damages at large compensate for losses that can be foreseen but cannot be readily quantified; (3) damages at large are a matter of discretion and are more a matter of impression, not addition; and (4) damages at large provide an opportunity to condemn flagrant abuse of the legal process.[17]

[99] In the immediate case, Midwest Amusement and the Institute suffered an outrageous and egregious attack on their reputation, and I am satisfied that their business suffered financially and that their principals and representatives suffered from the abuse, threats, and slanders and hate mongering of Mr. Cameron.

[100] Not surprisingly, there is no comparable cases where a defendant combined the harm caused by his frauds with the bad conduct boastfully and unabashedly undertaken by Mr. Cameron. As a matter of impression, in my opinion, the appropriate award of damages at large is $500,000.

6. Punitive Damages

[101] Punitive damages are only awarded in extraordinary situations. In general, punitive damages are considered in situations where the defendant's misconduct is so malicious, oppressive, and high-handed that it would offend the court's sense of decency. Punitive damages do not bear any relation to what the plaintiff should receive by way of compensation. Their aim is not to compensate a party, but rather to punish someone. It is the means by which a court expresses its outrage at what it considers egregious conduct of a party.[18]

[102] In the leading case of Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co.,[19] the Supreme Court of Canada restored a punitive damages award of $1 million made by a jury in an action against an insurer who had breached its duty of good faith and fair dealing to its insured. At para. 94 of his judgment, Justice Binnie described how to instruct a jury about punitive damages; he stated:

> 94. [I]t would be helpful if the trial judge's charge to the jury included words to convey an understanding of the following points, even at the risk of some repetition for emphasis. (1) Punitive damages are very much the exception rather than the rule, (2) imposed only if there has been high-handed, malicious, arbitrary or highly reprehensible misconduct that departs to a marked degree from ordinary standards of decent behaviour. (3) Where they are awarded, punitive damages should be assessed in an amount reasonably proportionate to such factors as the harm caused, the degree of the misconduct, the relative vulnerability of the plaintiff and any advantage or profit gained by the defendant, (4) having regard to any other fines or penalties suffered by the defendant for the misconduct in question. (5) Punitive damages are generally given only where the misconduct would otherwise be unpunished or where other penalties are or are likely to be inadequate to achieve the objectives of retribution, deterrence and denunciation. (6) Their purpose is not to compensate the plaintiff, but (7) to give a defendant his or her just desert (retribution), to deter the defendant and others from similar misconduct in the future (deterrence), and to mark the community's collective condemnation (denunciation) of what has happened. (8) Punitive damages are awarded only where compensatory damages, which to some extent are punitive, are insufficient to accomplish these objectives, and (9) they are given in an amount that is no greater than necessary to rationally accomplish their purpose. (10) While normally the state would be the recipient of any fine or penalty for misconduct, the plaintiff will keep punitive damages as a "windfall" in addition to compensatory damages. (11) Judges and juries in our system have usually found that moderate awards of punitive damages, which inevitably carry a stigma in the broader community, are generally sufficient.

[103] It follows from Justice Binnie's remarks that an assessment of punitive damages requires an appreciation of: (a) the degree of misconduct; (b) the amount of harm caused; (c) the availability of other remedies; (d) the quantification of compensatory damages; and (e) the adequacy of compensatory damages to achieve the objectives or retribution, deterrence, and denunciation. These factors must be known to ensure that punitive damages are rational and to ensure that the amount of punitive damages is not greater than necessary to accomplish their purposes.

[104] Earlier in his judgment, at para. 74, Justice Binnie stated:

> [T]he governing rule for quantum is proportionality. The overall award, that is to say compensatory damages plus punitive damages plus any other punishment related to the same misconduct, should be rationally related to the objectives for which the punitive damages are awarded (retribution, deterrence and denunciation).

[105] Later in his judgment, at para. 100, he stated: "The rationality test applies both to the question of whether an award of punitive damages should be made at all, as well as to the question of quantum."

[106] The cases at bar is certainly an extraordinary case. For many of the same reasons and because of the factual circumstances that justified the above compensatory award of damages at large of $500,000, the case at bar is an appropriate case to award punitive damages.

[107] I assess the punitive damages at $500,000, the amount requested by Midwest Amusement and the Institute. If the far less egregious circumstances in Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co., justified a $1 million punitive damages award, the circumstances of the 2010-action justify a punitive damages award of $500,000.

E. Conclusion

[108] For the above reasons, I lift the stay of proceedings in the 2008-action brought about by the assignment into bankruptcy of Cameron Motorsports. In the 2008-action, I grant Midwest Amusement a judgment against Mr. Cameron and Cameron Motorsports for: (a) the equivalent in Canadian dollars of $386,281.93 (USD), plus post-judgment interest at 2%; and (b) costs of $40,000 on a substantial indemnity basis. Defendants	)	Heard: March 3 to 7, 10, 2003

BLENUS WRIGHT J.:

[1] In 1994, the plaintiff Mikealice Management Corp. invested $1,218,300 U.S. in a Youngstown, New York, condominium project. The project never proceeded and Mikealice lost its investment. Dr. Michael Lai is the sole shareholder of Mikealice.

[2] The plaintiffs claim that the lost investment was caused by the defendants' breach of contract and fiduciary duties, negligence and deceit. The plaintiffs claim damages in the amount of the lost investment and aggravated and punitive damages.

[3] At the commencement of trial, counsel for the plaintiffs advised the court that the defendants Frank W. Somer and Trendsetter Real Estate Services Inc. were bankrupt and the plaintiffs did not intend to proceed against them. The action against those defendants is dismissed without costs.

[4] On March 7, 2003, the fifth day of trial, the plaintiffs and the defendant De Thomas Financial Corp. entered into a settlement. On consent I ordered a dismissal of all claims against De Thomas Financial Corp. without costs. The cross-claim of De Thomas Financial Corp. against all other defendants were withdrawn without costs.

[5] The defendant Vincent Chanyi appeared in person on the first day of trial on his own behalf and on behalf of his company Botco Developments Inc. Previously, the Statement of Defence of these defendants was struck out. No new Statement of Defence was filed. Mr. Chanyi, having been advised that a judgment could issue against him if he did not defend decided not to be present to defend the allegations against him and his company. He was called as a witness for the plaintiffs. A default judgment will issue against Vince Chanyi and Botco Developments Inc.

[7] Dr. Lai indicated that he has a net worth of between five and six million dollars. He is experienced in investing in stocks and bonds, mutual funds, gold, limited partnerships and real estate. Prior to the Youngstown Project he had been involved numerous times in many kinds of investments.

[8] Ms. Lim worked at De Thomas Financial Corp. She is registered with the Ontario Securities Commission. Her registration is: "Mutual Funds Only".

[9] Ms. Lim's first contact was a cold call to Dr. Lai in September 1990. Apparently from time to time she would recommend certain investments to Dr. Lai but he declined.

[10] The first business they did together concerned Dr. Lai's investment portfolio with Nesbitt Thompson. Dr. Lai complained that his broker was churning his account causing him to pay too much in commissions. He wished to lessen the costs of commissions. Ms. Lim suggested transferring his portfolio to a discount broker to sell his shares and invest in mutual funds with De Thomas Financial Corp.

[11] In order to transfer the portfolio and sell the shares, Dr. Lai entered into a trading authorization with Marathon Brokerage dated July 4, 1993 to allow Ms. Lim to instruct Marathon to sell the shares on his behalf. I find that it was Dr. Lai who suggested that Ms. Lim put down the word "relative" with respect to "Relationship of agent to account holder" on the Trading Authorization form. Ms. Lim did not disclose to Marathon that she was registered with the Securities Commission to sell mutual funds. The evidence is that if she had disclosed her registration it is unlikely that Marathon would have accepted the trading authorization. Both Dr. Lai and Ms. Lim were dishonest in filling out the Trading Authorization form. I infer that they probably discussed how best to fill out the form so that Marathon would not question Dr. Lai's authorizing Ms. Lim to be his trading agent.

2003 CanLII 43753 (ON SC)

Investment Planning Limited was also transferred into mutual funds with De Thomas. Dr. Lai appears to have done well through his mutual fund investments and makes no claim against Ms. Lim with respect to mutual fund advice.

[13] Dr. Lai's general impression of Ms. Lim was:

> She told me she had good training at De Thomas and could get me good returns. She would look after my total investments. She is not pushy and has a lot of products she can help me with. I trusted her. She gave me very good personal service. She came to my office. She did not tell me that she could only deal in mutual funds. She inferred she was an all-around financial advisor.

[14] Some time in August 1993, Ms. Lim, Vince Chanyi, Dr. Lai and Dr. Lai's father-in-law S.W. Yip, went to Youngstown to see the property and find out more about the investment. As a result of that trip Ms. Lim retained lawyer Allan Mandel to review mortgage documents for Mr. Yip who was considering an investment in the Youngstown Project. Mr. Yip did invest $250,000 as a one-third interest in a $750,000 mortgage held in trust by Chanyi.

[15] Dr. Lai testified that he kept receiving information on the Youngstown Project but indicated to Ms. Lim that he had no cash to invest.

[16] At some point Dr. Lai and Ms. Lim had a discussion of a Lai Family Trust situated in the Cayman Islands in the amount of $1,750,000. The CIBC was the trustee of the Family Trust. Both Lim and Chanyi became involved in attempting to get the Family Trust monies transferred to Canada without tax consequences so that Dr. Lai could invest in the Youngstown Project.

[17] The CIBC (Cayman) wrote to Chanyi on February 10, 1994, as follows:

> PROPOSED INVESTMENT OF TRUST T855
>
> I am pleased to confirm the details of our telephone conversation this morning concerning the above investment. As advised we have carefully considered this proposal and are unable to undertake this investment as trustee for the following reasons.
>
> A trustee has a duty to protect and enhance the value of a trust fund for the benefit of the beneficiaries of the Trust. Trustees are guided by both statute and common law as to the nature and types of investments which may be prudently undertaken. A trustee has a duty to minimize risk by investing in a diversified portfolio of high quality investments. Typically no one investment in a trust fund should constitute more than 5% of the total value and for this reason an investment of such a large proportion of the Trust fund is unacceptable to a trustee.
>
> The percentage of the Trust fund which will be placed in this investment is the main reason for not agreeing to undertake this investment. A figure of 20% of the > value of the Trust fund would be more acceptable from a diversification perspective although we would then need to look at the individual investment concerned. On the basis of the proposal provided I see that the loan is unsecured and whilst it will carry a return of 19.95% the risk reward ratio of holding an unsecured loan of this magnitude would not be acceptable to a trustee.

[18] Dr. Lai had not been happy with the CIBC as trustee. He stated:

> It was difficult to contact CIBC and talk to someone knowledgeable about the Trust. It is too big a company. It likes to hold on to your funds at a lower interest rate. I knew that under the rule CIBC would not do the transfer for the Youngstown investment.

[19] On February 18, 1994, Dr. Lai signed a power of attorney to Ms. Lim which reads in part:

> To arrange for a replacement Trustee for the existing Trustee at the CIBC (Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce)
>
> To arrange to have the Trust Deed amended in order to allow Dr. Michael Lai more control with respect to the types of investments these trust funds are placed in, without affecting the tax-free consequences of the Trust.

[20] On March 23, 1994, Dr. Lai signed an even broader power of attorney to Ms. Lim which states in part:

> To arrange for the transfer of trustee of the Michael Wai-Kee Lai Family Trust from the CIBC Bank and Trust Company (Cayman) Limited to the RHB Trust Company Limited or to any other qualified and registered trust company in the Cayman Islands as she may deem to be necessary;
> To execute all documents required by the Trustee to arrange for future investments including the project known as 'Harbour Gates of Youngstown' by purchase or by loan either directly or indirectly as my agent may deem appropriate;

[21] On April 14, 1994, The RHB Trust Co. Ltd. assumed trusteeship of the Family Trust. Shortly thereafter the funds were transferred to the plaintiff Mikealice Management Corp.

[22] Serious discussions about the Youngstown project took place on April 14, 1994, at Dr. Lai's home with Lim and Chanyi. Initially, a joint venture agreement was considered but abandoned. Several drafts of an agreement were exchanged between Lim, Chanyi and Dr. Lai. Dr. Lai reviewed the drafts and made changes.

[23] Dr. Lai had a talk with Lim on April 19, 1994, and he made some notes. I will set out the notes by numbers as Dr. Lai did, followed by Dr. Lai's testimony expanding on his notes.

2003 CanLII 43753 (ON SC)

1. Why I don't feel comfortable with this investment.

   She was urging too fast, no mortgage was proposed and the Youngstown project is not possible. Lim said, 'You are too suspicious, you have to trust people – always second guessing is not good in business'

2. Something that you know that haven't told me.

   She said she told me everything.

3. Feel that you are on the other side of the bargaining table

   She said, 'No, I'm on your side'

   I feel a lot of pressure to go fast. Chanyi had a lot of proposals and asked me to sign. I was reluctant. Lim was upset, 'How you not make up your mind.'

4. Plans – approved? If so stamped?

   Lim said building permit already there.

5. Terms all agreed – see lawyer so fine tune the wording – get principle agree 1st.

   Lim said to agree in principle and refer to lawyer to finalize wording.

6. Once/month – up-date

   Lim said – "of course."

[24] From these notes, Dr. Lai had reservations about the Youngstown Project. It is unfortunate that he did not follow his instincts.

[25] Dr. Lai testified that he would never have invested without the promise of a first mortgage. He said that Lim and Chanyi confirmed that he would get a mortgage at the time he advanced the money. According to Dr. Lai the procedure was that he would give $1.2 million to a lawyer in the U.S. to be held in trust. After a first mortgage was registered the money would be transferred to Botco.

[26] However, on April 23, 1994, Dr. Lai signed a three-part agreement on behalf of Mikealice with Chanyi on behalf of Botco. There is an Agreement of Purchase and Sale; another agreement setting out three conditions to be performed by Botco failing which certain financial provisions result; and, a Mortgage Intent.

[27] It is difficult to interpret the true meaning of the three agreements. Dr. Lai was to advance $1,256,300 at the time of signing the Agreement of Purchase and Sale but there is no reference to when a first mortgage would be registered.

[28] I accept Ms. Lim's evidence that in order to save money Dr. Lai did not want to retain a lawyer to assist in drafting any agreement or to review any agreement before he signed it. Dr. Lai now agrees that he should have consulted with a lawyer before he signed the agreements.

[29] Even if the agreements had stipulated a time for registration of a mortgage in Dr. Lai's favour he had no idea when he signed the agreement who actually owned the property and were there other encumbrancers because he did not retain someone to search the title and to advise him on these matters.

[30] In fact there was a $1,000,000 mortgage given by Botco which was subordinate to the $750,000 mortgage to which Dr. Lai's father-in-law had contributed $250,000.

[31] Dr. Lai met with Ms. Lim on April 25, 1994. His note of that meeting reads:

> Told her can't forward any money because need 1st mortgage legally sign 1st. Told had to pay off existing mortgage 1st.

[32] On April 27, 1994, Dr. Lai had another meeting with Ms. Lim. His notes of that meeting read:

> Asking for money to wire to Vince (to Botco) $968,300 – because other 1st mortgagee has retained a lawyer to sue Vince – Foreclose the property pay them 1st, Mr. Yip can be paid later. All condition will be agreed by Vince, documents can be signed later. Cheryl said Vince is honest, 'trust me.'

[33] There is no indication that Dr. Lai inquired as to who it was that intended to sue Vince or why Vince would be sued. There is no evidence that Dr. Lai even discussed the apparent problem with his father-in-law who had invested $250,000 and who, according to Cheryl, would not be paid out of Dr. Lai's money but would be paid later.

[34] The next day, April 28, 1994, Ms. Lim faxed Dr. Lai this message:

> Michael, it is urgent that to see you this morning. Is it possible to see you at ten o'clock?

Dr. Lai testified that Ms. Lim told him that the project would be in jeopardy if he did not wire the money and the first mortgagee would sue Chanyi.

[35] Dr. Lai instructed his bank to wire $968,300 to Botco although he did not know why that amount of money was needed or to whom it was eventually to be paid.

[36] Why did Dr. Lai not stick with his understanding of the agreement and insist that he send the money to a lawyer to be held in trust until he obtained a valid first mortgage? What was the urgency? Apparently, Dr. Lai did not ask himself these questions.

2003 CanLII 43753 (ON SC)

[37] Dr. Lai was asked if he had any concern about sending the money without getting a mortgage. He responded, “I was concerned but Lim said Vince was honest – trust me – you have to trust people in doing business.”

[38] From his testimony I recorded these questions and answers:

> Q. Why send funds to Botco instead of directly to the mortgagee or to a lawyer in trust?
>
> A. We were to go to a lawyer on May 11. Lim said trust me – it was against my common sense.
>
> Q. Why not wait until May 11 to advance funds?
>
> A. Lim had been successful in getting the funds transferred from Cayman. This convinced me to follow her advice and she persisted over two days.

[39] Unfortunately, most of Dr. Lai’s decisions with respect to his investment in the Youngstown Project were against common sense.

[40] Shortly before May 11, Lim advised Dr. Lai that the meeting would be cancelled because there was a problem getting a lawyer. Apparently, Dr. Lai did not question why it was a problem to retain a lawyer.

[41] On May 11, Dr. Lai had a meeting with Vince Chanyi. Dr. Lai asked, “when register my mortgage and pay off father-in-law?” Chanyi’s response: “Next week.”

[42] Subsequent to the meeting Dr. Lai testified that Chanyi was active in calling him to give him updates on the progress of the project.

[43] On June 8, 1994, Chanyi sent Dr. Lai a letter with an outline of additional funds to be sent to Botco in the amount of $589,154.95 U.S. Dr. Lai’s response: “I not send you a cent.”

[44] However, Dr. Lai said that Chanyi called him many times using the “F” word and stating that if the money was not sent the project would be blown out. Chanyi said, “I would never get my first mortgage, the construction company would walk out and costs would increase.”

[45] On June 10, 1994, Dr. Lai sent Botco what he called, “a minimum amount of $250,000”. In his cross-examination he said:

> Over a period of four or five days Vince kept calling me and using the ‘F’ word and pounding me that the whole project would blow up. I had no choice. Out of desperation I sent funds.

[46] Apparently, Dr. Lai did not take time to reflect on the attitude displayed by Vince in harassing him to send more money. Dr. Lai did not ask himself, “Is this the kind of person I want to do business with?" He also did not reflect back to his May 11 meeting in which Vince had promised that Dr. Lai's mortgage would be registered and Dr. Lai's father-in-law paid off, "next week". Dr. Lai's mortgage was not registered and Dr. Lai's father-in-law had not received a cent back from his $250,000 even though, according to Dr. Lai, part of his first advance of $968,300 was to pay off the $750,000 first mortgage which Chanyi held in trust. Yet, Dr. Lai advanced an additional $250,000 to Botco on June 10, 1994. Dr. Lai sought no independent advice before he advanced the additional funds.

[47] I accept Ms. Lim's evidence that she was in China on June 10, 1994, when Dr. Lai advanced the $250,000 and, prior to her departure, she advised Dr. Lai not to advance any further funds until he obtained his first mortgage.

[48] There is no question that the main culprit who caused Dr. Lai to lose $1,218,300 U.S. is Vince Chanyi. Even if Chanyi had defended this action I would have found him liable for Dr. Lai's loss. Chanyi was simply dishonest in his dealings with Dr. Lai and Ms. Lim with respect to the Youngstown Project.

[49] In a U.S. proceeding brought by the plaintiff Mikealice Management Corporation against Botco and Vince Chanyi and others, Justice John P. Lane of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, stated the following in his judgment of November 10, 2000:

> Vincent Chanyi has not faithfully and honestly performed his duties as trustee under the trust declaration and as holder of the trust mortgage.

[50] But, what about the liability of Ms. Lim? In her defence she submits that her only role was to introduce Dr. Lai to Vince Chanyi and that it was Vince Chanyi who supplied all of the information to Dr. Lai about the Youngstown Project and it was Vince who convinced Dr. Lai to invest in the project. It is Ms. Lim's position that she did not give Dr. Lai any advice but was acting only as an intermediary between Dr. Lai and Chanyi.

[51] However, I find that Ms. Lim was intimately involved in providing information to Dr. Lai about the project and urging him to invest in it. Ms. Lim sent Dr. Lai a fax on August 24, 1993, which was a brief summary of the Youngstown Project indicating that if he invested he could take out certain amounts of profit tax-free. In conclusion she said, "I will call you tomorrow to answer any questions you may have".

[52] It was also Ms. Lim who, on April 27 and 28, 1994, on an urgent basis, convinced Dr. Lai to send $968,300 U.S. to Botco because, "Vince is honest, trust me".

[53] Ms. Lim was registered with the Securities Commission to sell mutual funds only. She could not trade in stocks and bonds or deal in other products governed by the Commission.

2003 CanLII 43753 (ON SC)

[54] However, there was no prohibition prohibiting Ms. Lim from presenting herself as a financial advisor. Apparently, there are no regulations governing financial advisors. Anyone can be a financial advisor.

[55] But, Ms. Lim must have been aware that Dr. Lai was relying on her for sound financial advice. He had given her a trading authorization to instruct Marathon to sell his stock portfolio so that she could invest his money in mutual funds. He provided her with a power of attorney in order to have the Family Trust monies transferred from the Cayman Islands to Toronto to invest in the Youngstown Project.

[56] Even after the "horse had bolted from the barn", Dr. Lai continued to rely on Ms. Lim, and on August 24, 1994, gave her power of attorney re the Youngstown Project:

> … to explore all avenues to protect my portion of investments and interests. Miss Cheryl Lim can have the right to retain a lawyer if she feels fit. It is understood that Cheryl will keep me informed all the time and as soon as possible.

[57] When Ms. Lim placed herself in the position of financial advisor to Dr. Lai she had a duty of care toward Dr. Lai with an obligation to know the product she was advising on, to be sure that Dr. Lai knew the risks of investing in the product and was comfortable in investing in the product and, to ensure, where possible, that there was security for the investment.

[58] The problem with Ms. Lim advising Dr. Lai on the Youngstown Project; it was not her product that she was advising on. It was Vince Chanyi's product.

[59] It is difficult to know, with respect to the Youngstown Project, whether Ms. Lim was naïve and simply trusted Vince Chanyi or did she in fact know that Vince Chanyi was being dishonest?

[60] Ms. Lim had known Vince Chanyi because they had worked together at De Thomas Financial Corp.

[61] What did Ms. Lim know about who was behind the Youngstown Project? She was aware that Alberto Decouto had some involvement with Vince Chanyi in the Youngstown Project. She had previous involvement with Decouto's company, Mater's Management Ltd. Ms. Lim had sold mortgages to investors for Mater's projects. She knew that a number of investors had lost their investments. I suggest her prior knowledge should have twigged her into exploring the background of the Youngstown Project.

[62] There is no evidence that Ms. Lim ever questioned Vince Chanyi about the details of the Youngstown Project. An inference could be made that the reason she did not question Vince Chanyi is that she knew what was going on and was part and parcel of the scheme to get Dr. Lai to invest. Or, did she blindly accept Chanyi's information as true?

[63] Counsel for the plaintiffs submits that Ms. Lim was deceitful in her relationship with Dr. Lai and in the advice provided to him. On the evidence I am not prepared to find that Ms. Lim was deceitful.

[64] However, she did have a conflict of interest. Apparently, if Dr. Lai invested in the Youngstown Project, Ms. Lim was to receive one condominium unit. She did not advise Dr. Lai that she would receive a benefit from his investment.

[65] Dr. Lai put his trust and confidence in Ms. Lim and relied on her advice. I find that Ms. Lim breached her fiduciary duties to Dr. Lai.

[66] I find that Ms. Lim, in advising Dr. Lai, did not know sufficient information about the background of the Youngstown Project to give adequate advice to Dr. Lai on whether he should invest, what the risks were, and whether he would have security for his investment.

[67] In particular, Ms. Lim urged Dr. Lai, on April 27 and 28, 1994, to send Botco $968,300 U.S. She made no enquiries on Dr. Lai's behalf as to why that amount or what that amount would be used for. She did not question the urgency issue. Even if someone intended to retain a lawyer to sue Chanyi, why was the money needed immediately? Ms. Lim also knew that Dr. Lai expected to have a registered first mortgage before he advanced any funds. She knew that a meeting with a U.S. lawyer was to take place on May 11 to ensure that Dr. Lai had protection for his investment. Notwithstanding her knowledge of Dr. Lai's wishes for security for his investment and her apparent lack of knowledge of what the funds were for and the reason for the urgency, she persuaded Dr. Lai to advance the funds. Ms. Lim breached her duty of care to her client in every respect.

[68] I find that Ms. Lim was negligent in the advice she gave to Dr. Lai. Her negligence caused Dr. Lai to lose $968,300 U.S.

[69] But did Dr. Lai's negligence contribute to his loss. When asked what he expected Ms. Lim to do for him Dr. Lai said:

> I don't have any mandate for her. She knows my financial status. My bottom line is to make me investment which makes money.

[70] I asked Dr. Lai why he was so attracted to the Youngstown Project. He responded, "Because it was very profitable". Indeed it would have been profitable if it had been successful. Dr. Lai's total investment was to be $2,040,000 for 24 condo units at a cost of $85,000 each. They were to be sold at a minimum of $115,000 for a profit of $30,000 on each unit for a total of $720,000 profit. He would also receive some interest on his $2,040,000 at 21.93%. It appears also that he would share in Botco's net taxable income to the tune of at least $250,000. All of this profit was within a time frame of one and a half years. It is apparent that Dr. Lai did not ask himself the question, "Is this too good to be true?"

[71] Dr. Lai testified that this large investment was out of the ordinary for him; he went to the site several times but saw no evidence of construction; and, although he received pamphlets describing the Youngstown Project, he did not see or ask to see any construction drawings.

[72] I believe Dr. Lai was “penny wise and pound foolish”. The average person when purchasing a car will only purchase a car that has been certified. The average person when buying a house will require a satisfactory inspection report before agreeing to purchase.

[73] The average person does not have $2 million to invest. However, I suggest that the average person would have suggested to Dr. Lai that he required more than advice from a financial advisor before forking out that kind of money for the Youngstown Project.

[74] Dr. Lai is an educated person. He ought to have performed some level of due diligence and not relied totally on Ms. Lim who could not provide him with all of the advice required before investing in a real estate development.

[75] A few thousand dollars would have been well spent to retain a lawyer to search the title of the Youngstown Project, to provide an opinion on its feasibility, to draft the appropriate agreements, and to ensure the proper security documents were prepared and registered.

[76] Alas, Dr. Lai’s philosophy of maximize profit at minimal costs has now provided him with a costly lesson in how disastrous such a philosophy can be. Sometimes it is wise to accept just half a loaf.

[77] I believe that Dr. Lai was so mesmerized by the huge profit to be gained from this investment that he threw caution to the wind and common sense out the window, along with $1,218,300 U.S..

[78] What percentage of contributory negligence should be assessed against Dr. Lai. Chanyi was deceitful. Dr. Lai cannot be contributorily negligent where deceit is involved.

[79] The best statement of the law is contained at p.238 of the Ontario Law Reform Commission’s 1988 report entitled, “Report on Contribution Among Wrongdoers and Contributory Negligence”. That report states:

> It has long been established that the gullibility of the plaintiff in believing the defendant’s misrepresentation, or lack of care in failing to make an independent investigation, is no defence to an action based on fraud. It does not lie in the mouth of one who makes a statement on which another relies to say that the other was careless in believing her. …

> When once it is established that there has been any fraudulent misrepresentation or wilful concealment by which a person has been induced to enter into a contract, it is no answer to his claim to be relieved from it to tell him that he might have known the truth by proper inquiry. He has a right to retort upon his objector, 'You, at least, who have stated what is untrue, or have concealed the truth, for the purpose of drawing me into a contract, cannot accuse me of want of caution because I relied implicitly upon your fairness and honesty'.

[81] In the result, Vince Chanyi and Botco Developments Inc. are 100% responsible for Dr. Lai's losses. There will be judgment for the plaintiffs against Vince Chanyi and Botco Developments Inc. for $1,336,254, plus applicable prejudgment interest from April 28, 1994, and for $345,000, plus applicable prejudgment interest from June 10, 1994, plus costs.

[82] With respect to Ms. Lim, I did not find her deceitful. However, I find that Dr. Lai must accept the greater responsibility for his losses. I assess Dr. Lai's contributory negligence at 60%. Therefore, there will be judgment for the plaintiffs against Ms. Lim for 40% of $1,336,254, plus applicable prejudgment interest from April 28, 1994, plus costs.

[83] Ms. Lim shall have default judgment on her cross-claim against Vince Chanyi and Botco Developments Inc. for the full amount of the plaintiffs' judgment against Ms. Lim, plus costs.

[84] At the commencement of trial it was agreed that any judgment would not be enforceable until after it was determined what proceeds the plaintiffs would receive as a result of the U.S. judgment.

[85] If the parties are unable to agree on costs they may provide me with written submissions.

INTRODUCTION

[1] On August 31, 2000, applications were brought by Dundee Securities Corporation, Peters & Co. Limited, Nesbitt Burns Inc., Newcrest Capital Inc., RBC Dominion Securities, Bunting Warburg Dillon Read Inc., First Energy Capital Corporation (being the underwriters in the flow-through common share offering of Merit Energy Ltd., described below), certain directors and officers of Merit Energy Ltd. and Larry Delf, a representative purchaser of flow-through common shares in Merit, to determine whether these applicants were entitled to a priority in the nature of an equitable lien over the proceeds of the sale of Merit's assets.

[2] I dismissed the equitable lien applications. The Underwriters, except First Energy Capital Corporation, appealed that decision.

[3] Needless to say, the applicants wanted to be recognized as ordinary creditors of Merit in the event they did not have an equitable lien.

[4] Pending the hearing of the equitable lien appeal, the administration of the estate of Merit continued. As a result of my dismissal of the equitable lien claim, the Trustee anticipated that a fund of approximately $10 million would be available for distribution to unsecured creditors.

[5] Accordingly, the Trustee sought a determination as to the right of the Flow-Through Shareholders, the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers to be recognized as ordinary creditors of Merit and to be included in the distribution.

[6] I heard argument on that issue on April 30, 2001 but reserved my decision until the results of the appeal were known. On May 18, 2001, the appeal was heard and dismissed[1], so it is now appropriate to make the requested determination.

[7] The Trustee takes the position that the claims in issue are in substance claims by shareholders for the return of equity and, on the basis of the decision in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp.[2], must rank behind the claims of Merit's unsecured creditors.

[8] Alternatively, the Trustee argues that their claims are too contingent to constitute provable claims under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. [3]

[9] The Flow-Through Shareholders, the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers[4] submitted that their claims were in substance creditor claims and that they were not too contingent, thus qualifying them to rank as unsecured creditors in Merit's insolvency. If that position is sustained, the quantification of those claims will be a separate issue.

2001 ABQB 583 (CanLII)

BACKGROUND

[10] Merit was in the business of the exploration, development and production of natural gas and crude oil in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

[11] On July 15, 1999, the Underwriters entered into an underwriting agreement with Merit whereby they agreed to participate in a public offering of 2,222,222 Flow-Through Shares of Merit. Paragraph 16 of the Underwriting Agreement states in part:

> The Corporation shall indemnify and save each of the Indemnified Persons harmless against and from all liabilities, claims, demands, losses, (other than losses of profit in connection with the distribution of common shares), costs, damages and expenses to which any of the Indemnified Persons may be subject or which any of the Indemnified Persons may suffer or incur, whether under the provisions of any statute or otherwise, in any way caused by, or arising directly or indirectly from or in consequence of:
>
> (a) any information or statement contained in the Public Record (other than any information or statement relating solely to one or more of the Underwriters and furnished to the Corporation by the Underwriters for inclusion in the Public Record) which is or is alleged to be untrue or any omission or alleged omission to provide any information or state any fact the omission of which makes or is alleged to make any such information or statement untrue or misleading in light of all the circumstances in which it was made;
> (b) any misrepresentation or alleged misrepresentation (except a misrepresentation or alleged misrepresentation which is based upon information relating solely to one or more of the Underwriters and furnished to the Corporation by the Underwriters for inclusion in the Public Record) in the Public Record.

[12] The Underwriting Agreement provides in Paragraph 2 (entitled "Corporation's Covenants as to Qualification") that:

>
> (a) prior to the filing of the Preliminary Prospectus and thereafter and prior to the filing of the Prospectus, to allow the Underwriters to participate fully in the preparation of the Preliminary Prospectus (excluding the documents incorporated therein by reference) and such other documents as may be required under the Applicable Securities Laws in the Filing Jurisdictions to qualify the distribution of the Common Shares in the Filing Jurisdictions and allow the Underwriters to conduct all due diligence which the Underwriters may reasonably require (including with respect to the documents incorporated therein by reference) in order to (i) confirm the Public Record is accurate and current in all material respects; (ii) fulfill the Underwriters' obligations as agents and underwriters; and

2001 ABQB 583 (CanLII)

(iii) enable the Underwriters to responsibly execute the certificate in the Preliminary Prospectus or the Prospectus required to be executed by the Underwriters;

(b) the Corporation shall, not later than on July 19, 1999, have prepared and filed the Preliminary Prospectus...with the Securities Commissions...

(c) the Corporation shall prepare and file the Prospectus...as soon as possible and in any event not later than 4:30 p.m. (Calgary time) on August 3, 1999...

(e) that, during the period commencing with the date hereof and ending on the conclusion of the distribution of the Common Shares, the Preliminary Prospectus and the Prospectus will fully comply with the requirements of Applicable Securities Laws of the Filing Jurisdictions and, together with all information incorporated therein by reference, will provide full, true and plain disclosure of all material facts relating to the Corporation and the Common Shares and will not contain any misrepresentation; provided that the Corporation does not covenant with respect to information or statements contained in such documents relating solely to one or more of the Underwriters and furnished to the Corporation by one or more of the Underwriters for inclusion in such documents or omissions from such documents relating solely to one or more of the Underwriters and the foregoing covenant shall not be considered to be contravened as a consequence of any material change occurring after the date hereof or the occurrence of any event or state of facts after the date hereof if, in each such case, the Corporation complies with subparagraphs 3(a), (b), (c) and (d).

[13] In accordance with its covenant, Merit filed a Preliminary Prospectus and a Prospectus to qualify the shares for issue and ultimately the offering closed on August 17, 1999, at which time 2, 222, 222 Flow-Through Shares of Merit were issued.

[14] The Prospectus indicated that:

The gross proceeds of this Offering will be used to incur CEE in connection with the Corporation's ongoing oil and natural gas exploration activities. The Underwriters' fee and the expenses of this Offering will be paid from Merit's general funds...

The Flow-through Common Shares will be issued as 'Flow-through Shares' under the Act. The Corporation will incur on or before December 31, 2000, and renounce to each purchaser of Flow-through Common Shares, effective on or before December 31, 1999, CEE in an amount equal to the aggregate purchase price equal to the aggregate purchase price paid by such purchaser.

> Subscriptions for Flow-through Common Shares will be made pursuant to one or more subscription agreements ('Subscription Agreements') to made between the Corporation and one or more of the Underwriters or one or more sub-agents of the Underwriters , as agent for, on behalf of and in the name of the purchasers of Flow-through Common Shares...

[15] The Prospectus also indicated that:

> ... Pursuant to the Subscription Agreements, the Corporation will covenant and agree (i) to incur on or before December 31, 2000 and renounce to the purchaser, effective on or before December 31, 1999, CEE in an amount equal to the aggregate purchase price paid by such purchaser for the Flow-Through Common Shares and (ii) that if the Corporation does not renounce to such purchaser, effective on or before December 31, 1999, CEE equal to such amount, or if there is a reduction in such amount renounced pursuant to the provision of the Act and as the sole recourse of the purchaser for such failure or reduction, the Corporation shall indemnify the purchaser as to, and pay in settlement thereof to the purchaser, an amount equal to the amount of any tax payable or that may become payable under the Act...by the purchaser as a consequence of such failure or reduction...
>
> In respect of CEE renounced effective on December 31, 1999, and not incurred prior to the end of the period commencing on the date that the Subscription Agreement is entered into and ending on February 29, 2000, the Corporation will be required to pay an amount equivalent to interest to the Government of Canada. Any amount of CEE renounced on December 31, 1999 and not incurred by December 31, 2000 will result in a reassessment of deductible CEE to subscribers. However, interest in respect of additional tax payable under the Act by a purchaser of Flow-Through Common Shares will generally not be levied in respect of such reassessment until after April 30, 2001.

[16] The Underwriters each entered into Subscription and Renunciation Agreements with Merit for the purchase of the Flow-Through Shares, containing the covenants described in paragraph 15 above.

[17] Merit did not incur CEE as anticipated and in fact only approximately $4 million (of the anticipated $15 million of CEE) was renounced to the Flow-Through Shareholders prior to Merit being placed in receivership, leaving an $11 million shortfall. As a result, those Flow-Through Shareholders, who anticipated tax deductions based on $15 million of CEE, were potentially faced with a tax problem.

[18] The Directors and Officers entered into indemnity agreements with Merit, which state in part that:

> To the full extent allowed by law, [Merit]...agrees to indemnify and save harmless the Indemnified Party, his heirs, successors and legal representatives from and against any > and all damages, liabilities, costs, charges or expenses suffered or incurred by the Indemnified Party, his heirs, successors or legal representatives as a result of or by reason of the Indemnified Party being or having been a director and/or officer of [Merit] or by reason of any action taken by the Indemnified Party in his capacity as a director and/or officer of [Merit], including without limitation, any liability for unpaid employee wages, provided that such damages, liabilities, costs, charges or expenses were not suffered or incurred as a direct result of the Indemnified Party's own fraud, dishonesty or wilful default.

[19] Merit, the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers have been named as defendants in several actions commenced throughout Canada by or on behalf of the Flow-Through Shareholders. These actions allege that Merit, the Underwriters, the Directors and Officers and PriceWaterhouseCoopers are liable to the Plaintiffs because of misrepresentations made in the Prospectus. The Plaintiffs seek, inter alia, damages against all defendants, recission of their purchase of the Flow-Through Shares and damages for lost tax benefits associated with the Flow-Through Shares. The Underwriters have third-partied Merit and the Directors and Officers. As noted, the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers previously sought recognition as equitable lien holders (which was denied) and now they seek recognition as ordinary creditors.

[20] PriceWaterhouseCoopers was at all material times the auditor of Merit. As PriceWaterhouseCoopers had not yet filed a proof of claim at the time the Trustee filed its motion, the Trustee's materials did not address its claim as part of its application. However, the Trustee did not object to PriceWaterhouseCoopers participating in this application.

[21] PriceWaterhouseCoopers is in a similar position as the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers as it too has an indemnity from Merit and has also been sued by the Flow-Through Shareholders for misrepresentation. Its indemnity states that:

> Merit Energy Ltd. hereby indemnifies PriceWaterhouseCoopers LLP ("PriceWaterhouseCoopers")...and holds them harmless from all claims, liabilities, losses, and costs arising in circumstances where there has been a knowing misrepresentation by a member of Merit Energy Ltd.'s management, regardless of whether such a person was acting in Merit Energy Ltd.'s interest. This indemnification will survive termination of this engagement letter. This release and indemnification will not operate where PriceWaterhouseCoopers ought to have uncovered such knowing misrepresentation but failed to, due the gross negligence or willful misconduct of PriceWaterhouseCoopers, its partners and/or employees.

ISSUES

1. Are the claims of the Flow-Through Shareholders subordinate to the claims of Merit's unsecured creditors?

2001 ABQB 583 (CanLII)

2. Are the claims of the Underwriters, the Directors and Officers and PriceWaterhouseCoopers subordinate to the claims of Merit's unsecured creditors?

DECISION - ISSUE 1

The claims of the Flow-Through Shareholders are subordinate to the claims of Merit's unsecured creditors as they are in substance shareholder claims for the return of an equity investment.

[22] Central to this application are the reasons of my sister Romaine J. in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp.

[23] In that case, Big Bear Exploration Ltd. completed a hostile takeover for all of the shares of Blue Range Resource Corporation. After the takeover was completed, Big Bear alleged that the publicly disclosed information upon which it had relied in purchasing the Blue Range shares was misleading and that the shares were worthless. As sole shareholder, Big Bear authorized Blue Range to commence CCAA proceedings and then submitted a claim as an unsecured creditor in Blue Range's CCCA proceedings, based on the damages it alleged it had suffered as a result of Blue Range's misrepresentations.

[24] Romaine J. rejected Big Bear's attempt to prove as an unsecured creditor and held that Big Bear's claim was "in substance" a shareholder claim for a return of an equity investment and therefore ranked after the claims of unsecured creditors according to the general principles of corporate law, insolvency law and equity.

[25] Romaine J. stated at pp. 176-177:

> In this case, the true nature of Big Bear's claim is more difficult to characterize. There may well be scenarios where the fact that a party with a claim in tort or debt is a shareholder is coincidental or incidental, such as where a shareholder is also a regular trade creditor of a corporation, or slips and falls outside the corporate office and thus has a claim in negligence against the corporation. In the current situation, however, the very core of the claim is the acquisition of Blue Range shares by Big Bear and whether the consideration paid for such shares was based on misrepresentation. Big Bear had no cause of action until it acquired shares of Blue Range, which it did through share purchases for cash prior to becoming a majority shareholder, as it suffered no damage until it acquired such shares. This tort claim derives from Big Bear's status as shareholder, and not from a tort unrelated to that status. The claim for misrepresentation therefore is hybrid in nature and combines elements of both a claim in tort and a claim as shareholder. It must be determined what character it has in substance.

2001 ABQB 583 (CanLII)

> It is true that Big Bear does not claim recission. Therefore, this is not a claim for return of capital in the direct sense. What is being claimed, however, is an award of damages measured as the difference between the "true" value of Blue Range shares and their "misrepresented" value - in other words, money back from what Big Bear "paid" by way of consideration...A tort award to Big Bear could only represent a return of what Big Bear invested in equity of Blue Range. It is that kind of return that is limited by the basic common law principle that shareholders rank after creditors in respect of any return on their equity investment. ...
> I find that the alleged share exchange loss derives from and is inextricably intertwined with Big Bear's shareholder interest in Blue Range. The nature of the claim is in substance a claim by a shareholder for a return of what it invested qua shareholder, rather than an ordinary tort claim.

[26] Romaine J. went on at pp. 177-184 to describe five policy reasons which justified the conclusion that shareholders' claims such as Big Bear's should be ranked behind the claims of Blue Range's unsecured creditors. In summary, they are:

> (i) the claims of shareholders rank behind the claims of creditors in insolvency;
>
> (ii) creditors do business on the assumption that they will rank ahead of shareholders in the event of their debtor's insolvency;
>
> (iii) shareholders are not entitled to rescind their shares on the basis of misrepresentation after the company has become insolvent;
>
> (iv) United States jurisprudence supports the priority of creditors in "stockholder fraud" cases; and
> (v) to allow the shareholders to rank pari passu with the unsecured creditors could open the floodgates to aggrieved shareholders launching misrepresentation actions.

[27] Re Canada Deposit Insurance* v. *Canadian Commercial Bank [5] is also central to this application. That case involved an issue of priorities with respect to the insolvency of the Canadian Commercial Bank. In an effort to preserve the bank, a participation agreement was entered into among the governments of Canada and Alberta, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and six commercial banks. The sum of $255 million was advanced and it was to be repaid by CCB out of certain portfolio assets and pre-tax income. The agreement promised an indemnity in the event of insolvency, and gave the participants a right to subscribe for shares in CCB at a named price.

[28] The Supreme Court of Canada held that although the participation agreement contained both debt and equity features, it was, in substance, a debt transaction. Iacobucci J. stated at p. 406:

> As I see it, the fact that the transaction contains both debt and equity features does not, in itself, pose an insurmountable obstacle to characterizing the advance of $255 million. Instead of trying to pigeon-hole the entire agreement between the Participants and C.C.B. in one of two categories, I see nothing wrong in recognizing the arrangement for what it is, namely, one of a hybrid nature, combining elements of both debt and equity but which, in substance, reflects a creditor-debtor relationship. Financial and capital markets have been most creative in the variety of investments and securities that have been fashioned to meet the needs and interests of those who participate in those markets. It is not because an agreement has certain equity features that a court must either ignore those features as if they did not exist or characterize the transaction on the whole as an investment. There is an alternative. It is permissible, and often required, or desirable, for debt and equity to coexist in the given financial transaction without altering the substance of the agreement. Furthermore, it does not follow that each and every aspect of such an agreement must be given the exact same weight when addressing a characterization issue. Again, it is not because there are equity features that it is necessarily an investment in capital. This is particularly true when, as here, the equity features are nothing more than supplementary to and not definitive of the essence of the transaction. When a court is searching for the substance of a particular transaction, it should not too easily be distracted by aspects which are, in reality, only incidental or secondary in nature to the main thrust of the agreement. [emphasis added]

[29] As noted, the Flow-Through Shareholders have commenced several actions. Against Merit, they seek recission or damages due to an alleged misrepresentation in the Prospectus (based on their statutory rights to these remedies as disclosed in the Prospectus). They also claim damages relating to lost tax benefits associated with the Flow-Through Shares. While this is a contractual remedy based on the Subscription and Renunciation Agreements, it also has elements of misrepresentation flowing from certain descriptive statements made in the Prospectus.

[30] The Flow-Through Shareholders submitted that they are entitled to be treated as creditors based on the actions they have commenced, but the Trustee objects to this treatment and has sought the direction of the Court in this regard.

i. The Trustee's Position

[31] The Trustee (through counsel) focussed on the allegations made in the statements of claim in its analysis. It suggested that the essential allegation of the Flow-Through Shareholders in their actions is misrepresentation and that as a result of such misrepresentation they have suffered damages. The Trustee then described the remedy sought as, in essence, a claim for a return of equity. The Trustee suggested that the claim for the anticipated tax benefits was no more than a claim for a benefit that was ancillary to their shareholding interest. The Trustee also described the Flow-Through Shareholders' application to prove as unsecured creditors as an attempt to take a "second kick at the can", following the failure of their equity investment.

[32] Using the reasoning of Romaine J. in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp, the Trustee argued that the claim of the Flow-Through Shareholders must be subordinated to Merit's unsecured creditors. The Trustee submitted that all five policy reasons listed in that case (and described above) are present in this case, emphasizing that the dividend will be reduced 20 to 27% (from 15 to 11-12 cents) if the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims are included in the unsecured creditors' pool and that the facts in this case favour subordination even more than the facts in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp., as some of the Flow-Through Shareholders are seeking to rescind their purchase of the Flow-Through Shares in their actions.

ii. The Flow-Through Shareholders' Position

[33] Arguments were filed separately by Mr. McNally, as Counsel for Larry Delf (Mr. Delf being the designate of the Representative Flow-Through Shareholders group), and by Mr. Shea as Counsel for certain other Flow-Through Shareholders.

The Representative Flow-Through Shareholders Group's Position

[34] Mr. McNally did not take issue with the suggestion that as a general rule, shareholders rank after secured creditors. He also did not object to the reasoning of Romaine J. in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp., provided the case is limited to its context and not used to stand for the general proposition that in no circumstances may a shareholder ever have a claim provable in bankruptcy.

[35] Mr. McNally did object to the Trustee's characterization of the claim as a single claim for misrepresentation seeking damages equal to their purchase price for the shares. He suggested that the claims involved firstly, a right to damages or recission qua shareholder under securities legislation and secondly, a right to damages for breach of an indemnity provision qua debt holder. He also submitted that this latter claim may also be seen as having nothing to do with misrepresentation in the Prospectus or a return of capital, but arises independently as a result of Merit's failure to incur and then renounce CEE to the shareholders to enable them to obtain certain tax deductions.

[36] Mr. McNally suggested that this latter claim for tax losses was also a claim provable in bankruptcy. He referenced Laskin J.A.'s recognition in Re Central Capital Corporation [6] that shareholders may participate as creditors in the context of declared dividends because the liquidity provisions of corporate legislation would not have been triggered if the dividends had been declared prior to insolvency and would therefore be enforceable debts. Laskin J.A. stated at p.536:

> It seems to me that these appellants must either be shareholders or creditors. Except for declared dividends, they cannot be both... Moreover, as Justice Finlayson points out in his reasons, courts have always accepted the proposition that when a dividend is declared it is a debt on which each shareholder can sue the corporation.

[37] Mr. McNally also relied on Re G.M.D. Vending Co. [7] where the British Columbia Court of Appeal allowed declared but unpaid dividends to rank with other unsecured claims in a bankruptcy.

[38] He also emphasized that the CEE aspect of the relationship between the Flow-Through Shareholders, on the one hand, and Merit, the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers, on the other, possesses many of the indicia of debt mentioned by Weiler J.A. in Re Central Capital Corporation in that: (1) Merit is obliged to expend the funds raised by the Prospectus on CEE and the funds are advanced by Flow-Through Shareholders for this specific purpose alone, (2) there is an indemnity provision in the Prospectus itself to the Flow-Through Shareholders if this does not occur, evidencing an intention that the investors are to be fully repaid for the loss of the tax benefit,[8] and (3) interest becomes due for the amount of the failed tax write-off and is covered by the indemnity provision as tax payable.

[39] He suggested that the indemnity provisions in the Subscription and Renunciation Agreements are enforceable at law without consideration of corporate liquidity and are an acknowledgment of the unique commercial position of the Flow-Through Shareholders in the event that the CEE is not renounced. He concluded by submitting that the potential liquidity problem and contingent liability must constitute the rationale for the presence of the indemnity in the Subscription and Renunciation Agreements in the first place.

The Other Flow-Through Shareholders Group's Position

[40] Mr. Shea suggested that not only were the claims for tax losses relating to the CEE provable claims, the tort/statutory aspects of their claims were also provable claims, albeit they would be dealt with as "contingent" claims within the meaning of ss. 121 and 135 of the BIA[9]. He further submitted that the fact they are claims by shareholders is irrelevant.

[41] He relied on Gardner* v. Newton [10] as authority for the proposition that a contingent claim is a claim that may or may not ripen into a debt depending on the occurrence of some future event. Mr. Shea also suggested that so long as the claim is not too remote or speculative, a claim, even though it has not yet been reduced to judgment, may still be a contingent claim. Mr. Shea pointed out that the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Confederation Treasury Services Ltd. [11] departed from the earlier cases relied upon by the Trustee, including Claude Resources (Trustee of) v. *Dutton [12]. The Court of Appeal stated they imposed too high of a threshold for the establishment of a contingent claim and held that it was not necessary to demonstrate probability of liability but merely to show they were not too remote or speculative.

[42] He asserted that the claims are not shareholder claims, but claims for statutory remedies and for breach of contract and must rank with Merit's other unsecured creditors for that reason. Mr. Shea also said the Court must look to the substance of the relationship between the claimant and the bankrupt and most importantly, the context in which the claim is made.

[43] Mr. Shea then argued that it would not be equitable to subordinate these claims while other claims based on tort, breach of contract or statutory remedy are allowed to rank as unsecured claims and concluded that the traditional principles for subordinating claims by shareholders do not apply to this case.

[44] He suggested that allowing claims for statutory remedies and/or breach of contract based on misrepresentation to rank as unsecured claims will not affect how creditors do business with companies. Further, he argued that allowing this result will not "open the floodgates" as the statutory remedies involved are narrow in scope and have strict and relatively short time frames.

iii. The Underwriters' Position

[45] Firstly, the Underwriters supported the Flow-Through Shareholders' submissions regarding the nature of their claims. They emphasized that Re: Blue Range Resource Corp should not stand for the proposition that shareholders must always be subordinated to unsecured creditors simply because they are shareholders. Rather, the nature and substance of their claims determines the treatment they receive in the estate.

[46] The Underwriters also suggested that Re: Blue Range Resource Corp turned on its unique facts of a purchaser of Blue Range shares having knowledge of misrepresentations yet exercising shareholder rights, such as authorizing the company to take CCAA proceedings and then making an unsecured claim in those proceedings for the loss associated with its share purchase. The shareholder in that case did not claim recission and did not deny or attempt to avoid its shareholder status. Moreover, there was no contractual right to be treated by the company as anything but a shareholder.

ed in Re Wiebe (1995), 30 C.B.R. (3d) 109 (Ont. Gen. Div.)

[47] The Underwriters distinguished the claims of the Flow-Through Shareholders from those of Big Bear in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp as follows: (1) the Flow-Through Shareholders are not pursuing tort claims based on their status as shareholders, but rather are asserting a statutory right of recission, thereby refuting their status as shareholders, (2) the Flow-Through Shareholders also allege a direct contractual claim for indemnity against Merit pursuant to Subscription and Renunciation Agreements in which Merit agreed to incur qualifying expenditures (CEE), to renounce the resulting tax benefits to them and to indemnify them if it failed to incur the CEE, and (3) if their claims are ultimately successful, the Flow-Through Shareholders will be former shareholders and current creditors of Merit.

Resolution- ISSUE 1

[48] I agree with Romaine J. that the correct approach is to first examine the substance of the claim made against the insolvent. There are the two claims mentioned by counsel for the Flow-Through Shareholders. The first is an alternate remedy for damages or recission based on the alleged misrepresentations contained in the Prospectus. I was advised that some have advanced only one of these alternative claims. The second is cast as a claim in damages under the indemnity in the Subscription and Renunciation Agreements for the failure to renounce CEE.

[49] The Flow-Through Shareholders' claims for recission or damages based on misrepresentation derive from their status as Merit shareholders. Regardless of how they are framed[13], the form the actions take cannot overcome the substance of what is being claimed. It is plain from the Prospectus and the Subscription and Renunciation Agreements that the Flow-Through Shareholders invested in equity. It is equally plain from their actions that what they seek to recoup, in substance, is their investments. As in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp, the "very core" of these claims arises from the circumstances surrounding the acquisition of Merit shares. The Flow-Through Shareholders had no cause of action until they acquired the Flow-Through Shares and their claims include a direct claim for return of capital in their request for recission and in the case of a damage claim, just as in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp, the measure of damages enables them to recover the purchase price of the shares.

[50] It is true these shareholders are using statutory provisions to make their claims in damages or recission rather than the tort basis used in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp, but in substance they remain shareholder claims for the return of an equity investment. The right to a return of this equity investment must be limited by the basic common law principle that shareholders rank after creditors in respect of any return of their equity investment.

[51] Now what about the second aspect of the claims?

[13] Counsel described the claims variously as "statutory", "statutory/tort and "contractual"

[52] The second claim of the Flow-Through Shareholders has some of the features of a debt and the Subscription and Renunciation Agreements provide for a specific remedy in the event Merit fails to comply with its undertaking to make and renounce the CEE expenditures .

[53] While the discussion in Re Central Capital Corporation regarding the claim for declared dividends is appealing, it does not precisely apply in these circumstances. The tax advantages associated with flow-through shares is reflected in a premium paid for the purchase of the shares[14]. In essence, what happens in a flow- through share offering (as sanctioned by the Income Tax Act[15]) is the shareholder buys deductions from the company. As the company has given up deductions, it wants to be paid for those deductions that it is renouncing. From the perspective of the purchaser of the shares, the premium for the shares would not have been paid without some assurance that the deductions will be available. I note the purchaser is also required to reduce their adjusted cost base of the shares (for tax purposes) by the amount of the deductions utilized by the purchaser.

[54] While the Flow-Through Shareholders paid a premium for the shares (albeit to get the deductions), in my view the debt features associated with the CEE indemnity from Merit do not "transform" that part of the relationship from a shareholder relationship into a debt relationship. That part of the relationship remains "incidental" to being a shareholder.

[55] In summary, the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims, regardless of the basis chosen to support them, are in substance claims for the return of their equity investment and accordingly cannot rank with Merit's unsecured creditors.

DECISION - ISSUE 2

The claims of the Underwriters, the Directors and Officers and PriceWaterhouseCoopers are not subordinate to the claims of Merit's unsecured creditors as they are in substance creditors' claims that are not too contingent to constitute provable claims.

i. The Trustee's Position

[56] The Trustee argued that while on their face, the Underwriters' and the Directors and Officers' claims are not shareholder claims, "in substance", they are shareholders' claims and are no more than an indirect passing-on to Merit of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims. As a result, the Trustee submitted, equity dictates that since the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims must rank behind those of the unsecured creditors, the claims of the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers must fail as well. The Trustee suggested this subordination follows from the policy considerations set out by Romaine J. in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp. Alternatively, the Trustee asserted that the claims of the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers are so contingent they must be valued at nil.

ii. The Underwriters' Position

[57] The Underwriters argued that regardless of how the Court characterized the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims, the Trustee cannot succeed against the Underwriters because: (1) the indemnity claims are based on contractual, legal and equitable duties owed to the Underwriters by Merit, to which the Flow-Through Shareholders are strangers and to which Re: Blue Range Resource Corp has no application; (2) equitable subordination has never been applied by Canadian courts and the Trustee cannot satisfy the test even if the court chooses to apply it, and (3) the Underwriters' claims are precisely the type of contingent claims contemplated by the BIA.

iii. The Directors' and Officers' Position

[58] The Directors and Officers conceded that, while some of the potential liability they face is as a result of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims against them, or via indemnity claims brought by the Underwriters and Auditors against them, their claim is simply a claim in contract that is not an effort to obtain a return of equity. They argued that the enforceability of the indemnity is not contingent on the source of the potential liability.

[59] In any case, the Directors and Officers face claims other than from Merit's shareholders, which include: (1) a Saskatchewan action alleging the Directors and Officers assented to or acquiesed in Merit not paying its accounts and ought to be held liable for them, and (2) an Alberta action relating to ownership and lease payments on oilfield equipment. The Directors and Officers asserted that the existence of these claims demonstrate that they are not simply attempting to pass on shareholder claims, but rather they are making a contractual claim for all the potential liability they face, as the indemnity intends.

[60] The Directors and Officers also suggested that, as with the Underwriters, some of the contingency in their claim under the indemnity has been realized to the extent of legal fees incurred in defending the various actions. In any case, they agreed with the Flow-Through Shareholders and Underwriters that a contingent claim need not be "probable" in order to be "provable" but need only something more than to "remote and speculative in nature".

[61] Further, directors and officers require indemnities and commercial necessity dictates that these indemnities have real value.

Resolution - ISSUE 2

Nature of the Underwriters and the Directors' and Officers' claims against Merit [62] The fundamental premise of the Trustee's argument is that the Underwriters' indemnity simply "flows through" or "passes on" the Flow-Through Shareholders' claim to Merit. This ignores the nature of the causes of action being advanced by the Underwriters and the existence of a contractual indemnity freely given by Merit for good and valuable consideration. The Trustee did not suggest that the indemnity was invalid or unenforceable, rather, it argued that this valid and enforceable right should be treated as a "shareholders' claim" and subordinated. With respect, I cannot agree with the Trustee's position.

[63] The Trustee's argument attempts to shift the Court's focus from the Underwriters' claim against Merit to the claim being asserted against the Underwriters, even though it is the former that the Trustee wants the Court to subordinate. The Flow-Through Shareholders' cause of action against the Underwriter's is predicated on the Underwriters' alleged failure to discharge a statutory duty and their liability is not contingent in any way on a successful claim by the Underwriters against Merit under the indemnity.

[64] The Underwriters' indemnity claims against Merit are not made as a shareholder or for any return of investment made by the Underwriters. Rather, they are based on contractual, legal and equitable duties owed directly by Merit to the Underwriters. Similarly, the other causes of action advanced by the Underwriters against Merit in the Third Party Notice do not arise from any equity position in the company, but are based on agency, fiduciary and contractual relationships between the Underwriters and Merit, to which the Flow-Through Shareholders are strangers and are unavailable for them to assert.

[65] For example, the Underwriters are entitled to an indemnity for defence costs even if the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims fail completely. The ultimate success or failure of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims makes no difference to the existence and enforceability of this right against Merit.

[66] As the Underwriters' claims are not claims for a return of equity, Re: Blue Range Resource Corp does not apply. That decision only addressed equity claims of shareholders and I am not prepared to extend its application to the claims of the Underwriters in the application before me, simply because the claims triggering an indemnity by the Underwriters against Merit were shareholders' claims.

[67] As Firstenergy Capital Corp. emphasized, even if I were to apply the policy considerations for subordinating claims identified by Romaine J. in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp to the Underwriters' claims, these policy considerations support a conclusion that the Underwriters' claims are of the type I believe that Romaine J. would protect, not subordinate:

> 1. Shareholders rank behind creditors in insolvency - the issue here is whether the Underwriters are properly characterized as equity stakeholders or creditors. This is done by considering the substance of their claim. Regardless of how the Flow-Through

Shareholders' claims are characterized, the substance of the Underwriters' claims against Merit are contractual. They arise out of a contract for indemnity between Merit and the Underwriters. This is clearly distinct from a claim for return of shareholders' equity. The Trustee asked the court to consider the fact of a possible future payment from the Underwriters to the Flow-Through Shareholders in characterizing the claim of the Underwriters against Merit. Given the nature of the obligations under an indemnity, this is inappropriate. Describing the Underwriters' claims as "no more than and indirect passing-on of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims" is based on a flawed analysis of the obligations under an indemnity and ignores the statutory duty of the Underwriters to the Flow-Through Shareholders. There are two distinct obligations.

2001 ABQB 583 (CanLII)

The first obligation relates to the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims against the Underwriters and any obligations that may be imposed on the Underwriters as a result. This obligation is completely unrelated to, and unaffected by the Underwriters' indemnity. The second obligation is between Merit, as indemnifier, and the Underwriters. This second obligation is the obligation that must be characterized in this application. The Flow-Through Shareholders are strangers to this claim.

2. Creditors do business with companies on the assumption they will rank ahead of shareholders on insolvency - the focus of this analysis is the degree of risk-taking respectively assumed by shareholders and creditors. Unlike shareholders who assume the risks of insolvency, the Underwriters bargained, as any other creditor, for their place at the creditor table in an insolvency. An indemnity is a well-known commercial concept business people routinely use to eliminate or reduce risk and should be recognized as a necessary and desirable obligation.

To subordinate the Underwriters' claim would amount to a reversal of the expectations of the parties to the indemnities. The evidence before me suggests that the Underwriters would not have participated in Merit's offering without the indemnity. I need not decide whether that is true.

Subordinating the Underwriters would fundamentally change the underlying business relationship between underwriters and issuers, and would be unexpected in the industry. Such a result might make it impossible for an underwriter to recover under an indemnity from a bankrupt issuer in respect of an equity offering.

3. Shareholders are not entitled to rescind shares after insolvency - this consideration has no bearing on the Underwriters as they are not shareholders seeking to rescind shares. Their claims against the bankrupt are for damages under a contract for indemnity. Further, I was not asked to determine this particular question in this application.

4. The principles of equitable subordination - In Re Canada Deposit Insurance* v. *Canadian Commercial Bank, the Supreme Court of Canada expressly left open the question of whether equitable subordination formed part of Canadian insolvency law, but expressed its opinion as to the applicable test as developed in the United States:

> ...(1) the claimant must have engaged in some type of inequitable conduct; (2) the misconduct must have resulted in injury to the creditors of the bankrupt or conferred an unfair advantage on the claimant; and (3) equitable subordination of the claim must not be inconsistent with the provisions of the bankruptcy statute...(p. 420)

An application of these criteria would lead to the conclusion that equitable subordination would not apply in this case, even if it was part of Canadian law.

Although the Trustee suggested that the Underwriters may have "participated" in the misrepresentation, there is no evidence before me of inequitable conduct on their part. It is perhaps significant that the Flow-Through Shareholders have not alleged any such misconduct as against the Underwriters, but rather they have only advanced the statutory causes of action available to them under securities legislation.

As there is no evidence of inequitable conduct on the part of the Underwriters, there can be no corresponding injury to Merit's other creditors, or enhancement of the Underwriters' position.

Finally, the application of equitable subordination of the Underwriters' claims in this case would be inconsistent with the established priority scheme contained in the BIA. The United States Supreme Court addressed this third requirement of consistency in United States* v. *Noland [16]:

> [t]his last requirement has been read as a 'reminder to the bankruptcy court that although it is a court of equity, it is not free to adjust the legally valid claim of an innocent party who asserts the claim in good faith merely because the court perceives the result as inequitable'

This statement encapsulates what the Trustee is asking to the Court to do: subordinate the claims of the Underwriters, who have asserted their claims under their indemnities as they are entitled to do, merely because the result may be perceived as inequitable. The words of the US Supreme Court are consistent with the view that equitable subordination is an extraordinary remedy that ought to be employed only where there is some misconduct on the part of the claimant. The statutory scheme of distribution in the BIA must be paramount, and if it is to be interfered with, it should only be in clear cases where demonstrable inequitable conduct is present.

5. Floodgates - Romaine J. considered that allowing Big Bear's claim for misrepresentation to rank with unsecured creditors would encourage aggrieved shareholders to claim misrepresentation or fraud. This consideration has no application to the Underwriters, who are not shareholders. Allowing the Underwriters' claims, which are based on a contractual right of indemnity, will not open the door to increased claims of misrepresentation or fraud by shareholders. The nature of the claims against the Underwriters and the Underwriters' claim against Merit are entirely different.

[68] In summary, the Underwriters' claims against Merit are creditors' claims which rank with Merit's other unsecured creditors.

[69] With this result I appreciate the potential for the Flow-Through Shareholders to be seen as obtaining some recovery from the estate before all the unsecured creditors are paid in full. It might even be suggested it may ultimately allow the Flow-Through Shareholders to achieve indirectly what they could not achieve directly, based on the substance of their claims. This may be the final economic result.

[70] However, success by the Flow-Through Shareholders against the Underwriters is not contingent upon success by the Underwriters against Merit nor does it automatically follow that success by the Flow-Through Shareholders against the Underwriters must inevitably lead to success by the Underwriters against Merit. A successful claim by the Underwriters against Merit will be determined on the basis of the provisions of the indemnity and the result of the claim against the Underwriters will be one of the factors in that analysis.

[71] As the possible economic result described in paragraph 69 does not flow from a continuous chain of interdependent events, the possibility that the Flow-Through Shareholders may indirectly recover some of their equity investment from others prior to Merit's unsecured creditors being paid in full would not be a sufficient reason to decide this application differently.

[72] As with the Underwriters, I find that the Directors and Officers have creditors' claims entitled to rank with Merit's other unsecured creditors.

Contingent claims

[73] While the Trustee's primary argument was the claims of the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers are merely indirect shareholder claims, alternatively, it argued that these claims are too contingent and cannot constitute a provable claim on that basis.[17]

[74] The Trustee relied on the case of Claude Resources (Trustee of)* v. *Dutton in support of its position. In that case, an indemnity agreement was executed between the bankrupt and its sole shareholder, officer and director and entitled the individual to be indemnified for any liabilities arising out of actions taken in his capacity as an officer and director of the bankrupt. This individual was sued in relation to a debenture offering and sought to prove using his indemnity. Noble J. described the claim as having a "double contingency", in that as a first step the action on the debenture offering must be successful, and if so, then the claim on the application of the indemnity agreement must also succeed. Noble J. held that more is needed beyond evidence that the creditor has been sued and that liability may flow; some element of probability is needed.

[17] Supra footnote 9 for BIA definitions in ss. 121 and 135

[75] The Trustee submitted that there is no evidence as to the potential success of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims against the Underwriters and/or the Directors and Officers, nor was it possible prior to judgment in those actions, to determine whether any liability of the Underwriters and/or the Directors and Officers to the Flow-Through Shareholders would qualify for indemnification.

[76] The fact that a claim is contingent does not mean it is not "provable"[18]. Provable claims include contingent claims as long as they are not too speculative: Negus* v. *Oakley's General Contracting [19]. Section 121 defines provable claims to include "all debts and liabilities, present or future,...to which the bankrupt may become subject...".

[77] Section 121 does not specify the degree of certainty required to make a claim provable, other than to include as provable all debts or liabilities to which the bankrupt may become subject. As stated, the Ontario Court of Appeal addressed this in Re Confederation Treasury Services Ltd. and held that the test of probable liability set out in Claude Resources (Trustee of)* v. *Dutton and Re Wiebe (also relied on by the Trustee) imposed too high of a threshold to establish a valid contingent claim. Rather, the Ontario Court of Appeal expressed that contingent claims must simply be not too "remote or speculative in nature". I agree with the Ontario Court of Appeal's view of the test.

[78] On a plain reading of the Underwriting Agreement, the indemnity appears to be engaged by the Flow-Through Shareholders' actions. The actions are under case management and are proceeding through discoveries at this time. Further, there are several authorities that suggest an indemnity becomes enforceable as soon as a claim of the type indemnified is alleged.[20] Finally, at least one part of the Underwriters' claim is not contingent - they have incurred costs and disbursements in defence of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims and according to the terms of the indemnity are currently entitled to reimbursement for those costs, regardless of the outcome of the litigation.

iv. PriceWaterhouseCoopers

[79] PriceWaterhouseCoopers made similar submissions to the Underwriters and the Directors and Officers and emphasized the strong policy reason behind supporting auditors' indemnities as unsecured and not subordinated claims. In addition, PriceWaterhouseCoopers has an independent claim for negligent misrepresentation against the Directors and Officers, arising out of the provision of information to PriceWaterhouseCoopers by Merit management which PriceWaterhouseCoopers alleges was known, or ought to have been known, to be incorrect. PriceWaterhouseCoopers suggested this further distinguishes PriceWaterhouseCoopers' situation from the situation before the Court in Re: Blue Range Resource Corp.

[80] I find that PriceWaterhouseCoopers' indemnity claim is a creditor's claim entitled to rank with Merit's other unsecured creditors. My reasoning with respect to the Underwriters' claims, as based on their indemnities, applies equally to PriceWaterhouse Coopers' claim based on its indemnity.

[81] I am aware that the indemnities of the Flow-Through Shareholders are not being accorded creditor status, while those of the Underwriters, the Directors and Officers and PriceWaterhouseCoopers are. However, as noted, the indemnity feature of the Flow-Through Shareholders' claims is related to certain deductions and those deductions were part of the purchase price for the shares. This in my view is more analogous to Re Canada Deposit Insurance* v. *Canadian Commercial Bank than to Re Central Capital Corporation and that to me is sufficient to justify the distinction.

CONCLUSION

[82] The claims of the Flow-Through Shareholders are in substance claims for the return of equity investment and rank behind the claims of Merit's unsecured creditors, which shall include the claims of the Underwriters, the Directors and Officers and PriceWaterhouse Coopers.

I. Introduction

[1] Do these CCAA proceedings reach and, if so, should they govern what is at least in part an inter-creditor dispute?

[2] Specifically, should the Court compel one claimant against the various Canadian Sunterra entities to advise whether it proposes to sue another claimant and, if so, the basis or bases and associated quantum of its claim(s) against the other claimant, on pain of having those claim(s) barred otherwise, to assist the other claimant in proving and valuing an contribution-and-indemnity claim against the Canadian Sunterra entities or some of their directors and officers (or both) in these proceedings?

[3] The answer is no, as explained below.

II. Background

[4] National Bank of Canada, the primary lender to various Canadian Sunterra companies, seeks an order obliging Compeer Financial PCA, a U.S. lender, to advise by September 30, 2025 (or, presumably, based on submissions at the application, an extended deadline) whether it intends to pursue recovery from NBC for losses caused by NBC's dishonouring of certain cheques payable by some of the Canadian companies to certain Sunterra U.S. entities or Compeer itself. And, if so, the basis or bases of Compeer's anticipated claims against NBC and the range (in dollars) of those anticipated claims.

[5] NBC's proposed order says that, if Compeer does not perform this step or these steps (as applicable) by the deadline, Compeer's claim(s) against NBC in respect of the dishonoured cheques are barred.

[6] Per NBC, it needs the requested details to prove in the present CCAA proceedings a contribution-and-indemnity claim against the Canadian entities related to the dishonoured cheques i.e. tagging them with some or all of whatever liability Compeer succeeds in attaching to NBC. (The contribution-and-indemnity claim would be in addition to NBC's direct claim against the Canadian entities for loans advanced.)

[7] Further per NBC, section 11 of the CCAA provides jurisdiction to make the requested order. As well, the CCAA case law confirms that, while ordinarily the statute does not extend to addressing inter-creditor disputes (instead focusing centrally on claims against the insolvent company), the CCAA will reach, and govern, such disputes where their resolution would promote the accomplishment of CCAA purposes.

[8] Per Compeer, NBC has sufficient information to identify its legal exposure to Compeer on the dishonoured cheques by definition, since it was NBC's own decisions to dishonour them, in circumstances known to NBC, that underlie its potential liabilities to Compeer. In any case, Compeer says it does not have all the information it needs to decide what claim(s) it has or may have against NBC in respect of the dishonoured cheques, whether it will pursue NBC for those claim(s), and the actual or potential range of its claims.

[9] As well, per Compeer, NBC's cases are distinguishable, with the cited "inter-creditor disputes" not properly thus characterized, instead involving matters intertwined with the CCAA proceedings, including the proper administration of court-approved plans of reorganization.

[10] Other arguments raised by both sides are noted and addressed in the analysis below.

[11] For greater certainty, I note that Compeer has not yet sued NBC (if it sues at all) on or in respect of the dishonoured cheques, and (though the parties did not address limitations in any substantive way) it appears that the limitation period to do so has not yet expired and will apparently not expire until after December 2025, when further applications are scheduled in this matter, including one (as I understand it) to determine whether NBC can prove a contribution-and-indemnity claim against some or all of the Canadian entities and, if so, value that claim for the purpose of the CCAA proceedings.

2025 ABKB 599 (CanLII)

III. Analysis

A. CCAA proceedings do not extend to resolving pure inter-creditor disputes

[12] It is not a proper use of a CCAA proceeding to determine disputes between parties other than the debtor company: Stelco (Re), 2005 CanLII 42247 (ONCA) (para 32). See also Green Growth Brands Inc (In the matter of a plan of compromise or arrangement), 2020 ONSC 3565 (paras 33-37).

[13] An exception is where the resolution of such disputes is "inextricably connected to the restructuring process": Stelco Inc (Re), 2006 CanLII 16526 (ONCA) (paras 11 and 12) and Alderbridge Way GP Ltd, 2023 BCSC 1718 (Fitzpatrick J.) (paras 34-57). For examples of such connections, see Stelco (2006) (paras 5-10), Alderbridge (paras 58-72) and Dynamic Technologies Group Inc (Re CCAA), 2023 ABKB 172 (Mah J.).

[14] NBC did not point to any cases where CCAA proceedings were extended to inter-creditor disputes to assist in proving and valuing claims in those proceedings.

[15] I do not see such a purpose as "inextricably connected to the restructuring process" or as "likely to further the remedial purposes of the CCAA" (US Steel Canada Inc (Re), 2016 ONCA 662 (para 102).

[16] The CCAA provides a mechanism for proving and (if proved) valuing claims: ss 19 and 20 CCAA. That mechanism has apparently been adequate for proving and valuing claims even where the claims are for contribution and indemnity i.e. turn in part on separate claims involving the claimant and one or more third parties. Even where those claims are contingent, as appears to be the case here, with the existence of NBC's (possible) claim-over against the Canadian Sunterra entities depending on whether Compeer decides to pursue NBC on the dishonoured cheques and, in turn, whether NBC's indemnification rights extending to such claim(s). On the suitability of the CCAA claims process for proving and valuing such claims, see Conforti Holdings Ltd (In the matter of the proposal to creditors of), 2022 ONSC 3264 (Cavanagh J.) (paras 42-51).

[17] See also SemCanada Crude Company (Celtic Exploration Ltd #2, Re), 2012 ABQB 489 (Romaine J.):

> It may well have been difficult to value a contingent claim for future suspension damages that was filed before the Claims Bar Date, but that is often the nature of a contingent or future claim. In particular, there may have been issues relating to when the IGPA could reasonably be reinstated. As noted by SemCAMS, contingent claims are routinely filed in CCAA proceedings and in proceedings under the BIA. [para 27]

[18] Again, NBC did not point to any case where, for CCAA proving and valuation purposes, the CCAA proceeding reached into those separate claims for any purpose.

[19] NBC itself acknowledged in its application (para 10) that " ... it is possible to determine and value the NBC v Sunterra Claim in the absence of [the] details [sought from Compeer]", albeit submitting that "the process would benefit from, and would be significantly more efficient and efficacious [with those details]."

[20] Compeer stated that it may obtain more information about its possible claim against NBC after conducting certain already-scheduled examinations, which might clarify the nature and scope of its possible claim against NBC. Compeer did not state or imply that it was averse to providing such information to NBC, only that it was premature (now) to ask for such information and, in any case, to compel Compeer to provide it, particularly on pain of losing its claim entirely via a claims-bar provision (as discussed further below).

[21] In these circumstances, the "inextricable connection" to the CCAA proceedings is lacking.

[22] Leaving the normal approach – CCAA proceedings do not extend to resolving inter-creditor disputes – in place.

B. No likely benefit to the CCAA process via the proposed order

[23] Alternatively, if potential assistance in the CCAA proof-and-valuation-of-claims process reflects an inextricable connection or would likely further the CCAA's remedial purposes, as explained below I perceive no such assistance here.

[24] The terms of NBC's proposed order (reproduced here) illuminate this point.

> Compeer … is required to file an election ("the Compeer Election"), on or before September 30, 2025 [or extended deadline, as discussed at the conclusion of the application on September 3, 2025] (the "Compeer Claims Bar Date"), in which Compeer: (i) indicates whether it intends to advance a claim against NBC in respect of any facts, circumstances or matters giving rise to a Compeer v NBC Claim [i.e. a defined term focusing on the dishonoured cheques described above]; and, (ii) if Compeer indicates that it intends to advance such a claim, requiring Compeer to: (a) outline the bases of such claim(s); and (b) provide a range of the quantum of such claim(s). [emphasis added]

[25] Starting with the election element, Compeer has already advised NBC that it may pursue it for losses caused by the dishonoured cheques.

[26] As I understand NBC's position, as apparently reflected in the "file an election" requirement, the order, if granted, would require Compeer to answer "yes" or "no."

[27] While Compeer would apparently prefer, in the circumstances it describes (i.e. incomplete information), to provide a "may pursue" response, I infer that, if faced with a "yes" or "no" election, Compeer would invariably answer "yes" i.e. at minimum to preserve potential recourse against NBC on the cheques. Particularly with nothing in the order creating any prejudice or disadvantage to Compeer, after a "yes" election, if it were later to decide against pursuing NBC on the cheques or, if a pursuit had been launched, abandoning it. In other words, a "yes" election would not appear to lock Compeer into pursuing NBC regardless of any re-evaluation of present circumstances or a downstream change of circumstances.

[28] I find that NBC's understanding of Compeer's present position would not increase appreciably via the election itself, with no real chance, in the present circumstances, that Compeer would elect "no" and with a "yes" election being the product of what I find would be inevitable desire on Compeer's part to preserve its rights. In other words, Compeer's position will continue (on the ground) to be "maybe" or "it depends", albeit preserved under cover of a non-binding "yes" election.

[29] On the "bases" aspect, NBC understands from Compeer's direct claim against some or all of the Canadian entities that it is alleging a tracing claim, which NBC understands references and is aimed, at least in part, at recovering against NBC in respect of the dishonoured cheques.

[30] Accordingly, NBC is apparently looking for Compeer to outline whether it alleges any other basis or bases for recovery on or in respect of those cheques.

[31] As a bank, NBC is presumably familiar with the recourse(s) of collecting banks where cheques are dishonoured (i.e. to the extent Compeer had that status in respect of some or all of the cheques) and those of drawees or holders of dishonoured cheques (i.e. to the extent Compeer had that status on any of the cheques) or otherwise what liabilities it may have to Compeer in respect of the cheques in the circumstances here.

[32] In other words, in advance of Compeer starting an action against NBC (if it does at all) and even without a catalogue of potential liability from Compeer as contemplated by the proposed order, NBC is presumably already aware of the liabilities it has or may have incurred to Compeer on the dishonoured cheques.

[33] And, as noted by Compeer, NBC (by definition) has a window into its own decisions to dishonour the cheques, including its own understanding of the prevailing circumstances and its rationale(s) for dishonouring.

[34] As well, the proposed order does not call for details of the requested bases, whether particulars, facts, or evidence.

[35] Accordingly, Compeer could properly, and might, respond to the proposed order, bases-wise, by answering "tracing claims as detailed in our claim against the Canadian entities directly, plus all liabilities to Compeer otherwise triggered by the dishonouring of the cheques, whether under statute (including the Bills of Exchange Act), the common law, or in equity i.e. the orthodox species of liability to downstream parties where cheques are dishonoured."

[36] Which I infer NBC is already familiar with, at least in terms of the potential grounds of liability relating to dishonoured cheques.

[37] Particularly where Compeer has advised that its causes of action against NBC "would presumably not be fraud, conspiracy or oppression" i.e. some or all of the causes of action Compeer asserts against the CCAA debtors and their principals (or some of them).

[38] NBC's real concern is more likely with the quantum of Compeer's claims.

[39] From earlier materials on this file, I understand that Compeer suffered losses from certain chequing-relate activities of the Canadian and U.S. Sunterra entities of approximately $35 million (USD) and that it may have recovered approximately $15 million (USD) via certain asset sales in the U.S. i.e. that it is currently owed approximately $20 million (USD) by the U.S. entities.

[40] It may be that Compeer is able to achieve more recoveries out of the U.S. entities.

[41] It may also achieve recoveries via its claims already asserted against some or all of the Canadian entities.

[42] It may have other sources of recovery i.e. beyond those noted and its possible claim against NBC.

2025 ABKB 599 (CanLII)

[43] I infer that Compeer's "lack of information" also extends to the possible quantum of its claim against NBC i.e. given possible recoveries on these other fronts.

[44] I also infer, given the narrow information sought on this aspect in the proposed order ("a range of quantum of such claim(s)"), that, if obliged to provide such information via the proposed order, Compeer would not provide a range that would or could impair its position i.e. would not see any need to cap its own claim i.e. would in all likelihood provide a range like "while lacking full information at present, it may be that, via the cheque dishonouring in question, NBC became liable to us for some or even all of our cheque-related losses i.e. $35 million (USD), of which we have recovered $15 million (USD). Accordingly, we currently provide a range of possible recovery against NBC of up to $20 million (USD), plus a further $X million (USD) in consequential losses, interest, costs, and other amounts, for a grand total range of up to $20 + X million i.e. if it turns out that we do not recover any material amounts on other fronts or, alternatively, if we are not obliged at law to exhaust or factor in other recoveries when pursuing NBC."

[45] In other words, I cannot foresee that Compeer, acting rationally, would, in the present circumstances, answer "no" to the pursuit-of-NBC election, do anything other than list the already implicitly-asserted tracing recourse and all known-to-law liabilities triggered by cheque-dishonouring, or limit its range estimate below the absolute maximum of its conceivable claim(s) against NBC.

[46] I also note that the proposed order does not ask Compeer to provide a range or ranges per asserted ground of liability (e.g. "we estimate recovery of up to $X million from NBC on [ground #1], $Y million on [ground #2], etc.), instead calling only for a range of overall recovery.

[47] NBC is presently aware of all that information.

[48] Accordingly I do not foresee that NBC would receive any materially and incrementally helpful information from Compeer via the proposed order.

[49] In any case, NBC's counsel advised at the application that, if Compeer wished to reserve a right to amend its response (e.g. as I understand it, to add a new basis of liability or revise its claim range) with newly acquired information, it could do so.

[50] For that matter, the proposed order does not purport to block Compeer from revising its responses (e.g. to add a further ground of liability or revise its claim range) on account of pre-existing and discoverable information or even pre-existing and known but now reconsidered information e.g. "we overlooked but now invoke ground of recovery E, and we knew about but had discounted but now invoke ground of recovery F, and we also have reconsidered our range estimate, based on the same information, which we now set at $[new figure] million (USD)."

[51] In other words, as presently framed, the proposed order only calls for point-in-time information, which (per its terms) Compeer could change, whether between now and the December hearing on the proof and valuation of NBC's contribution-and-indemnity claim or afterwards, and whether on the basis of new information, existing information not yet factored in, or even existing information reconsidered.

[52] Viewed differently, as much as NBC might wish to pin down Compeer as part of understanding NBC's potential liability to it for the cheque dishonouring and, in turn, obtain more clarity on the scope and extent of its contribution-and-indemnity claim against the Canadian Sunterra entities, the order leaves Compeer free to depart from its point-in-time position e.g. whether to add perceived grounds of liability or increase its loss-range estimate or even to subtract grounds ("we are no longer pursuing X or Y theories of liability") or reduce its estimate.

[53] In such circumstances, it is hard to see what additional clarity any point-in-time set of positions casts on either the Compeer v NBC claim or NBC's claim-over against the Canadian Sunterra entities.

[54] In its brief, NBC characterized the present circumstances as "shadow boxing" with Compeer i.e. with uncertainty over whether the latter will pursue relief on the cheques and, if so, on what basis or bases and for what perceived losses.

[55] But as explained above, the proposed order would not move things out of the shadows.

[56] In other words, the limited and changeable information sought by the proposed order would not materially assist in the CCAA claims process.

C. Claims-bar provision not warranted

[57] In any case, even if Compeer should be compelled to comply with the order (i.e. if it were found that doing so would or would likely yield materially useful information for the December application), NBC has failed to show the necessity of enforcing the order with a claims-bar provision.

[58] NBC is not proposing that Compeer's potential claim against it be determined (i.e. on the merits) within the Sunterra CCAA proceedings.

[59] As noted, it is simply seeking information from Compeer to assist in advancing its (NBC's) contribution-and-indemnity claim in those proceedings.

[60] The hammer of a claims-bar provision is both incongruous and disproportionate here, with Compeer's claim ultimately, if pursued, being advanced in separate (non-CCAA) proceedings i.e. no need to corral and move Compeer's claim through the CCAA claims process.

[61] If an election order were granted here, and if Compeer failed to comply, other court-order-enforcement remedies could be invoked.

IV. Conclusion

[62] NBC has not shown that requiring Compeer to make the proposed election and, if electing "yes", to provide the requested information would yield materially and incrementally helpful information.

[63] In other words, that the proposed information would materially boost the CCAA proceeding here.

[64] In any case, the acknowledged right of Compeer to amend the information, whether new information emerged or otherwise, materially undercuts the ostensible certainty created by any order responses.

[65] In other words, the proposed order would not materially increase certainty here.

[66] And no claims bar date is warranted here in any case.

STINSON J.

[1] In this action the plaintiff seeks payment of the sum of $228,298.61 said to be owed by the defendant, arising from the operation of two line of credit accounts. The defendant resists the claim, relying on the circumstances under which the alleged indebtedness arose and also on the terms of the line of credit agreements.

FACTS

[2] On November 8, 2001 the parties signed two standard form line of credit agreements, one with a credit limit of $154,000 and the other with a credit limit of $146,000. As security for the monies to be advanced under the lines of credit the defendant gave the plaintiff a mortgage on her matrimonial home, for the principal sum of $300,000, being the equivalent of the total of the credit limits under the two lines of credit. The defendant's husband, Michael Tanev, signed the two line of credit agreements and the mortgage as guarantor.

[3] The relevant portions of the $154,000 line of credit agreement (the other agreement was identical, save for a credit limit of $146,000 and a different account number) are set out below:

> 1. TERMS AND CONDITIONS
>
> The Bank establishes, in favour of the Client, a Line of Credit on the date this agreement was signed, under the following terms and conditions:
>
> Credit limit: _$154,000.00_ Interest rate: Prime rate 4.5% + _0 %_ = 4.5%
> (Spread)
> (Effective November 8, 2001)
>
> Expiry date of agreement November 8, 2006 Account No. 70·694-97
>
> The Client shall use the Line of Credit by way of items drawn on the account (the "Account"), the number of which is indicated above, or in any other way agreed upon between the Bank and the Client; any item paid by the Bank may be debited from the Account. Items must be drawn on cheques authorized by the Bank. As long as the Line of Credit is in effect, the Bank shall pay the Client's items, except if the debit balance of the Account exceeds the credit limit or if the payment would create such an overrun.
>
>
> 4. ADVANCES
>
> All amounts charged to the Account, including fees in effect at the Bank for the handling of such Account as well as insurance premiums, if applicable, are considered advances made by the Bank to the Client; the Client must repay such advances in the manner provided for herein.
>
> 5. MONTHLY STATEMENT
>
> Every month, the Bank shall prepare and send to the Client a statement (the 'Statement'), as well as other items, if applicable, confirming the debits and credits posted to the Account during the period covered by the Statement. On receipt of each Statement, the Client shall pay the Bank the interest, fees and insurance premiums charged to the Account during the period covered by the Statement as well as any additional amount required so that the debit balance of the Account does not exceed the credit limit. This payment shall be made without using the Line of Credit. In the case of the Home Improvement Line of Credit, the Client is not obliged to pay interest, fees and insurance premiums charged to the Account before the expiry of the Line of Credit.

2004 CanLII 8031 (ON SC)

….

7. AMENDMENTS TO THIS AGREEMENT

The Bank may, at its discretion, increase or decrease the term of the line of Credit or the amount of the credit limit, and. with 30 days' prior notice, amend the terms hereof. The Bank may terminate the Line of Credit upon re-evaluation of the Client's financial situation or if the Client becomes insolvent or does not fulfill his obligations to the Bank hereunder or otherwise.

8. PAYMENT OF BALANCE AT EXPIRY

When the Line of Credit expires, the Client must pay to the Bank forthwith the debit balance of the Account with interest at the prime rate of the Bank grossed up as indicated in article 1 until payment in full; unpaid interest is compounded monthly.

….

11. AGREEMENT COVERING PERSONAL DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS

This agreement is subject to the provisions of the agreement Governing Personal Deposit Accounts; the Client acknowledges receipt of a copy thereof.

[4] Although article 11 of the line of credit agreements referred to something called the "Agreement Governing Personal Deposit Accounts" the latter document was not put into evidence before me.

[5] According to an agreed statement of fact, the lines of credit were obtained for the purpose of financing Mr. Tanev's business. According to the testimony of the bank official who testified before me, two separate line of credit accounts were opened because the proceeds of one were to be used to pay out an existing mortgage with the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

[6] Once the line of credit accounts were established, Mr. and Mrs. Tanev were provided with cheques that could be written on the accounts, thereby drawing down the credit facility provided by the bank. Although Mrs. Tanev was the bank's client and thus the account holder, pursuant to signature cards signed by her and her husband, either of them was authorized to sign cheques on these two accounts. Accordingly, although Mr. Tanev was not the account holder, but only the guarantor under the line of credit agreements and the mortgage, with the knowledge and approval of the defendant, Mr. Tanev was authorized to write cheques on the account and thereby draw down the lines of credit, utilizing only his own signature.

[7] Almost as soon as they were established the two line of credit accounts were drawn down almost to their maximum amount. Thereafter, between mid-November 2001 and mid-February 2002, various deposits were made to and cheques drawn against the accounts. Unbeknownst to the plaintiff, however, most of the cheques drawn on the accounts (which were apparently all signed by Mr. Tanev) and the deposits made to them (all made by Mr. Tanev) were part of an elaborate cheque-kiting scheme in which Mr. Tanev and others (but not the defendant) were participants. Briefly stated, Mr. Tanev and his confederates entered into an arrangement whereby they exchanged cheques, each in the same amount, which were then deposited and withdrawn in like amounts from their respective banks, simultaneously. There was no underlying transaction to support the exchange of cheques and at the time the cheques were written, there were insufficient funds in the drawer's account to cover them. The purpose of exchanging the cheques was simply to obtain funds from the participants' respective bankers.

[8] In effect, by depositing a confederate's cheque in one of the defendant's line of credit accounts, Mr. Tanev was able to artificially reduce the debit balance, thus enabling him to write further cheques on the account which, but for the credit arising from the deposit, would have exceeded the credit limit on the account. So long as the confederate's cheque was honoured, the line of credit account would continue to operate within its credit limit. In part at least, the scheme succeeded because of the plaintiff bank's practice of crediting the line of credit account with the full amount of the deposit at the time the confederate's cheque was deposited, instead of waiting until the cheque cleared or otherwise confirming that there were sufficient funds in the confederate's account to pay it.

[9] As of February 7, 2002, the first line of credit account was drawn down to the extent of $132,989.71. On February 8, 2002, a deposit of $180,000 was made to that account, and cheques totalling $185,000 together with interest of $391.95 were charged against the account, resulting in a net draw down of $138,381.66. On February 12, 2002 three cheques previously deposited into this account totalling $161,000, were returned NSF, apparently because the cheque-kiting scheme had been discovered. The bank charged these NSF cheques against the account by way of debit memos, increasing the draw down on this account from $138,381.66 to $299,381.66, almost double the credit limit of $154,000.

[10] With respect to the second line of credit account, as of February 7, 2002, it was drawn down to the extent of $138,487.37. On February 8, 2002, a deposit of $85,000 was made, a cheque of $90,000 was processed and interest of $429.65 was charged, resulting in a net draw down of $143,916.95. On February 12, 2002 a cheque previously deposited in the amount of $85,000 was returned NSF. The NSF cheque charged to this account by way of a debit memo, resulting in a net draw down of $228,916.95, well in excess of the credit limit of $146,000.

[11] As a result of the bank having charged the two accounts with the amounts of the deposited cheques that had been returned NSF, the credit limits established for both accounts were substantially exceeded: as compared to the total authorized credit limit of $300,000, the total of the charges to the two accounts was $528,298.61. In light of the fact that the charges to the two accounts had substantially exceeded the credit limits and upon the cheque-kiting scheme coming to light, the plaintiff "froze" the two accounts and did not process any further cheques drawn on them.

[12] Subsequently, the plaintiff took three legal steps. The first was to issue a Notice of Sale Under Mortgage in relation to the mortgage granted by the defendant on the matrimonial home. That Notice of Sale was dated August 21, 2002. According to the agreed statement of fact, in November 2002, the defendant, through counsel, arranged for a payment to the plaintiff in the amount of $317,351.70 (representing principal and accrued interest on the mortgage) in exchange for a discharge of the mortgage. Although the mortgage was discharged, there was no release given in respect of the line of credit liability.

[13] The second step taken by the plaintiff was to commence a separate action against Mr. Tanev and his confederates in the cheque-kiting scheme. Mr. Tanev did not defend that action and the plaintiff ultimately obtained a judgment against him in the principal amount of $799,556.52. According to the statement of claim in that action, it was founded on allegations of fraud and conspiracy relating to the cheque-kiting scheme and did not involve any claim based on the line of credit accounts, the mortgage, or Mr. Tanev's guarantee of same. Mr. Tanev has subsequently made an assignment in bankruptcy.

[14] The third step taken by the plaintiff was the commencement of this action against Mrs. Tanev, in December 2002, seeking payment of the balance of the indebtedness said to be owing on the line of credit accounts, after giving credit for the $300,000 payment in November 2002. Thus the amount claimed in this proceeding is the total drawn down on the two lines of credit, being $528,298.61, less the $300,000 paid to obtain the discharge of the mortgage, leaving a balance of $228,298.61.

[15] The only witness to testify at trial was Darcy Hamilton, the bank official who processed the original application by which the two line of credit accounts were opened. She testified that the bank did not monitor the accounts save to confirm that the cheques drawn on them had been signed by a signatory authorized to do so pursuant to the signature cards filed with the bank. She said that she did not know where the funds from the line of credit accounts went. She testified that, provided the accounts operated within their credit limits, she did not receive copies of the statements or the cheques drawn on them. If an account exceeded its credit limit, notice to this effect would appear on a computer screen and cheques drawn on the account in excess of the credit limit would not be paid.

[16] Ms. Hamilton testified that there was no practice in place to verify that funds were available to pay cheques that were deposited into the account. Thus, if a cheque for $50,000 had been deposited into one of the line of credit accounts, the bank would permit those funds to be drawn down by allowing the customer to write a cheque on the account for a like amount, without first verifying that the deposited cheque would be honoured by the bank upon which it was drawn by confirming that there were sufficient funds in the drawer's account.

[17] Mrs. Tanev did not testify. The plaintiff read in a portion of her examination for discovery transcript in which she confirmed that her agreement with Mr. Tanev was that Mr. Tanev would be using the line of credit accounts, would be writing the cheques and would be making the deposits. It would thus appear that Mrs. Tanev was content to leave the operation of her accounts to her husband. This was reflected in the signature cards that she provided to the bank by which she authorized the bank to process cheques on the accounts that were signed by her husband alone and further by her agreement with her husband that I have just mentioned.

THE POSITIONS OF THE PARTIES

The Plaintiff

[18] The plaintiff asserted that, as the bank's customer, the defendant is fully liable for the amounts drawn down on the two lines of credit. In essence, the bank asserted that it advanced funds for the defendant's account by paying cheques drawn on her line of credit accounts based and in reliance upon deposits made to that account, which deposits ultimately were worthless. Those deposits were made by the defendant's authorized agent, her husband, and when the underlying cheques were returned NSF, the bank properly charged them back as debits to the accounts.

[19] The bank argued that the debit memos by which the NSF cheques were processed reflect amounts charged to the accounts which must be repaid. Because the debit balances exceeded the credit limits, the customer is required to pay the excess amounts. Further, because the lines of credit have been terminated, the customer has to pay the full debit balances.

The Defendant

[20] In her statement of defence the defendant denied that she had signed the line of credit agreements. That defence would appear to have been abandoned prior to trial. In the statement of defence the defendant denied receipt of any money from the plaintiff. She further denied that she wrote any cheques against the two line of credit. Neither of these further defences was strenuously advanced at trial. Further, there was no suggestion of unconscionability, lack of independent legal advice or other equitable ground upon which the defendant's obligation could be avoided.

[21] Rather, at trial the position of the defendant was that she never agreed to incur any liability to the plaintiff in excess of the $300,000 total credit limit provided by the two line of credit agreements. In particular, she did not authorize the bank to advance funds in excess of

$300,000 pursuant to the agreements nor did she authorize the bank to charge back against the accounts deposited cheques that might have been returned NSF.

[22] Additionally, defence counsel submitted that there was a duty imposed on the bank to verify the validity of the deposits before paying cheques on the line of credit accounts that would exceed the credit limit of those accounts in the event that the deposited cheques were returned NSF. He pointed out that the bank make no effort to determine whether funds were available to pay the cheques that were deposited into the accounts from time to time, against which deposits further cheques were drawn on the account. Defence counsel also argued that there was nothing in the line of credit agreements (which were drafted by the bank) that authorized debits to be charged against the accounts where deposited cheques were returned NSF.

2004 CanLII 8031 (ON SC)

ISSUES AND ANALYSIS

[23] In light of the positions advanced by the parties, the plaintiff's entitlement to recover the amount claimed from the defendant raises three issues, as follows:

1. Was the plaintiff entitled to debit the defendant's line of credit accounts when the deposited cheques were returned NSF?

2. Under the terms of line of credit agreement, was the defendant's liability limited to the total amounts of the credit limits?

3. Based on the terms of the agreements and applying the principle of contra proferentem, is the defendant obliged to repay any deficiencies?

[24] I will deal with each of these issues in turn.

Issue 1 - Was the plaintiff entitled to debit the defendant's line of credit accounts when the deposited cheques were returned NSF?

[25] The law in relation to this topic is summarized by M.H. Ogilvie in Canadian Banking Law, 2nd ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1998) as follows (at pp. 631-632):

> Once a cheque has been dishonoured, the collecting bank is entitled to reverse the provisional credit in its customer's account. Today, provision for reversal of a provisional credit is normally made in the banker and customer contract; this common law right has long been established in England although, quite remarkably, less well so in Canada where it has only been clearly accepted since the mid-1970s. Normally, the bank will have recourse to reversal of a provisional credit where the account of a customer has sufficient funds, but where the account is in overdraft or reversal of the provisional credit does not yield the full amount of the dishonoured cheque, the bank still has enforceable rights in relation to the > cheque. The bank may either enforce such rights against the drawer of the cheque or other parties liable on it or against its own customer.

[26] In the present case, the line of credit agreements are silent on the subject of reversal of a provisional credit arising from the deposit of a cheque in the customer's account and the subsequent dishonouring of the cheque. It may be that this subject is addressed in the Agreement Governing Personal Deposit Accounts but, as I have noted, that document was not proved at trial. As Professor Ogilvie notes, however, the right to reverse a provisional credit is a common law right that is clearly accepted in Canada. See, for example, Bank of Nova Scotia v. Sharpe (1975), 57. D.L.R. (3d) 260 (B.C.C.A.) at 264.

[27] Counsel for the defendant submitted that the plaintiff had a duty to verify the validity of the cheques that were being deposited before it paid further cheques on the line of credit account that would exceed the credit limit if the deposited cheques were dishonoured. He was unable to cite any authority in support of that proposition. With the greatest of respect, it seems to me that this proposition is at odds with the law that I have summarized above, which expressly contemplates a bank providing a provisional credit to its customer's account when a third party's cheque is deposited. The effect of this submission would be to preclude banks from extending any provisional credit for deposited cheques before taking steps to confirm those cheques would be honoured. The imposition of such a requirement would, it seems to me, cause considerable inconvenience to both customer and bank. The current regime benefits the customer by making funds available at the time of the deposit, it being understood that a dishonoured deposit would be charged back to the customer.

[28] I pause to observe that there is no evidence to indicate whether, had the plaintiff bank adopted the practice of calling other banks to confirm that funds were available to cover deposited cheques, it would have been told that the cheques would not be honoured.

[29] At all material times, the bank was dealing with the defendant, through the defendant's authorized agent, Mr. Tanev. The defendant knowingly gave full signing authority on the account to her husband, and the bank was thus entitled to deal with him on her behalf. The credit that the bank extended through the line of credit accounts was extended to the defendant and the draws on that account, while carried out by Mr. Tanev, were, in effect, loans to the defendant. Similarly, the provisional credits to the accounts arising from the deposits of the cheques drawn on other banks were provisional credits in favour of the defendant. The account operated on this basis (that is, with the bank providing the customer with provisional credits and the customer's cheques being paid in reliance on that extra credit) throughout the month of January 2002. The bank could have declined to give the customer the benefit of the provisional credit until the deposited cheques had cleared, but it chose to credit the customer's account at the time of deposit. The defendant was content to enjoy the benefit of the provisional credit so long as the deposited cheques were honoured. It seems to me somehow incongruous to permit the customer to enjoy the benefits of the provisional credit arrangement while it operated in the customer's favour, and to disavow it when asked to repay the credit she enjoyed.

[30] I therefore conclude that the plaintiff bank was entitled to debit the defendant's line of credit accounts as it did when the deposited cheques were returned dishonoured, by applying the established principle of reversal of provisional credits.

Issue 2 - Under the terms of line of credit agreement was the defendant's liability limited to the total amounts of the credit limits?

[31] The result of the deposited cheques being dishonoured subsequent to the bank having paid further cheques on the line of credit accounts was that the total credit limit of $300,000 for the two accounts was substantially exceeded. Counsel for the defendant argued that his client had not authorized a borrowing on the accounts for anything greater than $300,000 and, therefore, she was not liable for the excess amount.

[32] In my opinion, the defendant's argument is not well founded. It is true that the agreements established lines of credit in favour of the defendant with specified credit limits. Pursuant to those agreements, the bank agreed to "pay the client's items, except if the debit balance of the account exceeds the credit limit or if the payment would create such an overrun." Thus, in my view, what the specified credit limits did was to place a ceiling on the customer's permissible borrowings and on the obligation of the bank to fund those borrowings. In other words, so long as the customer's cheques on the line of credit account were within the limit, the bank was obliged to honour them.

[33] Contrary to the defendant's submissions, the agreements in fact contemplated situations in which the credit limits might be exceeded. To begin with, as noted above, the bank was no longer obliged to pay the customer's cheques "if the debit balance of the account exceeds the credit limit". As well, pursuant to article 5 of the agreements, the customer was obliged to pay the bank not only interest, fees and insurance premiums charged to the account during each monthly period, but as well "any additional amount required so that the debit balance of the account does not exceed the credit limit."

[34] The foregoing provisions are difficult to reconcile with the defendant's submission that the credit limits recited in the agreements should be equated with a limit on the customer's liability to the bank. I am unable to find any language in the agreement that is capable of being construed in such a fashion nor, in my respectful view, given the context of the overall commercial relationship between the parties, would such a provision make sense. After all, this was a credit facility provided by the bank to its customer. The defendant was the customer and the primary borrower, not a guarantor. On the face of it, the funds advanced were for her benefit and her account. To quote Master Funduk in Bank of Montreal v. Ralph, [1997] A.J. No. 146 (Alberta Queen's Bench) at para. 19:

> It does not lie in the Defendant's mouth to say that the Plaintiff should not have lent her an amount in excess of the credit limit and so she is not liable for the excess. She is liable for whatever amounts she borrowed."

[35] The reality is that the total amounts debited to the accounts (either by way of cheques drawn on the accounts, interest charges or reversals of dishonoured deposits) represented funds advanced to the defendant which exceeded the limits of the credit which the bank had agreed to extend to its customer, through no fault of the bank. This is not a situation caused by any breach of duty by the plaintiff, but rather by the defendant's authorized agent depositing cheques that he knew were bad, and writing further cheques in reliance on the provisional credit granted by the bank, with a view to borrowing more money than the bank had agreed to lend. In light of these facts it would, in my respectful view, be nonsensical to construe the credit limits as, in effect, a limitation on the extent of the borrower's liability.

[36] I would therefore not give effect to this defence.

Issue 3 - Based on the terms of the agreements and applying the principle of contra proferentem, is the defendant obliged to repay any deficiencies?

[37] Pursuant to article 4 of the line of credit agreements "all amounts charged to the account, including fees in effect at the bank for the handling of such account as well as insurance premiums, if applicable, are considered advances made by the bank to the client; the client must repay such advances in the manner provided for herein." Article 7 of the agreements provided "the bank may terminate the line of credit upon re-evaluation of the client's financial situation or if the client becomes insolvent or does not fulfill his obligations to the bank hereunder or otherwise." Article 8 of the agreements provided: "When the line of credit expires, the client must pay to the bank forthwith the debit balance of the account with interest …."

[38] It was the position of the plaintiff that, read collectively, the foregoing provisions imposed an obligation on the defendant to repay the full debit balance, together with interest. The plaintiff argued that the lines of credit were terminated when the bank "froze" the accounts when the cheque-kiting scheme came to light.

[39] In my opinion, the debits to the accounts to reverse the provisional credits given upon the initial deposit of the (subsequently) dishonoured cheques were proper and in accordance with the legal principles that I have discussed earlier. It follows that they were proper "amounts charged to the account".

[40] It seems logical to interpret the bank's actions in the face of the discovery of the cheque-kiting scheme and the significant overages arising from the dishonoured cheques, to amount to a termination of the lines of credit, as contemplated by article 7 of the agreements. It follows that the defendant, as the customer, was obliged pursuant to article 8 to pay to the bank the debit balance of the accounts. Any other interpretation of the agreements or the defendant's obligations, in my respectful view, would make no commercial sense and would, in effect, ignore the reality that the defendant's total borrowings from the bank exceeded $528,000, of which she has repaid only $300,000.

2004 CanLII 8031 (ON SC)

[41] With respect to the defendant's submission that the principle of contra proferentem should be applied in the present case, counsel for the defendant relied upon the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Manulife Bank of Canada v. Conlin, [1996] 3 S.C.R. 415. That case, however, concerned a guarantee given by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff bank. The Supreme Court applied the principle of contra proferentem and concluded that any ambiguity in the guarantee should be construed against the bank as the party that drew it. In my view, the Manulife case is distinguishable from the present one on two grounds. Firstly, the liability of the defendant in the present case is not founded upon a guarantee of the obligations of another party; rather she is being sued as a principal debtor for a debit balance in her own account. Thus, she does not enjoy the favoured position of a surety. Secondly, and more importantly, I do not find any ambiguity in the language of the line of credit agreement that would operate to release the customer from her obligations to the bank.

[42] I would therefore not give effect to this submission.

CONCLUSION

[43] For the foregoing reasons I have concluded that the defendant is liable to pay the plaintiff the full debit balance of the line of credit accounts. To date she has paid $300,000, plus accrued interest on the mortgage. As I understand the plaintiff's claim, it seeks to recover the remaining deficiency, totalling $228,011.68, plus accrued interest since the date of the mortgage repayment. The calculation submitted to me indicates that additional interest to December 9, 2003 amounted to $11,300.63. Assuming that there is no dispute with respect to that interest calculation, the plaintiff shall recover judgment against the defendant for the total sum of $239,312.31 on account of outstanding principal and interest.

[44] If the parties disagree with respect to the interest calculation they should make arrangements to file written submissions concerning this point within the next 15 days.

[45] With respect to costs, if the parties are unable to resolve this issue, they should make written submissions on that point subsequent to the determination of the interest question (i.e. once the total recovery for principal and interest is fixed). The timetable and procedure for doing so will be as follows:

(a) plaintiff's submission due fifteen (15) days after final determination of total quantum of the judgment;

(b) defendant's response due within ten (10) days thereafter;

(c) plaintiff's reply, if any, due within five (5) days thereafter.

Rather than each party filing these documents individually with the court, I direct the plaintiff to collect and assemble into a single brief all submissions relating to costs and to file them with my assistant so that I may receive them all at once.

Judgment: March 16, 2007
Docket: 2004-2723(IT)G

Counsel: Jack Anderson, for Appellant
Susan Wong, for Respondent

M.A. Mogan D.J.*:

1 The Appellant filed income tax returns for the years 1996, 1997, 1998, 1999 and 2000 reporting net income in the range of $6,000 to $20,000 for the first four years and net income of $55,000 for the year 2000. During that five-year period, the Appellant obtained through unlawful means approximately $602,000 from HSBC Bank Canada ("HSBC"). By Notices of Assessment dated February 19, 2003, the Minister of National Revenue (the "Minister") added to the Appellant's reported income for the five years 1996 - 2000 significant amounts relating to the amounts which the Appellant had obtained from HSBC. The Appellant has appealed from the reassessments for those five years.

2 There are two principal issues in these appeals. First, did the money unlawfully obtained from HSBC have the character of income in the hands of the Appellant? And second, is the Minister permitted to reassess the taxation years 1996, 1997 and 1998 after the normal reassessment period as defined in subsection 152(3.1) of the Income Tax Act (the "Act")? Those first three years are commonly referred to as "statute-barred years". At the commencement of the hearing, counsel for the parties filed as Exhibit 1 an Agreed Statement of Facts comprising 10 paragraphs which are set out below.

> 1. At all material times, the Appellant sold life insurance policies on a commission basis.
> 2. The Appellant had previously worked in banking, first with Lloyds Bank, then with the Bank of Montreal, and lastly with HSBC, which was formerly known as the Bank of British Columbia;
>
> 3. At all material times the Appellant had two accounts at HSBC;
>
> 4. From 1993 to 2000, the Appellant engaged in a "kiting" scheme in which he would typically write a cheque from one account with insufficient funds and deposit the cheque into his second account to cover the outstanding payments against the second account. Prior to the cheque clearing, the Appellant would write a cheque from the second account to cover the overdraft created in the first account;
>
> 5. By June 27, 2000, the Appellant was indebted to HSBC for $659,877.27;
> 6. On June 8, 2001, HSBC obtained judgment against the Appellant in the Supreme Court of British Columbia for the full amount of the indebtedness, plus interest from and after June 22, 2000;

7. The Appellant also engaged in the practice of purchasing life insurance policies for himself and his family in order to receive sales commissions which would initially exceed premiums initially paid by him;

8. The Appellant was subsequently charged criminally for his actions against HSBC;

9. The Appellant was convicted of these criminal charges; and

10. On February 19, 2003, the Minister of National Revenue reassessed the Appellant for unreported income from the "kiting" scheme totalling $367,526.00 for the 1996, 1997, 1998, 1999 and 2000 taxation years.

3 The Appellant was born in the U.K. in 1940. He started working at Lloyds Bank in 1957 and continued there until 1970 when he and his wife moved to Canadafor greater opportunities. He worked briefly for the Bank of Montreal (1970-72) and then with the Bank of British Columbia (which later became HSBC) from 1972-1983. He was required to leave his employment at HSBC in 1983 because he had placed a second mortgage on his home without informing HSBC when it held the first mortgage. In 1983, he decided to sell life insurance and, after the necessary qualifications, was sponsored by North American Life Insurance Co.

4 Although the Appellant lost his house through foreclosure in 1985 and was forced to declare personal bankruptcy in 1986, North American Life continued to sponsor him because of his early success in the life insurance business. The Appellant's financial problem in the late 1980s and early 1990s arose from the fact that his commission cheques from North American Life were irregular but his cost of living - maintaining his family - was constant on a week-by-week basis.

5 North American Life would issue a commission cheque each week if there was money in the Appellant's account but, if he finalized the sale of a life policy in a particular week, it could take two or three months to be paid his commission on that policy because medical examinations, blood tests, doctors' reports, etc. were required before an underwriting decision was made by the Company. Accordingly, if there were some weeks when the Appellant did not sell a life policy, there would be weeks when he was not paid any commission. By 1993, the Appellant had two financial problems. He was not receiving a commission cheque every week from North American Life to help meet his weekly cost of living. Also, he was not earning enough to maintain his standard of living

6 To overcome his 1993 financial problems, the Appellant embarked upon two programs which, by June 2000, brought him financial ruin. In the first program, he engaged in a "kiting" scheme. In the second program, he started selling life insurance policies to himself and members of his family. I will consider first the kiting scheme. At the HSBC branch in Campbell River, BC, the Appellant had account number [Number Omitted-150] in his own name. I will hereafter refer to this account as "150". At the same HSBC branch, account number [Number Omitted-170] was in the joint names of the Appellant and his wife, Rona Peek. I will hereafter refer to this joint account as "170". The Appellant regarded 150 as his savings account and 170 as his chequing account. It was the kiting of cheques between 150 and 170 which caused him to be charged criminally for his actions against HSBC.

7 As I understand the evidence, the Appellant would write a cheque to himself drawn on 150 and deposit that cheque through an automated banking machine ("ABM") in 170 to cover outstanding payments from 170 without having funds in 150 to cover the cheque. He would repeat the process the following day by writing a cheque drawn on 170 and depositing it through an ABM to cover the overdraft in 150 created the previous day. Due to the one day delay in clearing cheques deposited through an ABM, he was able to keep 150 and 170 in a credit balance as far as HSBC records showed but, in actual fact, his own records showed an overdraft in each account. On many days, he would have to write more than one cheque on each account in order to create a credit balance in the HSBC records.

8 Exhibit R-1, Tab 28, contains page 4 of the monthly statement for account 150 as at January 19, 2000 showing transactions from December 30, 1999 to January 4, 2000. The same exhibit also contains pages 3 and 4 of the monthly statement for account 170 as at January 21, 2000 showing transactions from December 30, 1999 to January 5, 2000. These two extracts from the monthly statements for 150 and 170 over the December 31, 1999 year end show how the Appellant kited cheques between the two accounts to create a credit balance in the HSBC records. For example, on December 31, he deposited in 150 through ABMs the following three cheques drawn on 170:

December 31	$85,790.09
December 31	84,701.25
December 31	78,335.72
Total	$248,827.06

The monthly statement for 170 shows that these three cheques were not charged to 170 until January 4, 2000.

9 Also, on December 31, the Appellant deposited in 170 through ABMs the following five cheques drawn on 150:

December 31	$71,567.90
December 31	76,891.42
December 31	83,460.17
December 31	79,840.55
December 31	78,654.38
Total	$390,414.42

Page 4 of the monthly statement for 150 in Exhibit R-1, Tab 28 has only one entry after December 31, 1999; and so it does not show the above five cheques being charged to 150. I note, however, in Exhibit R-1, Tab 29, that the Revenue Canada auditor (Mr. B. Anderson) has listed the above five cheques plus the three cheques listed in paragraph 8 as the eight cheques which the Appellant kited over the year end of December 31, 1999 in order to keep 150 and 170 out of an overdraft position.

10 The aggregate of the three cheques listed in paragraph 8 plus the five cheques listed in paragraph 9 is $639,241. That is a staggering amount of money to be floating like a "kite" between 150 and 170 on New Year's Eve 1999 when one considers the relative impecuniosity of the Appellant reporting net income of only $29,000 in 1999. HSBC finally noticed the unusual activity in the two accounts 150 and 170. After interviewing the Appellant, the Bank determined that there was a kiting operation. On June 21, 2000, the Appellant's banking card was blocked and the two accounts 150 and 170 were frozen, preventing him from depositing any further cheques. When the outstanding kited cheques were finally processed, the Appellant owed the Bank $657,985.76 as at June 21, 2000.

11 One of the Respondent's witnesses was John K. Paterson, Corporate Security Manager at HSBC. He was involved in the Bank's investigation of the Appellant's kiting operating. He identified his memorandum dated June 28, 2000 at Exhibit R-1, Tab 24. In that memorandum, he summarized the Appellant's kiting operation as follows under the heading "Methodology":

> Essentially it can be seen that Peek deposited cheques through the ABM machines at the above noted Credit Unions for deposit to his HSBC accounts. There is a one day delay in the clearing of the cheques and this afforded him the opportunity to write a cheque on account [Number Omitted029] for say $50.00 and deposit it via ABM for credit to account [Number Omitted665] As account 029 had no funds, he would write a cheque on 665 in a slightly higher amount - say $60.00 for deposit to 029 to cover the $50.00 cheque plus provide a small extra balance (which would be the "profit" that he would subsequently remove as stolen funds). He would then write a cheque on 029 for a higher amount again - say $70.00 to cover the $60.00 cheque and so it would go. At the time of discovery, he was writing 5 cheques a day against one account - all in amounts of $75,000 to $85,000 and overlying them with a similar number of cheques on the other account for slightly increased amounts. The essence of the kite can therefore be seen to be writing cheques on an account for which there are no funds but prior to the cheques clearing and being debited to that account, a deposit is made sufficient to cover them. There is no "real" money belonging to Peek at all and he simply creates the illusion of real money through the above manipulation.

12 Referring to numbers 5 through 9 of the Agreed Statement of Facts set out in paragraph 2 above, HSBC sued the Appellant and obtained judgment against him in the British Columbia Court for approximately $659,000 plus interest from June 22, 2000; criminal charges were laid against him with respect to his kiting operation and he was convicted of those charges. In paragraph 6 above, I refer to the two programs which the Appellant commenced in 1993 and which brought him financial ruin. The second program was selling life insurance policies to himself and members of his family.

13 The Appellant explained that upon the sale of certain life policies, the commission he would earn over a few months would easily exceed the cost of monthly premiums over the first two years. The downside of such life policies was that, if a particular policy was not maintained for a minimum period like four years, the insurance company would reclaim from the salesperson any commission received on the sale of that policy. In 1993, the financial pressure on the Appellant was such that he decided to sell such policies to himself on his own life and to members of his family in order to receive commissions notwithstanding the downside. In a statement prepared for the British Columbia Court in December 2001 (Exhibit R-1, Tab 32), the Appellant described his life insurance program as follows:

> ... I wrote a small policy on my own life (no medical requirements) on which the company would pay me on an annualized premium basis, as they always did on life insurance sales. This means that for one monthly premium deposit, they would assume that during the first year of the policy all subsequent premiums are paid. The agent therefore was paid "up front" at around 70% of annual premium, plus bonus of another 100% (this varied) of the commission. In short, for an initial outlay of $100, for example, I would 'earn' almost $1700. This sounds very lucrative, until you realize that premiums have to continue in order to maintain the policy and eventually payments will far exceed commissions earned. Nevertheless, I did this several more times over the next two years during slow months and in the absence of overdraft facilities. This must seem very foolish to an outsider, as it wasn't long before this got out of hand with monthly insurance premiums well over $1000. I couldn't cancel the policies as the insurer had a 4 year chargeback restriction in place, whereby agents lose most of the commissions earned, especially in the first two years.

14 Exhibit R-1, Tabs 19, 20 and 29 demonstrate how the Revenue Canada auditor (Brad Anderson) deducted annual premiums paid by the Appellant for life insurance policies on his own life and other members of his family from amounts which the Appellant "earned" each year through his cheque kiting operation. According to Tab 20, the Appellant had about 25 life policies on his family in 1996 for which he paid aggregate premiums of $79,609. The number of family policies began to decline after 1996 when he allowed the older policies to lapse after they had been in effect for five years to secure his sales commissions (no reclaiming by the company!).

15 Tab 29 shows the amounts earned by the Appellant through his cheque kiting operation. The amount "earned" in a particular year was the amount by which the overdrafts in 150 and 170 at the end of that year exceeded the comparable overdrafts at the end of the preceding year. Tab 20 shows the total premiums paid by the Appellant each year on family life policies. Tab 19 shows how Mr. Anderson deducted the total premiums paid each year from the cheque kiting profit for each year to arrive at amounts identified as "unreported income". And, in Tab 18, the Appellant has confirmed in writing his agreement with Mr. Anderson's computation of the amounts which Revenue Canada regards as unreported income for the years 1996 to 2000 being the years under appeal.

16 In Exhibit R-2, Mr. Anderson summarized his method of computing the Appellant's net unreported income according to Revenue Canada. Set out below are the relevant parts of Exhibit R-2.

Year	Net Reported Income	Income from cheque kiting	Insurance premiums deducted	Net unreported income
1996	$6,000	$158,143	$79,609	$78,534
1997	18,000	177,367	74,949	102,418
1998	20,000	129,443	62,638	66,805
1999	16,000	118,347	16,940	101,407
2000	55,000	18,762	400	18,362
Totals	$115,000	$602,062	$234,536	$367,526

The amounts in the right-hand column under the heading "Net Unreported Income" are the amounts which were added to the Appellant's reported income for the respective years under appeal. See Exhibit R-1, Tabs 12 to 16 inclusive.

The Issues

17 The primary issue is whether the money unlawfully obtained from HSBC had the character of income in the hands of the Appellant. In argument, I asked Appellant's counsel if the Appellant had only one business (i.e. selling life insurance) for which the kiting of cheques was an integral part; or if his cheque kiting operation was separate from his business of selling life insurance. Counsel replied that he thought that the two operations were integrated because the banking for both was done through the same bank (HSBC). Indeed, both operations were conducted through the same two accounts at only one branch of HSBC.

18 There is extrinsic evidence that the two operations were integrated. According to Exhibit R-1, Tab 20, the annual premiums paid on the family life policies in the three statute-barred years were:

1996	$79,609
1998	62,638

In each of those years, the Appellant reported very modest income of $20,000 or less. Therefore, the Appellant could not have paid those high annual premiums on the family life policies (required to secure his retaining the commissions earned on the sale of such policies) unless he kited cheques from 150 (his savings account) to 170 (his chequing account) to pay those premiums. I find as a fact that the cheque kiting operation was an integral part of the Appellant's life insurance business.

19 In the circumstances of this case, the kiting of cheques by the Appellant was a fraudulent act because HSBC was induced to honour bona fide cheques issued to third parties (i.e. North American Life) believing that the Appellant had his own funds on deposit to support such third party cheques. The funds which appeared to be on deposit in account 170 (the chequing account) were drawn by the Appellant from account 150 (the savings account) using one or more kited cheques when the Appellant knew that he did not have sufficient funds of his own in 150 to cover the kited cheques.

20 In paragraphs 8 and 9 above, I refer to Exhibit R-1, Tab 28 to show that the Appellant had eight kited cheques "in the air" over December 31, 1999; and the aggregate face value of those cheques was $639,241. Also, Mr. Paterson's memorandum (Exhibit R-1, Tab 24) states that when the Bank closed down accounts 150 and 170 in June 2000, the Appellant was writing five cheques a day on each account, and that all cheques were in the range of $80,000. This was a constant, daily operation juggling significant amounts of money to deceive HSBC.

21 The law is well settled that money obtained by fraud may be income in the hands of the wrongdoer. In R. v. Poynton (1972), 72 D.T.C. 6329 (Ont. C.A.), the Ontario Court of Appeal convicted an employee of income tax evasion when he obtained money from his employer by fraud and failed to report it as income. In Buckman v. Minister of National Revenue (1991), 91 D.T.C. 1249 (T.C.C.), the taxpayer was a lawyer convicted of fraud for having embezzled money (approximately $520,000) from his clients. When Revenue Canadaincluded the embezzled amounts in Mr. Buckman's income for 1983, 1984 and 1985, he appealed claiming that the embezzled funds were not income but money borrowed from his clients. When dismissing Mr. Buckman's appeal, Sobier J. stated at paragraphs 30 and 31:

> The Appellant received the money, appropriated it unto himself and used and enjoyed it for his own benefit. It was never treated by him as a loan. There was no intention to repay the Funds. Mr. Buckman was engaged in an on-going, long term scheme to steal from his clients. In reality, he intended to hold the Funds for his own account and did so in fact.
> The number of misappropriations and the methods employed by the Appellant had all the earmarks of a business. He took risks in stealing the Funds and being found out. His reward however, was his hope of escaping detection and keeping the Funds for his own use. There is no difference whether the thief acted as a solicitor, agent or employee. The fact that the Funds are to be treated as income flows from the realities of the situation. Paraphrasing Evans, J.A. in Poynton: What is being sought to be taxed didn't accrue to Mr. Buckman qua solicitor or qua mortgage broker but qua thief.

22 The Appellant's circumstances are similar to Mr. Buckman's situation. The amounts of money (approximately $650,000) which the Appellant obtained unlawfully from HSBC are substantial. The frequency of the transactions (many cheques), the magnitude of the kited cheques, and the period of time when the transactions were effected (seven years 1994 - 2000) had the earmarks of a commercial operation. The Appellant took the risk of being found out. His potential reward, however, was escaping detection. Mr. Peek's misdeeds were not those of an office boy pilfering petty cash from the till!

23 A letter dated June 30, 2000 from HSBC's lawyers to the Appellant (Exhibit A-1, Tab 1) demanded payment of the "Indebtedness". The letter used the notations Loan 258029-150 and Loan 258665-170 to identify the accounts in which the kited cheques were deposited but HSBC never regarded itself as a "lender" to the Appellant. From the moment when the kiting operation was discovered, HSBC regarded the $650,000 as money unlawfully obtained; and HSBC notified the police.

24 I have no hesitation in concluding that the money unlawfully obtained from HSBC had the character of income in the hands of the Appellant.

25 The remaining issueis whether the Minister may reassess the statute-barred years 1996, 1997 and 1998. Subsection 152(4) permits the Minister to make a reassessment "at any time" except that, after the normal reassessment period, a reassessment may be made only if the taxpayer "has made any misrepresentation that is attributable to neglect, carelessness or wilful default or has committed fraud" in filing his return. For the statute-barred years, the relevant amounts speak for themselves:

Year	Other Income	Profit from Kiting Operation
1996	$6,616	$158,143
1998	20,245	129,443

26 In each year, the profit from the kiting operation was never less than six times the Appellant's income from other sources. The Appellant claimed that he was astonished to learn in 2002 that Revenue Canada was going to include the profit from his kiting operation with his income from other sources. He may have been astonished to learn that fact in 2002 but, during 1996, 1997 and 1998, the Appellant knew year-by-year that the financial benefits he was achieving each year from his extensive kiting operation far exceeded his income from other sources.

27 Having regard to the Appellant's experience and sophistication from working 26 years in banking (1957 to 1983), and having regard to the very substantial number of cheques which were kited on a daily basis in the years 1996, 1997 and 1998, the Appellant's failure to report any profit from his kiting operation in those years was a misrepresentation attributable to neglect or carelessness. And if he had reflected upon his standard of living with respect to his modest income from other sources, his failure to report such profit would have been attributable to wilful default. The appeals for all five years are dismissed, with costs.

Appeals dismissed.

P. & O. STEAM NAV. CO., LTD. v. EASTERN SHIPPING CO., LTD. AND QUAH BENG KEE

Lord Wrenbury

The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. were owners of a wharf at Belawan in Sumatra. They granted to the Eastern Shipping Co. a right to berth their ships at the wharf upon terms which included terms that the latter should pay 100 guilders a day for every day of 24 hours, and that all damages which might be brought about by the berthing of their steamers at the wharf should be made good by them. Quah Beng Kee was managing director of the Eastern Shipping Co. Slot and Co. were the shipping agents of that company. Beng Kee, who had control of the business of the Eastern Shipping Co. and was entitled, as managing director, to berth at the wharf ships of the Eastern Shipping Co., appointed Slot and Co. as his own agents at Belawan as charterer of a ship called the "Kamakata Maru," and instructed them to berth that ship at the wharf in question. The "Kamakata Maru" was a ship in which Beng Kee was, and the Eastern Shipping Co. were not, in any way interested. Beng Kee's instructions to berth this ship at the wharf were wholly unauthorized and were in breach of his duty to the Eastern Shipping Co. Owing to unskilful unloading excessive weight was put upon the wharf and it collapsed. Damage was thus occasioned which the P. & O. Co. were under their grant to the Eastern Shipping Co. entitled to recover. They brought their action against the Eastern Shipping Co.; the latter brought in Beng Kee under third party procedure and obtained an order on January 6, 1919, to the effect that Beng Kee should be at liberty to defend and to appear at the trial and should be bound by the judgment and that he might raise points of defence not raised by the Eastern Shipping Co. and that he should deliver his defence to the claim for indemnity raised by the Eastern Shipping Co., and that the question of his liability to indemnify should be tried at or immediately after the trial of the action.

Beng Kee appeared and pleaded and appeared at the trial of the action and in his presence the P. & O. Co. established their case and recovered damages to the extent of $79,860. The trial Judge found that the acts of Beng Kee were within the apparent scope of Beng Kee's authority, and upon that ground held the Eastern Shipping Co. to be liable and he reached the same conclusion upon another ground, namely, that by a letter of August 28, 1918, the Eastern Shipping Co. had ratified and accepted responsibility for the acts of Beng Kee in the matter. This was a letter signed "H. Oxenham, Manager." The trial Judge found as a fact that this was in reality Beng Kee's letter written and sent by H. Oxenham by his instructions. The result of that letter was that Beng Kee thereby raised an additional ground for throwing upon his principals a burden which Beng Kee ought himself to have discharged.

After trial of the action the trial Judge proceeded to try the third party issues, and upon the evidence arrived at findings which are summarized in the appellants' case as follows:

(7) That instructions to use the wharf purported to be given by Quah Beng Kee as managing director of the defendant company;

(8) That the instructions for the berthing were given by Quah Beng Kee in his own interest, and not in the interest of the defendant company;

(9) That Quah Beng Kee stood in a fiduciary relationship to the defendant company; and

(10) That he unjustifiably used his position in the defendant company for his own benefit and so was guilty of a clear breach of duty towards them.

These findings were justified by the evidence and are binding upon the parties.

The trial Judge, however, found that the defendants, the Eastern Shipping Co., had no right of indemnity against Quah Beng Kee, and inasmuch as under third party procedure relief can be given against a third party only in cases where the defendant has against the third party a direct right of indemnity, the proceedings against Quah Beng Kee failed.

An appeal from this order was dismissed with costs.

It was not disputed before their Lordships that in proceedings otherwise constituted Quah Beng Kee on the above findings would have been liable. The present appeal by the Eastern Shipping Co. is of the greater importance to the parties by reason of the fact that an action by the Eastern Shipping Co. against Beng Kee for damages is now barred by The Statute of Limitations, and unless he can be made liable in these proceedings his liability cannot be enforced at all.

The question for discussion is therefore whether upon the facts stated the appellants have as against Beng Kee a right of indemnity. There is no other question.

A right to indemnity generally arises from contract express or implied, but it is not confined to cases of contract. A right to indemnity exists where the relation between the parties is such that either in law or in equity there is an obligation upon the one party to indemnify the other. There are, for instance,

P.C.
1923

P. & O. STEAM NAV. CO., LTD. v. EASTERN SHIPPING CO., LTD. AND QUAH BENG KEE

cases in which the state of circumstances is such that the law attaches a legal or equitable duty to indemnify arising from an assumed promise by a person to do that which, under the circumstances, he ought to do. The right to indemnity need not arise by contract, it may (to give other instances) arise by statute; it may arise upon the notion of a request made under circumstances from which the law implies that the common intention is that the party requested shall be indemnified by the party requesting him; it may arise (to use Lord Eldon's words in Waring v. Ward, 7 Ves. Jun., 332, at p. 336, a case of vendor and purchaser) in cases in which the Court will "independent of contract raise upon his [the purchaser's] conscience an obligation to indemnify the vendor against the personal obligation" of the vendor. These considerations were all dealt with by the Lord Justices in Birmingham Land Co. v. L. & N.W. Ry., 34 Ch. D. 261, 56 L.J. Ch. 956.

The question of indemnity commonly arises in the case in which a trustee claims to be indemnified by his cesui que trust. This class of case was particularly discussed by Lord Lindley in Hardoon v. Belilios [1901] A.C. 118, 70 L.J.P.C. 9. The present case is converse. The cestui que trust is here claiming to be indemnified by the trustee. Beng Kee has been found to stand in fiduciary relation to the Eastern Shipping Co. and the latter claim indemnity from him in respect of liability imposed upon them by his abuse of powers in the exercise of which he owed them a duty and was responsible as a trustee of those powers. He was not a trustee in the full sense of that word. No property was vested in him. But he was a trustee of his powers in the sense that they were vested in him in such manner that he stood in a fiduciary relation to the company in respect of his exercise of those powers. The nearest simile that was put in argument was that of a trustee in the fullest sense of the word who abuses his powers; say, the trustee of real estate with power to mortgage who mortgages for his own benefit and in breach of his duty as trustee and puts the mortgage money into his own pocket. In such a case an action would lie in the Chancery Division for a declaration that the defendant was guilty of breach of trust and was liable to indemnify the cestui que trust against the mortgage and for an order that he do redeem the mortgaged property and indemnify the cestui que trust against the mortgage debt.

In the present case, suppose that it would have taken, say, a month to discharge the "Kamakata Maru" at the wharf and that the Eastern Shipping Co. had learned, say, three days after the ship was berthed that the breach of duty had been committed, an action would have lain to restrain the defendant from continuing the ship at the berth and for an order that he do indemnify the plaintiffs against the three days' rental that had been incurred.

In their Lordships' opinion these results follow from the following considerations. If Beng Kee as managing director had been granting to a third party the right to berth a ship at the wharf it would have been his duty to his principals to stipulate that the third party should accept the burden which would be cast upon his principals by the user of the wharf. What happened was that Beng Kee as managing director gave to himself, as charterer of the ship, the user of the wharf. He cannot be heard to say that in so doing he did not, as managing director, require from himself as charterer of the ship the same promise as that which it would have been his duty to require from a third party, viz., a promise that he would indemnify his principals against the consequences of his act. In other words, the relations between the parties was such that the law implies the promise which it was his duty to make and from this arises a right of indemnity. Upon these grounds their Lordships are of opinion that this appeal succeeds.

There should be a declaration that Quah Beng Kee is liable to indemnify the Eastern Shipping Co. against or to repay to them the damages awarded to the P. & O. Co. by the order made in the action as well as all costs ordered to be paid by them in the several orders for costs made in the action and in the third party proceedings and is liable to pay to the Eastern Shipping Co. the costs incurred by them in the action and in the third party proceedings, the costs incurred by them in the action to be taxed as between solicitor and client, but having regard to the fact that they are payable by the third party, and an order to give effect to that declaration. The respondent must pay the costs of this appeal.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Introduction

[1] When a guarantor, not yet found liable on his guarantee, claims against a co-guarantor who has made a proposal in bankruptcy and the claim is denied as offending the "rule against double proofs", can the guarantor pursue the co-guarantor successfully after the proposal has been accepted?

Facts

[2] In 1990, the respondent, Peters, and the appellant, Remington, pursuant to separate guarantees, each guaranteed the same loan from Metropolitan Trust Company of Canada (Met Trust) in the sum of $1,250.000.00. They both agreed to indemnify each other for 50 percent of the guarantees and all damages, liabilities, costs, charges and expenses incurred in connection with the guarantees, pursuant to a written indemnity agreement.

[3] In 1993, after default on the loan, Met Trust commenced an action against Peters and Remington based on the guarantees. Summary judgment was awarded against Remington. Peters vigorously defended the action and consequent interest and costs increased the overall debt owed to Met Trust.

[4] On April 24, 1996, Remington lodged a formal Proposal under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended (BIA), with BDO Dunwoody Ltd. as the trustee named in the Proposal (the Trustee).

[5] Met Trust filed a Proof of Claim in the Proposal dated May 10, 1996, which was accepted by the Trustee as a provable claim. Peters filed a Proof of Claim dated May 13, 1996 in the Proposal which was disallowed by the Trustee as a duplication of the Met Trust claim on May 21, 1996. On appeal, this decision of the Trustee was upheld by Bankruptcy Registrar Laycock. A further appeal to Paperny, J., (as she then was) was dismissed. Neither provided additional reasons.

[6] The Proposal under the BIA was approved by all creditors on August 12, 1996, and approved by the Bankruptcy Court August 27, 1996. The distribution to creditors did not include Peters. Met Trust received a dividend of $189,961.39 under the Proposal. Remington received a Certificate of Full Performance of Proposal November 5, 1996.

[7] On April 21, 1997, Peters negotiated a settlement with Met Trust by paying $600,000 and receiving an assignment of Met Trust's security.

[8] On September 18, 1997, Peters commenced this action in which he demanded payment from Remington under the indemnity agreement for his share as a co-guarantor.

2004 ABCA 5 (CanLII)

Decision of the Trial Judge (2001), 291 A.R. 189; 2001 ABQB 584

[9] A summary trial determined whether Peters' claim under the indemnity agreement survived the Proposal under the BIA. The trial judge's decision did not address the issue of res judicata, but rather, considered anew whether Peters' claim survived Remington's Proposal. Peters was therefore permitted to pursue his claim against Remington despite Remington having obtained an Order of Discharge under the BIA. The trial judge gave judgment for $205,019.30, representing one-half of the actual settlement with Met Trust, after deducting the dividend, and deferred the issue of damages, liabilities, charges and expenses in connection with the guarantees for further argument.

Summary

[10] This appeal can be determined on the basis that the issue of Peters' claim was res judicata before the trial judge. His claim was dismissed by the Bankruptcy Court as not provable in the bankruptcy and therefore, on that basis, survives, not being a claim provable in bankruptcy. The BIA, s. 178(2) released Remington only from all claims provable in bankruptcy. It is not necessary to decide whether Peters' claim was provable in bankruptcy upon fresh examination.

Legislation

[11] The relevant subsections the BIA are:

> s. 62(2) On whom approval binding - A proposal accepted by the creditors and approved by the Court is binding on creditors in respect of;
>
> (a) all unsecured claims, and
>
> (b) the secured claims in respect of which the proposal was made but does not release the insolvent person from the debts and liabilities referred to in s. 178, unless the creditor assents thereto.
>
> 121. (1) All debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.
>
>
> ...
> S.124(1) Creditors shall prove claims - Every creditor shall prove his claim, and a creditor who does not prove his claim is not entitled to share in any distribution that may be made.

> 135. (1) The trustee shall examine every proof of claim or proof of security and the grounds therefor and may require further evidence in support of the claim or security.
>
> (1.1) The trustee shall determine whether any contingent claim or unliquidated claim is a provable claim, and, if a provable claim, the trustee shall value it, and the claim is thereafter, subject to this section, deemed to be a proved claim to the amount of its valuation.
>
> (2) The trustee may disallow, in whole or in part,
>
> (a) any claim...
>
> S. 178(2) Claims relief - Subject to subsection (1), an Order of Discharge releases the Bankrupt from all claims provable in bankruptcy.

Standard of Review

[12] Determining if res judicata applies is a question of law: Donald J. Lange, The Doctrine of Res Judicata in Canada (Toronto: Butterworths, 2000) at 12; Gibson Mining Co. v. Hartin, [1940] 2 D.L.R. 605 at 607 (B.C.C.A.). As a result, this Court must review the trial judge's decision on a standard of correctness.

Analysis

Estoppel by Res Judicata

[13] In Guarantee Trust Co. of Canada v. Bailey (1987), 77 A.R. 387 at paras. 38-41, this Court reviewed the principle of res judicata and confirmed that three requirements must be satisfied in order for the principle to apply:

> (1) that the same question has been decided;
>
> (2) that the judicial decision which is said to create the estoppel was final; and
> (3) that the parties to the judicial decision or their privies were the same persons as the parties to the proceedings in which the estoppel is raised or their privies.

[14] Even if the three prerequisites exist, the court retains discretion to refuse to give effect to estoppel per rem judicatum: Danyluk v. Ainsworth Technologies Inc., [2001] 2 S.C.R. 460.

[15] In this case, the last two requirements are not in dispute. The only issue is whether the same question has been decided: did the Trustee decide the same question that was the subject of the summary trial?

[16] Remington submitted that Peters had a provable claim but the Trustee held it was a duplication of Met Trust's claim and therefore, it was a provable claim without value.

[17] In evaluating what was decided for the purpose of res judicata, the court may look to documentation beyond the formal judgment itself: Lange, The Doctrine of Res Judicata in Canada; Maynard v. Maynard, [1951] S.C.R. 346, [1951] 1 D.L.R. 241 at 251-52, leave to appeal to Privy Council denied, [1952] 1 S.C.R. vii; and Smode v. Deveaux (1996), 216 A.R. 20 at para. 3 (C.A.).

[18] In this case, the Trustee's actions, his testimony in cross-examination and what reasons he gave in disallowing the Peters' claim support the conclusion that he determined that Peters did not have a provable claim.

[19] In the Notice of Disallowance dated May 21, 1996, the Trustee gave the following reason:

> Your claim is a duplicate of the claim being made against the estate by Metropolitan Trust Company. This claim can be advanced only by one party and to be eligible to advance a claim, you would have to pay the claim yourself.

[20] Similarly, Hall, a senior vice president of the Trustee stated in an affidavit as follows:

> I verily believed that had [Peters] discharged all or part of his obligations to Met Trust pursuant to his guarantee, he would have had a claim provable in the proposal proceedings ... Having allowed the Met Proof in full, I verily believed that allowing [Peters'] Proof would have offended the rule against double proofs.

[21] This statement clearly indicates that the Trustee's position was Peters would have had a provable claim only if he discharged all or part of his obligation to Met Trust. The Trustee did not find that Peters' claim was in fact a provable claim. Nor was the finding expressed in terms of Peters not having a provable claim.

[22] When Hall was cross-examined on his affidavit, he stated that Peters did not have a provable claim:

> Q: Sir, Mr. Peters didn't receive a dividend from the Estate of Remington, did he?
>
> A: No.
>
> Q: Was that because he did not have a provable claim?
>
> A: That's right.

[23] Section 135(1.1) of the BIA requires that "the trustee shall determine whether any contingent claim or unliquidated claim is a provable claim". There is no dispute in this case that Peters' claim was a contingent one. A contingent claim is "a claim which may or may not ever ripen into a debt, according as some future event does or does not happen": Gardner v. Newton (1916), 29 D.L.R. 276 at 281, 10 W.W.R. 51 (Man. K.B.). At the time of the Proposal, Remington did not owe a debt to Peters unless and until Peters paid Met Trust part or of all of the debt owed under the guarantee.

[24] Also pursuant to s. 135(1.1), if the trustee determines that a contingent claim is a provable claim, "the trustee shall value it". A trustee is required to value the claim only if it previously determined that the claim was provable.

[25] In this instance, the Trustee did not value Peters' claim, implying that the Trustee determined the claim was not a provable claim, even though this finding was not expressly stated by the Trustee.

[26] Consistent with the Trustee finding that Peters did not have a provable claim, as described in further detail below, the Trustee maintained throughout the bankruptcy proposal proceedings that Peters had no status to participate.

[27] As a result, the Trustee determined the same question: i.e. whether Peters' claim was provable, and the three prerequisites for res judicata have been met. What remains is whether there is any reason to exercise the discretion to relieve against the effects of estoppel by res judicata in this case.

Discretion

[28] In exercising the discretion, as stated in Danyluk at 493 quoting the Ontario Court of Appeal in Schweneke v. Ontario (2000), 47 O.R. (3d) 97, "the court must ask – is there something in the circumstances of this case such that the usual operation of the doctrine of issue estoppel would work an injustice?"

[29] The circumstances relevant to this case are described below.

Peters' Conduct in Remington's Proposal

[30] The evidence in Remington's bankruptcy file shows that Peters made numerous and vigorous efforts to be included as a creditor and to obtain status in Remington's bankruptcy proposal proceedings. Peters believed that there was more money available for Remington's creditors and that Remington was fraudulently concealing assets. Peters consistently sought to advance his claim against Remington and to challenge the bankruptcy proposal proceedings.

[31] After the Trustee disallowed Peters' claim, Peters' counsel attended a creditors' meeting on May 24, 1996, and requested a vote be taken on the Proposal. The Trustee denied the request on the basis that Peters had no status because his claim had been disallowed. Peters was not allowed to participate in any voting on the Proposal. Peters also requested that the Trustee provide notice of the next meeting. Although given informal notice, the Trustee advised he was not obliged to give formal notice because Peters had no status. Peters' counsel attended a creditor's meeting on June 11, 1996 to consider Remington's amended Proposal. Peters also requested to examine Remington under oath as contemplated in s. 52(b) or s. 163(2) of the BIA or that Met Trust examine Remington. The Trustee denied the request.

2004 ABCA 5 (CanLII)

[32] Peters took steps to appeal the disallowance of his claim. The Bankruptcy Registrar dismissed the appeal on July 23, 1996 and the further appeal to Paperny, J. was dismissed on October 22, 1996. Both the Trustee and the successor to Met Trust, Hongkong Bank Trust Company, opposed each of Peters' appeal applications.

[33] Remington's amended Proposal was approved by the creditors and by order dated August 27, 1996, the Proposal was approved by the Bankruptcy Court. Peters filed an affidavit before the Bankruptcy Court, but as stated in the order, he had no status to speak to the application for approval of the Proposal as the Trustee had disallowed his claim and the disallowance had been upheld.

Peters' Actions

[34] After the A Certificate of Full Performance of Proposal was issued on November 5, 1996 and the Trustee was discharged, Peters brought an action based on the indemnity agreement and has continued to pursue his allegations impugning the bankruptcy proceedings. On September 18, 1997, he commenced this action seeking payment from Remington for one half of the damages in settling Met Trust's claim on the guarantees.

[35] The summary trial judge granted judgment against Remington on June 26, 2001. The enforcement of the judgment was stayed but Remington was ordered to produce copies of his income tax returns and bank statements for himself personally and any professional corporations in which he had an interest, and as well, he was examined on October 9, 2002.

[36] In the first hearing of this appeal on November 7, 2002, Peters sought to adduce fresh evidence based on Remington's bank statements, income tax returns and financial statements to demonstrate that Remington acted fraudulently when estimating his income at the time of filing his Proposal. The fresh evidence application was denied and this appeal was adjourned to allow Peters to apply to annul the Proposal, the approval of the Proposal and the discharge of Remington.

[37] Peters' application to annul the bankruptcy proposal proceedings was heard by a chambers judge on June 27, 2003. Remington opposed the application and applied for a declaration that Peters lacked status. Remington submitted that Peters had no status to interfere with the bankruptcy proposal because he did not have a provable claim. Remington argued that Peters' lack of status was extant through the bankruptcy proposal proceedings and remained to the present.

[38] The chambers judge adjourned the applications pending the adjudication of this appeal.

[39] In the circumstances of this case, I find no injustice would result from the usual operation of the doctrine of estoppel or estoppel by res judicata. Remington opposed Peters' participation in the bankruptcy proposal proceedings throughout. Had Peters been included as a creditor, his claim would have been fully satisfied by reason of the Proposal and provisions of s. 178(2) the BIA. Peters was not included as a creditor in Remington's bankruptcy proposal proceedings. That status was opposed by Remington.

[40] By this Court not relieving from the operation of estoppel by res judicata, Remington is now subject to the indemnity claims of Peters. That result is not inconsistent with the policy reasons for a bankruptcy. If Remington sought to be free of Peters' claim, Remington should have supported Peters' claim as provable in the bankruptcy proposal proceedings.

Relief

[41] Although the trial judge erred in failing to apply the doctrine of res judicata and in considering the issue afresh, I would not interfere with the result of the summary trial. Therefore, the appeal is dismissed.

2017 ABCA 378 (CanLII)

The Majority:

[1] Yangarra Resources Ltd. (Yangarra) appeals the decision of a chambers judge who granted summary judgment in favour of the respondent, Precision Drilling Canada Limited Partnership (Precision). Precision brought a summary judgment application for unpaid fees for drilling three oil wells for the appellant. The appellant resisted payment on the basis of set-off and damages, alleging breach of contract, gross negligence, willful misconduct, fraudulent misrepresentation, and breach of duties of honesty and good faith. Precision was granted summary judgment. Yangarra's defence was summarily dismissed as was Yangarra's counterclaim.

Background

[2] In 2009, the parties entered into a standard form industry contract, characterized as a "knock for knock" or "no-fault" contract. Under such an agreement, each party generally bears the risk of damage to its own assets, rather than having risk allocated on the basis of fault. Provisions of the contract that purported to exclude or limit liability were put in issue as a result of the acts of Precision employees in carrying out work for Yangarra under the drilling contract.

[3] During the nightshift on December 2, 2011, a Precision employee mistakenly mixed sulfamic acid instead of caustic potash into drilling mud. For the rest of that shift and into the day shift on December 3, 2011 Precision advised Yangarra that the drilling mud was in order, when it knew or should have known it was not.

[4] On the afternoon of December 3, 2011, the drill string and bit became stuck in the hole and Precision could not extract it. It was assumed by the chambers judge, for the purpose of the summary judgment application, that the drill bit had become stuck because of the sulfamic acid in the mud. It was also conceded by Precision, for the purpose of the summary judgment application, that it failed to inform Yangarra of the mixing error until after the drill big had become stuck. Precision's attempt to extract Yangarra's equipment from the well was unsuccessful and the well was subsequently abandoned with $300,000 worth of Yangarra's equipment lost down the hole. In addition, a replacement well had to be drilled at a cost of roughly $2 million.

[5] In early 2012, Precision sued Yangerra for the work it had performed in drilling the abandoned well and for the equipment it had provided. Yangarra defended alleging that Precision breached its contractual commitment to drill the well in a good and workmanlike manner in accordance with good drilling practices. It also alleged negligence, gross negligence and that Precision's failure to warn Yangarra of the improper mixing constituted a fraudulent misrepresentation. In its prayer for relief Yangarra claimed a set-off and counterclaimed for the loss of its equipment in the original well, for the costs of drilling the replacement well, and for other associated costs.

[6] In July 2012, Precision brought its application for summary judgment against Yangarra, including summary dismissal of Yangarra's counterclaim on the basis that there was no merit to Yangarra's defence or counterclaim and no genuine issue for trial. The focus of the application was the proper interpretation of the allocation of risk and liability provisions of the contract. The determinative provisions in this respect, at least according to the courts below, were Clauses 10.3, 10.4, and 10.13, the relevant portions of which read[1]:

> 10.3. Yangarra shall at all times assume all of the risk of and be solely liable for:
>
> (a) any loss, damage to or destruction of:
>
>
> (ii) Yangarra's equipment; and
>
> (iii) the hole, reservoir or any underground formation…
>
> regardless of the negligence or other fault of Precision or howsoever arising, and Yangarra shall defend and indemnify Precision from and against any and all actions, claims, losses, costs, damages and expenses resulting therefrom and specifically releases Precision from any claims Yangarra may otherwise make in regard thereto.
>
> 10.4 Yangarra shall at all times during a drilling program assume all of the risk of and be solely liable for the cost of repairing and re-drilling a lost or damaged hole, including, without limitation, the cost of fishing operations, regardless of the negligence or other fault of Precision or howsoever arising, and Yangarra specifically releases Precision from any claims Yangarra may otherwise have in regard thereto;
>
>
> 10.13 For greater clarity, Precision and Yangarra acknowledge and agree that:
>
> (a) the purpose of this Article X [ten] is to allocate contractually between Precision and Yangarra certain of the risks, responsibilities, and potential losses or liabilities associated with the operations and activities involved in drilling a well under a drilling program; and,

[1] For clarity, "Precision" has been inserted in the following provisions in place of "Contractor" or Contractor's Group" and "Yangarra" in place of "Operator" or "Operator's Group".

> (b) such allocation shall prevail in the place and stead of any other allocation of risks, responsibilities, or potential losses or liabilities that might be made on the basis of the negligence or other fault of either party or howsoever arising or any other theory of legal liability and notwithstanding the breach or alleged breach by either party or any provision of the drilling program not included in this Article X [ten].

[7] The initial summary judgment application before the Master in late 2012 was adjourned at the request of Yangarra, who wished to gather more evidence to support its allegations that Precision had acted improperly following the initial mixing error. The proceedings did not resume until June 2015; but when they did, the Master granted Precision's summary judgment application, finding that Yangarra's set-off defence and counterclaim were barred by the exclusion of liability clauses in the contract (2015 ABQB 433). Despite the additional evidence Yangarra had collected during the two and a half years' adjournment, the Master found no evidence of conduct that would render the enforcement of exclusion of liability clauses in the contract contrary to public policy.

[8] Yangarra's appeal of that decision was unsuccessful (2016 ABQB 365). The chambers judge agreed with the Master that by its terms the contract excluded liability for the type of damage claimed by Yangarra. The chambers judge further agreed with the Master in rejecting Yangarra's argument that giving effect to the exclusion of liability clauses to relieve Precision of liability for its conduct in this case would render Precision's covenant to drill in a good and workmanlike manger meaningless. The chambers judge additionally found that gross negligence was properly excluded by the contract, but that fraud might not be excluded. In this latter respect, the chambers judge was of the view that public policy might intervene in circumstances like these to prevent parties from contracting out of fraud. But the chambers judge, like the Master, found no evidence to support Yangarra's claims of fraudulent misrepresentation. The chambers judge also determined that Yangarra's claim of dishonesty or bad faith was "simply another way of describing its complaint regarding fraudulent misrepresentation", and was consequently also without an evidentiary foundation.

[9] Yangarra appeals the decision of the chambers judge on the basis that he erred in not finding that Yangarra's claims for fraudulent misrepresentation required a trial and in applying the law regarding interpretation of exclusion clauses.

[10] For the reasons that follow, we disagree with the chambers judge that this was an appropriate case for summary judgment. In our view, there is a genuine issue requiring trial. That is, on the record before the court on the summary judgment application, it was palpable and overriding error to find that there was no evidence of fraud. We conclude that the chambers judge erred both in the conclusions he drew on the issue of fraudulent misrepresentation, and also by failing to identify and apply the proper test for fraud.

[11] We deliberately refrain from addressing the issue of contractual interpretation (i.e. – whether the contract excludes fraud) in allowing this appeal. In the event a trial judge were ultimately to determine Yangarra's allegations against Precision were excluded from the contract (which we pose merely as one possibility), we agree with the chambers judge's assessment that provisions having the effect of excluding liability for the claim in fraudulent misrepresentation may be contrary to public policy. A determination as to whether public policy would intervene in the circumstances would best be made by a trial judge on hearing evidence relevant to the issue.

Standard of Review

[12] A chambers judge's assessment of the facts based on the record before the chambers judge, the application of the law to those facts and the ultimate determination of whether summary judgment is appropriate are all reviewed for palpable and overriding error: Amack v Wishewan, 2015 ABCA 147 at para 27, 602 AR 62. Inferences drawn from the facts by a chambers judge are also assessed on the standard of palpable and overriding error: Dow Chemical Canada Inc v Shell Chemicals Canada Ltd, 2010 ABCA 126 at para 10, 477 AR 112, citing Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235.

[13] Where, however, an alleged error "can be attributed to the application of an incorrect standard, a failure to consider a required element of a legal test, or similar error in principle, such an error can be characterized as an error of law, subject to a standard of correctness": Mace v Dirk, 2006 ABCA 106 at para 20, 412 AR 207, citing Housen at para 36.

Law on Summary Judgment

[14] Rule 7.3 of the Alberta Rules of Court, Alta Reg 124/2010 allows a party to apply for summary judgment when "there is no defence to a claim or part of it" or when "there is no merit to a claim or part of it". This rule must be considered in light of Hryniak v Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, where the Supreme Court of Canada indicated that "[t]here will be no genuine issue requiring a trial when the judge is able to reach a fair and just determination on the merits on a motion for summary judgment": para 49.

[15] The so-called modern approach to summary judgment as laid out in Hryniak was confirmed by the Alberta Court of Appeal in Windsor v Canadian Pacific Railway Ltd, 2014 ABCA 108. Windsor indicates that on a summary judgment application, the appropriate question to ask is whether there is an issue of "merit" that genuinely requires a trial: para. 16; see also WP v Alberta, 2014 ABCA 404 at para 26, 378 DLR (4th) 629. A second consideration is "whether examination of the existing record can lead to an adjudication and disposition that is fair and just to both parties": Whitecourt Power Limited Partnership v Elliott Turbomachinery Canada Inc, 2015 ABCA 252 at para. 9.

[16] In McDonald v Brookfield Asset Management Inc, 2016 ABCA 375, this court provided the following useful summary as to evidential requirements in a summary dismissal application (being one form of summary judgment)[2] at paragraph 13:

> Rule 7.3 provides that an action can be summarily dismissed if there is "no merit to a claim or part of it". The onus is first on the defendant to bring forward evidence indicating an absence of merit. If that is done, the plaintiff must provide some evidence of "merit", which often involves demonstrating that there are difficult questions of fact or law that cannot fairly be resolved summarily. The plaintiff is not required, at this stage, to demonstrate that the action will succeed, or to show that there is merit on a balance of probabilities. The application for summary dismissal can successfully be resisted without proving the case to the normal civil standard.

Analysis

[17] In the first part of the analysis below, we address the finding of the chambers judge that there is no case of fraudulent misrepresentation associated with the drilling mishap. We do so by assessing the evidence in support of Yangarra's claim and by considering whether the chambers judge applied the proper test for fraud.

[18] In the second part we assume, for the purposes of the analysis, that Yangarra's claim in fraudulent misrepresentation is barred by the contract, and we consider the issue of whether public policy may require that the exclusionary provisions of the contract be given no effect if fraud were established at trial.

[19] The second part of the analysis is necessary because by overturning the summary judgment, we are allowing the matter to proceed to trial on all issues, including the issue of the interpretation of the contract's exclusionary provisions. Should the trial judge ultimately determine, as did the courts below, that the contract excludes Yangarra's claim in fraudulent misrepresentation, Yangarra may still be in a position to pursue that claim if the trial judge concludes that the exclusionary provisions of the contract are of no effect on the basis of public policy.

Fraudulent Misrepresentation

[20] The issue most strenuously argued by the appellant at the hearing of the appeal was that Precision's conduct amounted to fraudulent misrepresentation. The appellant contends that the chambers judge neither identified nor applied the proper test for fraud.

[2] See Rule 7.3; Poliquin v Devon Canada Corp, 2009 ABCA 216, at para. 9.

[21] The test for the tort of civil fraud, or fraudulent misrepresentation, was stated in the recent Supreme Court decision of Bruno Appliance and Furniture Inc v Hryniak, 2014 SCC 8 at para 21, [2014] SCR 126 and requires the plaintiff to prove:

> (a) a false representation made by the defendant;
> (b) some level of knowledge of the falsehood of the representation on the part of the defendant (whether through knowledge or recklessness) ;
> (c) the false representation caused the plaintiff to act; and
> (d) the plaintiff's actions resulted in a loss.

[22] In this case, the chambers judge at paragraph 9 of his decision adopted the following overview of facts as found by the Master – some of which were yet to be proven, but nonetheless were properly assumed in Yangarra's favour for the purpose of the summary judgement application:

> The factual record before the court
>
> Here are the facts, which emerged from the evidence, with any conflict in evidence assumed to be as stated by Yangarra:
>
> (i) during the night shift on December 2nd and early December 3rd, 2011, a recently re-hired employee of Precision, Mr. Lewis, mistakenly mixed sulfamic acid into the drilling mud of the well, instead of caustic potash, notwithstanding that the packages containing these different products were clearly marked, and notwithstanding that the physical appearance of the two products was quite different;
>
> (ii) during the rest of the night shift, and part of the day shift on December 3rd , prior to the failure of the well, employees of Precision either neglected to test or carelessly tested the drilling mud, and wrongly advised Yangarra's supervisor that the drilling mud was in order;
>
> (iii) at the beginning of the day shift on December 3rd, one of Precision's day shift employees, Mr. Power, noted the empty packages of sulfamic acid and corrected the records to reflect that it had been added to the drilling mud and not caustic potash;
>
> (iv) Precision's employees at the rig site should have advised Yangarra of the addition of the acid to the mud but failed to do so, thus robbing Yangarra of the opportunity to temporarily shut the rig down while changing out the defective mud. This is conceded by Precision for the purposes of this application notwithstanding > that Precision will, if this matter proceeds to trial, attempt to prove that a warning was given to Yangarra;

2017 ABCA 378 (CanLII)

2017 ABCA 378 (CanLII)

>
> (v) On December 3rd at approximately 1:00 P.M. the drill string and bit being used by Precision became stuck in the hole, and could not be extracted. It is assumed that the rig became stuck as a result of sulfamic acid having been added to the drilling mud;
>
> (vi) Precision attempted to extract some of Yangarra's equipment from the well, but in the end approximately $300,000 worth of Yangarra equipment was lost and had to be left in the well, which was abandoned;
>
> (vii) It may be that Precision was not successful rescuing Yangarra's equipment from the well because the weight indicator on Precision's rig was not properly calibrated, and this resulted in Precision applying less tension or force to its rig attempting to complete the extraction than could have been applied if its weight indicator had been properly calibrated;
> (viii) Precision performed some work on the drilling of a relief well but another contractor in fact completed the relief well.

[23] Particularly relevant to this analysis is that, as of about 8:30 a.m. on December 3, Precision employees were aware both that a mixing error had occurred the night before, and that the error would affect the well's mud properties. Precision conceded for the purposes of the summary judgment application that it neglected to inform Yangarra about the error until after the drill bit had become stuck. Additionally, the record suggests that the results of a number of mud tests performed by Precision—on the morning of December 3 and into early afternoon—indicate suitability for drilling, but that the mud could not, based on the mixing error, have had the properties that were reported in those tests. Such results take on particular significance in light of the chambers judge's finding that "employees of Precision either neglected to test or carelessly tested the drilling mud, and wrongly advised Yangarra's supervisor that the drilling mud was in order".

[24] Taken together, these "facts" suggest not only a failure to disclose but also active steps to deceive, or at the very least, recklessness. In addition to not informing Yangarra of the error, Precision proceeded to convey to Yangarra false information about the properties of the drilling mud. In our view, the original error not having been conveyed to Yangarra suggests, at the very least, recklessness on the part of Precision. The communication of false information about the properties of the drilling mud suggests fraud unless rebutted by an explanation which, presumably, only Precision could provide and which apparently was not forthcoming on the summary dismissal application.

[25] In sum, on the record before us, including the presumed facts as adopted by the chambers judge, our view is that it was a palpable and overriding error for the chambers judge to conclude that the allegation of fraud "was rooted only in speculation and conjecture with a mild dose of melodrama thrown in".

[26] In our view, a determination of this issue cannot suitably be made in a summary judgment application. This is a matter that requires a trial. Credibility will be a particularly important assessment, given the allegation of fraud and the various Precision witnesses who were involved in the events transpiring on the nightshift of December 2 and into the day shift of December 3 prior to the drill bit becoming stuck.

[27] With respect to the suggestion that the appellant did not put its "best foot forward" in advancing its position on the summary judgment application, we simply note that there is sufficient evidence on the record to establish that there are difficult questions of fact or law that cannot fairly be resolved summarily. We also note that this court held in McDonald v Brookfield that an application for summary dismissal can be resisted without proving the claim to the normal civil standard. This was not simply a summary judgment application. It was also an application to summarily dismiss a claim. But even on a summary judgment application there must be no merit to the defence to the claim. "No merit" means no defence which has a hope of being successful. On the record before the chambers judge, that was not the situation here.

[28] Quite apart from any error the chambers judge made with respect to his assessment of facts on the issue of fraudulent misrepresentation, his reasons also suggest he failed to consider the appropriate test for fraud. The chambers judge did not explicitly set out the test he was applying in considering the appellant's allegation of fraud, though his reasons suggest he must have had some standard in mind. In considering the fraud claim he stated that there was "no merit" to it and that there was an "absence of credible evidence to support" it. He quoted with approval the following submission from Precision's brief (at para 34 of his decision):

> Yangarra's fraud argument is based on an allegation that Precision employees "concealed" the Improper Mixing. However, there is no evidentiary basis to suggest that there was any intentional concealment, never mind fraud on the part of any Precision employee. Furthermore, while Yangarra argues that Precision employees Power and Dutkel failed to report the Improper Mixing to Yangarra and despite the obligation to "put its best foot forward", Yangarra elected not to question these witnesses. [emphasis added]

[29] The chambers judge's adoption of the word intentional suggests his understanding was that the representor (Precision) had to intend to conceal critical facts in order for the representation to be actionable. On its face, there is no such requirement in the test from Bruno, though the person making the false representation must have knowledge of its falsity or be reckless as to its truth. In fact, Bruno (para 18) references the oft-cited House of Lords decision in Derry v Peek, [1889] UKHL 1, 14 App Cas 337, where Lord Herschell states:

> [I]f fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made.

[31] In this case, we acknowledge that the chambers judge used the word intention specifically to describe or qualify concealment. However, by using that word in the absence of an articulation of the test for fraud, the chambers judge appears to have been working on the understanding that intention was a required element of the test for fraud, in which case evidence of intention to deceive would be required to prove fraud. Any such understanding would likely have set the bar too high in terms of the test Yangarra needed to meet to defend Precision's summary judgment application.

[32] In the event that intention to deceive is a necessary element of the fraud alleged in this case, it should be noted that although intention can be proven directly with evidence, often it must be inferred. Sometimes it can be inferred from a lack of evidence of a credible explanation of the concealment or false representation of the actor. The chambers judge's reasons do not appear to have considered whether it was premature to conclude there was no fraud in the absence of evidence from Precision as to why it represented to Yangarra that the drilling mud was satisfactory when it wasn't, keeping in mind that it was assumed for the purposes of the summary judgment application that Precision provided false information about the properties of the drilling mud to Yangarra.

[33] Moreover, the chambers judge does not appear to have considered recklessness as a legitimate pathway to fraud. Recklessness is properly considered an alternative which satisfies the second element of the test for fraud. Either knowledge of the falsehood of the representation or recklessness as to the truth of the representation is required. With respect to recklessness, this court noted in Motkoski Holdings Ltd v Yellowhead (County), 2010 ABCA 72 at para 58, [2010] 5 WWR 603 that:

> [I]t is sufficient if the defendant did not actually know the statement was false, so long as the statement was made recklessly. "Recklessly" in this context means that the statement was made "without caring whether it was true or false".

[3] See Singh v Trump, 2016 ONCA 747 at para 141, [2016] OJ No 5285 as well as previous articulations of test for fraudulent misrepresentation from the Alberta Court of Appeal: TWT Enterprises Ltd v Westgreen Developments (North) Ltd, 1992 ABCA 211, [1992] 5 WWR 341; Stack v Hildebrand, 2010 ABCA 108 at para 13, 477 AR 359),

2017 ABCA 378 (CanLII)

> Recklessness typically involves a person's stating information in an authoritative way without having bothered at all to find out whether the information is accurate.

[35] In Opron, Feehan, J indicated that the absence of reasonable grounds for a representor's belief may provide some evidence of recklessness: para 639. The court in Opron referenced the following statement of Lord Herschell from Derry in this regard at paragraph 639:

> The ground upon which an alleged belief was founded is a most important test of its reality…[A]lthough means of knowledge are, as was pointed out by Lord Blackburn in Brownlie v. Campbell 5 App Cas at p 952, a very different thing from knowledge, if I thought that a person making a false statement had shut his eyes to the facts, or purposely abstained from inquiring into them, I should hold that honest belief was absent, and that he was just as fraudulent as if he had knowingly stated that which was false. [emphasis added]

[36] The court in Opron also indicated that proof of recklessness is most likely dependent upon inferences from circumstances: see paras 651, 633, and 647.

[37] A consideration of the facts adopted by the chambers judge begs the question as to whether the chambers judge was alive to recklessness being a possible pathway to the second element of the test for fraud. In this respect, reference may be made to the case of Stack v Hildebrand, 2010 ABCA 108, where this court held that a chambers judge, in granting a summary dismissal motion, erred by not considering that recklessness can amount fraudulent misrepresentation.

[38] Moreover, we note that a court is permitted to make inferences with respect to the recklessness aspect of fraud and we are of the view that there was a sufficient evidentiary basis to support an inference that Precision "shut its eyes" to the potential consequences of the mixing error by reporting questionable results which indicated that the mud was in order.

[39] Therefore, in addition to finding that the chambers judge made a palpable and overriding error in concluding there was no possible fraud on the evidence before him, we conclude that the chambers judge erred by failing to identify and apply the proper test for fraud. This error resulted from the combination of the chambers judge's (1) suggestion that intention was a necessary component of the test for fraud, and (2) failure to include the element of recklessness as a possible pathway to fraud.

Exclusion of Liability for Fraud

[40] According to the chambers judge (who agreed with the Master on this point), Yangarra's claims were specifically excluded in its contract with Precision. The contract purports to release Precision from any liability associated with drilling the well resulting from "negligence or other fault of either party or howsoever arising, or from any other theory of legal liability". But even if the contract effectively barred a fraudulent misrepresentation claim (which issue we specifically refrain from making a determination on), the issue would then become one of whether the court could intervene in the name of public policy to nullify that exclusion if a party had a legitimate claim of fraud.

[41] The chambers judge was of the view that even if the parties crafted their contract to explicitly release each other from a claim based in fraud, public policy requirements may intervene to give no effect to such language. On this issue, the chambers judge referred to Roy v. Kretschmer, 2014 BCCA 429, a case where fraud occurred "during the currency of the contract" and where the court held that the wrongdoer could not hide behind an exclusion clause.

[42] The respondent argues that there is no basis for a public policy intervention because there is no public policy reason or public interest which would induce a court not to give effect to what two sophisticated parties privately agreed to. Asserting that there is no public policy reason or public interest which would induce a court not to give effect to an exclusion of liability for fraud is not the same as proving it. Such an assertion would require evidence that others are not likely to be directly and adversely affected by the consequences of relieving liability for fraud.

[43] In making the argument that there is no basis for a public policy intervention, the respondent attempts to distinguish the instant matter from Roy. Precision points out that, unlike the facts in the case at bar, Roy did not involve a no-fault contract, nor were the parties sophisticated commercial entities (unlike the case at bar). The respondent also submits that while the court has the power to decline to enforce an agreement on the basis of public policy, it will rarely do so (Tercon Contractors Ltd v. British Columbia (Transportation and Highways), 2010 SCC 4 at para 117, [2010] 1 SCR 69).

[44] We tend to agree with the chambers judge that Roy is applicable here. As mentioned, the fraudulent conduct in Roy, as was alleged in this case, occurred after the contract had been entered into. This fact distinguishes Roy from many other cases in which fraudulent conduct induced a party to enter into a contract in the first place. In Roy, the court determined that the vendor could not hide behind an exclusion clause to avoid the effect of fraudulent conduct that caused injury to the plaintiff purchaser. In coming to its decision, the court in Roy considered the Supreme Court case of Tercon, which considered circumstances in which a court will deny a party the benefit of an exclusion of liability clause that the other party agreed to. The court in Roy indicated at paragraph 70:

> In my view, the judge erred in stating that the conduct must "approach criminal behaviour of egregious fraud". In fact, Binnie J. stated that the scenarios he outlined were "but examples" and that [in Tercon at para. 118]:
> > ... the contract breaker's conduct need not rise to the level of criminality or fraud to justify a finding of abuse.

[45] We note that Binnie, J. in Tercon (whose dissent with respect to the approach to assessing the validity of exclusion clauses was adopted by the majority) also stressed that "all of the circumstances should be examined very carefully by the court" in assessing any misconduct. Here, we have serious allegations of fraud against a sophisticated business entity that promised to conduct its risky and potentially dangerous work in a good and workmanlike manner. All we can say, without deciding the matter, is that if the appellant's allegations of fraud are substantiated, it is not clear to us that public policy would not be triggered to prevent Precision from the benefit of the contract's exclusion clauses.

[46] It is important to note that the determination as to whether public policy should intervene to render the exclusion clauses unenforceable should take place after the factual record is established, at which time the trial judge will be in a position to carefully examine whether there are public policy reasons to decline to enforce the liability exclusion clauses: Tercon, para. 119. As the British Columbia Court of Appeal stated in Niedermeyer v Charlton, 2014 BCCA 165 at para. 79: "the discussion of public policy in Tercon tends to focus on the conduct of the party who seeks to rely on the exclusion clause" [emphasis in original]. A proper understanding of Precision's conduct is not possible until the trier of fact has made findings of fact on the relevant issues. We would add that the discussion of public policy may also focus on the consequences of the conduct, for which liability is excluded, on third parties.

[47] We provide no further comment on this issue except to say that the trial judge would be in the best position to assess whether the evidence with respect to the allegations of fraud would warrant the intervention of public policy in this matter.

Conclusion

[48] We allow the appeal and set aside the summary judgment in favour of the respondent.

Appeal heard on June 13, 2017

Memorandum filed at Calgary, Alberta
this 10th day of November, 2017

O'Ferrall J.A.

Veldhuis J.A.

2017 ABCA 378 (CanLII)

Paperny J.A. (dissenting):

Background

[49] I have had the benefit of reading the decision of my colleagues. For the reasons that follow, I find myself unable to agree with their conclusion and I would dismiss Yangarra Resources Ltd.'s (Yangarra) appeal.

[50] The issue before us is whether the chambers judge erred in granting summary judgment in favour of the respondent, Precision Drilling Canada Limited Partnership (Precision). Precision, a drilling contractor, sought summary judgment for its unpaid fees, pursuant to an agreement between it and Yangarra. Yangarra resisted making payment, arguing that Precision's gross negligence, willful misconduct and fraudulent misrepresentation caused damage to Yangarra, and Yangarra should be entitled to set off and damages.

[51] The action arises out of a loss sustained in 2009, when a Precision employee mistakenly mixed sulfamic acid into drilling mud instead of caustic potash. Precision employees did not, or did not carefully, test the mud, and wrongly advised Yangarra that the drilling mud was in order. It was not. For the purpose of the summary judgment application, it was conceded that Precision failed to advise Yangarra of the problem, and that Yangarra was therefore denied the opportunity to temporarily shut down the rig while changing out the defective mud. The following day the drill string and bit became stuck in the hole and Precision could not extract it. The chambers judge assumed that the rig became stuck because of the sulfamic acid in the mud. Precision attempted to extract some of Yangarra's equipment from the well but was unsuccessful. The well was abandoned and $300,000 worth of Yangarra's equipment was lost. A replacement well had to be drilled at a cost of $2 million.

[52] In 2012, Precision sued Yangarra for the fees for its drilling work. Yangarra raised set-off as a defence, and counter-claimed for its losses.

[53] The agreement between Precision and Yangarra, entered into in 2009, is a standard industry contract known as a bilateral no-fault agreement or a "knock for knock" contract. The agreement allocates risks and liabilities between the drilling contractor (Precision) and the operator (Yangarra). The relevant terms of the agreement are set out later in these reasons, but the gist is that each party bears the risk of damage to its own assets, "regardless of the negligence or other fault of [the other party] or howsoever arising". Precision argues that, on the face of the agreement, its application to be paid its outstanding fees should be granted, notwithstanding any negligence on the part of Precision's employees. The agreement places the risk of damage to Yangarra's property squarely on Yangarra.

[54] Yangarra seeks to avoid that result by arguing, in the court below and before us on appeal, that the agreement does not exclude liability for gross negligence, willful misconduct or fraud. Further, if the terms of the agreement do purport to exclude liability on those grounds, such exclusion would be contrary to public policy.

[55] Precision brought its initial application for summary judgment before a Master of the Court of Queen's Bench in 2012. The Master adjourned the application at Yangarra's request, to give Yangarra an opportunity to gather evidence that it believed would establish conduct on the part of Precision that would amount to gross negligence, willful misconduct or fraud. The hearing before the Master continued in 2015, and the Master granted Precision's application for summary judgment (2015 ABQB 433). Yangarra's appeal to a Queen's Bench chambers justice was dismissed (2015 ABQB 649).

[56] A focus at the hearings before the Master and the chambers judge was the proper interpretation of clauses 10.3, 10.4 and 10.13 of the agreement. For convenience, I set out the relevant parts of those clauses below:

> 10.3. [Yangarra] shall at all times assume all of the risk of and be solely liable for:
>
> (a) any loss of, damage to or destruction of:
>
>
> (ii) [Yangarra]'s equipment; and,
>
> (iii) the hole, reservoir or any underground formation ...
>
> … regardless of the negligence or other fault of [Precision] or howsoever arising, and [Yangarra] shall defend and indemnify [Precision] from any claims [Yangarra] may otherwise make in regard thereto.
>
> 10.4. [Yangarra] shall at all times during a Drilling Program assume all of the risk of and be solely liable for the cost of repairing and re-drilling a lost or damaged hole, including, without limitation, the cost of fishing operations, regardless of the negligence or other fault of [Precision] or howsoever arising, and [Yangarra] specifically releases [Precision] from any claims [Yangarra] may otherwise have in regard thereto; …
>
> 10.13 For greater clarity, [Precision and Yangarra] acknowledge and agree that:
>
> (a) the purpose of this Article X [ten] is to allocate contractually between [Precision and Yangarra] certain of the risks, responsibilities and potential losses or liabilities associated with the operations and activities involved in drilling a Well under a Drilling Program; and,

(b) such allocation shall prevail in the place and stead of any other allocation of risks, responsibilities, or potential losses or liabilities that might be made on the basis of the negligence or other fault of either party or howsoever arising or any other theory of legal liability and notwithstanding the breach or alleged breach by either party or any provision of the Drilling Program not included in this Article X [ten].

[57] Neither the Master nor the chambers judge found any ambiguity in the terms of the agreement. Both decided that the exclusion clauses do not create an absurdity, nor do they defeat or contradict the primary purpose of the agreement, which is for Precision to drill wells in a good and workmanlike manner.

[58] Both the Master and the chambers judge concluded that negligence and gross negligence are specifically encompassed in the exclusion clauses, with gross negligence being included in the phrase "other fault ... howsoever arising" in clause 10.3. This conclusion was bolstered by clause 10.13, which expanded the release to include "any other theory of legal liability".

[59] The Master would also have interpreted the agreement to exclude liability for fraudulent misrepresentation. The chambers judge expressed doubt that the agreement would exclude liability for fraud. He relied on Roy v 1216393 Ontario Inc, 2014 BCCA 429, 378 DLR (4th) 702 to conclude that, as a matter of public policy, a court might decline to give effect to an exclusionary clause in the case of fraud during the currency of the contract.

[60] That public policy consideration was not determinative of the chambers judge's decision, however. He noted that Yangarra had not satisfied the Master on the evidence that there was a case for fraud or fraudulent misrepresentation. Upon reviewing the evidentiary record presented on the application, the chambers judge came to the same conclusion. He reviewed the evidence presented by Yangarra, said to support the claim that Precision employees had fraudulently concealed the mixing error from Yangarra. The chambers judge held that there was insufficient evidence to support that assertion, and that the claim of fraud or fraudulent misrepresentation was speculative and unsupported by the evidence. In that regard, he agreed with Precision's submission that there was "no evidentiary basis to suggest that there was any intentional concealment". The chambers judge also specifically noted Precision's submission that, although Yangarra argues that certain Precision employees failed to report the improper mixing, Yangarra elected not to question those very witnesses.

[61] The chambers judge rejected Yangarra's assertion of some type of cover up, finding that the suggestion that Precision's senior managers were "in on it" was rooted only in speculation and conjecture. He dismissed Yangarra's appeal and upheld the Master's decision to grant summary judgment to Precision.

Standard of review

[62] Errors of law are reviewable for correctness. The interpretation of standard form industry contracts can be such a question: Ledcor Construction v Northbridge Indemnity Insurance Co, 2016 SCC 37 at para 34, [2016] 2 SCR 23.

[63] The standard of review for findings of mixed law and fact is highly deferential, requiring a palpable and overriding error before an appellate court will intervene. An assessment of whether the evidentiary record can support a finding of fraud attracts that deferential standard. Moreover, whether to grant summary judgment is a discretionary matter. The chambers judge's assessment of the facts, the application of the law to those facts, and the ultimate determination of whether summary judgment is appropriate are entitled to deference: Hryniak v Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, [2014] 1 SCR 87 at paras 81-84; Windsor v Canadian Pacific Railway Ltd, 2014 ABCA 108 at para 10, 371 DLR (4th) 339.

Summary judgment

[64] Rule 7.3 (1) of the Alberta Rules of Court provides that a party may apply for summary judgment in respect of all or part of a claim if there is no defence or merit to a claim or part of it. Summary judgment plays an important role in the justice system by providing a process to avoid the heavy burdens of time and cost associated with lengthy litigation, when a claim or defence has no reasonable prospect of success: Windsor at para 12.

[65] Courts have more recently been encouraged to embrace summary judgment purposively; to focus on whether it would be fair and just to both sides to determine an issue on the record before the court on the summary judgment application. Summary judgment is an appropriate procedure where there is no genuine issue requiring a trial. This is the case when the summary judgment process allows the judge to make the necessary findings of fact, allows the judge to apply the law to the facts, and is a proportionate, more expeditious and less expensive means to achieve a just result: Hryniak at para 49; Windsor at para 13.

[66] It is expected that a party faced with a summary judgment application will put its best foot forward, and marshal sufficient evidence to show that there is a genuine issue requiring a trial. Speculating that evidence might be available at trial is not sufficient to resist summary judgment: Windsor at para 21.

Did the chambers judge err in concluding the issue of fraud should not go to trial?

[67] The Supreme Court of Canada[4] recently reiterated the classic statement of the elements of civil fraud, as set out in the 1889 decision of the House of Lords in Peek v Derry (1889), 14 App Cas 337 (UKHL) at p 374:

[4] Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc v Hryniak , 2014 SCC 8 at para 18, [2014] 1 SCR 126

> First, in order to sustain an action of deceit, there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Second, fraud is proved when it is shewn that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false…. Thirdly, if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made.

[68] In Bruno, the Supreme Court summarized the four elements of the tort of civil fraud: (1) a false representation made by the defendant; (2) some level of knowledge of the falsehood of the representation on the part of the defendant (whether through knowledge or recklessness); (3) the false representation caused the plaintiff to act; and (4) the plaintiff's actions resulted in loss: Bruno at para 21.

[69] This Court also reviewed the well-established legal definition of fraud from Peek v Derry, noting in its decision in Motkoski Holdings Ltd v Yellowhead (County), 2010 ABCA 72, [2010] 5 WWR 603 at paras 57-58, that the tort has two branches. Under the first, fraud is established if the defendant "knew" that the statement was false, and made it with the knowledge or intention that the plaintiff would rely on it. Under the second branch, it is sufficient if the defendant did not actually know the statement was false, so long as the statement was made "recklessly", meaning "without caring whether it was true or false". The court in Motkoski pointed out that in this context, "recklessly" does not mean the statement was made with "very great negligence". It is not enough that the defendant should have been more careful, or made further inquiries; actual knowledge or actual indifference to the truth is required: Motkoski at para 58. As Lord Herschell said in Peek v Derry at p 375, "making a false statement through want of care falls far short of, and is a very different thing from, fraud, and the same may be said of a false representation honestly believed though on insufficient grounds".

[70] It is apparent that fraud does not equal negligence, nor gross negligence. A fraudulent statement may be made recklessly, in the sense of "with actual indifference to the truth", but this is not the same as a statement made without sufficient care.

[71] The chambers judge must be taken as knowing this law. We cannot assume, in reviewing his decision, that he did not understand the elements of fraud, or that he failed to assess the evidence in light of those elements (including that a fraudulent statement may be one that is recklessly made). Indeed, the matter was argued before him and the relevant law was referred to him. A reading of his reasons shows clearly that he concluded the evidence was insufficient to establish a fraudulent misrepresentation.

[72] The appellant points out that the chambers judge quoted with approval a submission that there is no evidence of "intentional concealment", which, the appellant says, shows that he did not consider the possibility that a fraudulent statement can be made recklessly. The impugned statement may be a reference to a distinction drawn in Motkoski in the real estate context between "active concealment" (a positive and intentional step to hide a defect) and "mere concealment" or non-disclosure (meaning a failure to volunteer information), the latter being generally un-actionable. I do not infer from his reference to intentional concealment that the chambers judge was unaware of the possibility that fraud could be made out if Precision's employees made a statement recklessly, with "actual indifference" to whether it was true. To the contrary, in my view, in concluding that there was no evidentiary support for Yangarra's contention of some type of cover up, and in finding that Yangarra's assertions were rooted "only in conjecture and speculation", the chambers judge inferentially dismissed the possibility that Precision's employees recklessly made false statements that were relied on by Yangarra.

[73] The chambers judge's assessment of the evidence and his conclusion that it was not sufficient to merit a trial on the issue of fraud is owed deference. In my view, both his assessment and his conclusion are eminently reasonable given the state of the evidence before him. Yangarra acknowledges that under the terms of the agreement it is responsible for damage to its own property, even if that damage was caused by Precision's negligence. Since the first hearing date in 2012, Yangarra has been given the opportunity to marshal evidence to support its contention that Precision's conduct was more than negligent; that the conduct of Precision's employees was fraudulent and amounted to a fraudulent misrepresentation to Yangarra about the state of the drilling mud. Yangarra has, during that time, made efforts to gather such evidence. As the chambers judge noted, to successfully resist the summary judgment application, it was incumbent on Yangarra to provide sufficient evidence to show that there is arguable merit to its case on fraud and a genuine issue that should go to trial.

[74] The chambers judge found that there was no evidence of fraud on the record, and inferentially found that there was no evidence of recklessness that would amount to fraud. Yangarra's allegations of misconduct are consistent with inadvertence, carelessness and negligence. The failure to report the mixing error to Yangarra, the indication that the drilling mud was in order, and the failure to test, or carefully test, the drilling mud, all amount to negligence. Ultimately, it was up to the chambers judge to assess the evidence presented and decide if there was an arguable case that Precision's actions, or failure to act, amounted not just to negligence, but to fraud. Despite having cross-examined many Precision employees in an effort to gather evidence of fraud, Yangarra chose not to cross-examine the employees directly involved in the allegedly fraudulent statement. I see no palpable or overriding error in the chambers judge's conclusion that no evidence had been presented that would support an inference of indifference as to the truth or fraudulent intent. In my view, this ends the matter.

[75] I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

[76] Given my conclusion, it is not necessary for me to express an opinion as to whether the agreement would exclude liability for fraud or fraudulent misrepresentation, and I decline to do so.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Torts — Negligence — Negligent misrepresentation — Duty of care — Employer's representative allegedly making negligent misrepresentations to prospective employee during hiring interview — Whether employer or representative owed prospective employee a duty of care — If so, whether duty of care breached — Effect of subsequent employment agreement allowing termination without cause and reassignment.

Cognos is an Ottawa-based computer software company. The manager of product development for a particular line of accounting software, with the full knowledge of the company's senior management, advertised for an accountant to help with the development of the product. Appellant, a chartered accountant, applied and was interviewed for the position. He was living in Calgary with his wife and children at the time, where he occupied a relatively well paid and secure managerial position. He was actively seeking employment outside Calgary, because he wanted more challenging opportunities. During the job interview the manager told the appellant that the project in question was a major one which would be developed over a period of two years with enhancements and maintenance thereafter, and that the position being interviewed for would be needed throughout this period. It was represented that the staff required to develop the product modules would double. At no point during the interview was the appellant made aware of the fact that there was no guaranteed funding for the project as described to him, or that the position being applied for was subject to budgetary approval. Appellant was offered the job of manager, financial Responsabilité délictuelle — Négligence — Déclaration inexacte faite par négligence — Obligation de diligence — Le représentant d'un employeur aurait fait des déclarations inexactes par négligence à un employé éventuel au cours d'une entrevue — L'employeur ou son représentant avaient-ils envers l'employé éventuel une obligation de diligence? — Dans l'affirmative, cette obligation a-t-elle été violée? — Effet de la signature subséquente d'un contrat de travail permettant le congédiement sans motif et une réaffectation.

Cognos est une société établie à Ottawa qui exploite une entreprise de logiciels. Au su de la haute direction de la société, le directeur du développement des produits pour une ligne de produits composée de logiciels de comptabilité, a fait publié une annonce en vue de retenir les services d'un comptable qui aiderait au développement du produit. L'appelant, comptable agréé, s'est porté candidat et a été interviewé. Il habitait alors Calgary avec sa femme et ses enfants et occupait un poste de direction passablement rémunérateur et sûr. Il cherchait activement un emploi à l'extérieur de Calgary parce qu'il voulait des possibilités plus stimulantes. Au cours de l'entrevue, le directeur a dit à l'appelant qu'il s'agissait d'un projet majeur qui serait mis au point sur une période de deux ans, que les améliorations et la maintenance seraient assurées par la suite, et que le poste en question devait être comblé pendant toute cette période. Il a déclaré que le personnel requis pour mettre au point les modules du produit doublerait. Pendant l'entrevue, l'appelant n'a jamais été informé qu'il n'existait aucun financement garanti pour le projet comme on le lui décrivait, ou que le poste auquel il se portait candidat était assujetti à une approbation budgé-standards, and accepted immediately. He signed a written employment contract which permitted Cognos to terminate his employment at any time "without cause" upon one month's notice, or payment of one month's salary in lieu of notice, and to reassign him to another position within the company without reduction in salary, upon one month's notice. Appellant commenced employment in April 1983. In September he was advised that there would be a reassignment of personnel involved with the project owing to diminished research and development funding. The first notice of termination of employment he received was rescinded, but in July 1984 he received a second notice effective October 25, 1984. He worked until that day and was paid until November 15. The trial judge upheld the appellant's action against Cognos and awarded him damages for negligent misrepresentation. The Court of Appeal reversed the judgment and dismissed the action. The issues raised by this appeal are (1) whether Cognos or its representative owed the appellant a duty of care with respect to the representations made about Cognos and the nature and existence of the employment opportunity being offered; (2) whether Cognos or its representative breached this duty of care; and (3) what is the effect of the fact that the appellant signed an employment agreement after the negligent misrepresentations containing a termination "without cause" and a reassignment provision.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

Per La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé and Gonthier JJ.: Subject to what was said in Checo, issued concurrently, the reasons of Iacobucci and McLachlin JJ. were agreed with. This is not a case of concurrency. The tort here was independent of the contract and the liability was not limited by an exclusion clause in the contract.

Per Sopinka and Iacobucci JJ.: The tort of negligent misrepresentation is an established principle of Canadian tort law. There are five general requirements for a successful claim: (1) there must be a duty of care based on a "special relationship" between the representor and the representee; (2) the representation in question must be untrue, inaccurate, or misleading; (3) the representor must have acted negligently in making the misrepresentation; (4) the representee must have relied, in a reasonable manner, on the negligent misrepresentation; and taire. On a offert à l'appelant le poste de directeur, normes financières, qu'il a immédiatement accepté. Il a signé un contrat de travail, dont une clause permettait à Cognos de mettre fin à n'importe quel moment à l'emploi de l'appelant «sans motif» sur préavis d'un mois, ou sur paiement d'un mois de salaire, ou de le réaffecter à un autre poste au sein de la société sans diminution de salaire et sur préavis d'un mois. L'appelant a commencé à travailler en avril 1983. En septembre, il a été informé que le personnel prenant part au projet serait réaffecté, par suite des restrictions apportées au financement de la recherche et du développement. Le premier avis de cessation d'emploi qu'il a reçu a été annulé, mais en juillet 1984, il a reçu un second avis disant qu'il serait mis fin à son emploi le 25 octobre 1984. Il a travaillé jusqu'à cette date et a été rémunéré jusqu'au 15 novembre. Le juge de première instance a accueilli l'action de l'appelant contre Cognos et lui a accordé des dommages-intérêts pour déclaration inexacte faite par négligence. La Cour d'appel a infirmé le jugement et rejeté l'action. Les questions qui se posent en l'espèce sont les suivantes: (1) Cognos ou son représentant avaient-ils une obligation de diligence envers l'appelant relativement aux déclarations faites à ce dernier au sujet de Cognos ainsi que de la nature et de l'existence de l'emploi qui était offert? (2) Cognos ou son représentant ont-ils violé cette obligation de diligence? (3) Quel est l'effet de la signature par l'appelant, après les déclarations inexactes faites par négligence, d'un contrat de travail contenant une disposition au sujet du congédiement «sans motif» ainsi qu'une disposition concernant la réaffectation?

Arrêt: Le pourvoi est accueilli.

Les juges La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé et Gonthier: Sous réserve de ce qui a été dit dans l'arrêt connexe Checo, les motifs des juges Iacobucci et McLachlin sont acceptés. Il ne s'agit pas ici de concomitance. Le délit en l'espèce était indépendant du contrat et la responsabilité n'était pas limitée par une clause d'exclusion dans le contrat.

Les juges Sopinka et Iacobucci: Le délit de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence est un principe reconnu dans le droit canadien de la responsabilité délictuelle. Il existe cinq conditions générales pour qu'il soit fait droit à une demande: (1) il doit y avoir une obligation de diligence fondée sur un «lien spécial» entre l'auteur et le destinataire de la déclaration; (2) la déclaration en question doit être fausse, inexacte ou trompeuse; (3) l'auteur doit avoir agi d'une manière négligente; (4) le destinataire doit s'être fié d'une manière raisonnable à la déclaration inexacte faite par négligence, et (5) le fait que le destinataire s'est fié à la déclaration

(5) the reliance must have been detrimental to the representee in the sense that damages resulted.

An action in tort for negligent misrepresentation may lie even though the relevant parties to the action are in a contractual relationship. The fact that the alleged negligent misrepresentations are made in a pre-contractual setting, such as during negotiations or in the course of an employment hiring interview, and the fact that a contract is subsequently entered into by the parties do not, in themselves, bar an action in tort for damages caused by the misrepresentations. Depending on the circumstances, however, the subsequent contract may play a very important role in determining whether or not, and to what extent, a claim for negligent misrepresentation will succeed. Such a contract can have the effect of negating the action in tort and of confining the plaintiff to whatever remedies are available under the law of contract. Moreover, even if the tort claim is not barred altogether by the contract, the duty or liability of the defendant with respect to negligent misrepresentations may be limited or excluded by a term of the subsequent contract so as to diminish or extinguish the plaintiff's remedy in tort. Equally, however, there are cases where the subsequent contract will have no effect whatsoever on the plaintiff's claim for damages in tort.

The first and foremost question should be whether there is a specific contractual duty created by an express term of the contract which is co-extensive with the common law duty of care which the representee alleges the representor has breached. If the pre-contractual representation relied on by the plaintiff became an express term of the subsequent contract then absent any overriding considerations arising from the context in which the transaction occurred, the plaintiff cannot bring a concurrent action in tort for negligent misrepresentation and is confined to whatever remedies are available under the law of contract. Here, there is no concurrency. The employment agreement signed by the appellant does not contain any express contractual obligation co-extensive with the duty of care Cognos is alleged to have breached. The appellant's claim was not that the manager negligently misrepresented the amount of time he would be working on the project in question or the conditions under which his employment could be terminated. Rather, the appellant argued that the manager negligently misrepresented the nature and existence of doit lui être préjudiciable en ce sens qu'il doit avoir subi un préjudice.

Une action en responsabilité délictuelle fondée sur une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence peut être intentée malgré l'existence d'un lien contractuel entre les parties à l'action. Le fait que les déclarations inexactes alléguées soient faites avant la passation d'un contrat, par exemple au cours des négociations ou dans le cadre d'une entrevue d'embauchage, et le fait qu'un contrat soit par la suite passé par les parties n'excluent pas, en soi, une action en responsabilité délictuelle pour dommages-intérêts fondée sur les déclarations inexactes. Toutefois, selon les circonstances, le contrat subséquent peut avoir une très grande importance lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer s'il doit être fait droit à une demande fondée sur une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence et dans quelle mesure. Pareil contrat peut avoir pour effet d'exclure l'action fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle et de restreindre le demandeur à tout recours qu'il peut exercer en vertu du droit des contrats. Par ailleurs, même si le contrat n'exclut pas complètement la demande fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle, l'obligation ou la responsabilité qui incombe au défendeur en ce qui concerne les déclarations inexactes faites par négligence peut être limitée ou exclue par une condition du contrat subséquent, de façon à restreindre ou à éteindre le recours de nature délictuelle du demandeur. Toutefois, il est également vrai que, dans certains cas, le contrat subséquent n'aura aucun effet sur l'action en dommages-intérêts intentée par le demandeur en vertu de la responsabilité délictuelle.

Il s'agit avant tout de savoir si une obligation contractuelle précise a été créée par une condition expresse du contrat qui coïncide avec l'obligation de diligence existant en common law, què, selon le destinataire, l'auteur de la déclaration aurait violée. Si la déclaration faite avant la signature du contrat à laquelle le demandeur s'est fié est devenue une condition expresse du contrat subséquent, alors faute d'une considération prépondérante découlant du contexte dans lequel l'affaire a été conclue, le demandeur ne peut pas intenter une action en responsabilité délictuelle concomitante fondée sur une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence, et doit se limiter aux recours prévus par le droit des contrats. En l'espèce, il n'existe aucune concomitance. Le contrat de travail que l'appelant a signé ne comporte aucune obligation contractuelle expresse qui coïncide avec l'obligation de diligence que Cognos aurait violée. L'appelant n'a pas allégué que le directeur avait par négligence fait une déclaration inexacte au sujet de la période pendant laquelle il travaillerait au projet en question ou au sujet des conditions en vertu desquelles il pouvait the employment opportunity being offered. It is the existence, or reality, of the job being interviewed for, not the extent of the appellant's involvement therein, which is at the heart of this tort action, and the employment agreement contains no express provisions dealing with Cognos's obligations with respect to the nature and existence of the project.

There existed a "special relationship" between the parties, and Cognos and its representative, the manager, accordingly owed a duty of care toward the appellant to exercise reasonable care and diligence in making representations as to the employer and the employment opportunity being offered. The misrepresentations by the manager during the interview were made negligently, and the duty of care was therefore breached. It is not sufficient that the manager was truthful during the interview and that he believed in what he was representing. The applicable standard of care should be the one used in every negligence case, namely the universally accepted "reasonable person". The standard of care required by a person making representations is an objective one: it is a duty to exercise such reasonable care as the circumstances require to ensure that representations made are accurate and not misleading. The trial judge did not depart from the applicable standard of care in rendering his decision. He found that, "in all the circumstances", the misrepresentations made by the respondent's representative were negligently made. The trial judge did not impose a duty to make full disclosure on the respondent and its representative. He simply imposed a duty of care, the respect of which required, among other things and in the circumstances of this case, that the appellant be given highly relevant information about the nature and existence of the employment opportunity for which he had applied.

The specific employment agreement signed by the appellant is, in the circumstances of this case, irrelevant to his action for negligent misrepresentation. The common law duty of care invoked by the appellant is "independent" of the employment agreement, and neither Cognos's duty of care nor its liability is affected by the terms of the agreement. In particular, the agreement does not contain any valid disclaimer of responsibility for the representations made during the interview.

être mis fin à son emploi. L'appelant a plutôt soutenu que le directeur a par négligence fait une déclaration inexacte au sujet de la nature et de l'existence de l'emploi qui était offert. C'est l'existence, ou la réalité, de l'emploi en question, et non l'étendue de la participation de l'appelant, qui constitue le nœud de l'action en responsabilité délictuelle en l'espèce, et le contrat de travail ne comporte aucune disposition expresse au sujet des obligations de Cognos en ce qui concerne la nature et l'existence du projet.

Il existait un «lien spécial» entre les parties, et Cognos et son représentant, le directeur, avaient par conséquent une obligation de diligence envers l'appelant et ils étaient tenus de faire preuve d'une prudence et d'une diligence raisonnables en faisant des déclarations au sujet de l'employeur et de l'emploi offert. Les déclarations inexactes du directeur pendant l'entrevue ont été faites par négligence, et l'obligation de diligence a donc été violée. Il ne suffit pas que le directeur ait été sincère pendant l'entrevue et qu'il ait cru ce qu'il disait. La norme de diligence applicable devrait être celle qui est utilisée dans toute affaire de négligence, à savoir celle universellement reconnue de la «personne raisonnable». La norme de diligence requise d'une personne qui fait des déclarations est objective: il s'agit de l'obligation de faire preuve de la diligence raisonnable requise par les circonstances pour que les déclarations faites soient exactes et non trompeuses. Le juge de première instance ne s'est pas écarté de la norme de diligence applicable en rendant sa décision. Il a conclu que, «compte tenu de toutes les circonstances», le représentant de l'intimée a fait les déclarations inexactes par négligence. Le juge de première instance n'a pas imposé à l'intimée et à son représentant l'obligation de faire une divulgation complète. Il a simplement imposé une obligation de diligence qui, pour être respectée, exigeait en l'occurrence, entre autres choses, qu'on fournisse à l'appelant des renseignements très pertinents au sujet de la nature et de l'existence de l'emploi auquel il s'était porté candidat.

Le contrat de travail que l'appelant a signé n'a rien à voir, compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce, avec l'action fondée sur une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence qu'il a intentée. L'obligation de diligence existant en common law que l'appelant a invoquée est «indépendante» du contrat de travail, et les clauses du contrat de travail n'influent ni sur l'obligation de diligence ni sur la responsabilité de Cognos. En particulier, le contrat ne comprend aucune dénégation valide de responsabilité relativement aux déclarations faites pendant l'entrevue.

Per McLachlin J.: The fact that the parties in this case entered into a contract which contained a specific term governing termination does not preclude the appellant's action in tort for negligent misrepresentation as to the employment. The pre-contractual representation was different in scope and effect from the contractual obligation. The representation at issue in this case concerned the risk of termination coming about, and was not that Cognos would not have the discretion to terminate or transfer the appellant on one month's notice. The appellant relied on that representation in deciding to enter into the contract. It turned out to have been negligently made and false. It follows that the appellant is entitled to damages for the loss suffered as a result of that representation.

The trial judge held that the respondent had a duty not to hold out to applicants that the project was secure when it knew that funding was not approved and knew or should have known that the final approval was not a rubber stamp process and the secure funding was not a foregone conclusion. This is the appropriate standard and the duty of care with respect to representations made in a pre-employment situation is the same as that which applies generally.

Le juge McLachlin: Le fait que les parties en l'espèce ont conclu un contrat qui renfermait une condition portant expressément sur la cessation de l'emploi ne voue pas à l'échec l'action en responsabilité délictuelle de l'appelant pour déclaration inexacte faite par négligence relativement à l'emploi. La déclaration faite antérieurement à la passation du contrat différait, de par sa portée et son effet, de l'obligation contractuelle. La déclaration en cause en l'espèce concernait le risque de la cessation de l'emploi, et on n'a pas déclaré que Cognos ne détiendrait pas le pouvoir discrétionnaire de congédier ou de muter l'appelant sur préavis d'un mois. L'appelant s'est fondé sur cette déclaration pour décider de signer le contrat. Il s'est trouvé que la déclaration avait été faite par négligence et qu'elle était fausse. D'où il découle que l'appelant a droit aux dommages-intérêts pour la perte qu'il a subie par suite de cette déclaration.

Le juge de première instance a conclu que l'intimée avait l'obligation de ne pas faire croire aux candidats que le projet était assuré alors qu'elle savait que l'engagement des fonds n'avait pas été approuvé et qu'elle savait, ou aurait dû savoir, que l'approbation définitive n'était pas qu'une formalité et que l'engagement des fonds n'avait rien de certain. C'est là le critère qu'il convient d'appliquer et l'obligation de diligence en ce qui concerne les déclarations faites antérieurement à l'embauchage est identique à celle qui s'applique en général.

LE JUGE LA FOREST—Sous réserve de ce que j'ai dit dans l'arrêt connexe BG Checo International Ltd. c. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, [1993] 1 R.C.S. 12, je suis d'accord avec les juges Iacobucci et McLachlin, et je suis d'avis de disposer du pourvoi de la manière qu'ils proposent. Bien que le juge Iacobucci répète, pour l'essentiel, l'analyse qu'il a faite dans Checo, il ne s'agit pas du tout ici de concomitance. Qu'il me suffise de dire que le délit en l'espèce était indépendant du contrat et que la responsabilité n'était pas limitée par une clause d'exclusion dans le contrat.

LE JUGE IACOBUCCI—Il s'agit en l'espèce de déterminer si le délit de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence s'applique à une déclaration préalable à l'emploi qu'un employeur a faite à un employé éventuel pendant une entrevue d'embauchage. En particulier, on demande à notre Cour de representation made during a hiring interview becomes, in law, a "negligent misrepresentation". A subsidiary question deals with the effect of a subsequent employment agreement signed by the plaintiff, and its provisions allowing termination "without cause" and reassignment, on a claim for damages for negligent misrepresentation.

déterminer dans quelles circonstances une déclaration faite pendant une entrevue d'embauchage devient, en droit, une «déclaration inexacte faite par négligence». Une question subsidiaire concerne l'effet sur une action en dommages-intérêts découlant d'une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence d'un contrat de travail subséquent signé par le demandeur et des dispositions de ce contrat autorisant le congédiement «sans motif» et la réaffectation.

I. Facts

The trial judge conducted an extensive and thorough review of the facts in the course of his reasons for judgment. None of his findings of fact has been challenged in a direct manner by the respondent or altered by the Court of Appeal. As the facts are particularly important in the case at bar, I will review in some detail the trial judge's most relevant findings.

I. Les faits

Le juge de première instance a effectué un examen minutieux et approfondi des faits dans ses motifs. Aucune de ses conclusions de fait n'a été contestée d'une manière directe par l'intimée ou modifiée par la Cour d'appel. Étant donné que les faits en l'espèce sont particulièrement importants j'examinerai assez en détail les conclusions les plus pertinentes tirées par le juge de première instance.

The respondent, Cognos Incorporated (previously named Quasar Corporation and hereinafter referred to as "Cognos" or "respondent"), is an Ottawa-based company which carries on the business of designing, developing and marketing computer programmes and software. In December of 1982, the respondent's President (Mr. Mike Potter) instructed Mr. Sean Johnston, the recently appointed Manager of Product Development for a product line of accounting software known as "Multiview", that Cognos intended to develop Multiview to an equal standing with its main product line called "Power House". Mr. Johnston had also received instructions from the Vice-President of Research and Development of Cognos (Mr. Bob Minns), at the time of accepting the position of Manager of Product Development, that the respondent wished to see Multiview expand beyond the general ledger module (the software involved consists of various "modules") then developed and in circulation, and the accounts payable module then under development. In particular, he was told that the respondent wished to see the development of three additional modules, namely, accounts receivable, cash flow, and fixed assets. Mr. Johnston was instructed by Cognos's senior management to take L'intimée, Cognos Incorporated (autrefois connue sous le nom de Quasar Corporation et ci-après appelée «Cognos» ou «l'intimée»), est une société établie à Ottawa qui exploite une entreprise de conception, d'élaboration et de mise en marché de programmes d'ordinateurs et de logiciels. En décembre 1982, le président de l'intimée (M. Mike Potter) a informé M. Sean Johnston, qui venait d'être nommé directeur, Développement des produits, pour une ligne de produits composée de logiciels de comptabilité et connue sous le nom de «Multiview», que Cognos avait l'intention de développer Multiview au même point que sa ligne de produits principale appelée «Power House». Le vice-président, Recherche et Développement, de Cognos (M. Bob Minns) a également informé M. Johnston, au moment où ce dernier a accepté le poste de directeur, Développement des produits, que l'intimée voulait voir Multiview s'étendre au-delà du module grand livre (le logiciel en cause est composé de divers «modules») alors mis au point et en circulation, et du module comptes créditeurs qu'on était en train de mettre au point. En particulier, il lui a dit que l'intimée envisageait la mise au point de trois modules additionnels, à savoir les comptes débiteurs, le flux de l'encaisse et les charge and to do whatever was necessary to make Multiview a marketable and profitable product.

A meeting was held on December 21, 1982, during which Mr. Johnston and several senior executives of Cognos reviewed plans for the development of the Multiview line of products according to the mandate that had just been given. Criticisms were voiced by Mr. Johnston about the development of Multiview currently under way. He filed a project schedule covering a period of time up to 1985 and contemplating the development of modules such as accounts payable, accounts receivable, and cash flow.

Mr. Johnston indicated that there was a need on the research and development team of Multiview for an accountant to assist in the writing and maintenance of the software. Mr. Johnston proceeded, with the full knowledge of the respondent's senior management, to advertise for (and later hire) an accountant to help with the development of Multiview. An advertisement was placed in The Globe and Mail in mid-January, 1983, and many responses were received. In February of that year, a short list of six chartered accountants were interviewed by Mr. Johnston and two other executives of Cognos. The appellant, Douglas J. Queen, was one of the persons interviewed.

At the time of his interview, the appellant had been qualified as a chartered accountant for some eight and a half years. Since May of 1975, he had been living in Calgary with his wife and children and had occupied positions with three different employers, whereby he gained experience in working with computer accounting systems. For the three and a half years prior to the interview, the appellant had been the Regional Controller for a Calgary-based corporation named Genstar Development Corporation, occupying a relatively well paying and secure managerial position. In the fall of 1982, the appellant was actively seeking employment outside Calgary and was interested in the high-tech industry in the Ottawa area. In the words of the trial judge, the appellant wanted more immobilisations. La haute direction de Cognos a demandé à M. Johnston d'en assumer la responsabilité et de faire tout ce qu'il fallait pour que Multiview devienne un produit commercialisable et rentable.

Le 21 décembre 1982, a eu lieu une rencontre au cours de laquelle M. Johnston et plusieurs hauts dirigeants de Cognos ont examiné les plans de développement de la ligne de produits Multiview, conformément au mandat qui venait d'être conféré. Monsieur Johnston a formulé des critiques au sujet du développement de Multiview alors en cours. Il a produit un échéancier de projet pour une période allant jusqu'en 1985, lequel prévoyait la mise au point de modules comme les comptes créditeurs, les comptes débiteurs et le flux de l'encaisse.

Monsieur Johnston a fait savoir que l'équipe de recherche et développement de Multiview avait besoin d'un comptable qui l'aiderait à créer et à maintenir le logiciel. Au su de la haute direction de l'intimée, il a fait publier une annonce en vue de retenir les services d'un comptable qui aiderait au développement de Multiview (lequel a par la suite été embauché). Une annonce a été insérée dans le Globe and Mail à la mi-janvier 1983, à laquelle de nombreux candidats ont répondu. En février de la même année, M. Johnston et deux autres dirigeants de Cognos ont interviewé six comptables agréés. L'appelant, M. Douglas J. Queen, était l'un d'eux.

Au moment de son entrevue, l'appelant était comptable agréé depuis environ huit ans et demi. Depuis mai 1975, il habitait Calgary avec sa femme et ses enfants et avait occupé des postes auprès de trois employeurs différents, ce qui lui avait permis d'acquérir de l'expérience dans le domaine des systèmes de comptabilité informatisée. Pendant les trois années et demie qui ont précédé l'entrevue, l'appelant avait été contrôleur régional d'une société établie à Calgary, la Genstar Development Corporation, et avait occupé un poste de direction passablement rémunérateur et sûr. À l'automne 1982, l'appelant cherchait activement un emploi à l'extérieur de Calgary, et le secteur de la haute technologie de la région d'Ottawa l'intéressait. Comme l'a dit le juge de première challenging opportunities than were available for him in Calgary; he wanted a senior financial position that would make use of his expertise in management information computer systems.

On February 14, 1983, the appellant was interviewed for approximately an hour and a half. During this interview, Mr. Johnston made a number of representations (as he had to the other five candidates) about the Multiview project and about the successful candidate's role in its development. These representations are fully canvassed at pp. 396-98 of the reported reasons of the trial judge: (1987), 63 O.R. (2d) 389.

In sum, Mr. Johnston told the appellant that Multiview was a major project which would be developed over a period of two years (the "primary development period") with enhancements and maintenance thereafter, and that the position being interviewed for would be needed throughout this period. It was made clear that Cognos was committed to the development of additional modules of Multiview beyond general ledger (then developed), accounts payable (development under way), and accounts receivable (planned, but not yet under development). Those additional modules were cash flow, fixed assets, inventory, and order entry. Moreover, it was represented that the staff required to develop the Multiview modules would double, from 16 to 32, by August, 1983 (the appellant's evidence), or by the end of the two-year primary development period (Mr. Johnston's evidence). Throughout the interview, it was understood that the successful candidate would play an important role as a chartered accountant in the Multiview project, advising on accounting standards throughout the life of the project. In addition, the trial judge found, based on his assessment of all the evidence, that it was implicitly represented that there was a reasonable plan in existence for the additional modules and that Cognos had made a financinstance, l'appelant voulait des possibilités plus stimulantes que celles qui lui étaient offertes à Calgary; il voulait un poste de direction dans le domaine des finances qui ferait appel à son expertise en matière de systèmes automatiques de gestion.

Le 14 février 1983, l'appelant a eu une entrevue d'environ une heure et demie pendant laquelle M. Johnston a fait certaines déclarations (comme il l'avait fait dans le cas des cinq autres candidats) au sujet du projet Multiview et du rôle que jouerait le candidat retenu dans son développement. Ces déclarations sont examinées à fond aux pp. 396 à 398 des motifs du juge de première instance: (1987), 63 O.R. (2d) 389.

En somme, M. Johnston a dit à l'appelant que Multiview était un projet majeur qui serait mis au point sur une période de deux ans (la [TRADUCTION] «période de développement initial»), que les améliorations et la maintenance seraient assurées par la suite, et que le poste en question devait être comblé pendant toute cette période. Il a clairement fait savoir que Cognos était bien décidée à mettre au point des modules additionnels de Multiview, en plus du grand livre (qui existait déjà), des comptes créditeurs (qu'on était en train de mettre au point) et des comptes débiteurs (module envisagé, mais non encore mis au point). Ces modules additionnels étaient le flux de l'encaisse, les immobilisations, l'inventaire et l'enregistrement des commandes. En outre, il a déclaré que le personnel requis pour mettre au point les modules Multiview doublerait, le nombre d'employés devant passer de 16 à 32, avant le mois d'août 1983 (selon le témoignage de l'appelant), ou avant la fin de la période de développement initial de deux ans (selon le témoignage de M. Johnston). Pendant toute l'entrevue, il a laissé entendre que le candidat retenu jouerait, en sa qualité de comptable agréé, un rôle important dans le projet Multiview et qu'il agirait comme conseiller en ce qui concerne les normes comptables pendant toute la durée du projet. De plus, le juge de première instance a conclu, en se fondant sur son appréciation de l'ensemble de la preuve, qu'on avait implicitement déclaré qu'il existait un plan raisonnable à l'égard des modules cial commitment for such development in the way of budgetary provisions.

At the time of this interview, Mr. Johnston's knowledge as to the respondent's commitment to the development of Multiview was based on conversations and meetings with senior executives of Cognos. He was aware, however, that the funding needed for the full development of Multiview in accordance with his mandate had not yet been approved by the respondent's corporate management team. While this body had met in early February to discuss and formulate strategies and plans for the development of Multiview, it had not yet given any financial commitment commensurate with the mandate given to Mr. Johnston. Mr. Johnston was also aware that this body had the ultimate responsibility of deciding whether to allocate corporate funds for the research and development of Multiview. At no point during the interview was the appellant made aware of the fact that there was no guaranteed funding for the Multiview project as described to him, or that the position being applied for was subject, in any respect, to budgetary approval.

The appellant was offered the job of Manager, Financial Standards, by telephone early in the month of March, 1983. He accepted immediately and Mr. Johnston mailed to him a written contract of employment. It is undisputed that, prior to signing, the appellant read and understood the employment agreement. He knew that its purpose was to define the rights and obligations of the parties. One clause in the contract (clause 14) permitted the respondent to terminate at any time the appellant's employment "without cause" upon one month's notice, or payment of one month's salary in lieu of notice. Another clause (clause 13) enabled the respondent to reassign the appellant to another position within Cognos without reduction in salary and upon one month's notice. Much importance was given to these provisions by the Court of Appeal as well as by the respondent in argument before this Court.

additionnels et que Cognos s'était financièrement engagée à les mettre au point au moyen de dispositions budgétaires.

Au moment de l'entrevue, la connaissance de M. Johnston au sujet de l'engagement que l'intimée avait pris à l'égard du développement de Multiview était fondée sur des conversations et sur des rencontres avec des hauts dirigeants de Cognos. Toutefois, M. Johnston savait que l'équipe de gestion d'entreprise de l'intimée n'avait pas encore approuvé le financement nécessaire au plein développement de Multiview, conformément à son mandat. Cette équipe s'était réunie au début de février pour examiner et formuler des stratégies et des plans en vue du développement de Multiview, mais elle n'avait pas encore pris d'engagements financiers correspondant au mandat conféré à M. Johnston. Celui-ci savait également que cette équipe était en dernier ressort chargée de déterminer si la société devait affecter des fonds en recherche et développement pour Multiview. Pendant l'entrevue, l'appelant n'a jamais été informé qu'il n'existait aucun financement garanti pour le projet Multiview comme on le lui avait décrit, ou que le poste auquel il s'était porté candidat était assujetti, à quelques égards que ce soit, à une approbation budgétaire.

On a offert à l'appelant le poste de directeur, Normes financières, par téléphone au début de mars 1983. Il a immédiatement accepté et M. Johnston lui a envoyé, par la poste, un contrat de travail. Il n'est pas contesté qu'avant de signer le contrat de travail, l'appelant l'a lu et le comprenait. Il savait que l'objet du contrat était de définir les droits et obligations des parties. Une clause du contrat (la clause 14) permettait à l'intimée de mettre fin à n'importe quel moment à l'emploi de l'appelant «sans motif» sur préavis d'un mois, ou sur paiement d'un mois de salaire. Une autre (la clause 13) permettait à l'intimée de réaffecter l'appelant à un autre poste au sein de Cognos sans diminution de salaire et sur préavis d'un mois. La Cour d'appel a accordé beaucoup d'importance à ces dispositions, comme l'a également fait l'intimée dans son argumentation devant notre Cour.

For convenience, I shall reproduce clauses 13 and 14 of the employment agreement:

TRANSFER

13. Quasar Systems reserves the right to reassign you to another position with the Company without reduction of your salary or benefits and upon one month's notice to you. Should such reassignment require your permanent relocation to another city, the Company will reimburse you for your expenses in accordance with the then current relocation policy.

TERMINATION NOTICE — ONE MONTH

14. This Agreement may be terminated at any time and without cause by Quasar Systems Ltd. or by you. In the event of termination, Quasar Systems Ltd. will give you one month's notice of termination plus any additional notice that may be required by any applicable legislation. Similarly, you shall give Quasar Systems Ltd. one month's notice if you voluntarily terminate this Agreement. Quasar Systems Ltd. may pay you one month's salary in lieu of the aforesaid notice in which event this Agreement and your employment will be terminated on the date such payment in lieu of notice is made.

The trial judge specifically accepted the appellant's evidence that he signed the contract of employment based on the representations made to him during the interview, and that were it not for those representations he would not have signed it. In order to accept employment with Cognos, the appellant was required to give up a relatively well paying and secure, albeit not as challenging, position in Calgary and to move himself and his family more than halfway across the country.

The appellant commenced employment with Cognos on April 11, 1983. Two weeks later, on April 25, 1983, the corporate management team of the respondent considered for the very first time the project cost estimates for the Multiview project. This body rejected Mr. Johnston's funding proposal which was in excess of $1,000,000. It decided to commit research and development funds to the Power House project in priority to Multiview. This decision was based on a number of market considerations, including the continuing

Pour plus de commodité, je reproduis les clauses 13 et 14 du contrat de travail:

[TRADUCTION]

MUTATION

13. Quasar Systems se réserve le droit de vous réaffecter à un autre poste au sein de la société, sans diminution de salaire ou perte d'avantages, sur préavis d'un mois. Advenant le cas où la réaffectation exige que vous vous réinstalliez en permanence dans une autre ville, la société vous dédommagera de vos frais conformément à la politique de réinstallation alors en vigueur.

AVIS DE CESSATION D'EMPLOI — UN MOIS

14. Le présent contrat peut être résilié à n'importe quel moment et sans motif par Quasar Systems Ltd. ou par vous. En cas de cessation d'emploi, Quasar Systems Ltd. vous donnera un préavis d'un mois en sus de tout avis additionnel prévu par une loi pertinente. De même, vous donnerez à Quasar Systems Ltd. un préavis d'un mois si vous résiliez volontairement ce contrat. Quasar Systems Ltd. peut vous verser un mois de salaire au lieu dudit avis, auquel cas ce contrat et votre emploi prendront fin à la date à laquelle cette somme vous sera versée.

Le juge de première instance a expressément accepté le témoignage de l'appelant, à savoir qu'il avait signé le contrat de travail en se fondant sur les déclarations qui lui avaient été faites pendant l'entrevue et que, n'eût été de ces déclarations, il ne l'aurait pas signé. Pour accepter l'emploi auprès de Cognos, l'appelant devait renoncer à un poste passablement rémunérateur et sûr, quoique moins stimulant, à Calgary et s'installer avec sa famille presque à l'autre bout du pays.

L'appelant a commencé à travailler pour Cognos le 11 avril 1983. Deux semaines plus tard, le 25 avril 1983, l'équipe de gestion d'entreprise de l'intimée a examiné pour la première fois l'estimation des coûts du projet Multiview, et a rejeté la proposition de financement de M. Johnston, laquelle s'élevait à plus de 1 000 000 $. Elle a décidé de consacrer en priorité des fonds de recherche et développement au projet Power House plutôt qu'au projet Multiview. Cette décision était fondée sur un certain nombre de considé-low sales of the then developed Multiview module (general ledger) and the continuing high sales of the various Power House modules. The corporate management team allotted a budget of only $200,000 to Multiview, thus making the development of additional modules beyond accounts receivable quite unrealistic. Further meetings of the management team took place in the following months at which time additional funding curtailment of the Multiview project occurred. On September 9, 1983, barely five months after his arrival in Ottawa, the appellant and others were advised that there would be a reassignment of personnel involved with Multiview owing to diminished research and development funding. The appellant was informed that, unless a position was available for him in the finance and administration department of the respondent, he would most likely be laid off.

rations commerciales, notamment sur le chiffre d'affaires constamment bas du module existant de Multiview (grand livre) et sur celui constamment élevé des divers modules de Power House. L'équipe de gestion d'entreprise a alloué une somme de 200 000 $ seulement à Multiview, de sorte que la mise au point de modules additionnels autres que celui des comptes débiteurs était tout à fait irréaliste. D'autres réunions de l'équipe de gestion ont eu lieu au cours des mois qui ont suivi, et des restrictions financières additionnelles ont alors été apportées au projet Multiview. Le 9 septembre 1983, cinq mois à peine après son arrivée à Ottawa, l'appelant et d'autres employés ont été informés que le personnel prenant part au projet Multiview serait réaffecté, par suite des restrictions apportées au financement de la recherche et du développement. L'appelant a été informé qu'il serait fort probablement licencié, à moins qu'il n'y ait un poste pour lui au sein du service des finances et de l'administration de l'intimée.

On October 28, 1983, the appellant was given his first written notice of termination of employment effective March 21, 1984. The appellant negotiated an amendment to his employment agreement in order to eliminate his obligation to repay $7,500 of moving expenses, otherwise repayable in the event that his position was terminated within the first year of employment. This notice was rescinded in November, 1983, and the appellant was assigned to quality control of one of the aspects of the Power House project. On May 1, 1984, after having been informed earlier in March that he would no longer be needed with quality control, the appellant secured the position of Manager of Finance in the finance department of the respondent. He performed various tasks while in this function. On July 31, 1984, he received his second written notice of termination effective October 25, 1984. He worked until that day and was paid until November 15, 1984. The trial judge found that the appellant was not dismissed as a result of an unsatisfactory assessment of his job performance.

Le 28 octobre 1983, l'appelant a reçu un premier avis écrit disant qu'il serait mis fin à son emploi le 21 mars 1984. Il a négocié une modification de son contrat de travail afin d'éliminer l'obligation qui lui incombait de rembourser les frais de déménagement s'élevant à 7 500 $, qu'il devait par ailleurs rembourser s'il était mis fin à son poste pendant la première année d'emploi. Cet avis a été annulé en novembre 1983, et l'appelant a été affecté au contrôle de la qualité d'un des aspects du projet Power House. Le 1er mai 1984, après avoir été informé plus tôt, en mars, qu'on n'aurait plus besoin de ses services pour le contrôle de la qualité, l'appelant a été nommé au poste de directeur des finances au sein du service des finances de l'intimée. Il a assumé diverses tâches à ce poste. Le 31 juillet 1984, il a reçu un second avis écrit disant qu'il serait mis fin à son emploi le 25 octobre 1984. Il a travaillé jusqu'à cette date et a été rémunéré jusqu'au 15 novembre 1984. Le juge de première instance a constaté que l'appelant n'avait pas été congédié par suite d'une évaluation insatisfaisante de son rendement professionnel.

On March 25, 1985, the appellant commenced an action against the respondent seeking damages

Le 25 mars 1985, l'appelant a intenté contre l'intimée une action dans laquelle il demandait des for negligent and fraudulent misrepresentation. He apparently discontinued his claim for fraudulent misrepresentation at some point after filing the statement of claim, and proceeded only in negligence. From the beginning, the appellant's cause of action has been founded wholly and solely in tort. At no time did he argue breach of contract, breach of collateral warranty or any other contractual cause of action against the respondent. He did not dispute the fact that some of the terms of his employment contract appeared to be inconsistent with the representations made by Mr. Johnston. However, it was his understanding from the interview that the Multiview project was a reality and that its existence was not contingent on the happening of some future event. He testified that were it not for the representations made during the interview as to the nature and existence of the employment opportunity, he would not have left his secure position in Calgary.

In a judgment rendered on December 31, 1987, White J. of the Ontario High Court of Justice upheld the appellant's claim and awarded him $67,224 in damages: (1987), 63 O.R. (2d) 389, 18 C.C.E.L. 146. On May 1, 1990, an appeal by the respondent to the Court of Appeal for Ontario was allowed; the trial judgment was set aside and replaced by a judgment dismissing the action with costs: (1990), 74 O.R. (2d) 176, 38 O.A.C. 180, 69 D.L.R. (4th) 288, 30 C.C.E.L. 1, 90 CLLC §14, 024. The appellant was granted leave to appeal to this Court on January 17, 1991, [1991] 1 S.C.R. xii.

II. Judgments in the Courts Below

A. Ontario High Court of Justice (1987), 63 O.R. (2d) 389

The trial judge found, in all the circumstances, that there existed a "special relationship" between the respondent (via Mr. Johnston) and the appellant, within the meaning of Hedley Byrne & Co. v. Heller & Partners Ltd., [1964] A.C. 465 (H.L.), so as to give rise to a duty of care with respect to the representations made during the hiring interview.

dommages-intérêts fondés sur une déclaration inexacte et frauduleuse et faite par négligence. Il a apparemment renoncé à invoquer la déclaration inexacte et frauduleuse à un moment donné, après le dépôt de sa demande, et a uniquement continué à invoquer la négligence. Depuis le début, la cause d'action de l'appelant est entièrement fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle. L'appelant n'a jamais invoqué la violation du contrat, la violation d'une garantie accessoire ou une autre cause d'action contractuelle contre l'intimée. Il n'a pas contesté que certaines conditions de son contrat de travail semblaient incompatibles avec les déclarations que M. Johnston avait faites. Toutefois, il a cru comprendre, par suite de l'entrevue, que le projet Multiview était une réalité et que son existence ne dépendait pas de la réalisation d'un événement futur. Il a témoigné que n'eût été des déclarations faites pendant l'entrevue quant à la nature et à l'existence de l'emploi, il n'aurait pas quitté son poste sûr à Calgary.

Dans un jugement rendu le 31 décembre 1987, le juge White, de la Haute Cour de justice de l'Ontario, a accueilli la demande de l'appelant et lui a accordé la somme de 67 224 $ à titre de dommages-intérêts: (1987), 63 O.R. (2d) 389, 18 C.C.E.L. 146. Le 1er mai 1990, la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a accueilli l'appel interjeté par l'intimé; le jugement de première instance a été infirmé et remplacé par un jugement rejetant l'action avec dépens: (1990), 74 O.R. (2d) 176, 38 O.A.C. 180, 69 D.L.R. (4th) 288, 30 C.C.E.L. 1, 90 CCLC §14, 024. L'appelant a obtenu l'autorisation de se pourvoir devant notre Cour le 17 janvier 1991, [1991] 1 R.C.S. xii.

II. Les jugements des cours d'instance inférieure

A. Haute Cour de justice de l'Ontario (1987), 63 O.R. (2d) 389

Le juge de première instance a conclu que, compte tenu de toutes les circonstances, il y avait un «lien spécial» entre l'intimée (par l'entremise de M. Johnston) et l'appelant, au sens de l'arrêt Hedley Byrne & Co. c. Heller & Partners Ltd., [1964] A.C. 465 (H.L.), de façon à donner lieu à une obligation de diligence en ce qui concerne les

1993 CanLII 146 (SCC)

The fact that this case involved pre-contractual or pre-employment negotiations did not alter this conclusion. Based on his assessment of all the evidence adduced at trial, White J. also found that certain representations made to the appellant during the interview were inaccurate or misleading (i.e., they were misrepresentations), and that these misrepresentations were made in a negligent manner (i.e., they were negligent misrepresentations). Some of his comments in this respect warrant repeating (at pp. 415-16):

I find that misrepresentations were made to the [appellant] by Sean Johnston in the hiring interview. The effect of these misrepresentations was that the [appellant] would have a position in the research and development of the product "Multiview"; that that position would be a significant one and would involve his expertise as an accountant; that he would perform the responsible role of seeing to proper accounting standards being implemented into the product; that beyond the three modules immediately in contemplation were a minimum of four other modules; and that the project of "Multiview", in connection with which [the appellant] would be hired would last a minimum of two years. I find further that Mr. Johnston implicitly represented that management had made a firm budgetary commitment to the development of four other modules in addition to those then presently under development.

I find further, in all the circumstances, that Sean Johnston made those misrepresentations negligently. Based upon his expertise in the field of computer development, he was aware, according to his evidence, that until there is a feasibility study in which cost estimates have been submitted to and have been considered and approved by senior management, one could not say that the [respondent] had made a firm commitment to the project as Mr. Johnston envisaged it and as he described it to [the appellant] in the interview.

Other circumstances which the trial judge took into consideration in concluding that the misrepresentations were negligently made include the following: (1) Mr. Johnston knew, or ought to have known, that the truth of his representations depended on the approval by the corporate management of the project; (2) Mr. Johnston knew that the appellant was relying on his representations; (3) Mr. Johnston knew that the appellant was relying on his representations to his detriment; and (4) Mr. Johnston knew that the appellant was relying on his representations to his detriment and he was reckless as to the consequences of his representations.

déclarations faites pendant l'entrevue d'embauchage. Le fait que cette affaire portait sur des négociations préalables au contrat ou à l'emploi ne changeait rien à cette conclusion. Le juge White a également conclu que, selon son appréciation de l'ensemble de la preuve présentée à l'audience, certaines déclarations faites à l'appelant pendant l'entrevue étaient erronées ou trompeuses (c'est-à-dire qu'il s'agissait de déclarations inexactes), et que ces déclarations inexactes avaient été faites d'une manière négligente (c'est-à-dire qu'il s'agissait de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence). Il vaut la peine de reproduire certaines remarques qu'il a faites à cet égard (aux pp. 415 et 416):

[TRADUCTION] Je conclus que, pendant l'entrevue d'embauchage, Sean Johnston a fait des déclarations inexactes à [l'appelant]. Selon ces déclarations inexactes, [l'appelant] occuperait un poste en recherche et développement pour le produit «Multiview»; ce poste serait un poste d'importance et ferait appel à son expertise à titre de comptable; [l'appelant] serait chargé de veiller à ce que les normes comptables pertinentes soient appliquées relativement au produit; en plus des trois modules immédiatement envisagés, il y aurait au moins quatre autres modules; le projet «Multiview» dans le cadre duquel [l'appelant] serait embauché durerait au moins deux ans. Je conclus en outre que M. Johnston a implicitement déclaré que la direction avait pris un engagement budgétaire ferme à l'égard de la mise au point de quatre autres modules, en plus de ceux qu'on était en train de mettre au point.

Je conclus en outre que, compte tenu de toutes les circonstances, Sean Johnston a fait ces déclarations inexactes par négligence. Vu son expertise dans le domaine de la création informatique, il savait, selon son témoignage, que tant que n'a pas été effectuée une étude de faisabilité dans laquelle l'estimation des coûts est soumise à la haute direction, et examinée et approuvée par celle-ci, il est impossible de dire que [l'intimée] a pris un engagement ferme à l'égard du projet, comme M. Johnston le prévoyait et comme il l'a décrit [à l'appelant] pendant l'entrevue.

Le juge de première instance a notamment tenu compte des circonstances suivantes lorsqu'il a conclu que les déclarations inexactes avaient été faites par négligence: (1) M. Johnston savait, ou aurait dû savoir, que l'exactitude de ses déclarations dépendait de l'approbation, par l'équipe de gestion agement team of the cost estimates he had prepared for the research and development of the Multiview project; (2) it is reasonable to infer that Mr. Johnston, at the time of the interview, contemplated that the budgetary needs for the Multiview project would be substantial and that approval was at best speculative; (3) Mr. Johnston must have been aware of the continued poor sales performance of the Multiview product line; (4) Mr. Johnston did not disclose to the appellant that senior management had not yet given the financial commitment required to make the plans for the Multiview project a probable reality; (5) Mr. Johnston's expertise in the computer development field should have made him aware that, notwithstanding his conversations with senior management and the meeting of December 21, 1982, there was still a considerable risk that senior management would not give budgetary approval to his plans; (6) Mr. Johnston knew that the appellant was relying on the information he was providing during the interview; (7) Mr. Johnston knew that the appellant had a secure, responsible, and well-paying employment as a chartered accountant in Calgary and that coming to Ottawa would involve moving himself and his family across the country; and (8) Mr. Johnston was aware that the appellant was relying on the position with Cognos to enhance his career significantly as an accountant.

d'entreprise, de l'estimation des coûts qu'il avait préparée en matière de recherche et développement pour le projet Multiview; (2) il est raisonnable de déduire que M. Johnston prévoyait, au moment de l'entrevue, que les besoins budgétaires pour le projet Multiview seraient importants, et que l'approbation était, au mieux, fondée sur des conjectures; (3) M. Johnston devait être au courant du piètre rendement constant des ventes de la ligne de produits Multiview; (4) M. Johnston n'a pas révélé à l'appelant que la haute direction n'avait pas encore pris l'engagement financier requis pour que les plans relatifs au projet Multiview deviennent une réalité probable; (5) l'expertise de M. Johnston dans le domaine de la création informatique aurait dû lui permettre de savoir que, malgré les conversations qu'il avait eues avec des hauts dirigeants et malgré la réunion du 21 décembre 1982, il était encore fort probable que la haute direction ne donne pas l'approbation budgétaire requise; (6) M. Johnston savait que l'appelant se fiait aux renseignements qu'il avait fournis pendant l'entrevue; (7) M. Johnston savait que l'appelant occupait, à Calgary, un poste de responsabilité, un emploi sûr et rémunérateur, à titre de comptable agréé et que, pour venir travailler à Ottawa, il devait s'installer avec sa famille à l'autre bout du pays et (8) M. Johnston savait que l'appelant comptait sur le poste qu'il occuperait auprès de Cognos pour enrichir énormément sa carrière de comptable.

The trial judge also found that, even if Mr. Johnston felt justified in making the representations that he did (based on his conversations with senior management and the meeting of December 21, 1982), and assuming that this deprived his misrepresentations of their negligent quality, then such misrepresentations, while not negligently made by Mr. Johnston, were negligently made by the senior management of the respondent "through Mr. Johnston as an innocent instrument of the [respondent] company" (p. 418).

Le juge de première instance a également conclu que, même si M. Johnston croyait pouvoir légitimement faire les déclarations qu'il a faites (compte tenu des conversations qu'il avait eues avec la haute direction et de la réunion du 21 décembre 1982), et à supposer que cela enlève à ses déclarations inexactes leur caractère de négligence, ces déclarations inexactes, bien que M. Johnston ne les ait pas faites par négligence, avaient été faites par négligence par la haute direction de l'intimée [TRADUCTION] «par l'entremise de M. Johnston qui avait innocemment servi d'instrument à la société [intimée]» (à la p. 418).

White J. further found that the appellant had relied upon the negligent misrepresentations, to his

Le juge White a en outre conclu que l'appelant s'était appuyé sur les déclarations inexactes faites detriment, and that he had sustained substantial damages (at p. 419):

The misrepresentations induced [the appellant] to quit his job as controller of the Calgary Division of Genstar Development Corporation and to accept employment with the [respondent]. Those representations induced him to sign the contract of employment. But for those representations he would have remained working for the Genstar Development Corporation for some further period of time and would not have become an employee of the [respondent].

Finally, the trial judge addressed a number of arguments raised by the respondent in defence. First, he rejected the proposition that the representations were truthful and that Mr. Johnston was simply giving an opinion as to future events. In his view, the representations were untruthful: "What was untruthful in the representations was the implied assurance in those representations that Mr. Johnston had made a sufficient study of the relevant facts, including the decision of senior management to make a financial commitment to the development of 'Multiview' beyond the accounts receivable module, to be able to make the unqualified representations that he made" (pp. 417-18). All Mr. Johnston had to say, in the trial judge's opinion, was that the feasibility study of the project had not yet been completed. Second, senior management of the respondent made no attempt to disclaim expressly any representations made to the appellant during the interview. Third, the trial judge rejected the defence put forward that the appellant, by his conduct subsequent to learning the situation of Multiview, had affirmed his contract of employment. In this respect, White J. distinguished the decision relied on by the respondent (Burrows v. Burke (1984), 49 O.R. (2d) 76 (C.A.)), and held that the appellant's conduct was not one of affirming the contract of employment but of a person in a difficult situation attempting to "minimize his damages" (p. 420). In any event, his conduct "did not amount to an explicit waiver of his right to claim damages in tort arising out of negligent misrepresentations made to him inducing the contract" (p. 421). In his view, whether the contract is affirmed or not, the cause of action in tort is preserved as it is external to the contract. And fourth, the trial judge rejected the respon-par négligence, à son détriment, et qu'il avait subi un préjudice important (à la p. 419):

[TRADUCTION] Les déclarations inexactes ont poussé [l'appelant] à quitter son emploi de contrôleur de la division de Calgary de Genstar Development Corporation et à accepter un emploi auprès de [l'intimée]. Ces déclarations l'ont amené à signer le contrat de travail. N'eût été de ces déclarations, il aurait continué à travailler pour Genstar Development Corporation pendant un certain temps et ne serait pas devenu un employé de [l'intimée].

Enfin, le juge de première instance a examiné un certain nombre d'arguments que l'intimée a soulevés dans sa défense. Premièrement, il a rejeté la proposition selon laquelle les déclarations étaient véridiques, M. Johnston ayant simplement exprimé une opinion au sujet d'événements futurs. À son avis, les déclarations n'étaient pas véridiques: [TRADUCTION] «Ce qui n'était pas véridique dans les déclarations était la garantie implicite qui y était donnée, à savoir que M. Johnston avait fait une étude suffisante des faits pertinents, et notamment de la décision de la haute direction de prendre un engagement financier à l'égard du développement de «Multiview» au-delà du module comptes débiteurs, pour être en mesure de faire les déclarations catégoriques qu'il a faites» (aux pp. 417 et 418). De l'avis du juge de première instance, il suffisait que M. Johnston dise que l'étude de faisabilité du projet n'était pas encore terminée. Deuxièmement, la haute direction de l'intimée n'a aucunement tenté de nier expressément les déclarations faites à l'appelant pendant l'entrevue. Troisièmement, le juge de première instance a rejeté le moyen de défense selon lequel l'appelant, par la manière dont il a agi après avoir pris connaissance de la situation de Multiview, avait confirmé son contrat de travail. À cet égard, le juge White a fait une distinction en ce qui concerne la décision sur laquelle l'intimée s'appuyait (Burrows c. Burke (1984), 49 O.R. (2d) 76 (C.A.)), et a jugé que, par sa conduite, l'appelant n'avait pas confirmé le contrat de travail, mais qu'il avait agi comme une personne qui se trouve dans une situation difficile et qui tente de [TRADUCTION] «minimiser ses dommages» (à la p. 420). Quoi qu'il en soit, sa conduite [TRADUCTION] «n'équivalait pas à une renonciation explicite de son droit de demander des dent's defence of business necessity on the basis that there was no evidence of any such necessity which would exonerate the respondent from the negligent misrepresentations in issue.

Thus, White J. allowed the appellant's claim for negligent misrepresentation. He assessed the damages payable to the appellant at $67,224. This amount represented what was necessary, according to White J., "to put the [appellant] in the same position as he would have been if the negligent misrepresentation had not been made" (p. 414). It consists of $50,000 for loss of income, $252 for costs of obtaining a new employment, $11,972 for the loss on the purchase and sale of his home in the Ottawa area, and $5,000 in general damages for emotional stress.

B. Ontario Court of Appeal (1990), 74 O.R. (2d) 176

Finlayson J.A. (Griffiths and Arbour JJ.A. concurring) held that the trial judge made two errors in allowing the appellant's claim to succeed. Finlayson J.A. accepted that there was a "special relationship" between the appellant and the respondent so as to give rise to a duty of care of the sort described in Hedley Byrne, supra, and subsequent cases. However, he was of the view that, in the circumstances of the present case, White J. had erred in the manner in which he dealt with the issues of contractual disclaimer and of negligence.

With respect to disclaimer, Finlayson J.A. felt the trial judge had erred in requiring an express dommages-intérêts fondés sur la responsabilité délictuelle par suite des déclarations inexactes qui lui avaient été faites par négligence et qui l'avaient poussé à signer le contrat» (à la p. 421). À son avis, que le contrat soit confirmé ou non, la cause d'action en responsabilité délictuelle est maintenue car elle est indépendante du contrat. Et quatrièmement, le juge de première instance a rejeté le moyen de défense fondé sur la nécessité commerciale que l'intimée a invoqué, pour le motif que la preuve n'était pas faite de l'existence d'une nécessité de ce genre qui exonérerait cette dernière des déclarations inexactes faites par négligence.

Ainsi, le juge White a fait droit à la demande de l'appelant en ce qui concerne la déclaration inexacte faite par négligence. Il a évalué à 67 224 $ le montant des dommages-intérêts payables à ce dernier. Ce montant représentait ce qu'il fallait, selon le juge White, [TRADUCTION] «pour mettre [l'appelant] dans la même situation que celle dans laquelle il aurait été s'il n'y avait pas eu de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence» (à la p. 414). Ce montant se compose de 50 000 $ pour la perte de revenu, de 252 $ pour les frais d'obtention d'un nouvel emploi, de 11 972 $ pour la perte subie par suite de l'achat et de la vente de sa maison dans la région d'Ottawa, et de 5 000 $ représentant des dommages-intérêts généraux par suite du stress émotionnel subi.

B. Cour d'appel de l'Ontario (1990), 74 O.R. (2d) 176

Le juge Finlayson (avec l'appui des juges Griffiths et Arbour) a conclu que le juge de première instance a commis deux erreurs en permettant à l'appelant d'avoir gain de cause. Il a reconnu qu'il y a un «lien spécial» entre l'appelant et l'intimée, de sorte qu'il existe une obligation de diligence du genre décrit dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, précité, et dans des arrêts subséquents. Toutefois, il estime que, compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce, le juge White a commis une erreur en examinant les questions de dénégation contractuelle et de négligence.

Le juge Finlayson estime que le juge de première instance a commis une erreur en exigeant un disavowal of any representations that may have been made during the pre-contractual negotiations in order for a disclaimer argument to succeed, as it had in Hedley Byrne, supra, and in Carman Construction Ltd. v. Canadian Pacific Railway Co., [1982] 1 S.C.R. 958. In Finlayson J.A.'s opinion, something less than an express disclaimer could suffice (at p. 183): "it is a sufficient disclaimer if the contract contains terms which contradict or are inconsistent with the representations relied upon." He noted that the contract of employment, which the appellant read and understood, contained provisions relating to the possibility of reassignment and, more importantly, to the termination of employment on one month's notice. He found that such provisions were sufficient to constitute a valid disclaimer (at pp. 183 and 185):

> In the case on appeal, the [appellant] stated that he would not have given up his secure position in Calgary for a move to Ottawa that was without permanence, and yet he signed a contract which provided him with no assurances respecting his place of employment or its tenure. To rely on Hedley Byrne, the negligent misrepresentation must have amounted to a warranty of job security and yet the contract of employment was surely a disclaimer of just that. No representations as to job security, whether based on performance or on job availability, could have survived the one-month termination notice "without cause" contained in the contract.

The pre-employment discussions in this case merged in the contract of employment. There is no separate tort, even accepting the trial judge's findings of innocent misrepresentation, because the terms of the contract amounted to a disclaimer within the meaning of Hedley Byrne. The references to the Multiview project did not amount to warranties or representations that were independent of the contract of employment and they cannot survive the written agreement.

According to Finlayson J.A., this disclaimer was fatal to the appellant's claim as it had the effect of désaveu exprès de toute déclaration qui pouvait avoir été faite pendant les négociations préalables à la signature du contrat, pour que l'argument fondé sur la dénégation puisse être retenu, comme il l'a été dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, précité, et dans l'arrêt Carman Construction Ltd. c. Compagnie du chemin de fer canadien du Pacifique, [1982] 1 R.C.S. 958. De l'avis du juge Finlayson, quelque chose de moins qu'une dénégation expresse peut suffire (à la p. 183): [TRADUCTION] «il y a une dénégation suffisante si le contrat contient des clauses qui contredisent les déclarations auxquelles on s'est fié ou qui sont incompatibles avec ces déclarations.» Il fait remarquer que le contrat de travail, que l'appelant a lu et compris, contenait des dispositions concernant la possibilité d'une réaffectation et, fait encore plus important, concernant la cessation d'emploi sur préavis d'un mois. Il a conclu que ces dispositions sont suffisantes pour constituer une dénégation valide (aux pp. 183 et 185):

> [TRADUCTION] En l'espèce, [l'appelant] a déclaré qu'il n'aurait pas renoncé à son poste sûr à Calgary pour occuper à Ottawa un poste qui n'était pas permanent, et pourtant il a signé un contrat qui ne lui fournissait aucune garantie au sujet de son lieu de travail ou de sa permanence. Pour que l'arrêt Hedley Byrne puisse être invoqué, la déclaration inexacte faite par négligence doit équivaloir à une garantie de sécurité d'emploi, et pourtant le contrat de travail contenait certainement une dénégation à ce sujet. Aucune déclaration relative à la sécurité d'emploi, qu'elle soit fondée sur le rendement ou sur la disponibilité d'un emploi, n'aurait pu l'emporter sur la disposition concernant le préavis d'un mois de congédiement «sans motif» figurant dans le contrat.

En l'espèce, les discussions préalables à l'emploi ont abouti au contrat de travail. Il n'existe aucun délit distinct, même si l'on accepte les conclusions tirées par le juge de première instance au sujet d'une déclaration inexacte faite de bonne foi, parce que les conditions du contrat équivalaient à une dénégation au sens de l'arrêt Hedley Byrne. Les mentions du projet Multiview n'équivalaient pas à des garanties ou à des déclarations indépendantes du contrat de travail et elles ne peuvent pas l'emporter sur l'entente écrite.

Selon le juge Finlayson, cette dénégation porte un coup fatal à la demande de l'appelant car elle a negating any assumption of duty of care on the part of the respondent; a conclusion similar to the one reached in Hedley Byrne and Carman Construction, supra.

In any event, Finlayson J.A. was of the view that the trial judge had erred in his finding of negligent misrepresentation because he imposed a "higher duty of care" on the respondent than was required in the circumstances. According to Finlayson J.A., the duty in the case at bar is no more than a duty to take care that the representations made were "responsible and accurate to the knowledge of Johnston and of his principal, Cognos" (p. 186). He observed that the same representations were made to all the six candidates, that the purpose of the interview was to make the position sound attractive enough that the successful candidate would accept it, and that Mr. Johnston believed in the veracity of what he was saying during the interview. Moreover, he noted that the trial judge criticized more what was not said by Mr. Johnston, than what was actually said by him. In his view, any duty of care had been fully discharged in the circumstances of this case—there had been no negligent misrepresentation (at pp. 187-88):

Johnston was hired to oversee the Multiview project. Counsel for [the appellant] conceded that Johnston was as surprised as anyone at the corporate decision not to concentrate on it. Johnston believed in what he said to the job applicants about Multiview. The trial judge found that he had a duty to go further and to point out the details of the internal decision-making process at Cognos and stress that that process had not been completed. In other words, his own bona fide belief as a knowledgeable executive that the program was going forward was not sufficient. He had to divulge to all of the applicants that he interviewed the precise status of the corporate commitment to the development of the new product so that they could make their own assessment of the viability of the project.

In my opinion, this casts the duty too high. It suggests that at least a quasi-fiduciary relationship existed pour effet de nier toute présomption d'obligation de diligence de la part de l'intimée, conclusion semblable à celle qui a été tirée dans les arrêts Hedley Byrne et Carman Construction, précités.

Quoi qu'il en soit, le juge Finlayson estime que le juge de première instance a commis une erreur en concluant qu'il y a eu déclaration inexacte faite par négligence parce qu'il a imposé à l'intimée une [TRADUCTION] «obligation de diligence plus lourde» que celle qui était requise compte tenu des circonstances. Selon lui, l'obligation, en l'espèce, consiste simplement à veiller à ce que les déclarations soient [TRADUCTION] «réfléchies et exactes, à la connaissance de M. Johnston et de son commettant, Cognos» (à la p. 186). Le juge Finlayson fait remarquer que les mêmes déclarations ont été faites aux six candidats, que l'objet de l'entrevue était de rendre le poste suffisamment alléchant pour que le candidat retenu l'accepte, et que M. Johnston croyait à la véracité de ce qu'il disait pendant l'entrevue. En outre, il fait remarquer que le juge de première instance a davantage critiqué ce que M. Johnston n'a pas dit que ce qu'il a, en fait, réellement dit. À son avis, toute obligation de diligence a été pleinement respectée, compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce—il n'y a pas eu de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence (aux pp. 187 et 188):

[TRADUCTION] Monsieur Johnston a été embauché pour superviser le projet Multiview. L'avocat de [l'appelant] a reconnu que la décision de la société de ne pas concentrer son énergie sur ce projet a surpris M. Johnston autant que n'importe qui. Ce dernier croyait ce qu'il disait aux candidats au sujet de Multiview. Le juge de première instance a conclu qu'il était tenu de faire davantage, de signaler les particularités de la procédure interne de prise de décision au sein de Cognos et de souligner que cette procédure n'était pas terminée. En d'autres termes, le fait que, en sa qualité de dirigeant bien informé, il croyait réellement que le programme serait mis en œuvre n'était pas suffisant. Il devait informer tous les candidats qu'il rencontrait de la situation exacte relativement à l'engagement pris par la société à l'égard du développement du nouveau produit, de façon que ceux-ci puissent évaluer eux-mêmes la viabilité du projet.

À mon avis, il en résulte une obligation trop lourde. Cela laisse entendre qu'une relation quasi fiduciaire au between corporation and job applicant, giving rise to a duty to make full disclosure. Such a duty can exist in a given "special relationship" required by Hedley Byrne . . . but it does not exist in this one. The trial judge was in error in extending to this situation the narrow class of contract cases where uberrima fides is the standard.

In my opinion, while a "special relationship" existed between [the respondent] and the six applicants, any duty of care that arose from it was discharged. I say this without reference to the disclaimer in [the appellant's] contract. Johnston was not obliged to go farther than he did in describing the job prospects. What he said was truthful, he believed in it, that was enough.

There was an appeal and cross-appeal as to damages. Finlayson J.A. held that if, contrary to his view, the appellant's action was successful, he would not have interfered with the assessment of damages made by the trial judge.

III. Issues

I would characterize the issues raised by this appeal as follows:

(1) Disregarding for now the employment agreement signed by the appellant in March of 1983, did the respondent or its representative Mr. Johnston owe a duty of care to the appellant during the pre-employment interview of February 14, 1983, with respect to the representations made to the appellant about the respondent and the nature and existence of the employment opportunity being offered?

(2) If so, again disregarding for now the contract between the parties, did the respondent or its representative Mr. Johnston breach this duty of care in all the circumstances of this case?

(3) If so, should the answers given to questions 1 and 2, or the result that would normally follow from such conclusions (i.e. liability of the respondent for the damages caused to the appellant, fixed by the trial judge at $67,224, upheld by the Court moins existait entre la société et le candidat, d'où l'obligation de faire une divulgation complète. Cette obligation peut exister lorsqu'il y a un «lien spécial» donné au sens de l'arrêt Hedley Byrne [. . .] mais en l'espèce, elle n'existe pas. Le juge de première instance a commis une erreur en rangeant la présente affaire dans la catégorie restreinte des affaires contractuelles dans lesquelles uberrima fides est la norme.

À mon avis, il existait un «lien spécial» entre [l'intimée] et les six candidats, mais toute obligation de diligence en découlant a été respectée. Je dis ceci sans tenir compte de la dénégation figurant dans le contrat [de l'appelant]. Monsieur Johnston n'était pas tenu de faire davantage que ce qu'il a fait en décrivant les perspectives d'emploi. Ce qu'il a dit était vrai, il y croyait, et cela suffisait.

Un appel et un contre-appel ont été interjetés à l'égard des dommages-intérêts. Le juge Finlayson a conclu que si, contrairement à son avis, l'action intentée par l'appelant était accueillie, il ne modifierait pas l'évaluation des dommages-intérêts faite par le juge de première instance.

III. Les questions en litige

Je définirais comme suit les questions qui se posent en l'espèce:

(1) Abstraction faite pour le moment du contrat de travail signé par l'appelant en mars 1983, l'intimée ou son représentant, M. Johnston, avaient-ils une obligation de diligence envers l'appelant pendant l'entrevue de sélection du 14 février 1983, relativement aux déclarations faites à ce dernier au sujet de l'intimée ainsi que de la nature et de l'existence de l'emploi qui était offert?

(2) Dans l'affirmative, abstraction faite pour le moment du contrat entre les parties, l'intimée ou son représentant, M. Johnston, ont-ils violé cette obligation de diligence, compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce?

(3) Dans l'affirmative, les réponses données aux questions 1 et 2, ou le résultat qu'entraîneraient normalement ces conclusions (à savoir, la responsabilité de l'intimée, pour le préjudice causé à l'appelant, le montant des dommages-intérêts ayant été of Appeal, and unchallenged before this Court), be different in any way in view of the fact that the appellant signed an employment agreement after the negligent misrepresentations containing, inter alia, a termination "without cause" provision (clause 14) as well as a reassignment provision (clause 13)?

For reasons that follow, I am of the opinion that questions 1 and 2 should be answered in the affirmative and that question 3 should be answered in the negative. The appeal should therefore be allowed and the judgment of White J. in favour of the appellant and granting him damages in the amount of $67,224 should be restored.

IV. Analysis

A. Introduction

This appeal involves an action in tort to recover damages caused by alleged negligent misrepresentations made in the course of a hiring interview by an employer (the respondent), through its representative, to a prospective employee (the appellant) with respect to the employer and the nature and existence of the employment opportunity. Though a relatively recent feature of the common law, the tort of negligent misrepresentation relied on by the appellant and first recognized by the House of Lords in Hedley Byrne, supra, is now an established principle of Canadian tort law. This Court has confirmed on many occasions, sometimes tacitly, that an action in tort may lie, in appropriate circumstances, for damages caused by a misrepresentation made in a negligent manner: see Welbridge Holdings Ltd. v. Metropolitan Corporation of Greater Winnipeg, [1971] S.C.R. 957; J. Nunes Diamonds Ltd. v. Dominion Electric Protection Co., [1972] S.C.R. 769; Rivtow Marine Ltd. v. Washington Iron Works, [1974] S.C.R. 1189; Hodgins v. Hydro-Electric Commission of the Township of Nepean, [1976] 2 S.C.R. 501; The Pas (Town of) v. Porky Packers Ltd., [1977] 1 S.C.R. 51; Haig v. Bamford, [1977] 1 S.C.R. 466; Carman Construction, supra; V.K. Mason Construction Ltd. v. Bank of Nova Scotia, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 271;

fixé à 67 224 $ par le juge de première instance et confirmé par la Cour d'appel et n'ayant pas été contesté devant notre Cour), devraient-ils être, de quelque façon que ce soit, différents vu que, après les déclarations inexactes faites par négligence, l'appelant a signé un contrat de travail contenant notamment une disposition au sujet du congédiement «sans motif» (clause 14) ainsi qu'une disposition concernant la réaffectation (clause 13)?

Pour les motifs qui suivent, j'estime qu'il y a lieu de répondre aux questions 1 et 2 par l'affirmative et à la question 3 par la négative. Le pourvoi devrait donc être accueilli et le jugement que le juge White a rendu en faveur de l'appelant, dans lequel il accordait à ce dernier des dommages-intérêts de 67 224 $, devrait être rétabli.

IV. Analyse

A. Introduction

Le présent pourvoi concerne une action en responsabilité délictuelle pour dommages-intérêts fondée sur des déclarations inexactes qu'aurait faites par négligence à un employé éventuel (l'appelant) un employeur (l'intimée), par l'entremise de son représentant, dans le cadre d'une entrevue d'embauchage, au sujet de l'employeur ainsi que de la nature et de l'existence de l'emploi. Bien qu'il s'agisse d'un élément relativement récent de la common law, le délit de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence sur lequel s'appuie l'appelant et qui a pour la première fois été reconnu par la Chambre des lords dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, précité, est maintenant reconnu dans le droit canadien de la responsabilité délictuelle. Notre Cour a confirmé à maintes reprises, et parfois tacitement, qu'une action en responsabilité délictuelle peut être intentée, dans les cas appropriés, pour un préjudice découlant d'une déclaration inexacte faite d'une manière négligente: voir Welbridge Holdings Ltd. c. Metropolitan Corporation of Greater Winnipeg, [1971] R.C.S. 957; J. Nunes Diamonds Ltd. c. Dominion Electric Protection Co., [1972] R.C.S. 769; Rivtow Marine Ltd. c. Washington Iron Works, [1974] R.C.S. 1189; Hodgins c. Hydro-Electric Commission of the Township of Nepean, [1976] 2 R.C.S. 501; Le Pas (Ville de) c. Porky

and Rainbow Industrial Caterers Ltd. v. Canadian National Railway Co., [1991] 3 S.C.R. 3.

While the doctrine of Hedley Byrne, supra, is well established in Canada, the exact breadth of its applicability is, like any common law principle, subject to debate and to continuous development. At the time this appeal was heard, there have only been a handful of cases where the tort of negligent misrepresentation was used in a pre-employment context such as the one involved here: see Steer v. Aerovox Inc. (1984), 65 N.S.R. (2d) 91 (S.C.T.D.); H.B. Nickerson & Sons Ltd. v. Wooldridge (1980), 115 D.L.R. (3d) 97 (N.S.S.C.A.D.); Williams v. School District No. 63 (Saanich) (1986), 11 C.C.E.L. 233 (B.C.S.C.), aff'd on other grounds (1987), 17 C.C.E.L. 257 (B.C.C.A.); Grenier v. Timmins Board of Education, Ont. H.C., No. 1250/82, May 31, 1984, 26 A.C.W.S. (2d) 285; Pettit v. Prince George & District Credit Union (1991), 35 C.C.E.L. 140 (B.C.S.C.); and Roy v. B.N.P.P. Regional Police Commission (1986), 15 C.C.E.L. 167 (N.B.Q.B.). Without question, the present factual situation is a novel one for this Court.

Some have suggested that it is inappropriate to extend the application of Hedley Byrne, supra, to representations made by an employer to a prospective employee in the course of an interview because it places a heavy burden on employers. As will be apparent from my reasons herein, I disagree in principle with this view. However, I find it unnecessary for the purposes of this appeal to engage in a general and abstract discussion on the applicability of the tort of negligent misrepresentation to pre-employment representations. The thrust of the respondent's argument before this Court is not that the appellant's action is unfounded in law. Rather, the respondent argues that the appellant has not made out a case for compensation based on negligent misrepresentation. Accordingly, this appeal may be disposed of simply by considering Packers Ltd., [1977] 1 R.C.S. 51; Haig c. Bamford, [1977] 1 R.C.S. 466; Carman Construction, précité; V.K. Mason Construction Ltd. c. Banque de Nouvelle-Écosse, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 271; et Rainbow Industrial Caterers Ltd. c. Compagnie des chemins de fer nationaux du Canada, [1991] 3 R.C.S. 3.

La doctrine énoncée dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, précité, est bien établie au Canada, mais l'étendue exacte de son application est, comme tout principe de common law, sujette à controverse et en évolution constante. Au moment où le pourvoi a été entendu, il n'y avait eu que quelques affaires dans lesquelles le délit de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence était utilisé dans un contexte préalable à l'emploi comme celui en l'espèce: voir Steer c. Aerovox Inc. (1984), 65 N.S.R. (2d) 91 (C.S.D.P.I.); H.B. Nickerson & Sons Ltd. c. Wooldridge (1980), 115 D.L.R. (3d) 97 (C.S.N.-É. Div. app.); Williams c. School District No. 63 (Saanich) (1986), 11 C.C.E.L. 233 (C.S.C.-B.) conf. pour d'autres motifs par (1987), 17 C.C.E.L. 257 (C.A.C.B.); Grenier c. Timmins Board of Education, H.C. Ont., nº 1250/82, 31 mai 1984, 26 A.C.W.S. (2d) 285; Pettit c. Prince George & District Credit Union (1991), 35 C.C.E.L. 140 (C.S.C.-B.); et Roy c. B.N.P.P. Regional Police Commission (1986), 15 C.C.E.L. 167 (B.R.N.-B.). La situation de fait ici en cause est indubitablement une situation nouvelle pour notre Cour.

On a laissé entendre qu'il ne convient pas d'étendre l'application de l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, précité, aux déclarations qu'un employeur fait à un employé éventuel dans le cadre d'une entrevue, parce que cela impose un lourd fardeau aux employeurs. Mes motifs montreront que je ne souscris pas, en principe, à cet avis. Toutefois, j'estime qu'il est inutile, aux fins du présent pourvoi, d'entamer une discussion générale et abstraite au sujet de l'application du délit de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence aux déclarations préalables à l'emploi. L'essence de l'argument invoqué par l'intimée devant notre Cour n'est pas que l'action intentée par l'appelant n'est pas fondée en droit. L'intimée soutient plutôt que ce dernier n'a pas présenté de preuve à l'appui d'un dédommagement fondé sur une déclaration inexacte faite par whether or not the required elements under the Hedley Byrne doctrine are established in the facts of this case. In my view, they are.

The required elements for a successful Hedley Byrne claim have been stated in many authorities, sometimes in varying forms. The decisions of this Court cited above suggest five general requirements: (1) there must be a duty of care based on a "special relationship" between the representor and the representee; (2) the representation in question must be untrue, inaccurate, or misleading; (3) the representor must have acted negligently in making said misrepresentation; (4) the representee must have relied, in a reasonable manner, on said negligent misrepresentation; and (5) the reliance must have been detrimental to the representee in the sense that damages resulted. In the case at bar, the trial judge found that all elements were present and allowed the appellant's claim.

In particular, White J. found, as a fact, that the respondent's representative, Mr. Johnston, had misrepresented the nature and existence of the employment opportunity for which the appellant had applied, and that the appellant had relied to his detriment on those misrepresentations. These findings of fact were undisturbed by the Court of Appeal and, except for a few passing remarks, the respondent does not challenge them before this Court. Thus, the second, fourth, and fifth requirements are not in question here.

The only issues before this Court deal with the duty of care owed to the appellant in the circumstances of this case and the alleged breach of this duty (i.e., the alleged negligence). The respondent concedes that a "special relationship" existed between itself (through its representative) and the appellant so as to give rise to a duty of care. However, it argues that this duty is negated by a disclaimer contained in the employment contract signed by the appellant more than two weeks after the interview. Furthermore, the respondent argues négligence. Par conséquent, on pourrait trancher le pourvoi simplement en déterminant si l'existence des éléments requis en vertu de la doctrine énoncée dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne est établie selon les faits de l'espèce. À mon avis, cette existence est établie.

Les éléments requis, pour qu'il soit fait droit à une demande fondée sur l'arrêt Hedley Byrne ont été énoncés dans de nombreux arrêts, parfois sous diverses formes. Les arrêts précités de notre Cour donnent à penser qu'il existe cinq conditions générales: (1) il doit y avoir une obligation de diligence fondée sur un «lien spécial» entre l'auteur et le destinataire de la déclaration; (2) la déclaration en question doit être fausse, inexacte ou trompeuse; (3) l'auteur doit avoir agi d'une manière négligente; (4) le destinataire doit s'être fié d'une manière raisonnable à la déclaration inexacte faite par négligence, et (5) le fait que le destinataire s'est fié à la déclaration doit lui être préjudiciable en ce sens qu'il doit avoir subi un préjudice. En l'espèce, le juge de première instance a conclu que tous les éléments étaient présents et a fait droit à la demande de l'appelant.

En particulier, le juge White a tenu pour avéré, que le représentant de l'intimée, M. Johnston, avait fait des déclarations inexactes au sujet de la nature et de l'existence de l'emploi auquel l'appelant s'était porté candidat, et que ce dernier s'était appuyé à son détriment sur ces déclarations inexactes. La Cour d'appel n'a pas modifié ces conclusions de fait et, à l'exception de quelques remarques faites en passant, l'intimée ne les conteste pas devant notre Cour. Par conséquent, les deuxième, quatrième et cinquième conditions n'entrent pas ici en ligne de compte.

Les seules questions qui se posent devant notre Cour portent sur l'obligation de diligence qui existe envers l'appelant compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce, et sur la violation alléguée de cette obligation (c.-à-d. l'allégation de négligence). L'intimée reconnaît qu'il y avait entre elle (par l'entremise de son représentant) et l'appelant, un «lien spécial» qui donnait lieu à une obligation de diligence. Toutefois, elle soutient que cette obligation est éteinte en raison de la dénégation contenue dans le contrat de travail signé par l'appelant plus that any misrepresentations made during the hiring interview were not made in a negligent manner. For reasons that follow, it is my view that both submissions fail.

However, before turning to these issues, I intend to deal with a preliminary matter not directly raised in argument. This appeal was argued before this Court in close proximity to the case BG Checo International Ltd. v. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 12. That case involved circumstances somewhat similar to those in the present appeal in that it also dealt with a claim for damages based on an alleged negligent misrepresentation stemming from pre-contractual negotiations. Generally speaking, in BG Checo as in the case at bar, it was argued that certain representations made in a pre-contractual setting did not correspond with the post-agreement reality and were made in a negligent manner. In both cases, the defendants relied on the contract signed by the parties subsequent to the alleged negligent misrepresentation in order to bar the plaintiffs' claim in tort. As my conclusion in BG Checo is opposite from the one I take herein, I believe it is useful at the outset to explain why this case is clearly distinguishable from BG Checo. In doing so, my hope is to clarify some of the confusion which currently exists with respect to pre-contractual negligent misrepresentations.

B. Preliminary Observations on the Effect of the Employment Agreement on this Appeal

As I stated in BG Checo, it is now clear that an action in tort for negligent misrepresentation may lie even though the relevant parties to the action (i.e., the representee/plaintiff and the representor/defendant) are in a contractual relationship: see Esso Petroleum Co. v. Mardon, [1976] 2 All E.R. 5 (C.A.); Sodd Corporation Inc.

de deux semaines après l'entrevue. En outre, l'intimée soutient qu'aucune déclaration inexacte faite pendant l'entrevue d'embauchage n'a été faite par négligence. Pour les motifs qui suivent, les deux arguments doivent, à mon avis, être rejetés.

Toutefois, avant d'examiner ces questions, j'ai l'intention de me pencher sur une question préliminaire qui n'a pas directement été soulevée dans l'argumentation. Notre Cour a entendu le présent pourvoi presque en même temps que le pourvoi BG Checo International Ltd. c. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, [1993] 1 R.C.S. 12. Les circonstances de cette affaire sont à peu près semblables à celles de l'espèce, en ce sens qu'il s'agit également d'une action en dommages-intérêts fondée sur une déclaration inexacte qui aurait été faite par négligence dans le cadre de négociations préalables à la passation d'un contrat. De manière générale, dans le pourvoi BG Checo comme en l'espèce, on a soutenu que certaines déclarations préalables à la passation du contrat ne correspondaient pas à la réalité, après la passation du contrat, et avaient été faites d'une manière négligente. Dans les deux cas, les défendeurs se sont fondés sur le contrat signé par les parties après les déclarations inexactes qui auraient été faites par négligence pour contester la demande fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle présentée par les demandeurs. Étant donné que la conclusion que j'ai tirée dans l'arrêt BG Checo est contraire à celle que je tire en l'espèce, je crois utile d'expliquer dès le début pourquoi une distinction peut clairement être faite entre les deux affaires. Ce faisant, j'espère dissiper quelque peu la confusion qui existe actuellement en ce qui concerne les déclarations inexactes faites par négligence avant la passation d'un contrat.

B. Observations préliminaires au sujet de l'effet du contrat de travail sur le présent pourvoi

Comme je l'ai dit dans l'arrêt BG Checo, il est maintenant clair qu'une action en responsabilité délictuelle fondée sur une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence peut être intentée malgré l'existence d'un lien contractuel entre les parties à l'action (à savoir le destinataire de la déclaration ou demandeur et l'auteur de la déclaration ou

v. Tessis (1977), 17 O.R. (2d) 158 (C.A.); Kingu v. Walmar Ventures Ltd. (1986), 38 C.C.L.T. 51 (B.C.C.A.); Carman Construction, supra; V.K. Mason Construction, supra; Rainbow Industrial Caterers, supra; and L. N. Klar, Tort Law (1991), at p. 162, n. 89. More particularly, the fact that the alleged negligent misrepresentations are made in a pre-contractual setting, such as during negotiations or in the course of an employment hiring interview, and the fact that a contract is subsequently entered into by the parties do not, in themselves, bar an action in tort for damages caused by said misrepresentations: see, for example, Esso Petroleum, supra, and the cases cited above dealing specifically with pre-employment misrepresentation.

This is not to say that the contract in such a case is irrelevant and that a court should dispose of the plaintiff's tort claim independently of the contractual arrangement. On the contrary, depending on the circumstances, the subsequent contract may play a very important role in determining whether or not, and to what extent, a claim for negligent misrepresentation shall succeed. Indeed, as evidenced by my conclusion in BG Checo, such a contract can have the effect of negating the action in tort and of confining the plaintiff to whatever remedies are available under the law of contract. On the other hand, even if the tort claim is not barred altogether by the contract, the duty or liability of the defendant with respect to negligent misrepresentations may be limited or excluded by a term of the subsequent contract so as to diminish or extinguish the plaintiff's remedy in tort: see, for example, Hedley Byrne (although this case did not involve a contract) and Carman Construction (although this case involved mostly post-contractual representations), supra. Equally true, however, is that there are cases where the subsequent contract will have no effect whatsoever on the plaintiff's claim for damages in tort. As will be apparent from these reasons, it is my view that the Klar, Tort Law (1991), à la p. 162, n. 89. En particulier, le fait que les déclarations inexactes alléguées soient faites avant la passation d'un contrat, par exemple au cours des négociations ou dans le cadre d'une entrevue d'embauchage, et le fait qu'un contrat soit par la suite passé par les parties n'excluent pas, en soi, une action en responsabilité délictuelle pour dommages-intérêts fondée sur lesdites déclarations inexactes: voir, par exemple, l'arrêt Esso Petroleum, précité, et les arrêts susmentionnés qui portent expressément sur les déclarations inexactes préalables à l'emploi.

Cela ne veut pas dire qu'en pareil cas le contrat n'est pas pertinent et qu'un tribunal devrait trancher la demande fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle présentée par le demandeur indépendamment des dispositions contractuelles. Au contraire, selon les circonstances, le contrat subséquent peut avoir une très grande importance lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer s'il doit être fait droit à une demande fondée sur une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence et dans quelle mesure. De fait, comme en fait foi la conclusion que j'ai tirée dans l'arrêt BG Checo, pareil contrat peut avoir pour effet d'exclure l'action fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle et de restreindre le demandeur à tout recours qu'il peut exercer en vertu du droit des contrats. Par ailleurs, même si le contrat n'exclut pas complètement la demande fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle, l'obligation ou la responsabilité qui incombe au défendeur en ce qui concerne les déclarations inexactes faites par négligence peut être limitée ou exclue par une condition du contrat subséquent, de façon à restreindre ou à éteindre le recours de nature délictuelle: voir, par exemple, l'arrêt Hedley Byrne (bien que, dans cette affaire, il n'était pas question de contrat) et l'arrêt Carman Construction (bien que cette affaire se rapporte surtout à des déclarations faites après la passation du contrat), précités. Toutefois, il est également employment agreement signed by the appellant in March of 1983 is governed by this last proposition.

When considering the effect of the subsequent contract on the representee's tort action, everything revolves around the nature of the contractual obligations assumed by the parties and the nature of the alleged negligent misrepresentation. The first and foremost question should be whether there is a specific contractual duty created by an express term of the contract which is co-extensive with the common law duty of care which the representee alleges the representor has breached. Put another way, did the pre-contractual representation relied on by the plaintiff become an express term of the subsequent contract? If so, absent any overriding considerations arising from the context in which the transaction occurred, the plaintiff cannot bring a concurrent action in tort for negligent misrepresentation and is confined to whatever remedies are available under the law of contract. The authorities supporting this proposition, including the decision of this Court in Central Trust Co. v. Rafuse, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 147, are fully canvassed in my reasons in BG Checo. As alluded to in BG Checo, this principle is an exception to the general rule of concurrency espoused by this Court in Central Trust v. Rafuse, supra.

There lies, in my view, the fundamental difference between the present appeal and BG Checo, supra. In the latter case, the alleged pre-contractual misrepresentation had been incorporated verbatim as an express term of the subsequent contract. As such, the common law duty of care relied on by the plaintiff in its tort action was co-extensive with a duty imposed on the defendant in contract by an express term of their agreement. Thus, it was my vrai que, dans certains cas, le contrat subséquent n'aura aucun effet sur l'action en dommages-intérêts intentée par le demandeur en vertu de la responsabilité délictuelle. Comme mes motifs le montreront, j'estime que le contrat de travail signé par l'appelant en mars 1983 est régi par cette dernière proposition.

Dans l'examen de l'effet du contrat subséquent sur l'action en responsabilité délictuelle intentée par le destinataire de la déclaration, tout tourne autour de la nature des obligations contractuelles assumées par les parties et de la nature de la déclaration inexacte qui aurait été faite par négligence. Il s'agit avant tout de savoir si une obligation contractuelle précise a été créée par une condition expresse du contrat qui coïncide avec l'obligation de diligence existant en common law, que, selon le destinataire, l'auteur de la déclaration aurait violée. Autrement dit, la déclaration faite avant la signature du contrat à laquelle le demandeur s'est fié, est-elle devenue une condition expresse du contrat subséquent? Dans l'affirmative, faute d'une considération prépondérante découlant du contexte dans lequel l'affaire a été conclue, le demandeur ne peut pas intenter une action en responsabilité délictuelle concomitante (aussi appelée concurrente) fondée sur une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence, et doit se limiter aux recours prévus par le droit des contrats. Dans mes motifs de l'arrêt BG Checo, précité, j'ai fait un examen complet des arrêts à l'appui de cette proposition, et notamment de l'arrêt de notre Cour Central Trust Co. c. Rafuse, [1986] 2 R.C.S. 147. Comme je le donne à entendre dans l'arrêt BG Checo, il s'agit d'une exception à la règle générale de la concomitance que notre Cour a adoptée dans l'arrêt Central Trust c. Rafuse, précité.

À mon avis, c'est là la différence fondamentale entre le présent pourvoi et le pourvoi BG Checo, précité. Dans cette dernière affaire, la déclaration inexacte alléguée avait été intégralement incorporée à titre de condition expresse du contrat subséquent. En tant que telle, l'obligation de diligence existant en common law, invoquée par le demandeur dans son action en responsabilité délictuelle, coïncidait avec l'obligation incombant au défenview that the plaintiff was barred from exercising a concurrent action in tort for the alleged breach of said duty, and this view was reinforced by the commercial context in which the transaction occurred. In the case at bar, however, there is no such concurrency. The employment agreement signed by the appellant in March of 1983 does not contain any express contractual obligation co-extensive with the duty of care the respondent is alleged to have breached. The provisions most relevant to this appeal (clauses 13 and 14) contain contractual duties clearly different from, not co-extensive with, the common law duty invoked by the appellant in his tort action.

Had the appellant's action been based on pre-contractual representations concerning the length of his involvement on the Multiview project or his "job security", as characterized by the Court of Appeal, the concurrency question might be resolved differently in light of the termination and reassignment provisions of the contract. However, it is clear that the appellant's claim was not that Mr. Johnston negligently misrepresented the amount of time he would be working on Multiview or the conditions under which his employment could be terminated. In other words, he did not argue that the respondent, through its representative, breached a common law duty of care by negligently misrepresenting his security of employment with Cognos. Rather, the appellant argued that Mr. Johnston negligently misrepresented the nature and existence of the employment opportunity being offered. It is the existence, or reality, of the job being interviewed for, not the extent of the appellant's involvement therein, which is at the heart of this tort action. A close reading of the employment agreement reveals that it contains no express provisions dealing with the respondent's obligations with respect to the nature and existence of the Multiview project. Accordingly, the ratio decidendi of my reasons in BG Checo is inapplicable to the present appeal. While both cases involve pre-contractual negligent misrepresentations, only deur en vertu d'une condition expresse du contrat. J'ai donc estimé que le demandeur ne pouvait pas intenter une action en responsabilité délictuelle concomitante par suite de la violation alléguée de ladite obligation, opinion qui était renforcée par le contexte commercial dans lequel l'opération avait été effectuée. Toutefois, en l'espèce, il n'existe aucune concomitance de ce genre. Le contrat de travail que l'appelant a signé en mars 1983 ne comporte aucune obligation contractuelle expresse qui coïncide avec l'obligation de diligence que l'intimée aurait violée. Les dispositions les plus pertinentes en l'espèce (les clauses 13 et 14) prévoient des obligations contractuelles qui sont clairement distinctes de l'obligation de common law invoquée par l'appelant dans l'action en responsabilité délictuelle et qui ne coïncident pas avec ladite obligation.

Si l'action intentée par l'appelant avait été fondée sur des déclarations faites avant la signature du contrat au sujet de la durée de sa participation au projet Multiview ou de la «sécurité d'emploi», pour reprendre l'expression utilisée par la Cour d'appel, la question de la concomitance pourrait bien être réglée différemment compte tenu des dispositions du contrat concernant la cessation d'emploi et la réaffectation. Toutefois, il est clair que l'appelant n'a pas allégué que M. Johnston avait par négligence fait une déclaration inexacte au sujet de la période pendant laquelle il travaillerait au projet Multiview ou au sujet des conditions en vertu desquelles il pouvait être mis fin à son emploi. En d'autres termes, il n'a pas soutenu que, par l'entremise de son représentant, l'intimée a violé une obligation de diligence existant en common law en faisant par négligence une déclaration inexacte au sujet de sa sécurité d'emploi auprès de Cognos. L'appelant a plutôt soutenu que M. Johnston a par négligence fait une déclaration inexacte au sujet de la nature et de l'existence de l'emploi qui était offert. C'est l'existence, ou la réalité, de l'emploi en question, et non l'étendue de la participation de l'appelant, qui constitue le nœud de l'action en responsabilité délictuelle en l'espèce. La lecture minutieuse du contrat de travail révèle que celui-ci ne comporte aucune disposition expresse au sujet des obligations de l'intimée en ce

BG Checo involved an impermissible concurrent liability in tort and contract, an exception to the general rule of concurrency set out in Central Trust v. Rafuse, supra. The case at bar does not involve concurrency at all, let alone an exception thereto.

Having said this, it does not follow that the employment agreement is irrelevant to the disposition of this appeal. As I mentioned earlier, even if the tort claim is not barred altogether by the contract as in BG Checo, the duty or liability of the representor in tort may be limited or excluded by a term of the subsequent contract. In this respect, the respondent submits that the Court of Appeal was correct in finding that clauses 13 and 14 of the employment agreement represent a valid disclaimer for the misrepresentations allegedly made during the hiring interview, thereby negating any duty of care. I shall return to this issue in the last part of my reasons. I prefer to deal next with the questions of whether the respondent or its representative owed a duty of care to the appellant during the pre-employment interview and, if so, whether there was a breach of this duty in all the circumstances of this case.

C. The Duty of Care Owed to the Appellant

The respondent concedes that it itself and its representative, Mr. Johnston, owed a duty of care towards the six job applicants being interviewed, including the appellant, not to make negligent misrepresentations as to Cognos and the nature and permanence of the job being offered. In so doing, it accepts as correct the findings of both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal that there existed between the parties a "special relationship" within the meaning of Hedley Byrne, supra.

qui concerne la nature et l'existence du projet Multiview. Par conséquent, la ratio decidendi de mes motifs dans l'arrêt BG Checo ne s'applique pas en l'espèce. Les deux affaires portent sur des déclarations inexactes faites par négligence avant la passation d'un contrat, mais seule l'affaire BG Checo concerne une responsabilité concomitante prohibée en droit de la responsabilité délictuelle et en droit des contrats, une exception à la règle générale de la concomitance établie dans l'arrêt Central Trust c. Rafuse, précité. En l'espèce, il n'est pas du tout question de la concomitance, et encore moins d'une exception y afférente.

Cela dit, il ne s'ensuit pas que le contrat de travail n'est pas pertinent dans le présent pourvoi. Comme je l'ai déjà mentionné, même si le contrat n'exclut pas la demande fondée sur la responsabilité délictuelle, comme c'était le cas dans le pourvoi BG Checo, le devoir ou l'obligation de l'auteur de la déclaration sur le plan délictuel peut être limité ou exclu par une condition du contrat subséquent. À cet égard, l'intimée soutient que la Cour d'appel a eu raison de conclure que les clauses 13 et 14 du contrat de travail constituent une dénégation valide des déclarations inexactes qui auraient été faites pendant l'entrevue d'embauchage, de sorte que l'obligation de diligence est annulée. Je reviendrai sur la question dans la dernière partie de mes motifs. Je préfère examiner maintenant la question de savoir si, pendant l'entrevue de sélection, l'intimée ou son représentant avaient une obligation de diligence envers l'appelant et, dans l'affirmative, si cette obligation a été violée compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce.

C. L'obligation de diligence envers l'appelant

L'intimée concède qu'elle et son représentant, M. Johnston, avaient une obligation de diligence envers les six candidats qui subissaient une entrevue, dont l'appelant, à savoir qu'elle ne devait pas faire par négligence des déclarations inexactes au sujet de Cognos ou de la nature et de la permanence de l'emploi offert. Ce faisant, elle reconnaît l'exactitude des conclusions tirées par le juge de première instance et par la Cour d'appel, selon lesquelles il existait entre les parties un «lien spécial» au sens de l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, précité.

1993 CanLII 146 (SCC)

In my view, this concession is a sensible one. Without a doubt, when all the circumstances of this case are taken into account, the respondent and Mr. Johnston were under an obligation to exercise due diligence throughout the hiring interview with respect to the representations made to the appellant about Cognos and the nature and existence of the employment opportunity.

There is some debate in academic circles, fuelled by various judicial pronouncements, about the proper test that should be applied to determine when a "special relationship" exists between the representor and the representee which will give rise to a duty of care. Some have suggested that "foreseeable and reasonable reliance" on the representations is the key element to the analysis, while others speak of "voluntary assumption of responsibility" on the part of the representor. Recently, in Caparo Industries plc v. Dickman, [1990] 1 All E.R. 568 (H.L.), a case unlike the present one in that there the whole issue revolved around the existence of a duty of care, the House of Lords suggested that three criteria determine the imposition of a duty of care: foreseeability of damage, proximity of relationship, and the reasonableness or otherwise of imposing a duty.

For my part, I find it unnecessary—and unwise in view of the respondent's concession—to take part in this debate. Regardless of the test applied, the result which the circumstances of this case dictate would be the same. It was foreseeable that the appellant would be relying on the information given during the hiring interview in order to make his career decision. It was reasonable for the appellant to rely on said representations. There is nothing before this Court that suggests that the respondent was not, at the time of the interview or shortly thereafter, assuming responsibility for what was being represented to the appellant by Mr. Johnston. As noted by the trial judge, Mr. Johnston discussed the Multiview project in an unqualified manner, without making any relevant caveats. The alleged disclaimers of responsibility are provisions of a

À mon avis, cette concession est sensée. Sans doute, si l'on tient compte des circonstances de l'espèce, l'intimée et M. Johnston étaient obligés de faire preuve de diligence raisonnable pendant toute l'entrevue d'embauchage en ce qui concerne les déclarations qui étaient faites à l'appelant au sujet de Cognos ou de la nature et de l'existence de l'emploi.

Dans les milieux universitaires, il existe une certaine controverse, alimentée par divers prononcés judiciaires, quant au critère qu'il convient d'appliquer pour déterminer dans quelles circonstances il existe entre l'auteur d'une déclaration et son destinataire un «lien spécial» qui donne lieu à une obligation de diligence. Certains ont laissé entendre que l'élément fondamental de l'examen est qu'il est [TRADUCTION] «prévisible et raisonnable qu'on se fiera» aux déclarations, mais d'autres parlent du fait que l'auteur de la déclaration [TRADUCTION] «engage volontairement sa responsabilité». Récemment, dans l'arrêt Caparo Industries plc c. Dickman, [1990] 1 All E.R. 568 (H.L.), une affaire différente à ceux de l'espèce en ce sens que tout le litige concernait l'existence d'une obligation de diligence, la Chambre des lords a laissé entendre que l'obligation de diligence est fonction de trois critères: la prévisibilité du préjudice, l'étroitesse des liens entre les intéressés et le fait qu'il soit raisonnable ou non d'imposer une obligation.

Pour ma part, j'estime qu'il est inutile—et peu sage, compte tenu de la concession faite par l'intimée—d'intervenir dans cette controverse. Indépendamment du critère appliqué, le résultat dicté par les circonstances de l'espèce serait le même. Il était prévisible que l'appelant se fierait aux renseignements donnés pendant l'entrevue d'embauchage pour prendre une décision au sujet de sa carrière. Il était raisonnable qu'il se fie à ces déclarations. Rien de ce qui a été présenté devant notre Cour ne semble indiquer qu'au moment de l'entrevue ou peu de temps après, l'intimée n'assumait pas la responsabilité de ce que M. Johnston disait à l'appelant. Comme le juge de première instance l'a fait remarquer, M. Johnston a parlé du projet Multiview en termes catégoriques, sans faire quelque mise en garde que ce soit à ce sujet. Les contract signed more than two weeks after the interview. For reasons that I give in the last part of this analysis, these provisions are not valid disclaimers. They do not negate the duty of care owed to the appellant or prevent it from arising as in Hedley Byrne and Carman Construction, supra. It was foreseeable to the respondent and its representative that the appellant would sustain damages should the representations relied on prove to be false and negligently made. There was, undoubtedly, a relationship of proximity between the parties at all material times. Finally, it is not unreasonable to impose a duty of care in all the circumstances of this case; quite the contrary, it would be unreasonable not to impose such a duty. In short, therefore, there existed between the parties a "special relationship" at the time of the interview. The respondent and its representative Mr. Johnston were under a duty of care during the pre-employment interview to exercise reasonable care and diligence in making representations as to the employer and the employment opportunity being offered.

Although it was not argued before this Court, I wish to add what is implicit in my acceptance of the respondent's concession, namely, that I reject the so-called restrictive approach as to who can owe a Hedley Byrne duty of care, often associated with the majority judgment in Mutual Life and Citizens' Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Evatt, [1971] A.C. 793 (P.C.). In my opinion, confining this duty of care to "professionals" who are in the business of providing information and advice, such as doctors, lawyers, bankers, architects, and engineers, reflects an overly simplistic view of the analysis required in cases such as the present one. The question of whether a duty of care with respect to representations exists depends on a number of considerations including, but not limited to, the representor's profession. While this factor may provide a good indication as to whether a "special relationship" exists between the parties, it should not be treated in all cases as a threshold requirement. There may be sit-dénégations de responsabilité alléguées sont des dispositions d'un contrat signé plus de deux semaines après l'entrevue. Pour les raisons que j'énoncerai à la fin de cette analyse, ces dispositions ne constituent pas des dénégations valides. Elles n'annulent pas l'obligation de diligence qui existe envers l'appelant ni n'empêchent cette obligation d'être soulevée, comme c'était le cas dans les arrêts Hedley Byrne et Carman Construction, précités. L'intimée et son représentant pouvaient prévoir que l'appelant subirait un préjudice si les déclarations sur lesquelles ce dernier s'était appuyé se révélaient fausses et faites par négligence. Sans aucun doute, il existait, à tout moment pertinent, des liens suffisamment étroits entre les parties. Enfin, il n'est pas déraisonnable d'imposer une obligation de diligence, compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce; bien au contraire, il serait déraisonnable de ne pas imposer pareille obligation. Bref, il existait donc un «lien spécial» entre les parties au moment de l'entrevue. L'intimée et son représentant, M. Johnston, avaient une obligation de diligence pendant l'entrevue de sélection et ils étaient tenus de faire preuve d'une prudence et d'une diligence raisonnables en faisant des déclarations au sujet de l'employeur et de l'emploi offert.

La chose n'a pas été débattue devant notre Cour, mais je veux ajouter ce qui est implicite lorsque je retiens la concession faite par l'intimée, à savoir que je rejette ce qu'on appelle la méthode restrictive lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer qui peut avoir une obligation de diligence au sens de l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, qui est souvent associé au jugement rendu par la majorité dans l'arrêt Mutual Life and Citizens' Assurance Co. Ltd. c. Evatt, [1971] A.C. 793 (C.P.). À mon avis, limiter cette obligation de diligence aux «professionnels» dont la tâche consiste à fournir des renseignements et des conseils, comme les médecins, les avocats, les banquiers, les architectes et les ingénieurs, est adopter une vue trop simpliste au sujet de l'examen requis dans des affaires comme la présente espèce. La question de savoir si une obligation de diligence existe à l'égard des déclarations dépend d'un certain nombre de considérations, notamment de la profession de l'auteur. Ce facteur peut constituer une bonne uations where the surrounding circumstances provide sufficient indicia of a duty of care, notwithstanding the representor's profession. Indeed, the case at bar is a good example. I find support for a more flexible approach on this question in a number of authorities: see, for example, the dissenting reasons of Lord Reid and Lord Morris in Mutual Life, supra; Esso Petroleum, supra; Howard Marine and Dredging Co. v. A. Ogden & Sons (Excavations) Ltd., [1978] Q.B. 574 (C.A.); Shaddock & Associates Pty. Ltd. v. Parramatta City Council (1981), 150 C.L.R. 225 (H.C. Aust.); Blair v. Canada Trust Co. (1986), 38 C.C.L.T. 300 (B.C.S.C.); Nelson Lumber Co. v. Koch (1980), 13 C.C.L.T. 201 (Sask. C.A.); and A. M. Linden, Canadian Tort Law (4th ed. 1988), at pp. 400-404.

D. The Breach of the Duty of Care

(1) Introduction

The next issue deals with whether the above duty of care was breached during the course of the pre-employment interview of February 14, 1983. The main question to be addressed here is whether the misrepresentations of Mr. Johnston during the interview were negligently made, as found by the trial judge.

In order to answer this question, it will be necessary to determine the nature and extent of the duty of care owed to the appellant in the circumstances of this case or, as I prefer to characterize it, the standard of care imposed by law on the respondent and its representative. Specifically, we must ask ourselves whether it is sufficient, in law, that Mr. Johnston was truthful during the interview and that he believed in what he was representing, as found by the Court of Appeal, or whether something more was required of him.

I will also deal under this heading with a subissue raised by the respondent, namely, the nature of the misrepresentations made in the case at bar. As indication lorsqu'il s'agit de savoir s'il existe un «lien spécial» entre les parties, mais il ne devrait pas toujours être considéré comme une condition préliminaire. Il peut y avoir des cas dans lesquels les circonstances indiquent suffisamment l'existence d'une obligation de diligence, quelle que soit la profession de l'auteur de la déclaration. De fait, la présente espèce en est un bon exemple. Je me fonde sur un certain nombre d'arrêts pour préconiser une méthode plus souple à cet égard: voir, par exemple, les motifs de dissidence de lord Reid et lord Morris dans l'arrêt Mutual Life, précité; Esso Petroleum, précité; Howard Marine and Dredging Co. c. A. Ogden & Sons (Excavations) Ltd., [1978] Q.B. 574 (C.A.); Shaddock & Associates Pty. Ltd. c. Parramatta City Council (1981), 150 C.L.R. 225 (H.C. Austr.); Blair c. Canada Trust Co. (1986), 38 C.C.L.T. 300 (C.S.C.-B.); Nelson Lumber Co. c. Koch (1980), 13 C.C.L.T. 201 (C.A. Sask.); et A. M. Linden, La responsabilité civile délictuelle, (4e éd. 1988), aux pp. 483 à 488.

D. La violation de l'obligation de diligence

(1) Introduction

Il s'agit maintenant de savoir si ladite obligation de diligence a été violée pendant l'entrevue de sélection qui a eu lieu le 14 février 1983. Il faut principalement déterminer si les déclarations inexactes de M. Johnston pendant l'entrevue ont été faites par négligence, comme l'a conclu le juge de première instance.

Pour répondre à cette question, il y a lieu de déterminer la nature et l'étendue de l'obligation de diligence existant envers l'appelant, compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce, ou comme je préfère l'appeler, de la norme de diligence que la loi impose à l'intimée et à son représentant. En particulier, nous devons nous demander s'il suffit, en droit, que M. Johnston ait été sincère pendant l'entrevue et qu'il ait cru ce qu'il disait, comme la Cour d'appel l'a conclu, ou s'il était tenu de faire davantage.

J'examinerai également sous cette rubrique une question accessoire que l'intimée a soulevée, au sujet de la nature des déclarations inexactes qui ont previously noted, the trial judge found as a fact that some of the representations made to the appellant in the course of the pre-employment interview were misrepresentations in the sense that they were inaccurate or misleading. This finding, made on the basis of White J.'s assessment of all the evidence, was not disturbed in any way by the Court of Appeal. The respondent is not challenging—at least not directly—this finding of fact before this Court. However, it is arguing that regardless of any negligence these misrepresentations are not actionable at law under the Hedley Byrne principle because they depend on inferences or implications rather than on direct and express statements, and because they relate to a future expectation. I shall address this submission following my review of the relevant standard of care and of its application to the facts of this case.

(2) The Standard of Care Imposed on the Respondent

According to Finlayson J.A., the duty imposed on the respondent and its representative is "no more than a duty to take care that the representations made were responsible and accurate to the knowledge of Johnston and of his principal, Cognos" (p. 186). In his view, Mr. Johnston was not obliged to go further than he did in describing the employment opportunity to the appellant: "What he said was truthful, he believed in it, that was enough" (p. 188).

Before this Court, the respondent adopts the position of Finlayson J.A. with respect to the applicable standard of care. It also adopts his finding that the trial judge erred in imposing a higher standard than was required in the circumstances, namely, a standard of disclosure to the appellant concerning the extent of the respondent's financial commitment to the Multiview project. It is submitted that the trial judge's approach is an unwarranted extension to the law of master/servant of a quasi-fiduciary duty of uberrima fides. Finally, the respondent adopts the finding of Finlayson J.A. that the duty of care imposed on the respondent and its representative was fully discharged. In this été faites en l'espèce. Comme je l'ai déjà fait remarquer, le juge de première instance a tenu pour avéré que certaines déclarations faites à l'appelant dans le cadre de l'entrevue de sélection étaient inexactes en ce sens qu'elles étaient erronées ou trompeuses. La Cour d'appel n'a aucunement modifiée cette conclusion fondée sur l'appréciation de la preuve dans son ensemble faite par le juge White. L'intimée ne conteste pas—du moins pas directement—cette conclusion de fait devant notre Cour. Toutefois, elle soutient qu'indépendamment de toute négligence, ces déclarations inexactes n'ouvrent pas droit à une poursuite en vertu du principe énoncé dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, parce qu'elles dépendent de déductions ou de suppositions plutôt que de déclarations directes et expresses, et parce qu'elles se rapportent à une attente future. Je me pencherai sur cet argument après avoir examiné la norme de diligence pertinente et son application aux faits de l'espèce.

(2) La norme de diligence imposée à l'intimée

Selon le juge Finlayson, l'obligation qui incombe à l'intimée et à son représentant est [TRADUCTION] «tout au plus une obligation de veiller à ce que les déclarations faites soient réfléchies et exactes, à la connaissance de M. Johnston et de son commettant, Cognos» (à la p. 186). À son avis, M. Johnston n'était pas tenu de faire plus que ce qu'il a fait en décrivant la perspective d'emploi à l'appelant: [TRADUCTION] «Ce qu'il a dit était vrai, il y croyait, et cela suffisait» (à la p. 188).

Devant notre Cour, l'intimée adopte la position du juge Finlayson, en ce qui concerne la norme de diligence applicable. Elle adopte également la conclusion, tirée par ce dernier, que le juge de première instance a commis une erreur en imposant une norme plus élevée que celle qui est requise compte tenu des circonstances, à savoir, une norme selon laquelle il fallait divulguer à l'appelant l'étendue de l'engagement financier pris par l'intimée à l'égard du projet Multiview. On soutient que la position que le juge de première instance a prise constitue une application injustifiée au droit relatif aux employeurs et employés de l'obligation quasi fiduciaire d'uberrima fides. Enfin, l'intimée fait respect, the respondent emphasizes the fact that the recruitment process for the position in question had been commenced by Mr. Johnston with full knowledge and support of a number of senior executives of the respondent, and that there was in fact a "commitment" of the respondent to develop Multiview in the way outlined by Mr. Johnston during the interview.

The appellant characterizes the applicable standard of care in a somewhat different manner. He submits that the respondent's duty of care required that both it itself and Mr. Johnston take reasonable steps to avoid conveying information to the appellant about his prospective employment that was materially inaccurate or misleading. According to him, this duty also required them to put themselves "in the appellant's shoes" in assessing the possible impact of their representations on his career choices. In particular, it is argued that they had a duty to consider what inferences the appellant would probably make from the pre-employment statements. The appellant concedes that this standard appears to be high; however, he submits that it is justified in a pre-employment situation based on a number of "policy considerations". Finally, the appellant argues that the applicable standard requires not only that an employer provide accurate information regarding the employment opportunity, but it also requires that he or she provide complete information, viz. full disclosure. In the case at bar, the appellant submits that the duty of care was not discharged since the information provided by Mr. Johnston was incomplete; there was no mention of the absence of a financial commitment. In any event, it is submitted that there was negligence even under a lower standard of care because the respondent and its representative did not ensure that the information provided, both expressly and impliedly, was accurate.

In my view, the relevant standard of care is neither the one advanced by the respondent and the Court of Appeal nor the one proposed by the appellant. The former is too low as it equates, in sienne la conclusion du juge Finlayson qu'elle et son représentant se sont pleinement acquittés de l'obligation de diligence qui leur incombait. À cet égard, l'intimée met l'accent sur le fait que la procédure de recrutement pour le poste en question avait été engagée par M. Johnston au su et avec l'appui d'un certain nombre de ses hauts dirigeants et qu'il existait en fait un «engagement» à mettre au point Multiview de la façon décrite par M. Johnston pendant l'entrevue.

L'appelant décrit la norme de diligence applicable d'une manière assez différente. Il soutient que l'obligation de diligence qui incombait à l'intimée obligeait cette dernière ainsi que M. Johnston à prendre des mesures raisonnables pour éviter de lui fournir des renseignements erronés ou trompeurs sur des points importants quant à son emploi éventuel. Selon lui, cette obligation les obligeait également à se mettre à sa place en évaluant l'effet que pourraient avoir leurs déclarations sur son choix de carrière. En particulier, il soutient qu'ils étaient obligés de tenir compte des déductions que l'appelant ferait probablement à partir de leurs déclarations. L'appelant convient que cette norme semble élevée, mais, soutient-il, la chose est justifiée dans une situation de préembauchage compte tenu d'un certain nombre de «considérations de principe». Enfin, l'appelant prétend que, selon la norme applicable, non seulement l'employeur doit fournir des renseignements exacts au sujet de la perspective d'emploi, mais il doit également fournir des renseignements complets, c'est-à-dire faire une divulgation complète. En l'espèce, l'appelant soutient que l'obligation de diligence n'a pas été respectée, étant donné que les renseignements fournis par M. Johnston étaient incomplets; il n'a pas été question de l'absence d'engagement financier. Quoi qu'il en soit, il affirme qu'il y a eu négligence même selon une norme de diligence moins élevée, parce que l'intimée et son représentant ne se sont pas assurés de l'exactitude des renseignements expressément ou implicitement fournis.

À mon avis, la norme de diligence pertinente n'est ni celle que l'intimée et la Cour d'appel ont avancée ni celle que l'appelant propose. La première est trop souple car elle assimile essentielle-essence, a duty of care with a duty of common honesty. On the other hand, the standard of care proposed by the appellant is too onerous as it is tantamount to requiring full disclosure from employers during pre-employment interviews. This Court has been presented with no compelling reasons to treat representations made in an employment context differently from representations made in any other context. It is unfortunate that the appellant has spent considerable time in his argument trying to convince this Court to recognize a fundamentally new standard of care, specific to the employment context. Clearly, the standard of care normally required by law is sufficient to dispose of this appeal in the appellant's favour. Upholding the trial judge's finding of negligence does not require an expansion of tort law into previously uncharted and hence unknown waters. Rather, it simply requires an application of well established principles of the law of negligence.

The applicable standard of care should be the one used in every negligence case, namely the universally accepted, albeit hypothetical, "reasonable person". The standard of care required by a person making representations is an objective one. It is a duty to exercise such reasonable care as the circumstances require to ensure that representations made are accurate and not misleading: see Hedley Byrne, supra, at p. 486, per Lord Reid; Hodgins v. Hydro-Electric Commission, supra, at pp. 506-9, per Ritchie J. for the majority of this Court; H.B. Nickerson & Sons v. Wooldridge, supra, at pp. 135-36; J. G. Fleming, The Law of Torts (7th ed. 1987), at pp. 96-104 and 614; Linden, supra, at pp. 105-19; and Klar, supra, at pp. 159-60. Professor Klar provides some useful insight on this issue (at p. 160):

> An advisor does not guarantee the accuracy of the statement made, but is only required to exercise reasonable care with respect to it. As with the issue of standard of care in negligence in general, this is a question of fact which must be determined according to the circumment l'obligation de diligence à une obligation d'honnêteté ordinaire. Par contre, la norme de diligence proposée par l'appelant est trop lourde car elle équivaut à exiger de l'employeur la divulgation complète pendant les entrevues de préembauchage. On n'a présenté à notre Cour aucun motif impérieux permettant de considérer les déclarations faites dans le contexte d'un emploi d'une manière différente de celles qui sont faites dans un autre contexte. Il est malheureux que l'appelant ait passé beaucoup de temps, dans son argumentation, à tenter de convaincre notre Cour de reconnaître une norme de diligence fondamentalement nouvelle, propre au contexte de l'emploi. De toute évidence, la norme de diligence normalement requise par la loi est suffisante pour trancher le présent pourvoi en faveur de l'appelant. Confirmer la conclusion de négligence tirée par le juge de première instance n'exige pas qu'on étende le droit de la responsabilité délictuelle à un domaine non encore exploré et par conséquent inconnu. Cela exige plutôt simplement une application de principes bien établis du droit en matière de négligence.

La norme de diligence applicable devrait être celle qui est utilisée dans toute affaire de négligence, à savoir celle universellement reconnue, quoique hypothétique, de la «personne raisonnable». La norme de diligence requise d'une personne qui fait des déclarations est objective. Il s'agit de l'obligation de faire preuve de la diligence raisonnable requise par les circonstances pour que les déclarations faites soient exactes et non trompeuses: voir Hedley Byrne, précité, à la p. 486, lord Reid; Hodgins c. Hydro-Electric Commission, précité, aux pp. 506 à 509, le juge Ritchie au nom de notre Cour à la majorité; H.B. Nickerson & Sons c. Wooldridge, précité, aux pp. 135 et 136; J. G. Fleming, The Law of Torts (7e éd. 1987), aux pp. 96 à 104 et 614; Linden, op. cit., aux pp. 129 à 146; et Klar, op. cit., aux pp. 159 et 160. Le professeur Klar donne un aperçu utile de la question (à la p. 160):

> [TRADUCTION] Un conseiller ne garantit pas l'exactitude de la déclaration qui est faite, mais il est uniquement tenu de faire preuve d'une diligence raisonnable à cet égard. Comme c'est le cas pour la norme de diligence applicable en matière de négligence en général, il stances of the case. Taking into account the nature of the occasion, the purpose for which the statement was made, the foreseeable use of the statement, the probable damage which will result from an inaccurate statement, the status of the advisor and the level of competence generally observed by others similarly placed, the trier of fact will determine whether the advisor was negligent.

In my opinion, the trial judge did not depart from the applicable standard of care in rendering his decision. He found that, "in all the circumstances", the misrepresentations made by the respondent's representative were negligently made. Unlike the Court of Appeal, I find no reason to interfere with his careful and considered finding on this point.

As I see it, the Court of Appeal erred in two important respects when it interfered with White J.'s finding of negligence. First, it mischaracterized his reasons on the negligence issue. Finlayson J.A. said the following (at p. 187):

The trial judge found that [Mr. Johnston] had a duty to go further and to point out the details of the internal decision-making process at Cognos and stress that that process had not been completed. In other words, his own bona fide belief as a knowledgeable executive that the program was going forward was not sufficient. He had to divulge to all of the applicants that he interviewed the precise status of the corporate commitment to the development of the new product so that they could make their own assessment of the viability of the project.

In my opinion, this casts the duty too high. It suggests that at least a quasi-fiduciary relationship existed between corporation and job applicant, giving rise to a duty to make full disclosure.

Unlike Finlayson J.A., I do not read the trial judge's reasons as suggesting that the respondent and its representative had a duty to make "full disclosure" in the sense described above, and that the respondent was liable for a failure to meet this duty. Rather, I read his reasons as suggesting that, in all the circumstances of this case, Mr. Johnston s'agit d'une question de fait qui dépend des circonstances de l'affaire. Compte tenu de la nature de l'occasion, du but dans lequel la déclaration a été faite, de l'utilisation prévisible de la déclaration, du préjudice probable qu'occasionnera une déclaration inexacte, du statut du conseiller et du degré de compétence dont font généralement preuve les autres personnes dans une situation similaire, le juge des faits déterminera si le conseiller a été négligent.

À mon avis, le juge de première instance ne s'est pas écarté de la norme de diligence applicable en rendant sa décision. Il a conclu que [TRADUCTION] «compte tenu de toutes les circonstances», le représentant de l'intimée a fait les déclarations inexactes par négligence. Contrairement à la Cour d'appel, je ne vois rien qui me permette de modifier la conclusion minutieuse et réfléchie qu'il a tirée sur ce point.

À mon avis, la Cour d'appel a commis deux erreurs importantes lorsqu'elle a modifié la conclusion de négligence tirée par le juge White. En premier lieu, elle a mal décrit ses motifs en ce qui concerne la question de la négligence. Le juge Finlayson a dit (à la p. 187):

[TRADUCTION] Le juge de première instance a conclu que [M. Johnston] était tenu de faire davantage, de signaler les particularités de la procédure interne de prise de décision au sein de Cognos et de souligner que cette procédure n'était pas terminée. En d'autres termes, le fait que, en sa qualité de dirigeant bien informé, il croyait réellement que le programme serait mis en œuvre n'était pas suffisant. Il devait informer tous les candidats qu'il rencontrait de la situation exacte relativement à l'engagement pris par la société à l'égard du développement du nouveau produit, de façon que ceux-ci puissent évaluer eux-mêmes la viabilité du projet.

À mon avis, il en résulte une obligation trop lourde. Cela laisse entendre qu'une relation quasi fiduciaire au moins existait entre la société et le candidat, d'où l'obligation de faire une divulgation complète.

Contrairement au juge Finlayson, je n'interprète pas les motifs du juge de première instance comme laissant entendre que l'intimée et son représentant étaient tenus de faire une «divulgation complète» au sens décrit ci-dessus, et que l'intimée devait répondre de l'omission de respecter cette obligation. J'interprète plutôt ses motifs comme donnant breached a duty to exercise reasonable care by, inter alia, representing the employment opportunity in the way he did without, at the same time, informing the appellant about the precarious nature of the respondent's financial commitment to the development of Multiview. In reality, the trial judge did not impose a duty to make full disclosure on the respondent and its representative. He simply imposed a duty of care, the respect of which required, among other things and in the circumstances of this case, that the appellant be given highly relevant information about the nature and existence of the employment opportunity for which he had applied.

There are many reported cases in which a failure to divulge highly relevant information is a pertinent consideration in determining whether a misrepresentation was negligently made: see, for example, Fine's Flowers Ltd. v. General Accident Assurance Co. (1974), 5 O.R. (2d) 137 (H.C.), at p. 147, aff'd (1977), 17 O.R. (2d) 529 (C.A.); Grenier v. Timmins Board of Education, supra; H.B. Nickerson & Sons v. Wooldridge, supra; Hendrick v. De Marsh (1984), 45 O.R. (2d) 463 (H.C.), aff'd on other grounds (1986), 54 O.R. (2d) 185 (C.A.); Steer v. Aerovox, supra; W. B. Anderson & Sons Ltd. v. Rhodes (Liverpool), Ltd., [1967] 2 All E.R. 850 (Liverpool Assizes); and V.K. Mason Construction, supra. In the last case, Wilson J. said the following speaking for this Court (at p. 284):

> The statement was negligent because it was made without revealing that the Bank was giving an assurance based solely on a loan arrangement which Mason had already said was insufficient assurance to it of the existence of adequate financing.

In so doing, these cases and the trial judgment in the case at bar are not applying a standard of uberrima fides to the transactions involved therein. Quite frankly, this notion is irrelevant to a determination of whether the representor has breached a common law duty of care in tort. These decisions simply reflect the applicable law by taking into account all relevant circumstances in deciding à entendre que, compte tenu de toutes les circonstances de l'espèce, M. Johnston a violé l'obligation de faire preuve d'une diligence raisonnable, notamment en décrivant la perspective d'emploi comme il l'a fait, sans en même temps informer l'appelant de la nature précaire de l'engagement financier pris par l'intimée à l'égard du développement de Multiview. En réalité, le juge de première instance n'a pas imposé à l'intimée et à son représentant l'obligation de faire une divulgation complète. Il a simplement imposé une obligation de diligence qui, pour être respectée, exigeait en l'occurrence, entre autres choses, qu'on fournisse à l'appelant des renseignements très pertinents au sujet de la nature et de l'existence de l'emploi auquel il s'était porté candidat.

Il existe de nombreux arrêts dans lesquels l'omission de divulguer des renseignements très pertinents a été prise en considération lorsqu'il s'est agi de déterminer si une déclaration inexacte avait été faite par négligence: voir, par exemple, Fine's Flowers Ltd. c. General Accident Assurance Co. (1974), 5 O.R. (2d) 137 (H.C.), à la p. 147, conf. par (1977), 17 O.R. (2d) 529 (C.A.); Grenier c. Timmins Board of Education, précité; H.B. Nickerson & Sons c. Wooldridge, précité; Hendrick c. De Marsh (1984), 45 O.R. (2d) 463 (H.C.) conf. pour d'autres motifs par (1986), 54 O.R. (2d) 185 (C.A.); Steer c. Aerovox, précité; W. B. Anderson & Sons Ltd. c. Rhodes (Liverpool), Ltd., [1967] 2 All E.R. 850 (Liverpool Assizes); et V.K. Mason Construction, précité. Dans ce dernier arrêt, le juge Wilson, qui parlait au nom de notre Cour, a dit (à la p. 284):

> La déclaration a été faite avec négligence parce que la Banque n'a pas révélé qu'elle donnait cette assurance en fonction des seules conditions du prêt que Mason avait déjà considérées comme une garantie insuffisante de l'existence d'un financement adéquat.

Ce faisant, ces arrêts et le jugement rendu en première instance en l'espèce n'appliquent pas la norme de l'uberrima fides aux opérations en cause. À vrai dire, cette notion n'est pas pertinente lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer si l'auteur de la déclaration a violé l'obligation de diligence en matière délictuelle qui existe en common law. Ces décisions traduisent simplement le droit applicable en whether the representor's conduct was negligent. In some cases, this includes the failure to divulge highly pertinent information.

The second error made by the Court of Appeal is that it substituted for the "higher" standard of care allegedly imposed by the trial judge, a standard well below the one required by law. Once again, it is worth repeating the final words of Finlayson J.A. on the negligence issue: "Johnston was not obliged to go farther than he did in describing the job prospects. What he said was truthful, he believed in it, that was enough" (p. 188). In essence, the Court of Appeal reduced a common law duty of care to a duty of common honesty. Undoubtedly, the latter duty existed in the case at bar, as it exists during any pre-contractual negotiations.

However, the duty of care owed by a representor to a representee, when there exists a "special relationship" within the meaning of Hedley Byrne, supra, is distinct in nature and scope from a duty to be honest and truthful. As was stated in Hedley Byrne by Lord Morris (at pp. 502-3):

> Independently of contract, there may be circumstances where information is given or where advice is given which establishes a relationship which creates a duty not only to be honest but also to be careful.
> . . .
>
> In these circumstances, I think some duty towards the unnamed person, whoever it was, was owed by the bank. There was a duty of honesty. The great question, however, is whether there was a duty of care.

and by Lord Pearce (at p. 539):

> There is also, in my opinion, a duty of care created by special relationships which, though not fiduciary, give rise to an assumption that care as well as honesty is demanded.

tenant compte de toutes les circonstances pertinentes lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer si l'auteur de la déclaration a agi d'une manière négligente. Dans certains cas, cela comprend l'omission de divulguer des renseignements très pertinents.

En second lieu, la Cour d'appel a commis une erreur en remplaçant la norme de diligence «plus élevée» que le juge de première instance avait apparemment imposée par une norme bien inférieure à celle requise par la loi. Ici encore, il vaut la peine de répéter les remarques finales que le juge Finlayson a faites au sujet de la question de la négligence: [TRADUCTION] «M. Johnston n'était pas tenu de faire davantage que ce qu'il a fait en décrivant les perspectives d'emploi. Ce qu'il a dit était vrai, il y croyait, et cela suffisait» (à la p. 188). Essentiellement, la Cour d'appel a assimilé l'obligation de diligence existant en common law à une obligation d'honnêteté ordinaire. Cette dernière obligation existait sans aucun doute en l'espèce, comme elle existe dans le cadre de toute négociation préalable à la passation d'un contrat.

Toutefois, l'obligation de diligence que l'auteur de la déclaration a envers le destinataire lorsqu'il existe un «lien spécial» au sens de l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, précité, est distincte, quant à sa nature et à son étendue, de l'obligation d'être honnête et sincère. Comme lord Morris l'a déclaré dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne (aux pp. 502 et 503):

>
> . . .
>
> En pareil cas, je crois que la banque avait une certaine obligation envers la personne non désignée, quelle qu'elle soit. Elle était tenue de faire preuve d'honnêteté. Toutefois, il s'agit principalement de savoir s'il existait une obligation de diligence.

De son côté, lord Pearce a dit (à la p. 539):

> [TRADUCTION] À mon avis, une obligation de diligence est également créée par des liens spéciaux qui, bien que de nature non fiduciaire, laissent supposer qu'il faut faire preuve aussi bien de diligence que d'honnêteté.

A duty of care with respect to representations made during pre-contractual negotiations is over and above a duty to be honest in making those representations. It requires not just that the representor be truthful and honest in his or her representations. It also requires that the representor exercise such reasonable care as the circumstances require to ensure that the representations made are accurate and not misleading.

Although the representor's subjective belief in the accuracy of the representations and his moral blameworthiness, or lack thereof, are highly relevant when considering whether or not a misrepresentation was fraudulently made, they serve little, if any, purpose in an inquiry into negligence. As noted above, the applicable standard of care is that of the objective reasonable person. The representor's belief in the truth of his or her representations is irrelevant to that standard of care. The position adopted by the Court of Appeal seems to absolve those who make negligent misrepresentations from liability if they believe that their representations are true. Such a position would virtually eliminate liability for negligent misrepresentation as liability would result only where there is actual knowledge that the representation made is not true; the basis of fraudulent misrepresentation. In essence, the Court of Appeal has returned to the pre-Hedley Byrne state of law where a misrepresentation had to be accompanied by moral blameworthiness in order to support an action in tort for damages: see, in this respect, my discussion in BG Checo, supra, of the context in which Hedley Byrne was decided. The question facing the trial judge on the negligence issue was not whether Mr. Johnston was truthful or believed in what he was representing to the appellant. The question was whether he exercised such reasonable care as Voir également l'arrêt Hayward c. Mellick (1984), 45 O.R. (2d) 110 (C.A.), et l'arrêt Carman Construction, précité, à la p. 973.

L'obligation de diligence qui s'applique aux déclarations faites pendant les négociations préalables à la passation d'un contrat est plus lourde que l'obligation selon laquelle il faut se montrer honnête en faisant ces déclarations. L'auteur de la déclaration doit non seulement être sincère et honnête, mais il doit également faire preuve de la diligence raisonnable requise par les circonstances, de façon à ce que ses déclarations soient exactes et non trompeuses.

La croyance subjective de l'auteur quant à l'exactitude de ses déclarations et le fait de savoir s'il est moralement responsable ou non sont fort pertinents lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer si une déclaration inexacte a été faite d'une manière frauduleuse, mais cela ne sert pas à grand-chose, pour ne pas dire à rien, lorsqu'il est question de négligence. Comme je l'ai fait remarquer précédemment, la norme de diligence applicable est celle de la personne raisonnable objective. Le fait que l'auteur croit à la véracité de ses déclarations n'entre pas en ligne de compte en ce qui concerne la norme de diligence. La Cour d'appel semble vouloir libérer de toute responsabilité les personnes qui font des déclarations inexactes par négligence si ces dernières croient que leurs déclarations sont véridiques. Cette position éliminerait presque toute responsabilité dans le cas d'une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence, puisqu'il n'y aurait responsabilité que lorsque l'auteur sait pertinemment que sa déclaration n'est pas véridique, ce qui est le fondement de la déclaration inexacte et frauduleuse. Essentiellement, la Cour d'appel est revenue au droit, tel qu'il existait avant l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, selon lequel la responsabilité morale devait s'ajouter à la déclaration inexacte pour qu'une action en responsabilité délictuelle pour dommages-intérêts ait gain de cause: voir, à cet égard, l'examen que j'ai fait dans l'arrêt BG Checo, précité, au sujet du contexte dans lequel l'affaire Hedley Byrne a été tranchée. La question qui se posait devant le juge de première instance, en ce qui concerne la négligence, n'était pas de savoir si the circumstances required so as to ensure the accuracy of his representations.

The trial judge found that the respondent's representative had acted negligently in making the misrepresentations to the appellant about the nature and existence of the employment opportunity and, in particular, the extent of the respondent's commitment to the Multiview project. He found that Mr. Johnston was aware, based upon his expertise in the field of computer development, that until there was a feasibility study in which cost estimates had been submitted, considered, and approved by senior management, one could not say that the respondent had made a firm commitment to the project as Mr. Johnston envisaged it and as he described it to the appellant in the interview.

As noted above, the trial judge also made the following important findings: Mr. Johnston knew, or ought to have known, that the truth of his representations depended on the approval by the corporate management team of the cost estimates he had prepared for the research and development of the Multiview project; it is reasonable to infer that Mr. Johnston, at the time of the interview, contemplated that the budgetary needs for the Multiview project would be substantial and that approval was at best speculative; Mr. Johnston must have been aware of the continued poor sales performance of the Multiview product line; Mr. Johnston did not disclose to the appellant that senior management had not yet given the financial commitment required to make the plans for the Multiview project a probable reality; Mr. Johnston's expertise in the computer development field should have made him aware that, notwithstanding his conversations with senior management and the meeting of December 21, 1982, there was still a considerable risk that senior management would not give budgetary approval to his plans; Mr. Johnston knew that the appellant was relying on the information he was providing during the interview; Mr. Johnston knew that the appellant had a secure, responsible,

M. Johnston était sincère ou s'il croyait en ce qu'il disait à l'appelant. Il s'agissait de savoir s'il avait fait preuve de la diligence raisonnable requise par les circonstances, de façon à s'assurer de l'exactitude de ses déclarations.

Le juge de première instance a conclu que le représentant de l'intimée a agi d'une manière négligente en faisant à l'appelant des déclarations inexactes au sujet de la nature et de l'existence de l'emploi et, en particulier, de l'étendue de l'engagement pris par l'intimée à l'égard du projet Multiview. Il a conclu que M. Johnston savait, vu son expertise dans le domaine de la création informatique, que tant qu'il n'y avait pas eu d'étude de faisabilité dans laquelle l'estimation des coûts a été soumise à la haute direction et examinée et approuvée par celle-ci, il était impossible de dire que l'intimée a pris un engagement ferme à l'égard du projet, tel que M. Johnston l'envisageait et tel qu'il l'a décrit à l'appelant pendant l'entrevue.

Comme je l'ai déjà fait remarquer, le juge de première instance a également tiré ces conclusions importantes: M. Johnston savait, ou aurait dû savoir, que l'exactitude de ses déclarations dépendait de l'approbation, par l'équipe de gestion d'entreprise, de l'estimation des coûts qu'il avait préparée en matière de recherche et développement pour le projet Multiview; il est raisonnable de déduire que M. Johnston prévoyait, au moment de l'entrevue, que les besoins budgétaires pour le projet Multiview seraient importants, et que l'approbation était, au mieux, fondée sur des conjectures; M. Johnston devait être au courant du piètre rendement constant des ventes de la ligne de produits Multiview; M. Johnston n'a pas révélé à l'appelant que la haute direction n'avait pas encore pris l'engagement financier requis pour que les plans relatifs au projet Multiview deviennent une réalité probable; l'expertise de M. Johnston dans le domaine de la création informatique aurait dû lui permettre de savoir que, malgré les conversations qu'il avait eues avec des hauts dirigeants et malgré la réunion du 21 décembre 1982, il était encore fort probable que la haute direction ne donne pas l'approbation budgétaire requise; M. Johnston savait que l'appelant se fiait aux renseignements qu'il avait fournis and well-paying position as a chartered accountant in Calgary and that coming to Ottawa would involve moving himself and his family across the country; and Mr. Johnston was aware that the appellant was relying on the position with Cognos to enhance significantly his career as an accountant.

These findings are fully supported by the evidence adduced at trial. I see no reason to interfere with the trial judge's conclusion that the misrepresentations made to the appellant were, in all the circumstances, "negligent misrepresentations". Under the standard of care described above, Mr. Johnston failed to exercise such reasonable care as the circumstances required him to in making the representations he did during the interview. Particularly, he should not have led the appellant to believe that the Multiview project as described during the interview was a reality when, in fact, he knew very well that the most important factor to the existence of the project, as he was describing it, was financial support by the respondent.

Before this Court, the respondent made extensive reference to the evidence adduced at trial to indicate that it did, in reality, plan to develop Multiview and to make it a profitable project. While it seems to be true that Cognos was "committed" to the project at the end of 1982 and in early 1983, it was not committed in the most crucial respect, namely funding. As found by the trial judge, the impression given during the interview was not consistent with the fundamental reality that funding for the project was not yet approved.

In the end, I am unable to find any ground for interfering with White J.'s finding of negligence. There was, in the circumstances of this case, a breach of the duty of care owed to the appellant. In light of this conclusion, it is unnecessary to determine whether, as argued by the appellant, other members of the respondent such as senior manage-pendant l'entrevue; M. Johnston savait que l'appelant occupait, à Calgary, un poste de responsabilité, un emploi sûr et rémunérateur, à titre de comptable agréé et que, pour venir travailler à Ottawa, il devait s'installer avec sa famille à l'autre bout du pays; et M. Johnston savait que l'appelant comptait sur le poste qu'il occuperait auprès de Cognos pour enrichir énormément sa carrière de comptable.

Ces conclusions sont pleinement étayées par la preuve présentée en première instance. Je ne vois aucune raison de modifier la conclusion du juge de première instance, à savoir que les déclarations inexactes faites à l'appelant avaient, compte tenu de toutes les circonstances, été faites «par négligence». Selon la norme de diligence décrite précédemment, M. Johnston a omis de faire preuve de la diligence raisonnable requise par les circonstances en faisant les déclarations qu'il a faites pendant l'entrevue. En particulier, il n'aurait pas dû faire croire à l'appelant que le projet Multiview, tel que décrit pendant l'entrevue, était une réalité alors que, en fait, il savait fort bien que l'élément le plus important en vue de la réalisation du projet, tel qu'il le décrivait, était l'appui financier de l'intimée.

Devant notre Cour, l'intimée a longuement fait mention de la preuve présentée en première instance pour indiquer qu'en réalité elle envisageait de développer Multiview et d'en faire un projet rentable. Il semble vrai que Cognos avait «pris un engagement» à l'égard du projet à la fin de 1982 et au début de 1983, mais elle n'avait pas pris d'engagement à l'égard du point le plus crucial, c'est-à-dire le financement. Comme le juge de première instance l'a conclu, l'impression donnée pendant l'entrevue n'était pas compatible avec la réalité fondamentale que le financement du projet n'avait pas encore été approuvé.

En fin de compte, je ne puis trouver aucun motif me permettant de modifier la conclusion de négligence tirée par le juge White. Compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce, il y a eu violation de l'obligation de diligence qui existait envers l'appelant. Cela étant, il est inutile de déterminer si, comme le soutient l'appelant, d'autres membres de l'intimée, ment were negligent on the facts of this case. Mr. Johnston's conduct during the interview is sufficient to support a finding of liability against the respondent.

(3) The Nature of the Misrepresentations

The respondent takes the alternate position that, even accepting the trial judge's findings of misrepresentations and of negligence, the appellant's action must fail because the representations relied on are not actionable under the Hedley Byrne doctrine. In this respect, the respondent argues that the representations depend on inferences or implications, rather than on direct statements, and also relate to a future expectation. The appellant makes no submissions on this point. It is unclear whether this submission of the respondent was advanced prior to the appeal to this Court. If so, it has received very little attention by the courts below. There is only a brief discussion, and rejection, of the "future expectation" aspect of the argument in the trial judge's reasons and the Court of Appeal makes no reference whatsoever to this submission.

In my view, the respondent's alternate position cannot succeed in the circumstances of this case. First of all, I reject as incorrect the suggestion that the representations in question relate solely to future events or expectations. I reproduce again, for convenience, a passage from White J.'s judgment in which he finds, as a fact, that misrepresentations were made to the appellant in the hiring interview (at pp. 415-16):

The effect of these misrepresentations was that the [appellant] would have a position in the research and development of the product "Multiview"; that that position would be a significant one and would involve his expertise as an accountant; that he would perform the responsible role of seeing to proper accounting standards being implemented into the product; that beyond the three modules immediately in contemplation were a minimum of four other modules; and that the project of comme les hauts dirigeants, ont été négligents selon les faits de l'espèce. La conduite de M. Johnston pendant l'entrevue suffit pour appuyer une conclusion de responsabilité de l'intimée.

(3) La nature des déclarations inexactes

L'intimée soutient subsidiairement que, même si l'on retient les conclusions du juge de première instance à l'égard des déclarations inexactes et de la négligence, l'action intentée par l'appelant doit être rejetée parce que les déclarations auxquelles il s'est fié ne donnent pas droit à une poursuite en vertu de la doctrine énoncée dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne. À cet égard, l'intimée fait valoir qu'il s'agit de déductions ou de suppositions plutôt que de déclarations directes, lesquelles se rapportent en outre à une attente future. L'appelant n'invoque aucun argument sur ce point. D'autre part, il n'est pas clair que cet argument de l'intimée ait été avancé avant l'appel devant notre Cour. Si c'est le cas, les tribunaux d'instance inférieure y ont accordé très peu d'importance. Dans ses motifs, le juge de première instance s'est contenté d'examiner brièvement, et de rejeter, la partie de l'argument concernant l'«attente future»; de son côté, la Cour d'appel ne fait absolument pas mention de cet argument.

À mon avis, l'argument subsidiaire de l'intimée ne peut pas être retenu compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce. Premièrement, je rejette comme inexacte la prétention selon laquelle les déclarations en question visent uniquement des attentes ou des événements futurs. Pour plus de commodité, je reproduis ici encore un passage du jugement dans lequel le juge White tient pour avéré que des déclarations inexactes ont été faites à l'appelant pendant l'entrevue d'embauchage (aux pp. 415 et 416)

[TRADUCTION] Selon ces déclarations inexactes, [l'appelant] occuperait un poste en recherche et développement pour le produit «Multiview»; ce poste serait un poste d'importance et ferait appel à son expertise à titre de comptable; [l'appelant] serait chargé de veiller à ce que les normes comptables pertinentes soient appliquées relativement au produit; en plus des trois modules immédiatement envisagés, il y aurait au moins quatre autres modules; le projet «Multiview» dans le cadre

"Multiview", in connection with which [the appellant] would be hired would last a minimum of two years. I find further that Mr. Johnston implicitly represented that management had made a firm budgetary commitment to the development of four other modules in addition to those then presently under development.

Obviously, some aspects of the misrepresentations made to the appellant about the employment opportunity were, by their very nature, matters in futuro. Statements about the appellant's involvement with the respondent and his responsibilities should he be offered a position are representations that relate to future conduct and events. There are authorities supporting the view that only representations of existing facts, and not those relating to future occurrences, can give rise to actionable negligence: see, for example, Williams v. School District No. 63 (Saanich) (B.C.S.C.), supra; Datile Financial Corp. v. Royal Trust Corp. of Canada (1991), 5 O.R. (3d) 358 (Gen. Div.); Foster Advertising Ltd. v. Keenberg (1987), 38 C.C.L.T. 309 (Man. C.A.); and Andronyk v. Williams (1985), 35 C.C.L.T. 38 (Man. C.A.).

However, assuming without deciding that this view of the law is correct, the representations most relevant to the appellant's action are not those relating to his future involvement and responsibilities with Cognos, but those relating to the very existence of the job for which he had applied. That is a matter of existing fact. It was implicitly represented that the job applied for did in fact, at the time of the interview, exist in the manner described by Mr. Johnston. As found by the trial judge, however, such was not the case. The employment opportunity described to the appellant was not, at the time of the interview, a fait accompli for the respondent. Clearly, this misrepresentation relates to facts presumed to have existed at the time of the interview: the respondent's financial commitment to the development of Multiview and the existence of the employment opportunity offered. It is not a "remark by a defendant concerning the outcome of a future event" (Williams v. School District No. 63 (Saanich) (B.C.S.C.), supra, at p. 240), a "representation . . . as to future duquel [l'appelant] serait embauché durerait au moins deux ans. Je conclus en outre que M. Johnston a implicitement déclaré que la direction avait pris un engagement budgétaire ferme à l'égard de la mise au point de quatre autres modules, en plus de ceux qu'on était en train de mettre au point.

De toute évidence, certains aspects des déclarations inexactes faites à l'appelant au sujet de l'emploi se rapportaient, par leur nature même, à l'avenir. Les déclarations relatives à la participation de l'appelant à l'entreprise de l'intimée et à ses responsabilités, si jamais on lui offrait un poste, se rapportent à une conduite et à des événements futurs. Certains arrêts appuient le point de vue voulant que seules des déclarations concernant des faits existants, par opposition à des événements futurs, puissent donner lieu à une négligence donnant droit à une poursuite: voir, par exemple, Williams c. School District No. 63 (Saanich) (C.S.C.-B.), précité; Datile Financial Corp. c. Royal Trust Corp. of Canada (1991), 5 O.R. (3d) 358 (Div. gén.); Foster Advertising Ltd. c. Keenberg (1987), 38 C.C.L.T. 309 (C.A. Man.); et Andronyk c. Williams (1985), 35 C.C.L.T. 38 (C.A. Man.).

Toutefois, à supposer, sans en décider, que cette conception du droit soit exacte, les déclarations les plus pertinentes en l'espèce ne sont pas celles qui ont trait à la participation et aux responsabilités futures de l'appelant au sein de Cognos, mais celles qui ont trait à l'existence même de l'emploi auquel il s'est porté candidat. Il s'agit d'une question se rapportant à un fait existant. Il a implicitement été déclaré que l'emploi en question existait réellement au moment de l'entrevue, et ce, de la manière décrite par M. Johnston. Toutefois, comme le juge de première instance l'a conclu, tel n'était pas le cas. La perspective d'emploi décrite à l'appelant n'était pas, au moment de l'entrevue, un fait accompli pour l'intimée. De toute évidence, la déclaration inexacte se rapporte à des faits qui sont réputés avoir existé au moment de l'entrevue, soit l'engagement financier de l'intimée à l'égard du développement de Multiview et l'existence de la perspective d'emploi offerte. Il ne s'agit pas d'une [TRADUCTION] «remarque faite par un défendeur au sujet de l'aboutissement d'un événement futur» occurrences" (Datile Financial Corp. v. Royal Trust, supra, at p. 379), a "statement of intention or forecast of the future" (Foster Advertising Ltd. v. Keenberg, supra, at p. 325), or "forecasting" (Andronyk v. Williams, supra, at p. 57).

The other aspect of the respondent's argument is that representations which depend on implications or inferences cannot give rise to actionable negligence under the Hedley Byrne doctrine. Again, I reject this submission. However, on this issue, I prefer, for obvious reasons, to challenge the principle advanced by the respondent rather than simply reject its application to the facts of this case.

In my view, there is no compelling reason in principle, authority, or policy for the proposition that, as a general rule, an implied representation cannot under any circumstance give rise to actionable negligence. The only authority offered by the respondent is the decision of the New South Wales Court of Appeal in Minister Administering the Environmental Planning and Assessment Act, 1979 v. San Sebastian Pty. Ltd., [1983] 2 N.S.W.L.R. 268, aff'd on other grounds (1986), 68 A.L.R. 161 (H.C.), applied by Southin J.A. of the British Columbia Court of Appeal, in dissent, in BG Checo International Ltd. v. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority (1990), 44 B.C.L.R. (2d) 145. The reasons of Mahoney and Hutley JJ.A. in the former case appear indeed to support the proposition that nothing less than an express, or tantamount to an express, representation can suffice under the Hedley Byrne doctrine. It is not without significance, however, that the High Court of Australia in dismissing a subsequent appeal on different grounds expressly refrained from making any comments on this issue. Rather, the majority of the Court preferred to base its judgment, inter alia, on the fact that no misrepresentations, whether "express or implied", had been made. In other words, the High Court found nothing mis-

L'autre aspect de l'argument de l'intimée est que les déclarations qui dépendent de déductions ou de suppositions ne peuvent pas donner lieu à une négligence donnant droit à une poursuite, en vertu de la doctrine énoncée dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne. Ici encore, je rejette cet argument. Toutefois, à cet égard, je préfère, pour des motifs évidents, contester le principe avancé par l'intimée plutôt que simplement refuser de l'appliquer aux faits de l'espèce.

À mon avis, il n'existe aucun motif impérieux fondé sur un principe, un arrêt ou une politique à l'appui de la proposition selon laquelle, en règle générale, une déclaration implicite ne peut en aucun cas donner lieu à une négligence ouvrant droit à une poursuite. L'intimée a uniquement cité l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel de la Nouvelle-Galles du Sud Minister Administering the Environmental Planning and Assessment Act, 1979 c. San Sebastian Pty. Ltd., [1983] 2 N.S.W.L.R. 268, conf. pour d'autres motifs par (1986), 68 A.L.R. 161 (H.C.), appliqué en dissidence par le juge Southin de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique, dans l'arrêt BG Checo International Ltd. c. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority (1990), 44 B.C.L.R. (2d) 145. Les motifs prononcés par les juges Mahoney et Hutley dans la première affaire semblent de fait étayer la proposition selon laquelle il faut au moins qu'une déclaration expresse, ou qu'une déclaration équivalant à une déclaration expresse, ait été faite, selon la doctrine énoncée dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne. Toutefois, il importe de noter qu'en rejetant un appel subséquent pour des motifs différents, la High Court d'Australie s'est expressément abstenue de faire quelque remarque que ce soit sur ce point. La cour à la majorité a préféré fonder son jugement, entre leading or inaccurate in what was represented, regardless of how the representation was characterized.

On the other hand, there is considerable authority for the more flexible view that, in appropriate circumstances, implied misrepresentations can, and often do, give rise to actionable negligence: see, for example, Banque Financière de la Cité SA v. Westgate Insurance Co., [1989] 2 All E.R. 952 (C.A.), at p. 1000, aff'd on other grounds [1990] 2 All E.R. 947 (H.L.); Datile Financial Corp. v. Royal Trust, supra, at p. 379; Hendrick v. De Marsh (Ont. H.C.), supra; Steer v. Aerovox, supra; and Doherty v. Allen (1988), 55 D.L.R. (4th) 746 (N.B.C.A.).

In my opinion, a flexible approach to this issue is preferable. It is arbitrary and premature to declare as a general rule that nothing less than express or direct representations can succeed under the Hedley Byrne doctrine. Undoubtedly, there will be cases such as the present one where the surrounding circumstances are such that it makes little difference, if any, how one characterizes the manner in which the representation is made, and where it would be unjust to deny recovery simply because the representation relied on is said to be implied rather than express. It is unnecessary for me to set out in detail the circumstances in which so-called implied representations can be enough to sustain an action in tort for negligent misrepresentation. I prefer leaving this task to trial judges dealing with specific factual situations. Suffice it to say that the case at bar falls well within this category.

There was a considerable number of express representations made by Mr. Johnston during the interview which point directly towards the existence of the Multiview project and the nature of the respondent's commitment thereto. The implied misrepresentation found by the trial judge is not only reasonable in the surrounding circumstances, but it is also perhaps the only inference that could autres, sur le fait qu'aucune déclaration inexacte, [TRADUCTION] «expresse ou implicite», n'avait été faite. En d'autres termes, la High Court n'a rien constaté de trompeur ou d'inexact dans la déclaration, quelle que soit la manière dont elle a été qualifiée.

Par ailleurs, de nombreux arrêts viennent appuyer l'opinion plus large selon laquelle, dans des circonstances appropriées, des déclarations inexactes implicites peuvent donner lieu à une négligence donnant droit à une poursuite et y donnent souvent lieu: voir, par exemple, Banque Financière de la Cité SA c. Westgate Insurance Co., [1989] 2 All E.R. 952 (C.A.), à la p. 1000, conf. pour d'autres motifs par [1990] 2 All E.R. 947 (H.L.); Datile Financial Corp. c. Royal Trust, précité, à la p. 379; Hendrick c. De Marsh (H.C. Ont.), précité; Steer c. Aerovox, précité; et Doherty c. Allen (1988), 55 D.L.R. (4th) 746 (C.A.N.-B.).

À mon avis, il est préférable d'adopter une attitude plus souple à cet égard. Il est arbitraire et prématuré de déclarer qu'en règle générale il faut au moins une déclaration expresse ou directe, selon la doctrine énoncée dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne. Il y a sans doute des cas comme celui-ci où les circonstances sont telles que la façon de qualifier la déclaration importe peu, ou n'importe pas du tout, et où il serait injuste de refuser un redressement simplement parce que la déclaration sur laquelle on s'appuie est jugée implicite plutôt qu'expresse. Il est inutile d'énoncer en détail les circonstances dans lesquelles des déclarations dites implicites peuvent suffire pour soutenir une action en responsabilité délictuelle fondée sur une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence. Je préfère laisser cette tâche au juge des faits, qui examine des situations de fait précises. Il suffit de dire que l'affaire qui nous occupe fait partie de cette catégorie.

Pendant l'entrevue, M. Johnston a fait un nombre considérable de déclarations expresses qui établissent directement l'existence du projet Multiview et la nature de l'engagement pris par l'intimée à cet égard. La conclusion d'existence d'une déclaration inexacte implicite tirée par le juge de première instance est non seulement raisonnable, selon les circonstances, mais il s'agit be drawn from the direct representations made to the appellant during the interview. A reasonable person placed in the appellant's position would, without a doubt, have drawn the same inference from what was being said that the appellant and trial judge did.

This is not a situation where many different and conflicting interpretations may reasonably be drawn from a series of direct representations and where the representee advances the implied meaning most favourable to recovery. This is a case where everything said and represented during the interview points to the same conclusion: the Multiview project as described by Mr. Johnston was a reality in that the respondent had given its financial support to its development. The appellant had a relatively secure and well paying job in Calgary and, as found by the trial judge, he would not have chosen to move across the country if he thought there was a substantial risk that the employment opportunity described to him would no longer exist, after his arrival in Ottawa. To a large extent, this risk was alleviated by the representations made during the interview. For these reasons, the fact that the representation in question falls short of being express should not, in the circumstances of this case, preclude the appellant from relying on the Hedley Byrne doctrine and from obtaining a remedy for the damages he suffered.

E. The Employment Agreement Signed Subsequent to the Negligent Misrepresentations

Thus far, I have stated that the courts below were correct in finding a "special relationship" between the parties as to give rise to a duty of care during the interview, and that the misrepresentations found by the trial judge were indeed made in a negligent manner in all the circumstances of the case. Again, there is no question in this appeal that the appellant reasonably relied, to his detriment, on these negligent misrepresentations. The only remaining issue is whether the employment agreement signed by the appellant more than two weeks after the interview affects, in any way, the above findings or the consequence that would normally peut-être également de la seule déduction possible par suite des déclarations directes faites à l'appelant pendant l'entrevue. Une personne raisonnable se trouvant dans la situation de l'appelant aurait sans doute fait les mêmes déductions que ce dernier et le juge de première instance.

Il ne s'agit pas d'un cas dans lequel de nombreuses interprétations différentes et contradictoires peuvent raisonnablement être données à partir d'une série de déclarations directes, le destinataire de la déclaration préconisant le sens implicite le plus favorable au redressement. Il s'agit d'un cas où tout ce qui a été dit et déclaré pendant l'entrevue mène à la même conclusion: le projet Multiview décrit par M. Johnston était une réalité, en ce sens que l'intimée avait financièrement appuyé sa mise en œuvre. L'appelant exerçait un emploi relativement sûr et rémunérateur à Calgary et, comme le juge de première instance l'a conclu, il n'aurait pas choisi de s'installer à l'autre bout du pays s'il avait cru que la perspective d'emploi qui lui avait été décrite n'existerait probablement plus, après son arrivée à Ottawa. Dans une large mesure, ce risque a été atténué par les déclarations faites pendant l'entrevue. Pour ces motifs, le fait que la déclaration en question n'est pas expresse ne devrait pas, compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce, empêcher l'appelant de s'appuyer sur la doctrine énoncée dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne et d'obtenir un redressement pour le préjudice qu'il a subi.

E. Le contrat de travail signé après les déclarations inexactes

Jusqu'ici, j'ai dit que les tribunaux d'instance inférieure avaient eu raison de conclure à l'existence d'un «lien spécial» entre les parties, de façon à donner lieu à une obligation de diligence pendant l'entrevue, et que les déclarations inexactes constatées par le juge de première instance avaient de fait été faites d'une manière négligente, compte tenu de toutes les circonstances de l'espèce. Ici encore, il est certain que l'appelant s'est fié d'une manière raisonnable, à son détriment, à ces déclarations inexactes. Il reste uniquement à savoir si le contrat de travail signé par l'appelant plus de deux semaines après l'entrevue influe de quelque façon follow therefrom, namely, liability of the respondent for the damages caused to the appellant.

Finlayson J.A. found that clauses 13 and 14 of the employment agreement constituted an adequate, albeit not express, "disclaimer of responsibility" for the representations made during the interview because these clauses contradicted or were inconsistent with those representations. The respondent adopts this conclusion, submitting that there is a clear inconsistency between the contract and the alleged misrepresentations and that this inconsistency is sufficient to constitute a disclaimer within the meaning of Hedley Byrne, supra. The respondent argues that the representation relied on by the appellant goes to the issue of job security and that the contract of employment specifically addresses, and contradicts, this issue in its provisions dealing with reassignment and termination of employment, "without cause", on one month's notice. Furthermore, the respondent relies on the decision of this Court in J. Nunes Diamonds, supra, for the proposition that the doctrine of Hedley Byrne, supra, "is inapplicable to any case where the relationship between the parties is governed by a contract, unless the negligence relied on can properly be considered as 'an independent tort' unconnected with the performance of that contract". It is argued that the tort in question is not "independent" from the contract. Moreover, the respondent submits that the one-month termination clause in the contract amounts to a "limitation of liability clause" and that the appellant is attempting to circumvent this clause by its present action in tort, contrary to the decision of this Court in Central Trust v. Rafuse, supra. Finally, the respondent argues that the appellant's conduct after his arrival at the company and his learning of the developments regarding the Multiview project amounts to an affirmation of his contract of employment.

For his part, the appellant submits that the tort at issue is "independent" of the employment agreement within the meaning of J. Nunes Diamonds, sur les conclusions susmentionnées ou sur la conséquence qui en découlerait normalement, à savoir la responsabilité de l'intimée pour le préjudice causé à l'appelant.

Le juge Finlayson a conclu que les clauses 13 et 14 du contrat de travail constituaient une [TRADUCTION] «dénégation de responsabilité» adéquate, quoique non expresse, à l'égard des déclarations faites pendant l'entrevue, parce qu'elles contredisaient ces déclarations ou étaient incompatibles avec elles. L'intimée fait sienne cette conclusion et soutient qu'il y a clairement une contradiction entre le contrat et les déclarations inexactes alléguées et que cette contradiction est suffisante pour constituer une dénégation au sens de l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, précité. L'intimée soutient que la déclaration sur laquelle l'appelant s'est appuyé porte sur la question de la sécurité d'emploi et que cette question est expressément visée, et contredite, par les dispositions du contrat de travail concernant la réaffectation et le congédiement «sans motif» sur préavis d'un mois. En outre, l'intimée s'appuie sur l'arrêt J. Nunes Diamonds, précité, de notre Cour en ce qui concerne la proposition selon laquelle la doctrine énoncée dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, précité, «ne peut pas s'appliquer lorsque les relations entre les parties sont régies par un contrat, à moins qu'il soit possible de considérer que la négligence imputée constitue un délit civil indépendant n'ayant aucun rapport avec l'exécution du contrat». Or, allègue-t-on, le délit en question n'est pas «indépendant» du contrat. En outre, l'intimée soutient que la clause de congédiement sur préavis d'un mois figurant dans le contrat équivaut à une [TRADUCTION] «clause de limitation de responsabilité» et que l'appelant tente de se soustraire à cette clause par son action en responsabilité délictuelle, ce qui va à l'encontre de l'arrêt Central Trust c. Rafuse, précité, de notre Cour. Enfin, l'intimée prétend que la conduite de l'appelant après qu'il fut arrivé à la société et qu'il eut pris connaissance de la situation au sujet du projet Multiview équivaut à une confirmation de son contrat de travail.

De son côté, l'appelant fait valoir que le délit en cause est «indépendant» du contrat de travail au sens de l'arrêt J. Nunes Diamonds, précité, et qu'il supra, and is not affected in any way by its provisions. In particular, it is submitted that clauses 13 and 14 of the employment contract do not amount to a valid disclaimer and have no bearing whatsoever on the respondent's liability in tort. In this respect, he argues that express contractual terms are required in order to negate an otherwise "independent" duty of care. Furthermore, the appellant claims he was simply attempting to mitigate his damages by staying with the respondent after the reassignments. According to him, any "affirmation" of the contract is irrelevant since the tort in issue is "independent" from the contract and because the damages crystallized at the moment he became aware of the misrepresentations.

n'est aucunement touché par ses dispositions. En particulier, il soutient que les clauses 13 et 14 du contrat de travail n'équivalent pas à une dénégation valide et n'influent aucunement sur la responsabilité délictuelle de l'intimée. À cet égard, l'appelant est d'avis que des conditions contractuelles expresses sont requises pour éteindre une obligation de diligence par ailleurs «indépendante». En outre, l'appelant affirme qu'il tentait simplement d'atténuer son préjudice en demeurant chez l'intimée après les réaffectations. Selon lui, toute «confirmation» du contrat n'est pas pertinente puisque le délit en question est «indépendant» du contrat et que le préjudice s'est cristallisé au moment où il a pris connaissance des déclarations inexactes.

As I see the matter, the specific employment agreement signed by the appellant is, in the circumstances of this case, irrelevant to his action for negligent misrepresentation. This contract falls within the third proposition suggested earlier in which a representee's claim for damages for a negligent pre-contractual misrepresentation is not affected, in any way, by the subsequent contract. I observed at p. 111 of these reasons that this appeal is clearly distinguishable from BG Checo, supra, in that the common law duty of care relied on by the appellant is not, unlike in BG Checo, co-extensive with a duty imposed on the respondent by an express term of the employment agreement. This conclusion, in effect, disposes of the respondent's argument based on J. Nunes Diamonds, supra.

À mon avis, le contrat de travail que l'appelant a signé n'a rien à voir, compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce, avec l'action fondée sur une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence qu'il a intentée. Ce contrat est visé par la troisième proposition mentionnée ci-dessus, selon laquelle l'action en dommages-intérêts intentée par le destinataire par suite d'une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence avant la passation d'un contrat n'est aucunement touchée par le contrat subséquent. J'ai fait remarquer à la p. 111 des présents motifs que l'on peut facilement faire une distinction entre le présent pourvoi et le pourvoi BG Checo, précité, en ce sens que l'obligation de diligence existant en common law sur laquelle s'appuie l'appelant ne coïncide pas, contrairement à ce qui était le cas dans le pourvoi BG Checo, avec une obligation imposée à l'intimée par une condition expresse du contrat de travail. En fait, cette conclusion répond à l'argument de l'intimée fondé sur l'arrêt J. Nunes Diamonds, précité.

Indeed, as I alluded to in BG Checo, the aspect of the judgment of the majority in J. Nunes Diamonds, supra, upon which the respondent relies (the passage found at pp. 777-78) was qualified by the unanimous judgment of this Court in Central Trust v. Rafuse, supra, recognizing concurrency between contract and tort as a general

De fait, comme je l'ai mentionné dans l'arrêt BG Checo, l'aspect du jugement rendu par la majorité dans l'arrêt J. Nunes Diamonds, précité, sur lequel l'intimée s'appuie (le passage figurant aux pp. 777 et 778) a fait l'objet de certaines réserves dans l'arrêt unanime Central Trust c. Rafuse, précité, de notre Cour, celle-ci ayant reconnu que la concomitance entre la responsabilité en matière contractuelle et délictuelle est en rule subject to certain "exceptions", including (at p. 205):

> 2. What is undertaken by the contract will indicate the nature of the relationship that gives rise to the common law duty of care, but the nature and scope of the duty of care that is asserted as the foundation of the tortious liability must not depend on specific obligations or duties created by the express terms of the contract. It is in that sense that the common law duty of care must be independent of the contract. The distinction, in so far as the terms of the contract are concerned, is, broadly speaking, between what is to be done and how it is to be done. A claim cannot be said to be in tort if it depends for the nature and scope of the asserted duty of care on the manner in which an obligation or duty has been expressly and specifically defined by a contract. [Emphasis added.]

Unlike in BG Checo, the common law duty of care invoked by the appellant is, for reasons already given, "independent" of the employment agreement. I would therefore reject this part of the respondent's argument which attempts to disallow the appellant's action in tort and to confine him to whatever remedies are available under the law of contract.

This leaves the question of whether the duty or liability of the respondent in tort is limited or excluded by a term of the employment agreement. As I see the matter, neither the respondent's duty of care nor its liability is affected by the terms of the employment agreement. For convenience, I reproduce again the provisions of this contract which play a determining role according to the Court of Appeal and the respondent:

TRANSFER

> 13. Quasar Systems reserves the right to reassign you to another position with the Company without reduction of your salary or benefits and upon one month's notice to you. Should such reassignment require your permanent relocation to another city, the Company will reimburse you for your expenses in accordance with the then current relocation policy.

général assujettie à certaines «exceptions», et notamment (à la p. 205):

> 2. Les engagements stipulés dans le contrat révèlent la nature des liens dont découle l'obligation de diligence en common law, mais la nature et la portée de l'obligation de diligence invoquée comme fondement de la responsabilité délictuelle ne doivent pas dépendre d'obligations ou de devoirs précis créés expressément par le contrat. C'est dans ce sens que l'obligation de diligence en common law doit être indépendante du contrat. La distinction, en ce qui concerne les termes du contrat, est, d'une manière générale, entre ce qu'il faut faire et la façon de le faire. On ne saurait affirmer qu'une réclamation est en matière délictuelle si elle tient, en ce qui concerne la nature et la portée de l'obligation de diligence alléguée, à la façon dont une obligation a été expressément et précisément définie dans un contrat. [Je souligne.]

Contrairement à ce qui était le cas dans le pourvoi BG Checo, l'obligation de diligence existant en common law que l'appelant a invoquée est, pour les motifs déjà énoncés, «indépendante» du contrat de travail. Par conséquent, je suis d'avis de rejeter la partie de l'argument de l'intimée visant à faire rejeter l'action en responsabilité délictuelle intentée par l'appelant et à limiter ce dernier aux redressements prévus par le droit des contrats.

Il reste à savoir si l'obligation ou la responsabilité délictuelle de l'intimée est limitée ou exclue par une clause du contrat de travail. À mon avis, les clauses du contrat de travail n'influent pas sur l'obligation de diligence de l'intimée ni sur sa responsabilité. Pour plus de commodité, je reproduis ici encore les dispositions de ce contrat qui, selon la Cour d'appel et l'intimée, ont un rôle déterminant:

MUTATION

TERMINATION NOTICE — ONE MONTH

14. This Agreement may be terminated at any time and without cause by Quasar Systems Ltd. or by you. In the event of termination, Quasar Systems Ltd. will give you one month's notice of termination plus any additional notice that may be required by any applicable legislation. Similarly, you shall give Quasar Systems Ltd. one month's notice if you voluntarily terminate this Agreement. Quasar Systems Ltd. may pay you one month's salary in lieu of the aforesaid notice in which event this Agreement and your employment will be terminated on the date such payment in lieu of notice is made.

In my view, the Court of Appeal erred in giving to clauses 13 and 14 the effect of a "disclaimer of responsibility" within the meaning of Hedley Byrne and Carman Construction, supra. These provisions are clearly distinguishable from the disclaimers at issue in both Hedley Byrne and Carman Construction.

In Hedley Byrne, the representee's bank requested certain financial information from the representors, merchant bankers for a potential client of the representee, "in confidence and without responsibility" on the part of the representors. The latter replied to the inquiry, in part, as follows: "CONFIDENTIAL. For your private use and without responsibility on the part of the bank or its officials." Unlike the present appeal, there was never any contractual relationship between the representee and the representor in Hedley Byrne. The House of Lords unanimously held that even though a duty of care with respect to representations could, in appropriate circumstances, exist, such a duty could not arise in Hedley Byrne since the representors had manifestly expressed, prior to the representations and to the knowledge of the representee, that they did not assume or accept responsibility for any of the information given.

Carman Construction, supra, on the other hand, concerned a misrepresentation made in a contractual setting. The corresponding clause in that case (cl. 3.1) expressly provided that the plaintiff was

AVIS DE CESSATION D'EMPLOI — UN MOIS

14. Le présent contrat peut être résilié à n'importe quel moment et sans motif par Quasar Systems Ltd. ou par vous. En cas de cessation d'emploi, Quasar Systems Ltd. vous donnera un préavis d'un mois en sus de tout avis additionnel prévu par une loi pertinente. De même, vous donnerez à Quasar Systems Ltd. un préavis d'un mois si vous résiliez volontairement ce contrat. Quasar Systems Ltd. peut vous verser un mois de salaire au lieu dudit avis, auquel cas ce contrat et votre emploi prendront fin à la date à laquelle cette somme vous sera versée.

À mon avis, la Cour d'appel a commis une erreur en interprétant les clauses 13 et 14 comme une «dénégation de responsabilité» au sens des arrêts Hedley Byrne et Carman Construction, précités. Une distinction peut clairement être faite entre ces dispositions et les dénégations en cause dans les arrêts Hedley Byrne et Carman Construction.

Dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, la banque du destinataire de la déclaration avait demandé certains renseignements financiers aux auteurs, qui étaient des spécialistes d'une banque d'affaire pour un client éventuel du destinataire, [TRADUCTION] «confidentiellement et sous toutes réserves» de la part de ceux-ci. Les auteurs ont en partie répondu comme suit: [TRADUCTION] «CONFIDENTIEL. Pour votre usage personnel et sous toutes réserves de la part de la banque ou de ses représentants.» Contrairement au présent pourvoi, il n'y avait jamais eu de lien contractuel entre l'auteur et le destinataire de la déclaration dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne. La Chambre des lords a jugé à l'unanimité qu'une obligation de diligence pouvait exister, dans les cas appropriés, à l'égard des déclarations, mais que cette obligation ne pouvait pas exister dans cette affaire étant donné que les auteurs des déclarations avaient clairement fait savoir au préalable, et ce, à la connaissance du destinataire, qu'ils n'assumaient ou ne reconnaissaient aucune responsabilité à l'égard des renseignements fournis.

D'autre part, l'arrêt Carman Construction, précité, portait sur une déclaration inexacte faite dans un contexte contractuel. La clause correspondante dans cette affaire (la cl. 3.1) prévoyait expressé-not relying on the representations of the defendant: "the Contractor does not rely upon any information given or statement made to him in relation to the work by the Company" (p. 961). The pertinent comments of Martland J., writing for a unanimous Court, are worth quoting (at pp. 972-73):

In the Hedley Byrne case the decision was that the disclaimer of responsibility for the persons alleged to be liable for negligent misrepresentation, communicated to the other party, excluded the assumption of a duty of care. I regard the wording of clause 3.1 of the agreement as having the like effect. The judgment at trial dealt with the situation on the basis that negligent misrepresentation had been established, but that clause 3.1 was an exemption clause which exempted C.P.R. from liability. In the circumstances of this case, I would prefer to regard the clause as establishing that C.P.R. did not assume any duty of care, and a claim in negligence will not arise in the absence of a duty of care.

I reach this conclusion in the light of the facts to which I have already referred in dealing with the issue of collateral warranty. Carman was made aware, when Fielding received the tender documents, and read and understood clause 3.1, that if it entered into an agreement with C.P.R. it was doing so on its own knowledge as to the quantities of material to be removed and that it would not rely upon any information or statement made to it by C.P.R. in relation to the work. Fielding was aware of this when he sought information from a C.P.R. employee. He knew that if information was obtained, Carman would be relying upon it at its own risk. In my opinion, on the facts of this case, a duty of care on the part of C.P.R. in respect of information provided by its employee never arose provided the information was given honestly. The trial judge has found that the misrepresentation made to Carman was made innocently without intent to defraud. [Emphasis added.]

Also instructive is the following excerpt from the reasons of Wilson J.A. (as she then was), writing for the majority of the Court of Appeal, in Carman Construction ((1981), 33 O.R. (2d) 472, at p. 473):

ment que la demanderesse ne s'appuyait pas sur les déclarations de la défenderesse: [TRADUCTION] «l'entrepreneur ne se fie à aucun renseignement que la Compagnie lui a donné ni à aucune déclaration qu'elle lui a faite concernant les travaux» (à la p. 961). Il vaut la peine de citer les remarques pertinentes du juge Martland, qui a rédigé les motifs unanimes de la Cour (aux pp. 972 et 973):

Dans l'affaire Hedley Byrne, on a décidé que la dénégation de responsabilité relative aux personnes auxquelles on imputait une responsabilité en raison d'une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence à l'autre partie, excluait l'hypothèse d'une obligation de diligence. J'estime que les termes de la clause 3.1 du contrat ont le même effet. Le jugement de première instance a traité la situation en tenant pour acquis que l'existence d'une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence avait été établie, mais que la clause 3.1 était une clause d'exonération qui dégageait le C.P. de toute responsabilité. Dans les circonstances en l'espèce, je préfère considérer que cette clause établit que le C.P. n'a assumé aucune obligation de diligence et, en l'absence d'une obligation de diligence, il ne peut y avoir de réclamation fondée sur la négligence.

J'arrive à cette conclusion compte tenu des faits que j'ai déjà mentionnés en traitant la question de la garantie accessoire. Lorsque Fielding a reçu les documents de soumission et qu'il a lu et saisi la clause 3.1, Carman a été informée que si elle se liait par contrat avec le C.P., elle le ferait suivant sa propre connaissance du volume de roc à déplacer et qu'elle ne devrait se fier à aucun renseignement ni à aucune déclaration du C.P. relativement aux travaux. Fielding le savait lorsqu'il a demandé des renseignements à un employé du C.P. Il savait que s'il obtenait un renseignement, Carman ne pourrait s'y fier qu'à ses propres risques. À mon avis, d'après les faits en l'espèce, C.P. n'a jamais assumé une obligation de diligence à l'égard du renseignement donné par son employé, pourvu que ce renseignement ait été donné honnêtement. Le juge de première instance a conclu que la déclaration inexacte a été faite à Carman de bonne foi sans intention frauduleuse. [Je souligne.]

Il est également intéressant de noter l'extrait suivant des motifs du juge Wilson (alors juge à la Cour d'appel), qui a rédigé les motifs au nom de la Cour d'appel à la majorité, dans l'arrêt Carman Construction ((1981), 33 O.R. (2d) 472, à la p. 473):

This is not, in the view of the majority, a case in which, after making a negligent misrepresentation to the plaintiff in order to induce it to enter into a contract, the terms of which were at the time of the misrepresentation unknown, the defendant thereafter inserts into the contract an exculpatory clause in order to insulate itself against antecedent tort liability. This is a case in which the plaintiff tendered knowing that in the very contract on which it was tendering it had agreed to assume the risk of using any information obtained by it from the defendant's employees.

Contrary to Hedley Byrne and Carman Construction, supra, there is no contemporaneity in this case between the alleged disclaimers of responsibility and the negligent misrepresentations. More important than their timing, however, clauses 13 and 14 of the employment agreement are far from being statements, express or implied, that the respondent and its representative are not assuming responsibility for the representations made to the appellant during the hiring interview about the nature and existence of the Multiview project. Although I am not prepared to hold that nothing less than the clearest and most express disclaimer will suffice to negate a duty of care, something more than clauses 13 and 14 is definitely required. These provisions relate to the rights and obligations of the parties in the event of the appellant's termination or transfer. They have nothing to do with representations made during pre- or post-contractual negotiations, let alone disclaimers for said representations.

Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the principle set out in the judgment of the Court of Appeal is correct in law (i.e., "it is a sufficient disclaimer if the contract contains terms which contradict or are inconsistent with the representations relied upon" (p. 183)), there are no inconsistencies in the case at bar between clauses 13 and 14 of the contract and the representations relied on by the appellant. The only way to find such an inconsistency is to agree with Finlayson J.A. and the respondent that the representations relied on by the appellant amount to a warranty of job security. However, as noted above, the representations in Contrairement à ce qui était le cas dans les arrêts Hedley Byrne et Carman Construction, précités, les dénégations de responsabilité alléguées et les déclarations inexactes n'ont pas été faites en même temps en l'espèce. Toutefois, ce qui est encore plus important que le moment où elles ont été faites, les clauses 13 et 14 du contrat de travail sont loin d'être des déclarations, expresses ou implicites, voulant que l'intimée et son représentant n'assument pas la responsabilité des déclarations faites à l'appelant pendant l'entrevue d'embauchage au sujet de la nature et de l'existence du projet Multiview. Je ne suis pas prêt à conclure qu'il faut absolument une dénégation claire et expresse pour exclure l'obligation de diligence, mais il est certain que les clauses 13 et 14 ne suffisent pas. Ces dispositions portent sur les droits et obligations des parties en cas de cessation d'emploi ou de mutation. Elle n'ont rien à voir avec les déclarations faites pendant les négociations qui ont précédé ou suivi la signature du contrat, et sont encore moins des dénégations relatives auxdites déclarations.

À supposer, pour les fins de la discussion, que le principe énoncé dans le jugement de la Cour d'appel soit fondé en droit (à savoir, [TRADUCTION] «il y a une dénégation suffisante si le contrat contient des clauses qui contredisent les déclarations auxquelles on s'est fié ou qui sont incompatibles avec ces déclarations» (à la p. 183)), il n'y a pas de contradictions en l'espèce entre les clauses 13 et 14 du contrat et les déclarations sur lesquelles s'appuie l'appelant. La seule façon de constater pareille contradiction est de souscrire à l'avis du juge Finlayson et de l'intimée, que les déclarations sur lesquelles l'appelant s'est appuyé équivalent à une question are not of this nature. Rather, they are representations that a particular job would exist and that it would have certain features. As the trial judge found, the representations made during the job interview were firm representations "that the [respondent] company was committed to the development of additional modules of 'Multiview'" (p. 397), and there were implicit representations "that there was a reasonable plan in existence for the additional modules and that the company had made a financial commitment in the way of budgetary provisions for such development" (p. 398). Characterizing the representations in question as a warranty of job security seems particularly strained because Mr. Johnston actually indicated that the project would last only two years. Thus, Mr. Johnston did not represent that the position would last forever, although he certainly did represent that it would exist.

Again, the appellant's claim is not that Mr. Johnston negligently misrepresented the length of time he would be working on Multiview or the conditions under which his employment could be terminated. He does not argue that Cognos, through its representative, breached a duty of care by negligently misrepresenting his security of employment with the respondent company. Rather, the appellant argues that Mr. Johnston misrepresented the nature and existence of the employment opportunity being offered. It is on these latter representations that the appellant relied in leaving his relatively secure and well paying job in Calgary. The employment agreement neither expressly nor impliedly states that there may be no job of the sort described during the interview after the appellant's arrival in Ottawa. Stipulations that an employee can be dismissed without cause upon proper notice or reassigned to another position are not incompatible with a pre-contractual representation that a garantie de sécurité d'emploi. Toutefois, comme je l'ai fait remarquer précédemment, les déclarations en question ne sont pas de cette nature. Il s'agit plutôt de déclarations selon lesquelles un emploi particulier existerait, lequel comporterait certains éléments. Comme le juge de première instance l'a conclu, les déclarations faites pendant l'entrevue d'embauchage étaient des déclarations fermes: [TRADUCTION] «la société [intimée] était bien décidée à mettre au point des modules additionnels de «Multiview»» (à la p. 397); on avait implicitement déclaré [TRADUCTION] «qu'il existait un plan raisonnable à l'égard des modules additionnels et que la société s'était financièrement engagée à les mettre au point au moyen de dispositions budgétaires» (à la p. 398). Qualifier les déclarations en question de garanties relatives à la sécurité d'emploi semble être particulièrement exagéré étant donné que M. Johnston a de fait indiqué que le projet ne durerait que deux ans. M. Johnston n'a donc pas déclaré qu'il s'agissait d'un poste permanent, bien qu'il ait certainement affirmé que ce poste serait disponible.

Ici encore, l'appelant n'allègue pas que M. Johnston a fait par négligence des déclarations inexactes quant à la période pendant laquelle il travaillerait au projet Multiview ou aux conditions dans lesquelles il pouvait être mis fin à son emploi. Il ne soutient pas que Cognos, par l'entremise de son représentant, a violé son obligation de diligence en faisant par négligence des déclarations inexactes au sujet de sa sécurité d'emploi auprès de la société intimée. L'appelant fait valoir plutôt que M. Johnston a fait des déclarations inexactes au sujet de la nature et de l'existence de l'emploi offert. L'appelant s'est fié à ces dernières déclarations lorsqu'il a quitté son emploi relativement sûr et rémunérateur à Calgary. Le contrat de travail ne dit pas expressément ni implicitement qu'il se peut qu'une fois l'appelant arrivé à Ottawa, il n'y ait aucun emploi du genre décrit pendant l'entrevue. Les clauses prévoyant que l'employé peut être congédié sans motif à la suite d'un préavis approprié ou qu'il peut être réaffecté à un autre poste ne sont pas incompatibles avec la déclaration faite avant la signature du contrat, à savoir qu'un poste particular job would exist, as described, should the employee accept employment.

As for the respondent's liability, clauses 13 and 14 of the employment agreement are clearly not, on their face, general limitation or exclusion of liability clauses as these expressions are commonly used. The language adopted by the parties is unambiguous. By stretching the common definition of "limitation of liability clause", one could interpret clauses 13 and 14 as "limiting" the respondent's "liability" in the event of a transfer or termination to what is specifically provided therein. However, even if this interpretation were adopted, the respondent's liability for pre-contractual negligent misrepresentations is clearly beyond the scope of these provisions. It is trite law that, in determining whether or not a limitation (or exclusion) of liability clause protects a defendant in a particular situation, the first step is to interpret the clause to see if it applies to the tort or breach of contract complained of. If the clause is wide enough to cover, for example, the defendant's negligence, then it may operate to limit effectively the defendant's liability for the breach of a common law duty of care, subject to any overriding considerations. This is not, however, the situation facing this Court.

Clauses 13 and 14 of the employment agreement, even if characterized as "limitation of liability" clauses, cannot support an interpretation which would enable them to protect the respondent from the breach of a common law duty of care, let alone the breach of the particular duty invoked by the appellant in his action for negligent misrepresentation. These provisions are no more relevant to the outcome of this case than is clause 15 of the contract, permitting Cognos to terminate the appellant's employment for cause. Thus, contrary to the respondent's submission, the third proposition set out in Central Trust v. Rafuse, supra, at p. 206, is of no assistance to this appeal, that is, the appellant is not attempting by his tort claim to "circumvent particulier serait disponible, tel que décrit, si l'employé acceptait l'emploi.

Quant à la responsabilité de l'intimée, les clauses 13 et 14 du contrat de travail ne constituent clairement pas, à première vue, des clauses de limitation ou d'exclusion de responsabilité au sens où ces expressions sont ordinairement employées. Le libellé adopté par les parties n'est pas ambigu. En élargissant la définition ordinaire de l'expression «clause de limitation de responsabilité», on pourrait interpréter les clauses 13 et 14 comme «limitant» la «responsabilité» de l'intimée à ce qui y est expressément prévu, dans le cas d'une mutation ou d'une cessation d'emploi. Toutefois, même si l'on adoptait cette interprétation, la responsabilité de l'intimée pour les déclarations inexactes faites par négligence avant la signature du contrat irait clairement au-delà de la portée de ces dispositions. Il est de droit constant qu'en déterminant si une clause de limitation (ou d'exclusion) de responsabilité protège un défendeur dans un cas particulier, il faut avant tout interpréter la clause pour déterminer si elle s'applique au délit civil ou à la violation de contrat en cause. Si la clause est suffisamment générale pour viser, par exemple, la négligence du défendeur, elle peut s'appliquer de façon à limiter effectivement la responsabilité de celui-ci pour la violation d'une obligation de diligence existant en common law, sous réserve de quelque considération prépondérante. Toutefois, tel n'est pas ici le cas.

Les clauses 13 et 14 du contrat de travail, même si elles sont considérées comme des clauses de «limitation de responsabilité», ne peuvent pas étayer une interprétation selon laquelle elles pourraient protéger l'intimée contre la violation de l'obligation de diligence existant en common law, et encore moins la violation de l'obligation particulière invoquée par l'appelant dans son action fondée sur la déclaration inexacte faite par négligence. Ces dispositions ne sont pas plus pertinentes, en ce qui concerne l'issue de l'affaire, que la clause 15 du contrat, qui permet à Cognos de congédier l'appelant pour un motif déterminé. Ainsi, contrairement à l'argument de l'intimée, la troisième proposition énoncée dans l'arrêt Central or escape a contractual exclusion or limitation of liability for the act or omission that would constitute the tort". Simply put, there is nothing in the employment agreement for the appellant to circumvent or to escape.

Finally, with respect to the respondent's argument that the appellant "affirmed" his contract by his conduct subsequent to his arrival in Ottawa, I would make two brief comments. First, the whole concept of "affirming" a contract is irrelevant in the case at bar as the appellant is seeking to rely on a tort remedy rather than a contractual one. Second, it seems somewhat harsh to characterize the appellant as having affirmed his contract of employment. The appellant found himself in a very difficult job situation, with increasing marital and health problems to exacerbate the situation. In my view, he acted quite reasonably in attempting to mitigate his losses before finally ending his employment relationship with Cognos.

F. Conclusion

In my view, the appellant has established all the required elements to succeed in his action. The respondent and its representative, Mr. Johnston, owed a duty of care to the appellant during the course of the hiring interview to exercise such reasonable care as the circumstances required to ensure that the representations made were accurate and not misleading. This duty of care is distinct from, and additional to, the duty of common honesty existing between negotiating parties. The trial judge found, as a fact, that misrepresentations—both express and implied—were made to the appellant and that he relied upon them, reasonably I might add, to his eventual detriment. In all the circumstances of this case, I agree with the trial judge that these misrepresentations were made by Mr. Johnston in a negligent manner. While a subsequent contract may, in appropriate cases, affect a Hedley Byrne claim relying on pre-contractual rep-

Trust c. Rafuse, précité, à la p. 206, n'est d'aucune utilité en l'espèce, c'est-à-dire que l'appelant ne tente pas, par l'action en responsabilité délictuelle qu'il a intentée, «de contourner ou d'éluder une clause contractuelle d'exonération ou de limitation de responsabilité pour l'acte ou l'omission qui constitue le délit civil». Bref, il n'y a rien dans le contrat de travail que l'appelant peut contourner ou éluder.

Enfin, en ce qui concerne l'argument de l'intimée selon lequel l'appelant a «confirmé» son contrat vu la façon dont il a agi après son arrivée à Ottawa, je ferais deux brèves remarques. En premier lieu, la notion de «confirmation» de contrat n'est pas pertinente en l'espèce car l'appelant cherche à exercer un recours fondé sur la responsabilité délictuelle plutôt que sur un contrat. En second lieu, il semble que ce soit être plutôt sévère que de considérer que l'appelant a confirmé son contrat de travail. L'appelant s'est trouvé dans une situation professionnelle fort difficile, et des problèmes conjugaux et médicaux sont venus aggraver la situation. À mon avis, il a agi d'une manière tout à fait raisonnable en tentant d'atténuer ses pertes avant de mettre finalement fin à ses relations professionnelles avec Cognos.

F. Conclusion

À mon avis, l'appelant a établi tous les éléments nécessaires pour avoir gain de cause. L'intimée et son représentant, M. Johnston, avaient une obligation de diligence envers l'appelant pendant l'entrevue d'embauchage et devaient faire preuve de la diligence raisonnable requise par les circonstances, de façon à s'assurer que les déclarations qui étaient faites étaient exactes et non trompeuses. Cette obligation de diligence est distincte de l'obligation d'honnêteté ordinaire existant entre des parties qui négocient et vient s'y ajouter. Le juge de première instance a tenu pour avéré que des déclarations inexactes, expresses et implicites, avaient été faites à l'appelant et qu'il s'y était fié, de manière raisonnable selon moi, et à son détriment. Compte tenu de toutes les circonstances de l'espèce, je souscris à l'avis du juge de première instance, selon lequel M. Johnston a fait ces déclarations inexactes d'une manière négligente. Un contrat subséquent peut, resentations, the employment agreement signed by the appellant is irrelevant to this action. In particular, clauses 13 and 14 of the contract are not valid disclaimers of responsibility for the representations made during the interview.

1993 CanLII 146 (SCC)

V. Disposition

For the foregoing reasons, I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal, and restore the judgment of White J., finding the respondent liable and granting the appellant damages in the amount of $67,224. The appellant should have his costs here and in the courts below.

The following are the reasons delivered by

MCLACHLIN J.—I agree with my colleague Iacobucci J. that this appeal should be allowed, although for reasons which are obvious from my reasons in BG Checo International Ltd. v. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 12 (released concurrently), I do not concur in all aspects of his reasons.

The first issue raised by this appeal is the effect of the fact that the parties in this case entered into a contract which contained a specific term governing termination. The Court of Appeal (1990), 74 O.R. (2d) 176 concluded that this precluded the plaintiff's action in tort for negligent misrepresentation as to the employment. Finlayson J.A., for the court, stated (at p. 183):

. . . the respondent Queen stated that he would not have given up his secure position in Calgary for a move to Ottawa that was without permanence, and yet he signed a contract which provided him with no assurances respecting his place of employment or its tenure. To rely on Hedley Byrne, the negligent misrepresentation must have amounted to a warranty of job security and yet the dans les cas appropriés, influer sur une demande fondée sur des déclarations faites avant la passation d'un contrat, comme dans l'arrêt Hedley Byrne, mais le contrat de travail signé par l'appelant n'a rien à voir avec la présente action. En particulier, les clauses 13 et 14 du contrat ne constituent pas des dénégations valides de responsabilité relativement aux déclarations faites pendant l'entrevue.

V. Dispositif

Pour ces motifs, je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi, d'infirmer l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario et de rétablir le jugement par lequel le juge White a conclu à la responsabilité de l'intimée et a accordé à l'appelant des dommages-intérêts au montant de 67 224 $. L'appelant a droit à ses dépens devant toutes les cours.

Version française des motifs rendus par

LE JUGE MCLACHLIN—Je conviens avec mon collègue le juge Iacobucci que le présent pourvoi devrait être accueilli, quoique je ne souscrive pas entièrement à ses motifs, pour des raisons qui sont évidentes à la lecture de mes motifs dans l'arrêt BG Checo International Ltd. c. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, [1993] 1 R.C.S. 12 (rendu en même temps que les présents motifs).

La première question soulevée par le présent pourvoi concerne les conséquences que peut avoir le fait que les parties en l'espèce ont conclu un contrat qui renfermait une condition portant expressément sur la cessation de l'emploi. La Cour d'appel (1990), 74 O.R. (2d) 176, a conclu que cette clause vouait à l'échec l'action en responsabilité délictuelle du demandeur pour déclaration inexacte faite par négligence relativement à l'emploi. Le juge Finlayson de la Cour d'appel a dit (à la p. 183):

[TRADUCTION] . . . l'intimé Queen a déclaré qu'il n'aurait pas renoncé à son poste sûr à Calgary pour occuper à Ottawa un poste qui n'était pas permanent, et pourtant il a signé un contrat qui ne lui fournissait aucune garantie au sujet de son lieu de travail ou de sa permanence. Pour que l'arrêt Hedley Byrne puisse être invoqué, la déclaration inexacte faite par négligence doit équivaloir contract of employment was surely a disclaimer of just that. No representations as to job security, whether based on performance or on job availability, could have survived the one-month termination notice "without cause" contained in the contract. [Emphasis added.]

My colleague, at p. 139, rejects this conclusion on the ground that the contractual duties were different from the common law duty associated with the tort of negligent misrepresentation. The misrepresentation concerned "the nature and existence of the employment opportunity being offered". The contract clauses, by contrast, were concerned with the rights and remedies of the parties relating to termination.

I agree that the pre-contractual representation was different in scope and effect from the contractual obligation. The matter is not merely one of semantics. It turns on the plaintiff's assessment of the risk involved in leaving his employment and joining Cognos. When a person is deciding to enter a contract with terms governing termination, he or she makes an assessment as to the risk of such termination occurring. A stringent term as to termination may not deter the person from entering into the contract if he or she is satisfied that the risk of termination materializing is low. The representation at issue in this case concerned the risk of termination coming about. The representation was not that Cognos would not have the discretion to terminate or transfer the plaintiff on one month's notice. Rather, by implying that the Multiview project was a reality, that it had the financial support of Cognos, and that it had passed through the feasibility and costing stage, Johnston on behalf of Cognos caused the plaintiff to be misled as to the level of the risk to the plaintiff that Cognos might at some point choose to exercise its termination power under the employment contract. The plain-à une garantie de sécurité d'emploi, et pourtant le contrat de travail contenait certainement une dénégation à ce sujet. Aucune déclaration relative à la sécurité d'emploi, qu'elle soit fondée sur le rendement ou sur la disponibilité d'un emploi, n'aurait pu l'emporter sur la disposition concernant le préavis d'un mois de congédiement «sans motif» figurant dans le contrat. [Je souligne.]

Mon collègue, à la p. 139, rejette cette conclusion au motif que les obligations contractuelles différaient de l'obligation de common law associée au délit civil de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence. La déclaration inexacte touchait «la nature et [. . .] l'existence de l'emploi offert». Les clauses du contrat, par contre, portaient sur les droits et les redressements dont pouvaient se prévaloir les parties en cas de cessation d'emploi.

Je partage l'avis que la déclaration faite antérieurement à la passation du contrat différait, de par sa portée et son effet, de l'obligation contractuelle. Ce n'est pas une simple question de sémantique. Ce dont il s'agit en fait c'est l'appréciation par le demandeur du risque qu'il courait en quittant son poste pour se joindre à Cognos. En effet, avant de décider s'il y a lieu de conclure un contrat contenant des conditions régissant la cessation de l'emploi, il faut soupeser le risque d'une telle éventualité. Il se peut qu'une condition sévère relative à la cessation de l'emploi ne dissuade pas la personne de signer le contrat si elle est convaincue qu'elle ne court qu'un faible risque de perdre son emploi. La déclaration en cause en l'espèce concernait le risque de la cessation de l'emploi. On n'a pas déclaré que Cognos ne détiendrait pas le pouvoir discrétionnaire de congédier ou de muter le demandeur sur préavis d'un mois. Ce qui s'est plutôt passé c'est qu'en laissant entendre que le projet Multiview était une réalité, qu'il jouissait de l'appui financier de Cognos et qu'il avait franchi l'étape de l'étude de faisabilité et de l'estimation des coûts, Johnston, pour le compte de Cognos, a induit le demandeur en erreur quant au degré du risque, auquel s'exposait ce dernier, de voir Cognos décider à un moment donné d'exercer le pouvoir de congédiement que lui conférait le contrat de travail. Le demandeur, ajoutant foi aux pro-tiff, believing Johnston, concluded that the risk of being transferred or terminated was low.

To elaborate, a number of situations can be envisaged in which Cognos might have decided to terminate the plaintiff's employment:

(i) his employment not working out in the Multiview project, for reasons that did not amount to just cause for dismissal (e.g., say his work was mediocre, but not incompetent);

(ii) unanticipated serious financial difficulties being encountered by Cognos, such that a decision might be made to lay off staff;

(iii) the situation that actually developed, of Cognos's Corporate Management Team deciding, when the Multiview project reached the end of the feasibility and costing stage, not to make a financial commitment to proceeding with the full development of the Multiview line of products;

(iv) Cognos's Corporate Management Team deciding after a financial commitment had been made to scale back or terminate the development of the Multiview line of products.

The representation excluded the third reason for dismissal, thereby reducing the risk of termination. As found by the trial judge, the plaintiff relied on that representation in deciding to enter into the contract. It turned out to have been negligently made and false. It follows that the plaintiff is entitled to damages for the loss suffered as a result of that representation.

The second issue on the appeal is whether the Court of Appeal was correct in concluding that the trial judge imposed too high a duty of care. Finlayson J.A. correctly stated that the duty on Cognos was "no more than a duty to take care that the representations made were responsible and accurate to the knowledge of Johnston and of his principal, pos de Johnston, a conclu qu'il ne courait qu'un faible risque de mutation ou de congédiement.

Précisons que l'on peut envisager plusieurs situations dans lesquelles Cognos aurait pu décider de mettre fin à l'emploi du demandeur:

(i) celle où il n'aurait pas fait le poids dans le projet Multiview, mais pour des raisons qui ne constituaient pas un motif valable de congédiement (p. ex. s'il faisait un travail médiocre sans toutefois aller jusqu'à l'incompétence);

(ii) celle où Cognos éprouverait de graves difficultés financières imprévues pouvant entraîner la mise à pied d'employés;

(iii) celle qui s'est en fait produite, où l'équipe de gestion d'entreprise de Cognos a décidé, lorsque le projet Multiview est arrivé au terme de l'étude de faisabilité et de l'estimation des coûts, de ne pas engager les fonds nécessaires pour le développement complet de la gamme de produits Multiview;

(iv) celle où l'équipe de gestion d'entreprise de Cognos déciderait, après avoir engagé les fonds, de limiter le développement de la gamme de produits Multiview ou d'y mettre fin.

Or, la déclaration en cause écartait le troisième motif de congédiement et, par le fait même, diminuait le risque de la cessation de l'emploi. Comme l'a conclu le juge de première instance, le demandeur s'est fondé sur cette déclaration pour décider de signer le contrat. Il s'est toutefois trouvé que la déclaration avait été faite par négligence et qu'elle était fausse. D'où il découle que le demandeur a droit aux dommages-intérêts pour la perte qu'il a subie par suite de cette déclaration.

Le pourvoi soulève en second lieu la question de savoir si la Cour d'appel a eu raison de conclure que le juge de première instance avait imposé une obligation de diligence trop lourde. Le juge Finlayson a dit, avec raison, que l'obligation incombant à Cognos consistait [TRADUCTION] «simplement à veiller à ce que les déclarations soient réfléchies et

Cognos" (p. 186). However, he went on to conclude "What [Johnston] said was truthful, he believed in it, that was enough" (p. 188). With respect, the second statement cannot be supported. It is not enough that the defendant believed what he said; he must have been non-negligent in having formed and expressed that belief. At the same time, Finlayson J.A. exaggerated the duty of care which the trial judge applied, in stating the trial judge held that Johnston "had to divulge to all of the applicants that he interviewed the precise status of the corporate commitment to the development of the new product so that they could make their own assessment" (p. 187). In fact, the trial judge held only that the defendant had a duty not to hold out to applicants that the project was secure when it knew that funding was not approved and knew or should have known that the final approval was not a rubber stamp process and the secure funding was not a foregone conclusion. I agree with my colleague that this is the appropriate standard and that the duty of care with respect to representations made in a pre-employment situation is the same as that which applies generally. I also agree with my colleague that the argument that the representations are non-actionable by their nature must be rejected.

I would allow the appeal on the terms proposed by Iacobucci J.

exactes, à la connaissance de M. Johnston et de son commettant, Cognos» (à la p. 186). Il est toutefois arrivé, plus loin, à la conclusion suivante: [TRADUCTION] «Ce qu'il [Johnston] a dit était vrai, il y croyait, et cela suffisait» (à la p. 188). Avec égards, la seconde déclaration est sans fondement. Il ne suffit pas que le défendeur croie à ce qu'il a dit; il faut en outre qu'il ait agi sans négligence en formant et en exprimant cette opinion. Par ailleurs, le juge Finlayson a exagéré l'obligation de diligence retenue par le premier juge, affirmant en effet que, d'après ce dernier, Johnston [TRADUCTION] «devait informer tous les candidats qu'il rencontrait de la situation exacte relativement à l'engagement pris par la société à l'égard du développement du nouveau produit, de façon que ceux-ci puissent évaluer eux-mêmes la viabilité du projet» (à la p. 187). De fait, le juge de première instance a simplement conclu que la défenderesse avait l'obligation de ne pas faire croire aux candidats que le projet était assuré alors qu'elle savait que l'engagement des fonds n'avait pas été approuvé et qu'elle savait, ou aurait dû savoir, que l'approbation définitive n'était pas qu'une formalité et que l'engagement des fonds n'avait rien de certain. Je conviens avec mon collègue que c'est là le critère qu'il convient d'appliquer et que l'obligation de diligence en ce qui concerne les déclarations faites antérieurement à l'embauchage est identique à celle qui s'applique en général. Je suis également d'accord avec mon collègue que doit être rejeté l'argument voulant que les déclarations, de par leur nature, ne peuvent donner lieu à une action en justice.

Je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi selon les modalités que propose le juge Iacobucci.

Responsabilité délictuelle — Régime législatif provincial conférant un droit d'action contre les fabricants et les fournisseurs de tabac — Le gouvernement fédéral a-t-il engagé sa responsabilité à titre de « fabricant » au sens de la Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act, S.B.C. 2000, ch. 30, ou de « fournisseur » au sens de la Business Practices and Consumer Protection Act, S.B.C. 2004, ch. 2, et de la Trade Practice Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, ch. 457?

Le pourvoi porte sur deux actions intentées devant les tribunaux de la Colombie-Britannique. Dans l'Affaire du

2011 SCC 42 (CanLII)

Government of British Columbia is seeking to recover, pursuant to the Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act ("CRA"), the cost of paying for the medical treatment of individuals suffering from tobacco-related illnesses from a group of tobacco companies, including Imperial. British Columbia alleges that by 1950, the tobacco companies knew or ought to have known that cigarettes were harmful to one's health, and that they failed to properly warn the public about the risks associated with smoking their product. In the Knight case, a class action was brought against Imperial alone on behalf of class members who purchased "light" or "mild" cigarettes, seeking a refund of the cost of the cigarettes and punitive damages. The class alleges that the levels of tar and nicotine listed on Imperial's packages for light and mild cigarettes did not reflect the actual deliveries of toxic emissions to smokers, and alleges that the smoke produced by light cigarettes was just as harmful as that produced by regular cigarettes.

In both cases, the tobacco companies issued third-party notices to the Government of Canada, alleging that if the tobacco companies are held liable to the plaintiffs, they are entitled to compensation from Canada for negligent misrepresentation, negligent design and failure to warn, as well as at equity. They also allege that Canada would itself be liable as a "manufacturer" under the CRA or a "supplier" under the Business Practices and Consumer Protection Act and the Trade Practice Act, and that they are entitled to contribution and indemnity from Canada pursuant to the Negligence Act. Canada brought motions to strike the third-party notices, arguing that it was plain and obvious that the third-party claims failed to disclose a reasonable cause of action. In both cases, the chambers judges struck all of the third-party notices. The British Columbia Court of Appeal allowed the tobacco companies' appeals in part. A majority held that the negligent misrepresentation claims arising from Canada's alleged duty of care to the tobacco companies in both the Costs Recovery case and the Knight case should proceed to trial. A majority in the Knight case further held that the negligent misrepresentation claim based on Canada's alleged duty of care to consumers should proceed, as should the negligent design claim. The court unanimously struck the remainder of the tobacco companies' claims.

recouvrement des coûts, le gouvernement de la Colombie-Britannique cherche, aux termes de la Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act (« CRA »), à recouvrer d'un groupe de compagnies de tabac, dont Imperial, les sommes consacrées au traitement médical de personnes souffrant de maladies liées au tabagisme. Selon la Colombie-Britannique, dès 1950, les compagnies de tabac savaient ou auraient dû savoir que les cigarettes étaient néfastes pour la santé et ont fait défaut de mettre le public en garde adéquatement contre les risques associés à l'usage de leur produit. Dans l'affaire Knight, un recours collectif a été intenté contre Imperial seulement, pour demander, au nom des membres qui ont acheté des cigarettes dites « légères » ou « douces », le remboursement du coût des cigarettes ainsi que le versement de dommages-intérêts punitifs. Selon eux, la teneur en goudron et en nicotine indiquée sur les paquets de cigarettes fabriquées par Imperial ne correspondait pas aux émissions toxiques réelles pour les fumeurs. Ils font valoir que la fumée dégagée par les cigarettes légères était tout aussi néfaste que celle dégagée par les cigarettes régulières.

Dans les deux affaires, les compagnies de tabac ont mis en cause le gouvernement du Canada, prétendant que, si elles étaient tenues responsables envers les demandeurs, elles avaient le droit d'être indemnisées par le Canada pour déclarations inexactes faites par négligence, conception négligente et défaut de mise en garde; ainsi qu'en vertu de l'equity. Elles font également valoir que le Canada aurait engagé sa propre responsabilité à titre de « fabricant » au sens de la CRA ou à titre de « fournisseur » au sens de la Business Practices and Consumer Protection Act et de la Trade Practice Act, et qu'elles sont en droit d'obtenir du Canada une contribution et une indemnisation en vertu de la Negligence Act. Le Canada a présenté des requêtes en radiation des avis de mise en cause, faisant valoir qu'il était évident et manifeste que ces avis ne révélaient aucune cause d'action raisonnable. Dans les deux affaires, les juges siégeant en cabinet ont ordonné la radiation de tous les avis de mise en cause. La Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a accueilli en partie les appels interjetés par les compagnies de tabac. Les juges majoritaires ont conclu à l'opportunité d'instruire, dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts et dans l'affaire Knight, les demandes relatives aux déclarations inexactes faites par négligence en violation d'une prétendue obligation de diligence du Canada envers les compagnies de tabac. Dans l'affaire Knight, les juges majoritaires ont conclu en outre à l'opportunité d'instruire la demande relative aux déclarations inexactes faites par négligence fondée sur une prétendue obligation de diligence du Canada envers les consommateurs, ainsi que la demande relative à la conception négligente. La cour a radié à l'unanimité les autres demandes présentées par les compagnies de tabac.

Held: The appeals should be allowed and the claims should be struck out. The tobacco companies' cross-appeals should be dismissed.

On a motion to strike, a claim will only be struck if it is plain and obvious, assuming the facts pleaded to be true, that the pleading discloses no reasonable cause of action. The approach must be generous, and err on the side of permitting a novel but arguable claim to proceed to trial. However, the judge cannot consider what evidence adduced in the future might or might not show. Here, it is plain and obvious that none of the tobacco companies' claims against Canada have a reasonable chance of success.

Canada's Alleged Duties of Care to Smokers in the Costs Recovery Case

In the Costs Recovery case, the private law claims against Canada for contribution and indemnity based on alleged breaches of a duty of care to smokers must be struck. A third party may only be liable for contribution under the Negligence Act if it is directly liable to the plaintiff, in this case, British Columbia. Here, even if Canada breached duties to smokers, this would have no effect on whether it was liable to British Columbia.

The Claims for Negligent Misrepresentation

There are two relationships at issue in these claims: one between Canada and consumers and one between Canada and tobacco companies. In the Knight case, Imperial alleges that Canada negligently represented the health attributes of low-tar cigarettes to consumers. In both the Knight case and the Costs Recovery case, the tobacco companies allege that Canada made negligent misrepresentations to the tobacco companies.

The facts as pleaded do not bring Canada's relationship with consumers and the tobacco companies within a settled category of negligent misrepresentation. Accordingly, to determine whether the alleged causes of action have a reasonable prospect of success, the general requirements for liability in tort must be met. At Arrêt : Les pourvois sont accueillis et les demandes sont radiées. Les pourvois incidents interjetés par les compagnies de tabac sont rejetés.

Dans le cas d'une requête en radiation, une demande ne sera radiée que s'il est évident et manifeste, dans l'hypothèse où les faits allégués seraient avérés, que la déclaration ne révèle aucune cause d'action raisonnable. L'approche doit être généreuse et permettre, dans la mesure du possible, l'instruction de toute demande inédite, mais soutenable. Cependant, le juge ne peut pas anticiper ce que la preuve qui sera produite permettra d'établir. En l'espèce, il est évident et manifeste qu'aucune des allégations des compagnies de tabac visant le Canada n'a une possibilité raisonnable d'être accueillie.

Les prétendues obligations de diligence du Canada envers les fumeurs dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts

Dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, les demandes de contribution et d'indemnisation de droit privé dirigées contre le Canada et fondées sur des manquements allégués à une obligation de diligence envers les fumeurs doivent être radiées. Un tiers ne peut être tenu de verser une contribution en vertu de la Negligence Act que s'il est directement responsable envers le demandeur, en l'occurrence la Colombie-Britannique. En l'espèce, même si le Canada a manqué à ses obligations envers les fumeurs, ce manquement n'aurait aucune incidence sur la question de savoir s'il est responsable envers la Colombie-Britannique.

Les allégations de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence

Les allégations en l'espèce mettent en cause deux liens : celui entre le Canada et les consommateurs, et celui entre le Canada et les compagnies de tabac. Dans l'affaire Knight, Imperial prétend que le Canada a fait preuve de négligence en déclarant faussement aux fumeurs que la cigarette à teneur réduite en goudron serait moins nocive pour la santé. Dans l'affaire Knight et l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, les compagnies de tabac prétendent que le Canada leur a fait des déclarations inexactes par négligence.

Les faits allégués ne font pas entrer la relation du Canada avec les consommateurs et les compagnies de tabac dans une catégorie définie en matière de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence. Par conséquent, afin de déterminer si les causes d'action alléguées ont une possibilité raisonnable d'être accueillies, il faut que the first stage, the question is whether the facts disclose a relationship of proximity in which failure to take reasonable care might foreseeably cause loss or harm to the plaintiff. In a claim of negligent misrepresentation, both of these requirements for a prima facie duty of care are established if there was a "special relationship" between the parties. A special relationship will be established where: (1) the defendant ought reasonably to foresee that the plaintiff will rely on his or her representation; and (2) reliance by the plaintiff would be reasonable in the circumstances of the case. If proximity is established, a prima facie duty of care arises and the analysis proceeds to the second stage, which asks whether there are policy reasons why this prima facie duty of care should not be recognized.

Here, on the facts as pleaded, Canada did not owe a prima facie duty of care to consumers. The relationship between the two was limited to Canada's statements to the general public that low-tar cigarettes are less hazardous. There were no specific interactions between Canada and the class members. Consequently, a finding of proximity in this relationship must arise from the governing statutes. However, the relevant statutes establish only general duties to the public, and no private law duties to consumers. In light of the lack of proximity, this claim in the Knight case should be struck at the first stage of the analysis.

As for the tobacco companies, the facts pleaded allege a history of interactions between Canada and the tobacco companies capable of establishing a special relationship of proximity giving rise to a prima facie duty of care. The allegations are that Canada assumed the role of adviser to a finite number of manufacturers and that there were commercial relationships entered into between Canada and the companies based in part on the advice given to the companies by government officials, going far beyond the sort of statements made by Canada to the public at large. Furthermore, Canada's regulatory powers over the manufacturers coupled with its specific advice and its commercial involvement could be seen as supporting a conclusion that Canada ought reasonably to have foreseen that the tobacco companies would rely on the representations and that such reliance would be reasonable in the pleaded circumstance.

les exigences générales en matière de responsabilité délictuelle soient remplies. À la première étape, il faut se demander si les faits révèlent l'existence d'un lien de proximité dans le cadre duquel l'omission de faire preuve de diligence raisonnable peut, de façon prévisible, causer une perte ou un préjudice au plaignant. Dans le cadre d'une action pour déclaration inexacte faite par négligence, ces deux conditions pour qu'il existe une obligation de diligence prima facie sont remplies lorsqu'un « lien spécial » unit les parties. L'existence d'un lien spécial est établie lorsque : (1) le défendeur doit raisonnablement prévoir que le demandeur se fiera à sa déclaration; et que (2) la confiance que le demandeur accorde à la déclaration serait raisonnable dans les circonstances. Si l'existence d'un lien de proximité est établie, il y a obligation de diligence prima facie et l'analyse passe à l'étape suivante dans laquelle on se demande si des considérations de politique empêcheraient de reconnaître cette obligation de diligence prima facie.

Compte tenu des faits allégués, le Canada n'avait pas d'obligation de ce genre envers les consommateurs. Le lien entre eux se limitait aux déclarations du Canada adressées au grand public selon lesquelles les cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron sont moins dangereuses pour la santé. Le Canada n'entretenait pas de rapports spéciaux avec les membres du groupe. Par conséquent, le constat qu'il s'agit d'un lien suffisamment étroit doit découler des lois applicables. Les lois pertinentes n'établissent toutefois que des obligations générales envers le public, et aucune obligation de nature privée envers les consommateurs. Vu l'absence de lien de proximité, il convient de radier cette allégation dans l'affaire Knight à la première étape de l'analyse.

En ce qui concerne les compagnies de tabac, les faits allégués révèlent que le Canada et les compagnies de tabac entretiennent depuis longtemps des rapports qui peuvent constituer un lien spécial imposant une obligation de diligence prima facie. On allègue que le Canada a joué un rôle de conseiller auprès d'un nombre déterminé de fabricants et a entretenu des rapports commerciaux avec les sociétés en cause compte tenu, en partie, des avis fournis à ces dernières par des fonctionnaires, avis qui vont bien au-delà des déclarations faites par le Canada au grand public. De plus, les pouvoirs de réglementation du Canada envers les fabricants, conjugués aux avis précis qu'il a donnés et à sa participation à des activités commerciales, pourraient être considérés comme étayant la conclusion que le Canada aurait raisonnablement dû prévoir que les compagnies de tabac se fieraient aux déclarations et que cette confiance serait raisonnable dans les circonstances alléguées.

Canada's alleged negligent misrepresentations do not give rise to tort liability, however, because of conflicting policy considerations. The alleged representations constitute protected expressions of government policy. Core government policy decisions protected from suit are decisions as to a course or principle of action that are based on public policy considerations, such as economic, social and political factors, provided they are neither irrational nor taken in bad faith. The representations in this case were part and parcel of a government policy, adopted at the highest level in the Canadian government and developed out of concern for the health of Canadians and the individual and institutional costs associated with tobacco-related disease, to encourage people who continued to smoke to switch to low-tar cigarettes.

Les déclarations inexactes que le Canada aurait faites par négligence n'engagent toutefois pas sa responsabilité délictuelle parce que des considérations de politique générale s'y opposent. Les déclarations qui auraient été faites sont des expressions protégées de politique générale du gouvernement. Les décisions de politique générale fondamentale du gouvernement qui sont soustraites aux poursuites sont les décisions qui se rapportent à une ligne de conduite et reposent sur des considérations d'intérêt public, tels des facteurs économiques, sociaux ou politiques, pourvu qu'elles ne soient ni irrationnelles ni prises de mauvaise foi. Les déclarations en cause faisaient partie intégrante d'une politique générale adoptée par les plus hautes instances du gouvernement canadien et élaborée par souci pour la santé des Canadiens et des Canadiennes et en raison des coûts individuels et institutionnels associés aux maladies causées par le tabac, afin d'inciter les personnes qui continuaient de fumer à opter pour des cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron.

The claims for negligent misrepresentation should also fail because they would expose Canada to indeterminate liability. Recognizing a duty of care for representations to the tobacco companies would effectively amount to a duty to consumers. While the quantum of damages owed by Canada to the companies in both cases would depend on the number of smokers and the number of cigarettes sold, Canada had no control over the number of people who smoked light cigarettes.

Les allégations de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence doivent aussi être rejetées parce qu'elles exposeraient le Canada à une responsabilité indéterminée. Reconnaître une obligation de diligence à l'égard des déclarations faites aux compagnies de tabac reviendrait en fait à reconnaître une obligation envers les consommateurs. Le montant des dommages-intérêts dus par le Canada aux compagnies de tabac dans les deux cas dépendrait du nombre de fumeurs et du nombre de cigarettes vendues, alors que le Canada n'exerçait aucun contrôle sur le nombre de fumeurs de cigarettes légères.

The Claims for Failure to Warn

The tobacco companies make two allegations for failure to warn: (1) that Canada directed the tobacco companies not to provide warnings on cigarette packages about the health hazards of cigarettes and (2) that Canada failed to warn the tobacco companies about the dangers posed by the strains of tobacco it designed and licensed. These two claims should be struck. The crux of the first claim is essentially the same as the negligent misrepresentation claim, and should be rejected for the same policy reasons. The Minister of Health's recommendations on warning labels were integral to the government's policy of encouraging smokers to switch to low-tar cigarettes. As such, they cannot ground a claim in failure to warn. The same is true of the second claim. While the tort of failure to warn requires evidence of a positive duty towards the plaintiff, nothing in the third-party notices suggests that Canada was under such a positive duty here. A plea of negligence, without more, will not suffice to raise a duty to warn. In any event,

Les allégations de défaut de mise en garde

Les compagnies de tabac formulent deux allégations de défaut de mise en garde : (1) le Canada a interdit aux compagnies de tabac d'apposer sur les paquets de cigarettes des mises en garde à l'égard des dangers que présentent les cigarettes pour la santé et (2) le Canada n'a pas avisé les compagnies de tabac des dangers que présentent les souches de tabac conçues par le Canada et pour lesquelles il a octroyé des licences. Il faut radier ces allégations. L'élément crucial de la première allégation est essentiellement le même que celui des allégations de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence, et il y a lieu de la rejeter pour les mêmes considérations de politique générale. Les recommandations du ministre de la Santé sur les mises en garde faisaient partie intégrante de la politique générale du gouvernement visant à inciter les fumeurs à opter pour des cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron. En tant que telles, elles ne peuvent fonder une action pour défaut de mise en garde. Cela vaut aussi pour la deuxième allégation. Bien que le délit such a claim would fail for the policy reasons applicable to the negligent misrepresentation claim.

The Claims for Negligent Design

The tobacco companies have brought two types of negligent design claims against Canada. They submit that Canada breached its duty of care to the tobacco companies when it negligently designed its strains of low-tar tobacco. In the Knight case, Imperial submits that Canada breached its duty of care to consumers of light and mild cigarettes. The two negligent design claims establish a prima facie duty of care. With respect to Canada's design of low-tar tobacco strains, the proximity alleged with the tobacco companies is not based on a statutory duty, but on commercial interactions between Canada and the tobacco companies. In the Knight case also, it is at least arguable that Canada was acting in a commercial capacity towards the consumers of light and mild cigarettes when it designed its strains of tobacco. However, the decision to develop low-tar strains of tobacco on the belief that the resulting cigarettes would be less harmful to health is a decision that constitutes a course or principle of action based on Canada's health policy and based on social and economic factors. As a core government policy decision, it cannot ground a claim for negligent design. These claims should accordingly be struck.

Liability as a "Manufacturer" and a "Supplier"

The tobacco companies' contribution claim in the Costs Recovery case that Canada could qualify as a "manufacturer" under the CRA should be struck. It is plain and obvious that the federal government does not qualify as a manufacturer of tobacco under that Act. When the Act is read in context and all of its provisions are taken into account, it is apparent that the British Columbia legislature did not intend Canada to be liable as a manufacturer. This is confirmed by the text of the statute, the intent of the legislature in adopting the Act, de défaut de mise en garde requière la preuve d'une obligation positive envers le demandeur, les avis de mise en cause ne donnent aucunement matière à croire que le Canada avait une telle obligation en l'espèce. Une allégation de négligence, sans plus, est insuffisante pour imposer une obligation de mise en garde. Quoi qu'il en soit, une allégation de ce genre serait rejetée pour les considérations de politique générale qui s'appliquent aux allégations de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence.

La conception négligente

Les compagnies de tabac ont soulevé à l'encontre du Canada deux types d'allégations de conception négligente. Elles affirment que le Canada a manqué à son obligation de diligence envers elles en concevant de manière négligente ses souches de tabac à faible teneur en goudron. Dans l'affaire Knight, Imperial fait valoir que le Canada a manqué à son obligation de diligence envers les consommateurs de cigarettes légères et douces. Ces deux allégations de conception négligente établissent l'existence d'une obligation de diligence prima facie. Pour ce qui est des souches de tabac à faible teneur en goudron conçues par le Canada, le prétendu lien de proximité avec les compagnies de tabac se fonde non pas sur une obligation prévue par la loi, mais sur les rapports entre le Canada et les compagnies de tabac. Dans l'affaire Knight également, il est au moins possible de soutenir que le Canada agissait comme une entreprise commerciale envers les consommateurs de cigarettes légères et douces lorsqu'il a conçu ses souches de tabac. Cependant, la décision de concevoir des souches de tabac à faible teneur en goudron parce qu'on croit que les cigarettes fabriquées avec ce tabac seraient moins nuisibles pour la santé constitue une ligne de conduite fondée sur la politique générale du Canada en matière de santé et repose sur des facteurs sociaux et économiques. Cette décision de politique générale fondamentale du gouvernement ne saurait fonder une poursuite pour conception négligente. Il faut donc rejeter ces allégations.

Responsabilité d'un « fabricant » et d'un « fournisseur »

Dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, la demande de contribution des compagnies de tabac visant à faire reconnaître au Canada la qualité de « fabricant » au sens de la CRA doit être radiée. Il est manifeste et évident que le gouvernement fédéral n'est pas un fabricant de produits du tabac au sens de cette loi. Lorsqu'on interprète la loi dans son contexte eu égard à l'ensemble de ses dispositions, il appert que la législature de la Colombie-Britannique ne voulait pas imposer au Canada la responsabilité d'un fabricant. C'est ce que and the broader context of the relationship between the province and the federal government. Holding Canada accountable under the CRA would defeat the legislature's intention of transferring the health-care costs resulting from tobacco-related wrongs from taxpayers to the tobacco industry. Similarly, the tobacco companies cannot rely on the recently adopted Health Care Costs Recovery Act in an action for contribution under the CRA. Finally, Canada could not be liable for contribution under the Negligence Act or at common law since it is not directly liable to British Columbia.

confirment le texte de la loi, l'intention qu'avait le législateur au moment de l'adopter et le contexte plus général des rapports entre la province et le gouvernement fédéral. Tenir le Canada responsable en application de la CRA contrecarrerait l'intention de la législature de faire passer des contribuables à l'industrie du tabac la responsabilité des coûts des soins de santé résultant d'une faute du fabricant. Dans le même ordre d'idées, les compagnies de tabac ne peuvent s'appuyer sur la Health Care Costs Recovery Act, récemment édictée, dans le cadre d'une action intentée pour obtenir une contribution en vertu de la CRA. Enfin, le Canada ne peut être tenu à une contribution au titre de la Negligence Act ou en common law parce qu'il n'est pas directement responsable envers la Colombie-Britannique.

Imperial's claim in the Knight case that Canada could qualify as a "supplier" under the Trade Practice Act and the Business Practices and Consumer Protection Act which replaced it should also be struck. Canada's purpose for developing and promoting tobacco as described in the third-party notice suggests that it was not acting "in the course of business" or "in the course of the person's business" as those phrases are used in those statutes. Those phrases must be understood as limited to activities undertaken for a commercial purpose. Here, it is plain and obvious from the facts pleaded that Canada did not promote the use of low-tar cigarettes for a commercial purpose, but for a health purpose. Canada is therefore not a supplier and is not liable under those statutes.

Dans l'affaire Knight, la demande d'Imperial de reconnaître au Canada la qualité de « fournisseur » au sens de la Trade Practice Act et de la loi qui l'a remplacée, la Business Practices and Consumer Protection Act, doit aussi être radiée. Le but recherché par le Canada lorsqu'il a développé et promu le tabac, comme l'indique l'avis de mise en cause, tend à indiquer que le Canada n'agissait pas « dans le cours de ses affaires », dans le sens où cette expression est employée dans ces lois. Cette expression doit être interprétée comme visant seulement les activités exercées à une fin commerciale. Il ressort de façon évidente et manifeste des faits allégués que le Canada a promu la consommation de cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron non pas à une fin commerciale, mais à une fin liée à la santé. Le Canada n'est donc pas un fournisseur et sa responsabilité n'est pas engagée en application de ces lois.

Claims for Equitable Indemnity and Procedural Considerations

The tobacco companies' claims of equitable indemnity should be struck. Equitable indemnity is a narrow doctrine, confined to situations of an express or implied understanding that a principal will indemnify its agent for acting on the directions given. When Canada directed the tobacco industry about how it should conduct itself, it was doing so in its capacity as a government regulator that was concerned about the health of Canadians. Under such circumstances, it is unreasonable to infer that Canada was implicitly promising to indemnify the industry for acting on its request.

Demandes d'indemnité fondées sur l'equity et considérations d'ordre procédural

Les demandes des compagnies de tabac relatives à l'indemnisation en equity doivent être radiées. La doctrine de l'indemnité fondée sur l'equity est une doctrine restreinte qui ne s'applique que dans les cas où le mandant s'engage expressément ou implicitement à indemniser son mandataire pour avoir agi conformément à ses directives. Lorsque le Canada a donné à l'industrie du tabac des directives sur la manière dont elle devrait se comporter, il le faisait à titre d'autorité de réglementation du gouvernement qui se souciait de la santé des Canadiens et des Canadiennes. Dans ces circonstances, il est déraisonnable de déduire que le Canada avait promis implicitement d'indemniser l'industrie pour avoir donné suite à sa demande.

Finally, the claims for declaratory relief should be struck. The tobacco companies' ability to mount defences would not be severely prejudiced if Canada was no longer a third party in the litigation.

Enfin, il convient de radier les demandes de jugement déclaratoire. La capacité des compagnies de tabac de se défendre ne serait pas gravement compromise si la mise en cause du Canada en l'espèce prenait fin.

I. Introduction

[1] Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd. ("Imperial") is a defendant in two cases before the courts in British Columbia, British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., Docket: S010421, and Knight v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., Docket: L031300. In the first case, the Government of British Columbia is seeking to recover the cost of paying for the medical treatment of individuals suffering from tobacco-related illnesses from a group of 14 tobacco companies, including Imperial ("Costs Recovery case"). The second case is a class action brought against Imperial alone by Mr. Knight on behalf of class members who purchased "light" or "mild" cigarettes, seeking a refund of the cost

V. Conclusion 151

I. Introduction

[1] Imperial Tobacco Canada Limitée (« Imperial ») est défenderesse dans deux actions intentées devant les tribunaux de la Colombie-Britannique, soit British Columbia c. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., dossier : S010421, et Knight c. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., dossier : L031300. Dans la première, le gouvernement de la Colombie-Britannique cherche à recouvrer d'un groupe de 14 compagnies de tabac, dont Imperial, les sommes consacrées au traitement médical de personnes souffrant de maladies liées au tabagisme (l'« Affaire du recouvrement des coûts »). Dans la deuxième action, un recours collectif intenté contre Imperial uniquement, M. Knight, au nom of the cigarettes and punitive damages ("Knight case").

[2] In both cases, the tobacco companies issued third-party notices to the Government of Canada, alleging that if the tobacco companies are held liable to the plaintiffs, they are entitled to compensation from Canada for negligent misrepresentation, negligent design, and failure to warn, as well as at equity. They also allege that Canada would itself be liable under the statutory schemes at issue in the two cases. In the Costs Recovery case, it is alleged that Canada would be liable under the Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act, S.B.C. 2000, c. 30 ("CRA"), as a "manufacturer". In the Knight case, it is alleged that Canada would be liable as a "supplier" under the Business Practices and Consumer Protection Act, S.B.C. 2004, c. 2 ("BPCPA"), and its predecessor, the Trade Practice Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 457 ("TPA").

[3] In both cases, Canada brought motions to strike the third party notices under r. 19(24) of the Supreme Court Rules, B.C. Reg. 221/90 (replaced by the Supreme Court Civil Rules, B.C. Reg. 168/2009, r. 9-5), arguing that it was plain and obvious that the third-party claims failed to disclose a reasonable cause of action. In both cases, the chambers judges agreed with Canada, and struck all of the third-party notices. The British Columbia Court of Appeal allowed the tobacco companies' appeals in part. A majority of 3-2 held that the negligent misrepresentation claims arising from Canada's alleged duty of care to the tobacco companies in both the Costs Recovery case and the Knight case should proceed to trial. A majority in the Knight case further held that the negligent misrepresentation claim based on Canada's alleged duty of care to consumers should proceed, as should the negligent design claims in the Knight case. The court unanimously des autres membres qui ont acheté des cigarettes dites « légères » ou « douces », demande le remboursement du coût des cigarettes ainsi que le versement de dommages-intérêts punitifs (l'« Affaire Knight »).

[2] Dans les deux affaires, les compagnies de tabac ont mis en cause le gouvernement du Canada, prétendant que si elles sont tenues responsables envers les demandeurs, elles ont le droit d'être indemnisées par le Canada pour déclarations inexactes faites par négligence, pour conception négligente et défaut de mise en garde; elles fondent aussi leur demande sur l'equity. Elles font également valoir que le Canada aurait engagé sa propre responsabilité au titre des régimes législatifs invoqués dans ces deux affaires. Dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, elles invoquent sa responsabilité, à titre de [TRADUCTION] « fabricant », aux termes de la Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act, S.B.C. 2000, ch. 30 (« CRA »). Dans l'Affaire Knight, c'est à titre de [TRADUCTION] « fournisseur » que le Canada serait responsable, aux termes de la Business Practices and Consumer Protection Act, S.B.C. 2004, ch. 2 (« BPCPA ») et de la loi qui l'a précédée, la Trade Practice Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, ch. 457 (« TPA »).

[3] Dans les deux affaires, le Canada a présenté des requêtes en radiation des avis de mise en cause en vertu du par. 19(24) des Supreme Court Rules, B.C. Reg. 221/90 (remplacé par la règle 9-5 des Supreme Court Civil Rules, B.C. Reg. 168/2009), faisant valoir qu'il était évident et manifeste que ces avis ne révélaient aucune cause d'action raisonnable. Les juges siégeant en cabinet, faisant droit aux requêtes du Canada dans les deux actions, ont ordonné la radiation de tous les avis de mise en cause. La Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a accueilli en partie les appels interjetés par les compagnies de tabac. À trois voix contre deux, les juges majoritaires ont conclu à l'opportunité d'instruire, dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts et dans l'Affaire Knight, les demandes relatives aux déclarations inexactes faites par négligence en violation d'une prétendue obligation de diligence du Canada envers les compagnies de tabac. Dans l'Affaire Knight, les juges majoritaires ont conclu en struck the remainder of the tobacco companies' claims.

[4] The Government of Canada appeals the finding that the claims for negligent misrepresentation and the claim for negligent design should be allowed to go to trial. The tobacco companies cross-appeal the striking of the other claims.

[5] For the reasons that follow, I conclude that all the claims of Imperial and the other tobacco companies brought against the Government of Canada are bound to fail, and should be struck. I would allow the appeals of the Government of Canada in both cases and dismiss the cross-appeals.

II. Underlying Claims and Judicial History

A. The Knight Case

[6] In the Knight case, consumers in British Columbia have brought a class action against Imperial under the BPCPA and its predecessor, the TPA. The class consists of consumers of light or mild cigarettes. It alleges that Imperial engaged in deceptive practices when it promoted low-tar cigarettes as less hazardous to the health of consumers. The class alleges that the levels of tar and nicotine listed on Imperial's packages for light and mild cigarettes did not reflect the actual deliveries of toxic emissions to smokers, and alleges that the smoke produced by light cigarettes was just as harmful as that produced by regular cigarettes. The class seeks reimbursement of the cost of the cigarettes purchased, and punitive damages.

outre à l'opportunité d'instruire la demande relative aux déclarations inexactes faites par négligence fondée sur une prétendue obligation de diligence du Canada envers les consommateurs, ainsi que la demande relative à la conception négligente dans l'Affaire Knight. La cour a radié à l'unanimité les autres demandes présentées par les compagnies de tabac.

[4] Le gouvernement du Canada en appelle de la décision de permettre l'instruction des demandes pour déclarations inexactes faites par négligence et pour conception négligente. Les compagnies de tabac forment un appel incident à l'égard de la radiation des autres demandes.

II. Demandes initiales et historique judiciaire

A. L'Affaire Knight

[6] Dans l'Affaire Knight, un groupe de consommateurs de la Colombie-Britannique, composé de fumeurs de cigarettes légères ou douces, a intenté un recours collectif contre Imperial en vertu de la BPCPA et de la loi qui l'a précédée, la TPA. Ces consommateurs prétendent qu'Imperial s'est livrée à des pratiques trompeuses en présentant les cigarettes à teneur réduite en goudron comme un choix moins nuisible à la santé des consommateurs que les autres cigarettes. Selon eux, la teneur en goudron et en nicotine indiquée sur les paquets de cigarettes légères et douces fabriquées par Imperial ne correspondait pas aux émissions toxiques réelles pour les fumeurs. Ils font valoir que la fumée dégagée par les cigarettes légères était tout aussi néfaste que celle dégagée par les cigarettes régulières. Ils réclament le remboursement du coût d'achat des cigarettes ainsi que des dommages-intérêts punitifs.

[7] Imperial issued a third-party notice against Canada. It alleges that Health Canada advised tobacco companies and the public that low-tar cigarettes were less hazardous than regular cigarettes. Imperial alleges that while Health Canada was initially opposed to the use of health warnings on cigarette packaging, it changed its policy in 1967. It instructed smokers to switch to low-tar cigarettes if they were unwilling to quit smoking altogether, and it asked tobacco companies to voluntarily list the tar and nicotine levels on their advertisements to encourage consumers to purchase low-tar brands. Contrary to expectations, it now appears that low-tar cigarettes are potentially more harmful to smokers.

[8] Imperial also alleges that Agriculture Canada researched, developed, manufactured, and licensed several strains of low-tar tobacco, and collected royalties from the companies, including Imperial, that used these strains. By 1982, Imperial pleads, the tobacco strains developed by Agriculture Canada were "almost the only tobacco varieties available to Canadian tobacco manufacturers" (Knight case, amended third-party notice of Imperial, at para. 97).

[9] Imperial makes five allegations against Canada:

(1) Canada is itself liable under the BPCPA and the TPA as a "supplier" of tobacco products that engaged in deceptive practices, and Imperial is entitled to contribution and indemnity from Canada pursuant to the provisions of the Negligence Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 333.

(2) Canada breached private law duties to consumers by negligently misrepresenting the health attributes of low-tar cigarettes, by failing to warn them against the hazards of low-tar cigarettes, and by failing to design its tobacco

[7] Par voie d'avis, Imperial a mis en cause le gouvernement du Canada. Selon elle, Santé Canada aurait informé les compagnies de tabac et le public que les cigarettes à teneur réduite en goudron étaient moins nuisibles que les cigarettes régulières. Imperial fait valoir que Santé Canada s'était d'abord opposé à l'impression de mises en garde relatives à la santé sur les paquets de cigarettes avant de changer sa politique en 1967. Le ministère invitait les fumeurs ne souhaitant pas cesser de fumer à consommer des cigarettes à teneur réduite en goudron et a demandé aux compagnies de tabac de révéler volontairement les quantités de goudron et de nicotine dans leurs publicités afin d'encourager les consommateurs à acheter des marques à faible teneur en goudron. Contre toute attente, il appert maintenant que ces cigarettes seraient peut-être plus nuisibles à la santé des fumeurs que les autres.

[8] Imperial prétend également qu'Agriculture Canada a protégé par licences plusieurs souches de tabac à teneur réduite en goudron — cultivées par lui après des travaux de recherche et de développement — et a perçu des redevances des compagnies, dont Imperial, qui utilisaient ses souches. Selon Imperial, en 1982, les souches d'Agriculture Canada représentaient [TRADUCTION] « presque les seules variétés dont disposaient les fabricants canadiens de produits du tabac » (l'Affaire Knight, avis de mise en cause modifié d'Imperial, par. 97).

[9] Imperial formule contre le Canada les cinq allégations suivantes :

(1) La responsabilité du Canada lui-même est engagée aux termes de la BPCPA et de la TPA à titre de [TRADUCTION] « fournisseur » de produits du tabac puisqu'il s'est livré à des pratiques trompeuses, et Imperial a le droit, aux termes de la Negligence Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, ch. 333, de réclamer au Canada une contribution et une indemnisation.

(2) Le Canada a manqué à ses obligations de droit privé envers les consommateurs en faisant par négligence des déclarations inexactes au sujet de l'effet, sur la santé, des cigarettes à teneur réduite en goudron, en faisant défaut de les strain with due care. Consequently, Imperial alleges that it is entitled to contribution and indemnity from Canada under the Negligence Act.

(3) Canada breached its private law duties to Imperial by negligently misrepresenting the health attributes of low-tar cigarettes, by failing to warn Imperial about the hazards of low-tar cigarettes, and by failing to design its tobacco strain with due care. Imperial alleges that it is entitled to damages against Canada to the extent of any liability Imperial may have to the class members.

(4) In the alternative, Canada is obliged to indemnify Imperial under the doctrine of equitable indemnity.

(5) If Canada is not liable to Imperial under any of the above claims, Imperial is entitled to declaratory relief against Canada so that it will remain a party to the action and be subject to discovery procedures under the Supreme Court Rules.

[10] Canada brought an application to strike the third-party claims. It was successful before Satanove J. in the Supreme Court of British Columbia (2007 BCSC 964, 76 B.C.L.R. (4th) 100). The chambers judge struck all of the claims against Canada. Imperial was partially successful in the Court of Appeal (2009 BCCA 541, 99 B.C.L.R. (4th) 93). The Court of Appeal unanimously struck the statutory claim, the claim of negligent design between Canada and Imperial, and the equitable indemnity claim. However, the majority, per Tysoe J.A., held that the two negligent misrepresentation claims and the negligent design claim between Canada and consumers should be allowed to proceed. The majority reasons did not address the mettre en garde contre les risques associés à ces produits et en ne faisant pas preuve de diligence raisonnable dans la conception de sa souche de tabac. Par conséquent, Imperial se dit en droit d'obtenir du Canada une contribution et une indemnisation en vertu de la Negligence Act.

(3) Le Canada a manqué à ses obligations de droit privé envers Imperial en faisant par négligence des déclarations inexactes au sujet de l'effet, sur la santé, des cigarettes à teneur réduite en goudron, en faisant défaut de mettre en garde Imperial contre les risques associés à ces produits et en ne faisant pas preuve de diligence raisonnable dans la conception de sa souche de tabac. Imperial se dit en droit de réclamer au Canada des dommages-intérêts dans la mesure de leur responsabilité envers les membres du groupe.

(4) Subsidiairement, le Canada est tenu en equity d'indemniser Imperial.

(5) Si la responsabilité du Canada envers Imperial n'est reconnue à l'égard d'aucune des allégations précédentes, Imperial peut obtenir un jugement déclarant que le Canada reste partie au litige, ce qui le soumettra aux obligations de communication préalable de la preuve prévues aux Supreme Court Rules.

[10] Par requête, le Canada a demandé et obtenu de la juge Satanove de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique la radiation des avis de mise en cause (2007 BCSC 964, 76 B.C.L.R. (4th) 100). La juge siégeant en cabinet a radié toutes les demandes formées contre le Canada. Imperial a eu partiellement gain de cause devant la Cour d'appel (2009 BCCA 541, 99 B.C.L.R. (4th) 93). Les juges de cette cour ont radié à l'unanimité la demande relative aux manquements aux obligations légales, la demande relative à la conception négligente qui oppose Imperial au Canada, ainsi que la demande d'indemnisation en equity. Au nom des juges majoritaires, le juge Tysoe a permis l'instruction des deux demandes concernant les déclarations failure to warn claim. Hall J.A., dissenting, would have struck all the third-party claims.

B. The Costs Recovery Case

[11] The Government of British Columbia has brought a claim under the CRA to recover the expense of treating tobacco-related illnesses caused by "tobacco related wrong[s]". Under the CRA, manufacturers of tobacco products are liable to the province directly. The claim was brought against 14 tobacco companies. British Columbia alleges that by 1950, these tobacco companies knew or ought to have known that cigarettes were harmful to one's health, and that they failed to properly warn the public about the risks associated with smoking their product.

[12] Various defendants in the Costs Recovery case, including Imperial, brought third-party notices against Canada for its alleged role in the tobacco industry. I refer to them collectively as the "tobacco companies". The allegations in this claim are strikingly similar to those in the Knight case. The tobacco companies plead that Health Canada advised them and the public that low-tar cigarettes were less hazardous and instructed smokers that they should quit smoking or purchase low-tar cigarettes. The tobacco companies allege that Canada was initially opposed to the use of warning labels on cigarette packaging, but ultimately instructed the industry that warning labels should be used and what they should say. The tobacco companies also plead that Agriculture Canada researched, developed, manufactured and licensed the strains of low-tar tobacco which they used for their cigarettes in exchange for royalties.

inexactes faites par négligence et de celle portant sur la conception négligente opposant le Canada et les consommateurs. Les juges majoritaires n'ont pas traité de la demande relative au défaut de mise en garde. Le juge Hall, dissident, aurait radié toutes les demandes de mise en cause.

B. L'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts

[12] Divers défendeurs dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, dont Imperial, ont mis en cause le Canada pour le rôle qu'il aurait joué dans l'industrie du tabac. Je les désigne collectivement comme les « compagnies de tabac ». Les allégations contenues dans l'avis présentent une similitude frappante avec celles formulées dans l'Affaire Knight. Les compagnies de tabac font valoir que Santé Canada les aurait informées, ainsi que le public, de l'effet moins nuisible des cigarettes à teneur réduite en goudron par rapport aux cigarettes régulières et aurait conseillé aux fumeurs d'abandonner le tabagisme ou d'acheter des cigarettes à teneur réduite en goudron. Les compagnies de tabac prétendent que, bien qu'initialement opposé à l'impression de mises en garde sur les paquets de cigarettes, le Canada a fini par l'exiger et a déterminé les renseignements qui devaient y figurer. Les compagnies de tabac plaident également qu'Agriculture Canada avait protégé par licences les souches de tabac à teneur réduite en goudron — cultivées par lui après des travaux de recherche et de développement — que les compagnies utilisaient dans la fabrication des cigarettes en échange du paiement de redevances.

[13] The tobacco companies brought the following claims against Canada:

(1) Canada is itself liable under the CRA as a "manufacturer" of tobacco products, and the tobacco companies are entitled to contribution and indemnity from Canada pursuant to the Negligence Act.

(2) Canada breached private law duties to consumers for failure to warn, negligent design, and negligent misrepresentation, and the tobacco companies are entitled to contribution and indemnity from Canada to the extent of any liability they may have to British Columbia under the CRA.

(3) Canada breached its private law duties owed to the tobacco companies for failure to warn and negligent design, and negligently misrepresented the attributes of low-tar cigarettes. The tobacco companies allege that they are entitled to damages against Canada to the extent of any liability they may have to British Columbia under the CRA.

(4) In the alternative, Canada is obliged to indemnify the tobacco companies under the doctrine of equitable indemnity.

(5) If Canada is not liable to the tobacco companies under any of the above claims, they are entitled to declaratory relief.

[14] Canada was successful before the chambers judge, Wedge J., who struck all of the claims (2008 BCSC 419, 82 B.C.L.R. (4th) 362). In the Court of Appeal, the majority, per Tysoe J.A., allowed the negligent misrepresentation claim between Canada and the tobacco companies to proceed (2009 BCCA 540, 98 B.C.L.R. (4th) 201). Hall J.A.,

[13] Les compagnies de tabac ont formulé contre le Canada les allégations suivantes :

(1) La responsabilité du Canada lui-même est engagée aux termes de la CRA à titre de [TRADUCTION] « fabricant » de produits du tabac, et les compagnies de tabac ont le droit, en vertu de la Negligence Act, de réclamer au Canada une contribution et une indemnisation.

(2) Le Canada a manqué à ses obligations de droit privé envers les consommateurs en raison du défaut de mise en garde, de la conception négligente et de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence. De plus, les compagnies de tabac sont en droit de réclamer du Canada contribution et indemnisation dans la mesure de leur responsabilité envers la Colombie-Britannique suivant la CRA.

(3) Le Canada a manqué à ses obligations de droit privé envers les compagnies de tabac en raison du défaut de mise en garde, de la conception négligente et de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence au sujet de l'effet, sur la santé, des cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron. Les compagnies de tabac se disent en droit de réclamer au Canada des dommages-intérêts dans la mesure de leur responsabilité envers la Colombie-Britannique au titre de la CRA.

(4) Subsidiairement, le Canada est tenu d'indemniser en equity les compagnies de tabac.

dissenting, would have struck all the third-party claims.

III. Issues Before the Court

[15] There is significant overlap between the issues on appeal in the Costs Recovery case and the Knight case, particularly in relation to the common law claims. Both cases discuss whether Canada could be liable at common law in negligent misrepresentation, negligent design and failure to warn, and in equitable indemnity. To reduce duplication, I treat the issues common to both cases together.

[16] There are also issues and arguments that are distinct in the two cases. Uniquely in the Costs Recovery case, Canada argues that all the contribution claims based on the Negligence Act and Canada's alleged duties of care to smokers should be struck because even if these alleged duties were breached, Canada would not be liable to the sole plaintiff British Columbia. The statutory claims are also distinct in the two cases. The issues may therefore be stated as follows:

1. What is the test for striking out claims for failure to disclose a reasonable cause of action?

2. Should the claims for contribution and indemnity based on the Negligence Act and alleged breaches of duties of care to smokers be struck in the Costs Recovery case?

3. Should the tobacco companies' negligent misrepresentation claims be struck out?

de tabac au Canada (2009 BCCA 540, 98 B.C.L.R. (4th) 201). Le juge Hall, dissident, aurait radié toutes les demandes de mise en cause.

III. Questions en litige

[15] Les questions à trancher dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts et dans l'Affaire Knight se chevauchent considérablement, tout particulièrement quant aux demandes fondées sur la common law. Dans les deux cas, il s'agit de savoir si le Canada pourrait être tenu responsable, d'une part en common law, pour déclarations inexactes faites par négligence, conception négligente et défaut de mise en garde et, d'autre part, suivant la doctrine de l'indemnisation en equity. Par souci d'éviter les répétitions, j'examinerai ensemble les questions communes.

[16] Par ailleurs, les deux affaires présentent également des questions et des arguments distincts. Ainsi, dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, le Canada fait valoir que les demandes de contribution fondées sur la Negligence Act et sur l'obligation de diligence qu'on lui impute à l'égard des fumeurs devraient être radiées, car, même s'il avait manqué à une telle obligation, il ne pourrait être tenu responsable envers la demanderesse, la Colombie-Britannique. Les demandes fondées sur les lois sont elles aussi distinctes. Par conséquent, les questions en litige peuvent être formulées comme suit :

1. Quel est le critère applicable à la radiation d'une demande pour absence de cause d'action raisonnable?

2. Les demandes de contribution et d'indemnisation fondées sur la Negligence Act et sur les manquements allégués à l'obligation de diligence envers les fumeurs doivent-elles être radiées dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts?

3. Les demandes des compagnies de tabac relatives aux déclarations inexactes faites par négligence doivent-elles être radiées?

2011 SCC 42 (CanLII)

4. Should the tobacco companies' claims of failure to warn be struck out?

5. Should the tobacco companies' claims of negligent design be struck out?

6. Should the tobacco companies' claim in the Costs Recovery case that Canada could qualify as a "manufacturer" under the CRA be struck out?

7. Should Imperial's claim in the Knight case that Canada could qualify as a "supplier" under the TPA and the BPCPA be struck out?

8. Should the tobacco companies' claims of equitable indemnity be struck out?

9. If Canada is not liable to the tobacco companies under any of the third-party claims, are the tobacco companies nonetheless entitled to declaratory relief against Canada so that it will remain a party to both actions and be subject to discovery procedures under the Supreme Court Rules?

IV. Analysis

A. The Test for Striking Out Claims

[17] The parties agree on the test applicable on a motion to strike for not disclosing a reasonable cause of action under r. 19(24)(a) of the B.C. Supreme Court Rules. This Court has reiterated the test on many occasions. A claim will only be struck if it is plain and obvious, assuming the facts pleaded to be true, that the pleading discloses no reasonable cause of action: Odhavji Estate v. Woodhouse, 2003 SCC 69, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 263, at para. 15; Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959, at p. 980. Another way of putting the test is that the claim has no reasonable prospect of

4. Les demandes des compagnies de tabac relatives au défaut de mise en garde doivent-elles être radiées?

5. Les demandes des compagnies de tabac relatives à la conception négligente doivent-elles être radiées?

6. Dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, la demande des compagnies de tabac de reconnaître au Canada la qualité de [TRADUCTION] « fabricant » au sens de la CRA doit-elle être radiée?

7. Dans l'Affaire Knight, la demande d'Imperial de reconnaître au Canada la qualité de [TRADUCTION] « fournisseur » au sens de la TPA et de la BPCPA doit-elle être radiée?

8. Les demandes des compagnies de tabac relatives à l'indemnisation en equity doivent-elles être radiées?

9. Si la responsabilité du Canada envers les compagnies de tabac n'est retenue à l'égard d'aucune des demandes de mise en cause, les compagnies de tabac ont-elles quand même le droit d'obtenir contre lui un jugement le déclarant partie aux deux litiges, ce qui le soumettra aux obligations de communication préalable de la preuve prévues aux Supreme Court Rules?

IV. Analyse

A. Le critère applicable à la radiation d'une demande

[17] Les parties conviennent du critère applicable à la radiation d'une demande pour absence de cause d'action raisonnable en vertu de l'al. 19(24)a) des Supreme Court Rules de la Colombie-Britannique. La Cour a réitéré ce critère à maintes reprises : l'action ne sera rejetée que s'il est évident et manifeste, dans l'hypothèse où les faits allégués seraient avérés, que la déclaration ne révèle aucune cause d'action raisonnable : Succession Odhavji c. Woodhouse, 2003 CSC 69, [2003] 3 R.C.S. 263, par. 15; Hunt c. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 R.C.S. 959, p. 980. Autrement dit, la demande doit n'avoir success. Where a reasonable prospect of success exists, the matter should be allowed to proceed to trial: see, generally, Syl Apps Secure Treatment Centre v. B.D., 2007 SCC 38, [2007] 3 S.C.R. 83; Odhavji Estate; Hunt; Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735.

[18] Although all agree on the test, the arguments before us revealed different conceptions about how it should be applied. It may therefore be useful to review the purpose of the test and its application.

[19] The power to strike out claims that have no reasonable prospect of success is a valuable housekeeping measure essential to effective and fair litigation. It unclutters the proceedings, weeding out the hopeless claims and ensuring that those that have some chance of success go on to trial.

[20] This promotes two goods — efficiency in the conduct of the litigation and correct results. Striking out claims that have no reasonable prospect of success promotes litigation efficiency, reducing time and cost. The litigants can focus on serious claims, without devoting days and sometimes weeks of evidence and argument to claims that are in any event hopeless. The same applies to judges and juries, whose attention is focused where it should be — on claims that have a reasonable chance of success. The efficiency gained by weeding out unmeritorious claims in turn contributes to better justice. The more the evidence and arguments are trained on the real issues, the more likely it is that the trial process will successfully come to grips with the parties' respective positions on those issues and the merits of the case.

[21] Valuable as it is, the motion to strike is a tool that must be used with care. The law is not static and unchanging. Actions that yesterday were deemed hopeless may tomorrow succeed. Before Donoghue v. Stevenson, [1932] A.C. 562 (H.L.) introduced a general duty of care to one's neighbour premised aucune possibilité raisonnable d'être accueillie. Sinon, il faut lui laisser suivre son cours : voir généralement Syl Apps Secure Treatment Centre c. B.D., 2007 CSC 38, [2007] 3 R.C.S. 83; Succession Odhavji; Hunt; Procureur général du Canada c. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 R.C.S. 735.

[18] Bien que les parties acceptent d'emblée ce critère, il ressort des arguments qui nous ont été présentés que toutes ne voient pas du même œil son application aux faits. Il peut donc se révéler utile de revoir l'objet du critère et son application.

[19] Le pouvoir de radier les demandes ne présentant aucune possibilité raisonnable de succès constitue une importante mesure de gouverne judiciaire essentielle à l'efficacité et à l'équité des procès. Il permet d'élaguer les litiges en écartant les demandes vaines et en assurant l'instruction des demandes susceptibles d'être accueillies.

[20] Ce faisant, il favorise deux conséquences positives, soit l'instruction efficace des litiges et le bien-fondé des décisions sur ces demandes. La radiation des demandes n'ayant aucune possibilité raisonnable de succès favorise l'efficacité et fait épargner temps et argent. Les plaideurs peuvent se concentrer sur les demandes importantes et n'ont pas à consacrer des jours — parfois même des semaines — à la preuve et aux arguments de demandes vouées de toute façon à l'échec. Il en va de même pour les juges et les jurés, dont l'attention est portée là où il le faut, soit sur les demandes présentant une possibilité raisonnable de succès. Les gains d'efficacité découlant de cet élagage contribuent à leur tour à l'amélioration de l'administration de la justice. Plus la preuve et les arguments sont axés sur les vraies questions, mieux les thèses des parties à l'égard de ces questions et le bien-fondé de l'affaire se dégageront de l'instruction du procès.

[21] Quoique très utile, la requête en radiation ne saurait être accueillie à la légère. Le droit n'est pas immuable. Des actions qui semblaient hier encore vouées à l'échec pourraient être accueillies demain. Avant qu'une obligation générale de diligence envers son prochain reposant sur la prévisibilité on foreseeability, few would have predicted that, absent a contractual relationship, a bottling company could be held liable for physical injury and emotional trauma resulting from a snail in a bottle of ginger beer. Before Hedley Byrne & Co. v. Heller & Partners, Ltd., [1963] 2 All E.R. 575 (H.L.), a tort action for negligent misstatement would have been regarded as incapable of success. The history of our law reveals that often new developments in the law first surface on motions to strike or similar preliminary motions, like the one at issue in Donoghue v. Stevenson. Therefore, on a motion to strike, it is not determinative that the law has not yet recognized the particular claim. The court must rather ask whether, assuming the facts pleaded are true, there is a reasonable prospect that the claim will succeed. The approach must be generous and err on the side of permitting a novel but arguable claim to proceed to trial.

soit reconnue dans l'arrêt Donoghue c. Stevenson, [1932] A.C. 562 (H.L.), peu de gens auraient pu prévoir qu'une entreprise d'embouteillage puisse être tenue responsable, en l'absence de tout lien contractuel, du préjudice corporel et du traumatisme émotionnel causé par la découverte d'un escargot dans une bouteille de bière de gingembre. Avant l'arrêt Hedley Byrne & Co. c. Heller & Partners, Ltd., [1963] 2 All E.R. 575 (H.L.), l'action en responsabilité délictuelle pour déclarations inexactes faites par négligence aurait paru vouée à l'échec. L'histoire de notre droit nous apprend que souvent, des requêtes en radiation ou des requêtes préliminaires semblables, à l'instar de celle présentée dans Donoghue c. Stevenson, amorcent une évolution du droit. Par conséquent, le fait qu'une action en particulier n'a pas encore été reconnue en droit n'est pas déterminant pour la requête en radiation. Le tribunal doit plutôt se demander si, dans l'hypothèse où les faits allégués seraient avérés, il est raisonnablement possible que l'action soit accueillie. L'approche doit être généreuse et permettre, dans la mesure du possible, l'instruction de toute demande inédite, mais soutenable.

[22] A motion to strike for failure to disclose a reasonable cause of action proceeds on the basis that the facts pleaded are true, unless they are manifestly incapable of being proven: Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441, at p. 455. No evidence is admissible on such a motion: r. 19(27) of the Supreme Court Rules (now r. 9-5(2) of the Supreme Court Civil Rules). It is incumbent on the claimant to clearly plead the facts upon which it relies in making its claim. A claimant is not entitled to rely on the possibility that new facts may turn up as the case progresses. The claimant may not be in a position to prove the facts pleaded at the time of the motion. It may only hope to be able to prove them. But plead them it must. The facts pleaded are the firm basis upon which the possibility of success of the claim must be evaluated. If they are not pleaded, the exercise cannot be properly conducted.

[22] Une requête en radiation pour absence de cause d'action raisonnable repose sur le principe que les faits allégués sont vrais, sauf s'ils ne peuvent manifestement pas être prouvés : Operation Dismantle Inc. c. La Reine, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 441, p. 455. Aucune preuve n'est admissible à l'égard d'une telle requête : par. 19(27) des Supreme Court Rules de la Colombie-Britannique (maintenant le par. 9-5(2) des Supreme Court Civil Rules). Il incombe au demandeur de plaider clairement les faits sur lesquels il fonde sa demande. Un demandeur ne peut compter sur la possibilité que de nouveaux faits apparaissent au fur et à mesure que l'instruction progresse. Il peut arriver que le demandeur ne soit pas en mesure de prouver les faits plaidés au moment de la requête. Il peut seulement espérer qu'il sera en mesure de les prouver. Il doit cependant les plaider. Les faits allégués sont le fondement solide en fonction duquel doit être évaluée la possibilité que la demande soit accueillie. S'ils ne sont pas allégués, l'exercice ne peut pas être exécuté adéquatement.

[23] Before us, Imperial and the other tobacco companies argued that the motion to strike should take into account, not only the facts pleaded, but the possibility that as the case progressed, the evidence would reveal more about Canada's conduct and role in promoting the use of low-tar cigarettes. This fundamentally misunderstands what a motion to strike is about. It is not about evidence, but the pleadings. The facts pleaded are taken as true. Whether the evidence substantiates the pleaded facts, now or at some future date, is irrelevant to the motion to strike. The judge on the motion to strike cannot consider what evidence adduced in the future might or might not show. To require the judge to do so would be to gut the motion to strike of its logic and ultimately render it useless.

[23] Dans notre Cour, Imperial et les autres compagnies de tabac ont prétendu que la requête en radiation devrait prendre en compte non seulement les faits plaidés, mais la possibilité que, au fur et à mesure que l'instruction progresse, la preuve en révélerait davantage quant au comportement du Canada et au rôle qu'il a joué dans la promotion de la consommation de cigarettes à teneur réduite en goudron. Cette position dénote une compréhension fondamentalement erronée de ce que vise une requête en radiation. Elle n'a rien à voir avec la preuve. Elle porte sur les actes de procédure. Les faits allégués sont réputés véridiques. La question de savoir si la preuve corrobore ou corroborera les faits allégués n'a aucune pertinence quant à la requête en radiation. Le juge saisi de la requête en radiation ne peut pas anticiper ce que la preuve qui sera produite permettra d'établir. Si l'on exigeait cela du juge, la requête en radiation perdrait sa logique et deviendrait en fin de compte inutile.

[24] This is not unfair to the claimant. The presumption that the facts pleaded are true operates in the claimant's favour. The claimant chooses what facts to plead, with a view to the cause of action it is asserting. If new developments raise new possibilities — as they sometimes do — the remedy is to amend the pleadings to plead new facts at that time.

[24] Cela n'a rien d'inéquitable pour le demandeur. La présomption selon laquelle les faits allégués sont vrais joue en sa faveur. Le demandeur choisit les faits qu'il allègue en fonction de la cause d'action qu'il fait valoir. Si des faits nouveaux soulèvent de nouvelles possibilités — comme c'est parfois le cas —, la solution consiste à modifier les actes de procédure afin d'alléguer les faits nouveaux à ce moment-là.

[25] Related to the issue of whether the motion should be refused because of the possibility of unknown evidence appearing at a future date is the issue of speculation. The judge on a motion to strike asks if the claim has any reasonable prospect of success. In the world of abstract speculation, there is a mathematical chance that any number of things might happen. That is not what the test on a motion to strike seeks to determine. Rather, it operates on the assumption that the claim will proceed through the court system in the usual way — in an adversarial system where judges are under a duty to apply the law as set out in (and as it may develop from) statutes and precedent. The question is whether, considered in the context of the [25] La question de la conjecture est liée à la question de savoir si la requête devrait être rejetée en raison de la possibilité qu'une nouvelle preuve apparaisse éventuellement. Le juge saisi d'une requête en radiation se demande s'il existe une possibilité raisonnable que la demande soit accueillie. Dans le monde de la conjecture abstraite, il existe une probabilité mathématique qu'un certain nombre d'événements se produisent. Ce n'est pas ce que le critère applicable aux requêtes en radiation cherche à déterminer. Il suppose plutôt que la demande sera traitée de la manière habituelle dans le système judiciaire — un système fondé sur le débat contradictoire dans lequel les juges sont tenus d'appliquer le droit (et son évolution) énoncé dans les law and the litigation process, the claim has no reasonable chance of succeeding.

[26] With this framework in mind, I proceed to consider the tobacco companies' claims.

B. Canada's Alleged Duties of Care to Smokers in the Costs Recovery Case

[27] In the Costs Recovery case, Canada argues that all the claims for contribution based on its alleged duties of care to smokers must be struck. Under the Negligence Act, Canada submits, contribution may only be awarded if the third party would be liable to the plaintiff directly. It argues that even if Canada breached duties to smokers, such breaches cannot ground the tobacco companies' claims for contribution if they are found liable to British Columbia, the sole plaintiff in the Costs Recovery case. This argument was successful in the Court of Appeal.

[28] The tobacco companies argue that direct liability to the plaintiff is not a requirement for being held liable in contribution. They argue that contribution in the Negligence Act turns on fault, not liability. The object of the Negligence Act is to allow defendants to recover from other parties that were also at fault for the damage that resulted to the plaintiff, and barring a claim against Canada would defeat this purpose, they argue.

[29] I agree with Canada and the Court of Appeal that a third party may only be liable for contribution under the Negligence Act if it is directly liable to the plaintiff. In Giffels Associates Ltd. v. Eastern Construction Co., [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1346, dealing lois et la jurisprudence. Il s'agit de savoir si, dans le contexte du droit et du processus judiciaire, la demande n'a aucune possibilité raisonnable d'être accueillie.

[26] C'est en tenant compte de ce cadre que j'entame l'examen des demandes des compagnies de tabac.

B. Les prétendues obligations de diligence du Canada envers les fumeurs dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts

[27] Dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, le Canada plaide que toutes les demandes de contribution fondées sur ses prétendues obligations de diligence envers les fumeurs doivent être radiées. Le Canada prétend que, aux termes de la Negligence Act, une contribution ne peut être accordée si le tiers n'est pas directement responsable envers le plaignant. Il prétend que même s'il a manqué à ses obligations envers les fumeurs, ce manquement ne peut pas servir de fondement aux demandes de contribution des compagnies de tabac si elles sont tenues responsables envers la Colombie-Britannique, l'unique demanderesse dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts. La Cour d'appel a accepté cet argument.

[28] Les compagnies de tabac prétendent qu'il n'est pas nécessaire qu'une personne soit directement responsable envers le demandeur pour être tenue de verser une contribution. Elles prétendent que la contribution dont parle la Negligence Act repose sur la faute et non pas sur la responsabilité. Elles affirment que la Negligence Act vise à permettre aux défendeurs d'être indemnisés par d'autres parties qui sont également responsables du dommage causé au plaignant, et qu'interdire un droit d'action contre le Canada ferait échec à cet objectif.

[29] Je souscris à l'opinion du Canada et de la Cour d'appel selon laquelle un tiers ne peut être tenu de verser une contribution en vertu de la Negligence Act que s'il est directement responsable envers le plaignant. Dans l'arrêt Giffels Associates with a statutory provision similar to that in British Columbia, Laskin C.J. stated:

> . . . I am of the view that it is a precondition of the right to resort to contribution that there be liability to the plaintiff. I am unable to appreciate how a claim for contribution can be made under s. 2(1) by one person against another in respect of loss resulting to a third person unless each of the former two came under a liability to the third person to answer for his loss. [Emphasis added; p. 1354.]

[30] Accordingly, it is plain and obvious that the private law claims against Canada in the Costs Recovery case that arise from an alleged duty of care to consumers must be struck. Even if Canada breached duties to smokers, this would have no effect on whether it was liable to British Columbia, the plaintiff in that case. This holding has no bearing on the consumer claim in the Knight case since consumers of light or mild cigarettes are the plaintiffs in the underlying action.

[31] The discussion of the private law claims in the remainder of these reasons will refer exclusively to the claims based on Canada's alleged duties of care to the tobacco companies in both cases before the Court, and Canada's alleged duties to consumers in the Knight case.

C. The Claims for Negligent Misrepresentation

[32] There are two types of negligent misrepresentation claims that remain at issue on this appeal. First, in the Knight case, Imperial alleges that Canada negligently misrepresented the health attributes of low-tar cigarettes to consumers, and is therefore liable for contribution and indemnity on the basis of the Negligence Act if the class members

Ltd. c. Eastern Construction Co., [1978] 2 R.C.S. 1346, où il était question d'une disposition législative semblable à celle de la Colombie-Britannique, le juge en chef Laskin a déclaré ce qui suit :

> . . . j'estime qu'il faut d'abord établir la responsabilité envers la demanderesse pour pouvoir réclamer la contribution. Je ne vois pas comment une personne pourrait, en vertu du par. 2(1), réclamer à une autre personne une contribution relativement à la perte subie par un tiers sans que chacune des deux premières personnes soit responsable envers le tiers de la perte qu'il a subie. [Je souligne; p. 1354.]

C. Les demandes fondées sur des déclarations inexactes faites par négligence

[32] Deux types de demandes fondées sur des déclarations inexactes faites par négligence sont toujours en litige dans le présent appel. Premièrement, dans l'Affaire Knight, Imperial prétend que le Canada a fait preuve de négligence en déclarant faussement aux consommateurs que la cigarette à teneur réduite en goudron serait are successful in this suit. Second, in both cases before the Court, Imperial and the other tobacco companies allege that Canada made negligent misrepresentations to the tobacco companies, and that Canada is liable for any losses that the tobacco companies incur to the plaintiffs in either case.

[33] Canada applies to have the claims struck on the ground that they have no reasonable prospect of success.

[34] For the purposes of the motion to strike, we must accept as true the facts pleaded. We must therefore accept that Canada represented to consumers and to tobacco companies that light or mild cigarettes were less harmful, and that these representations were not accurate. We must also accept that consumers and the tobacco companies relied on Canada's representations and acted on them to their detriment.

[35] The law first recognized a tort action for negligent misrepresentation in Hedley Byrne. Prior to this, parties were confined to contractual remedies for misrepresentations. Hedley Byrne represented a break with this tradition, allowing a claim for economic loss in tort for misrepresentations made in the absence of a contract between the parties. In the decades that have followed, liability for negligent misrepresentation has been imposed in a variety of situations where the relationship between the parties disclosed sufficient proximity and foreseeability, and policy considerations did not negate liability.

[36] Imperial and the other tobacco companies argue that the facts pleaded against Canada bring their claims within the settled parameters of the moins nocive pour la santé, et qu'il est donc tenu à contribution et à indemnisation sur la base de la Negligence Act si les membres du groupe ont gain de cause dans cette poursuite. Deuxièmement, dans les deux affaires dont la Cour est saisie, Imperial et les autres compagnies de tabac prétendent que le Canada a fait aux compagnies de tabac des déclarations inexactes par négligence et qu'il est responsable des pertes que pourraient subir les compagnies de tabac en raison des indemnités à verser aux plaignants dans l'une ou l'autre de ces affaires.

[33] Le Canada demande la radiation des demandes parce qu'il n'existe aucune possibilité raisonnable qu'elles soient accueillies.

[34] Pour les besoins de la requête en radiation, nous devons tenir pour avérés les faits allégués. Nous devons donc accepter que le Canada a déclaré aux consommateurs et aux compagnies de tabac que les cigarettes légères ou douces étaient moins nocives et que ces déclarations n'étaient pas exactes. Nous devons également accepter que les consommateurs et les compagnies de tabac ont agi à leur détriment sur la foi des déclarations inexactes du Canada.

[35] Le droit a reconnu pour la première fois l'action en responsabilité délictuelle par suite d'une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence dans Hedley Byrne. Avant cette décision, les parties ne disposaient que de recours contractuels en matière de déclarations inexactes. La décision Hedley Byrne a rompu avec cette tradition en accueillant une action pour perte financière par suite d'une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence en l'absence d'un contrat entre les parties. Dans les décennies qui ont suivi, la responsabilité délictuelle pour déclaration inexacte faite par négligence a été retenue dans diverses situations où la relation entre les parties révélait une prévisibilité et l'existence d'un lien suffisamment étroit et où les considérations de politique générale n'empêchaient pas la reconnaissance de la responsabilité délictuelle.

[36] Imperial et les autres compagnies de tabac prétendent que, vu les faits allégués contre le Canada, les paramètres définis du délit de tort of negligent misrepresentation, and therefore a prima facie duty of care is established. The majority in the Court of Appeal accepted this argument in both decisions below (Knight case, at paras. 45 and 66; Costs Recovery case, at para. 70).

[37] The first question is whether the facts as pleaded bring Canada's relationships with consumers and the tobacco companies within a settled category that gives rise to a duty of care. If they do, a prima facie duty of care will be established: see Childs v. Desormeaux, 2006 SCC 18, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 643, at para. 15. However, it is important to note that liability for negligent misrepresentation depends on the nature of the relationship between the plaintiff and defendant, as discussed more fully below. The question is not whether negligent misrepresentation is a recognized tort, but whether there is a reasonable prospect that the relationship alleged in the pleadings will give rise to liability for negligent misrepresentation.

[38] In my view, the facts pleaded do not bring either claim within a settled category of negligent misrepresentation. The law of negligent misrepresentation has thus far not recognized liability in the kinds of relationships at issue in these cases. The error of the tobacco companies lies in assuming that the relationships disclosed by the pleadings between Canada and the tobacco companies on the one hand and between Canada and consumers on the other are like other relationships that have been held to give rise to liability for negligent misrepresentation. In fact, they differ in important ways. It is sufficient at this point to note that the tobacco companies have not been able to point to any case where a government has been held liable in negligent misrepresentation for statements made to an industry. To determine whether such a cause of action has a reasonable prospect of success, we must therefore consider whether the general requirements for liability in tort are met, on the test déclaration inexacte faite par négligence correspondent à leurs demandes et, par conséquent, l'existence d'une obligation de diligence prima facie est établie. Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont retenu cet argument dans les deux décisions en cause (l'Affaire Knight, par. 45 et 66; l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, par. 70).

[38] À mon avis, les faits allégués ne font entrer aucune des demandes à l'intérieur d'une catégorie définie de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence. Le droit en matière de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence n'a jusqu'à présent pas reconnu la responsabilité dans les types de relations en cause dans ces affaires. Les compagnies de tabac ont fait l'erreur de supposer que les relations, révélées par les actes de procédure, entre le Canada et les compagnies de tabac, d'une part, et entre le Canada et les consommateurs, d'autre part, sont semblables aux autres relations à l'égard desquelles la responsabilité délictuelle pour déclaration inexacte faite par négligence a été retenue. En fait, elles comportent des différences importantes. Il suffit à ce stade de signaler que les compagnies de tabac ont été incapables de citer une décision dans laquelle un gouvernement a été tenu responsable d'une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence relativement à des déclarations faites à une industrie.

set out by the House of Lords in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council, [1978] A.C. 728, and somewhat reformulated but consistently applied by this Court, most notably in Cooper v. Hobart, 2001 SCC 79, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 537.

[39] At the first stage of this test, the question is whether the facts disclose a relationship of proximity in which failure to take reasonable care might foreseeably cause loss or harm to the plaintiff. If this is established, a prima facie duty of care arises and the analysis proceeds to the second stage, which asks whether there are policy reasons why this prima facie duty of care should not be recognized: Hill v. Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police Services Board, 2007 SCC 41, [2007] 3 S.C.R. 129.

(1) Stage One: Proximity and Foreseeability

[40] On the first branch of the test, the tobacco companies argue that the facts pleaded establish a sufficiently close and direct, or "proximate", relationship between Canada and consumers (in the Knight case) and between Canada and tobacco companies (in both cases) to support a duty of care with respect to government statements about light and mild cigarettes. They also argue that Canada could reasonably have foreseen that consumers and the tobacco industry would rely on Canada's statements about the health advantages of light cigarettes, and that such reliance was reasonable. Canada responds that it was acting exclusively in a regulatory capacity when it made statements to the public and to the industry, which does not give rise to sufficient proximity to ground the alleged duty of care. In the Costs Recovery case, Canada also alleges that it could not have reasonably foreseen that the B.C. legislature would enact the CRA and therefore cannot be liable for the Afin de déterminer si une pareille cause d'action a une possibilité raisonnable d'être accueillie, nous devons donc examiner s'il a été satisfait aux exigences générales en matière de responsabilité délictuelle énoncées dans le critère établi par la Chambre des lords dans Anns c. Merton London Borough Council, [1978] A.C. 728, et quelque peu reformulé, mais appliqué de façon constante par la Cour, notamment dans l'arrêt Cooper c. Hobart, 2001 CSC 79, [2001] 3 R.C.S. 537.

[39] À la première étape de ce critère, il faut se demander si les faits révèlent l'existence d'un lien de proximité dans le cadre duquel l'omission de faire preuve de diligence raisonnable peut, de façon prévisible, causer une perte ou un préjudice au plaignant. Si cette condition est remplie, il y a obligation de diligence prima facie et l'analyse passe à l'étape suivante dans laquelle on se demande si des considérations de politique générale empêcheraient de reconnaître cette obligation de diligence prima facie : Hill c. Commission des services policiers de la municipalité régionale de Hamilton-Wentworth, 2007 CSC 41, [2007] 3 R.C.S. 129.

(1) Première étape de l'analyse : le lien de proximité et la prévisibilité

[40] Quant au premier volet du critère, les compagnies de tabac font valoir que les faits allégués établissent l'existence d'un lien suffisamment étroit et direct, ou lien [TRADUCTION] « de proximité », d'une part, entre le Canada et les consommateurs (dans l'Affaire Knight) et, d'autre part, entre le Canada et les compagnies de tabac (dans les deux affaires) pour justifier une obligation de diligence à l'égard des déclarations du gouvernement au sujet des cigarettes légères et douces. Les compagnies de tabac ajoutent que le Canada aurait pu raisonnablement prévoir que les consommateurs et l'industrie du tabac se fieraient à ses déclarations au sujet des avantages des cigarettes légères au chapitre de la santé, et qu'il était raisonnable pour eux de se fier à ces déclarations. Le Canada rétorque qu'il agissait seulement à titre d'autorité de réglementation lorsqu'il a fait des déclarations à la population et à l'industrie, ce qui n'entraîne pas la création d'un lien suffisamment étroit pour potential losses of the tobacco companies under that Act.

[41] Proximity and foreseeability are two aspects of one inquiry — the inquiry into whether the facts disclose a relationship that gives rise to a prima facie duty of care at common law. Foreseeability is the touchstone of negligence law. However, not every foreseeable outcome will attract a commensurate duty of care. Foreseeability must be grounded in a relationship of sufficient closeness, or proximity, to make it just and reasonable to impose an obligation on one party to take reasonable care not to injure the other.

[42] Proximity and foreseeability are heightened concerns in claims for economic loss, such as negligent misrepresentation: see, generally, Canadian National Railway Co. v. Norsk Pacific Steamship Co., [1992] 1 S.C.R. 1021; Bow Valley Husky (Bermuda) Ltd. v. Saint John Shipbuilding Ltd., [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1210. In a claim of negligent misrepresentation, both these requirements for a prima facie duty of care are established if there was a "special relationship" between the parties: Hercules Managements Ltd. v. Ernst & Young, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 165, at para. 24. In Hercules Managements, the Court, per La Forest J., held that a special relationship will be established where: (1) the defendant ought reasonably to foresee that the plaintiff will rely on his or her representation; and (2) reliance by the plaintiff would be reasonable in the circumstances of the case (ibid.). Where such a relationship is established, the defendant may be liable for losses suffered by the plaintiff as a result of a negligent misstatement.

fonder l'obligation de diligence revendiquée. Dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, le Canada prétend aussi qu'il n'aurait pas pu raisonnablement prévoir que la législature de la Colombie-Britannique adopterait la CRA, et qu'il ne saurait donc être tenu responsable des pertes éventuelles des compagnies de tabac en application de cette Loi.

[41] Le lien de proximité et la prévisibilité sont deux aspects d'une même analyse — celle visant à déterminer si les faits révèlent l'existence d'un lien donnant lieu à une obligation de diligence prima facie en common law. La prévisibilité est l'élément fondamental du droit de la négligence. Par contre, ce ne sont pas tous les résultats prévisibles qui donnent lieu à une obligation de diligence comparable. La prévisibilité doit reposer sur un lien suffisamment étroit, ou lien de proximité suffisant, pour qu'il soit juste et raisonnable d'imposer à une partie l'obligation de prendre les mesures raisonnables pour ne pas porter préjudice à l'autre.

[42] On se soucie davantage du lien de proximité et de la prévisibilité dans les actions pour perte financière, comme celles pour déclaration inexacte faite par négligence : voir, de façon générale, Cie des chemins de fer nationaux du Canada c. Norsk Pacific Steamship Co., [1992] 1 R.C.S. 1021; Bow Valley Husky (Bermuda) Ltd. c. Saint John Shipbuilding Ltd., [1997] 3 R.C.S. 1210. Ces deux conditions d'une obligation de diligence prima facie sont remplies dans le cadre d'une action pour déclaration inexacte faite par négligence lorsqu'un « lien spécial » unit les parties : Hercules Managements Ltd. c. Ernst & Young, [1997] 2 R.C.S. 165, par. 24. S'exprimant au nom de la Cour dans Hercules Managements, le juge La Forest a affirmé que l'existence d'un lien spécial est établie lorsque : (1) le défendeur doit raisonnablement prévoir que le demandeur se fiera à sa déclaration; et que (2) la confiance que le demandeur accorde à la déclaration serait raisonnable dans les circonstances (ibid.). Si pareil lien est établi, le demandeur peut être tenu responsable des pertes subies par le demandeur du fait d'une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence.

[43] A complicating factor is the role that legislation should play when determining if a government actor owed a prima facie duty of care. Two situations may be distinguished. The first is the situation where the alleged duty of care is said to arise explicitly or by implication from the statutory scheme. The second is the situation where the duty of care is alleged to arise from interactions between the claimant and the government, and is not negated by the statute.

[44] The argument in the first kind of case is that the statute itself creates a private relationship of proximity giving rise to a prima facie duty of care. It may be difficult to find that a statute creates sufficient proximity to give rise to a duty of care. Some statutes may impose duties on state actors with respect to particular claimants. However, more often, statutes are aimed at public goods, like regulating an industry (Cooper), or removing children from harmful environments (Syl Apps). In such cases, it may be difficult to infer that the legislature intended to create private law tort duties to claimants. This may be even more difficult if the recognition of a private law duty would conflict with the public authority's duty to the public: see, e.g., Cooper and Syl Apps. As stated in Syl Apps, "[w]here an alleged duty of care is found to conflict with an overarching statutory or public duty, this may constitute a compelling policy reason for refusing to find proximity" (at para. 28; see also Fullowka v. Pinkerton's of Canada Ltd., 2010 SCC 5, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 132, at para. 39).

[45] The second situation is where the proximity essential to the private duty of care is alleged to arise from a series of specific interactions between the government and the claimant. The argument in these cases is that the government has, through its conduct, entered into a special relationship with the plaintiff sufficient to establish the necessary proximity for a duty of care. In these cases, the

[44] Selon l'argument avancé dans la première catégorie de cas, la loi elle-même crée un rapport de proximité de nature privée qui donne lieu à une obligation de diligence prima facie. Il peut être difficile d'arriver au constat qu'une loi crée un lien suffisamment étroit pour donner lieu à une obligation de diligence. Certaines lois peuvent imposer à des représentants de l'État des obligations envers des demandeurs en particulier, mais plus souvent, les lois visent des objectifs d'intérêt public, tels la réglementation d'une industrie (Cooper), ou le retrait d'un enfant d'un milieu qui lui est préjudiciable (Syl Apps). Dans ces circonstances, il peut être difficile d'inférer que le législateur entendait créer des obligations de droit privé envers des demandeurs. Il est encore plus difficile d'inférer cette intention si l'établissement d'une obligation de nature privée irait à l'encontre des obligations d'une autorité publique envers la population : voir notamment Cooper et Syl Apps. Tel qu'il est mentionné dans Syl Apps, « [u]n conflit entre l'obligation de diligence revendiquée et une obligation primordiale de nature publique ou imposée par la loi peut constituer une raison de principe impérieuse pour refuser de conclure à la proximité » (par. 28; voir aussi Fullowka c. Pinkerton's of Canada Ltd., 2010 CSC 5, [2010] 1 R.C.S. 132, par. 39).

[45] Dans la deuxième catégorie de cas, on prétend que le lien étroit essentiel à l'obligation de diligence de nature privée tire son origine d'une série de rapports précis entre le gouvernement et le demandeur. On fait valoir dans ces cas que le gouvernement, de par sa conduite, a tissé avec le demandeur un lien suffisamment spécial pour établir la proximité nécessaire à une obligation de governing statutes are still relevant to the analysis. For instance, if a finding of proximity would conflict with the state's general public duty established by the statute, the court may hold that no proximity arises: Syl Apps; see also Heaslip Estate v. Mansfield Ski Club Inc., 2009 ONCA 594, 96 O.R. (3d) 401. However, the factor that gives rise to a duty of care in these types of cases is the specific interactions between the government actor and the claimant.

[46] Finally, it is possible to envision a claim where proximity is based both on interactions between the parties and the government's statutory duties.

[47] Since this is a motion to strike, the question before us is simply whether, assuming the facts pleaded to be true, there is any reasonable prospect of successfully establishing proximity, on the basis of a statute or otherwise. On one hand, where the sole basis asserted for proximity is the statute, conflicting public duties may rule out any possibility of proximity being established as a matter of statutory interpretation: Syl Apps. On the other, where the asserted basis for proximity is grounded in specific conduct and interactions, ruling a claim out at the proximity stage may be difficult. So long as there is a reasonable prospect that the asserted interactions could, if true, result in a finding of sufficient proximity, and the statute does not exclude that possibility, the matter must be allowed to proceed to trial, subject to any policy considerations that may negate the prima facie duty of care at the second stage of the analysis.

[48] As mentioned above, there are two relationships at issue in these claims: the relationship between Canada and consumers (the Knight case), and the relationship between Canada and tobacco companies (both cases). The question at this stage is whether there is a prima facie duty of care in either or both these relationships. In my view, on the facts pleaded, Canada did not owe a prima facie diligence. Dans ces cas, les lois applicables restent pertinentes pour l'analyse. Par exemple, si un constat de proximité irait à l'encontre du devoir général de nature publique imposé par la loi à l'État, le tribunal peut conclure que cette proximité n'existe pas : Syl Apps; voir aussi Heaslip Estate c. Mansfield Ski Club Inc., 2009 ONCA 594, 96 O.R. (3d) 401. Cependant, ce sont les rapports précis entre l'organisme gouvernemental et le demandeur qui font naître une obligation de diligence dans un cas de ce genre.

[46] Enfin, il est possible d'imaginer une action mettant en cause un lien étroit qui se fonde à la fois sur les rapports entre les parties et sur les obligations imposées au gouvernement par la loi.

[47] Puisqu'il s'agit en l'espèce d'une requête en radiation, la question qui nous est soumise est simplement de savoir si, à supposer que les faits allégués soient vrais, il est raisonnablement possible de réussir à établir la proximité en raison d'une loi ou d'un autre facteur. D'une part, dans les cas où on invoque uniquement la loi comme fondement du lien étroit, des obligations opposées de nature publique peuvent exclure toute possibilité d'établir ce lien sur le plan de l'interprétation législative : Syl Apps. D'autre part, dans les cas où on affirme que le lien étroit repose sur un acte et des rapports précis, il peut être difficile de rejeter une action à ce stade. Tant qu'il est raisonnablement possible que les rapports allégués, s'ils sont vrais, amènent à conclure à l'existence d'un lien suffisamment étroit, et que la loi n'exclut pas clairement cette possibilité, il faut permettre que l'affaire soit instruite, sous réserve de l'existence de quelque considération de politique générale susceptible d'écarter l'obligation de diligence prima facie à la deuxième étape de l'analyse.

[48] Comme je l'ai déjà mentionné, les allégations en l'espèce mettent en cause deux liens : celui entre le Canada et les consommateurs (dans l'Affaire Knight), et celui entre le Canada et les compagnies de tabac (dans les deux affaires). La question qui se pose à ce stade est de savoir s'il existe une obligation de diligence prima facie dans l'un ou l'autre de ces liens. À mon sens, compte tenu des duty of care to consumers, but did owe a prima facie duty to the tobacco companies.

[49] The facts pleaded in Imperial's third-party notice in the Knight case establish no direct relationship between Canada and the consumers of light cigarettes. The relationship between the two was limited to Canada's statements to the general public that low-tar cigarettes are less hazardous. There were no specific interactions between Canada and the class members. Consequently, a finding of proximity in this relationship must arise from the governing statutes: Cooper, at para. 43.

[50] The relevant statutes establish only general duties to the public, and no private law duties to consumers. The Department of Health Act, S.C. 1996, c. 8, establishes that the duties of the Minister of Health relate to "the promotion and preservation of the health of the people of Canada": s. 4(1). Similarly, the Department of Agriculture and Agri-Food Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. A-9, s. 4, the Tobacco Act, S.C. 1997, c. 13, s. 4, and the Tobacco Products Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 14 (4th Supp.), s. 3 [rep. 1997, c. 13, s. 64], only establish duties to the general public. These general duties to the public do not give rise to a private law duty of care to particular individuals. To borrow the words of Sharpe J.A. of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Eliopoulos Estate v. Ontario (Minister of Health and Long-Term Care) (2006), 276 D.L.R. (4th) 411, "I fail to see how it could be possible to convert any of the Minister's public law discretionary powers, to be exercised in the general public interest, into private law duties owed to specific individuals": para. 17. At the same time, the governing statutes do not foreclose the possibility of recognizing a duty of care to the tobacco companies. Recognizing a duty of care on the government when it makes representations to the tobacco companies about the health attributes of tobacco strains would not conflict with its general duty to protect the health of the public.

faits allégués, le Canada n'avait pas d'obligation de ce genre envers les consommateurs, mais il en avait une envers les compagnies de tabac.

[49] Les faits allégués dans l'avis de mise en cause d'Imperial dans l'Affaire Knight n'établissent aucun lien direct entre le Canada et les consommateurs de cigarettes légères. Le lien dans ce cas se limitait aux déclarations du Canada adressées au grand public selon lesquelles les cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron sont moins dangereuses pour la santé. Le Canada n'entretenait pas de rapports spéciaux avec les membres du groupe. Par conséquent, le constat qu'il s'agit d'un lien suffisamment étroit doit découler des lois applicables : Cooper, par. 43.

[50] Les lois pertinentes n'établissent que des obligations générales envers le public, et non des obligations de nature privée envers les consommateurs. Selon la Loi sur le ministère de la Santé, L.C. 1996, ch. 8, les obligations du ministre de la Santé ont trait à « la promotion et au maintien de la santé de la population » : par. 4(1). Dans la même veine, l'art. 4 de la Loi sur le ministère de l'Agriculture et de l'Agroalimentaire, L.R.C. 1985, ch. A-9, l'art. 4 de la Loi sur le tabac, L.C. 1997, ch. 13, et l'art. 3 de la Loi réglementant les produits du tabac, L.R.C. 1985, ch. 14 (4e suppl.), art. 3 [abr. 1997, ch. 13, art. 64], ne prévoient eux aussi que des obligations envers le grand public. Ces obligations générales envers le public n'entraînent pas d'obligation de diligence de droit privé envers des personnes en particulier. Pour reprendre les termes utilisés par le juge Sharpe de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario dans Eliopoulos Estate c. Ontario (Minister of Health and Long-Term Care) (2006), 276 D.L.R. (4th) 411, [TRADUCTION] « [j]e ne vois pas en quoi il serait possible de transformer l'un des pouvoirs discrétionnaires de droit public du ministre, qui doivent être exercés dans l'intérêt public, en obligations de droit privé envers des personnes en particulier » : par. 17. Par contre, les lois applicables n'excluent pas la possibilité de reconnaître une obligation de diligence envers les compagnies de tabac. Le fait d'imposer au gouvernement une obligation de diligence lorsqu'il fait, à ces compagnies, des déclarations relativement aux effets des souches de tabac sur la santé ne serait pas incompatible avec son obligation générale de protéger la santé de la population.

[51] Turning to the relationship between Canada and the tobacco companies, at issue in both of the cases before the Court, the tobacco companies contend that a duty of care on Canada arose from the transactions between them and Canada over the years. They allege that Canada went beyond its role as regulator of industry players and entered into a relationship of advising and assisting the companies in reducing harm to their consumers. They hope to show that Canada gave erroneous information and advice, knowing that the companies would rely on it, which they did.

[52] The question is whether these pleadings bring the tobacco companies within the requirements for a special relationship under the law of negligent misrepresentation as set out in Hercules Managements. As noted above, a special relationship will be established where (1) the defendant ought reasonably to foresee that the plaintiff will rely on his or her representation, and (2) such reliance would, in the particular circumstances of the case, be reasonable. In the cases at bar, the facts pleaded allege a history of interactions between Canada and the tobacco companies capable of fulfilling these conditions.

[53] What is alleged against Canada is that Health Canada assumed duties separate and apart from its governing statute, including research into and design of tobacco and tobacco products and the promotion of tobacco and tobacco products (third-party statement of claim of Imperial in the Costs Recovery case, A.R., vol. II, at p. 66). In addition, it is alleged that Agriculture Canada carried out a programme of cooperation with and support for tobacco growers and cigarette manufacturers including advising cigarette manufacturers of the desirable content of nicotine in tobacco to be used in the manufacture of tobacco products. It is alleged that officials, drawing on their knowledge and expertise in smoking and health matters, provided both advice and directions to the manufacturers including advice that the tobacco strains

[52] Il s'agit de déterminer si les actes de procédure mentionnés ci-dessus font en sorte que les compagnies de tabac répondent aux conditions d'un lien spécial selon le droit en matière de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence qui sont énoncées dans Hercules Managements. Comme je l'ai mentionné, un lien spécial est établi lorsque (1) le défendeur doit raisonnablement prévoir que le demandeur se fiera à sa déclaration, et que (2) la confiance accordée par le demandeur serait raisonnable dans les circonstances. En l'espèce, les faits allégués révèlent que le Canada et les compagnies de tabac entretiennent depuis longtemps des rapports qui peuvent remplir ces conditions.

[53] Ce qu'on reproche au Canada, c'est que Santé Canada a exercé des fonctions distinctes de celles prévues par sa loi habilitante, y compris des recherches sur le tabac et des produits du tabac ainsi que la conception et la promotion du tabac et des produits du tabac (déclaration de mise en cause d'Imperial dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, d.a., vol. II, p. 66). Il est aussi allégué qu'Agriculture Canada a mis en œuvre un programme de coopération et de soutien destiné aux producteurs de tabac et aux fabricants de cigarettes, notamment en avisant ces derniers de la teneur en nicotine que devrait avoir le tabac utilisé pour la fabrication des produits du tabac. On allègue que des fonctionnaires ont fait appel à leurs connaissances et à leur expertise dans les domaines de l'usage du tabac et de la santé pour fournir à la fois des avis et des designed and developed by officials of Agriculture Canada and sold or licensed to the manufacturers for use in their tobacco products would not increase health risks to consumers or otherwise be harmful to them (ibid., at pp. 109-10). Thus, what is alleged is not simply that broad powers of regulation were brought to bear on the tobacco industry, but that Canada assumed the role of adviser to a finite number of manufacturers and that there were commercial relationships entered into between Canada and the companies based in part on the advice given to the companies by government officials.

[54] What is alleged with respect to Canada's interactions with the manufacturers goes far beyond the sort of statements made by Canada to the public at large. Canada is alleged to have had specific interactions with the manufacturers in contrast to the absence of such specific interactions between Canada and the class members. Whereas the claims in relation to consumers must be founded on a statutory framework establishing very general duties to the public, the claims alleged in relation to the manufacturers are not alleged to arise primarily from such general regulatory duties and powers but from roles undertaken specifically in relation to the manufacturers by Canada apart from its statutory duties, namely its roles as designer, developer, promoter and licensor of tobacco strains. With respect to the issue of reasonable reliance, Canada's regulatory powers over the manufacturers, coupled with its specific advice and its commercial involvement, could be seen as supporting a conclusion that reliance was reasonable in the pleaded circumstance.

[55] The indicia of proximity offered in Hercules Managements for a special relationship (direct financial interest; professional skill or knowledge; advice provided in the course of business, deliberately or in response to a specific request) may not be particularly apt in the context of alleged instructions aux fabricants, en les avisant notamment que les souches de tabac conçues et mises au point par des fonctionnaires d'Agriculture Canada, qui leur ont été vendues ou pour lesquelles des licences leur ont été octroyées, n'exposeraient pas les consommateurs à des dangers accrus pour leur santé, ni ne leur seraient autrement néfastes (ibid., p. 109-110). Par conséquent, on allègue non seulement que l'exercice de larges pouvoirs de réglementation a eu des répercussions sur l'industrie du tabac, mais aussi que le Canada a joué un rôle de conseiller auprès d'un nombre déterminé de fabricants et a entretenu des rapports commerciaux avec les sociétés en cause compte tenu, en partie, des avis fournis à ces dernières par des fonctionnaires.

[54] Les allégations relatives aux rapports entre le Canada et les fabricants vont bien au-delà des déclarations que fait le Canada au grand public. Les rapports précis qu'aurait entretenus le Canada avec les fabricants se distinguent de l'absence de pareils rapports entre le Canada et les membres du groupe. Alors que les allégations relatives aux consommateurs doivent reposer sur un cadre législatif établissant des obligations fort générales envers le public, les allégations visant les fabricants découleraient principalement, non pas de tels obligations et pouvoirs généraux de réglementation, mais des fonctions exercées spécifiquement à l'égard des fabricants par le Canada, et ce, indépendamment de ses obligations légales. Il s'agit en l'occurrence de ses fonctions de concepteur, d'inventeur, et de promoteur de souches de tabac ainsi que de concédant de licence à l'égard de ces souches. Pour ce qui est de la confiance raisonnable, les pouvoirs de réglementation du Canada envers les fabricants, conjugués aux avis précis qu'il a donnés et à sa participation à des activités commerciales, pourraient être considérés comme étayant la conclusion que la confiance accordée était raisonnable dans les circonstances alléguées.

[55] Il se peut que les indices de proximité énoncés dans Hercules Managements dans le cas d'un lien spécial (intérêt financier direct, aptitudes ou connaissances professionnelles, avis donné dans le cours normal des affaires, délibérément ou en réponse à une demande précise) ne soient pas très negligent misrepresentations by government. I note, however, that the representations are alleged to have been made in the course of Health Canada's regulatory and other activities, not in the course of casual interaction. They were made specifically to the manufacturers who were subject to Health Canada's regulatory powers and by officials alleged to have special skill, judgment and knowledge.

[56] Before leaving this issue, two final arguments must be considered. First, in the Costs Recovery case, Canada submits that there is no prima facie duty of care between Canada and the tobacco companies because the potential damages that the tobacco companies may incur under the CRA were not foreseeable. It argues that "[i]t was not reasonably foreseeable by Canada that a provincial government might create a wholly new type of civil obligation to reimburse costs incurred by a provincial health care scheme in respect of defined tobacco related wrongs, with unlimited retroactive and prospective reach" (A.F., at para. 36).

[57] In my view, Canada's argument was correctly rejected by the majority of the Court of Appeal. It is not necessary that Canada should have foreseen the precise statutory vehicle that would result in the tobacco companies' liability. All that is required is that it could have foreseen that its negligent misrepresentations would result in a harm of some sort to the tobacco companies: Hercules Managements, at paras. 25-26 and 42. On the facts pleaded, it cannot be ruled out that the tobacco companies may succeed in proving that Canada foresaw that the tobacco industry would incur this type of penalty for selling a more hazardous product. As held by Tysoe J.A., it is not necessary that Canada foresee that the liability would extend to health care costs specifically, or that provinces would create statutory causes of action to recover these costs. Rather, "[i]t is sufficient that Canada could have reasonably foreseen in a general way that the appellants would utiles dans le contexte de déclarations inexactes que le gouvernement aurait faites par négligence. Je signale toutefois que ces déclarations auraient été faites dans le cours des activités de réglementation et des autres activités de Santé Canada, et non dans le cadre de rapports informels. Elles ont été faites précisément aux fabricants assujettis aux pouvoirs de réglementation de Santé Canada, par des fonctionnaires prétendument dotés d'aptitudes, d'une capacité de discernement et de connaissances particulières.

[57] À mon sens, les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont eu raison de rejeter l'argument du Canada. Le Canada n'avait pas à prévoir la mesure législative précise qui engagerait la responsabilité des compagnies de tabac. Il suffit qu'il ait été à même de prévoir que ses déclarations inexactes faites par négligence causeraient un quelconque préjudice à ces compagnies : Hercules Managements, par. 25-26 et 42. Compte tenu des faits allégués, il n'est pas exclu que les compagnies de tabac réussissent à prouver que le Canada s'attendait à ce que l'industrie du tabac soit pénalisée de la sorte pour avoir vendu un produit plus dangereux. Comme l'a mentionné le juge Tysoe, le Canada n'avait pas à prévoir que la responsabilité viserait précisément les coûts des soins de santé, ou que des provinces créeraient un droit d'action d'origine législative pour recouvrer ces coûts. [TRADUCTION] « Il suffit que le Canada ait pu raisonnablement prévoir de suffer harm if the light and mild cigarettes were more hazardous to the health of smokers than regular cigarettes" (Costs Recovery case, at para. 78).

façon générale que les appelantes subiraient un préjudice si les cigarettes légères et douces étaient plus néfastes pour la santé des fumeurs que les cigarettes ordinaires » (l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, par. 78).

[58] Second, Canada argues that the relationship in this case does not meet the requirement of reasonable reliance because Canada was not acting in a commercial capacity, but rather as a regulator of an industry. It was therefore not reasonable for the tobacco companies to have relied on Canada as an advisor, it submits. This view was adopted by Hall J.A. in dissent, holding that "it could never have been the perception of the appellants that Canada was taking responsibility for their interests" (Costs Recovery case, at para. 51).

[58] Deuxièmement, le Canada fait valoir que le lien en l'espèce ne satisfait pas à la condition de la confiance raisonnable parce que le Canada agissait non pas comme une entreprise commerciale, mais plutôt comme une autorité de réglementation d'une industrie. Il n'était donc pas raisonnable, selon le Canada, que les compagnies de tabac se soient fiées à lui en qualité de conseiller. Le juge Hall, dissident, a souscrit à cette opinion, concluant que [TRADUCTION] « les appelantes n'auraient jamais pu croire que le Canada prenait la responsabilité de leurs intérêts » (l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, par. 51).

[59] In my view, this argument misconceives the reliance necessary for negligent misrepresentation under the test in Hercules Managements. When the jurisprudence refers to "reasonable reliance" in the context of negligent misrepresentation, it asks whether it was reasonable for the listener to rely on the speaker's statement as accurate, not whether it was reasonable to believe that the speaker is guaranteeing the accuracy of its statement. It is not plain and obvious that it was unreasonable for the tobacco companies to rely on Canada's statements about the advantages of light or mild cigarettes. In my view, Canada's argument that it was acting as a regulator does not relate to reasonable reliance, although it exposes policy concerns that should be considered at stage two of the Anns/Cooper test: Hercules Managements, at para. 41.

[59] À mon avis, cet argument dénature la confiance nécessaire en cas de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence selon le critère établi dans Hercules Managements. Lorsque la jurisprudence parle de « confiance raisonnable » dans le contexte d'une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence, elle pose la question de savoir s'il était raisonnable pour l'interlocuteur de se fier à l'exactitude de la déclaration, et non pas celle de savoir s'il était raisonnable de croire que l'auteur de la déclaration garantissait l'exactitude de celle-ci. Il n'est pas manifeste et évident que les compagnies de tabac se sont fiées de manière déraisonnable aux déclarations du Canada relatives aux avantages des cigarettes légères ou douces. J'estime que l'argument du Canada selon lequel il agissait en qualité d'autorité de réglementation n'a rien à voir avec la confiance raisonnable, mais il fait ressortir des considérations de politique générale qui doivent être examinées au deuxième volet du critère établi dans les arrêts Anns et Cooper : Hercules Managements, par. 41.

[60] In sum, I conclude that the claims between the tobacco companies and Canada should not be struck out at the first stage of the analysis. The pleadings, assuming them to be true, disclose a prima facie duty of care in negligent misrepresentation. However, the facts as pleaded in the Knight

[60] En résumé, je conclus que les allégations visant les compagnies de tabac et le Canada ne doivent pas être radiées à la première étape de l'analyse. À supposer qu'ils soient exacts, les actes de procédure révèlent l'existence d'une obligation de diligence prima facie d'éviter les déclarations case do not show a relationship between Canada and consumers that would give rise to a duty of care. That claim should accordingly be struck at this stage of the analysis.

(2) Stage Two: Conflicting Policy Considerations

[61] Canada submits that there can be no duty of care in the cases at bar because of stage-two policy considerations. It relies on four policy concerns: (1) that the alleged misrepresentations were policy decisions of the government; (2) that recognizing a duty of care would give rise to indeterminate liability to an indeterminate class; (3) that recognizing a duty of care would create an unintended insurance scheme; and (4) that allowing Imperial's claim would transfer responsibility for tobacco products to the government from the manufacturer, and the manufacturer "is best positioned to address liability for economic loss" (A.F., at para. 72).

[62] For the reasons that follow, I accept Canada's submission that its alleged negligent misrepresentations to the tobacco industry in both cases should not give rise to tort liability because of stage-two policy considerations. First, the alleged statements are protected expressions of government policy. Second, recognizing a duty of care would expose Canada to indeterminate liability.

(a) Government Policy Decisions

[63] Canada contends that it had a policy of encouraging smokers to consume low-tar cigarettes, inexactes faites par négligence. Toutefois, les faits, tels qu'ils ont été plaidés dans l'Affaire Knight, ne démontrent pas l'existence, entre le Canada et les consommateurs, d'une relation qui donnerait naissance à une obligation de diligence. Cette allégation doit donc être radiée à cette étape de l'analyse.

(2) Deuxième étape de l'analyse : considérations de politique générale opposées

[61] Le Canada fait valoir qu'il ne peut y avoir d'obligation de diligence dans les présentes affaires en raison des considérations de politique générale qui entrent en jeu à la deuxième étape de l'analyse. Le Canada invoque à cet égard quatre considérations de cette nature : (1) les prétendues déclarations inexactes constituaient des décisions de politique générale du gouvernement; (2) la reconnaissance d'une obligation de diligence entraînerait la création d'une responsabilité indéterminée envers une catégorie indéterminée de personnes; (3) la reconnaissance d'une telle obligation aurait pour effet imprévu d'instaurer un régime d'assurance; et (4) si l'on fait droit à la demande d'Imperial, la responsabilité à l'égard des produits du tabac passerait du fabricant au gouvernement, et le fabricant [TRADUCTION] « est le mieux en mesure d'assumer la responsabilité des pertes financières » (m.a., par. 72).

a) Décisions de politique générale du gouvernement

[63] Le Canada prétend qu'il avait pour politique générale d'encourager les fumeurs à consommer

and pursuant to this policy, promoted this variety of cigarette and developed strains of low-tar tobacco. Canada argues that statements made pursuant to this policy cannot ground tort liability. It relies on the statement of Cory J. in Just v. British Columbia, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1228, that "[t]rue policy decisions should be exempt from tortious claims so that governments are not restricted in making decisions based upon social, political or economic factors" (p. 1240).

des cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron, et qu'il a promu ce type de cigarette et développé des souches de tabac à faible teneur en goudron conformément à cette politique. Il ajoute que les déclarations faites en application de cette politique générale ne sauraient fonder une responsabilité délictuelle. Il s'appuie sur les propos suivants tenus par le juge Cory dans Just c. Colombie-Britannique, [1989] 2 R.C.S. 1228 : « Les véritables décisions de politique devraient être à l'abri des poursuites en responsabilité délictuelle, de sorte que les gouvernements soient libres de prendre leurs décisions en fonction de facteurs sociaux, politiques ou économiques » (p. 1240-1241).

[64] The tobacco companies, for their part, contend that Canada's actions were not matters of policy, but operational acts implementing policy, and therefore, are subject to tort liability. They submit that Canada's argument fails to account for the "facts" as pleaded in the third-party notices, namely that Canada was acting in an operational capacity, and as a participant in the tobacco industry. The tobacco companies also argue that more evidence is required to determine if the government's actions were operational or pursuant to policy, and that the matter should therefore be permitted to go to trial.

[65] In the Knight case, the majority in the Court of Appeal, per Tysoe J.A., agreed with Imperial's submissions, holding that "evidence is required to determine which of the actions and statements of Canada in this case were policy decisions and which were operational decisions" (para. 52). Hall J.A. dissented; in his view, it was clear that all of Canada's initiatives were matters of government policy:

[65] Dans l'Affaire Knight, les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel, sous la plume du juge Tysoe, ont souscrit aux prétentions d'Imperial, affirmant qu'[TRADUCTION] « une preuve est nécessaire pour déterminer lesquels des actes et déclarations du Canada en l'espèce constituaient des décisions de politique générale et lesquels étaient des décisions opérationnelles » (par. 52). Le juge Hall était dissident; à son avis, toutes les initiatives du Canada relevaient manifestement de la politique générale du gouvernement :

[Canada] had a responsibility, as pleaded in the Third Party Notice, to protect the health of the Canadian public including smokers. Any initiatives it took to develop less hazardous strains of tobacco, or to publish the tar and nicotine yields of different cigarette brands were directed to this end. While the development of new strains of tobacco involved Agriculture Canada, in my view the government engaged in such activities as a regulator of the tobacco industry seeking to protect the health interests of the Canadian public. Policy considerations underlaid all of these various activities undertaken by departments of the federal government. [para. 100]

[66] In order to resolve the issue of whether the alleged "policy" nature of Canada's conduct negates the prima facie duty of care for negligent misrepresentation established at stage one of the analysis, it is necessary to first consider several preliminary matters.

(i) Conduct at Issue

[67] The first preliminary matter is the conduct at issue for purposes of this discussion. The third-party notices describe two distinct types of conduct — one that is related to the allegation of negligent misrepresentation and one that is not. The first type of conduct relates to representations by Canada that low-tar and light cigarettes were less harmful to health than other cigarettes. The second type of conduct relates to Agriculture Canada's role in developing and growing a strain of low-tar tobacco and collecting royalties on the product. In argument, the tobacco companies merged the two types of conduct, emphasizing aspects that cast Canada in the role of a business operator in the tobacco industry. However, in considering negligent misrepresentation, only the first type of conduct — conduct relevant to statements and representations made by Canada — is at issue.

(ii) Relevance of Evidence

[68] This brings us to the second and related preliminary matter — the helpfulness of evidence in resolving the question of whether the third-party claims for negligent misrepresentation should be

de différentes marques de cigarettes, visaient cet objectif. Bien qu'Agriculture Canada ait participé au développement de nouvelles souches de tabac, j'estime que le gouvernement s'est livré à pareilles activités en qualité d'autorité de réglementation de l'industrie du tabac dans le but de protéger la santé de la population canadienne. Des considérations de politique générale sous-tendaient l'ensemble des diverses activités susmentionnées entreprises par les ministères fédéraux. [par. 100]

[66] Pour régler la question de savoir si la nature censément « politique » de la conduite du Canada a pour effet d'écarter l'obligation de diligence prima facie en matière de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence, une obligation dont l'existence a été établie à la première étape de l'analyse, il faut d'abord examiner plusieurs questions préliminaires.

(i) La conduite en cause

[67] La conduite en cause est la première question préliminaire à examiner dans le cadre de la présente analyse. Les avis de mise en cause traitent de deux types distincts de conduite : la conduite visée par l'allégation de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence et la conduite non visée par cette allégation. La première a trait aux déclarations du Canada selon lesquelles les cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron et les cigarettes légères étaient moins nuisibles pour la santé que les autres cigarettes. La deuxième conduite a trait au rôle joué par Agriculture Canada dans le développement et la culture d'une souche de tabac à faible teneur en goudron ainsi que dans la perception des redevances sur le produit. Les compagnies de tabac ont fusionné les deux types de conduite dans leur plaidoirie, en faisant ressortir des éléments qui campent le Canada dans un rôle de commerçant dans l'industrie du tabac. Toutefois, dans l'analyse des déclarations inexactes faites par négligence, seul est en cause le premier type de conduite, celui relatif aux déclarations du Canada.

(ii) La pertinence de la preuve

[68] Cela nous amène à la deuxième question préliminaire connexe : l'utilité de la preuve pour déterminer s'il convient de radier les demandes de mise en cause fondées sur les déclarations inexactes faites

struck. The majority of the Court of Appeal concluded that evidence was required to establish whether Canada's alleged misrepresentations were made pursuant to a government policy. Likewise, the tobacco companies in this Court argued strenuously that insofar as Canada was developing, growing, and profiting from low-tar tobacco, it should not be regarded as a government regulator or policy maker, but rather a business operator. Evidence was required, they urged, to determine the extent to which this was business activity.

[69] There are two problems with this argument. The first is that, as mentioned, it relies mainly on conduct — the development and marketing of a strain of low-tar tobacco — that is not directly related to the allegation of negligent misrepresentation. The only question at this point of the analysis is whether policy considerations weigh against finding that Canada was under a duty of care to the tobacco companies to take reasonable care to accurately represent the qualities of low-tar tobacco. Whether Canada produced strains of low-tar tobacco is not directly relevant to that inquiry. The question is whether, insofar as it made statements on this matter, policy considerations militate against holding it liable for those statements.

[70] The second problem with the argument is that, as discussed above, a motion to strike is, by its very nature, not dependent on evidence. The facts pleaded must be assumed to be true. Unless it is plain and obvious that on those facts the action has no reasonable chance of success, the motion to strike must be refused. To put it another way, if there is a reasonable chance that the matter as pleaded may in fact turn out not to be a matter of policy, then the application to strike must be dismissed. Doubts as to what may be proved in the par négligence. La Cour d'appel a conclu à la majorité qu'une preuve était nécessaire pour établir si les déclarations inexactes attribuées au Canada avaient été faites conformément à une politique générale du gouvernement. Dans la même veine, les compagnies de tabac ont soutenu vigoureusement devant notre Cour que, dans la mesure où le Canada développait et cultivait du tabac à faible teneur en goudron et en tirait profit, il devrait être considéré non pas comme une autorité de réglementation du gouvernement ou un architecte des politiques publiques, mais comme un commerçant. Les compagnies de tabac ont fait valoir avec insistance qu'une preuve était nécessaire pour déterminer la mesure dans laquelle il s'agissait d'une activité commerciale.

[69] Cet argument pose problème à deux égards. Premièrement, comme je l'ai mentionné, il repose principalement sur des actes — le développement et la commercialisation d'une souche de tabac à faible teneur en goudron — qui n'ont pas de lien direct avec l'allégation de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence. La seule question qui se pose à ce stade de l'analyse est de savoir si les considérations de politique générale militent contre la conclusion que le Canada avait envers les compagnies de tabac l'obligation de prendre les mesures raisonnables pour énoncer correctement les avantages du tabac à faible teneur en goudron. La question de savoir si le Canada a produit des souches de tabac à faible teneur en goudron n'est pas directement pertinente pour cette analyse. Il s'agit plutôt de savoir si, dans la mesure où le Canada a fait des déclarations à cet égard, des considérations de politique générale nous empêcheraient de le tenir responsable de ces déclarations.

[70] Deuxièmement, comme je l'ai déjà indiqué, une requête en radiation ne dépend pas, de par sa nature, de la preuve. Les faits allégués doivent être tenus pour avérés. Le rejet de la requête en radiation s'impose, à moins qu'il ne soit évident et manifeste, d'après ces faits, que l'action n'a aucune possibilité raisonnable de succès. Autrement dit, s'il existe une possibilité raisonnable que la question alléguée s'avère en fait une question de politique générale, la requête en radiation doit alors être rejetée. Les doutes quant à ce que la preuve peut démontrer evidence should be resolved in favour of proceeding to trial. The question for us is therefore whether, assuming the facts pleaded to be true, it is plain and obvious that any duty of care in negligent misrepresentation would be defeated on the ground that the conduct grounding the alleged misrepresentation is a matter of government policy and hence not capable of giving rise to liability in tort.

[71] Before we can answer this question, we must consider a third preliminary issue: what constitutes a policy decision immune from review by the courts?

(iii) What Constitutes a Policy Decision Immune From Judicial Review?

[72] The question of what constitutes a policy decision that is generally protected from negligence liability is a vexed one, upon which much judicial ink has been spilled. There is general agreement in the common law world that government policy decisions are not justiciable and cannot give rise to tort liability. There is also general agreement that governments may attract liability in tort where government agents are negligent in carrying out prescribed duties. The problem is to devise a workable test to distinguish these situations.

[73] The jurisprudence reveals two approaches to the problem, one emphasizing discretion, the other, policy, each with variations. The first approach focuses on the discretionary nature of the impugned conduct. The "discretionary decision" approach was first adopted in Home Office v. Dorset Yacht Co., [1970] 2 W.L.R. 1140 (H.L.). This approach holds that public authorities should be exempt from liability if they are acting within their discretion, unless the challenged decision is irrational.

ne devraient pas empêcher la tenue d'un procès. La question dont nous sommes saisis est donc de savoir s'il ressort clairement des faits tenus pour avérés qu'une obligation de faire diligence afin d'éviter les déclarations inexactes faites par négligence serait écartée parce que la conduite à l'origine de la déclaration inexacte alléguée relève d'une politique générale du gouvernement et n'est donc pas susceptible d'engager la responsabilité délictuelle de son auteur.

[71] Pour être en mesure de répondre à cette question, nous devons examiner une troisième question préliminaire : en quoi consiste une décision de politique générale soustraite au contrôle judiciaire?

(iii) Les décisions de politique générale soustraites au contrôle judiciaire

[72] La question de savoir en quoi consiste une décision de politique générale qui écarte généralement toute responsabilité pour négligence est une question épineuse qui a fait couler beaucoup d'encre. Les tribunaux de common law de partout dans le monde s'entendent généralement pour dire que les décisions de politique générale des gouvernements ne sont pas justiciables et ne peuvent engager la responsabilité délictuelle de ces derniers. On s'entend aussi généralement pour dire que la responsabilité délictuelle de l'État peut être engagée lorsque ses mandataires exercent de façon négligente des fonctions prescrites. La difficulté tient à l'élaboration d'un critère qui permette de distinguer ces situations.

[73] La jurisprudence révèle l'existence de deux méthodes d'analyse utilisées pour résoudre cette difficulté, l'une étant axée sur la notion de pouvoir discrétionnaire, et l'autre sur la notion de politique générale, et chacune a ses propres variantes. La première méthode met l'accent sur la nature discrétionnaire de la conduite reprochée. La méthode fondée sur la [TRADUCTION] « décision discrétionnaire » a été retenue pour la première fois dans Home Office c. Dorset Yacht Co., [1970] 2 W.L.R. 1140 (H.L.). Selon cette méthode, les autorités publiques doivent être exonérées de toute responsabilité lorsqu'elles agissent dans l'exercice de leur pouvoir discrétionnaire, à moins que la décision attaquée ne soit irrationnelle.

[74] The second approach emphasizes the "policy" nature of protected state conduct. Policy decisions are conceived of as a subset of discretionary decisions, typically characterized as raising social, economic and political considerations. These are sometimes called "true" or "core" policy decisions. They are exempt from judicial consideration and cannot give rise to liability in tort, provided they are neither irrational nor taken in bad faith. A variant of this is the policy/operational test, in which "true" policy decisions are distinguished from "operational" decisions, which seek to implement or carry out settled policy. To date, the policy/operational approach is the dominant approach in Canada: Just; Brown v. British Columbia (Minister of Transportation and Highways), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 420; Swinamer v. Nova Scotia (Attorney General), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 445; Lewis (Guardian ad litem of) v. British Columbia, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1145.

[74] La seconde méthode insiste sur la qualité de « politique générale » de la conduite de l'État bénéficiant d'une protection. On considère que les décisions de politique générale forment un sous-groupe de décisions discrétionnaires, qui font habituellement intervenir des considérations d'ordre social, économique et politique. Elles sont parfois qualifiées de « véritables » décisions de politique générale ou décisions de politique générale « fondamentale ». Les décisions de politique générale sont soustraites au contrôle judiciaire et ne peuvent engager la responsabilité délictuelle de l'État, sauf si elles sont irrationnelles ou ont été prises de mauvaise foi. Une variante de cette méthode est le critère politique générale-opérations, lequel fait la distinction entre les « véritables » décisions de politique générale et les décisions « opérationnelles », qui visent la mise en œuvre ou l'application d'une politique générale établie. De nos jours, c'est le critère politique générale-opérations qui prévaut au Canada : Just; Brown c. Colombie-Britannique (Ministre des Transports et de la Voirie), [1994] 1 R.C.S. 420; Swinamer c. Nouvelle-Écosse (Procureur général), [1994] 1 R.C.S. 445; Lewis (Tutrice à l'instance de) c. Colombie-Britannique, [1997] 3 R.C.S. 1145.

[75] To complicate matters, the concepts of discretion and policy overlap and are sometimes used interchangeably. Thus Lord Wilberforce in Anns defined policy as a synonym for discretion (p. 754).

[75] Pour compliquer les choses, les notions de pouvoir discrétionnaire et de politique générale se chevauchent et sont parfois employées de manière interchangeable. Ainsi, dans Anns, lord Wilberforce a décrit la notion de politique générale comme étant synonyme de pouvoir discrétionnaire (p. 754).

[76] There is wide consensus that the law of negligence must account for the unique role of government agencies: Just. On the one hand, it is important for public authorities to be liable in general for their negligent conduct in light of the pervasive role that they play in all aspects of society. Exempting all government actions from liability would result in intolerable outcomes. On the other hand, "the Crown is not a person and must be free to govern and make true policy decisions without becoming subject to tort liability as a result of those decisions": Just, at p. 1239. The challenge, [76] On admet généralement que le droit de la négligence doit prendre en compte le rôle unique des organismes gouvernementaux : Just. D'une part, il importe que les organismes publics soient responsables en général de leur négligence compte tenu du grand rôle qu'ils jouent dans tous les aspects de la vie en société. Soustraire les gouvernements à toute responsabilité pour leurs actes entraînerait des conséquences inacceptables. Par contre, « la Couronne n'est pas une personne et elle doit pouvoir être libre de gouverner et de prendre de véritables décisions de politique sans encourir pour autant une to repeat, is to fashion a just and workable legal test.

[77] The main difficulty with the "discretion" approach is that it has the potential to create an overbroad exemption for the conduct of government actors. Many decisions can be characterized as to some extent discretionary. For this reason, this approach has sometimes been refined or replaced by tests that narrow the scope of the discretion that confers immunity.

[78] The main difficulty with the policy/operational approach is that courts have found it notoriously difficult to decide whether a particular government decision falls on the policy or operational side of the line. Even low-level state employees may enjoy some discretion related to how much money is in the budget or which of a range of tasks is most important at a particular time. Is the decision of a social worker when to visit a troubled home, or the decision of a snow-plow operator when to sand an icy road, a policy decision or an operational decision? Depending on the circumstances, it may be argued to be either or both. The policy/operational distinction, while capturing an important element of why some government conduct should generally be shielded from liability, does not work very well as a legal test.

[79] The elusiveness of a workable test to define policy decisions protected from judicial review is captured by the history of the issue in various courts. I begin with the House of Lords. The House initially adopted the view that all discretionary decisions of government are immune, unless they are irrational: Dorset Yacht. It then moved on to a two-stage test that asked first whether the decision was discretionary and, if so, rational; and asked second whether it was a core policy decision, responsabilité civile délictuelle » : Just, p. 1239. La difficulté, encore une fois, consiste à formuler un critère juridique équitable et utile.

[77] La principale difficulté que pose la méthode d'analyse fondée sur la notion de « décision discrétionnaire » réside dans la possibilité qu'elle applique à la conduite des acteurs gouvernementaux une exemption trop générale. Bien des décisions peuvent être qualifiées de discrétionnaires dans une certaine mesure. Cette méthode d'analyse a donc parfois été peaufinée ou remplacée par des critères restreignant le pouvoir discrétionnaire qui dégage son titulaire de toute responsabilité.

[78] La principale difficulté que pose le critère politique générale-opérations tient au fait qu'il est notoirement difficile pour les tribunaux de décider si une décision gouvernementale donnée relève d'une politique générale ou des opérations. Même des fonctionnaires aux échelons inférieurs peuvent jouir d'un certain pouvoir discrétionnaire pour ce qui est d'établir le montant des fonds disponibles ou de décider quelle tâche parmi d'autres revêt le plus d'importance à un moment donné. La décision d'un travailleur social quant au moment de rendre visite à une famille perturbée, ou celle d'un conducteur de chasse-neige quant au moment d'épandre du sable sur une route glacée, sont-elles des décisions de politique générale ou des décisions opérationnelles? On peut soutenir que les deux réponses sont bonnes, selon les circonstances. Bien qu'elle illustre un facteur clé en raison duquel certains actes du gouvernement doivent généralement être à l'abri de toute responsabilité, la distinction politique générale-opérations ne constitue pas un critère juridique très utile.

[79] L'historique du traitement de la question par différents tribunaux illustre la difficulté que présente l'élaboration d'un critère utile pour décrire les décisions de politique générale soustraites au contrôle judiciaire. Commençons par la Chambre des lords, qui estimait au départ que toutes les décisions discrétionnaires du gouvernement qui ne sont pas irrationnelles sont soustraites au contrôle judiciaire : Dorset Yacht. Elle a ensuite appliqué un critère à deux volets, en se demandant en in which case it was entirely exempt from judicial scrutiny: X v. Bedfordshire County Council, [1995] 3 All E.R. 353. Within a year of adopting this two-stage test, the House abandoned it with a ringing declamation of the policy/operational distinction as unworkable in difficult cases, a point said to be evidenced by the Canadian jurisprudence: Stovin v. Wise, [1996] A.C. 923 (H.L.), per Lord Hoffmann. In its most recent foray into the subject, the House of Lords affirmed that both the policy/operational distinction and the discretionary decision approach are valuable tools for discerning which government decisions attract tort liability, but held that the final test is a "justiciability" test: Barrett v. Enfield London Borough Council, [2001] 2 A.C. 550. The ultimate question on this test is whether the court is institutionally capable of deciding on the question, or "whether the court should accept that it has no role to play" (p. 571). Thus at the end of the long judicial voyage the traveller arrives at a test that essentially restates the question. When should the court hold that a government decision is protected from negligence liability? When the court concludes that the matter is one for the government and not the courts.

[80] Australian judges in successive cases have divided between a discretionary/irrationality model and a "true policy" model. In Sutherland Shire Council v. Heyman (1985), 157 C.L.R. 424 (H.C.), two of the justices (Gibbs C.J. and Wilson J.) adopted the Dorset Yacht rule that all discretionary decisions are immune, provided they are rational (p. 442). They endorsed the policy/operational distinction as a logical test for discerning which decisions should be protected, and adopted Lord Wilberforce's definition of policy as a synonym for discretion. Mason J., by contrast, held that only core policy decisions, which he viewed as a narrower subset of discretionary decisions, were protected (p. 500). Deane J. agreed with Mason J.

premier lieu si la décision était discrétionnaire et, dans l'affirmative, si elle était rationnelle; elle s'est demandé en second lieu s'il s'agissait d'une décision de politique fondamentale, et donc entièrement soustraite à l'examen judiciaire : X c. Bedfordshire County Council, [1995] 3 All E.R. 353. Moins d'un an après avoir retenu ce critère à deux volets, la Chambre des lords l'a laissé tomber en déclamant de manière retentissante que le critère politique générale-opérations était inapplicable dans les cas difficiles, ce dont témoignerait la jurisprudence canadienne : Stovin c. Wise, [1996] A.C. 923 (H.L.), lord Hoffmann. Lors de sa dernière incursion dans ce domaine, la Chambre des lords a mentionné que tant le critère politique générale-opérations que l'analyse fondée sur la notion de décision discrétionnaire sont utiles pour déterminer les décisions du gouvernement qui engagent la responsabilité délictuelle de celui-ci, mais elle a jugé que le critère final en est un de « justiciabilité » : Barrett c. Enfield London Borough Council, [2001] 2 A.C. 550. Selon ce critère, il s'agit de savoir, en définitive, si le tribunal est habile, sur le plan institutionnel, à trancher la question ou [TRADUCTION] « si le tribunal doit reconnaître qu'il n'a pas à intervenir » (p. 571). Ainsi, à la fin de ce long périple jurisprudentiel, on se retrouve avec un critère qui ne fait que reformuler la question. Quand le tribunal doit-il juger qu'une décision gouvernementale ne donne pas prise à la responsabilité pour négligence? Quand le tribunal conclut que l'affaire est du ressort du gouvernement et non des tribunaux.

[80] Des juges australiens s'étant prononcés dans des décisions successives sont partagés entre le modèle décision discrétionnaire-décision irrationnelle et celui de la « véritable décision de politique générale ». Dans Sutherland Shire Council c. Heyman (1985), 157 C.L.R. 424 (H.C.), deux des juges (le juge en chef Gibbs et le juge Wilson) ont adopté la règle établie dans l'arrêt Dorset Yacht, selon laquelle toutes les décisions discrétionnaires échappent au contrôle judiciaire, pourvu qu'elles soient rationnelles (p. 442). Ils ont souscrit à la thèse que la distinction entre la politique générale et les opérations était un critère logique pour déterminer quelles décisions ne donnent pas prise à la responsabilité, et ils ont fait leur la description de lord for somewhat different reasons. Brennan J. did not comment on which test should be adopted, leaving the test an open question. The Australian High Court again divided in Pyrenees Shire Council v. Day, [1998] HCA 3, 192 C.L.R. 330, with three justices holding that a discretionary government action will only attract liability if it is irrational and two justices endorsing different versions of the policy/operational distinction.

Wilberforce voulant que la politique générale soit synonyme de pouvoir discrétionnaire. Pour sa part, le juge Mason a affirmé que l'État bénéficiait de la protection uniquement à l'égard des décisions de politique générale fondamentale, qu'il considérait comme un sous-groupe plus restreint de décisions discrétionnaires (p. 500). Le juge Deane a souscrit à l'opinion du juge Mason, mais pour des raisons quelque peu différentes. Quant au juge Brennan, il n'a pas dit quel critère devrait être retenu, laissant cette question en suspens. La Haute Cour d'Australie était encore une fois divisée dans Pyrenees Shire Council c. Day, [1998] HCA 3, 192 C.L.R. 330, où trois juges ont conclu qu'une mesure gouvernementale discrétionnaire n'engage la responsabilité de l'État que si elle est irrationnelle, et deux juges ont retenu des versions différentes du critère politique générale-opérations.

[81] In the United States, the liability of the federal government is governed by the Federal Tort Claims Act of 1946, 28 U.S.C. ("FTCA"), which waived sovereign immunity for torts, but created an exemption for discretionary decisions. Section 2680(a) excludes liability in tort for

> [a]ny claim based upon an act or omission of an employee of the Government, exercising due care, in the execution of a statute or regulation, whether or not such statute or regulation be valid, or based upon the exercise or performance or the failure to exercise or perform a discretionary function or duty on the part of a federal agency or an employee of the Government, whether or not the discretion involved be abused.

> [TRADUCTION] [t]oute poursuite fondée sur l'acte ou l'omission d'un fonctionnaire dans l'exécution diligente d'une loi ou d'un règlement, que ces derniers soient ou non valides, ou fondée sur l'exercice ou le défaut d'exercice d'une fonction ou d'un pouvoir discrétionnaire de la part d'un organisme fédéral ou d'un fonctionnaire, qu'il y ait eu ou non exercice abusif de ce pouvoir discrétionnaire.

Significantly, s. 2680(h) of the FTCA exempts the federal government from any claim of misrepresentation, either intentional or negligent: Office of Personnel Management v. Richmond, 496 U.S. 414 (1990), at p. 430; United States v. Neustadt, 366 U.S. 696 (1961).

Fait important, l'al. 2680h) de la FTCA soustrait le gouvernement fédéral à toute poursuite pour déclaration inexacte, faite délibérément ou par négligence : Office of Personnel Management c. Richmond, 496 U.S. 414 (1990), p. 430; United States c. Neustadt, 366 U.S. 696 (1961).

[82] Without detailing the complex history of the American jurisprudence on the issue, it suffices to say that the cases have narrowed the concept of discretion in the FTCA by reference to the concept of policy. Some cases develop this analysis by distinguishing between policy and operational decisions:

[82] Sans entrer dans les détails de l'historique complexe de la jurisprudence américaine en la matière, il suffit de dire que les tribunaux ont restreint le concept de pouvoir discrétionnaire énoncé dans la FTCA en invoquant la notion de politique générale. Dans certaines décisions, ils développent

e.g., Dalehite v. United States, 346 U.S. 15 (1953). The Supreme Court of the United States has since distanced itself from the approach of defining a true policy decision negatively as "not operational", in favour of an approach that asks whether the impugned state conduct was based on public policy considerations. In United States v. Gaubert, 499 U.S. 315 (1991), White J. faulted the Court of Appeals for relying on "a nonexistent dichotomy between discretionary functions and operational activities" (p. 326). He held that the "discretionary function exception" of the FTCA "protects only governmental actions and decisions based on considerations of public policy" (at p. 323, citing Berkovitz v. United States, 486 U.S. 531 (1988), at p. 537 (emphasis added)), such as those involving social, economic and political considerations: see also United States v. S.A. Empresa de Viacao Aerea Rio Grandense (Varig Airlines), 467 U.S. 797 (1984).

[83] In Gaubert, only Scalia J. found lingering appeal in defining policy decisions as "not operational", but only in the narrow sense that people at the operational level will seldom make policy decisions. He stated that "there is something to the planning vs. operational dichotomy — though . . . not precisely what the Court of Appeals believed" (p. 335). That "something" is that "[o]rdinarily, an employee working at the operational level is not responsible for policy decisions, even though policy considerations may be highly relevant to his actions". For Scalia J., a government decision is a protected policy decision if it "ought to be informed by considerations of social, economic, or political policy and is made by an officer whose official responsibilities include assessment of those considerations".

cette analyse en distinguant les décisions de politique générale des décisions opérationnelles : p. ex. Dalehite c. United States, 346 U.S. 15 (1953). La Cour suprême des États-Unis s'est depuis distanciée de l'approche qui consiste à décrire de façon négative une véritable décision de politique générale comme une décision [TRADUCTION] « n'étant pas de nature opérationnelle » et favorise une approche visant à déterminer si la conduite contestée de l'État reposait sur des considérations d'intérêt public. Dans United States c. Gaubert, 499 U.S. 315 (1991), le juge White a reproché à la Court of Appeals de se fonder sur une [TRADUCTION] « dichotomie inexistante entre les fonctions discrétionnaires et les activités opérationnelles » (p. 326). Selon lui, l'« exception relative aux fonctions discrétionnaires » prévue par la FTCA « ne vise que les mesures et les décisions du gouvernement qui reposent sur des considérations d'intérêt public » (p. 323, citant Berkovitz c. United States, 486 U.S. 531 (1988), p. 537 (je souligne)), comme celles faisant intervenir des considérations sociales, économiques ou politiques; voir aussi United States c. S.A. Empresa de Viacao Aerea Rio Grandense (Varig Airlines), 467 U.S. 797 (1984).

[83] Dans Gaubert, seul le juge Scalia trouvait encore attrayante l'idée de définir les décisions de politique générale comme des décisions [TRADUCTION] « n'étant pas de nature opérationnelle », mais seulement au sens strict selon lequel les employés au niveau opérationnel prennent rarement des décisions de politique générale. Selon lui, [TRADUCTION] « un facteur intervient dans la dichotomie entre la planification et les opérations [. . .] mais ce n'est pas tout à fait ce que les cours d'appel avaient en tête » (p. 335). Ce « facteur », c'est que, « [h]abituellement, un employé au niveau opérationnel n'a pas à prendre des décisions de politique générale, même si ses actes peuvent être étroitement liés à des considérations de cette nature ». D'après le juge Scalia, une décision du gouvernement constitue une décision de politique générale bénéficiant de protection si elle « doit tenir compte de considérations sociales, économiques ou politiques et si elle est prise par un fonctionnaire dont l'une des responsabilités officielles consiste à évaluer ces considérations ».

[84] A review of the jurisprudence provokes the following observations. The first is that a test based simply on the exercise of government discretion is generally now viewed as too broad. Discretion can imbue even routine tasks, like driving a government vehicle. To protect all government acts that involve discretion unless they are irrational simply casts the net of immunity too broadly.

[84] Les observations suivantes s'imposent comme suite à l'analyse de la jurisprudence. Premièrement, un critère fondé uniquement sur l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire du gouvernement est maintenant perçu par la plupart des tribunaux comme étant trop général. Même les tâches courantes, comme la conduite d'un véhicule du gouvernement, peuvent requérir l'exercice d'un certain pouvoir discrétionnaire. Soustraire à l'examen judiciaire tous les actes de l'administration publique qui font intervenir un pouvoir discrétionnaire, pourvu qu'ils ne soient pas irrationnels, a pour effet de donner une portée trop large à l'immunité.

[85] The second observation is that there is considerable support in all jurisdictions reviewed for the view that "true" or "core" policy decisions should be protected from negligence liability. The current Canadian approach holds that only "true" policy decisions should be so protected, as opposed to operational decisions: Just. The difficulty in defining such decisions does not detract from the fact that the cases keep coming back to this central insight. Even the most recent "justiciability" test in the U.K. looks to this concept for support in defining what should be viewed as justiciable.

[86] A third observation is that defining a core policy decision negatively as a decision that is not an "operational" decision may not always be helpful as a stand-alone test. It posits a stark dichotomy between two water-tight compartments — policy decisions and operational decisions. In fact, decisions in real life may not fall neatly into one category or the other.

[86] Troisièmement, le fait de définir négativement une décision de politique générale fondamentale comme une décision n'étant pas de nature « opérationnelle » ne constitue peut-être pas un critère distinct utile dans tous les cas. Ce critère suppose une nette dichotomie entre deux compartiments étanches : les décisions de politique générale et les décisions opérationnelles. Dans les faits, il est possible que les décisions n'appartiennent pas clairement à l'une ou l'autre de ces catégories.

[87] Instead of defining protected policy decisions negatively, as "not operational", the majority in Gaubert defines them positively as discretionary legislative or administrative decisions and conduct that are grounded in social, economic, and political considerations. Generally, policy decisions are made by legislators or officers whose official responsibility requires them to assess and balance public policy considerations. The decision is a considered decision that represents a "policy" in the sense of a general rule or approach, applied to a particular situation. It represents "a course or principle of action adopted or proposed by a government": New Oxford Dictionary of English (1998), at p. 1434. When judges are faced with such a course or principle of action adopted by a government, they generally will find the matter to be a policy decision. The weighing of social, economic, and political considerations to arrive at a course or principle of action is the proper role of government, not the courts. For this reason, decisions and conduct based on these considerations cannot ground an action in tort.

étant des décisions et des mesures discrétionnaires d'ordre législatif ou administratif qui se fondent sur des considérations sociales, économiques ou politiques. Les décisions de politique générale sont habituellement prises par le législateur ou un fonctionnaire tenu officiellement d'évaluer et de mettre en balance des considérations d'intérêt public. La décision est réfléchie et traduit une « politique générale » dans le sens d'une règle ou orientation générale appliquée dans une situation précise. La politique désigne une « ligne de conduite adoptée par un organisme [. . .] public » : Multidictionnaire de la langue française, p. 1261. Les juges saisis d'une pareille ligne de conduite adoptée par un organisme public estiment généralement qu'il s'agit d'une décision de politique générale. Il appartient véritablement au gouvernement, et non aux tribunaux, de mettre en balance des considérations sociales, économiques et politiques pour en arriver à une ligne de conduite. C'est pourquoi les décisions et les actes reposant sur ces considérations ne sauraient fonder une action en responsabilité délictuelle.

[88] Policy, used in this sense, is not the same thing as discretion. Discretion is concerned with whether a particular actor had a choice to act in one way or the other. Policy is a narrow subset of discretionary decisions, covering only those decisions that are based on public policy considerations, like economic, social and political considerations. Policy decisions are always discretionary, in the sense that a different policy could have been chosen. But not all discretionary decisions by government are policy decisions.

[88] Utilisée dans ce sens, la notion de politique générale diffère de la notion de pouvoir discrétionnaire. Un tel pouvoir dépend de la question de savoir si un acteur donné a la faculté de choisir d'agir d'une façon ou d'une autre. Les politiques générales forment un sous-ensemble restreint de décisions discrétionnaires, et n'englobent que les décisions fondées sur des considérations d'intérêt public, comme des considérations d'ordre économique, social ou politique. Toutes les décisions de politique générale sont discrétionnaires, en ce sens qu'une politique différente aurait pu être retenue. Toutefois, les décisions discrétionnaires du gouvernement ne sont pas toutes des décisions de politique générale.

[89] While the main focus on the Gaubert approach is on the nature of the decision, the role of the person who makes the decision may be of assistance. Did the decision maker have the responsibility of looking at social, economic or political factors and formulating a "course" or "principle" of action with respect to a particular problem facing the government? Without suggesting that the question can be resolved simply by reference to the rank of the actor, there is something to Scalia J.'s observation in Gaubert that employees working at the operational level are not usually involved in making policy choices.

[89] Bien que l'approche préconisée dans Gaubert mette l'accent sur la nature de la décision, le rôle du décideur peut se révéler utile. Ce dernier était-il chargé d'étudier les facteurs sociaux, économiques ou politiques et d'élaborer une « ligne de conduite » à l'égard d'un problème auquel fait face le gouvernement? Sans prétendre qu'il est possible de répondre à la question en invoquant

[90] I conclude that "core policy" government decisions protected from suit are decisions as to a course or principle of action that are based on public policy considerations, such as economic, social and political factors, provided they are neither irrational nor taken in bad faith. This approach is consistent with the basic thrust of Canadian cases on the issue, although it emphasizes positive features of policy decisions, instead of relying exclusively on the quality of being "non-operational". It is also supported by the insights of emerging jurisprudence here and elsewhere. This said, it does not purport to be a litmus test. Difficult cases may be expected to arise from time to time where it is not easy to decide whether the degree of "policy" involved suffices for protection from negligence liability. A black and white test that will provide a ready and irrefutable answer for every decision in the infinite variety of decisions that government actors may produce is likely chimerical. Nevertheless, most government decisions that represent a course or principle of action based on a balancing of economic, social and political considerations will be readily identifiable.

[91] Applying this approach to motions to strike, we may conclude that where it is "plain and obvious" that an impugned government decision is a policy decision, the claim may properly be struck on the ground that it cannot ground an action in tort. If it is not plain and obvious, the matter must be allowed to go to trial.

simplement le niveau hiérarchique du décideur, on peut s'inspirer de l'observation faite par le juge Scalia dans Gaubert selon laquelle les employés au niveau opérationnel ne participent habituellement pas à la prise de décisions de politique générale.

[90] Je conclus que les décisions de « politique générale fondamentale » du gouvernement à l'égard desquelles ce dernier est soustrait aux poursuites se rapportent à une ligne de conduite et reposent sur des considérations d'intérêt public, tels des facteurs économiques, sociaux ou politiques, pourvu qu'elles ne soient ni irrationnelles ni prises de mauvaise foi. Cette approche concorde avec le message essentiel de la jurisprudence canadienne à cet égard, bien qu'elle fasse ressortir des caractéristiques positives des décisions de politique générale, au lieu de se fonder exclusivement sur le fait qu'elles ne sont pas de « nature opérationnelle ». Elle est aussi étayée par les réflexions faites dans la nouvelle jurisprudence canadienne et étrangère. Cela dit, elle n'est pas censée constituer un critère décisif. On peut s'attendre à ce que surviennent de temps à autre des situations délicates où il n'est pas facile de décider si le degré de « politique générale » en cause suffit à mettre une décision à l'abri de toute responsabilité pour négligence. Il serait illusoire de vouloir établir un critère absolu qui donnerait rapidement et infailliblement une réponse à l'égard de toute décision parmi la gamme infinie de celles que peuvent prendre les acteurs gouvernementaux. On pourra néanmoins facilement cerner la plupart des décisions gouvernementales qui représentent une ligne de conduite fondée sur une mise en balance de considérations économiques, sociales et politiques.

[91] L'application de l'approche exposée ci-dessus aux requêtes en radiation nous permet de conclure que, dans les cas où il est « évident et manifeste » qu'une décision contestée du gouvernement constitue une décision de politique générale, l'allégation peut à juste titre être radiée au motif qu'elle ne saurait fonder une action en responsabilité délictuelle. S'il n'est pas évident et manifeste qu'il s'agit d'une décision de politique générale, il faut permettre l'instruction de l'affaire.

(iv) Conclusion on the Policy Argument

[92] As discussed, the question is whether the alleged representations of Canada to the tobacco companies that low-tar cigarettes are less harmful to health are matters of policy, in the sense that they constitute a course or principle of action of the government. If so, the representations cannot ground an action in tort.

[93] The third-party notices plead that Canada made statements to the public (and to the tobacco companies) warning about the hazards of smoking, and asserting that low-tar cigarettes are less harmful than regular cigarettes; that the representations that low-tar cigarettes are less harmful to health were false; and that insofar as consumption caused extra harm to consumers for which the tobacco companies are held liable, Canada is required to indemnify the tobacco companies and/or contribute to their losses.

[94] The third-party notices implicitly accept that in making the alleged representations, Health Canada was acting out of concern for the health of Canadians, pursuant to its policy of encouraging smokers to switch to low-tar cigarettes. They assert, in effect, that Health Canada had a policy to warn the public about the hazardous effects of smoking, and to encourage healthier smoking habits among Canadians. The third-party claims rest on the allegation that Health Canada accepted that some smokers would continue to smoke despite the adverse health effects, and decided that these smokers should be encouraged to smoke lower-tar cigarettes.

[95] In short, the representations on which the third-party claims rely were part and parcel of a government policy to encourage people who continued to smoke to switch to low-tar cigarettes. This was a "true" or "core" policy, in the sense of a course or principle of action that the government

(iv) Conclusion sur l'argument relatif à la politique générale

[92] Comme je l'ai indiqué, il s'agit de savoir si les déclarations qu'aurait faites le Canada aux compagnies de tabac, selon lesquelles les cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron sont moins nuisibles pour la santé, sont des questions de politique générale, en ce sens qu'elles constituent une ligne de conduite du gouvernement. Dans l'affirmative, ces déclarations ne peuvent fonder une action en responsabilité délictuelle.

[93] On soutient dans les avis de mise en cause que le Canada a mis en garde la population (et les compagnies de tabac) contre les dangers de l'usage du tabac et a affirmé que les cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron sont moins nocives que les cigarettes ordinaires. On soutient aussi que ces déclarations étaient fausses et que, dans la mesure où l'usage du tabac a causé aux consommateurs un préjudice additionnel dont sont tenues responsables les compagnies de tabac, le Canada doit indemniser celles-ci ou éponger une partie de leurs pertes.

[94] Les avis de mise en cause concèdent implicitement que Santé Canada a fait les déclarations qu'on lui attribue par souci pour la santé des Canadiens et Canadiennes, conformément à sa politique d'inciter les fumeurs à opter pour des cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron. Ils mentionnent en fait que Santé Canada avait pour politique de mettre en garde la population contre les effets nocifs de l'usage du tabac, et d'encourager les Canadiens et Canadiennes à fumer plus sainement. Les demandes de mise en cause reposent sur l'allégation que Santé Canada s'est résigné à ce que certaines personnes continuent de fumer malgré les effets nuisibles de cette habitude sur leur santé, et a décidé qu'il convenait de les inciter à fumer des cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron.

[95] En bref, les déclarations sur lesquelles s'appuient les demandes de mise en cause faisaient partie intégrante d'une politique générale du gouvernement visant à inciter les personnes qui continuaient de fumer à opter pour des cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron. Il s'agissait d'une « véritable » adopted. The government's alleged course of action was adopted at the highest level in the Canadian government, and involved social and economic considerations. Canada, on the pleadings, developed this policy out of concern for the health of Canadians and the individual and institutional costs associated with tobacco-related disease. In my view, it is plain and obvious that the alleged representations were matters of government policy, with the result that the tobacco companies' claims against Canada for negligent misrepresentation must be struck out.

[96] Having concluded that the claims for negligent misrepresentation are not actionable because the alleged representations were matters of government policy, it is not necessary to canvas the other stage-two policy grounds that Canada raised against the third-party claims relating to negligent misrepresentation. However, since the argument about indeterminate liability was fully argued, I will briefly discuss it. In my view, it confirms that no liability in tort should be recognized for Canada's alleged misrepresentations.

(b) Indeterminate Liability

[97] Canada submits that allowing the defendants' claims in negligent misrepresentation would result in indeterminate liability, and must therefore be rejected. It submits that Canada had no control over the number of cigarettes being sold. It argues that in cases of economic loss, the courts must limit liability to cases where the third party had a means of controlling the extent of liability.

[98] The tobacco companies respond that Canada faces extensive, but not indeterminate liability.

politique générale ou d'une politique générale « fondamentale » au sens d'une ligne de conduite adoptée par le gouvernement. La ligne de conduite gouvernementale alléguée a été adoptée par les plus hautes instances du gouvernement canadien et mettait en jeu des considérations sociales et économiques. Selon les actes de procédure, le Canada a élaboré cette politique par souci pour la santé des Canadiens et Canadiennes et en raison des coûts individuels et institutionnels associés aux maladies causées par le tabac. Il m'apparaît évident et manifeste que les déclarations alléguées relevaient de la politique générale du gouvernement, de sorte que les allégations de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence qu'ont formulées les compagnies de tabac à l'encontre du Canada doivent être radiées.

[96] Vu ma conclusion que les allégations de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence ne peuvent fonder une action parce que les déclarations alléguées relevaient de la politique générale du gouvernement, point n'est besoin de passer en revue les autres motifs de politique générale — liés à la deuxième étape de l'analyse — qu'a invoqués le Canada à l'encontre des demandes de mise en cause pour déclarations inexactes faites par négligence. Mais, comme l'argument relatif à la responsabilité indéterminée a été débattu à fond, je vais l'analyser brièvement. À mon avis, cet argument confirme que la responsabilité délictuelle du Canada ne doit pas être reconnue à l'égard des déclarations inexactes qu'il aurait faites.

b) Responsabilité indéterminée

[97] Le Canada soutient que, si l'on accepte les allégations des défenderesses en matière de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence, cela entraînerait une responsabilité indéterminée de sa part, et qu'il faut donc les rejeter. Le Canada affirme que le nombre de cigarettes vendues était indépendant de sa volonté. En outre, dans les cas de perte financière, les tribunaux ne doivent conclure à la responsabilité du mis en cause que lorsque celui-ci est à même d'en contrôler la portée.

[98] Les compagnies de tabac répondent que la responsabilité à laquelle s'expose le Canada est

2011 SCC 42 (CanLII)

They submit that the scope of Canada's liability to tobacco companies is circumscribed by the tort of negligent misrepresentation. Canada would only be liable to the smokers of light cigarettes and to the tobacco companies.

[99] I agree with Canada that the prospect of indeterminate liability is fatal to the tobacco companies' claims of negligent misrepresentation. Insofar as the claims are based on representations to consumers, Canada had no control over the number of people who smoked light cigarettes. This situation is analogous to Cooper, where this Court held that it would have declined to apply a duty of care to the Registrar of Mortgage Brokers in respect of economic losses suffered by investors because "[t]he Act itself imposes no limit and the Registrar has no means of controlling the number of investors or the amount of money invested in the mortgage brokerage system" (para. 54). While this statement was made in obiter, the argument is persuasive.

[100] The risk of indeterminate liability is enhanced by the fact that the claims are for pure economic loss. In Design Services Ltd. v. Canada, 2008 SCC 22, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 737, the Court, per Rothstein J., held that "in cases of pure economic loss, to paraphrase Cardozo C.J., care must be taken to find that a duty is recognized only in cases where the class of plaintiffs, the time and the amounts are determinate" (para. 62). If Canada owed a duty of care to consumers of light cigarettes, the potential class of plaintiffs and the amount of liability would be indeterminate.

[101] Insofar as the claims are based on representations to the tobacco companies, they are at first blush more circumscribed. However, this distinction breaks down on analysis. Recognizing a duty of care for representations to the tobacco considérable, mais non indéterminée. Selon les compagnies de tabac, la responsabilité du Canada envers elles se limite au délit de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence. Le Canada ne serait responsable qu'envers les fumeurs de cigarettes légères et les compagnies de tabac.

[99] Je suis d'accord avec le Canada pour dire que la possibilité d'une responsabilité indéterminée porte un coup fatal aux allégations des compagnies de tabac relatives aux déclarations inexactes faites par négligence. Dans la mesure où les allégations reposent sur des déclarations faites aux consommateurs, le Canada n'exerçait aucun contrôle sur le nombre de fumeurs de cigarettes légères. Cette situation est analogue à celle dans l'arrêt Cooper dans lequel notre Cour a affirmé qu'elle aurait refusé d'attribuer au registrateur des courtiers en hypothèques une obligation de diligence à l'égard des pertes financières subies par les investisseurs, parce que « [l]a Loi elle-même n'impose aucune limite au nombre des investisseurs et aux montants d'argent investis dans le système de courtage en hypothèques, et le registrateur ne dispose d'aucun moyen pour les contrôler » (par. 54). Cette affirmation constituait une remarque incidente, mais il s'agit d'un argument convaincant.

[101] Dans la mesure où les allégations reposent sur des déclarations faites aux compagnies de tabac, elles semblent plus limitées à première vue. Cette distinction ne résiste toutefois pas à l'analyse. Si l'on reconnaissait une obligation de diligence à companies would effectively amount to a duty to consumers, since the quantum of damages owed to the companies in both cases would depend on the number of smokers and the number of cigarettes sold. This is a flow-through claim of negligent misrepresentation, where the tobacco companies are passing along their potential liability to consumers and to the province of British Columbia. In my view, in both cases, these claims should fail because Canada was not in control of the extent of its potential liability.

(c) Summary on Stage-Two Policy Arguments

[102] In my view, this Court should strike the negligent misrepresentation claims in both cases as a result of stage-two policy concerns about interfering with government policy decisions and the prospect of indeterminate liability.

D. Failure to Warn

[103] The tobacco companies make two allegations of failure to warn: B.A.T. alleges that Canada directed the tobacco companies not to provide warnings on cigarette packages (the labelling claim) about the health hazards of cigarettes; and Imperial alleges that Canada failed to warn the tobacco companies about the dangers posed by the strains of tobacco designed and licensed by Canada.

(1) Labelling Claim

[104] B.A.T. alleges that by instructing the industry to not put warning labels on their cigarettes, Canada is liable in tort for failure to warn. In the Knight case, Tysoe J.A. did not address the failure l'égard des déclarations faites aux compagnies de tabac, cela reviendrait effectivement à reconnaître une obligation envers les consommateurs, vu que le montant des dommages-intérêts dus aux compagnies de tabac dans les deux cas dépendrait du nombre de fumeurs et du nombre de cigarettes vendues. Il s'agit d'allégations de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence par lesquelles les compagnies de tabac détournent leur responsabilité potentielle vers les consommateurs et la province de la Colombie-Britannique. À mon avis, il faut rejeter ces allégations dans les deux cas, parce que le Canada n'avait aucune prise sur l'ampleur de sa responsabilité potentielle.

c) Résumé quant aux arguments de politique générale soulevés à la deuxième étape de l'analyse

D. Le défaut de mise en garde

[103] Les compagnies de tabac formulent deux allégations au sujet du défaut de mise en garde : B.A.T. prétend que le Canada a interdit aux compagnies de tabac d'apposer sur les paquets de cigarettes des mises en garde (l'allégation relative à l'étiquetage) à l'égard des dangers que présentent les cigarettes pour la santé; Imperial, quant à elle, prétend que le Canada a fait défaut de mettre les compagnies de tabac en garde contre les dangers que présentent les souches de tabac conçues par le Canada et pour lesquelles il a octroyé des licences.

(1) L'allégation relative à l'étiquetage

[104] B.A.T. allègue que, en donnant à l'industrie la directive de ne pas apposer de mise en garde sur ses paquets de cigarettes, le Canada a engagé sa responsabilité délictuelle pour défaut de mise en to warn claims. Hall J.A., writing for the minority, would have struck those claims on stage-two grounds, finding that Canada's decision was a policy decision and that liability would be indeterminate. Hall J.A. also held that liability would conflict with the government's public duties (para. 99). In the Costs Recovery case, Tysoe J.A. adopted Hall J.A.'s analysis from the Knight case in rejecting the failure to warn claim as between Canada and the tobacco companies (para. 89). B.A.T. challenges these findings.

garde. Dans l'Affaire Knight, le juge Tysoe n'a pas abordé les allégations relatives au défaut de mise en garde. Pour sa part, le juge Hall, exprimant l'opinion de la minorité, aurait rejeté ces allégations pour des motifs liés à l'étape deux de l'analyse, estimant que la décision du Canada était une décision de politique générale et que la responsabilité du Canada serait indéterminée. Il a aussi conclu qu'imposer cette responsabilité au gouvernement irait à l'encontre des obligations du Canada envers la population (par. 99). Dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, le juge Tysoe a souscrit à l'analyse faite par le juge Hall dans l'Affaire Knight en rejetant l'allégation relative au défaut du Canada de mettre en garde les compagnies de tabac (par. 89). B.A.T. conteste ces conclusions.

[105] The crux of this failure to warn claim is essentially the same as the negligent misrepresentation claim, and should be rejected for the same policy reasons. The Minister of Health's recommendations on warning labels were integral to the government's policy of encouraging smokers to switch to low-tar cigarettes. As such, they cannot ground a claim in failure to warn.

[105] L'élément crucial de cette allégation relative au défaut de mise en garde est essentiellement le même que celui des allégations de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence, et il y a lieu de la rejeter pour les mêmes considérations de politique générale. Les recommandations du ministre de la Santé sur les mises en garde faisaient partie intégrante de la politique générale du gouvernement visant à inciter les fumeurs à opter pour des cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron. En tant que telles, elles ne peuvent fonder une action pour défaut de mise en garde.

(2) Failure to Warn Imperial About Health Hazards

(2) Le défaut de mettre Imperial en garde contre les dangers pour la santé

[106] The Court of Appeal, per Tysoe J.A., held that the third-party notices did not sufficiently plead that Canada failed to warn the industry about the health hazards of its strains of tobacco. Imperial argues that this was in error, because the elements of a failure to warn claim are identical to the elements of the negligence claim, which was sufficiently pleaded.

[106] S'exprimant au nom de la Cour d'appel, le juge Tysoe a conclu que l'on n'avait pas suffisamment plaidé, dans les avis de mise en cause, que le Canada avait fait défaut de mettre l'industrie en garde contre les dangers pour la santé que présentaient ses souches de tabac. Imperial prétend que cette conclusion était erronée, car les éléments de l'allégation de défaut de mise en garde sont identiques à ceux de l'allégation de négligence qui, elle, avait suffisamment été plaidée.

[107] Canada points out that the two paragraphs of the third-party notices that discuss failure to warn only mention the claims that relate to labels, and not the claim that Canada failed to warn Imperial about potential health hazards of the tobacco strains. Canada also argues that to support a claim of failure to warn, the plaintiff must not only show that the defendant acted negligently, but that the defendant was also under a positive duty to act. It submits that nothing in the third-party notices suggests that Canada was under such a positive duty here.

[107] Le Canada souligne que les deux paragraphes des avis de mise en cause où il est question du défaut de mise en garde ne font allusion qu'aux allégations concernant l'étiquetage, et non à l'allégation

[108] I agree with Canada that the tort of failure to warn requires evidence of a positive duty towards the plaintiff. Positive duties in tort law are the exception rather than the rule. In Childs v. Desormeaux, the Court held:

> Although there is no doubt that an omission may be negligent, as a general principle, the common law is a jealous guardian of individual autonomy. Duties to take positive action in the face of risk or danger are not free-standing. Generally, the mere fact that a person faces danger, or has become a danger to others, does not itself impose any kind of duty on those in a position to become involved. [para. 31]

Moreover, none of the authorities cited by Imperial support the proposition that a plea of negligence, without more, will suffice to raise a duty to warn: Day v. Central Okanagan (Regional District), 2000 BCSC 1134, 79 B.C.L.R. (3d) 36, per Drossos J.; see also Elias v. Headache and Pain Management Clinic, 2008 CanLII 53133 (Ont. S.C.J.), per Macdonald J. (paras. 6 to 9).

[109] Even if pleading negligence were viewed as sufficient to raise a claim of duty to warn, which I do not accept, the claim would fail for the stage-two policy reasons applicable to the negligent misrepresentation claim.

E. Negligent Design

[110] The tobacco companies have brought two types of negligent design claims against Canada que le Canada a fait défaut de mettre Imperial en garde contre les dangers possibles pour la santé que présentaient les souches de tabac. Le Canada soutient également que pour étayer une allégation de défaut de mise en garde, le demandeur doit non seulement démontrer que le défendeur a fait preuve de négligence, mais aussi que celui-ci avait l'obligation positive d'agir. Toujours selon le Canada, les avis de mise en cause ne donnent aucunement matière à croire qu'il avait une telle obligation en l'espèce.

[108] Je conviens avec le Canada que le délit de défaut de mise en garde requiert la preuve d'une obligation positive envers le demandeur. En droit des délits, les obligations positives constituent l'exception et non la règle. Dans Childs c. Desormeaux, la Cour a affirmé ce qui suit :

> Bien qu'il ne fasse aucun doute qu'une omission peut emporter négligence, la common law, en règle générale, est une fervente protectrice de l'autonomie individuelle. L'obligation de prendre des mesures concrètes face à un risque ou à un danger n'est pas une obligation distincte. Généralement, le simple fait qu'une personne court un danger ou constitue un danger pour autrui n'impose pas en soi une quelconque obligation aux personnes susceptibles d'intervenir. [par. 31]

Qui plus est, aucune des décisions citées par Imperial n'étaye l'argument qu'une allégation de négligence, sans plus, est suffisante pour imposer une obligation de mise en garde : Day c. Central Okanagan (Regional District), 2000 BCSC 1134, 79 B.C.L.R. (3d) 36, le juge Drossos; voir aussi Elias c. Headache and Pain Management Clinic, 2008 CanLII 53133 (C.S.J. Ont.), le juge Macdonald (par. 6 à 9).

[109] Même si l'on considérait qu'il suffit de plaider la négligence pour formuler une allégation d'obligation de mise en garde, ce que je ne puis accepter, l'allégation serait rejetée pour les considérations de politique générale liées à la deuxième étape de l'analyse et qui s'appliquent à l'allégation de déclaration inexacte faite par négligence.

E. La conception négligente

[110] Les compagnies de tabac ont soulevé à l'encontre du Canada deux types d'allégations that remain to be considered. First, they submit that Canada breached its duty of care to the tobacco companies when it negligently designed its strains of low-tar tobacco. The Court of Appeal held that the pleadings supported a prima facie duty of care in this respect, but held that the duty was negated by the stage-two policy concern of indeterminate liability. Second, Imperial submits that Canada breached its duty of care to the consumers of light and mild cigarettes in the Knight case. A majority of the Court of Appeal held that this claim should proceed to trial.

[111] In my view, both remaining negligent design claims establish a prima facie duty of care, but fail at the second stage of the analysis because they relate to core government policy decisions.

(1) Prima Facie Duty of Care

[112] I begin with the claim that Canada owed a prima facie duty of care to the tobacco companies. Canada submits that there was no prima facie duty of care since there is no proximity between Canada and the tobacco companies, relying on the same arguments that it raises in the negligent misrepresentations claims.

[113] In my view, the Court of Appeal correctly concluded that Canada owed a prima facie duty of care towards the tobacco companies with respect to its design of low-tar tobacco strains. I agree with Tysoe J.A. that the alleged relationship in this case meets the requirements for proximity:

If sufficient proximity exists in the relationship between a designer of a product and a purchaser of the product, it would seem to me to follow that there is sufficient proximity in the relationship between the designer of a product and a manufacturer who uses the product in goods sold to the public. Also, the designer of the de conception négligente qu'il reste à examiner. Premièrement, elles affirment que le Canada a manqué à son obligation de diligence envers elles en concevant de manière négligente ses souches de tabac à faible teneur en goudron. La Cour d'appel a jugé que les actes de procédure appuyaient une obligation de diligence prima facie à cet égard, mais que cette obligation était écartée par la considération de politique générale liée à la responsabilité indéterminée, soulevée à la deuxième étape de l'analyse. Deuxièmement, Imperial fait valoir que le Canada a manqué à son obligation de diligence envers les consommateurs de cigarettes légères et douces dans l'Affaire Knight. La Cour d'appel a conclu à la majorité que cette allégation est matière à procès.

[111] J'estime que ces deux allégations de conception négligente établissent l'existence d'une obligation de diligence prima facie, mais doivent être rejetées à la deuxième étape de l'analyse parce qu'elles ont trait à des décisions de politique générale fondamentale du gouvernement.

(1) Obligation de diligence prima facie

[112] Je commence par l'allégation que le Canada avait une obligation de diligence prima facie envers les compagnies de tabac. Se fondant sur les mêmes arguments qu'il avance à l'encontre des allégations de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence, le Canada affirme ne pas avoir d'obligation de cette nature, parce qu'il n'existe pas de lien de proximité entre lui et les compagnies de tabac.

[113] À mon sens, la Cour d'appel a conclu avec raison que le Canada avait une obligation de diligence prima facie envers les compagnies de tabac relativement à la conception des souches de tabac à faible teneur en goudron. Je suis d'accord avec le juge Tysoe pour dire que les rapports invoqués en l'espèce répondent aux conditions de proximité :

[TRADUCTION] Si les rapports entre le concepteur et l'acheteur d'un produit sont suffisamment étroits, il s'ensuit, à mon avis, qu'il existe un lien suffisamment étroit entre le concepteur d'un produit et celui qui s'en sert pour fabriquer des biens vendus au public. En outre, dans le contexte de la présente affaire, le concepteur du product ought reasonably to have the manufacturer in contemplation as a person who would be affected by its design in the context of the present case. It would have been reasonably foreseeable to the designer of the product that a manufacturer of goods incorporating the product could be required to refund the purchase price paid by consumers if the design of the product did not accomplish that which it was intended to accomplish. [Knight case, para. 67]

[114] The allegation is that Canada was acting like a private company conducting business, and conducted itself toward the tobacco companies in a way that established proximity. The proximity alleged is not based on a statutory duty, but on interactions between Canada and the tobacco companies. Canada's argument that a duty of care would result in conflicting private and public duties does not negate proximity arising from conduct, although it may be a relevant stage-two policy consideration.

[115] For similar reasons, I conclude that on the facts pleaded, Canada owed a prima facie duty of care to the consumers of light and mild cigarettes in the Knight case. On the facts pleaded, it is at least arguable that Canada was acting in a commercial capacity when it designed its strains of tobacco. As Tysoe J.A. held in the court below, "a person who designs a product intended for sale to the public owes a prima facie duty of care to the purchasers of the product" (para. 48).

(2) Stage-Two Policy Considerations

[116] For the reasons given in relation to the negligent misrepresentation claim, I am of the view that stage-two policy considerations negate this prima facie duty of care for the claims of negligent design. The decision to develop low-tar strains of tobacco on the belief that the resulting cigarettes would be less harmful to health is a decision that constitutes a course or principle of action based on Canada's health policy. It was a decision based on produit devrait raisonnablement s'attendre à ce que sa conception ait une incidence sur le fabricant. Le concepteur pouvait raisonnablement prévoir qu'un fabricant de biens auxquels le produit est intégré serait tenu de rembourser le prix d'achat payé par des consommateurs si la conception du produit n'atteignait pas l'objectif qu'elle était censée atteindre. [L'Affaire Knight, par. 67]

[114] On allègue que le Canada se comportait comme une société commerciale privée et entretenait des rapports étroits avec les compagnies de tabac. Le prétendu lien de proximité se fonde non pas sur une obligation prévue par la loi, mais sur les rapports entre le Canada et les compagnies de tabac. L'argument du Canada selon lequel une obligation de diligence donnerait lieu à un conflit entre des obligations de droit privé et des obligations de droit public n'écarte pas la possibilité qu'un lien de proximité découle de sa conduite, mais il peut constituer une considération de politique générale pertinente à la deuxième étape de l'analyse.

[115] Pour des motifs semblables et compte tenu des faits allégués, je conclus que le Canada avait une obligation de diligence prima facie envers les consommateurs de cigarettes légères et douces dans l'Affaire Knight. Vu ces faits, il est au moins possible de soutenir que le Canada agissait comme une entreprise commerciale lorsqu'il a conçu ses souches de tabac. Comme l'a affirmé le juge Tysoe de la Cour d'appel, [TRADUCTION] « le concepteur d'un produit destiné à être vendu au public a une obligation de diligence prima facie envers ceux et celles qui achètent ce produit » (par. 48).

(2) Considérations de politique générale soulevées à la deuxième étape de l'analyse

[116] Pour les motifs fournis à l'égard des allégations de déclarations inexactes faites par négligence, j'estime que les considérations de politique générale qui entrent en jeu à la deuxième étape de l'analyse écartent l'obligation de diligence prima facie à l'égard des allégations de conception négligente. La décision de concevoir des souches de tabac à faible teneur en goudron parce qu'on croit que les cigarettes fabriquées avec ce tabac seraient social and economic factors. As a core government policy decision, it cannot ground a claim for negligent design. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider the argument of indeterminate liability also raised as a stage-two policy objection to the claim of negligent design.

moins nuisibles pour la santé constitue une ligne de conduite fondée sur la politique générale du Canada en matière de santé. Il s'agissait d'une décision reposant sur des facteurs sociaux et économiques. Cette décision de politique générale fondamentale du gouvernement ne saurait fonder une poursuite pour conception négligente. Vu cette conclusion, point n'est besoin d'examiner l'argument relatif à la responsabilité indéterminée, opposé lui aussi à l'allégation de conception négligente en tant que considération de politique générale à la deuxième étape de l'analyse.

F. The Direct Claims Under the Costs Recovery Acts

[117] The tobacco companies submit that the Court of Appeal erred when it held that it was plain and obvious that Canada could not qualify as a manufacturer under the CRA. They also present three alternative arguments: (1) that if Canada is not liable under the Act, it is liable under the recently adopted Health Care Costs Recovery Act, S.B.C. 2008, c. 27 ("HCCRA"); (2) that if Canada is not liable under either the CRA or the HCCRA, it is nonetheless liable to the defendants for contribution under the Negligence Act; and (3) that in the further alternative, Canada could be liable for contribution under the common law (joint factum of Rothmans, Benson & Hedges ("RBH") and Philip Morris only).

[118] Section 2 of the CRA establishes that "[t]he government has a direct and distinct action against a manufacturer to recover the cost of health care benefits caused or contributed to by a tobacco related wrong". The words "manufacture" and "manufacturer" are defined in s. 1(1) of the Act as follows:

1 (1) . . .

"manufacture" includes, for a tobacco product, the production, assembly or packaging of the tobacco product;

F. Les allégations directes faites en vertu des lois sur le recouvrement des coûts

[117] Selon les compagnies de tabac, la Cour d'appel a conclu à tort qu'il était manifeste et évident que le Canada ne pouvait pas être un fabricant au sens de la CRA. Elles présentent également trois arguments subsidiaires : (1) si la responsabilité du Canada n'est pas engagée en application de la CRA, elle l'est aux termes de la Health Care Costs Recovery Act, S.B.C. 2008, ch. 27 (« HCCRA »), récemment édictée; (2) si la responsabilité du Canada n'est pas engagée aux termes de l'une de ces deux lois, il est néanmoins tenu de verser aux défenderesses une contribution aux termes de la Negligence Act; et (3) enfin, le Canada peut être tenu en common law de verser une contribution (mémoire conjoint de Rothmans, Benson & Hedges (« RBH ») et de Philip Morris seulement).

[118] Aux termes de l'art. 2 de la CRA, [TRADUCTION] « [l]e gouvernement a contre un fabricant un droit d'action direct et distinct pour le recouvrement du coût des services de soins de santé occasionnés ou favorisés par une faute du fabricant ». Les termes « fabrication » et « fabricant » sont définis comme suit à l'art. 1(1) de la CRA :

1 (1) . . .

« fabricant » Personne qui fabrique ou a fabriqué un produit du tabac, y compris la personne qui, selon le cas :

2011 SCC 42 (CanLII)

"manufacturer" means a person who manufactures or has manufactured a tobacco product and includes a person who currently or in the past

(a) causes, directly or indirectly, through arrangements with contractors, subcontractors, licensees, franchisees or others, the manufacture of a tobacco product,

(b) for any fiscal year of the person, derives at least 10% of revenues, determined on a consolidated basis in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles in Canada, from the manufacture or promotion of tobacco products by that person or by other persons,

(c) engages in, or causes, directly or indirectly, other persons to engage in the promotion of a tobacco product, or

(d) is a trade association primarily engaged in

(i) the advancement of the interests of manufacturers,

(ii) the promotion of a tobacco product, or

(iii) causing, directly or indirectly, other persons to engage in the promotion of a tobacco product;

The third-party notices allege that Canada grew (manufactured) tobacco and licensed it to the tobacco industry for a profit, and that Canada "promoted" the use of mild or light cigarettes to the industry and the public. These facts, they say, bring Canada within the definition of "manufacturer" of the CRA.

[119] Canada submits that it is not a manufacturer under the Act. In the alternative, it submits that it is immune from the operation of this provincial statute at common law and alternatively under the Constitution.

[120] For the reasons that follow, I conclude that Canada is not a manufacturer under the Act. Indeed,

a) directement ou indirectement, fait ou a fait fabriquer un produit du tabac dans le cadre d'ententes conclues avec des entrepreneurs, des sous-traitants, des titulaires de licence, des franchisés ou d'autres personnes;

b) au cours d'un de ses exercices, tire ou a tiré au moins 10 % de ses revenus, calculés sur une base consolidée conformément aux principes comptables généralement reconnus au Canada, de la fabrication ou de la promotion de produits du tabac par elle-même ou par d'autres personnes;

c) se livre ou s'est livrée à la promotion d'un produit du tabac ou fait ou a fait, directement ou indirectement, que d'autres personnes s'y livrent;

d) est une association commerciale se consacrant principalement :

(i) à l'avancement des intérêts des fabricants,

(ii) à la promotion d'un produit du tabac, ou

(iii) à faire faire, directement ou indirectement, la promotion par d'autres personnes d'un produit du tabac.

« fabrication » Est assimilé à la fabrication d'un produit du tabac sa production, son assemblage ou son empaquetage;

On allègue dans les avis de mise en cause que le Canada a cultivé (fabriqué) du tabac et octroyé des licences visant celui-ci à l'industrie du tabac à des fins lucratives, et qu'il a « fait la promotion » des cigarettes douces ou légères auprès de l'industrie et de la population. Selon les compagnies de tabac, ces faits font en sorte que le Canada répond à la définition de « fabricant » qui figure dans la CRA.

[119] Le Canada dit ne pas être un fabricant au sens de la CRA. Subsidiairement, il affirme être soustrait à l'application de cette loi provinciale en vertu de la common law et, sinon, en vertu de la Constitution.

[120] Pour les motifs exposés ci-après, je conclus que le Canada n'est pas un fabricant au sens de la holding Canada accountable under the CRA would defeat the legislature's intention of transferring the health-care costs resulting from tobacco related wrongs from taxpayers to the tobacco industry. This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider Canada's arguments that it would in any event be immune from liability under the provincial Act. I would also reject the tobacco companies' argument for contribution under the HCCRA and the Negligence Act, and the common law contribution argument.

(1) Could Canada Qualify as a Manufacturer Under the Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act?

[121] The Court of Appeal held that the definition of "manufacturer" could not apply to the Government of Canada. I agree. While the argument that Canada could qualify as a manufacturer under the CRA has superficial appeal, when the Act is read in context and all of its provisions are taken into account, it is apparent that the British Columbia legislature did not intend for Canada to be liable as a manufacturer. This is confirmed by the text of the statute, the intent of the legislature in adopting the Act, and the broader context of the relationship between the province and the federal government.

(a) Text of the Statute

[122] The definition of manufacturer in s. 1(1) "manufacturer" (b) of the Act includes a person who "for any fiscal year of the person, derives at least 10% of revenues, determined on a consolidated basis in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles in Canada, from the manufacture or promotion of tobacco products by that person or by other persons". Hall J.A. held that this definition indicated that the legislature intended the Act to apply to companies involved in the tobacco industry, and not to governments.

CRA. En effet, si l'on tenait le Canada responsable en application de la CRA, cela contrecarrerait l'intention de la législature de faire passer des contribuables à l'industrie du tabac la responsabilité des coûts des soins de santé résultant d'une « faute d'un fabricant ». Vu cette conclusion, nul n'est besoin d'étudier les arguments du Canada voulant qu'il soit en tout état de cause exonéré de toute responsabilité en vertu de la loi provinciale. Je suis également d'avis de rejeter l'argument des compagnies de tabac en faveur d'une contribution au titre de la HCCRA et de la Negligence Act, ainsi que l'argument en faveur d'une contribution en common law.

(1) Le Canada peut-il être un fabricant au sens de la Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act?

[121] La Cour d'appel a affirmé que le gouvernement canadien ne pouvait pas être visé par la définition de « fabricant ». Je suis du même avis. L'argument selon lequel le Canada peut être un fabricant au sens de la CRA a un attrait superficiel, mais, lorsqu'on interprète la CRA dans son contexte eu égard à l'ensemble de ses dispositions, il appert que la législature de la Colombie-Britannique ne voulait pas imposer au Canada la responsabilité d'un fabricant. C'est ce que confirment le texte de la loi, l'intention qu'avait le législateur au moment d'adopter la CRA et le contexte plus général des rapports entre la province et le gouvernement fédéral.

a) Le texte de la loi

[122] Aux termes de l'al. b) de la définition de [TRADUCTION] « fabricant » qui se trouve à l'art. 1(1) de la CRA, ce terme s'entend d'une personne qui, « au cours d'un de ses exercices, tire ou a tiré au moins 10 % de ses revenus, calculés sur une base consolidée conformément aux principes comptables généralement reconnus au Canada, de la fabrication ou de la promotion de produits du tabac par elle-même ou par d'autres personnes ». Le juge Hall a conclu que, selon cette définition, le législateur souhaitait que la CRA s'applique aux compagnies membres de l'industrie du tabac, et non aux gouvernements.

[123] The tobacco companies respond that the definition of "manufacturer" is disjunctive since it uses the word "or", such that an individual will qualify as a manufacturer if it meets any of the four definitions in (a) to (d). Even if Canada is incapable of meeting the definition in (b) of the Act (deriving 10% of its revenues from the manufacture or promotion of tobacco products), Canada qualifies under subparagraphs (a) (causing the manufacture of tobacco products) and (c) (engaging in or causing others to engage in the promotion of tobacco products) on the facts pled, they argue.

[124] Like the Court of Appeal, I would reject this argument. It is true that s. 1 must be read disjunctively, and that an individual will qualify as a manufacturer if it meets any of the four definitions in (a) to (d). However, the Act must nevertheless be read purposively and as a whole. A proper reading of the Act will therefore take each of the four definitions into account. It will also consider the rest of the statutory scheme, and the legislative context. When the Act is read in this way, it is clear that the B.C. legislature did not intend to include the federal government as a potential manufacturer under the CRA.

[125] The fact that one of the statutory definitions is based on revenue percentage suggests that the term "manufacturer" is meant to capture businesses or individuals who earn profit from tobacco-related activities. This interpretation is reinforced by the provisions of the Act that establish the liability of defendants. Section 3(3)(b) provides that "each defendant to which the presumptions [provided in s. 3(2) of the CRA] apply is liable for the proportion of the aggregate cost referred to in paragraph (a) equal to its market share in the type of tobacco product". This language cannot be stretched to include the Government of Canada.

[126] I conclude that the text of the CRA, read as a whole, does not support the view that Canada is a "manufacturer" under the Act.

[123] Les compagnies de tabac répondent que la définition du mot « manufacturer » (« fabricant ») est disjonctive, vu qu'elle renferme le mot « or » (habituellement rendu en français par l'expression « selon le cas »), de telle sorte qu'une personne sera considérée comme un fabricant si elle répond à l'une des quatre définitions qui figurent aux al. a) à d). Même si le Canada ne peut répondre à la définition de l'al. b) de la CRA (tirer 10 % de ses revenus de la fabrication ou de la promotion de produits du tabac), elles soutiennent que, à la lumière des faits allégués, le Canada répond aux définitions des al. a) (fait fabriquer un produit du tabac) et c) (fait ou fait faire la promotion d'un produit du tabac).

[124] À l'instar de la Cour d'appel, je suis d'avis de rejeter l'argument susmentionné. Il est vrai qu'il faut interpréter de façon disjonctive la définition de fabricant à l'article premier, et qu'un particulier sera assimilé à un fabricant s'il répond à l'une ou l'autre des quatre définitions des al. a) à d). Il faut néanmoins interpréter de manière téléologique la CRA dans son ensemble. Par conséquent, une interprétation adéquate de la CRA tient compte de chacune des quatre définitions. Elle prend aussi en considération le reste du régime législatif et le contexte législatif. Interprétée ainsi, la CRA indique clairement que la législature de la Colombie-Britannique ne voulait pas faire du gouvernement fédéral un fabricant potentiel au sens de cette loi.

[125] Le fait qu'une des définitions de la CRA repose sur un pourcentage des revenus donne à penser que le mot « fabricant » est censé viser des entreprises ou des particuliers qui tirent profit des activités liées au tabac. Les dispositions de la CRA établissant la responsabilité des défenderesses renforcent cette interprétation. Aux termes de l'al. 3(3)b), [TRADUCTION] « chaque défendeur auquel s'appliquent les présomptions [créées par le par. 3(2) de la CRA] est responsable du coût global visé à l'alinéa a) au prorata de sa part de marché du type de produit du tabac ». On ne saurait considérer cette disposition comme visant le gouvernement du Canada.

[126] J'estime que, interprété dans son ensemble, le texte de la CRA n'étaye pas la thèse selon laquelle le Canada est un « fabricant » au sens de cette loi.

2011 SCC 42 (CanLII)

(b) Legislative Intention

[127] I agree with Canada that considerations related to legislative intent further support the view that Canada does not fall within the definition of "manufacturer". When the CRA was introduced in the legislature, the Minister responsible stated that "the industry" manufactured a lethal product, and that "the industry" composed of "tobacco companies" should accordingly be held accountable (B.C. Official Report of Debates of the Legislative Assembly (Hansard), vol. 20, 4th Sess., 36th Parl., June 7, 2000, at p. 16314). It is plain and obvious that the Government of Canada would not fit into these categories.

[128] Imperial submits that it is improper to rely on excerpts from Hansard on an application to strike a pleading, since evidence is not admissible on such an application. However, a distinction lies between evidence that is introduced to prove a point of fact and evidence of legislative intent that is provided to assist the court in discerning the proper interpretation of a statute. The former is not relevant on an application to strike; the latter may be. Applications to strike are intended to economize judicial resources in cases where on the facts pled, the law does not support the plaintiff's claim. Courts may consider all evidence relevant to statutory interpretation in order to achieve this purpose.

(c) Broader Context

[129] The broader context of the statute strongly supports the conclusion that the British Columbia legislature did not intend the federal government to be liable as a manufacturer of tobacco products. The object of the Act is to recover the cost of providing health care to British Columbians from the companies that sold them tobacco products. As held by this Court in British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 473:

b) L'intention du législateur

[127] Je suis d'accord avec le Canada pour dire que les considérations liées à l'intention du législateur appuient davantage la thèse voulant que la définition de [TRADUCTION] « fabricant » ne vise pas le Canada. Quand la CRA a été présentée à l'assemblée législative, le ministre responsable a affirmé que [TRADUCTION] « l'industrie » fabriquait un produit mortel, et que les « compagnies de tabac » qui en faisaient partie devraient en être tenues responsables pour cette raison (C.-B., Official Report of Debates of the Legislative Assembly (Hansard), vol. 20, 4e sess., 36e lég., 7 juin 2000, p. 16314). Il est évident et manifeste que le gouvernement du Canada n'appartient pas à cette catégorie.

[128] Selon Imperial, il ne convient pas d'invoquer des extraits du Hansard dans le cadre d'une requête en radiation d'une allégation, étant donné que des éléments de preuve ne peuvent être présentés à l'occasion d'une telle demande. Il y a toutefois une distinction entre une preuve produite pour établir un fait et une preuve de l'intention du législateur qui est produite pour aider la cour à déterminer l'interprétation que doit recevoir une loi. La première n'est pas pertinente dans le cadre d'une requête en radiation, mais la seconde peut l'être. Les requêtes en radiation visent à économiser les ressources judiciaires dans les cas où la loi n'appuie pas une demande compte tenu des faits allégués. Les tribunaux peuvent prendre en considération tous les éléments de preuve pertinents à l'interprétation de la loi pour arriver à cette fin.

c) Le contexte plus général

[129] Le contexte plus général de la loi étaye fortement la conclusion que la législature de la Colombie-Britannique n'avait pas l'intention d'imposer au gouvernement fédéral la responsabilité d'un fabricant de produits du tabac. La CRA a pour objet le recouvrement du coût des soins de santé fournis aux Britanno-Colombiens auprès des compagnies qui leur ont vendu des produits du tabac. Comme l'a affirmé notre Cour dans Colombie-Britannique c. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltée, 2005 CSC 49, [2005] 2 R.C.S. 473 :

2011 SCC 42 (CanLII)

[T]he driving force of the Act's cause of action is compensation for the government of British Columbia's health care costs, not remediation of tobacco manufacturers' breaches of duty. While the Act makes the existence of a breach of duty one of several necessary conditions to a manufacturer's liability to the government, it is not the mischief at which the cause of action created by the Act is aimed. [para. 40]

[L']élément déterminant de la cause d'action créée par la Loi demeure l'indemnisation des coûts engagés par le gouvernement de la Colombie-Britannique au titre des soins de santé, et non la correction des manquements aux obligations des fabricants de produits du tabac. La Loi fait de l'existence d'une violation d'une obligation une des diverses conditions préalables à l'établissement de la responsabilité du fabricant envers le gouvernement, mais ce n'est pas cette faute que vise la cause d'action créée par la Loi. [par. 40]

The legislature sought to transfer the medical costs from provincial taxpayers to the private sector that sold a harmful product. This object would be fundamentally undermined if the funds were simply recovered from the federal government, which draws its revenue from the same taxpayers.

La législature cherchait à transférer la responsabilité des frais médicaux des contribuables provinciaux aux entreprises privées qui vendaient un produit nocif. Cet objectif serait gravement compromis si l'on recouvrait simplement les fonds auprès du gouvernement fédéral, qui tire son revenu des mêmes contribuables.

[130] The tobacco companies' proposed application of the CRA to Canada is particularly problematic in light of the long-standing funding relationship between the federal and provincial governments with regards to health care. The federal government has been making health transfer payments to the provinces for decades. As held by Hall J.A.:

[130] L'assujettissement du Canada à la CRA que font valoir les compagnies de tabac est particulièrement problématique compte tenu des rapports de longue date entre le gouvernement fédéral et les provinces en matière de financement des soins de santé. Depuis des décennies, le gouvernement fédéral verse aux provinces des paiements de transfert relatifs à la santé. Comme l'a mentionné le juge Hall :

If the Costs Recovery Act were to be construed to permit the inclusion of Canada as a manufacturer targeted for the recovery of provincial health costs, this would permit a direct economic claim to be advanced against Canada by British Columbia to obtain further funding for health care costs. In light of these long-standing fiscal arrangements between governments, I cannot conceive that the legislature of British Columbia could ever have envisaged that Canada might be a target under the Costs Recovery Act. [para. 33]

[TRADUCTION] Si l'on interprétait la Costs Recovery Act comme permettant de qualifier le Canada de fabricant visé aux fins du recouvrement des coûts engagés par les provinces au titre des soins de santé, il serait possible pour la Colombie-Britannique d'exercer un recours pécuniaire direct contre le Canada en vue d'obtenir des fonds supplémentaires au titre des soins de santé. Étant donné ces accords fiscaux de longue date entre les gouvernements, je ne puis imaginer que la législature de la Colombie-Britannique ait pensé à quelque moment que ce soit à la possibilité que le Canada soit poursuivi en vertu de la Costs Recovery Act. [par. 33]

[131] Imperial argues that the only way to achieve the object of the CRA is to allow the province to recover from all those who participated in the tobacco industry, including the federal government. I disagree. Holding the federal government accountable under the Act would defeat the legislature's intention of transferring the cost of medical treatment from taxpayers to the tobacco industry.

[131] Imperial soutient que le seul moyen de réaliser l'objet de la CRA est d'autoriser la province à recouvrer le coût des soins de santé auprès de tous les participants à l'industrie du tabac, dont le gouvernement fédéral. Je ne puis retenir cet argument. Si l'on tenait le gouvernement fédéral responsable en vertu de la CRA, cela contrecarrerait l'intention du législateur de transférer le coût des traitements médicaux des contribuables à l'industrie du tabac.

2011 SCC 42 (CanLII)

(d) Summary

[132] For the foregoing reasons, I conclude that it is plain and obvious that the federal government does not qualify as a manufacturer of tobacco products under the CRA. This pleading must therefore be struck.

(2) Could Canada Be Found Liable Under the Health Care Costs Recovery Act?

[133] The tobacco companies submit that if Canada is not liable under the CRA, it would be liable under the HCCRA, which creates a cause of action for the province to recover health care costs generally from wrongdoers (s. 8(1)). Canada submits that the HCCRA is inapplicable because it provides that the cause of action does not apply to cases that qualify as "tobacco related wrong[s]" under the CRA (s. 24(3)(b)). RBH and Philip Morris respond that a "tobacco related wrong" under the CRA may only be committed by a "manufacturer". Consequently, if the CRA does not apply to Canada because it cannot qualify as a manufacturer, it is not open to Canada to argue that the more general HCCRA does not apply either.

[134] In my view, the tobacco companies cannot rely on the HCCRA in a CRA action for contribution. While it is true that Canada is incapable of committing a tobacco-related wrong itself if it is not a manufacturer, the underlying cause of action in this case is that it is the defendants who are alleged to have committed a tobacco-related wrong. The HCCRA specifies that it does not apply in cases "arising out of a tobacco related wrong as defined in the Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act" (s. 24(3)(b)). This precludes contribution claims arising out of that Act.

d) Résumé

[132] Pour les motifs qui précèdent, j'estime qu'il est manifeste et évident que le gouvernement fédéral n'est pas un fabricant de produits du tabac au sens de la CRA. Cette allégation doit donc être radiée.

(2) Le Canada peut-il être tenu responsable en vertu de la Health Care Costs Recovery Act?

[133] Les compagnies de tabac affirment que si la responsabilité du Canada n'est pas engagée au titre de la CRA, elle le serait en vertu de la HCCRA, qui confère à la province un droit d'action pour recouvrer auprès de l'auteur d'une faute le coût des soins de santé dans la plupart des cas (par. 8(1)). Selon le Canada, la HCCRA est inapplicable parce qu'elle dispose que le droit d'action ne peut être exercé dans les cas de [TRADUCTION] « faute d'un fabricant » au sens de la CRA (al. 24(3)b)). RBH et Philip Morris rétorquent qu'une [TRADUCTION] « faute d'un fabricant » au sens de la CRA ne peut être commise que par un [TRADUCTION] « fabricant ». Par conséquent, si la CRA ne s'applique pas au Canada parce que ce dernier ne peut être un fabricant, il n'est pas loisible au Canada de faire valoir que la HCCRA — une loi plus générale — ne trouve pas application non plus.

[134] À mon avis, les compagnies de tabac ne peuvent s'appuyer sur la HCCRA dans le cadre d'une action intentée en vertu de la CRA pour obtenir une contribution. Certes, le Canada n'est pas en mesure de commettre lui-même une faute d'un fabricant s'il n'est pas un fabricant, mais la cause d'action sous-jacente en l'espèce est la faute d'un fabricant qu'auraient commise les défenderesses. Il est précisé dans la HCCRA que cette loi ne s'applique pas dans les affaires [TRADUCTION] « découlant d'une faute d'un fabricant au sens de la Tobacco Damages and Health Care Costs Recovery Act » (al. 24(3)b)), ce qui fait obstacle aux demandes de contribution présentées en application de cette loi.

(3) Could Canada Be Liable for Contribution Under the Negligence Act if It Is Not Directly Liable to British Columbia?

[135] RBH and Philip Morris submit that even if Canada is not liable to British Columbia, it can still be held liable for contribution under the Negligence Act. They argue that direct liability to the plaintiff is not a requirement for being held liable in contribution.

[136] As noted above, I agree with Canada's submission that, following Giffels, a party can only be liable for contribution if it is also liable to the plaintiff directly.

[137] Accordingly, I would reject the argument that the Negligence Act in British Columbia allows recovery from a third party that could not be liable to the plaintiff.

(4) Could Canada Be Liable for Common Law Contribution?

[138] RBH and Philip Morris submit that if this Court rejects the contribution claim under the Negligence Act, it should allow a contribution claim under the common law. They rely on this Court's decisions in Bow Valley and Blackwater v. Plint, 2005 SCC 58, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 3, in which this Court recognized claims of contribution which were not permitted by statute.

[139] I would reject this argument. In my view, the cases cited by RBH and Philip Morris support common law contribution claims only if the third party is directly liable to the plaintiff. In Bow Valley, the Court recognized a limited right of contribution "between tortfeasors", and noted that the defendants were "jointly and severally liable to the plaintiff" (paras. 101 and 102). A similar point was made by this Court in Blackwater (per McLachlin C.J.), which stated that a "common law right of contribution between tortfeasors may exist" (para. 68

(3) Le Canada peut-il être tenu à une contribution en application de la Negligence Act s'il n'est pas directement responsable envers la Colombie-Britannique?

[135] RBH et Philip Morris affirment que, même si le Canada n'est pas responsable envers la Colombie-Britannique, il peut néanmoins être tenu à une contribution au titre de la Negligence Act. Elles font valoir que le défendeur n'a pas à être directement responsable envers le demandeur pour être condamné à verser une contribution.

[136] Comme je l'ai déjà mentionné, je souscris à l'argument du Canada que, depuis l'arrêt Giffels, une partie ne peut être condamnée à verser une contribution que si elle est aussi directement responsable envers le demandeur.

[137] Je suis donc d'avis de rejeter l'argument selon lequel la Negligence Act de la Colombie-Britannique permet de recouvrer des sommes d'argent auprès d'un tiers qui ne pouvait pas être responsable envers le demandeur.

(4) Le Canada peut-il être tenu en common law de verser une contribution?

[138] D'après RBH et Philip Morris, si notre Cour rejette la demande de contribution présentée en vertu de la Negligence Act, elle devrait faire droit à une telle demande en common law. Elles invoquent les arrêts Bow Valley et Blackwater c. Plint, 2005 CSC 58, [2005] 3 R.C.S. 3, où notre Cour a accueilli des demandes de contribution non permises par la loi.

[139] Je suis d'avis de rejeter cet argument. Les décisions citées par RBH et Philip Morris me semblent n'appuyer les demandes de contribution en common law que dans les cas où le tiers est directement responsable envers le demandeur. Dans Bow Valley, la Cour a reconnu un droit restreint à la contribution « entre coauteurs d'un délit », et a fait remarquer que les défenderesses étaient « solidairement responsables envers la demanderesse » (par. 101 et 102). Notre Cour a fait une observation semblable dans Blackwater (la juge en chef (emphasis added)). There is no support in our jurisprudence for allowing contribution claims in cases where the third party is not liable to the plaintiff.

McLachlin), affirmant que, « en common law, les coauteurs d'un délit pouvaient se réclamer mutuellement une contribution » (par. 68 (je souligne)). Rien dans notre jurisprudence ne permet d'accueillir des demandes de contribution en l'absence de responsabilité du tiers envers le demandeur.

G. Liability Under the Trade Practice Act and the Business Practices and Consumer Protection Act

G. Responsabilité en vertu de la Trade Practice Act et de la Business Practices and Consumer Protection Act

[140] In the Knight case, Imperial alleges that Canada satisfies the definition of a "supplier" under the Trade Practice Act ("TPA") and the Business Practices and Consumer Protection Act ("BPCPA"). The TPA was repealed and replaced by the BPCPA in 2004. Imperial argues that the Court of Appeal erred in striking its claim against Canada under these statutes.

[140] Dans l'Affaire Knight, Imperial prétend que le Canada répond aux définitions de « supplier » (« fournisseur ») qui figurent dans la Trade Practice Act (« TPA ») et la Business Practices and Consumer Protection Act (« BPCPA »). La TPA a été abrogée et remplacée par la BPCPA en 2004. Imperial fait valoir que la Cour d'appel a radié à tort la poursuite qu'elle avait intentée contre le Canada en vertu de ces lois.

[141] In my view, Canada could not qualify as a "supplier" under the Acts on the facts pled. Section 1 of the TPA defined "supplier" as follows:

[141] À mon avis, le Canada ne peut être un « fournisseur » au sens de ces deux lois compte tenu des faits allégués. L'article 1 de la TPA définissait ainsi le mot « fournisseur » :

1 . . .

"supplier" means a person, other than a consumer, who in the course of the person's business solicits, offers, advertises or promotes the disposition or supply of the subject of a consumer transaction or who engages in, enforces or otherwise participates in a consumer transaction, whether or not privity of contract exists between that person and the consumer, and includes the successor to, and assignee of, any rights or obligations of the supplier.

1 . . .

« fournisseur » Une personne autre qu'un consommateur qui, dans le cours de ses affaires, sollicite, offre ou annonce l'aliénation ou la fourniture de l'objet d'une opération commerciale ou se livre à des activités promotionnelles à cet égard, prend part à une opération commerciale, l'exécute ou y participe autrement, qu'il y ait ou non un lien contractuel entre cette personne et le consommateur. Sont également visés par la présente définition le successeur du fournisseur et le cessionnaire de ses droits et obligations.

Section 1(1) of the BPCPA defines "supplier" as follows:

Pour sa part, l'art. 1(1) de la BPCPA le définit ainsi :

[TRADUCTION]

1 (1) . . .

"supplier" means a person, whether in British Columbia or not, who in the course of business participates in a consumer transaction by

1 (1) . . .

« fournisseur » Une personne, se trouvant en Colombie-Britannique ou ailleurs qui, dans le cours de ses affaires, prend part à une opération commerciale

2011 SCC 42 (CanLII)

(a) supplying goods or services or real property to a consumer, or

(b) soliciting, offering, advertising or promoting with respect to a transaction referred to in paragraph (a) of the definition of "consumer transaction", whether or not privity of contract exists between that person and the consumer, and includes the successor to, and assignee of, any rights or obligations of that person and, except in Parts 3 to 5 [Rights of Assignees and Guarantors Respecting Consumer Credit; Consumer Contracts; Disclosure of the Cost of Consumer Credit], includes a person who solicits a consumer for a contribution of money or other property by the consumer;

a) soit en fournissant des biens ou des services à un consommateur,

b) soit en sollicitant, en offrant ou en annonçant l'opération visée à l'alinéa a) de la définition d'« opération commerciale » ou en se livrant à des activités promotionnelles à cet égard, qu'il y ait ou non un lien contractuel entre cette personne et le consommateur. Sont également visés par la présente définition le successeur de cette personne, le cessionnaire de ses droits et obligations et, sauf aux parties 3 à 5 [Droits des cessionnaires et garants en matière de crédit au consommateur; Contrats de consommation; Communication du coût du crédit au consommateur], la personne qui demande une somme d'argent ou un bien à un consommateur;

[142] The Court of Appeal unanimously held that neither definition could apply to Canada because its alleged actions were not undertaken "in the course of business". The court held that the pleadings allege that Canada promoted the use of mild or light cigarettes, but only in order to reduce the health risks of smoking, not in the course of a business carried on for the purpose of earning a profit (Knight case, para. 35).

[142] La Cour d'appel a jugé à l'unanimité qu'aucune de ces définitions ne pouvaient s'appliquer au Canada, parce que celui-ci n'a pas commis les actes qu'on lui reproche [TRADUCTION] « dans le cours de ses affaires ». Selon la Cour d'appel, il est allégué dans les actes de procédure que le Canada a encouragé la consommation de cigarettes douces et légères, mais uniquement dans le but de réduire les risques que présente l'usage du tabac pour la santé, et non dans le cadre d'une activité exercée en vue de réaliser un profit (l'Affaire Knight, par. 35).

[143] Imperial submits that it is not necessary for Canada to have been motivated by profit to qualify as a "supplier" under the Acts, provided it researched, designed and manufactured a defective product. Canada responds that its alleged purpose of improving the health of Canadians shows that it was not acting in the course of business. This was not a case where a public authority was itself operating in the private market as a business, but rather a case where a public authority sought to regulate the industry by promoting a type of cigarette.

[143] Imperial soutient que le Canada n'avait pas à être motivé par le profit pour être un « fournisseur » au sens des lois applicables, pourvu qu'il ait conçu et fabriqué un produit défectueux et fait des recherches à cet égard. Le Canada répond que son intention d'améliorer la santé des Canadiens et Canadiennes démontre qu'il n'agissait pas dans le cours de ses affaires. Il n'était pas question en l'espèce d'un organisme public exerçant les activités d'une entreprise du secteur privé, mais plutôt d'un organisme public qui cherche à réglementer l'industrie en faisant la promotion d'un type de cigarette.

[144] I accept that Canada's purpose for developing and promoting tobacco as described in the third-party notice suggests that it was not acting "in the course of business" or "in the course of the person's business" as those phrases are used in

[144] Je reconnais que le but recherché par le Canada lorsqu'il a développé et promu le tabac, comme l'indique l'avis de mise en cause, tend à indiquer que le Canada n'agissait pas [TRADUCTION] « dans le cours de ses affaires », dans le sens où the TPA or the BPCPA, and therefore that Canada could not be a "supplier" under either of those statutes. The phrases "in the course of business" and "in the course of the person's business" may have different meanings, depending of the context. On the one hand, they can be read as including all activities that an individual undertakes in his or her professional life: e.g., see discussion of the indicia of reasonable reliance above. On the other, they can be understood as limited to activities undertaken for a commercial purpose. In my view, the contexts in which the phrases are used in the TPA and the BPCPA support the latter interpretation. The definitions of "supplier" in both Acts refer to "consumer transaction[s]", and contrast suppliers, who must have a commercial purpose, with consumers. It is plain and obvious from the facts pleaded that Canada did not promote the use of low-tar cigarettes for a commercial purpose, but for a health purpose. Canada is therefore not a supplier under the TPA or the BPCPA, and the contribution claim based on this ground and the Negligence Act should be struck.

cette expression est employée dans la TPA ou la BPCPA, et que le Canada ne peut donc être un « fournisseur » au sens de l'une ou l'autre de ces lois. L'expression [TRADUCTION] « dans le cours de ses affaires » peut avoir des significations différentes selon le contexte. D'une part, il est possible de considérer qu'elle englobe toutes les activités auxquelles se livre un particulier durant sa carrière professionnelle : voir notamment l'analyse ci-dessus des indices de confiance raisonnable. D'autre part, elle peut être interprétée comme visant seulement les activités exercées à une fin commerciale. J'estime que les contextes dans lesquels cette expression est employée dans la TPA et la BPCPA appuient la deuxième interprétation. Les définitions de [TRADUCTION] « fournisseur » figurant dans les deux lois renvoient à des [TRADUCTION] « opérations commerciales » et font la distinction entre les fournisseurs — qui poursuivent une fin commerciale — et les consommateurs. Il ressort de façon évidente et manifeste des faits allégués que le Canada a promu la consommation de cigarettes à faible teneur en goudron non pas à une fin commerciale, mais à une fin liée à la santé. Le Canada n'est donc pas un fournisseur au sens de la TPA ou de la BPCPA, et la demande de contribution fondée sur ce motif et sur la Negligence Act doit être radiée.

[145] Having concluded that Canada is not liable under the TPA and the BPCPA, it is unnecessary to consider whether, if it were, Canada would be protected by Crown immunity.

[145] Vu ma conclusion que la responsabilité du Canada n'est pas engagée en application de la TPA ou de la BPCPA, point n'est besoin de déterminer si le Canada serait, dans l'affirmative, protégé par l'immunité de l'État.

H. The Claim for Equitable Indemnity

H. La demande d'indemnité fondée sur l'equity

[146] RBH and Philip Morris submit that if the tobacco companies are found liable in the Costs Recovery case, Canada is liable for "equitable indemnity" on the facts pleaded. They submit that whenever a person requests or directs another person to do something that causes the other to incur liability, the requesting or directing person is liable to indemnify the other for its liability. Imperial adopts this argument in the Knight case.

[146] RBH et Philip Morris soutiennent que, si les compagnies de tabac sont tenues responsables dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, le Canada doit verser une [TRADUCTION] « indemnité en equity » compte tenu des faits allégués. Selon elles, chaque fois qu'une personne demande ou ordonne à une autre de faire quelque chose qui engage la responsabilité de cette dernière, la personne qui demande ou ordonne de faire cette chose est tenue d'indemniser l'autre pour sa responsabilité. C'est ce que fait valoir Imperial dans l'Affaire Knight.

[147] Equitable indemnity is a narrow doctrine, confined to situations of an express or implied understanding that a principal will indemnify its agent for acting on the directions given. As stated in Parmley v. Parmley, [1945] S.C.R. 635, claims of equitable indemnity "proceed upon the notion of a request which one person makes under circumstances from which the law implies that both parties understand that the person who acts upon the request is to be indemnified if he does so" (p. 648, quoting Bowen L.J. in Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North Western Railway Co. (1886), 34 Ch. D. 261, at p. 275.

[147] La doctrine de l'indemnité fondée sur l'equity est une doctrine restreinte qui ne s'applique que dans les cas où le mandant s'engage expressément ou implicitement à indemniser son mandataire pour avoir agi conformément à ses directives. Comme le mentionne l'arrêt Parmley c. Parmley, [1945] R.C.S. 635, les demandes d'indemnité fondées sur l'equity [TRADUCTION] « reposent sur l'idée qu'une personne fait une demande dans des circonstances où la loi présume que les deux parties sont conscientes de l'obligation d'indemniser la personne donnant suite à la demande » (p. 648, citant le juge Bowen, Birmingham and District Land Co. c. London and North Western Railway Co. (1886), 34 Ch. D. 261, p. 275.

[148] In my view, the Court of Appeal, per Hall J.A., correctly held that the tobacco companies could not establish this requirement of the claim:

[148] À mon avis, le juge Hall de la Cour d'appel avait raison de conclure que les compagnies de tabac n'étaient pas en mesure d'établir cette condition de la demande :

[I]f the notional reasonable observer were asked whether or not Canada, in the interaction it had over many decades with the appellants, was undertaking to indemnify them from some future liability that might be incurred relating to their business, the observer would reply that this could not be a rational expectation, having regard to the relationship between the parties. Likewise, if Canada through its agents had been specifically asked or a suggestion had been made to its agents by representatives of the appellants that Canada might in future be liable for any such responsibility or incur such a liability, the answer would have been firmly in the negative. [Costs Recovery case, para. 57]

[TRADUCTION] [S]i l'on demandait à l'observateur raisonnable hypothétique si, dans les rapports qu'il a entretenus pendant de nombreuses décennies avec les appelantes, le Canada s'était engagé à les indemniser pour une quelconque responsabilité ultérieure susceptible de découler de leurs activités, l'observateur répondrait que cette attente ne pourrait être rationnelle, eu égard à la relation entre les parties. De même, si les représentants des appelantes avaient demandé explicitement ou suggéré au Canada, par l'entremise de ses mandataires, d'indemniser les appelantes pour une telle responsabilité ou d'engager pareille responsabilité, le Canada aurait répondu fermement par la négative. [L'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts, par. 57]

When Canada directed the tobacco industry about how it should conduct itself, it was doing so in its capacity as a government regulator that was concerned about the health of Canadians. Under such circumstances, it is unreasonable to infer that Canada was implicitly promising to indemnify the industry for acting on its request.

Lorsque le Canada a donné à l'industrie du tabac des directives sur la manière dont elle devrait se comporter, il le faisait à titre d'autorité de réglementation du gouvernement qui se souciait de la santé des Canadiens et des Canadiennes. Dans ces circonstances, il est déraisonnable de déduire que le Canada avait promis implicitement d'indemniser l'industrie pour avoir donné suite à sa demande.

I. Procedural Considerations

I. Considérations d'ordre procédural

[149] In the courts below, the tobacco companies argued that even if the claims for compensation against Canada are struck, Canada should

[149] Les compagnies de tabac ont fait valoir devant les juridictions inférieures que, même si les demandes d'indemnisation présentées à l'encontre remain a third party in the litigation for procedural reasons. The tobacco companies argued that their ability to mount defences against British Columbia in the Costs Recovery case and the class members in the Knight case would be severely prejudiced if Canada was no longer a third party. This argument was rejected in chambers by both Wedge J. and Satanove J. The majority of the Court of Appeal found it unnecessary to consider the question, while Hall J.A. would have affirmed the holdings of the chambers judges.

2011 SCC 42 (CanLII)

[150] The tobacco companies did not pursue this issue on appeal. I would affirm the findings of Wedge J., Satanove J. and Hall J.A. and strike the claims for declaratory relief.

V. Conclusion

[151] I conclude that it is plain and obvious that the tobacco companies' claims against Canada have no reasonable chance of success, and should be struck out. Canada's appeals in the Costs Recovery case and the Knight case are allowed, and the cross-appeals are dismissed. Costs are awarded throughout against Imperial in the Knight case, and against the tobacco companies in the Costs Recovery case. No costs are awarded against or in favour of British Columbia in the Costs Recovery case.

Appeals allowed and cross-appeals dismissed with costs.

du Canada étaient radiées, la mise en cause du Canada devrait se poursuivre en l'espèce pour des motifs d'ordre procédural. Toujours selon les compagnies de tabac, leur capacité de se défendre contre la Colombie-Britannique dans l'Affaire du recouvrement des coûts ainsi que contre le groupe dans l'Affaire Knight serait gravement compromise si la mise en cause du Canada prenait fin. Les juges Wedge et Satanove, qui siégeaient en cabinet, ont toutes deux rejeté cet argument. La Cour d'appel a conclu à la majorité qu'il était inutile d'examiner la question, alors que le juge Hall était d'avis de confirmer les conclusions des juges siégeant en cabinet.

[150] Les compagnies de tabac n'ont pas débattu cette question dans le pourvoi. Je suis d'avis de confirmer les conclusions des juges Wedge, Satanove et Hall, et de radier les demandes de jugement déclaratoire.

V. Conclusion

Summary:

The appellant was convicted on a charge of fraud over $5,000, and the trial judge entered a suspended sentence with three years probation. The Crown appeals from this sentence on the basis that the judge erred in finding exceptional circumstances where none existed, resulting in an unfit sentence. Held: Appeal allowed, the suspended sentence is set aside and a substituted sentence of six months' imprisonment is entered. The trial judge made an error in principle when she considered the ordinary consequences of the offence as exceptional circumstances warranting a suspended sentence. The trial judge also erred by treating certain circumstances as mitigating when the circumstances did not relate to the gravity of the offence or the degree of responsibility of the offender.

2020 BCCA 275 (CanLII)

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Groberman and the Honourable Madam Justice Fisher:

[1] Rajesh Kodimyala was convicted after a five-day trial on a charge of fraud over $5,000 contrary to s. 380(1)(a) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46. The trial judge, acting under s. 731(1)(a) of the Code, suspended the passing of sentence. The Crown applies for leave to appeal the suspended sentence, contending that such a disposition was unfit. If leave is granted, it seeks, instead, the imposition of a custodial sentence of six to 12 months.

Circumstances of the Offence

[2] Mr. Kodimyala engaged in an unsophisticated "cheque kiting" scheme in November 2014. He deposited four cheques amounting to $113,300 into his bank account at Vancouver City Savings Credit Union. The cheques were drawn on a closed account and were worthless. Within four days after the first cheque was deposited, and before the credit union became aware that it would not clear, Mr. Kodimyala made numerous cash withdrawals and online payments from the account. His subsequent withdrawals and payments from the rest of the deposits were unsuccessful, as they were returned for insufficient funds. In the end, the credit union suffered a loss of $48,313.84.

[3] Mr. Kodimyala pleaded not guilty to the offence, and gave evidence that exonerated himself and placed the blame for the bogus cheques on business associates. He also claimed that many of the withdrawals were initiated by persons other than himself. The judge rejected his evidence, and found that he was wholly responsible for both the deposits of the bogus cheques and for the withdrawal of funds.

Circumstances of the Offender

[4] Mr. Kodimyala was 41 years old at the time of sentencing. He had resided in Canada for approximately 16 years, and had no criminal record.

[5] The charge was not laid until some three years after the offence was committed. In the meantime, Mr. Kodimyala had obtained full-time employment with the IT department of a bank. He had re-married, and his wife had given birth to a daughter. The daughter was approaching two years old at the time of sentencing.

[6] Mr. Kodimyala also had a 10-year-old daughter from a previous marriage who lived with the child's mother. Although Mr. Kodimyala had a substantial salary, he also had significant debts, and, in addition to child support he paid to his ex-wife, was also providing support to his parents and relatives in India.

[7] From the pre-sentence period to the hearing itself, Mr. Kodimyala took no responsibility for his actions and expressed no remorse.

The Sentence Imposed

[8] The maximum sentence for fraud over $5,000 is fourteen years. Accordingly, under s. 742.1(c) of the Criminal Code, a conditional sentence order was unavailable.

[9] The Crown took the position that the ordinary range of sentence for this type of offence, at least for a first offender, was nine to 18 months imprisonment. It sought a sentence of 12 months, to be followed by 12 months of probation.

[10] Mr. Kodimyala argued that a suspended sentence was appropriate, and sought such a sentence with a two-year period of probation. The Crown contended that there were no exceptional circumstances that would justify a sentence lower than the range suggested above.

[11] The judge accepted that the ordinary range of sentence for the offence was nine to 18 months. She considered as aggravating factors that there was some planning and premeditation to the offensive conduct, albeit an unsophisticated crime that occurred for a short duration, the conduct was not isolated, the amount obtained was "not insignificant", and there was an impact on the credit union. She did not consider that any of the statutory aggravating factors in s. 380.1(1) were present. In particular, she found that Mr. Kodimyala's reputation as a customer and businessman did not contribute to the offence.

[12] The judge considered as mitigating factors Mr. Kodimyala's lack of a criminal record, his pro-social life and efforts to rehabilitate himself, the stability provided by his second marriage and the birth of his daughter, the support from his family and friends, his success in maintaining lawful employment since 2015 with no offensive conduct, his stated intention and ability to pay restitution, his embarrassment, shame and loss of reputation, and the fact that he was not in a position of trust. She also considered as mitigating the period of pre-charge delay, concluding that the delay took this matter "into one of the rare cases that exceptional circumstances do exist" and "most significantly … in the context of Mr. Kodimyala's efforts to rehabilitate himself".

[13] The judge concluded that a custodial sentence was not necessary, summarizing her reasons as follows (at para. 123):

> In conclusion, in the circumstances of this case, including the lack of criminal record, the significant pro-social changes in Mr. Kodimyala's life which I outlined above including a stable family life and secure full-time employment, the support that he gives to the community including his extended family, and as I said, most importantly the significant time delay from the date of the offence to the date the charges were sworn, I am satisfied that the circumstances here are above and beyond the norm to justify a non-custodial sentence and I conclude that Mr. Kodimyala has truly turned his life around and the protection of the public is better served by a non-custodial sentence.

[14] Her view was that a suspended sentence was appropriate "so long as the conditions imposed satisfy all the principles of sentencing including the paramount principle of deterrence and the secondary principle of denunciation". She therefore suspended sentencing, and placed Mr. Kodimyala on three years of probation. Among the terms of the probation were the imposition of a curfew during the first nine months and a requirement to perform 80 hours of community service. The judge also imposed a restitution order, requiring Mr. Kodimyala to make payments to reimburse the credit union for the losses it suffered.

2020 BCCA 275 (CanLII)

The Crown Appeal

[15] On appeal, the Crown contends that the judge erred in finding exceptional circumstances where such circumstances did not exist, relying on pre-charge delay, and erroneously considering mitigating factors, all of which resulted in an unfit sentence.

[16] Mr. Kodimyala contends that there is no requirement for exceptional circumstances to justify a departure from a range of sentence. However, if there is, he says the judge's findings are entitled to deference from this court and the sentence was not demonstrably unfit, especially given the judge's conclusion that the public would be better served by a non-custodial sentence.

Analysis

1. Exceptional and mitigating circumstances

[17] The Crown submits that it is an error in principle to categorize the ordinary as exceptional, citing R. v. Zenari, 2012 ABCA 279; R. v. Burnett, 2017 MBCA 122 and R. v. Murdoch, 2015 NBCA 38. The Crown referred to R. v. Voong, 2015 BCCA 285 in respect of what may constitute exceptional circumstances but acknowledged that such circumstances do not oust the proportionality principle, citing R. v. L.S.N., 2020 BCCA 109. The Crown also takes issue with the judge's description of certain circumstances as being mitigating.

[18] Mr. Kodimyala's submission concerns, in part, the application of Voong, and whether it continues to be good law in light of the subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. Lacasse, 2015 SCC 64 and R. v. Friesen, 2020 SCC 9, both of which emphasize the limited basis for appellate intervention in sentencing.

[19] The judge considered that the issue before her was whether or not there were exceptional circumstances as contemplated in Voong to justify a departure from the range of sentence. She did not make an explicit finding of "exceptional circumstances", other than in relation to the pre-charge delay, but it is implicit in her reasons that she considered the mitigating circumstances she identified to be sufficiently "exceptional" so as to justify a sentence below the range she accepted as between nine and 18-months imprisonment.

2020 BCCA 275 (CanLII)

R. v. Voong

[20] Given Mr. Kodimyala's submission and the judge's approach in this case, it is important to begin the discussion with a consideration of what Voong decided.

[21] In Voong, this court considered both whether suspended sentences were available for drug trafficking offences, and what circumstances could justify such a sentence. Voong is a detailed and carefully reasoned judgment. It discusses principles of sentencing, and analyses the seriousness of drug trafficking as a crime. It discusses the historical range of sentences. Following the analysis, the judgment concludes that a custodial sentence will normally, though not always, be required for those found to have participated as traffickers in dial-a-dope operations:

> [59] In summary, absent exceptional circumstances, the sentence for a first offence or with a minimal criminal record, dial-a-dope drug seller will be in the range of six to eighteen months imprisonment, depending on the aggravating circumstances. Exceptional circumstances may include a combination of no criminal record, significant and objectively identifiable steps towards rehabilitation for the drug addict, gainful employment, remorse and acknowledgement of the harm done to society as a result of the offences, as opposed to harm done to the offender as a result of being caught. This is a non-exhaustive list, but at the end of the day, there must be circumstances that are above and beyond the norm to justify a non-custodial sentence. There must be something that would lead a sentencing judge to conclude that the offender had truly turned his or her life around, and that the protection of the public was subsequently better served by a non-custodial sentence. However, Parliament, while not removing a non-custodial sentence for this type of offence, has concluded that CSO sentences are not available. Thus, it will be the rare case where the standard of exceptional circumstances is met.

[22] Lacasse specifically rejected the idea that a sentence could be overturned on appeal simply because the trial judge imposed a sentence outside of the normal "range" for the offence. Wagner J. (as he then was), speaking for the majority, stated:

> [11] This Court has on many occasions noted the importance of giving wide latitude to sentencing judges. Since they have, inter alia, the advantage of having heard and seen the witnesses, sentencing judges are in the best position to determine, having regard to the circumstances, a just and appropriate sentence that is consistent with the objectives and principles set out in the Criminal Code in this regard. The fact that a judge deviates from the proper sentencing range does not in itself justify appellate intervention. Ultimately, except where a sentencing judge makes an error of law or an error in principle that has an impact on the sentence, an appellate court may not vary the sentence unless it is demonstrably unfit.
> [12] In such cases, proportionality is the cardinal principle that must guide appellate courts in considering the fitness of a sentence imposed on an offender. The more serious the crime and its consequences, or the greater the offender's degree of responsibility, the heavier the sentence will be. In other words, the severity of a sentence depends not only on the seriousness of the crime's consequences, but also on the moral blameworthiness of the offender. Determining a proportionate sentence is a delicate task. As I mentioned above, both sentences that are too lenient and sentences that are too harsh can undermine public confidence in the administration of justice. Moreover, if appellate courts intervene without deference to vary sentences that they consider too lenient or too harsh, their interventions could undermine the credibility of the system and the authority of trial courts.

[23] The court further clarified the limited role of appeal courts on sentencing appeals in Friesen:

> [26] As this Court confirmed in Lacasse, an appellate court can only intervene to vary a sentence if (1) the sentence is demonstrably unfit (para. 41), or (2) the sentencing judge made an error in principle that had an impact on the sentence (para. 44). Errors in principle include an error of law, a failure to consider a relevant factor, or erroneous consideration of an aggravating or mitigating factor. The weighing or balancing of factors can form an error in principle "[o]nly if by emphasizing one factor or by not giving enough weight to another, the trial judge exercises his or her discretion unreasonably" (R. v. McKnight (1999), 135 C.C.C. (3d) 41 (Ont. C.A.), at para. 35, cited in Lacasse, at para. 49). Not every error in principle is material: an appellate court can only intervene if it is apparent from the trial judge's reasons that the error had an impact on the sentence (Lacasse, at para. 44). If an error in principle had no impact on the sentence, that is the end of the error in principle analysis and appellate intervention is justified only if the sentence is demonstrably unfit.

[24] The court also clarified (at para. 112) that there is no requirement for there to be “rare or special circumstances” in order to impose a substantial sentence where it is proportionate, which we interpret as equally applicable to the imposition of a lenient sentence where one is proportionate. The Manitoba Court of Appeal echoed the same principle in Burnett, noting that the law does not require a sentencing judge to find exceptional circumstances to justify a sentence below a judicially created range: see paras. 25–26.

[25] In our view, Voong is not based on the idea that a departure from normal sentencing ranges requires justification. Rather, it is a case that discusses the reasons why the principle of proportionality will usually require a custodial sentence for drug traffickers in dial-a-dope cases, subject to there being circumstances that demonstrate that a lesser sentence will satisfy the principle. Understood in that light, it does not run afoul of the principles set out in Lacasse and Friesen.

[26] In the years following the judgment in Voong, submissions were made to this court in several cases that attempted to characterize the question of whether there were “exceptional circumstances” as a question of law. Such an approach has been rejected. In R. v. Ruiz, 2019 BCCA 323, the court said:

> [18] It is important to recognize that “exceptional circumstances” is not a term of art, but rather a generalized description intended to encompass circumstances of the offender and of the offence that call out for a sentence that is well below the generally accepted range. [The Court then quotes from para. 59 of Voong].
> [19] There is, in short, no litmus test for “exceptional circumstances”. Further, as Bennett J.A. recognized in Voong, at para. 102, there are degrees of “exceptional circumstances”. A sentencing judge, recognizing that suspended sentences may be imposed even for trafficking of drugs, must evaluate the circumstances of the offence and of the offender and decide whether the situation is such as to call for a sentence that is lighter than those usually imposed for trafficking offences.

[27] In L.S.N., Fitch J.A., on behalf of the court, specifically discussed the relationship between “exceptional circumstances” and the proportionality principle:

> [50] Proportionality is the cardinal principle of sentencing: Lacasse at para. 12. All sentences must be proportionate to the gravity of the offence > and the degree of responsibility of the offender: R. v. Proulx, 2000 SCC 5 at para. 54; Friesen at para. 30.

2020 BCCA 275 (CanLII)

>
> [51] Sentencing judges exercise a broad, case-specific discretion in determining the weight to be accorded to the sentencing principles set out in s. 718 and 718.2 of the Code. Sentencing judges also exercise a broad discretion in determining how those principles are best achieved in a particular case. But the resulting sentence must respect the fundamental principle of proportionality: R. v. Nasogaluak, 2010 SCC 6 at para. 40; R. v. Ipeelee, 2012 SCC 13 at para. 37.
>
> [52] Sentencing is, of course, an individualized process. Exceptional circumstances—often rooted in an offender's disadvantaged background—may inform the assessment of an offender's moral culpability. The moral culpability of a significantly disadvantaged offender may be attenuated in the face of circumstances a sentencing judge considers to be exceptional.
>
> [54] Exceptional circumstances do not, however, oust the proportionality principle. They simply permit the taking into account of case-specific considerations that could conceivably justify departure from a conventional sentencing range in order to craft a proportionate sentence. As this Court noted in R. v. Padda, 2019 BCCA 351 at para. 36, characterizing an offender's circumstances as exceptional "is simply a shorthand means of identifying the kind of personal circumstances which justify going outside a conventional range in order to craft an appropriate individualised proportionate sentence."

[28] The judge in this case identified the issue as "whether or not there were exceptional circumstances as contemplated in R. v. Voong to justify a departure from the range of sentence", went on to assess the aggravating and mitigating factors, and concluded that the circumstances justified a non-custodial sentence. This court must show deference to her findings and conclusions absent any demonstrated error of principle.

Exceptional vs. ordinary

[29] As noted above, the Crown submits that the judge erred in principle by considering the ordinary exceptional. It says that many of the factors considered by the judge to justify the non-custodial sentence were nothing more than the normal consequences of the fraud offence and notes that such offenders frequently come before the court with no record and strong family support. This was addressed in Zenari, a case involving employee fraud:

> [8] While the sentencing judge correctly stated the principle [absent exceptional circumstances the goals of deterrence and denunciation demand a sentence of imprisonment for such crimes], she misapplied it. Many of the factors she found to be exceptional are merely the normal consequences of this type of crime. The consequences of a fraud conviction for a person of previous apparently good character are often the same: loss of reputation; loss of job; shame; financial ruin; loss of house; negative repercussions for the family; letters of surprise but continuing support from friends and family; concerns about who will support the family while the accused is in jail, etc. These are common features of many of the other reported decisions, and cannot be considered to be exceptional. If these are exceptional, then virtually every case like this is exceptional. It was an error of principle for the sentencing judge to categorize the ordinary as exceptional.

[30] See also Murdoch at para. 47 and Burnett at para. 31.

[31] We agree with the Crown that the factors the judge considered to be exceptional enough to justify a suspended sentence were not exceptional. As a first offender, Mr. Kodimyala had the support of his family and friends and suffered shame, embarrassment and loss of his reputation due to the nature of his crime. While he had left his risky business after the offence and secured full time employment, the pro-social changes referred to by the judge were not reflective of an accused who had turned his life around in a significant way. His life both before and after the offence was not markedly different. He was pro-social and married before and he re-married since, and he continued to support his immediate and extended family. Moreover, some of the circumstances the judge considered to be mitigating were not in fact mitigating, which brings us to the Crown's next submission.

Mitigating circumstances

[32] The Crown submits that the judge erred in treating certain circumstances as mitigating: the fact that Mr. Kodimyala did not occupy a position of trust, the pre-charge delay, and his stated intention to pay restitution.

2020 BCCA 275 (CanLII)

[33] Again, we agree with the Crown that these factors cannot properly be considered to be mitigating in the circumstances of this case.

[34] First, the fact that Mr. Kodimyala was not in a position of trust is simply the absence of an aggravating factor, which is neutral to the determination of sentence: see R. v. Scofield, 2019 BCCA 3 at para. 36.

[35] Second, mitigating factors are those related to the gravity of the offence or to the degree of responsibility of the offender: R. v. Pham, 2013 SCC 15 at para. 11. Pre-charge delay in and of itself, relates to neither, and it may only be a mitigating factor when it rises to the level of a Charter breach or causes prejudice to the offender, neither of which was raised or argued here: see R. v. K.V.E., 2013 BCCA 521 at para. 30 and R. v. Nasogaluak, 2010 SCC 6 at paras. 53–55. The judge first determined that the delay "took this matter into one of the rare cases that exceptional circumstances do exist" on the basis of her own analysis of the conduct of the police investigation. She then related the delay to the context of Mr. Kodimyala's efforts to rehabilitate himself, but there was no evidence that the delay prejudiced Mr. Kodimyala; to the contrary, during this time period he was able to secure new employment, re-marry and have another child.

[36] Finally, in the context of Mr. Kodimyala's continued denial of responsibility for the offence, it is difficult to conceive how his stated intention to pay restitution in and of itself could have been considered a mitigating factor. A restitution order acceded to by an offender may be taken into account in mitigation as indicative of remorse: see R. v. Chamczuk, 2010 ABCA 380 at para. 14. However in this case, there was no expression of remorse, and as the Crown pointed out, Mr. Kodimyala's denial carried through the pre-sentence process to the hearing itself despite the judge's finding at trial that his evidence was not believable. While a lack of remorse is clearly not an aggravating circumstance, there was no indication from Mr. Kodimyala that he had come to realize the gravity of his conduct or to otherwise provide an explanation for it.

Errors in principle

[37] For the forgoing reasons, we have concluded that the judge erred in principle by considering the normal consequences of the offence as exceptional and by treating some factors as mitigating when they were not. In essence, her conclusion that a non-custodial sentence was appropriate was based on Mr. Kodimyala's rehabilitation subsequent to the offence. While these positive steps are clearly important and may justify a more lenient sentence, the judge failed to properly assess whether a suspended sentence was proportionate to the gravity of the offence and the degree of responsibility of Mr. Kodimyala. These errors in our view impacted the sentence, and therefore this court may intervene to vary it.

2. What is a fit sentence?

[38] The Crown's position at sentencing, accepted by the judge, was that the range of sentence for fraud offences of this type is nine to 18 months, with the lower range at 12 months being appropriate in this case. It takes the same position on appeal, but at the hearing suggested a lesser sentence of six months to take into account the nine-month period of curfew Mr. Kodimyala served under his probation order.

[39] Mr. Kodimyala submits that the range of sentence for this kind of fraud is from a suspended sentence to 12 months. He says that the nine to 18-month range is appropriate only for fraud that involves a breach of trust. He seeks, as he did at sentencing, a suspended sentence with probation, or alternatively a 90-day sentence to be served intermittently. He also seeks an order staying the execution of any custodial sentence given the length of time since the offence.

[40] We see no error in the judge's acceptance of a range of sentence of nine to 18 months, with a sentence in the lower end of the range being appropriate here. She relied on cases that included similar cheque-kiting frauds, the most analogous being R. v. Asgari, [1997] B.C.J. No. 3149, and R. v. Dolder, [1985] B.C.J. No. 2638. Asgari involved three forged cheques totalling $132,000, with $82,000 being advanced to the offender. The scheme, while unsophisticated, was found to require a concentrated commitment of time and effort over a short period of time to make the withdrawals, and the offender was not remorseful. A 12-month sentence was imposed, along with a restitution order. In Dolder, a sentence of two years less a day was upheld where the loss was much less ($2,791), with the court commenting that a fit sentence for the cheque-kiting offences would have been 12 to 15 months. While these cases are dated, the ranges suggested continue to be appropriate today.

[41] That said, there are certainly cases where the sentences imposed for fraud offences were below this range, as cited by Mr. Kodimyala. Most of those cases involved guilty pleas where the offenders accepted responsibility and expressed genuine remorse for their conduct: see, for example, R. v. Abdulahi-Sabet, 2019 BCSC 1538 (8 months); R. v. Steen, 2018 BCPC 353 (4 months and two years probation); R. v. Johal, 2018 BCPC 360 (90 days intermittent and three years probation). In some cases, conditional sentence orders were imposed for terms between nine months and two years: R. v. Truong, 2017 BCPC 68 (nine months CSO, guilty plea); R. v. Gonzalez-Urena, 2011 BCSC 406 (15 months CSO); R. v. Burkart, 2006 BCCA 446 (18 months CSO, guilty plea) and R. v. Offman, 2017 BCPC 70 (two years less a day CSO, guilty plea). These latter cases have limited applicability, as a conditional sentence is no longer available for the offence of fraud over $5,000, but the length of the conditional sentences imposed is consistent with the range discussed above.

[42] As the judge recognized, the principles of denunciation and deterrence are paramount in fraud and dishonesty-related offences. Deterrence may be particularly important because these kinds of offences are often committed by otherwise law-abiding citizens like Mr. Kodimyala: see R. v. Proulx, 2000 SCC 5 at para. 129. However, it is our view that the judge gave these principles insufficient weight in concluding that they could be satisfied by imposing conditions under a probation order, in light of the circumstances of the offence and Mr. Kodimyala’s failure to take responsibility and to express any remorse. While a suspended sentence may have a deterrent effect, a probation order has primarily (but not exclusively) a rehabilitative objective, and optional conditions are usually directed to protecting the community and reintegrating the offender: see Voong at paras. 37–43. We do not see this as a case where a period of incarceration would unduly interfere with Mr. Kodimyala's rehabilitation and reintegration, nor do we see a suspended sentence having a sufficiently deterrent effect. In our view, a suspended sentence is not proportionate, and the paramountcy of the principles of denunciation and deterrence make it necessary in the public interest to impose a custodial sentence.

[43] We accept the judge's assessment of the aggravating factors: principally that the scheme, while unsophisticated, required some planning and premeditation given the numerous steps taken to make the deposits and withdrawals, and the loss was reasonably substantial and had some impact on the credit union.

[44] The mitigating factors are Mr. Kodimyala's lack of a record, his pro-social and stable family life, the support of his family and friends, and his successful efforts to rehabilitate himself over a substantial period of time.

[45] In these circumstances, we agree with the Crown that a sentence of 12 months would be appropriate, but should be reduced to six months to take into account the nine-month period of curfew and the community services hours that were completed under the terms of the probation order. The period of probation should also be reduced to two years, from the time of the original sentence.

[46] We would not accede to Mr. Kodimyala's request to stay the execution of the sentence. Stays have been granted in cases where the principles of denunciation and deterrence could be adequately served without further incarceration: see, for example, R. v. Smickle, 2014 ONCA 49, and R. v. MacDonald, 2014 NSCA 102. In both of those cases, the constitutionality of the three-year minimum sentence for firearms offences had been adjudicated prior to the appellate court considering the fitness of the sentences, resulting in considerable time delays where the offenders had long completed their sentences and had successfully rehabilitated and reintegrated in the community. We agree with the summary of the jurisprudence, primarily from Ontario, set out by the majority in R. v. Dufour, 2015 ONCA 426, as well as their cautious approach:

> [29] To summarize, this jurisprudence indicates that on a successful Crown appeal against sentence, where the seriousness of the offence does not require that an offender serve the sentence that should have been imposed, the appellate court can consider the length of the sentence to be served and the offender's post-sentence rehabilitative efforts in determining whether to stay the sentence. However, over-emphasis of post-sentencing rehabilitation has the potential to distort the sentencing process. Staying appropriate sentences may also introduce unwarranted disparities between similarly situated offenders where one is released from custody pending appeal and another is not.

[47] While the offence in Mr. Kodimyala's case was committed almost six years ago, there has not been inordinate delay since his conviction (in July 2019) and sentencing (in October 2019). The circumstances today have not shown to be appreciably different from those that prevailed at the time of sentencing, so what was a fit sentence for the trial judge to impose remains a fit sentence today, subject to adjustment for the completion of probation conditions. Mr. Kodimyala has not served any time in prison, and we have already taken into account the fact that he completed the curfew and community service conditions in his probation order to reduce the sentence. We certainly appreciate his successful rehabilitative efforts, but that alone does not justify a stay of execution. In our view, the seriousness of the offence and Mr. Kodimyala's degree of moral culpability require that he serve his sentence.

2020 BCCA 275 (CanLII)

Disposition

[48] We would grant the Crown's application for leave to appeal sentence and we would allow the appeal. We would set aside the suspended sentence and substitute a sentence of six months' imprisonment. We would also reduce the period of probation to two years, effective from the date of the original sentence.

Criminal law — Fraud — Elements of fraud — Directors' actions re assets of company — Absence of quid pro quo — Basis of evidence of fraud to go to jury — Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, s. 338(1).

In late 1971 Langley's Limited, a long-established dry-cleaning enterprise in Toronto, owned a substantial portfolio of "blue-chip" securities valued at $1,443,460. The control of the company, some 90 per cent of the common shares, was held by two estates and an individual represented by a chartered accountant, Leonard Johnston. Mr. Johnston was approached by one of the accused, Olan, President of First Montreal City Corporation Limited, to discuss the purchase of the controlling shares. It was agreed that the controlling common shares and certain preferred shares of Langley's would be acquired by First Montreal for approximately $1,485,000 payable in cash. Toward the end of the negotiations Mr. Johnston also met the other accused Hudson, President and Director of Beauport Holdings, and Hartnett, Vice-President and Director of Beauport Holdings and legal adviser to Hudson. Before closing First Montreal assigned its rights under the agreement to Beauport. Thereafter Hudson and Hartnett played the dominant roles aided by Olan who was to receive a finder's fee of approximately $67,000 for negotiating the sale. As at November 30, 1971 the total current assets of Beauport Holdings were $149,968.30 and the total assets $738,966.87. The closing date for the purchase of the Langley's shares was to have been December 2, 1971, but, as the purchasers did not have the necessary money, was postponed. A series of financial manœuvres followed. A bank account had been opened in name of Beauport Holdings on December 8, 1971, and the accused met with the bank manager concerning the certification of a cheque for $1,025,000 to be drawn on the account. There were no funds in the account but the manager was advised that a deposit of $488,000 was available and would be deposited later the same day. At a second meeting the manager agreed to Droit criminel — Fraude — Eléments de la fraude — Utilisation par les administrateurs de l'actif de la compagnie — Absence de contrepartie — Elément de base de la preuve de fraude soumise au jury — Code criminel, S.R.C. 1970, chap. C-34, par. 338(1).

A la fin de 1971, Langley's Limited, une entreprise de nettoyage à sec établie de longue date à Toronto, possédait un portefeuille considérable de valeurs de premier ordre, évalué à $1,443,460. La participation majoritaire dans la compagnie, pour environ 90 pour cent des actions ordinaires, était détenue par deux successions et un particulier représentés par un comptable agréé, Leonard Johnston. Un des accusés, Olan, président de La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal, est entré en contact avec M. Johnston afin de négocier l'achat de la participation majoritaire. Une entente fut conclue aux termes de laquelle La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal achèterait les actions ordinaires majoritaires de Langley et certaines de ses actions privilégiées pour un montant de $1,485,000 payable comptant. A la fin des négociations, M. Johnston a aussi rencontré les deux autres accusés, Hudson, président et administrateur de Beauport Holdings, et Hartnett, vice-président et administrateur de Beauport Holdings et conseiller juridique de Hudson. Avant la signature, La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal a cédé tous ses droits découlant de l'entente à Beauport Holdings. Par la suite, Hudson et Hartnett ont joué un rôle de premier plan, aidés par Olan qui devait recevoir des honoraires d'environ $67,000 pour avoir négocié la vente. Le 30 novembre 1971, les disponibilités de Beauport Holdings s'élevaient à $149,968.30 et son actif total à $738,966.87. La signature de l'achat des actions de Langley devait se faire le 2 décembre 1971 mais les acheteurs n'ayant pas les fonds nécessaires, la date de signature fut différée. Une série d'opérations financières s'ensuivirent. Un compte en banque au nom de Beauport Holdings avait été ouvert le 8 décembre 1971 et les accusés ont rencontré le gérant de la banque au sujet de la certification d'un chèque de $1,025,000 à tirer sur le the certification but only on conditions—he was to be present at the closing and retain possession of the cheque until the purchase of Langley's was completed, when the accused would take possession of Langley's portfolio, sell the securities and with the proceeds cause Langley's to buy another company owned by them. On December 10, 1971, the accused completed through Beauport Holdings the purchase of approximately 90 per cent of Langley's common shares; the preferred shares were purchased later. The vendors received the certified cheque for $1,025,000 drawn on the account of Beauport Holdings plus $246,545 being the proceeds of a loan to Beauport Holdings.

Another company, Beauport Financial Corporation Limited, had been incorporated by Hudson and Hartnett on November 23, 1971. Immediately after the purchase of the Langley's shares a meeting of the new Board of Directors of Langley's was convened which authorized the sale of all securities owned by Langley's, the purchase of 11,000 shares of Gibraltar Mines Ltd. for $49,500, the purchase from First Montreal of the outstanding shares of a Quebec company, Advertising Associates, for $400,000, and the subscription by Langley's for 10,000 shares in Beauport Financial at $10 per share. Further steps were taken and as a result Beauport Financial received from Langley's $790,000 which it loaned to Beauport Holdings to complete by Beauport Holdings the purchase of Langley's. The issues were whether the $790,000 was expended in furtherance of the bona fide business interests of Langley's, or merely in advancing the personal interests of the accused, and whether Langley's suffered deprivation as a result of this action. The accused were tried and convicted of defrauding Langley's of money and valuable securities to a value of $1,190,000 contrary to s. 338 of the Criminal Code, however the Court of Appeal set aside the conviction. Leave was granted to appeal to the Supreme Court on the question as to whether the Court of Appeal had erred in holding that there was no evidence of fraud to go to the jury and in its consideration of the applicability and scope of the principles of law in Cox and Paton v. The Queen, [1963] S.C.R. 500, as they related to each accused.

compte en question. Le compte n'était pas approvisionné mais on a informé le gérant qu'un dépôt de $488,000 était disponible et que le solde serait déposé plus tard le même jour. Lors d'une deuxième rencontre, le gérant a accepté de certifier le chèque à la condition cependant que le chèque soit signé en sa présence et qu'il le conserve jusqu'à la conclusion de l'achat de Langley; à ce moment, les accusés prendraient possession du portefeuille de Langley, vendraient les titres et, avec les profits, feraient acheter par Langley une autre compagnie qu'ils possédaient. Le 10 décembre 1971, les accusés ont conclu, par l'intermédiaire de Beauport Holdings, l'achat d'environ 90 pour cent des actions ordinaires de Langley; les actions privilégiées ont été achetées plus tard. Les vendeurs ont reçu en paiement le chèque visé de $1,025,000 tiré sur le compte de Beauport Holdings, et $246,545, soit le produit d'un prêt consenti à Beauport Holdings.

Le 23 novembre 1971, Hudson et Hartnett avaient constitué la compagnie Beauport Financial Corporation Limited. Immédiatement après l'achat des actions de Langley, les nouveaux administrateurs de Langley se sont réunis et ont autorisé la vente de toutes les valeurs détenues par Langley, l'achat de 11,000 actions du capital de Gibraltar Mines Ltd., au prix de $49,500, l'achat à La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal des actions en circulation d'une compagnie québécoise, Advertising Associates Limited, pour $400,000 et la souscription par Langley des 10,000 actions du actions du capital de Beauport Financial, à $10 l'action. D'autres opérations ont été effectuées et le résultat final atteint est le suivant: Beauport Financial a reçu $790,000 de Langley qu'elle a prêtés à Beauport Holdings pour permettre à cette dernière d'acheter Langley. Il s'agit de déterminer si le montant de $790,000 provenant de l'actif de Langley et utilisé pour l'achat d'actions de Beauport Financial a été dépensé pour servir les véritables intérêts financiers de Langley ou, au contraire, les intérêts personnels des accusés. Il faut également décider si Langley a subi une privation à la suite de cette opération commerciale. Les accusés ont subi leur procès et ont été déclarés coupables d'avoir frustré Langley d'argent et de valeurs totalisant $1,190,000, en contravention de l'art. 338 du Code criminel. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a cependant infirmé la condamnation. L'autorisation d'interjeter appel à la Cour suprême a été accordée sur la question de savoir si la Cour d'appel a commis une erreur en décidant qu'il n'y avait aucune preuve de fraude à soumettre au jury et en examinant, relativement à chaque accusé, l'applicabilité et la portée des principes de droit énoncés dans l'arrêt Cox et Paton c. La Reine, [1963] R.C.S. 500.

1978 CanLII 9 (SCC)

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

From Cox and Paton it is apparent that proof of deceit is not essential to support a conviction under s. 338(1). Where it is alleged that a corporation has been defrauded by its directors deception is not an essential element of the offence. The words "other fraudulent means" in s. 338(1) include means which are not in the nature of a falsehood or a deceit and they encompass all other means which can properly be stigmatized as dishonest. While the courts have been loath to attempt an exhaustive definition of "defraud" one can say that two elements are essential, "dishonesty" and "deprivation". Using the assets of the corporation for personal purposes rather than bona fide for the benefit of the corporation can constitute dishonesty in a case of alleged fraud by directors of the corporation. Deprivation is satisfied on proof of detriment, prejudice or risk of prejudice; it is not essential that there be actual loss. On the facts it was here open to the jury to find that the exchange of the Langley portfolio for a loan was something other than a quid pro quo. The Court of Appeal erred in its consideration of the applicability and scope of the principles of law in Cox and Paton v. The Queen as they related to each accused and in holding that there was no evidence of fraud to go to the jury.

Arrêt: Le pourvoi doit être accueilli.

Il ressort de l'arrêt Cox et Paton que la preuve de la supercherie n'est pas essentielle pour pouvoir prononcer une condamnation en vertu du par. 338(1). Quand on allègue que les administrateurs ont fraudé leur compagnie, la supercherie ne constitue pas un élément essentiel de l'infraction. Les mots «autres moyens dolosifs» au par. 338(1) couvrent les moyens qui ne sont ni des mensonges ni des supercheries; ils comprennent tous les autres moyens qu'on peut proprement qualifier de malhonnêtes. Les tribunaux ont de bonnes raisons d'hésiter à définir de façon exhaustive le mot «frauder» (frustrer), mais on peut sans crainte dire que deux éléments sont essentiels: la «malhonnêteté» et la «privation». L'utilisation des biens d'une compagnie à des fins personnelles plutôt qu'à l'avantage de celle-ci peut constituer un acte malhonnête si l'on accuse des administrateurs de fraude. On établit la privation si l'on prouve un dommage, un préjudice ou un risque de préjudice; il n'est pas essentiel que la fraude mène à une perte pécuniaire réelle. D'après les faits, le jury pouvait conclure qu'il y avait une nette disproportion dans l'échange du portefeuille de Langley contre le prêt. La Cour d'appel a commis une erreur en examinant, relativement à chaque accusé, l'applicabilité et la portée des principes de droits énoncés dans l'arrêt Cox et Paton c. La Reine et en décidant qu'il n'y avait aucune preuve de fraude à soumettre au jury.

1978 CanLII 9 (SCC)

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

DICKSON J.—The respondents were tried and convicted before judge and jury on the charge of defrauding Langley's Limited, between December 1, 1971, and December 31, 1971, of money and valuable securities having an aggregate value of $1,190,000, more or less, contrary to s. 338 of the Criminal Code. Section 338(1) makes it a crime to defraud the public or any person of any property, money or valuable security by deceit, falsehood or other fraudulent means. The word "defraud" is not defined.

The Court of Appeal for Ontario set aside the conviction and entered a verdict of acquittal. This Court granted leave to appeal from the order of the Court of Appeal for Ontario upon the following question of law:

Did the Ontario Court of Appeal err in holding that there was no evidence of fraud to go to the jury and, in that connection, did it err in its consideration of the applicability and scope of the principles of law in Cox and Paton v. The Queen, [1963] S.C.R. 500 as they related to each accused?

The judgment in Cox and Paton is helpful in considering the substantive offence of fraud although the relevant count under discussion in that case was conspiracy to commit fraud and not the substantive offence itself. In Cox and Paton, the accused had entered into an option agreement for the purchase from the principal shareholder, one Donaldson, of all of his shares in the capital stock of a company known as Brandon Packers Limited. The option agreement declared the stated intention of the optionee (the accused) to procure that Brandon Packers Limited would issue bonds to the extent of $400,000 for sale, and the optionor, Donaldson, agreed to use his best endeavours to promote the sale of the bonds. The option was exercised. Prior to closing, about $275,000 of the bonds had been sold. At closing, numerous steps were taken, including a daylight loan from a chartered bank, but essentially what occurred was this: (i) Donaldson caused Brandon Packers to subscribe for preference shares of the value of $200,000 in the capital stock of Fropak Limited, a company controlled by the accused; (ii) with the

Le jugement de la Cour a été rendu par

LE JUGE DICKSON—Les intimés ont subi leur procès devant juge et jury et ont été déclarés coupables d'avoir, entre le 1er et le 31 décembre 1971, frustré Langley's Limited d'argent et de valeurs totalisant approximativement $1,190,000, en contravention de l'art. 338 du Code criminel. Aux termes du par. 338(1), commet un acte criminel quiconque frustre le public ou toute personne de quelque bien, argent ou valeur par supercherie, mensonge ou autres moyens dolosifs. Le verbe «frustrer» n'y est pas défini.

La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a infirmé la condamnation et a prononcé un verdict d'acquittement. Cette Cour a autorisé le pourvoi contre cet arrêt sur la question de droit suivante:

La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a-t-elle commis une erreur de droit en décidant qu'il n'y avait aucune preuve de fraude à soumettre au jury et, à cet égard, a-t-elle commis une erreur de droit en examinant, relativement à chaque accusé, l'applicabilité et la portée des principes de droit énoncés dans l'arrêt Cox et Paton c. La Reine, [1963] R.C.S. 500?

L'arrêt Cox et Paton est utile aux fins de l'analyse de l'infraction en cause, même si cet arrêt porte sur un chef d'accusation de complot en vue de frauder et non sur l'infraction de fraude proprement dite. Dans l'affaire Cox et Paton, les accusés avaient conclu une entente à option, pour l'achat à l'actionnaire principal, un nommé Donaldson, de toutes ses actions dans le capital actions d'une compagnie appelée Brandon Packers Limited. L'entente faisait état de l'intention déclarée des cessionnaires (les accusés) de prendre les mesures nécessaires pour que Brandon Packers Limited émette $400,000 d'obligations à vendre, et le cédant, Donaldson, consentait à faire tout son possible pour en promouvoir la vente. L'option fut levée. Avant la date limite, on avait vendu $275,000 d'obligations. A la date de clôture, on prit plusieurs mesures dont un prêt d'un jour consenti par une banque à charte, mais voici essentiellement ce qui se produisit: (i) Donaldson fit souscrire à Brandon Packers $200,000 d'actions privilégiées du capital actions de Fropak Limited, une compagnie contrôlée par les accusés; (ii) avec l'ar-monies received upon such subscription, Fropak advanced $183,560 to two personal holding corporations owned and controlled by the accused; (iii) the personal corporations paid Donaldson $183,-560 for, and took delivery of, his shares in Brandon Packers Limited; (iv) Fropak received promissory notes from the two personal corporations totalling $183,560. In the result, Donaldson received in cash the purchase price of his shares. The accused, through their personal corporations, acquired those shares. Brandon Packers Limited had expended $200,000 for preference shares of Fropak Limited, and Fropak was left with promissory notes of the two personal holding corporations in the amount of $183,560, plus $6,440. In substance, Brandon Packers Limited became the source of the funds used by the accused to purchase Donaldson's shares and acquire control of Brandon Packers Limited.

The Test for Fraud

The paragraph in Cox and Paton which particularly concerns us in the present appeal is to be found in the judgment of Cartwright J., speaking for the Court, at pp. 512-513, reading:

> In the course of argument on this branch of the appeal counsel for the appellants submitted that there was no evidence that the appellants defrauded Brandon Packers Limited or that they intended to do so because, as it was said, there was no evidence of any false representation made to the company or of any official of the company having been deceived into parting with the moneys referred to in the particulars furnished. Assuming, without deciding, that there was a dissent on this point within the meaning of s. 597(1) of the Criminal Code, I would reject this argument, I will examine it only in connection with the transaction relating to the $200,000 which is the first item in the particulars. I have already indicated my agreement with the statement of Freedman J.A. that "implicit in the entire transaction was the representation of the accused that this was a legitimate bona fide investment for Brandon Packers Limited to make" and with his view that there was ample evidence to warrant a finding that this representation was false to the knowledge of the accused. If it deceived Donaldson, who was still nominally at least in control of the company, into paying over the $200,000 to Fropak that would be a fraud on the company. If, on the other hand, it is suggested that Donaldson was not deceived but paid the money over knowing that the gent de cette souscription, Fropak avança $183,-560 à deux compagnies personnelles de gestion, dans lesquelles les accusés avaient une participation majoritaire; (iii) les compagnies personnelles versèrent $183,560 à Donaldson en contrepartie de ses actions de Brandon Packers Limited; (iv) Fropak reçut des deux compagnies personnelles des billets à ordre au montant de $183,560. Donaldson a donc reçu comptant le prix d'achat de ses actions. Les accusés ont acheté ces actions par l'intermédiaire de leurs compagnies personnelles. Brandon Packers Limited avait dépensé $200,000 pour des actions privilégiées de Fropak Limited et Fropak s'est retrouvée avec des billets à ordre des deux compagnies personnelles de gestion au montant de $183,560, plus $6,440. Au fond, Brandon Packers Limited a fourni aux accusés les fonds utilisés pour acheter les actions de Donaldson et prendre le contrôle de Brandon Packers Limited.

Voici l'extrait pertinent de l'arrêt Cox et Paton, tiré des motifs du juge Cartwright, parlant au nom de la Cour, aux pp. 512 et 513:

> [TRADUCTION] Dans sa plaidoirie relative à cet aspect du pourvoi, l'avocat des appelants a prétendu que rien dans la preuve ne révèle que les appelants ont fraudé Brandon Packers Limited ni qu'ils ont eu cette intention, parce que, a-t-il souligné, rien dans la preuve n'indique qu'ils ont fait des déclarations mensongères à la compagnie ni trompé un dirigeant de cette dernière pour l'inciter à se départir des fonds en question. A supposer, sans me prononcer sur ce point, qu'il y ait une dissidence sur cette question, au sens du par. 597(1) du Code criminel, je suis d'avis de rejeter ce moyen; je ne l'étudierai que dans le cadre de l'opération relative aux $200,000, qui fait l'objet du premier point des détails fournis. J'ai déjà indiqué que je souscris à la déclaration du juge Freedman, de la Cour d'appel, selon laquelle «les accusés ont laissé entendre que l'opération représentait un investissement régulier et légitime pour Brandon Packers Limited» et je partage son opinion que la preuve permettait nettement de conclure que les accusés savaient qu'il s'agissait de déclarations mensongères. Si celles-ci ont induit en erreur Donaldson, qui détenait encore, nominalement du moins, le contrôle de la compagnie, et l'ont incité à verser les $200,000 à Fropak, on peut dire que la compagnie a été fraudée. Par contre, si l'on suggère que Donaldson n'a pas été induit en erreur transaction was not bona fide, that the Fropak shares were worthless and that their purchase was merely a step in a scheme to enable the accused to buy the shares of Brandon Packers Limited with his own money, that would simply be to say that Donaldson was particeps criminis. If all the directors of a company should join in using its funds to purchase an asset which they knew to be worthless as part of a scheme to divert those funds to their own use they would, in my opinion, be guilty under s. 323(1) of defrauding the company of those funds. Even supposing it could be said that, the directors being "the mind of the company" and well knowing the true facts, the company was not deceived (a proposition which I should find it difficult to accept), I think it clear that in the supposed case the directors would have defrauded the company, if not by deceit or falsehood, by "other fraudulent means".

mais a versé l'argent tout en sachant que l'opération n'était pas régulière, que les actions de Fropak n'avaient aucune valeur et que leur achat n'était qu'une étape d'un plan visant à permettre aux accusés d'acheter les actions de Brandon Packers Limited avec son argent, cela revient à dire que Donaldson est complice. Quand tous les administrateurs d'une compagnie se liguent pour utiliser les fonds de cette dernière en vue d'acheter un actif qu'ils savent sans valeur, en exécution d'un plan élaboré pour détourner ces fonds à leur profit, ils sont, à mon avis, coupables aux termes du par. 323(1), d'avoir frustré la compagnie de cet argent. En outre, à supposer que l'on puisse dire que la compagnie n'a pas été trompée puisque les administrateurs en sont «l'âme dirigeante» et sont donc parfaitement au courant des faits (argument que je trouve difficile à accepter), il est à mon avis évident, dans cette hypothèse, que les administrateurs auraient alors fraudé la compagnie, sinon par supercherie ou mensonge, par d'«autres moyens dolosifs».

In Cox and Paton the guilt of the accused rested essentially on the conclusion that the investment of $200,000 in the shares of Fropak was not a legitimate bona fide investment for Brandon Packers. It is apparent from the quoted passage that proof of deceit is not essential to support a conviction under s. 338(1). Where it is alleged that a corporation has been defrauded by its directors, deception of the corporation is not an essential element of the offence. The words "other fraudulent means" in s. 338(1) include means which are not in the nature of a falsehood or a deceit; they encompass all other means which can properly be stigmatized as dishonest.

Dans Cox et Paton, la culpabilité des accusés reposait essentiellement sur la conclusion que l'investissement de $200,000 dans les actions de Fropak ne représentait pas un investissement régulier et légitime pour Brandon Packers. Il ressort de l'extrait cité que la preuve de la supercherie n'est pas essentielle pour pouvoir prononcer une condamnation en vertu du par. 338(1). Quand on allègue que les administrateurs ont fraudé leur compagnie, la supercherie ne constitue pas un élément essentiel de l'infraction. Les mots «autres moyens dolosifs» couvrent les moyens qui ne sont ni des mensonges ni des supercheries; ils comprennent tous les autres moyens qu'on peut proprement qualifier de malhonnêtes.

In R. v. Lemire[1], the accused was charged with having defrauded the public through the submission of fictitious expense accounts. Mr. Justice Martland, writing for the majority of this Court, dealt with the argument that no one was deceived by the expense accounts because they did not contain a detailed list of the expenditures as contemplated by the form used in making a claim. He said, pp. 185-186: "Whether or not they deceived the people who saw them, they were the necessary means used to obtain the payments and without them the payments would not have been made. They were fraudulent." See also R. v. Renard[2], at p. 358.

Dans l'affaire R. c. Lemire[1], l'accusé était inculpé d'avoir fraudé le public en remettant des comptes de dépenses fictifs. Le juge Martland, parlant au nom de la majorité de cette Cour, a examiné l'argument selon lequel les comptes n'avaient trompé personne parce qu'ils n'énuméraient pas les dépenses, comme l'exigeait la formule de demande de remboursement. Il a déclaré, aux pp. 185 et 186: [TRADUCTION] «Qu'ils aient ou non induit en erreur les personnes qui les ont vus, c'étaient les moyens qu'il fallait nécessaire-

In Scott v. Metropolitan Police Commissioner[3], the House of Lords held that in the common law offence of conspiracy to defraud, deceit is not a necessary ingredient, although in a great many cases the fraud may have been perpetrated by deceit. In the course of his speech, Viscount Dilhorne, with whom Lord Reid, Lord Simon of Glaisdale and Lord Kilbrandon agreed, after referring to the Criminal Law Revision Committee's Eighth Report on "Theft and Related Offences," 1966 (Cmnd. 2977) had this to say, at p. 839:

If, as I think, and as the Criminal Law Revision Committee appears to have thought "fraudulently" means "dishonestly", then "to defraud" ordinarily means, in my opinion, to deprive a person dishonestly of something which is his or of something to which he is or would or might but for the perpetration of the fraud be entitled.

Lord Diplock spoke to the same effect, at p. 841:

The intended means by which the purpose is to be achieved must be dishonest. They need not involve fraudulent misrepresentation such as is needed to constitute the civil tort of deceit. Dishonesty of any kind is enough.

In the earlier English case of R. v. Sinclair[4], the defendants were charged with conspiring to cheat and defraud a company, its shareholders and creditors by fraudulently using its assets for purposes other than those of the company, and by fraudulently concealing such use. The judge directed the jury as to fraud, saying, at p. 1249:

To prove fraud it must be established that the conduct was deliberately dishonest. In the circumstances of this case what sort of test should be applied as to whether the conduct was dishonest? It is fraud if it is proved that there was the taking of a risk which there was no right to take which would cause detriment or prejudice to another.

ment utiliser pour se faire payer et sans lesquels il n'y aurait pas eu de paiement. Ils étaient frauduleux.» Voir aussi R. v. Renard[2], à la p. 358.

Dans Scott v. Metropolitan Police Commissioner[3], la Chambre des lords a jugé qu'en common law la supercherie ne constitue pas un élément essentiel de l'infraction de complot en vue de frauder même si, dans la plupart des cas, c'est par ce moyen que la fraude est commise. Dans son exposé, auquel ont souscrit les lords Reid, Simon of Glaisdale et Kilbrandon, le vicomte Dilhorne écrit, à la p. 839, à propos du [TRADUCTION] Huitième rapport du Comité de réforme du droit relatif aux «Vol et Infractions connexes» 1966 (Cmnd. 2977):

[TRADUCTION] Si, comme je le pense et à l'instar semble-t-il du Comité de réforme du droit, «frauduleusement» signifie «malhonnêtement», alors «frauder» signifie, dans le langage courant, priver malhonnêtement une personne de quelque chose qui lui appartient ou de quelque chose à laquelle elle a, aurait ou pourrait avoir droit, n'eut été la perpétration de la fraude.

Lord Diplock a tenu des propos semblables, à la p. 841:

[TRADUCTION] Les moyens utilisés intentionnellement pour parvenir au but doivent être malhonnêtes. Il n'est pas nécessaire qu'il y ait des déclarations mensongères comme c'est le cas pour le dol au civil. La malhonnêteté, quelle qu'elle soit, suffit.

Dans une cause anglaise plus ancienne, R. v. Sinclair[4], les défendeurs étaient accusés d'avoir comploté de voler et frauder une compagnie, ses actionnaires et ses créanciers par l'utilisation frauduleuse et clandestine de ses biens à d'autres fins que celles qu'elle poursuivait. Voici les directives du juge au jury quant à la fraude (à la p. 1249):

[TRADUCTION] Pour prouver la fraude, il faut établir que la conduite des accusés était délibérément malhonnête. Dans les circonstances de la présente affaire, quel critère doit-on appliquer pour décider s'il y a eu conduite malhonnête? Il y a fraude si la preuve révèle qu'on a pris un risque, sans en avoir le droit, au détriment ou au préjudice d'autrui.

1978 CanLII 9 (SCC)

The defendants were convicted and appealed. The Court of Appeal, in upholding the convictions, had this to say, at p. 1250:

To cheat and defraud is to act with deliberate dishonesty to the prejudice of another person's proprietary right. In the context of this case the alleged conspiracy to cheat and defraud is an agreement by a director of a company and others dishonestly to take a risk with the assets of the company by using them in a manner which was known to be not in the best interests of the company and to be prejudicial to the minority shareholders.

The general direction as to fraud in the summing-up commences by stating that to amount to fraud the conduct must be deliberately dishonest. That is plainly right.

Courts, for good reason, have been loath to attempt anything in the nature of an exhaustive definition of "defraud" but one may safely say, upon the authorities, that two elements are essential, "dishonesty" and "deprivation". To succeed, the Crown must establish dishonest deprivation.

Using the assets of the corporation for personal purposes rather than bona fide for the benefit of the corporation can constitute dishonesty in a case of alleged fraud by directors of a corporation. This proposition finds full support in Cox and Paton.

The element of deprivation is satisfied on proof of detriment, prejudice, or risk of prejudice to the economic interests of the victim. It is not essential that there be actual economic loss as the outcome of the fraud. The following passages from the English Court of Appeal judgment in R. v. Allsop[5] in my view correctly state the law on the role of economic loss in fraud, at pp. 31, 32:

Generally the primary objective of fraudsmen is to advantage themselves. The detriment that results to their victims is secondary to that purpose and incidental. It is "intended" only in the sense that it is a contemplated outcome of the fraud that is perpetrated. If the deceit which is employed imperils the economic interest of the person deceived, this is sufficient to constitute fraud even though in the event no actual loss is suffered and notwithstanding that the deceiver did not desire to bring about an actual loss.

[5] (1976), 64 Cr. App. R. 29.

Les défendeurs ont été déclarés coupables et ont interjeté appel. La Cour d'appel a confirmé la condamnation et a déclaré (à la p. 1250):

[TRADUCTION] Voler et frauder, c'est agir de façon délibérément malhonnête, au préjudice du droit de propriété d'une autre personne. Dans la présente affaire, le complot de vol et de fraude aurait consisté dans une entente malhonnête entre un administrateur d'une compagnie et d'autres personnes en vue de prendre un risque avec les biens de la compagnie, soit de les utiliser sciemment à l'encontre des meilleurs intérêts de cette dernière et au détriment des actionnaires minoritaires.

On déclare au début des directives générales relatives à la fraude que pour qu'il y ait fraude, il faut que la conduite soit délibérément malhonnête. C'est tout à fait exact.

Les tribunaux ont de bonnes raisons d'hésiter à définir de façon exhaustive le mot «frauder» (frustrer), mais on peut sans crainte dire que, selon la jurisprudence, deux éléments sont essentiels: la «malhonnêteté» et la «privation». Pour avoir gain de cause, le ministère public doit donc prouver la privation malhonnête.

L'utilisation des biens d'une compagnie à des fins personnelles plutôt qu'à l'avantage de celle-ci peut constituer un acte malhonnête si l'on accuse ses administrateurs de fraude. L'arrêt Cox et Paton appuie ce principe.

On établit la privation si l'on prouve que les intérêts pécuniaires de la victime ont subi un dommage ou un préjudice ou qu'il y a risque de préjudice à leur égard. Il n'est pas essentiel que la fraude mène à une perte pécuniaire réelle. L'extrait suivant, tiré de l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel d'Angleterre, R. v. Allsop[5], décrit bien, à mon avis, l'état du droit sur le rôle de la perte pécuniaire dans la fraude (aux pp. 31 et 32):

[TRADUCTION] En général, un fraudeur veut avant tout se procurer un avantage. Le tort causé à sa victime est secondaire et incident. Il n'est «intentionnel» que parce qu'il fait partie du résultat prévu de la fraude. Si la supercherie met en péril les intérêts pécuniaires de la personne induite en erreur, cela suffit pour constituer une fraude, même s'il n'en résulte aucune perte réelle et même si le fraudeur n'a pas eu l'intention de causer une perte réelle.

1978 CanLII 9 (SCC)

We see nothing in Lord Diplock's speech [in Scott] to suggest a different view. "Economic loss" may be ephemeral and not lasting, or potential and not actual; but even a threat of financial prejudice while it exists it may be measured in terms of money . . .

Interests which are imperilled are less valuable in terms of money than those same interests when they are secure and protected. Where a person intends by deceit to induce a course of conduct in another which puts that other's economic interests in jeopardy he is guilty of fraud even though he does not intend or desire that actual loss should ultimately be suffered by that other in this context.

The Facts

One of the dangers in this case is the risk of being overwhelmed by factual minutiae. Superficially, the facts are complicated. Stripped of unessentials, it is clear what took place. I do not propose a detailed recital as, in my opinion, the appeal should be allowed and a new trial ordered, but to answer the question upon which leave to appeal has been granted it is necessary to sketch the relevant transactions. In late 1971, when the impugned events took place, Langley's Limited was a dry-cleaning enterprise, long-established in the City of Toronto, owning a substantial portfolio of "blue-chip" securities valued at $1,443,460. The controlling interest in the company, comprising some 90% of the common shares, was owned by two estates and an individual represented by a chartered accountant, Mr. Leonard Johnston. In the autumn of 1971, Mr. Johnston was approached by one of the accused, Mr. Olan, President of First Montreal City Corporation Limited, for the purpose of discussing purchase of the controlling shares. The negotiations which followed led to an agreement under which the controlling common shares, and certain preferred shares, of Langley's would be purchased by First Montreal for approximately $1,485,000 payable in cash. Toward the end of the negotiations, Mr. Johnston also met the

A notre avis, rien dans les motifs de lord Diplock [dans Scott] ne suggère une opinion différente. La «perte pécuniaire» peut être éphémère et temporaire ou éventuelle sans être réelle, mais même une simple menace de préjudice financier, pendant qu'elle existe, peut être évaluée monétairement . . .

Des intérêts mis en péril ont moins de valeur en termes monétaires que des intérêts protégés et en sécurité. Quiconque a l'intention d'inciter par une supercherie une autre personne à agir de manière à compromettre ses intérêts pécuniaires se rend coupable de fraude même s'il ne prévoit, ni ne veut que l'autre subisse finalement une perte réelle.

Les faits

Un des dangers dans cette affaire est de se perdre dans des détails infimes. De prime abord, les faits sont compliqués, mais si l'on s'en tient à l'essentiel, on comprend bien ce qui s'est produit. Comme je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi et d'ordonner un nouveau procès, je n'ai pas l'intention de relater tous les faits en détail, mais pour répondre à la question posée dans l'autorisation d'appel, je vais décrire les opérations pertinentes. A la fin de 1971, époque des actes reprochés, Langley's Limited, une entreprise de nettoyage à sec établie de longue date à Toronto, possédait un portefeuille considérable de valeurs de premier ordre, évalué à $1,443,460. La participation majoritaire dans la compagnie, pour environ 90% des actions ordinaires, était détenue par deux successions et un particulier représentés par un comptable agréé, M. Leonard Johnston. A l'automne 1971, un des accusés, M. Olan, président de La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal, est entré en contact avec M. Johnston afin de négocier l'achat de la participation majoritaire. Les négociations qui suivirent ont mené à une entente aux termes de laquelle La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal achèterait les actions ordinaires majoritaires de Langley, et certaines de ses actions privilégiées, pour un montant other two accused, Mr. Hudson, President and Director of Beauport Holdings, and Mr. Hartnett, Vice-President and Director of Beauport Holdings and legal adviser to Mr. Hudson. Before the actual closing, First Montreal assigned all of its rights under the agreement to Beauport Holdings. Thereafter, Hudson and Hartnett played the dominant roles, aided in some respects by Olan, who, it was agreed, would receive a finder's fee of approximately $67,000 for negotiating the sale. As at November 30, 1971, total current assets of Beauport Holdings amounted to $149,968.30 and total assets of the company amounted to $738,966.87. The closing of the purchase of the Langley's shares was to have taken place on December 2, 1971, but the purchasers did not then have the money with which to close. Closing date was postponed.

Mr. Leslie Smith, Manager of a branch of Toronto-Dominion Bank located in Toronto, testified that in the month of December, 1971, he had two separate discussions with the three accused concerning the certification of a cheque in the amount of $1,025,000 to be drawn on the account of Beauport Holdings in that bank. The account had been opened on December 8, 1971. On the first occasion, there were no funds in the account, but Smith was advised that there was a deposit of $488,000 available and that the balance of the funds would be deposited later the same day. Smith refused to certify the cheque, as his modest credit limits of $10,000 unsecured and $20,000 secured did not permit him to authorize an overdraft in the amount of the shortfall of $537,000. On the second meeting, the respondents asked for certification of a $1,025,000 cheque on conditions which proved to be acceptable to Smith. It was agreed that he would be present at the closing and retain possession of the cheque until such time as the purchase of Langley's had been completed, at which time the accused would take possession of the Langley's portfolio, sell the securities, and with the proceeds cause Langley's to buy another company they owned.

de $1,485,000, payable comptant. A la fin des négociations, M. Johnston a aussi rencontré les deux autres accusés, M. Hudson, président et administrateur de Beauport Holdings, et M. Hartnett, vice-président et administrateur de Beauport Holdings et conseiller juridique de M. Hudson. Avant la signature, La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal a cédé tous ses droits découlant de l'entente à Beauport Holdings. Par la suite, Hudson et Hartnett ont joué un rôle de premier plan, aidés à certains égards par Olan qui, selon les faits admis, devait recevoir des honoraires d'environ $67,000 pour avoir négocié la vente. Le 30 novembre 1971, les disponibilités de Beauport Holdings s'élevaient à $149,968.30 et son actif total à $738,966.87. La signature de l'achat des actions de Langley devait se faire le 2 décembre 1971, mais les acheteurs n'avaient pas les fonds nécessaires pour conclure la transaction. La date de signature fut donc différée.

M. Leslie Smith, gérant d'une succursale de la Banque Toronto-Dominion à Toronto, a témoigné qu'à deux reprises en décembre 1971, il avait discuté avec les trois accusés de la certification d'un chèque de $1,025,000 à tirer sur le compte de Beauport Holdings à cette banque. Le compte était ouvert depuis le 8 décembre 1971. A la première rencontre, le compte n'était pas approvisionné, mais on a informé Smith qu'un dépôt de $488,000 était disponible et que le solde serait déposé plus tard le même jour. Smith a refusé de viser le chèque car il ne pouvait accorder un découvert que jusqu'à concurrence de $10,000 sans garantie et à $20,000 avec garantie; il n'était donc pas en mesure d'autoriser un découvert de $537,000, soit le solde non payé. A la deuxième rencontre, les intimés ont demandé et obtenu un chèque visé de $1,025,000, Smith ayant jugé les conditions acceptables. Il fut convenu que le chèque serait signé en sa présence et qu'il le conserverait jusqu'à la conclusion de l'achat de Langley. A ce moment, les accusés prendraient possession du portefeuille de Langley, vendraient les titres et, avec le produit, feraient acheter par Langley une autre compagnie qu'ils possédaient.

1978 CanLII 9 (SCC)

On December 10, 1971, the accused completed, through Beauport Holdings, the purchase of approximately 90% of the Langley's common shares; the preferred shares were purchased later. In satisfaction, the vendors received the certified cheque for $1,025,000, drawn on the account of Beauport Holdings, plus $246,545, being the proceeds of a loan from one Orenstein to Beauport Holdings. Upon payment being tendered, the accused were handed a briefcase containing all of the stocks and bonds owned by Langley's. The briefcase was immediately turned over to two representatives of a brokerage firm who, accompanied by Smith and Hudson, and possibly Olan, went to the office of the brokerage firm where a cheque in the amount of $500,000 was issued, payable to Langley's. This cheque represented the first instalment of the proceeds from sale of the securities.

Le 10 décembre 1971, les accusés ont conclu, par l'intermédiaire de Beauport Holdings, l'achat d'environ 90% des actions ordinaires de Langley. Les actions privilégiées ont été achetées plus tard. Les vendeurs ont reçu en paiement le chèque visé de $1,025,000 tiré sur le compte de Beauport Holdings, et $246,545, soit le produit d'un prêt consenti par un nommé Orenstein à Beauport Holdings. En contrepartie du paiement, les accusés ont reçu un porte-documents contenant toutes les actions et obligations détenues par Langley. Le porte-documents a immédiatement été remis à deux représentants d'une maison de courtage qui, accompagnés de Smith et de Hudson, et peut-être d'Olan, se sont rendus au bureau de la maison de courtage pour y recevoir un chèque de $500,000 à l'ordre de Langley. Ce chèque représentait le premier acompte sur le produit de la vente des valeurs.

I should here mention that, prior to the closing, the respondents Hudson and Hartnett caused to be incorporated, on November 23, 1971, a company under the name of Beauport Financial Corporation Limited, of which Hartnett became President and Director. Immediately following the purchase of the Langley's shares from the former owners on December 10, a meeting of the new directors of Langley's, namely Hudson, one Teeter, and one Joseph, was convened at which four items of business were transacted. The first, headed "Sale of Securities," involved the passage of a resolution authorizing Hudson to sell all the securities owned by Langley's. The actual resolution was preceded by these few words:

Je dois mentionner ici que le 23 novembre 1971, avant la signature, les intimés Hudson et Hartnett ont constitué la compagnie Beauport Financial Corporation Limited, dont Hartnett est devenu président et administrateur. Immédiatement après l'achat des actions de Langley à leurs anciens propriétaires le 10 décembre, les nouveaux administrateurs de Langley, Hudson, un nommé Teeter et un nommé Joseph, se sont réunis pour régler quatre points à l'ordre du jour de la réunion. Le premier, intitulé «vente des valeurs,» nécessitait une résolution qui autorise Hudson à vendre toutes les valeurs détenues par Langley. La résolution en question était précédée de ces quelques mots:

> The Chairman suggested that in view of certain plans which he had for the Corporation it would be advisable that its investment portfolio be liquidated.

> [TRADUCTION] Le président suggère que pour réaliser certains projets qu'il entretient pour la compagnie, il serait judicieux de réaliser le portefeuille de valeurs.

The second item authorized the purchase from Beauport Holdings of 11,000 shares in the capital of Gibraltar Mines Ltd. for $49,500. The third item involved the purchase from First Montreal of the outstanding shares of a Quebec company, Advertising Associates Limited, for $400,000. The final item authorized Langley's to subscribe for 10,000 shares in the capital of Beauport Financial at a price of $10 per share.

Le deuxième point autorisait l'achat à Beauport Holdings de 11,000 actions du capital de Gibraltar Mines Ltd., au prix de $49,500. Le troisième point portait sur l'achat à La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal des actions en circulation d'une compagnie québécoise, Advertising Associates Limited, pour $400,000. Le dernier point autorisait Langley à souscrire 10,000 actions du capital de Beauport Financial, à $10 l'action.

1978 CanLII 9 (SCC)

Later the same afternoon, at a meeting of the board of directors of Beauport Financial, attended by Hartnett and Teeter, it was explained that when the Corporation was organized it was intended to be a wholly-owned subsidiary of Langley's. A resolution was passed authorizing issuance to Langley's of up to a maximum of 99,997 shares of Beauport Financial at a price of $10 per share. Another resolution was passed authorizing the officers of the corporation to make loans to Beauport Holdings. By the end of the day Langley's had become a subsidiary of Beauport Holdings and Beauport Financial had become a subsidiary of Langley's. Beauport Holdings thus became the top company in the corporate structure.

The money used by Beauport Holdings to take over Langley's, according to Hartnett, came from:

—a deposit of $88,000 into the account of Beauport Holdings,
—a loan of $400,000 from Hudson,
—a loan of $400,000 from First Montreal,
—a loan of $100,000 from Beauport Financial,
—the sale of 11,000 shares of Gibraltar Mines by Beauport Holdings to Langley's for $49,500.

These monies were sufficient to meet the certified cheque for $1,025,000. Additionally, there was the loan from Orenstein.

In response to a demand for particulars the Crown alleged that the $1,190,000 referred to in the charge was made up as follows:

(1) Payment by Langley's Limited to the First Montreal City Corporation on or about December 10, 1971, in the amount of four hundred thousand dollars ($400,000.00);

(2) Payment by Langley's Limited to Beauport Financial Corporation Limited on or about December 10, 1971, in the amount of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000.00);

(3) Payment by Langley's Limited to Beauport Financial Corporation Limited on or about December 14, 1971, in the amount of two hundred and ninety thousand dollars ($290,000.00);

(4) Payment by Langley's Limited to Beauport Financial Corporation Limited on or about December 27,

Plus tard, le même après-midi, au cours d'une réunion du conseil d'administration de Beauport Financial à laquelle assistaient Hartnett et Teeter, on annonça que la compagnie avait été constituée pour devenir une filiale en propriété exclusive de Langley. Une résolution autorisa l'émission en faveur de Langley d'actions de Beauport Financial, à $10 l'action, jusqu'à concurrence de 99,997 actions. Une autre résolution autorisa les administrateurs de la compagnie à consentir des prêts à Beauport Holdings. A la fin de la journée, Langley était devenue une filiale de Beauport Holdings et Beauport Financial une filiale de Langley. Beauport Holdings était donc devenue la compagnie-mère du groupe.

Voici, selon Hartnett, les sources des fonds utilisés par Beauport Holdings pour prendre le contrôle de Langley:

—le dépôt de $88,000 au compte de Beauport Holdings,
—le prêt de $400,000 de Hudson,
—le prêt de $400,000 de La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal, —le prêt de $100,000 de Beauport Financial,
—la vente de 11,000 actions de Gibraltar Mines par Beauport Holdings à Langley, pour $49,500.

Ces fonds suffisaient pour permettre la certification du chèque de $1,025,000. En plus, il y avait le prêt consenti par Orenstein.

En réponse à une demande de détails, le ministère public a prétendu que le montant de $1,190,000 mentionné à l'acte d'accusation provenait:

[TRADUCTION] (1) Du paiement par Langley's Limited à La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal, le 10 décembre 1971, ou vers cette date, d'un montant de quatre cent mille dollars ($400,000);

(2) Du paiement par Langley's Limited à Beauport Financial Corporation Limited, le 10 décembre 1971, ou vers cette date, d'un montant de cent mille dollars ($100,000);

(3) Du paiement par Langley's Limited à Beauport Financial Corporation Limited, le 14 décembre 1971, ou vers cette date, d'un montant de deux cent quatre-vingt-dix mille dollars ($290,000);

(4) Du paiement par Langley's Limited à Beauport Financial Corporation Limited, le 27 décembre

1978 CanLII 9 (SCC)

1971, in the amount of four hundred thousand dollars ($400,000.00).

The purchase of the shares of Advertising Associates no longer seems to be regarded by the Crown as being the subject of fraudulent acquisition. The case, therefore, turns on items (2), (3), and (4). Item (2) refers to the share subscription by Langley's for shares in Beauport Financial. Item (3) arose in these circumstances. On December 14, 1971, the sum of $290,000 was paid by Langley's to Beauport Financial and a like sum was paid by Beauport Financial to First Montreal. At trial, it was common ground that the price paid by Langley's for the shares of Advertising Associates had been later reduced to $350,000 from $400,000. Olan, through First Montreal, had earlier purchased the shares of Advertising Associates for $300,000, with a $10,000 deposit. It was the Crown's contention that the $290,000 paid by Langley's to Beauport Financial to First Montreal on December 14 was in payment of the Advertising Associates' shares and that the $400,000 paid by Langley's to First Montreal on December 10, following sale of the Langley's portfolio, and loaned on the same day by First Montreal to Beauport Holdings, was for the purpose of putting Beauport Holdings in funds wherewith to complete the purchase of the Langley's shares and not in payment of the shares of Advertising Associates. Item (4) relates to the repayment out of funds originating in Langley's of the loan of $400,000 by Hudson to Beauport Holdings. As a result of transactions (2), (3) and (4), Beauport Financial received from Langley's the sum of $790,000 which it in turn loaned to Beauport Holdings enabling Beauport Holdings to complete the purchase of Langley's.

The conflict in this case is essentially very narrow. It centres simply on whether there was evidence upon which a jury properly instructed could find beyond reasonable doubt that Langley's suffered deprivation from dishonest action of respondents. To show this narrowness of the dis-1971, ou vers cette date, d'un montant de quatre cent mille dollars ($400,000).

Il semble que le ministère public ne considère plus l'achat des actions d'Advertising Associates comme une acquisition frauduleuse. L'affaire porte donc sur les par. (2), (3) et (4). Le paragraphe (2) renvoie à la souscription par Langley des actions de Beauport Financial. Le paragraphe (3) se rapporte à l'opération suivante: le 14 décembre 1971, Langley a versé à Beauport Financial un montant de $290,000 et Beauport Financial a remis à La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal le même montant. Au procès, les parties ont admis que le prix payé par Langley pour les actions d'Advertising Associates avait par la suite été réduit de $400,000 à $350,000. Par l'intermédiaire de La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal, Olan s'était préalablement porté acquéreur des actions d'Advertising Associates pour un montant de $300,000, avec $10,000 de dépôt. Le ministère public a soutenu que les $290,000 payés par Langley à Beauport Financial qui les a versés à La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal, le 14 décembre, représentaient le paiement des actions d'Advertising Associates et que les $400,000 payés par Langley à La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal le 10 décembre, après la vente du portefeuille de Langley, et prêtés le même jour par La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal à Beauport Holdings visaient à fournir à cette dernière les fonds nécessaires pour conclure l'achat des actions de Langley et ne se rapportaient pas au paiement des actions d'Advertising Associates. Le paragraphe (4) se rapporte au remboursement à même les fonds de Langley du prêt de $400,000 consenti par Hudson à Beauport Holdings. A la suite des opérations mentionnées aux par. (2), (3) et (4), Beauport Financial a reçu de Langley la somme de $790,000 qu'elle a à son tour prêtée à Beauport Holdings, lui permettant ainsi de conclure l'achat de Langley.

La question litigieuse dans cette affaire est très étroite. Elle est centrée sur le point de savoir si la preuve fournie permettait à un jury ayant reçu les instructions appropriées de conclure, hors de tout doute raisonnable, que les actes malhonnêtes des intimés ont infligé une privation à Langley. Pour pute, it is necessary only to quote the argument of the accused respondents. First, the respondent Hartnett:

73. It is respectfully submitted that the Crown failed to prove any deprivation of Langley's. The respondent does not take issue with the appellant's submission that economic loss is not a necessary ingredient in the offence of fraud. It is respectfully submitted, however, that in a case where no economic loss is shown, the Crown must establish other facts to show that the victim of a fraud was dishonestly deprived of something. The evidence adduced in the present case does not establish such deprivation. The appellant says deprivation was shown in two ways. First, it submits that corporate assets were used for personal purposes and were therefore not available for corporate purposes such as other investments or maintaining a stable financial base. It is submitted that in fact, the Crown proved at trial that Langley's portfolio had been turned into other investments and that at the date of those investments, there was no evidence that such investments would fail to provide a stable financial base.

Secondly, the appellant has submitted that deprivation was shown in that the corporate assets were put at risk. The risk taken, according to the appellant arose from the exchange of $1,190,000.00 in liquid assets for $49,500.00 worth of Gibraltar shares, $350,000.00 of Advertising Associates shares and $790,000.00 of shares of Beauport Financial. The evidence shows that the shares of Gibraltar and Advertising Associates were valuable assets. Further, the evidence establishes that the purchase of $790,000.00 worth of shares in Beauport Financial and Beauport Financial's loan of $790,000.00 to Beauport Holdings were proper business transactions and that at the time of the loan from Beauport Financial to Beauport Holdings, Beauport Holdings had substantial assets sufficient to cover the amount of the loan.

Next, the respondent Hudson:

16. Consistent with its application of Cox and Paton v. The Queen to the facts of this case the Court of Appeal for Ontario held that the Crown in the case at bar had failed to satisfy the onus on it of showing the dubious nature of the promissory notes given to Beauport Financial, and further held that there was no evidence to go to the jury from which they could conclude that the value of those notes was so tenuous and illusory as to taint the whole transaction with fraud.

17. At the very best, even on the test proposed by the appellant some prejudice or risk of prejudice must be conclusively provided in order to result in a finding of bien montrer à quel point cette question est étroite, il suffit de citer un extrait de l'argumentation des accusés intimés. Premièrement, l'intimé Hartnett:

[TRADUCTION] 73. Nous soutenons respectueusement que le ministère public n'a pas prouvé que Langley a subi une privation. L'intimé ne conteste pas la prétention de l'appelante selon laquelle une perte pécuniaire ne constitue pas un élément essentiel de l'infraction de fraude. Par contre, nous soutenons respectueusement que dans un cas où il n'y a pas de perte pécuniaire, le ministère public doit établir d'autres faits pour prouver que la victime d'une fraude a été malhonnêtement privée de quelque chose, ce qui n'est pas le cas de la preuve présentée en l'espèce. L'appelante prétend avoir établi la privation de deux manières. Premièrement, elle soutient que l'actif de la compagnie a servi à des fins personnelles et que la compagnie n'en disposait plus pour investir ou simplement maintenir sa stabilité financière. Nous prétendons qu'en fait, la preuve du ministère public révèle que le portefeuille de Langley a servi à d'autres placements et que rien dans la preuve n'indique qu'à l'époque de ces placements, on pouvait dire qu'ils n'assureraient pas la stabilité financière recherchée.

Deuxièmement, l'appelante soutient avoir démontré la privation en prouvant que l'actif de la compagnie a été mis en péril. Selon l'appelante, le risque consiste en l'échange d'un actif liquide de $1,190,000, pour des actions de Gibraltar valant $49,500, des actions d'Advertising Associates valant $350,000 et des actions de Beauport Financial valant $790,000. La preuve révèle que les actions de Gibraltar et d'Advertising Associates étaient des biens de valeur. Elle révèle aussi que l'achat des actions de Beauport Financial pour un montant de $790,000 et le prêt du même montant consenti par cette dernière à Beauport Holdings constituaient des opérations commerciales régulières et qu'à l'époque du prêt de Beauport Financial à Beauport Holdings, l'actif de cette dernière était suffisant pour couvrir le montant du prêt.

Puis l'intimé Hudson:

[TRADUCTION] 16. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a appliqué l'arrêt Cox et Paton c. La Reine aux faits de l'espèce et a jugé que, dans la présente affaire, le ministère public ne s'était pas acquitté de la charge de prouver le caractère douteux des billets à ordre donnés à Beauport Financial et a en outre estimé qu'il n'y avait aucune preuve à soumettre au jury pour lui permettre de conclure que la valeur de ces billets était infime et illusoire, au point d'entacher toute l'opération de fraude.

17. Au mieux, même selon le critère défini par l'appelante, il faut apporter la preuve d'un préjudice ou d'un risque de préjudice pour conclure à la malhonnêteté.

1978 CanLII 9 (SCC)

dishonesty. When a charge arises in circumstances where all the directors of the corporation are said to have defrauded the corporation there must be proof that the corporation was deprived of something to which it was entitled without having obtained something in return which could be reasonably regarded as quid pro quo.

The issues are whether the $790,000 of Langley's' assets used to purchase shares in Beauport Financial were expended in furtherance of the bona fide business interests of Langley's, or expended in advancing the personal interests of the accused, and whether Langley's suffered deprivation, in the sense described above, as a result of this action. There can be no doubt that the purchase of the controlling block of Langley's shares could not have been effected without utilization of the Langley's' portfolio. But this is not decisive. Beauport Holdings would appear to have contributed from its own assets the sum of $88,000, plus the shares of Gibraltar Mines worth $49,500. Again, this is not decisive. The question is whether there was evidence that the accused dishonestly deprived Langley's for personal ends. Was the investment of $790,000 by Langley's in its subsidiary, Beauport Financial, with that money to be loaned by Beauport Financial to Beauport Holdings to enable Beauport Holdings to acquire control of Langley's, a legitimate investment for Langley's to make? Did this investment cause detriment, prejudice, or risk of prejudice to Langley's?

The principal asset, indeed almost the only asset, of Beauport Financial was the indebtedness to it of Beauport Holdings. Therefore, the worth of the investment by Langley's in Beauport Financial is determined by the ability of the ultimate recipient of the funds, Beauport Holdings, to repay the moneys loaned. It should be noted that this loan was by way of unsecured demand notes. The issue thus resolves into an examination of the ability of Beauport Holdings to repay on demand the loan of $790,000 made to it by Beauport Financial.

It was not necessary for the Crown to establish that the investment in Beauport Financial was "worthless", to use the term of Cartwright J. in Cox and Paton, or of "negligible worth", to use

Dans le cas où l'on accuse tous les administrateurs d'une compagnie de l'avoir fraudée, la preuve doit établir que la compagnie a été privée de quelque chose à quoi elle avait droit sans obtenir quoi que ce soit qui puisse raisonnablement constituer une contrepartie.

Il faut déterminer si le montant de $790,000 provenant de l'actif de Langley et utilisé pour l'achat d'actions de Beauport Financial a été dépensé pour servir les véritables intérêts financiers de Langley ou, au contraire, les intérêts personnels des accusés. Il faut également décider si Langley a subi une privation, au sens indiqué plus haut, à la suite de cette opération commerciale. Il ne fait aucun doute que l'achat d'une participation majoritaire dans Langley ne pouvait se faire sans utiliser le portefeuille de cette dernière. Mais cet argument n'est pas concluant. Il semble que Beauport Holdings ait contribué $88,000, tirés de son propre actif, plus les actions de Gibraltar Mines, valant $49,500. Cela non plus n'est pas concluant. La question est de savoir si la preuve permettait de conclure que les accusés ont malhonnêtement privé Langley à des fins personnelles. Les $790,000 investis par Langley dans sa filiale, Beauport Financial, qui a prêté ces fonds à Beauport Holdings pour permettre à cette dernière de prendre le contrôle de Langley, constituaient-ils, pour Langley, un investissement régulier? Cet investissement a-t-il causé des dommages ou un préjudice à Langley ou y a-t-il eu risque de préjudice?

L'actif principal, en fait le seul avoir de Beauport Financial, était sa créance sur Beauport Holdings. En conséquence, la valeur de l'investissement de Langley dans Beauport Financial dépend de la capacité du dernier bénéficiaire des fonds, Beauport Holdings, de rembourser l'argent prêté. Je souligne que ce prêt avait été consenti contre des billets à demande non garantis. La question revient donc à examiner la capacité de Beauport Holdings de payer à demande le prêt de $790,000 consenti par Beauport Financial.

Le ministère public n'avait pas à prouver que l'investissement dans Beauport Financial n'avait «aucune valeur», pour reprendre les termes du juge Cartwright dans Cox et Paton, ou n'avait qu'une the words of Freedman J.A. in the same case. I do not think that Cartwright J. intended to lay down the proposition that in order to sustain a charge of fraud, it must be shown that the victim of the fraud was caused to exchange something of worth for something entirely without worth. On the evidence in Cox and Paton, it was open to the jury to conclude, in the opinion of Cartwright J., that Fropak Limited had no assets of any value. In that case, the detriment was plain and entire. The question to be determined in each case is rather whether there was deprivation caused in furtherance of personal ends. The Crown contends that the case of Cox and Paton and the case at bar are on all fours, that there are minor points of difference, but essentially the cases are symmetrical. In Cox and Paton, the victim, Brandon Packers, was caused to buy shares of Fropak, a company revived for the purpose of the transaction, which loaned the funds to the private companies of the accused, enabling those companies to purchase the controlling shares of Brandon Packers. In the case at bar, the alleged victim, Langley's, was caused to buy shares in Beauport Financial, a company incorporated for the purpose of the transaction, which loaned funds to Beauport Holdings, with which at least two of the accused were closely associated, enabling Beauport Holdings to purchase the controlling shares of Langley's. In Cox and Paton, it was open to the jury to find that the promissory notes given by the two personal holding companies of the accused to Fropak were of little or no worth. Yet those companies would appear to have ended up with the shares earlier owned by Donaldson and, to that extent, could not be said to be worthless. In the present case, Beauport Holdings ended up with the controlling shares of Langley's. To that extent, there is a further similarity in the two cases.

In Cox and Paton, there was evidence that the covenant to repay given by the personal corporations was of little value. In the case at bar, the ability of Beauport Holdings to repay on demand a loan in the amount of $790,000 is the critical issue. Ability to repay is not determined by asset value alone, but rather by an appraisal of the entire financial position of the debtor, including both «valeur infime», selon l'expression du juge Freedman dans la même affaire en Cour d'appel. Je ne pense pas que le juge Cartwright voulait poser en règle que, pour prouver la fraude, il faut démontrer que la victime a été amenée à échanger un bien de valeur contre un autre sans aucune valeur. Vu la preuve soumise dans Cox et Paton, le jury pouvait conclure, selon le juge Cartwright, que Fropak n'avait aucun actif de valeur. Dans ce cas, le préjudice était total et absolu. La question à trancher dans chaque cas est plutôt de savoir si la poursuite d'intérêts personnels a causé une privation. Le ministère public soutient que, sous réserve de différences mineures, Cox et Paton et la présente affaire coïncident et qu'elles sont essentiellement semblables. Dans Cox et Paton, on a fait acheter à la victime, Brandon Packers, des actions de Fropak, une compagnie réanimée aux fins de l'opération, qui à son tour a prêté l'argent aux compagnies privées des accusés afin de permettre à celles-ci d'acheter une participation majoritaire dans Brandon Packers. En l'espèce, on a fait acheter à Langley, la victime présumée, des actions de Beauport Financial, une compagnie constituée aux fins de l'opération, qui à son tour a prêté l'argent à Beauport Holdings, avec laquelle au moins deux des accusés avaient des liens étroits, afin de permettre à cette dernière d'acheter une participation majoritaire dans Langley. Dans Cox et Paton, le jury pouvait conclure que les billets à ordre donnés par les deux compagnies personnelles de gestion des accusés à Fropak avaient peu de valeur, sinon aucune. Il semble toutefois que ces compagnies aient reçu en contrepartie les actions ayant appartenu à Donaldson et, en ce sens, on ne peut dire qu'elles n'avaient pas de valeur. En l'espèce, Beauport Holdings a reçu en contrepartie une participation majoritaire dans Langley. Dans cette mesure, c'est un autre point commun entre les deux affaires.

Dans Cox et Paton, la preuve indiquait que l'engagement de remboursement pris par les compagnies personnelles avait peu de valeur. En l'espèce, la capacité de Beauport Holdings de payer à demande un prêt de $790,000 est au cœur du litige. La capacité de rembourser ne dépend pas de la seule valeur de l'actif, mais d'une évaluation de la situation financière globale du débiteur, c'est-à-assets and liabilities. As we are here concerned with a demand loan, the relationship between current assets and current liabilities is of particular importance.

The jury had before it, as Exhibit 3, the audited balance sheet of Beauport Holdings as at December 31, 1971 which showed, as at that date, current assets of $16,953 and current liabilities of $1,164,415. The asset side of the balance sheet consisted of (i) the current assets ($16,953); (ii) an investment, being the down-payment on an option to purchase the shares of another company ($250,000); (iii) the investment in Langley's ($1,378,810); (iv) mining claims situated in the Northwest Territories ($250,000); (v) deferred pre-production expenditures ($19,691), and (vi) organization expenses ($4,613). The current liabilities of $1,164,415 included the demand notes payable to Beauport Financial ($793,205) and the Orenstein note payable February 8, 1972 ($250,000). Included also under liabilities were shareholders equity represented by capital stock ($805,648), contingency reserve ($12,500) and deficit ($62,496). According to the financial statement, Beauport Holdings sustained a net operating loss during the nine months ended December 31, 1971 in the amount of $278,020. Current liabilities exceeded current assets by $1,147,462. It was open to the jury faced with this evidence, and with no evidence that the value of the mining claims exceeded book value, to find that the net worth of Beauport Holdings was such that it would have been quite impossible for the company to have repaid on demand the loan of $790,000, or even any substantial part of this amount. It was thus open to the jury to find that the investment of $790,000 in the shares of Beauport Financial was made to the clear detriment of Langley's. It was open to the jury to ask this question—what possible legitimate business reason could have prompted the disposal by Langley's of a portfolio of high quality securities and, in effect, the substitution therefor, as to $790,000, of unsecured demand promissory notes of a company with a working capital deficit of over $1,100,000 and over which company Langley's had no control?

dire l'actif et le passif. Comme il est question d'un billet à demande, le rapport entre les disponibilités et le passif exigible est d'une importance particulière.

Le jury avait devant lui le bilan vérifié de Beauport Holdings, daté du 31 décembre 1971 (pièce 3). A cette date, les disponibilités s'élevaient à $16,953 et le passif exigible à $1,164,415. Au bilan, les montants suivants figurent à l'actif: (i) les disponibilités ($16,953); (ii) un placement, soit un acompte sur une option d'achat des actions d'une autre compagnie ($250,000); (iii) le placement dans Langley ($1,378,810); (iv) des concessions minières dans les Territoires du Nord-Ouest ($250,000); (v) le report de dépenses antérieures à la production ($19,691) et (vi) des dépenses d'organisation ($4,613). Le passif de $1,164,415 comprenait les billets à demande à l'ordre de Beauport Financial ($793,205) et le billet d'Orenstein, exigible le 8 février 1972 ($250,000). Le passif comprenait en outre, au poste de l'avoir des actionnaires, le capital actions ($805,648), une réserve pour éventualités ($12,500) et un déficit ($62,496). D'après les états financiers, Beauport Holdings a accusé durant la période de neuf mois se terminant le 31 décembre 1971 une perte nette d'exploitation de $278,020. Le passif exigible excédait de $1,147,462 les disponibilités. Vu cette preuve et en l'absence de preuve que la valeur des concessions minières excédait leur valeur comptable, le jury pouvait conclure que l'actif net de Beauport Holdings ne lui permettait pas de payer à demande le prêt de $790,000, ni même une partie importante de cette somme. Le jury pouvait donc conclure que le placement de $790,000 dans les actions de Beauport Financial était nettement fait au détriment de Langley. Il pouvait se demander quel motif commercial légitime avait pu inciter Langley à céder son portefeuille de valeurs de grande qualité pour l'échanger, à concurrence de $790,000, contre des billets à demande non garantis d'une compagnie dont le fonds de roulement accusait un déficit supérieur à $1,100,000 et sur laquelle Langley n'exerçait aucun contrôle.

1978 CanLII 9 (SCC)

There is further evidence which bears upon Beauport Holdings' ability to repay. The resolution passed by the Board of Beauport Financial, authorizing loans to Beauport Holdings, and the discussion which preceded it, read as follows:

Loan to Beauport Holdings Limited

The chairman then presented an application of Beauport Holdings Limited for a line of credit and loans from this Corporation. Unaudited financial statements of Beauport Holdings Limited, one immediately before and one immediately after the acquisition of 13,453 shares of common stock of Langley's Limited were presented and examined. It was pointed out that Beauport Holdings Limited now owns approximately 90% of the voting stock of Langley's Limited and Langley's Limited in turn owns all of the issued and outstanding shares of this Corporation. There followed a lengthy discussion particularly as to how Beauport Holdings Limited proposes to repay any loans to it by this Corporation. It was pointed out that the 13,453 common shares of Langley's Limited will be free and clear when Beauport Holdings pays the loan from Charles Orenstein In Trust in full; that a loan from a bank at a lower interest rate is probably feasible with said 13,453 shares as collateral because Langley's Limited owns valuable real property free and clear of any liens and in view of the earning power of Langley's Limited. As an alternative Langley's Limited can declare substantial dividends to its stockholders the proceeds of which can be used by Beauport Holdings Limited to pay its indebtedness to this Corporation. Mr. Hartnett pointed out that he is a director of Beauport Holdings Limited and therefore disqualified himself from voting. Upon motion duly made and seconded, it was unanimously:

RESOLVED that the officers of this Corporation be and they hereby are authorized, from time to time, to make loans in such amounts and on such terms as they deem to be in the best interest of the Corporation to Beauport Holdings Limited.

It was open to the jury to find to be false the statement that the 13,453 common shares of Langley's Limited would be free and clear when Beauport Holdings paid the loan from Charles Orenstein In Trust in full. At the date of the meeting Beauport Holdings was also in debt to Hudson in the amount of $400,000 and in debt to First Montreal City Corporation in the amount of $400,000. Equally, it was open to the jury to find

Il existe d'autres preuves relatives à la capacité de paiement de Beauport Holdings. Voici le texte de la résolution adoptée par le conseil d'administration de Beauport Financial pour autoriser les prêts à Beauport Holdings et la discussion qui l'a précédée:

[TRADUCTION] Prêt à Beauport Holdings Limited

Le président expose ensuite une demande de crédit et de prêts que nous présente Beauport Holdings Limited. Des états financiers non vérifiés de Beauport Holdings Limited, l'un précédant immédiatement l'achat de 13,453 actions ordinaires de Langley's Limited et l'autre le suivant immédiatement, sont examinés. On souligne que Beauport Holdings Limited détient maintenant approximativement 90% des actions de Langley's Limited donnant droit de vote et que cette dernière est, en retour, propriétaire de toutes les actions en circulation de cette compagnie-ci. La discussion s'attarde alors sur la façon dont Beauport Holdings Limited entend rembourser le prêt que lui consentirait cette compagnie-ci. On indique que les 13,453 actions ordinaires de Langley's Limited seront libres de toute charge sur remboursement complet par Beauport Holdings du prêt consenti par Charles Orenstein, en fiducie; qu'on peut probablement obtenir un prêt bancaire à un taux d'intérêt plus faible, en donnant les 13,453 actions en garantie, compte tenu de la capacité de gain de Langley's Limited et du fait qu'elle est propriétaire de biens immeubles importants, libres de toute charge. Comme autre possibilité, Langley's Limited peut déclarer des dividendes considérables à ses actionnaires, ce qui permettrait à Beauport Holdings Limited de rembourser le prêt dû à cette compagnie-ci. M. Hartnett, à titre d'administrateur de Beauport Holdings Limited, souligne qu'il doit s'abstenir de voter. Sur une proposition dûment présentée et appuyée, il est unanimement:

RÉSOLU que les administrateurs de la Compagnie sont par les présentes autorisés à consentir, à l'occasion, à Beauport Holdings Limited des prêts dont ils établiront les montants et modalités dans le meilleur intérêt de la Compagnie.

Le jury pouvait conclure qu'il était mensonger de déclarer que les 13,453 actions ordinaires de Langley's Limited seraient libres de toute charge sur remboursement complet par Beauport Holdings du prêt consenti par Charles Orenstein, en fiducie. A l'époque de la réunion, Beauport Holdings était aussi endettée envers Hudson et envers La compagnie des Grandes Premières de Montréal d'un montant de $400,000 respectivement. En outre, le in the quoted passage, expressing the views of the participants themselves, cogent evidence of the kind of assets Langley's acquired in substitution for its investment in high quality marketable securities. It would appear that, when the loans were made, the only way in which those controlling Beauport Financial could see Beauport Holdings fulfilling its loan obligation, owed in substance to Langley's, was either in effect (i) by mortgaging the property and business of Langley's itself, or (ii) by Langley's paying the money to itself by declaring a dividend to Beauport Holdings which would then pay Beauport Financial which would then pay Langley's. On this evidence, it seems to me that a jury could find that the loan was other than a stable, secure and bona fide investment for Langley's. If Langley's should have encountered financial difficulties, it should have been able to call in the loan immediately for an injection of additional working capital. Before the accused came into the picture, with its portfolio intact, a substantial fund of liquid assets was available to Langley's. The loan to Beauport Holdings could only be realized by Langley's placing its own property at risk, or paying itself money which it clearly would not have in a situation of financial difficulty. In short, in my opinion, it was open to a jury to find that the exchange of the portfolio for the loan was something other than a quid pro quo.

I wish to turn now to the judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario. That Court was of the view that Cox and Paton v. The Queen was distinguishable on a number of grounds. Briefly these were: (i) for its cash assets, Brandon Packers obtained shares whose value was negligible; (ii) implicit in the transaction was the representation that the investment in shares of Fropak was a legitimate bona fide investment for Brandon Packers to make; (iii) the two private companies of Cox and of Paton, which obtained the shares of Brandon Packers, gave promissory notes to Fropak to repay Fropak for moneys advanced to the two companies to buy the controlling shares of Brandon Packers from Donaldson; (iv) in Cox and Paton it was the Crown's theory at trial that Brandon Packers had made loans to companies controlled by Cox and jury pouvait trouver dans l'extrait du procès-verbal précité, qui relate les opinions des participants eux-mêmes, une preuve convaincante du genre de biens que Langley a reçu à la place de ses titres de grande valeur marchande. Il ressort que lorsque les prêts ont été consentis, ceux qui dirigeaient Beauport Financial voyaient que Beauport Holdings ne parviendrait à rembourser son emprunt, dont Langley était le principal créancier, que par les moyens suivants (i) hypothéquer les immeubles et l'entreprise de Langley elle-même ou (ii) faire en sorte que Langley se rembourse elle-même en versant un dividende à Beauport Holdings qui rembourserait Beauport Financial qui, à son tour, rembourserait Langley. A mon avis, cette preuve permettait au jury de conclure que le prêt n'était pas un placement solide, sûr et régulier pour Langley. Si Langley avait eu à faire face à des difficultés financières, elle aurait dû être en mesure d'exiger le remboursement immédiat du prêt afin d'augmenter son fonds de roulement. Avant que les accusés n'entrent en scène, alors que son portefeuille était encore intact, Langley disposait d'importantes liquidités. Beauport Holdings ne pouvait effectuer l'emprunt que si Langley mettait en péril ses propres biens ou se payait à elle-même des montants qu'elle n'aurait plus, advenant des difficultés financières. En somme, je suis d'avis que le jury pouvait conclure qu'il y avait une nette disproportion dans l'échange du portefeuille contre le prêt.

J'en viens maintenant à l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario. Selon cette cour, Cox et Paton c. La Reine se distingue de la présente affaire pour plusieurs motifs. En bref, les voici: (i) en échange de son argent comptant, Brandon Packers a reçu des actions dont la valeur était négligeable; (ii) il était implicite dans l'opération que le placement dans les actions de Fropak représentait pour Brandon Packers un investissement régulier et légitime; (iii) les deux compagnies privées de Cox et de Paton, qui ont reçu les actions de Brandon Packers, ont remis à Fropak des billets à ordre afin de rembourser à cette dernière l'argent avancé aux deux compagnies pour acheter à Donaldson une participation majoritaire dans Brandon Packers; (iv) dans Cox et Paton, le ministère public a plaidé au procès que Brandon Packers avait consenti des

Paton which were not only unauthorized, but without any intention that they should be repaid; in the instant case, not only was there abundant evidence of authorization but, also, there was no evidence that the accused did not intend that Beauport Holdings should repay to Beauport Financial the loans which had been made to Beauport Holdings; (v) in Cox and Paton the Crown alleged that the accused had caused Brandon Packers to pay $208,750 in alleged management fees for negligible services.

Point (i) refers to value, as to which I will have more to say in a moment. With respect, point (ii) is not distinguishing, as implicit in the case at bar is the representation that the investment by Langley's in Beauport Financial and the loan by Beauport Financial to Beauport Holdings of the moneys so invested was a legitimate bona fide investment for Langley's to make. In the minute book itself, appears the statement that this investment would be advisable "in view of certain plans which he [the Chairman—Hudson] had for the Corporation". But that is all that appears. The evidence is silent as to justification. Why was it a legitimate bona fide investment? What was the reason for liquidating Langley's portfolio? In my opinion, it was proper for the judge at trial to leave it to the jury to decide whether the respondents honestly believed that the disposal of the portfolio and re-investment of the proceeds was in the best interests of Langley's. Point (iii), in my opinion, does not raise any distinguishing feature. In the instant case, Beauport Holdings (of which Hudson and Hartnett were President and Vice-President, respectively), gave promissory notes to Beauport Financial (Fropak in the Cox and Paton case) to "repay" (the word used by the Court of Appeal for Ontario) Beauport Financial for moneys advanced to Beauport Holdings to buy the controlling shares of Langley's. Point (iv) raises the question of intention to repay. In Cox and Paton, this Court did not find it necessary to deal with the point. In any event, an intention to repay has never been of avail in the past in negating fraud if the conduct of the accused is otherwise shown to involve dishonest deprivation for personal ends. An intention to repay might, at most, be relevant at sentencing. Point (v) also, in my view, fails to distinguish. It prêts aux compagnies contrôlées par Cox et Paton sans autorisation et sans la moindre intention qu'ils soient remboursés alors qu'en l'espèce, non seulement l'autorisation a été prouvée, mais rien dans la preuve n'indique que les accusés n'entendaient pas faire rembourser à Beauport Holdings les prêts consentis par Beauport Financial; (v) dans Cox et Paton, le ministère public a soutenu que les accusés avaient fait payer à Brandon Packers $208,750 en honoraires de gestion pour des services négligeables.

Le motif (i) a trait à la valeur et j'en discuterai plus loin. Avec égards, le point (ii) ne peut servir d'élément de distinction, car il est implicite en l'espèce que l'investissement de Langley dans Beauport Financial, suivi du prêt de ces fonds par cette dernière à Beauport Holdings, représentait pour Langley un placement régulier et légitime. Dans le procès-verbal même, il est déclaré qu'il s'agit d'un placement judicieux [TRADUCTION] «pour réaliser certains projets qu'il [le président—Hudson] entretient pour la compagnie». Le procès-verbal n'en dit pas plus. La preuve n'en révèle pas la raison. Pourquoi s'agissait-il d'un placement régulier et légitime? Pour quelle raison réaliser le portefeuille de Langley? A mon avis, le juge de première instance a eu raison de laisser au jury le soin de décider si les intimés croyaient sincèrement que la liquidation du portefeuille, dont le produit était réinvesti, était conforme aux meilleurs intérêts de Langley. Le point (iii) ne peut, à mon avis, servir d'élément de distinction. En l'espèce, Beauport Holdings (dont Hudson et Hartnett étaient respectivement président et vice-président) a remis à Beauport Financial (Fropak dans l'affaire Cox et Paton) des billets à ordre pour «rembourser» (le terme employé par la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario) à Beauport Financial l'argent prêté par Beauport Holdings pour acheter une participation majoritaire dans Langley. Le motif (iv) soulève la question de l'intention de rembourser. Dans Cox et Paton, cette Cour n'a pas jugé nécessaire d'analyser cet élément. Quoi qu'il en soit, l'intention de rembourser n'a jamais permis d'excuser une fraude si la preuve révèle que la conduite de l'accusé a donné lieu à un détournement malhonnête à des fins personnelles. Au mieux, l'intention de rembourser serait retenue pour mitiger la sentence. Le may have been an aggravating feature in Cox and Paton, but as noted in the judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario in the case at bar, the Court of Appeal in the Cox and Paton case did not find it necessary to pass upon the question of whether the evidence was sufficient to justify the theory of the Crown in respect of the management fees.

After discussing the points which, in his opinion, distinguished this case from Cox and Paton, Mr. Justice Arnup, writing for the Court, accurately stated the question to be answered by that Court, as follows:

> . . . was there evidence of an intention by the appellants to cheat Langley's, and to transfer for fraudulent purposes the liquid investment portfolio of Langley's for the benefit of the appellants?

To answer that question, the Court of Appeal considered it necessary to make some examination, as I have attempted to do, of the financial position of Beauport Holdings. In doing so, the Court first rejected the proposition advanced by counsel for Hudson, that having regard to the financial statement of Beauport Holdings before the transaction took place, it was in a position to purchase, for the price which was paid, the shares of Langley's. The Court then conceded that "undoubtedly the investment, indirect as it was, in Beauport Holdings was much more speculative than the shares sold out of the investment portfolio of Langley's". If that is so, it would seem to me to go some considerable distance in supporting the contentions of the Crown that it was proper to leave the case to the jury. Where there was this sort of evidence and no evidence in justification, the question of whether the exchange of a secure investment for one "much more speculative", constituted detriment in the circumstances was one for the jury alone to answer.

The Ontario Court of Appeal made three findings: (i) in no way could it be said that the assets of Beauport Holdings were worthless, or even of negligible value; (ii) its assets were of substantial value; (iii) there was no evidence fit to go to the jury that the value of the asset was so tenuous and illusory as to taint the whole transaction with fraud. In my opinion, with great respect, the Court point (v) ne peut plus servir à établir une distinction. Il pouvait s'agir d'une circonstance aggravante dans Cox et Paton mais, comme l'a souligné la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario en l'espèce, la Cour d'appel dans cette dernière affaire n'a pas jugé nécessaire de déterminer si la preuve était suffisante pour justifier la thèse du ministère public relativement aux honoraires de gestion.

Après une analyse des motifs qui, à son avis, permettaient de distinguer la présente affaire de Cox et Paton, le juge Arnup, qui a écrit au nom de la Cour, a bien posé la question à laquelle elle devait répondre:

> [TRADUCTION] . . . la preuve révèle-t-elle que les appelants avaient l'intention de tromper Langley et de transférer à des fins frauduleuses et à leur bénéfice le portefeuille de valeurs disponibles de Langley?

Pour répondre à cette question, la Cour d'appel a jugé nécessaire d'examiner, comme j'ai tenté de le faire, la situation financière de Beauport Holdings. Ce faisant, elle a d'abord rejeté la prétention de l'avocat de Hudson selon laquelle, compte tenu des états financiers de Beauport Holdings avant l'opération, cette dernière avait les moyens d'acheter, au prix payé, les actions de Langley. La Cour a ensuite concédé que [TRADUCTION] «il ne fait pas de doute que le placement, même indirect, dans Beauport Holdings était de nature beaucoup plus spéculative que ne l'étaient les actions du portefeuille de valeurs de Langley qui ont été vendues». Si c'est le cas, il me semble que cela vient appuyer les prétentions du ministère public selon lesquelles il appartenait au jury de trancher la question. Etant donné le genre de preuve soumise et vu l'absence de preuve justificative, il appartenait au jury seul de décider si l'échange de valeurs sûres pour des valeurs de nature «beaucoup plus spéculative» a causé un préjudice dans les circonstances.

La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a conclu en trois points: (i) on ne peut dire en aucune façon que l'actif de Beauport Holdings était sans valeur ou de valeur négligeable; (ii) son actif avait une valeur considérable; (iii) il n'y avait pas de preuve à soumettre au jury qui lui aurait permis de conclure que la valeur de l'actif était infime et illusoire, au point de donner à toute l'opération un of Appeal erred in these findings. First, it erred in law in applying a test of "worthless" or "negligible". The proper question was whether there was detriment or prejudice to Langley's. Second, it erred in its assessment of the asset position of Beauport Holdings which, apart from the Langley's shares, consisted of a $250,000 deposit, committed to another project, and some mining claims. None of those assets could be regarded as a current asset readily available for payment of a demand loan. Third, it erred in ignoring the liability position of Beauport Holdings and, in particular, the current liabilities which exceeded $1,160,000. In assessing ability to pay, the liabilities of the debtor are of equal or perhaps greater importance than the assets.

In my opinion, in answer to the question of law referred to this Court, the Court of Appeal for Ontario erred in holding that there was no evidence of fraud to go to the jury and in its consideration of the applicability and scope of the principles of law in Cox and Paton v. The Queen as they related to each accused. In my view, there was evidence to be left to the jury as to each of the accused.

Although not raised in any of the factums, an oral argument was advanced to the effect that this Court lacked jurisdiction to hear the present appeal because, as I understand the argument, we were concerned only with sufficiency of evidence and sufficiency of evidence raises only a question of fact, not appealable to this Court. In my view, the Court has jurisdiction. The question is not one of sufficiency of evidence but whether there is any evidence to go to the jury. This is a question of law: see R. v. McKay[9]. In the present case, the judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal reads in part:

As I have indicated, it is our conclusion that at the end of the Crown's case the trial Judge ought to have ruled that there was no evidence to go to the jury on caractère frauduleux. Avec égards, j'estime que ces conclusions sont erronées. Premièrement, la Cour d'appel a commis une erreur de droit en appliquant le critère de «l'absence de valeur» ou de «la valeur négligeable». La bonne question est de se demander si Langley a subi un préjudice ou un dommage. Deuxièmement, elle a commis une erreur dans son évaluation de l'actif de Beauport Holdings qui, à part les actions de Langley, comprenait seulement un dépôt de $250,000, engagé dans un autre projet, et quelques concessions minières. On ne peut considérer aucun de ces éléments d'actif comme un actif disponible et réalisable à court terme pour payer un prêt à demande. Troisièmement, elle a commis une erreur en n'accordant pas d'importance au passif de Beauport Holdings et, en particulier, à son passif exigible à court terme qui excédait $1,160,000. Pour évaluer la capacité de payer, l'ensemble des dettes du débiteur est tout aussi important, sinon plus, que l'actif.

En réponse à la question de droit soumise à cette Cour, j'estime donc que la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a commis une erreur en décidant qu'il n'y avait aucune preuve de fraude à soumettre au jury et en examinant, relativement à chaque accusé, l'applicabilité et la portée des principes de droit énoncés dans l'arrêt Cox et Paton c. La Reine. Au contraire, à mon avis, il y avait des éléments de preuve à soumettre au jury relativement à chaque accusé.

Bien que ce moyen n'ait pas été soulevé dans les factums, on a plaidé que cette Cour n'était pas compétente pour entendre le présent pourvoi parce que la question posée ne porte que sur la suffisance de la preuve et qu'il s'agit là d'une question de fait qui ne peut faire l'objet d'un pourvoi. A mon avis, la Cour est compétente. Il ne s'agit pas de déterminer si la preuve est suffisante mais de savoir s'il existe une preuve à soumettre au jury. C'est une question de droit: voir R. c. McKay[9]. En l'espèce, le jugement de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario déclare:

[TRADUCTION] Comme je l'ai indiqué, nous concluons que lorsque le ministère public a déclaré sa preuve close, le juge de première instance aurait dû

Count 1, and should have directed the jury that they were to bring in a verdict of not guilty on all three counts of the indictment and not merely counts 2 and 3.

Additionally, it is the duty of this Court to give the judgment which the Court below should have given.

I would accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Court of Appeal and direct a new trial. Apart from the issue here under consideration, the Court of Appeal found errors in the trial judge's charge to the jury warranting a new trial. Leave to appeal to this Court was limited to the one issue set forth earlier in these reasons. The other issues which, in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, warranted a new trial, were not canvassed before this Court.

Appeal allowed, new trial directed.

décider qu'il n'y avait aucune preuve à soumettre au jury sur le premier chef, et imposer au jury un verdict d'acquittement sur les trois chefs de l'acte d'accusation et pas seulement sur les chefs 2 et 3.

En outre, cette Cour a le devoir de rendre le jugement que la cour d'instance inférieure aurait dû rendre.

Je suis donc d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi, d'infirmer l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel et d'ordonner un nouveau procès. Indépendamment de la question en litige en l'espèce, la Cour d'appel a conclu que l'exposé du juge de première instance contenait des erreurs justifiant un nouveau procès. L'autorisation de se pourvoir devant cette Cour a été restreinte à la seule question énoncée au début des présents motifs. Les autres motifs qui, de l'avis de la Cour d'appel, justifiaient un nouveau procès n'y ont pas été débattus.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR QUEBEC

Criminal law — Fraud — Elements of offence — Mens rea — Accused directing mind of company involved in residential construction — Deposits taken from potential purchasers on false representation that deposits were insured — Project not completed following company's insolvency — Accused honestly believing that project would be completed and deposits not lost — Whether accused guilty of fraud — Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, s. 380(1).

The accused, the directing mind of a company involved in residential construction, was charged with fraud. The company entered into agreements with a number of individuals for the purchase of residences. The contracts were made and the deposits taken on the basis of a false representation by the company that the deposits were insured. The representation was made orally and backed up by a certificate of participation in the insurance program. In addition, a brochure describing the program was distributed to most of the depositors. In fact, the company never paid the premiums due on a first application for participation in the insurance program and a second application was never completed. The company became insolvent, the project was not completed and most of the depositors lost their money. The trial judge found that the accused, as directing mind of the company, was responsible for the misrepresentations. The accused knew at the time that the deposits were not guaranteed but nevertheless made misrepresentations to induce potential home purchasers to sign a contract and give a deposit. The trial judge also found that the accused sincerely believed that the residential project would be completed and hence that the deposits

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DU QUÉBEC

Droit criminel — Fraude — Éléments de l'infraction — Mens rea — L'accusé était l'âme dirigeante d'une compagnie engagée dans la construction domiciliaire — Perception de dépôts auprès d'acheteurs éventuels sur la foi de fausses déclarations selon lesquelles les dépôts étaient garantis — Projet non mené à terme en raison de l'insolvabilité de la compagnie — Accusé croyant sincèrement que le projet serait mené à terme et que les dépôts ne seraient pas perdus — L'accusé est-il coupable de fraude? — Code criminel, L.R.C. (1985), ch. C-46, art. 380(1).

L'accusé, qui était l'âme dirigeante d'une compagnie engagée dans la construction domiciliaire, a été inculpé de fraude. La compagnie a conclu des contrats de vente de résidences avec un certain nombre de personnes. Les contrats ont été conclus et les dépôts perçus sur la foi d'une fausse déclaration de la compagnie selon laquelle les dépôts étaient garantis. Cette déclaration, faite verbalement, était appuyée par une attestation de participation au plan de garantie. En outre, une brochure décrivant ce plan était remise à la plupart des déposants. En réalité, la compagnie n'a jamais payé les primes dues à la suite d'une première demande de participation au plan de garantie et une deuxième demande n'a jamais été remplie. La compagnie est devenue insolvable, le projet n'a pas été mené à terme et la plupart des déposants ont perdu leur dépôt. Le juge du procès a conclu que l'accusé, à titre d'âme dirigeante de la compagnie, était responsable des fausses déclarations. L'accusé savait à l'époque que les dépôts n'étaient pas garantis, mais il a tout de même fait ces fausses déclarations en vue d'amener les acheteurs de maison éventuels à conclure un contrat et à verser un dépôt. Le juge du procès a également conclu que l'accusé croyait sincèrement que le would not be lost. The accused was convicted of fraud pursuant to s. 380(1)(a) of the Criminal Code and the Court of Appeal upheld the conviction. The issue in this appeal is whether the fact that the accused honestly believed that the project would be completed negates the mens rea of the offence of fraud.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

Per La Forest, Gonthier, Cory and McLachlin JJ.: The actus reus of fraud is established by proof of a prohibited act, be it an act of deceit, falsehood or other fraudulent means, and by proof of deprivation caused by the prohibited act (which may consist in actual loss or the placing of the victim's pecuniary interests at risk). Just as what constitutes a falsehood or a deceitful act for the purpose of the actus reus is judged on the objective facts, the actus reus of fraud by "other fraudulent means" is determined objectively, by reference to what a reasonable person would consider to be a dishonest act. Correspondingly, the mens rea of fraud is established by proof of subjective knowledge of the prohibited act, and by proof of subjective knowledge that the performance of the prohibited act could have as a consequence the deprivation of another (which deprivation may consist in knowledge that the victim's pecuniary interests are put at risk). In certain cases, the subjective knowledge of the risk of deprivation may be inferred from the act itself, barring some explanation casting doubt on such inference. Where the conduct and knowledge required by these definitions are established, the accused is guilty whether he actually intended the deprivation or was reckless as to whether it would occur. The accused's belief that the conduct is not wrong or that no one will in the end be hurt affords no defence to a charge of fraud. While the scope of the offence may encompass a broad range of dishonest commercial dealings, the proposed definition of mens rea will not catch conduct which does not warrant criminalization. Only the deliberately practised fraudulent acts which, in the knowledge of the accused, actually put the property of others at risk will constitute fraud. The requirement of intentional fraudulent action excludes mere negligent misrepresentation, or sharp business practice.

In this case, it is clear from the trial judge's findings that the offence of fraud is made out. The actus reus is established: the accused committed deliberate falsehood projet de construction domiciliaire serait réalisé et, par conséquent, que les dépôts ne seraient pas perdus. L'accusé a été déclaré coupable de fraude conformément à l'al. 380(1)a) du Code criminel et la Cour d'appel a maintenu cette déclaration de culpabilité. Il s'agit en l'espèce de déterminer si le fait que l'accusé croyait honnêtement que le projet serait réalisé efface la mens rea de l'infraction de fraude.

Arrêt: Le pourvoi est rejeté.

Les juges La Forest, Gonthier, Cory et McLachlin: L'actus reus de l'infraction de fraude sera établi par la preuve d'un acte prohibé, qu'il s'agisse d'une supercherie, d'un mensonge ou d'un autre moyen dolosif, et par la preuve de la privation causée par l'acte prohibé (qui peut consister en une perte véritable ou dans le fait de mettre en péril les intérêts pécuniaires de la victime). Tout comme ce qui constitue un mensonge ou une supercherie pour les fins de l'actus reus est déterminé en fonction des faits objectifs, l'actus reus de la fraude par un «autre moyen dolosif» est déterminé objectivement, selon ce qu'une personne raisonnable considérerait comme un acte malhonnête. De même, la mens rea de la fraude est établie par la preuve de la connaissance subjective de l'acte prohibé et par la preuve de la connaissance subjective que l'accomplissement de l'acte prohibé pourrait causer une privation à autrui (laquelle privation peut consister en la connaissance que les intérêts pécuniaires de la victime sont mis en péril). Dans certains cas, la connaissance subjective du risque de privation peut être déduite de l'acte lui-même, sous réserve de quelque explication qui vient mettre en doute cette déduction. Si la conduite et la connaissance requises par ces définitions sont établies, l'accusé est coupable peu importe qu'il ait effectivement souhaité la privation ou qu'il lui était indifférent qu'elle survienne ou non. La conviction de l'accusé que sa conduite n'est pas mauvaise ou que personne ne sera lésé en fin de compte ne constitue pas un moyen de défense opposable à une accusation de fraude. Si l'infraction de fraude peut viser une large gamme d'activités commerciales malhonnêtes, la définition proposée de la mens rea ne visera pas une conduite ne justifiant pas la criminalisation. Seuls les actes frauduleux accomplis délibérément qui, à la connaissance de l'accusé, mettent vraiment en péril le bien d'autrui, constituent une fraude. L'exigence d'un acte frauduleux intentionnel exclut la simple déclaration inexacte faite par négligence ou la pratique commerciale déloyale.

En l'espèce, il ressort nettement des conclusions du juge du procès qu'il y a eu fraude. L'actus reus est établi: l'accusé a menti délibérément et ses mensonges ont hoods which caused or gave rise to deprivation. First, the depositors did not get the insurance protection they were told they would get and, second, the money they gave to the accused's company was put at risk, a risk which in most cases materialized. The mens rea too is established: the accused told the depositors that they had insurance protection when he knew this to be false. By this act he was knowingly depriving the depositors of something they thought they had, namely insurance protection. It may also be inferred from his knowledge that insurance protection was not in place that the accused knew that he was subjecting the depositors' money to risk. The fact that he sincerely believed that the houses would be built, and that the deposits would not be lost, was no defence to the crime.

Per Lamer C.J. and Sopinka J.: Subject to the following reservations, McLachlin J.'s analysis of the law of fraud was generally agreed with. First, while the accused's belief that an act is honest will not avail if it is objectively dishonest as determined by reasonable persons, it is critical to distinguish this from the accused's belief in facts that, if true, would deprive the act of its dishonest character. Secondly, mens rea is not typically concerned with the consequences of the prohibited actus reus. The actus reus often includes the consequences, and, frequently, more serious offences are distinguished from less serious offences by the consequences without any additional mental element. Thirdly, the general proposition that "[r]ecklessness presupposes knowledge of the likelihood of the prohibited consequences" is applicable in the case of fraud but not necessarily for other offences.

In this case, the trial judge's finding that the accused deliberately lied to his customers determines both the actus reus and mens rea of deceit. If the sole issue were whether the accused's conduct created a risk that the depositors might be deprived of their deposits by reason of the non-completion of the project, the appeal should be allowed. Where the risk of deprivation is dependent on some future event not happening but the accused honestly believes that the future event will happen and there will be no deprivation, a trial judge who accepts this evidence should acquit. Here, the trial judge found there was no insurance in place, however, and therefore even if the project were eventually completed, there would have been a deprivation or risk thereof during the uninsured period. The trial judge, having made all the findings of fact which constitute a deprivation, ought to have found that this element had been made out. Failure causé une privation. Premièrement, les déposants n'ont pas obtenu la garantie qui leur était promise et, deuxièmement, l'argent qu'ils ont versé à la compagnie de l'accusé a été exposé à un risque qui, dans la plupart des cas, s'est concrétisé. La mens rea est également établie: l'accusé a dit aux déposants qu'ils bénéficiaient d'une garantie alors qu'il savait que c'était faux. Par ce geste, il a privé sciemment les déposants d'une chose dont ils croyaient bénéficier, soit une garantie. On peut également déduire de sa connaissance de l'absence de garantie que l'accusé savait qu'il exposait à un risque l'argent des déposants. Le fait qu'il croyait sincèrement que les résidences seraient construites et que les dépôts ne seraient pas perdus ne constituait pas un moyen de défense opposable au crime commis.

Le juge en chef Lamer et le juge Sopinka: L'analyse que le juge McLachlin fait du droit de la fraude est acceptée de manière générale, à l'exception des réserves suivantes. Premièrement, même si la conviction de l'accusé qu'un acte est honnête ne sera guère utile si cet acte est, aux yeux d'une personne raisonnable, objectivement malhonnête, il est essentiel d'établir une distinction entre une telle conviction et celle de l'accusé à l'égard de faits qui, s'ils étaient avérés, dépouilleraient l'acte de son caractère malhonnête. Deuxièmement, la mens rea ne porte pas habituellement sur les conséquences de l'actus reus prohibé. Il arrive fréquemment que l'actus reus inclue les conséquences et que des infractions plus graves se distinguent d'infractions moins graves par leurs conséquences indépendamment de tout élément moral additionnel. Troisièmement, la proposition générale selon laquelle «[l]'insouciance présuppose la connaissance de la vraisemblance des conséquences prohibées» s'applique au cas de fraude, mais non nécessairement à d'autres infractions.

En l'espèce, la conclusion du juge du procès que l'accusé a délibérément menti à ses clients détermine à la fois l'actus reus et la mens rea de la supercherie. S'il s'était agi uniquement de déterminer si la conduite de l'accusé créait un risque que les déposants se voient privés de leurs dépôts en raison de la non-réalisation du projet, il y aurait lieu d'accueillir le pourvoi. Si le risque de privation dépend de la non-réalisation d'un événement ultérieur, mais que l'accusé croit honnêtement que cet événement se produira et qu'il n'y aura aucune privation, le juge du procès qui accepte cette preuve doit prononcer un verdict d'acquittement. En l'espèce, toutefois, le juge du procès a conclu qu'aucune garantie n'existait et que, par conséquent, même si le projet avait été éventuellement mené à terme, il y aurait eu privation ou risque de privation au cours de la période pendant laquelle aucune garantie n'existait. Après avoir tiré to make such a determination would be an error of law and would entitle this Court to affirm the conviction and dispose of the case on this basis.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé J.: Subject to the second and third reservations expressed by Sopinka J., the reasons of McLachlin J. were generally agreed with.

SOPINKA J. —I have had the benefit of reading the reasons for judgment of McLachlin J. herein and I agree with much of her analysis and the conclusion she reaches. With respect to the meaning to be ascribed to "other fraudulent means" in s. 380(1) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, I agree that the objective dishonesty test should be applied rather than the subjective approach adopted in the English cases. Although this issue does not arise in this case, it is crucial to the decision in R. v. Zlatic, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 29, which is released herewith. There are several issues in my colleague's analysis of the law of fraud with which I have difficulty, and since I will elaborate on them in Zlatic I will content myself with simply mentioning them here.

First, while I agree that the accused's belief that an act is honest will not avail if it is objectively dishonest as determined by reasonable persons, it is critical to distinguish this from the accused's belief in facts that, if true, would deprive the act of its dishonest character. Secondly, I cannot agree with the statement that "[t]ypically, mens rea is concerned with the consequences of the prohibited actus reus." The actus reus often includes the consequences, and, frequently, more serious offences are distinguished from less serious offences by the LE JUGE SOPINKA—J'ai pris connaissance des motifs de jugement du juge McLachlin et je souscris en grande partie à son analyse et à la conclusion à laquelle elle arrive. En ce qui concerne le sens à donner à l'expression «autre moyen dolosif» du par. 380(1) du Code criminel, L.R.C. (1985), ch. C-46, je conviens que le critère de la malhonnêteté objective devrait être appliqué plutôt que l'approche subjective adoptée dans les décisions anglaises. Même si cette question ne se pose pas en l'espèce, elle est cruciale dans l'arrêt R. c. Zlatic, [1993] 2 R.C.S. 29, rendu simultanément. Il m'est difficile d'être d'accord avec plusieurs points que ma collègue soulève dans son analyse du droit de la fraude mais, puisque je vais les expliquer de façon détaillée dans l'arrêt Zlatic, je me contenterai ici de les mentionner.

Premièrement, même si je conviens que la conviction de l'accusé qu'un acte est honnête ne sera guère utile si cet acte est, aux yeux d'une personne raisonnable, objectivement malhonnête, il est essentiel d'établir une distinction entre une telle conviction et celle de l'accusé à l'égard de faits qui, s'ils étaient avérés, dépouilleraient l'acte de son caractère malhonnête. Deuxièmement, je ne puis souscrire à l'affirmation voulant que «[h]abituellement, la mens rea porte sur les conséquences de l'actus reus prohibé.» Il arrive fréquemment consequences without any additional mental element. See R. v. DeSousa, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 944. Thirdly, I have reservations about the statement that "[r]ecklessness presupposes knowledge of the likelihood of the prohibited consequences" as a general proposition. This is the subjective definition of recklessness which I agree is applicable in the case of fraud but not necessarily in all cases. For instance, recklessness in the definition of criminal negligence may arguably be made out if there is objective foresight of risk. This is an issue which we have yet to resolve.

In this case, the trial judge's finding that the appellant deliberately lied to his customers that their deposits were insured determines both the actus reus and mens rea of deceit which is the first element in the definition of fraud. That leaves for consideration the issue of deprivation or risk thereof which is the second element. The trial judge found that there was no insurance in place but that the appellant believed that there was no risk to the depositors because the project would be completed and the depositors would obtain the homes in respect of which the deposits were placed. If the sole issue were whether the conduct of the appellant created a risk of deprivation to the depositors of their deposits by reason of the non-completion of the project, I would have allowed the appeal. If the risk of deprivation is dependent on some future event not happening but the accused honestly believes that the future event will happen and there will be no deprivation, a trial judge who accepts this evidence should acquit. The Crown will not have proved mens rea with respect to deprivation. In this case, however, the trial judge found there was no insurance in place and, therefore, even if the project were eventually completed, there would have been a deprivation or risk of deprivation during the uninsured period. The trial judge, having made all the findings of fact which constitute a deprivation, ought to have found that this element had been made out. While the trial judge may not have made this specific que l'actus reus inclue les conséquences et que des infractions plus graves se distinguent d'infractions moins graves par leurs conséquences indépendamment de tout élément moral additionnel. Voir R. c. DeSousa, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 944. Troisièmement, j'éprouve des doutes à l'égard de l'affirmation, posée comme principe général, selon laquelle «[l]'insouciance présuppose la connaissance de la vraisemblance des conséquences prohibées.» Il s'agit là de la définition subjective de l'insouciance qui, je le reconnais, s'applique au cas de fraude, mais non nécessairement à tous les cas. Ainsi, on pourrait soutenir que, selon la définition de négligence criminelle, il y a insouciance s'il y a prévision objective du risque. C'est là une question que nous n'avons pas encore résolue.

En l'espèce, la conclusion du juge du procès que l'appelant a délibérément menti à ses clients en leur disant que leurs dépôts étaient garantis détermine à la fois l'actus reus et la mens rea de la supercherie qui est le premier élément de la définition de fraude. Reste la question de la privation, ou du risque de privation, qui en est le deuxième élément. Le juge du procès a conclu qu'aucune garantie n'existait, mais que l'appelant croyait que les déposants ne risquaient rien puisque le projet serait réalisé et que les déposants obtiendraient les résidences pour lesquelles les dépôts ont été versés. S'il s'était agi uniquement de déterminer si la conduite de l'appelant créait un risque que les déposants se voient privés de leurs dépôts en raison de la non-réalisation du projet, j'aurais accueilli le pourvoi. Si le risque de privation dépend de la non-réalisation d'un événement ultérieur, mais que l'accusé croit honnêtement que cet événement se produira et qu'il n'y aura aucune privation, le juge du procès qui accepte cette preuve doit prononcer un verdict d'acquittement. Le ministère public n'aura pas établi la mens rea à l'égard de la privation. En l'espèce, toutefois, le juge du procès a conclu qu'aucune garantie n'existait et que, par conséquent, même si le projet avait été éventuellement mené à terme, il y aurait eu privation ou risque de privation au cours de la période pendant laquelle aucune garantie n'existait. Après avoir tiré toutes les conclusions de fait qui constituent une privation, le juge du procès aurait dû conclure que determination, failure to do so would be an error of law and we are entitled to affirm the conviction and dispose of the case on this basis. I would dismiss the appeal.

The judgment of La Forest, Gonthier, Cory and McLachlin JJ. was delivered by MCLACHLIN J.—This appeal requires the Court to consider the elements of the offence of fraud, and in particular the mental element or mens rea necessary to sustain a conviction for fraud. The question is whether a belief that, in the end, a dishonest practice will not result in loss to the victims of that practice, negates the guilty mind necessary to establish the offence of fraud.

I — Facts

The appellant, Robert Théroux, was a businessman involved in residential construction in the province of Quebec. He operated through a company called Les Habitations Co-Hab Inc. Although a personal bankruptcy prevented him from serving as a director of Co-Hab, Théroux was the directing mind, or âme dirigeante, of the company.

The charges arise out of two residential housing projects Co-Hab undertook through its subsidiaries, one in Laprairie and one in St-Catherine. Sales to prospective home buyers were solicited from a trailer located on the Laprairie site. Co-Hab's representative at this site entered into agreements for the purchase of the residences with a number of individuals, collecting deposits from them.

The contracts were made and the deposits taken on the basis of a representation by Co-Hab that the deposits were insured by the Fédération de construction du Québec. The representation was made orally. It was backed up by a certificate of participation in the insurance program posted on the trailer wall, which had been furnished to Co-Hab cet élément avait été établi. Même s'il se peut que le juge du procès n'ait pas a tiré cette conclusion précise, l'omission de le faire constituerait une erreur de droit et nous sommes en droit de confirmer la déclaration de culpabilité et de trancher l'affaire en conséquence. Je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

Version française du jugement des juges La Forest, Gonthier, Cory et McLachlin rendu par

LE JUGE MCLACHLIN—En l'espèce, la Cour est appelée à examiner les éléments de l'infraction de fraude et, en particulier, l'élément moral ou la mens rea nécessaire à une déclaration de culpabilité de fraude. Il s'agit de savoir si la conviction qu'en définitive une pratique malhonnête ne causera aucune perte aux victimes de cette pratique efface l'intention coupable nécessaire à l'infraction de fraude.

I — Les faits

L'appelant, Robert Théroux, était un homme d'affaires engagé dans la construction domiciliaire au Québec. Il exploitait une compagnie appelée Les Habitations Co-Hab Inc. Même si, en raison d'une faillite personnelle, il ne pouvait agir comme administrateur de Co-Hab, Théroux était l'âme dirigeante de la compagnie.

Les accusations ont été portées relativement à deux projets de construction domiciliaire, l'un à Laprairie et l'autre à Ste-Catherine, mis sur pied par Co-Hab par l'entremise de ses filiales. Les acheteurs de maison éventuels étaient sollicités depuis une remorque située au chantier de Laprairie. Le représentant de Co-Hab, à cet endroit, a conclu des contrats de vente de résidences avec un certain nombre de personnes et a perçu des dépôts auprès de ces dernières.

Les contrats ont été conclus et les dépôts perçus sur la foi d'une déclaration de Co-Hab selon laquelle les dépôts étaient garantis par la Fédération de construction du Québec. Cette déclaration, faite verbalement, était appuyée par une attestation de participation au plan de garantie affichée au mur de la remorque, qui avait été remise à Co-Hab before it completed the application process. In addition, a brochure describing the insurance program was distributed to most of the depositors.

In fact, the representations that the deposits were insured were false. Co-Hab never paid the premiums due on a first application for participation in the insurance program; a second application was never completed. The trial judge found that Théroux, as the directing mind of Co-Hab, was responsible for these misrepresentations.

The company which was to have built the residences became insolvent and could not complete the project. Some of the depositors got their money back, but most lost the entire amount.

II — Judgments Below

The trial judge found that the appellant Théroux was responsible for the misrepresentations that the deposits were guaranteed, and that he had made them for the purpose of obtaining the depositors' signatures and deposits. He found that Théroux had made these misrepresentations without any reasonable assurance that the residential construction project would be completed, although he sincerely believed that it would be completed:

[TRANSLATION] So it was these false representations, . . . one cannot at some point sell real estate by saying: "I will deliver it on such and such a date", without being assured, like any reasonable man should be, that it can be done.

The trial judge convicted Théroux of thirteen of the eighteen counts of fraud with which he stood charged pursuant to s. 380(1)(a) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46 (formerly R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, s. 338(1)(a)).

The Court of Appeal upheld the convictions: (1990), 61 C.C.C. (3d) 525, [1991] R.J.Q. 79. Dubé J.A. held that all that was required for a conviction was a dishonest act which had as a consequence that someone was deprived of something; the fact that Théroux honestly believed that the avant qu'elle complète le processus de demande. En outre, une brochure décrivant le plan de garantie était remise à la plupart des déposants.

En réalité, les déclarations selon lesquelles les dépôts étaient garantis étaient fausses. Co-Hab n'a jamais payé les primes dues à la suite d'une première demande de participation au plan de garantie; une deuxième demande n'a jamais été remplie. Le juge du procès a conclu qu'à titre d'âme dirigeante de Co-Hab Théroux était responsable de ces fausses déclarations.

La compagnie qui aurait dû construire les résidences est devenue insolvable, et n'a pu mener le projet à terme. Si certains déposants ont été remboursés, la plupart ont perdu le montant total de leur dépôt.

II — Les juridictions inférieures

Le juge du procès a conclu que l'appelant Théroux était responsable des fausses déclarations selon lesquelles les dépôts étaient garantis, et qu'il les avait faites dans le but d'obtenir la signature et les dépôts des déposants. Il a statué que Théroux avait fait ces fausses déclarations sans être raisonnablement certain que le projet de construction domiciliaire serait réalisé, même s'il croyait sincèrement qu'il le serait:

Alors c'est des fausses représentations, on ne peut pas à un moment donné vendre des immeubles en disant: «Je vais vous les livrer à telle date», sans s'être assuré, comme tout homme raisonnable devrait le faire, qu'on peut le réaliser.

Le juge du procès a déclaré Théroux coupable relativement à treize des dix-huit chefs d'accusation de fraude qui avaient été portés contre lui conformément à l'al. 380(1)a) du Code criminel, L.R.C. (1985), ch. C-46 (auparavant S.R.C. 1970, ch. C-34, al. 338(1)a)).

La Cour d'appel a confirmé les déclarations de culpabilité: [1991] R.J.Q. 79. Le juge Dubé a conclu qu'il suffisait, pour prononcer une déclaration de culpabilité, qu'un acte malhonnête ait eu pour effet de priver quelqu'un de quelque chose; le fait que Théroux croyait sincèrement que les résí-residences would be built, and that the deposits would not be lost, was no defence to the crime. Proulx J.A. held that the mens rea of fraud requires proof of subjective dishonesty: there must be a dishonest act on the part of the accused and that act must be thought, subjectively, to be dishonest. Proulx J.A. held, however, that this did not mean that Théroux should be acquitted because of his belief that the project would be completed. It was open to the trial judge to conclude that the Crown had proved a subjective dishonest intention to defraud even if the accused initially intended to repay, or, in this case, honour the deposits of, his victims. Proulx J.A. concluded that although Théroux's primary intention may not have been to perpetrate a fraud, Théroux [TRANSLATION] "could not take refuge behind the hope of completing the project if moreover "he had no guarantee that he could complete it" ". (Emphasis in original.) He suggested that the intention to defraud arose later, when the project ran into difficulties (at p. 537 C.C.C.): [TRANSLATION] What caused problems for the appellant arose not in the elaboration of his residential project, but in its execution.

III — Legislation

Criminal Code

Prior to December 4, 1985, s. 380(1) (then s. 338(1)) read:

338. (1) Every one who, by deceit, falsehood or other fraudulent means, whether or not it is a false pretence within the meaning of this Act, defrauds the public or any person, whether ascertained or not, of any property, money or valuable security,

(a) is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years, where the subject-matter of the fraud is a testamentary instrument or where the value thereof exceeds two hundred dollars; or

(b) is guilty

(i) of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years, or

(ii) of an offence punishable on summary conviction, dences seraient construites et que les dépôts ne seraient pas perdus ne constituait pas un moyen de défense opposable au crime commis. Le juge Proulx a conclu que la mens rea de la fraude nécessite la preuve d'une malhonnêteté subjective: l'accusé doit avoir accompli un acte malhonnête que, subjectivement, il croit malhonnête. Selon le juge Proulx, cela ne signifiait toutefois pas que Théroux devait être acquitté parce qu'il croyait que le projet serait réalisé. Le juge du procès pouvait conclure que le ministère public avait établi l'existence d'une intention malhonnête subjective de frauder même si l'accusé avait l'intention, au départ, de rembourser ses victimes ou, en l'espèce, d'honorer les dépôts qu'elles avaient versés. Le juge Proulx a conclu que, même s'il se pouvait qu'il n'ait pas été animé de l'intention de frauder au départ, Théroux «ne pouvait pas se retrancher derrière l'espoir de réaliser le projet si, par ailleurs, «il n'avait aucune garantie qu'il pouvait le réaliser»». (En italique dans l'original.) Il a affirmé que l'intention de frauder était apparue plus tard, au moment où le projet a connu des difficultés (à la p. 87):

Ce qui cause problème à l'appelant est survenu non pas dans l'élaboration de son projet domiciliaire, mais dans son exécution.

III — Les dispositions législatives

Code criminel

Avant le 4 décembre 1985, le par. 380(1) (alors le par. 338(1)) était ainsi rédigé:

338. (1) Quiconque, par supercherie, mensonge ou autre moyen dolosif, constituant ou non un faux semblant au sens de la présente loi, frustre le public ou toute personne, déterminée ou non, de quelque bien, argent ou valeur

a) est coupable d'un acte criminel et passible d'un emprisonnement de dix ans si l'objet de la fraude est un titre testamentaire ou si la valeur de ce dont est frustré le public ou toute personne dépasse deux cents dollars; ou

b) est coupable

(i) d'un acte criminel et passible d'un emprisonnement de deux ans, ou

(ii) d'une infraction punissable sur déclaration sommaire de culpabilité,

1993 CanLII 134 (SCC)

where the value of the property of which the public or any person is defrauded does not exceed two hundred dollars.

It now reads:

380. (1) Every one who, by deceit, falsehood or other fraudulent means, whether or not it is a false pretence within the meaning of this Act, defrauds the public or any person, whether ascertained or not, of any property, money or valuable security,

(a) is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a term of imprisonment not exceeding ten years, where the subject-matter of the offence is a testamentary instrument or where the value of the subject-matter of the offence exceeds one thousand dollars; or

(b) is guilty

(i) of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or

(ii) of an offence punishable on summary conviction, where the value of the subject-matter of the offence does not exceed one thousand dollars.

IV — Issue

There is no doubt that the appellant deliberately practised a deceitful act, constituting the actus reus of the offence of fraud. The issue is whether the fact that he honestly believed that the projects would be completed negates the guilty mind or mens rea of the offence. This requires this Court to examine the question of what constitutes the mens rea for the offence of fraud.

V — Discussion

1. Introduction

Fraud, as a substantive offence, was introduced in Canada only in 1948. Before this date, conspiracy to defraud was a criminal offence, but fraud committed by one person was not. In 1948 (S.C. 1948, c. 39, s. 13), s. 444 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1927, c. 36, was amended to delete the "conspiracy" requirement and create the general offence of fraud. In the years following, there have been only minor amendments to the section.

si la valeur du bien dont est frustré le public ou toute personne ne dépasse pas deux cents dollars.

Maintenant, il se lit ainsi:

380. (1) Quiconque, par supercherie, mensonge ou autre moyen dolosif, constituant ou non un faux semblant au sens de la présente loi, frustre le public ou toute personne, déterminée ou non, de quelque bien, argent ou valeur:

a) est coupable d'un acte criminel et passible d'un emprisonnement maximal de dix ans, si l'objet de l'infraction est un titre testamentaire ou si la valeur de l'objet de l'infraction dépasse mille dollars;

b) est coupable:

(i) soit d'un acte criminel et passible d'un emprisonnement maximal de deux ans,

(ii) soit d'une infraction punissable sur déclaration de culpabilité par procédure sommaire, si la valeur de l'objet de l'infraction ne dépasse pas mille dollars.

IV — La question en litige

Il n'y a pas de doute que l'appelant a délibérément eu recours à la supercherie qui constitue l'actus reus de l'infraction de fraude. Il s'agit de déterminer si le fait qu'il croyait honnêtement que les projets seraient réalisés efface l'intention coupable ou la mens rea de l'infraction. Notre Cour doit donc déterminer ce qui constitue la mens rea de l'infraction de fraude.

V — Analyse

1. Introduction

La fraude, en tant qu'infraction matérielle précise, n'est apparue au Canada qu'en 1948. Auparavant, le complot en vue de frauder était une infraction criminelle, alors que la fraude commise par une seule personne ne l'était pas. En 1948 (S.C. 1948, ch. 39, art. 13), l'art. 444 du Code criminel, S.R.C. 1927, ch. 36, a été modifié de manière à supprimer l'exigence de «complot» et à créer l'infraction générale de fraude. Au cours des années qui ont suivi, l'article n'a subi que des modifications mineures.

1993 CanLII 134 (SCC)

It has been said that a single precept underlies the offence of fraud: "commercial affairs are to be conducted honestly" (J. D. Ewart, Criminal Fraud (1986), at p. 9). The courts, in the decades since the adoption of the new offence, have moved to develop a jurisprudence which conforms to this central tenet. Nevertheless, the generality of the language of the section coupled with the lack of jurisprudential antecedents created uncertainty as to the elements of the offence. In 1978, this Court provided a comprehensive definition of the actus reus of the offence in R. v. Olan, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1175. But uncertainty remained about what was required to establish the mens rea of the offence, the issue raised in this case. Is the test for guilty mind objective or subjective? More particularly, does an honest belief that no one will be harmed establish the absence of mens rea? Again, must the accused subjectively believe that his or her act is dishonest before he or she will have the required mens rea?

On a dit que l'infraction de fraude repose sur un principe unique: [TRADUCTION] «les activités commerciales doivent se dérouler honnêtement» (J. D. Ewart, Criminal Fraud (1986), à la p. 9). Au cours des décennies qui ont suivi l'adoption de la nouvelle infraction, les tribunaux ont entrepris de développer une jurisprudence conforme à ce principe fondamental. Néanmoins, le caractère général du texte de l'article, conjugué à l'absence de précédents jurisprudentiels, a engendré une incertitude quant aux éléments de l'infraction. En 1978, notre Cour a donné une définition exhaustive de l'actus reus de l'infraction dans R. c. Olan, [1978] 2 R.C.S. 1175. Toutefois, l'incertitude est demeurée quant à la question de savoir ce qui est requis pour établir la mens rea de l'infraction, laquelle question est soulevée en l'espèce. Le critère applicable à l'intention coupable est-il objectif ou subjectif? Plus précisément, la conviction sincère que personne ne subira un préjudice démontre-t-elle l'absence de mens rea? Encore une fois, pour avoir la mens rea nécessaire, l'accusé doit-il subjectivement croire que son acte est malhonnête?

2. The Actus Reus of Fraud

Since the mens rea of an offence is related to its actus reus, it is helpful to begin the analysis by considering the actus reus of the offence of fraud. Speaking of the actus reus of this offence, Dickson J. (as he then was) set out the following principles in Olan:

> (i) the offence has two elements: dishonest act and deprivation;
>
> (ii) the dishonest act is established by proof of deceit, falsehood or "other fraudulent means";
>
> (iii) the element of deprivation is established by proof of detriment, prejudice, or risk of prejudice to the economic interests of the victim, caused by the dishonest act.

Olan marked a broadening of the law of fraud in two respects. First, it overruled previous authority which suggested that deceit was an essential element of the offence. Instead, it posited the general concept of dishonesty, which might manifest itself

2. L'actus reus de la fraude

Étant donné que la mens rea d'une infraction est liée à son actus reus, il est utile d'entamer l'analyse par l'étude de l'actus reus de l'infraction de fraude. Au sujet de l'actus reus de cette infraction, le juge Dickson (plus tard Juge en chef) a énoncé les principes suivants dans l'arrêt Olan:

> (i) l'infraction compte deux éléments: l'acte malhonnête et une privation;
>
> (ii) l'acte malhonnête est établi par la preuve d'une supercherie, d'un mensonge ou d'un «autre moyen dolosif»;

L'arrêt Olan a marqué un élargissement du droit de la fraude à deux égards. Il a d'abord renversé la jurisprudence antérieure qui laissait entendre que la supercherie était un élément essentiel de l'infraction. Il a plutôt énoncé le concept général de la in deceit, falsehood or some other form of dishonesty. Just as what constitutes a lie or a deceitful act for the purpose of the actus reus is judged on the objective facts, so the "other fraudulent means" in the third category is determined objectively, by reference to what a reasonable person would consider to be a dishonest act. Second, Olan made it clear that economic loss was not essential to the offence; the imperilling of an economic interest is sufficient even though no actual loss has been suffered. By adopting an expansive interpretation of the offence, the Court established fraud as an offence of general scope capable of encompassing a wide range of dishonest commercial dealings.

Subsequent cases followed Olan's lead, fleshing out the elements of the offence set out in Olan in a broad and purposive manner. One of the first questions which arose was whether the third type of dishonest conduct, "other fraudulent means", was a super-added element which the Crown must prove in addition to proving either deceit or falsehood. This was rejected in R. v. Doren (1982), 36 O.R. (2d) 114 (C.A.); see also R. v. Kirkwood (1983), 42 O.R. (2d) 65 (C.A.). In a number of subsequent cases, courts have defined the sort of conduct which may fall under this third category of other fraudulent means to include the use of corporate funds for personal purposes, non-disclosure of important facts, exploiting the weakness of another, unauthorized diversion of funds, and unauthorized arrogation of funds or property: R. v. Black and Whiteside (1983), 5 C.C.C. (3d) 313 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Shaw (1983), 4 C.C.C. (3d) 348 (N.B.C.A.); R. v. Wagman (1981), 60 C.C.C. (2d) 23 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Rosen (1979), 55 C.C.C. (2d) 342 (Ont. Co. Ct.); R. v. Côté and Vézina (No. 2) (1982), 3 C.C.C. (3d) 557 (Que. C.A.); R. v. Hansen (1983), 25 Alta. L.R. (2d) 193 (C.A.); R. v. Geddes (1979), 52 C.C.C. (2d) 230 (Man. C.A.); R. v. Currie; R. v. Bruce (1984), 5 O.A.C. 280, and R. v. Kirkwood, supra. As noted above, where it is alleged that the actus reus of a particular fraud is "other fraudulent means", the existence of such means will be determined by what reasonable peomalhonnêteté, qui pourrait se manifester dans la supercherie, le mensonge ou une autre forme de malhonnêteté. Tout comme ce qui constitue un mensonge ou une supercherie pour les fins de l'actus reus est déterminé en fonction des faits objectifs, l'«autre moyen dolosif» de la troisième catégorie est déterminé objectivement, selon ce qu'une personne raisonnable considérerait comme un acte malhonnête. L'arrêt Olan a ensuite précisé que la perte économique n'était pas essentielle à l'infraction; la mise en péril d'un intérêt pécuniaire est suffisante, même si aucune perte véritable n'est subie. En adoptant une interprétation libérale de l'infraction, la Cour a fait de la fraude une infraction de portée générale susceptible d'englober une large gamme d'activités commerciales malhonnêtes.

Dans des affaires subséquentes, on a suivi l'exemple de l'arrêt Olan pour étoffer les éléments de l'infraction énoncés dans l'arrêt Olan d'une manière générale et fondée sur l'objet visé. L'une des premières questions qui se posait était de savoir si le troisième genre de conduite malhonnête, soit l'«autre moyen dolosif», était un élément surajouté que le ministère public doit établir en sus de la supercherie ou du mensonge. Cette hypothèse a été rejetée dans l'arrêt R. c. Doren (1982), 36 O.R. (2d) 114 (C.A.); voir également R. c. Kirkwood (1983), 42 O.R. (2d) 65 (C.A.). Les tribunaux ont, dans un certain nombre d'affaires subséquentes, défini le genre de conduite qui peut tomber dans cette troisième catégorie de l'autre moyen dolosif, comme incluant l'utilisation des ressources financières d'une compagnie à des fins personnelles, la dissimulation de faits importants, l'exploitation de la faiblesse d'autrui, le détournement non autorisé de fonds et l'usurpation non autorisée de fonds ou de biens: R. c. Black and Whiteside (1983), 5 C.C.C. (3d) 313 (C.A. Ont.); R. c. Shaw (1983), 4 C.C.C. (3d) 348 (C.A.N.-B.); R. c. Wagman (1981), 60 C.C.C. (2d) 23 (C.A. Ont.); R. c. Rosen (1979), 55 C.C.C. (2d) 342 (C. cté Ont.); R. c. Côté and Vézina (No. 2) (1982), 3 C.C.C. (3d) 557 (C.A. Qué.); R. c. Hansen (1983), 25 Alta. L.R. (2d) 193 (C.A.); R. c. Geddes (1979), 52 C.C.C. (2d) 230 (C.A. ple consider to be dishonest dealing. In instances of fraud by deceit or falsehood, it will not be necessary to undertake such an inquiry; all that need be determined is whether the accused, as a matter of fact, represented that a situation was of a certain character, when, in reality, it was not.

A further question, whether it was necessary for the accused to have profited by the fraud, had been uniformly answered in the negative prior to Olan: Welham v. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1961] A.C. 103 (H.L.); R. v. Melnyk (1947), 90 C.C.C. 257 (B.C.C.A.); R. v. Rodrigue, Ares and Nantel (1973), 17 C.C.C. (2d) 252 (Que. C.A.); R. v. Allsop (1976), 64 Cr. App. R. 29, and R. v. Huggett (1978), 42 C.C.C. (2d) 198 (Ont. C.A.). In Olan, this Court affirmed this rule at pp. 1182-83.

3. The Mens Rea of Fraud

(i) Doctrinal Considerations

This brings us to the mens rea of fraud. What is the guilty mind of fraud? At this point, certain confusions inherent in the concept of mens rea itself become apparent. It is useful initially to distinguish between the mental element or elements of a crime and the mens rea. The term mens rea, properly understood, does not encompass all of the mental elements of a crime. The actus reus has its own mental element; the act must be the voluntary act of the accused for the actus reus to exist. Mens rea, on the other hand, refers to the guilty mind, the wrongful intention, of the accused. Its function in criminal law is to prevent the conviction of the morally innocent—those who do not understand or intend the consequences of their acts. Typically, mens rea is concerned with the consequences of the prohibited actus reus. Thus in the crimes of homicide, we speak of the consequences of the voluntary act—intention to cause death, or reckless and wilfully blind persistence in conduct which one knows is likely to cause death. In other Kirkwood, précité. Tel que mentionné plus haut, lorsqu'on allègue que l'actus reus d'une fraude particulière est un «autre moyen dolosif», l'existence d'un tel moyen sera déterminée en fonction de ce qu'une personne raisonnable considère comme une activité malhonnête. Dans les cas de fraude par supercherie ou mensonge, il ne sera pas nécessaire d'entreprendre une telle analyse: il suffit de déterminer si l'accusé a effectivement déclaré qu'une situation était d'une certaine nature alors qu'en réalité elle ne l'était pas.

Une autre question, celle de savoir s'il était nécessaire que l'accusé ait tiré profit de la fraude, avait constamment reçu une réponse négative avant l'arrêt Olan: Welham c. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1961] A.C. 103 (H.L.); R. c. Melnyk (1947), 90 C.C.C. 257 (C.A.C.-B.); R. c. Rodrigue, Ares and Nantel (1973), 17 C.C.C. (2d) 252 (C.A. Qué.); R. c. Allsop (1976), 64 Cr. App. R. 29, et R. c. Huggett (1978), 42 C.C.C. (2d) 198 (C.A. Ont.). Dans l'arrêt Olan, notre Cour a confirmé cette règle, aux pp. 1182 et 1183.

3. La mens rea de la fraude

(i) Considérations doctrinales

Nous en arrivons à la mens rea de la fraude. Quelle est l'intention coupable de la fraude? À ce stade, certaines confusions inhérentes au concept de la mens rea lui-même se manifestent. Il convient d'abord de distinguer entre l'élément moral ou les éléments moraux d'un crime et la mens rea. Le terme mens rea, interprété correctement, n'inclut pas tous les éléments moraux d'un crime. L'actus reus comporte son propre élément moral; pour qu'il y ait actus reus, l'acte de l'accusé doit être volontaire. Par ailleurs, la mens rea renvoie à l'intention coupable, illégale, de l'accusé. En droit criminel, son rôle consiste à éviter que la personne moralement innocente—qui ne comprend ni ne souhaite les conséquences de ses actes—soit déclarée coupable. Habituellement, la mens rea porte sur les conséquences de l'actus reus prohibé. Ainsi, en matière d'homicide, il s'agit des conséquences de l'acte volontaire, soit l'intention de causer la mort ou le fait de persister, par insouciance ou ignorance volontaire, à se conduire offences, such as dangerous driving, the mens rea may relate to the failure to consider the consequences of inadvertence.

This brings me to the question of whether the test for mens rea is subjective or objective. Most scholars and jurists agree that, leaving aside offences where the actus reus is negligence or inadvertence and offences of absolute liability, the test for mens rea is subjective. The test is not whether a reasonable person would have foreseen the consequences of the prohibited act, but whether the accused subjectively appreciated those consequences at least as a possibility. In applying the subjective test, the court looks to the accused's intention and the facts as the accused believed them to be: G. Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law (2nd ed. 1983), at pp. 727-28.

Two collateral points must be made at this juncture. First, as Williams underlines, this inquiry has nothing to do with the accused's system of values. A person is not saved from conviction because he or she believes there is nothing wrong with what he or she is doing. The question is whether the accused subjectively appreciated that certain consequences would follow from his or her acts, not whether the accused believed the acts or their consequences to be moral. Just as the pathological killer would not be acquitted on the mere ground that he failed to see his act as morally reprehensible, so the defrauder will not be acquitted because he believed that what he was doing was honest.

The second collateral point is the oft-made observation that the Crown need not, in every case, show precisely what thought was in the accused's mind at the time of the criminal act. In certain cases, subjective awareness of the consequences can be inferred from the act itself, barring some explanation casting doubt on such inference. The fact that such an inference is made does not detract from the subjectivity of the test.

d'une façon que l'on sait de nature à causer la mort. Dans le cas d'autres infractions, comme celle de la conduite dangereuse, la mens rea peut avoir trait au défaut de considérer les conséquences de l'inattention.

Ceci m'amène à la question de savoir si le critère applicable à la mens rea est subjectif ou objectif. La plupart des auteurs de doctrine et des juristes conviennent qu'à l'exception des infractions dont l'actus reus est la négligence ou l'inattention et des infractions de responsabilité absolue, le critère applicable à la mens rea est subjectif. Il s'agit non pas de savoir si une personne raisonnable aurait prévu les conséquences de l'acte prohibé, mais si l'accusé était subjectivement conscient que ces conséquences étaient à tout le moins possibles. Dans l'application du critère subjectif, le tribunal examine l'intention de l'accusé et les faits tels que ce dernier croyait qu'ils étaient: G. Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law (2e éd. 1983), aux pp. 727 et 728.

Il importe, à ce stade, de faire deux remarques accessoires. Premièrement, comme le souligne Williams, la présente analyse n'a rien à voir avec l'échelle des valeurs de l'accusé. Une personne n'échappe pas à une déclaration de culpabilité pour le motif qu'elle croit qu'elle ne fait rien de mal. Il s'agit de savoir si l'accusé était subjectivement conscient que certaines conséquences résulteraient de ses actes, et non pas s'il croyait que ses actes ou leurs conséquences étaient moraux. Tout comme un meurtrier pathologique ne serait pas acquitté pour le seul motif qu'il ne considérait pas que son acte était moralement répréhensible, le fraudeur ne sera pas acquitté pour le motif qu'il croyait que ce qu'il faisait était honnête.

Deuxièmement, il y a l'observation fréquente selon laquelle le ministère public n'a pas à démontrer précisément, dans tous les cas, ce que l'accusé avait à l'esprit au moment où il a commis l'acte criminel. Dans certains cas, la conscience subjective des conséquences peut être déduite de l'acte lui-même, sous réserve de quelque explication qui vient mettre en doute cette déduction. Le fait qu'une telle déduction soit faite ne diminue en rien le caractère subjectif du critère.

Having ventured these general comments on mens rea, I return to the offence of fraud. The prohibited act is deceit, falsehood, or some other dishonest act. The prohibited consequence is depriving another of what is or should be his, which may, as we have seen, consist in merely placing another's property at risk. The mens rea would then consist in the subjective awareness that one was undertaking a prohibited act (the deceit, falsehood or other dishonest act) which could cause deprivation in the sense of depriving another of property or putting that property at risk. If this is shown, the crime is complete. The fact that the accused may have hoped the deprivation would not take place, or may have felt there was nothing wrong with what he or she was doing, provides no defence. To put it another way, following the traditional criminal law principle that the mental state necessary to the offence must be determined by reference to the external acts which constitute the actus of the offence (see Williams, supra, c. 3), the proper focus in determining the mens rea of fraud is to ask whether the accused intentionally committed the prohibited acts (deceit, falsehood, or other dishonest act) knowing or desiring the consequences proscribed by the offence (deprivation, including the risk of deprivation). The personal feeling of the accused about the morality or honesty of the act or its consequences is no more relevant to the analysis than is the accused's awareness that the particular acts undertaken constitute a criminal offence.

This applies as much to the third head of fraud, "other fraudulent means", as to lies and acts of deceit. Although other fraudulent means have been broadly defined as means which are "dishonest", it is not necessary that an accused personally consider these means to be dishonest in order that he or she be convicted of fraud for having undertaken them. The "dishonesty" of the means is relevant to the determination whether the conduct falls within the type of conduct caught by the offence of fraud; what reasonable people consider dishonest assists in the determination whether the actus reus of the offence can be made out on particular facts. That established, it need only be determined that an Ces commentaires généraux sur la mens rea étant faits, je reviens à l'infraction de fraude. L'acte prohibé est la supercherie, le mensonge ou quelque autre acte malhonnête. La conséquence prohibée consiste à priver quelqu'un de ce qui est ou devrait être sien, ce qui peut, comme nous l'avons vu, consister simplement à mettre le bien d'autrui en péril. La mens rea serait alors la conscience subjective que l'on commettait un acte prohibé (la supercherie, le mensonge ou un autre acte malhonnête) qui pouvait causer une privation au sens de priver autrui d'un bien ou de mettre ce bien en péril. Une fois cela démontré, le crime est complet. Le fait que l'accusé ait pu espérer qu'il n'y aurait aucune privation ou qu'il ait pu croire qu'il ne faisait rien de mal ne constitue pas un moyen de défense. En d'autres termes, suivant le principe traditionnel de droit criminel qui veut que l'état d'esprit nécessaire à l'infraction soit déterminé en fonction des actes externes qui constituent l'actus de l'infraction (voir Williams, op. cit., ch. 3), il convient de se demander, lorsqu'on détermine la mens rea de la fraude, si l'accusé a intentionnellement accompli les actes prohibés (supercherie, mensonge ou un autre acte malhonnête) tout en connaissant ou en souhaitant les conséquences visées par l'infraction (soit la privation, y compris le risque de privation). Le sentiment personnel de l'accusé à l'égard du caractère moral ou honnête de l'acte ou de ses conséquences n'est pas plus pertinent quant à l'analyse que ne l'est la conscience de l'accusé que les actes commis constituent une infraction criminelle.

Cela s'applique autant à la troisième catégorie de fraude, soit un «autre moyen dolosif», qu'aux mensonges et à la supercherie. Bien que l'expression «autre moyen dolosif» ait été généralement définie comme un moyen «malhonnête», il n'est pas nécessaire qu'un accusé considère personnellement que ce moyen est malhonnête pour être déclaré coupable de fraude pour y avoir eu recours. Le caractère «malhonnête» du moyen est pertinent pour déterminer si la conduite est du genre de celle visée par l'infraction de fraude; ce qu'une personne raisonnable considère malhonnête aide à déterminer si l'actus reus de l'infraction peut être établi en fonction de certains faits. Une fois cela accused knowingly undertook the acts in question, aware that deprivation, or risk of deprivation, could follow as a likely consequence.

I have spoken of knowledge of the consequences of the fraudulent act. There appears to be no reason, however, why recklessness as to consequences might not also attract criminal responsibility. Recklessness presupposes knowledge of the likelihood of the prohibited consequences. It is established when it is shown that the accused, with such knowledge, commits acts which may bring about these prohibited consequences, while being reckless as to whether or not they ensue.

These doctrinal observations suggest that the actus reus of the offence of fraud will be established by proof of:

1. the prohibited act, be it an act of deceit, a falsehood or some other fraudulent means; and

2. deprivation caused by the prohibited act, which may consist in actual loss or the placing of the victim's pecuniary interests at risk.

Correspondingly, the mens rea of fraud is established by proof of:

1. subjective knowledge of the prohibited act; and

2. subjective knowledge that the prohibited act could have as a consequence the deprivation of another (which deprivation may consist in knowledge that the victim's pecuniary interests are put at risk).

Where the conduct and knowledge required by these definitions are established, the accused is guilty whether he actually intended the prohibited consequence or was reckless as to whether it would occur.

The inclusion of risk of deprivation in the concept of deprivation in Olan requires specific comment. The accused must have subjective aware-établi, il suffit de déterminer qu'un accusé a sciemment commis les actes en question et qu'il était conscient que la privation ou le risque de privation représentait une conséquence probable.

J'ai parlé de la connaissance des conséquences de l'acte frauduleux. Toutefois, rien ne paraît s'opposer à ce que l'insouciance quant aux conséquences entraîne également la responsabilité criminelle. L'insouciance présuppose la connaissance de la vraisemblance des conséquences prohibées. Elle est établie s'il est démontré que l'accusé, fort d'une telle connaissance, accomplit des actes qui risquent d'entraîner ces conséquences prohibées, tout en ne se souciant pas qu'elles s'ensuivent ou non.

Ces observations doctrinales donnent à entendre que l'actus reus de l'infraction de fraude sera établi par la preuve:

1. d'un acte prohibé, qu'il s'agisse d'une supercherie, d'un mensonge ou d'un autre moyen dolosif, et

2. de la privation causée par l'acte prohibé, qui peut consister en une perte véritable ou dans le fait de mettre en péril les intérêts pécuniaires de la victime.

De même, la mens rea de la fraude est établie par la preuve:

1. de la connaissance subjective de l'acte prohibé, et

2. de la connaissance subjective que l'acte prohibé pourrait causer une privation à autrui (laquelle privation peut consister en la connaissance que les intérêts pécuniaires de la victime sont mis en péril).

Si la conduite et la connaissance requises par ces définitions sont établies, l'accusé est coupable peu importe qu'il ait effectivement souhaité la conséquence prohibée ou qu'il lui était indifférent qu'elle se réalise ou non.

L'inclusion du risque de privation dans le concept de la privation, que l'on constate dans l'arrêt Olan, demande certaines précisions. L'accusé doit, ness, at the very least, that his or her conduct will put the property or economic expectations of others at risk. As noted above, this does not mean that the Crown must provide the trier of fact with a mental snapshot proving exactly what was in the accused's mind at the moment the dishonest act was committed. In certain cases, the inference of subjective knowledge of the risk may be drawn from the facts as the accused believed them to be. The accused may introduce evidence negating that inference, such as evidence that his deceit was part of an innocent prank, or evidence of circumstances which led him to believe that no one would act on his lie or deceitful or dishonest act. But in cases like the present one, where the accused tells a lie knowing others will act on it and thereby puts their property at risk, the inference of subjective knowledge that the property of another would be put at risk is clear.

(ii) Jurisprudential Considerations

The view of mens rea suggested above accords with earlier rulings of this Court which rejected the notion that the accused's subjective appreciation of his or her dishonesty is relevant to the mens rea of fraud. In Lafrance v. The Queen, [1975] 2 S.C.R. 201, the accused had taken a car with the intention of returning it later. This Court was faced with the issue of whether this amounted to theft. Martland J. (for the majority) held that it did and that the taking was fraudulent, at p. 214: "The taking was intentional, under no mistake and with knowledge that the motor vehicle was the property of another. In my opinion this made the taking fraudulent."

In R. v. Lemire, [1965] S.C.R. 174, this Court held that the accused's belief that his actions would subsequently be ratified afforded no defence. The accused, the Chief of the Quebec Liquor Police, had been told by the Premier of Quebec to submit fictitious expense accounts in order to receive a salary increase which had been agreed to but which could not be officially paid à tout le moins, être subjectivement conscient que sa conduite mettra en péril le bien d'autrui ou compromettra ses attentes économiques. Comme je l'ai déjà souligné, cela ne signifie pas que le ministère public doit fournir au juge des faits une image exacte de l'état d'esprit de l'accusé au moment où il a commis l'acte malhonnête. Dans certains cas, il est possible de déduire la connaissance subjective du risque des faits tels que l'accusé croyait qu'ils étaient. Ce dernier peut annihiler cette déduction en démontrant, par exemple, que sa supercherie n'était qu'une plaisanterie innocente, ou en établissant les circonstances qui l'ont amené à croire que personne ne se fonderait sur son mensonge, sa supercherie ou son acte malhonnête pour agir. Mais dans les cas comme l'espèce, où l'accusé ment tout en sachant que d'autres personnes se fonderont sur ce mensonge pour agir et met ainsi leur bien en péril, il est facile de déduire qu'il savait subjectivement que le bien d'autrui serait mis en péril.

(ii) Considérations jurisprudentielles

La perception de la mens rea proposée plus haut est conforme aux arrêts antérieurs de notre Cour où on a rejeté l'idée selon laquelle la conscience subjective de l'accusé de sa malhonnêteté est pertinente en ce qui concerne la mens rea de la fraude. Dans l'arrêt Lafrance c. La Reine, [1975] 2 R.C.S. 201, l'accusé s'était emparé d'une automobile dans l'intention de la ramener plus tard. Notre Cour devait décider si cela constituait un vol. À la page 214, le juge Martland (s'exprimant au nom de la majorité) a conclu que oui et qu'on avait agi frauduleusement en prenant la voiture: «L'intention était présente, il n'y a pas eu de méprise et l'on savait que le véhicule à moteur appartenait à un tiers. À mon avis, en prenant la voiture dans ces circonstances, on a agi frauduleusement.»

Dans l'arrêt R. c. Lemire, [1965] R.C.S. 174, notre Cour a jugé que le fait que l'accusé croyait que ses actes seraient par la suite entérinés ne constituait pas un moyen de défense. Le Premier ministre du Québec avait dit à l'accusé, le directeur de la Police des liqueurs du Québec, de soumettre des comptes de dépenses fictifs afin de recevoir une augmentation de salaire qui avait déjà until a government-wide salary review, then under way, had been completed. In submitting the expense accounts Lemire no doubt felt that his actions, if unorthodox, were not dishonest. Nevertheless, Lemire was convicted. Reversing the decision in the Court of Appeal, Martland J. (for the majority) held, at p. 193:

In other words, [the court below held that] there is no intent to defraud within the requirement of s. 323(1) [now s. 380(1)] if the accused person, while deliberately committing an act which is clearly fraudulent, expects that that which he is doing may, at a later date, be validated. To me the very statement of this proposition establishes its error in law.

I do not, of course, overlook the fact that a variety of rulings can be found in lower courts, some of which adopt the position that unless the Crown establishes that the accused subjectively intended to act dishonestly, the mens rea of fraud is not proven and the accused is entitled to be acquitted: see, R. v. Bobbie (1988), 43 C.C.C. (3d) 187 (Ont. C.A.); Lacroix v. La Reine, [1989] R.J.Q. 812 (C.A.); R. v. Daigle (1987), 9 Q.A.C. 140; R. v. Sebe (1987), 35 C.C.C. (3d) 97 (Sask. C.A.), and R. v. Mugford (1990), 58 C.C.C. (3d) 172 (Nfld. C.A.). This was the position adopted by Proulx J.A. in the appeal now before this Court.

These decisions are largely predicated on the English approach in R. v. Landy, [1981] 1 All E.R. 1172 (C.A.), which held that the accused must subjectively believe his or her actions to be dishonest to support conviction, or upon the modification of that approach in R. v. Ghosh, [1982] 2 All E.R. 689 (C.A.), where it was held that the accused must subjectively realize that his or her conduct falls below the ordinary standard of reasonable and honest people. There are two problems with applying the English authorities to the Canadian offence of fraud. First, the relevant English offence rests on language different from that of the Canadian offence. Specifically, the English offence (ss. 1 and été acceptée, mais qui ne pourrait toutefois être officiellement versée que lorsqu'une révision des salaires alors entreprise à l'échelle du gouvernement serait complétée. En soumettant les comptes de dépenses, Lemire croyait indubitablement que ses actes, quoique peu orthodoxes, n'étaient pas malhonnêtes. Lemire a néanmoins été déclaré coupable. Infirmant l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel, le juge Martland conclut, au nom de la majorité, à la p. 193:

[TRADUCTION] En d'autres termes, [la cour d'appel a conclu que] l'accusé n'a aucune intention de frauder au sens de l'exigence prévue au par. 323(1) [maintenant le par. 380(1)] si, en commettant délibérément un acte nettement frauduleux, il s'attend à ce que son geste soit par la suite validé. À mon avis, la formulation même de cette proposition démontre son erreur de droit.

Évidemment, je n'oublie pas qu'on peut trouver toute une gamme de décisions de tribunaux d'instance inférieure, où, dans certains cas, on a adopté le point du vue selon lequel, à moins que le ministère public ne démontre que l'accusé avait subjectivement l'intention d'agir malhonnêtement, la mens rea de la fraude n'est pas établie et l'accusé a droit à l'acquittement: voir R. c. Bobbie (1988), 43 C.C.C. (3d) 187 (C.A. Ont.); Lacroix c. La Reine, [1989] R.J.Q. 812 (C.A.); R. c. Daigle (1987), 9 Q.A.C. 140; R. c. Sebe (1987), 35 C.C.C. (3d) 97 (C.A. Sask.), et R. c. Mugford (1990), 58 C.C.C. (3d) 172 (C.A.T.-N.). C'est le point de vue que le juge Proulx a adopté dans l'appel dont notre Cour est maintenant saisie.

Ces décisions reposent en grande partie sur le point de vue anglais adopté dans R. c. Landy, [1981] 1 All E.R. 1172 (C.A.), où on a conclu que, pour justifier une déclaration de culpabilité, il faut que l'accusé croie subjectivement que ses actes sont malhonnêtes, ou sur la modification de ce point de vue dans l'arrêt R. c. Ghosh, [1982] 2 All E.R. 689 (C.A.), où on a jugé que l'accusé doit subjectivement se rendre compte que sa conduite ne respecte pas la norme ordinaire de la personne raisonnable et honnête. L'application de la jurisprudence anglaise à l'infraction canadienne de fraude présente deux difficultés. D'abord, l'infraction anglaise pertinente est formulée différemment 15(1) of the Theft Act, 1968 (U.K.), 1968, c. 60) expressly refers to "dishonest appropriation" and "dishonestly" obtaining by deception, respectively. This wording, absent in Canada, has been interpreted in England to show Parliament's intention to require subjective awareness of dishonesty. The second problem is, as I see it, that the English authorities cannot be reconciled with the basic principles of criminal law relating to mens rea.

The British Columbia Court of Appeal for these reasons rejected the English approach in R. v. Long (1990), 61 C.C.C. (3d) 156. Taggart J.A. held at p. 169 that Landy was not the law in Canada. With respect to Ghosh, he stated, at p. 170: "I agree with Ewart's [supra] opinion that the Ghosh approach is predicated upon assumptions which have no relevance to the Canadian law of fraud." Taggart J.A. summarized the mental element of fraud as follows, at p. 174:

> ... the mental element of the offence of fraud must not be based on what the accused thought about the honesty or otherwise of his conduct and its consequences. Rather, it must be based on what the accused knew were the facts of the transaction, the circumstances in which it was undertaken and what the consequences might be of carrying it to a conclusion.

In my opinion, Taggart J.A. was correct in rejecting the English approach. While the authorities are far from consistent, the better view is that the accused's belief that the conduct is not wrong or that no one will in the end be hurt affords no defence to a charge of fraud.

(iii) Pragmatic Considerations

Pragmatic considerations support the view of mens rea proposed above. A person who deprives another person of what the latter has should not de l'infraction canadienne. Plus précisément, l'infraction anglaise (décrite à l'art. 1 et au par. 15(1) de la Theft Act, 1968 (R.-U.), 1968, ch. 60) mentionne expressément l'[TRADUCTION] «appropriation malhonnête» et l'obtention [TRADUCTION] «malhonnête» par supercherie, respectivement. En Angleterre, on a considéré que ces mots, qu'on ne retrouve pas au Canada, démontrent l'intention du Parlement d'exiger la conscience subjective de la malhonnêteté. La deuxième difficulté réside, selon moi, dans le fait que la jurisprudence anglaise n'est pas conciliable avec les principes fondamentaux du droit criminel en matière de mens rea.

La Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a, pour ces motifs, rejeté le point de vue anglais dans l'arrêt R. c. Long (1990), 61 C.C.C. (3d) 156. À la page 169, le juge Taggart a conclu que l'arrêt Landy ne s'appliquait pas au Canada. En ce qui concerne l'arrêt Ghosh, il dit à la p. 170: [TRADUCTION] «Je souscris à l'opinion d'Ewart [op. cit.] pour qui le point de vue adopté dans l'arrêt Ghosh repose sur des hypothèses qui ne sont aucunement pertinentes en ce qui concerne le droit canadien de la fraude». À la page 174, le juge Taggart résume ainsi l'élément moral de la fraude:

> [TRADUCTION] ... l'élément moral de l'infraction de fraude ne doit pas reposer sur la croyance de l'accusé quant au caractère honnête ou malhonnête de sa conduite et de ses conséquences. Il doit plutôt reposer sur ce que l'accusé savait être les faits de l'opération, les circonstances dans lesquelles elle a eu lieu et ce que les conséquences pourraient être une fois l'opération terminée.

J'estime que le juge Taggart a eu raison de rejeter le point de vue anglais. Bien que la jurisprudence soit loin d'être uniforme, il vaut mieux considérer que la conviction de l'accusé que sa conduite n'est pas mauvaise ou que personne ne sera lésé en fin de compte ne constitue pas un moyen de défense opposable à une accusation de fraude.

(iii) Considérations pragmatiques

Des considérations pragmatiques appuient la perception de la mens rea proposée plus haut. La personne qui prive une autre personne de ce escape criminal responsibility merely because, according to his moral or her personal code, he or she was doing nothing wrong or because of a sanguine belief that all will come out right in the end. Many frauds are perpetrated by people who think there is nothing wrong in what they are doing or who sincerely believe that their act of placing other people's property at risk will not ultimately result in actual loss to those persons. If the offence of fraud is to catch those who actually practise fraud, its mens rea cannot be cast so narrowly as this. As stated in R. v. Allsop, supra, approved by this Court in Olan, at p. 1182:

> Generally the primary objective of fraudsmen is to advantage themselves. The detriment that results to their victims is secondary to that purpose and incidental. It is "intended" only in the sense that it is a contemplated outcome of the fraud that is perpetrated.

The law of fraud must be sufficiently broad to catch this secondary incident of the defrauder's purpose or it will be of little avail.

This approach conforms to the conception of the offence of fraud which imbues this Court's decision in Olan. Olan points the way to a conception of fraud broad enough in scope to encompass the entire panoply of dishonest commercial dealings. It defines the actus reus accordingly; the offence is committed whenever a person deceives, lies or otherwise acts dishonestly, and that act causes deprivation (including risk of deprivation) to another. To adopt a definition of mens rea which requires subjective awareness of dishonesty and a belief that actual deprivation (as opposed to risk of deprivation) will result, is inconsistent with Olan's definition of the actus reus. The effect of such a test would be to negate the broad thrust of Olan and confine the offence of fraud to a narrow ambit, capable of catching only a small portion of the dishonest commercial dealing which Olan took as the target of the offence of fraud.

The question arises whether the definition of mens rea for fraud which I have proposed may catch conduct which does not warrant criminaliza-qu'elle possède ne devrait pas échapper à la responsabilité criminelle simplement parce que, selon son code moral ou personnel, elle ne faisait rien de mal ou parce qu'en raison de son optimisme elle croyait que tout se terminerait bien. De nombreuses fraudes sont commises par des personnes qui croient qu'elles ne font rien de mal ou qui croient sincèrement que le fait de mettre en péril le bien d'autrui ne causera finalement aucune perte véritable. Si l'infraction de fraude vise à mettre la main au collet des véritables fraudeurs, sa mens rea ne peut être formulée aussi étroitement. Comme on l'a dit dans l'arrêt R. c. Allsop, précité, approuvé par notre Cour dans Olan, à la p. 1182:

> [TRADUCTION] En général, un fraudeur veut avant tout se procurer un avantage. Le tort causé à sa victime est secondaire et incident. Il n'est «intentionnel» que parce qu'il fait partie du résultat prévu de la fraude.

Le droit de la fraude doit être suffisamment large pour viser ce résultat secondaire de l'intention du fraudeur, sinon il ne sera guère utile.

Ce point de vue est conforme à la conception de l'infraction de fraude qui a inspiré notre Cour dans l'arrêt Olan. Ce dernier arrêt ouvre la voie à une conception de la fraude assez large pour comprendre toute la gamme d'activités commerciales malhonnêtes. Il définit l'actus reus en conséquence; l'infraction est commise lorsque, par la supercherie, le mensonge ou un autre acte malhonnête, une personne cause une privation (dont un risque de privation) à autrui. L'adoption d'une définition de la mens rea qui exige une conscience subjective de la malhonnêteté et une conviction qu'une privation véritable (par opposition à un risque de privation) résultera est incompatible avec la définition de l'actus reus formulée dans Olan. Un tel critère aurait pour effet d'annuler la portée générale de l'arrêt Olan et de limiter la portée de l'infraction de fraude qui ne serait plus susceptible que d'englober une infime partie des activités commerciales malhonnêtes que l'arrêt Olan considérait comme visées par l'infraction de fraude.

La question est donc de savoir si la définition de la mens rea que j'ai proposée à l'égard de la fraude peut viser une conduite ne justifiant pas la crimina-

tion. I refer to the fear, reflected in the appellate decisions adopting a narrower definition of the required mens rea, that the reach of the offence of fraud may be extended beyond criminal dishonesty to catch sharp or improvident business practices which, although not to be encouraged, do not merit the stigma and loss of liberty that attends the criminal sanction. The concern is that any misrepresentation or practice which induces an incorrect understanding or belief in the minds of customers, or which causes deprivation, will become criminal. As Marshall J.A. put it in Mugford, supra, at pp. 175-76:

> . . . it is not sufficient to base fraud merely upon a finding that the appellant induced a state of mind in his customers which was not correct. Any misrepresentation may have that effect. Criminal dishonesty extends further. . . .
> It would be a startling extension of criminal liability if every statement urging the public to purchase one's wares because only a limited supply remain were by itself to be visited with criminal sanction.

This poses starkly the critical question: does a view of the offence of fraud which catches a broad range of dishonest commercial dealing also catch conduct which should not be regarded as criminal, but rather left to the civil sanction?

In my view, the approach to the offence of fraud adopted in Olan and perused in these reasons does not take us out of the proper domain of the criminal sanction. To establish the actus reus of fraud, the Crown must establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused practised deceit, lied, or committed some other fraudulent act. Under the third head of the offence it will be necessary to show that the impugned act is one which a reasonable person would see as dishonest. Deprivation or the risk of deprivation must then be shown to have occurred as a matter of fact. To establish the mens rea of fraud the Crown must prove that the accused knowingly undertook the acts which constitute the falsehood, deceit or other fraudulent means, and lisation. Je mentionne la crainte, reflétée dans les arrêts de tribunaux d'appel qui ont adopté une définition plus étroite de la mens rea nécessaire, que la portée de l'infraction de fraude puisse être étendue au-delà de la malhonnêteté criminelle de manière à englober des pratiques commerciales déloyales ou imprudentes qui, même si elles ne doivent pas être encouragées, ne méritent ni l'opprobre ni la perte de liberté que comporte la sanction criminelle. On craint que toute fausse déclaration ou toute pratique qui suscite chez le client une mauvaise compréhension ou une conviction inexacte, ou qui cause une privation, ne devienne criminelle. Comme l'affirme le juge Marshall dans l'arrêt Mugford, précité, aux pp. 175 et 176:

> [TRADUCTION] . . . il ne suffit pas de fonder la fraude sur la seule conclusion que l'appelant a fait naître chez ses clients un état d'esprit inexact. Toute fausse déclaration peut avoir cet effet. La malhonnêteté criminelle va plus loin . . .
> La responsabilité criminelle serait étendue de façon effarante si toute déclaration pressant le public d'acquérir les marchandises de quelqu'un en raison d'un approvisionnement limité devait elle-même faire l'objet d'une sanction criminelle.

La question cruciale est donc celle-ci: une perception de l'infraction de fraude comme visant une large gamme d'activités commerciales malhonnêtes a-t-elle également pour effet d'inclure une conduite qui ne devrait pas être considérée comme criminelle, mais devrait plutôt faire l'objet d'une sanction civile?

À mon avis, l'interprétation de l'infraction de fraude adoptée dans l'arrêt Olan et examinée attentivement dans les présents motifs ne nous fait pas sortir du domaine approprié de la sanction criminelle. Pour établir l'actus reus de la fraude, le ministère public doit prouver hors de tout doute raisonnable que l'accusé a eu recours à la supercherie ou au mensonge, ou qu'il a accompli quelque autre acte frauduleux. En ce qui concerne le troisième volet de l'infraction, il faudra démontrer que l'acte reproché en est un qu'une personne raisonnable considérerait comme malhonnête. Il faut ensuite démontrer qu'il y a effectivement eu privation ou risque de privation. Pour établir la mens rea de la fraude, le ministère public doit that the accused was aware that deprivation could result from such conduct.

The requirement of intentional fraudulent action excludes mere negligent misrepresentation. It also excludes improvident business conduct or conduct which is sharp in the sense of taking advantage of a business opportunity to the detriment of someone less astute. The accused must intentionally deceive, lie or commit some other fraudulent act for the offence to be established. Neither a negligent misstatement, nor a sharp business practice, will suffice, because in neither case will the required intent to deprive by fraudulent means be present. A statement made carelessly, even if it is untrue, will not amount to an intentional falsehood, subjectively appreciated. Nor will any seizing of a business opportunity which is not motivated by a person's subjective intent to deprive by cheating or misleading others amount to an instance of fraud. Again, an act of deceit which is made carelessly without any expectation of consequences, as for example, an innocent prank or a statement made in debate which is not intended to be acted upon, would not amount to fraud because the accused would have no knowledge that the prank would put the property of those who heard it at risk. We are left then with deliberately practised fraudulent acts which, in the knowledge of the accused, actually put the property of others at risk. Such conduct may be appropriately criminalized, in my view.

4. Application of the Law on this Appeal

The trial judge found that the appellant deliberately lied to his customers, by means of verbal misrepresentations, a certificate of participation in the insurance scheme, and brochures advising that the scheme protected all deposits. The lies were told in order to induce potential customers to enter into contracts for the homes the appellant was selling and to induce them to give him their money as deposits on the purchase of these homes. The trial judge also found that the appellant knew at the démontrer que l'accusé a sciemment employé le mensonge, la supercherie ou un autre moyen dolosif alors qu'il savait qu'une privation pouvait en résulter.

L'exigence d'un acte frauduleux intentionnel exclut la simple déclaration inexacte faite par négligence. Elle exclut également le comportement commercial imprudent ou le comportement qui est déloyal au sens de profiter d'une occasion d'affaires au détriment d'une personne moins astucieuse. L'accusé doit intentionnellement tromper, mentir ou accomplir quelque autre acte frauduleux pour que l'infraction soit établie. Une déclaration inexacte faite par négligence ou une pratique commerciale déloyale sont insuffisantes puisque, dans ni l'un ni l'autre cas, on ne trouve l'intention requise de priver par un moyen dolosif. Une déclaration faite par négligence, même si elle est inexacte, ne constitue pas un mensonge intentionnel du point de vue subjectif. De même, le fait de sauter sur une occasion d'affaires sans être motivé par l'intention subjective de causer une privation en trompant ou en induisant autrui en erreur ne constituera pas une fraude. Encore une fois, la supercherie employée négligemment sans s'attendre à des conséquences, comme par exemple, la plaisanterie innocente ou la déclaration faite au cours d'un débat, à laquelle on ne veut pas donner suite, ne constituerait pas une fraude, parce que l'accusé ignorerait que sa plaisanterie mettrait en péril le bien de ceux qui l'ont entendue. Il reste donc les actes frauduleux accomplis délibérément qui, à la connaissance de l'accusé, mettent vraiment en péril le bien d'autrui. À mon avis, une telle conduite peut être à bon droit criminalisée.

4. Application du droit en l'espèce

Le juge du procès a conclu que l'appelant avait délibérément menti à ses clients au moyen de fausses déclarations verbales, d'une attestation de participation au plan de garantie et de brochures informant que le plan garantissait tous les dépôts. L'appelant a menti en vue d'amener les acheteurs éventuels à conclure des contrats pour les résidences qu'il vendait et à lui verser des dépôts pour l'achat de ces dernières. Le juge du procès a également conclu que l'appelant savait, au moment où il time he made these falsehoods that the insurance for the deposits was not in place. Finally, he found that the appellant genuinely believed that the homes would be built and hence that there was no risk to the depositors. "No risk" used in this sense is the equivalent of saying the appellant believed the risk would not materialize.

Applying the principles discussed above, these findings establish that the appellant was guilty of fraud. The actus reus of the offence is clearly established. The appellant committed deliberate falsehoods. Those falsehoods caused or gave rise to deprivation. First, the depositors did not get the insurance protection they were told they would get. That, in itself, is a deprivation sufficient to establish the actus reus fraud. Second, the money they gave to the appellant's company was put at risk, a risk which in most cases materialized. Again, this suffices to establish deprivation.

The mens rea too is established. The appellant told the depositors they had insurance protection when he knew that they did not have that protection. He knew this to be false. He knew that by this act he was depriving the depositors of something they thought they had, insurance protection. It may also be inferred from his possession of this knowledge that the appellant knew that he was placing the depositors' money at risk. That established, his mens rea is proved. The fact that he sincerely believed that in the end the houses would be built and that the risk would not materialize cannot save him.

VI — Disposition

I would dismiss the appeal.

The following are the reasons delivered by

L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ J.—Although I am in general agreement with the reasons of McLachlin J., I share some of the reservations expressed by my colleague Sopinka J. in his reasons, in particular regarding the two following issues, which he expressed as follows (at pp. 9-10):

Secondly, I cannot agree with the statement that "[t]ypically, mens rea is concerned with the consequences of a fait ces mensonges, que les dépôts n'étaient pas garantis. Enfin, il a conclu que l'appelant croyait sincèrement que les résidences seraient construites et que, par conséquent, les déposants ne risquaient rien. Utilisée dans ce sens, l'expression «ne risquaient rien» revient à dire que l'appelant croyait que le risque ne se concrétiserait pas.

Si on applique les principes analysés plus haut, ces conclusions établissent que l'appelant était coupable de fraude. L'actus reus de l'infraction est nettement établi. L'appelant a menti délibérément et ses mensonges ont causé une privation. Premièrement, les déposants n'ont pas obtenu la garantie qui leur était promise. Cela constitue en soi une privation suffisante pour établir l'actus reus de la fraude. Deuxièmement, l'argent qu'ils ont versé à la compagnie de l'appelant a été exposé à un risque qui, dans la plupart des cas, s'est concrétisé. Cela suffit également à établir la privation.

La mens rea est également établie. L'appelant a dit aux déposants qu'ils bénéficiaient d'une garantie alors qu'il savait que ce n'était pas le cas. Il savait que c'était faux. Il savait que, par ce geste, il privait les déposants d'une chose dont ils croyaient bénéficier, soit une garantie. On peut également déduire de cette connaissance qu'il avait que l'appelant savait qu'il mettait en péril l'argent des déposants. La mens rea est par le fait même établie. Le fait que l'appelant croyait sincèrement que les résidences seraient finalement construites et que le risque ne se concrétiserait pas ne lui est d'aucun secours.

VI — Dispositif

Je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

Les motifs suivants ont été rendus par

LE JUGE L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ—Bien que je souscrive d'une manière générale aux motifs du juge McLachlin, je partage certaines des réserves exprimées par le juge Sopinka, dans ses motifs, au sujet des deux questions suivantes notamment (aux pp. 9 et 10):

Deuxièmement, je ne puis souscrire à l'affirmation voulant que «[h]abituellement, la mens rea porte sur les the prohibited actus reus." The actus reus often includes the consequences, and, frequently, more serious offences are distinguished from less serious offences by the consequences without any additional mental element. See R. v. DeSousa, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 944. Thirdly, I have reservations about the statement that "[r]ecklessness presupposes knowledge of the likelihood of the prohibited consequences" as a general proposition. This is the subjective definition of recklessness which I agree is applicable in the case of fraud but not necessarily in all cases. For instance, recklessness in the definition of criminal negligence may arguably be made out if there is objective foresight of risk. This is an issue which we have yet to resolve.

I agree with the result reached by both of my colleagues and would dispose of the case as they do.

Appeal dismissed.

conséquences de l'actus reus prohibé.» Il arrive fréquemment que l'actus reus inclue les conséquences et que des infractions plus graves se distinguent d'infractions moins graves par leurs conséquences indépendamment de tout élément moral additionnel. Voir R. c. DeSousa, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 944. Troisièmement, j'éprouve des doutes à l'égard de l'affirmation, posée comme principe général, selon laquelle «[l]'insouciance présuppose la connaissance de la vraisemblance des conséquences prohibées.» Il s'agit là de la définition subjective de l'insouciance qui, je le reconnais, s'applique au cas de fraude, mais non nécessairement à tous les cas. Ainsi, on pourrait soutenir que, selon la définition de négligence criminelle, il y a insouciance s'il y a prévision objective du risque. C'est là une question que nous n'avons pas encore résolue.

Je suis d'accord avec le résultat auquel en arrivent mes deux collègues et je trancherais le pourvoi comme ils le suggèrent.

Tweedie, J.

G. H. Van Allen, K.C., for plaintiff; W. S. Gray, K.C., for defendant; The trustee was not represented.

TWEEDIE, J.:—This is an action brought by the plaintiff, a chattel mortgagee, to determine, in substance, the validity of a statutory lien claimed by the defendant as guarantor by virtue of the provisions of the Live Stock Encouragement Act and amendments thereto (1917 (Alta.), c. 9, now R.S.A. 1922, c. 65), and its right, in priority to the plaintiff, to the proceeds realized from the sale of property which was subject to both the mortgages of the plaintiff and the lien of the defendant. The plaintiff asks for (1) a declaration that it is entitled in priority to the defendant to the proceeds realized from the sale, and (2) for a direction that the trustee pay to it the sum of $482 so realized.

Summary proceedings were instituted to determine the respective rights of the parties, but owing to the numerous objections involving questions of fact, both as to the validity of the lien and the defendant's right of enforcement, raised on behalf of the plaintiff, pleadings were directed for the purpose of determining the issues. Many of the objections as to validity of the lien raised on the application, and set forth as allegations in the statement of claim, were abandoned at the close of the trial, as the result of information gained upon examination for discovery of an officer of the defendant department and facts disclosed during the hearing of the case.

The facts material to the questions in issue are as follows:—

In September, 1918, one H. R. Froment and 5 others formed themselves into an association under the Live Stock Encouragement Act as amended by 1918 (Alta.), c. 43, for the purpose of procuring a loan to be used in the purchase of live-stock, the repayment of which was to be guaranteed, pursuant to the provisions of the Act, by the Province of Alberta.

On September 14, the association filed with the commissioner, the officer designated in the Act for that purpose, an application in writing, signed by each of its members, for a loan of $3,000 of which $500 was to be received by each of the 6 members. The application stated that Froment required his portion of the loan for the purchase of "milk cows and heifers, Shorthorns preferred," but did not state "the kind of live stock which each purchaser," other than Froment, intended to purchase.

The application was approved by the commissioner and, arrangements having been previously made with the Merchants Bank of Canada to advance money to the various associations to be formed from time to time, a promissory note signed by all the members of the association was obtained by the commissioner as required by s. 5 of the Act as enacted by 1918 (Alta.), c. 43, s. 2. The note dated December 9, 1918, reads as follows:—

"Five years after date I promise to pay to the Order of The Merchants Bank of Canada at Edmonton . . . Alberta, the sum of three thousand dollars with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum payable annually. Value received." Then follow the signatures.

The Provincial Treasurer, endorsed on the note in the form prescribed (s. 6, as enacted by 1918 (Alta.), c. 43, s. 3), the following guarantee:—

"Pursuant to the statute on that behalf I do hereby on behalf of the Province of Alberta guarantee in case of default by the makers payment of the principal and interest of the within promissory note."

The note so guaranteed was forwarded to the bank, and each member of the association received $500, which was used in the purchase of the "kind of live stock" specified in the Act (s. 3).

On October 26, 1921, Froment and his wife being indebted to the plaintiff gave a chattel mortgage to secure the amount of their indebtedness. It is admitted that the wife had no interest in the mortgaged property, her signature having been obtained for the purpose of having her bound by the covenants. The mortgage, which was in good standing at the date of the authorized assignment hereinafter referred to, charged property alleged to be subject to the defendant's statutory lien.

On November 28, 1923, Froment made an authorized assignment under the Bankruptcy Act, 1919 (Can.), c. 36.

On December 11, 1923, a meeting of his creditors was held at which the Traders Trust Co. was elected trustee and at which it was resolved that:—

"The Trustee arrange to hold a cash auction sale of the chattels of the estate forthwith and that the proceeds of each chattel be specifically identified by the clerk of the sale and that the proceeds be held in trust by the trustee pending settlement of the various claims."—the "settlement of the various claims" having reference no doubt to the dispute between the various secured creditors as to their rights against the chattels and personal property affected by their respective securities.

On December 21, 1923, the trustee sold the chattels by public auction and realized $1,322.35, which amount was almost wholly realized from chattels charged in favour of secured creditors.

RE FROMENT, ALTA. LBR. CO. v. ALTA. DEPT. OF AGRICULTURE.

Tweedie, J.

The proceeds of the sale were identified by the clerk as resulting from chattels affected by the security of

(a) The Crown (defendant), $212, (b) The Alberta Lumber Co. Ltd. (plaintiff), $482, (c) The Royal Bank of Canada, $414.50, (d) T. Daniels & Son, $31, (e) A. Thompson, $10; $1,149.50, leaving a balance of $172.85 to be disposed of according to the trustee's statement on file, as follows:—Trustee's fees, $12.58, Costs of sale, $71.50, For distribution, $88.77; $172.85.

The amount of $212 above mentioned as having been realized from the sale of the Crown's security is the amount realized from the sale of cows purchased by the assignor with money procured by him out of the loan to the association, and their offspring or other live-stock substituted in place thereof pursuant to the provisions of the Live Stock Encouragement Act.

At the time of the assignment there was owing under the plaintiff's chattel mortgage $771.10, and on the note $2,069.65, 2 of the makers having paid their share in full, one in part, while the remaining 3 had not paid any portion thereof and were in arrears for approximately 2 years' interest in addition. Froment was directly liable as maker to the bank for the full amount but as between himself and the other members of the association for $589.10.

The Bank of Montreal is now the holder of the note, having acquired it upon taking over the business of the Merchants Bank of Canada, the lender. No proof of claim has been filed with the trustee on its behalf, it realizing no doubt that practically nothing would be available for distribution amongst the unsecured creditors, and preferring to rely for payment upon the other makers of the note and the defendant, the guarantor.

On December 11, 1923, the defendant proved for the full amount owing on the note, and in its proofs stated that it held security described as "a statutory charge upon the real and personal property within the Province of the members of the association." That claim was not disallowed by the trustee. At the trial it was stated by counsel for the defendant that it was abandoning its claim except as to the amount for which the authorized assignor was directly liable as between the members of the association, i.e., $589.10, and desired to enforce its security only to that extent.

No claim has been filed by any of the authorized assignor's co-makers of the note.

The note became due and payable on December 12, 1923, and nothing has been paid on account of it since the authorized assignment.

1925 CanLII 313 (AB KB)

The security claimed by the defendant comes under 2 heads, namely, that acquired under the provisions of ss. 7, 8 and 13 of the Act, which sections create a charge upon all live-stock purchased by the members of the association with the proceeds of the loan, their offspring and any live-stock substituted in place thereof in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and the additional security acquired under s. 6 (b) as enacted by 1921 (Alta.), c. 47, s. 3, which creates a charge upon all the property real and personal within the Province of the members of the association.

Numerous grounds were relied upon on behalf of the plaintiff to establish that "the claim of the defendant is invalid, illegal and void," many of which, as already indicated, were abandoned at the trial. There remains to be considered the following:—(1) The application did not state "the kind of live stock each purchaser intended to purchase" with his share of the proceeds of the loan. (2) "The commissioner did not obtain a joint and several promissory note of the members of the association for the amount of money to be advanced." (3) "The note was for a period exceeding 5 years" and (4) The department is not the holder of the note, has not fulfilled its guarantee nor has it advanced any monies for such purpose.

As to the first of these contentions: Section 3 of the Act provides in part that "The said application shall be in writing and shall state . . . the kind of live stock which each purchaser intends to purchase." The application, as already pointed out, did not so state as to 5 of the purchasing applicants. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff that strict compliance with the above provision was a condition precedent to the exercise by the Provincial Treasurer of his right to guarantee payment of the note without which the Province could not be made liable and consequently the statutory charge could not become effective. That, in my opinion is not a condition precedent as contended for, but is a direction for the purpose of giving information as to grade or quality of the live-stock, for the purpose of assisting the commissioner in determining whether or not the loan should be recommended. The Act itself specifically sets forth the kind of live-stock which may be purchased by each, namely "cows and heifers," and under certain conditions, 10% of the loan may be used "for the joint purchase of a pure-bred bull" (s. 3). The application being silent on this point will be deemed to be an application for a loan to be used in the purchase of live-stock specified in the Act. Even if this objection were tenable under the Act as originally passed, it ceased to be available under s. 6 (a) as enacted by 1918 (Alta.), c. 43, s. 5, in force when the loan was made, which provides that "The guarantee of any note by the Treasurer in form of schedule A to this Act or to a like effect shall render the Province of Alberta liable as endorser thereof and shall be conclusive evidence of the liability of the province for the payment of the principal and interest secured thereby." The omission from the application as alleged does not affect the liability of the Province nor its right to the security claimed in connection therewith.

As to the second objection, that the commissioner did not obtain a joint and several promissory note: s. 5 of the Act as re-enacted, provides that the commissioner "shall obtain the joint and several promissory note of the members of the association for the amount of the money to be advanced." It is argued that this note must be payable to the commissioner himself. There is nothing in the section to so indicate. It is clear from a perusal of the whole Act, particularly s. 11 and ss. 5 and 6 as re-enacted, that the payee of the note is to be the lender, in this case the Merchants Bank of Canada. It is further objected that the note is not "joint and several." The words of promise used in the note are "I promise to pay" which, when a note is signed by 2 or more persons, as is the case in the note in question, are sufficient to constitute it a joint and several note (s. 179 (2) Bills of Exchange Act, R.S.C. 1906, c. 119; Falconbridge on Banking and Bills of Exchange, 3rd ed., p. 889).

As to the third objection, that the note was for a period exceeding 5 years: It is contended that inasmuch as the note became payable by reason of the days of grace 3 days after the expiration of the 5-year period that the Provincial Treasurer had no authority to guarantee the loan. Section 12 of the Act provides that "No loan shall be recommended or guaranteed under this Act covering a greater period than five years . . ." This section must, however, be read in conjunction with ss. 5 and 6 as re-enacted, which respectively provide that the commissioner shall obtain a joint and several promissory note "such note to be for a period not exceeding five years," and upon receipt of the necessary recommendations from the commissioner "the Treasurer may endorse on such note a guarantee in the form" prescribed. The limitation to a period of 5 years within which the loan must be repaid has reference only to the agreement between the lender and the members of the association and when the Act directs that the obligation shall be taken in a particular form, as here in the form of a promissory note, the time for payment in which as agreed between the parties and as set forth in the document is extended by law or custom, there is an implied authority to execute a guarantee for a period which will include such additional time. The guarantee was for the period authorized by the Act.

As to the fourth objection that the defendant is not the holder of the note nor has the Province discharged its obligation under the guarantee: These facts which were admitted can in no way affect the validity of the charge or lien of the defendant which was created and existed for the purpose of enabling the Province to indemnify itself for any payments which it might be called upon to make under its guarantee, for which purpose it is clearly entitled to take and hold security. The greater part of argument of plaintiff's counsel in connection with this point was directed, however, against the defendant's right to prove its claim under the Bankruptcy Act and its consequent right to realize upon its security in accordance with the provisions thereof and reimburse itself in anticipation of the discharge of its obligation. The question as to right of proof and the validity of the security are separate and distinct. Strictly speaking, the proof of claim, having been allowed by the trustee, should not now be open to collateral attack in the proceedings as the trustee is not a party to the action, nor is the procedure that ordinarily adopted for the determination of such questions. Section 53 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act gives to the Court power to expunge or reduce a proof "if the trustee declines to interfere in the matter," which evidently is not the case here, as there is no evidence of any application having been made to him for that purpose.

In view of the fact that the only question involved in this connection affecting the trustee is one of law, i.e., as to the right of proof as to a contingent liability and the trustee has since the trial of the action consented to be added as a party in order to avoid the additional cost which necessarily would be involved in taking proceedings ab initio to determine the question, it will now be dealt with.

The liability in connection with which the defendant has filed its proof of claim is contingent. The authorized assignor Froment was subject to 4 distinct liabilities in regard to the same debt. As one of the makers of the note he is liable (a) as between himself and the holder primarily for the unpaid balance, the note being joint and several, the relation between the parties being that of debtor and creditor; (b) as between himself and the defendant for the unpaid balance in the event of the latter being called upon for payment, the relation being that of principal and surety; (c) as between himself and the other makers, primarily for the share of the loan received by him, the relation of the parties being that of principal and surety and (d) as between himself and one or more of the other makers for contribution of his fair proportion of any sum, payment of which may be necessary to discharge the obligation under the note and on account of which reimbursement cannot be obtained from those, who, as between the makers, are primarily liable. The relation between them is that of co-sureties. He is liable for the debt, for indemnity to the defendant, for indemnity to his co-makers and for contribution.

Has the defendant a provable claim in view of the fact that it is not the holder of the note and has not discharged its obligation to the creditor? In support of his contention that it has not counsel for the plaintiff relies upon a number of authorities having to do with the rights of endorsers under the Bills of Exchange Act and of guarantors and sureties at common law and in equity apart from insolvency proceedings.

But the claim which the defendant seeks to enforce here is not one against the authorized assignor but one, by reason of the assignor's obligation, against the trustee in bankruptcy for the payment of a dividend and the enforcement of its rights under the lien against the estate of the debtor, given by the Bankruptcy Act. That Act extends the rights of persons who are subject to a contingent liability.

Under s. 44 (2) of that Act "all debts and liabilities, present and future, to which the debtor is subject at the date of the receiving order or the making of an authorized assignment or to which he may become subject before his discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the date of the receiving order or the making of the authorized assignment, shall be deemed to be debts provable in bankruptcy or in proceedings under an authorized assignment."—if the claim is based upon a contract or promise as provided for in s-s. 1 of the same section. The provisions of these subsections are similar to those contained in the Bankruptcy Acts 1883 (Imp.), c. 52, s. 37, and 1914 (Imp.), c. 59, s. 30, under which sections the right of proof on the part of a surety has arisen in numerous cases as a result of which "It is now established, notwithstanding the doubts expressed in Re Parrott, [Ex p. Whittaker (1891)] 8 Mor. 49, that the contingent liability of a surety who has not been called upon to pay, or has not in fact paid, forms a debt provable in bankruptcy of the principal debtor (Re Paine, (1897) 1 Q.B. 122; Re Herepath & Delmar, [Ex p. Delmar (1890)] 7 Mor. 129; Re Blackpool Motor Car Co. Limited (1901) 1 Ch. 77) and that one surety can prove in the bankruptcy of a co-surety for contribution, although the proving surety has not paid the creditor anything. (Wolmershausen v. Guillick (1893) 2 Ch. 514.)'' Williams on Bankruptcy, 12th ed., p. 153. In Re Herepath & Delmar, Ex p. Delmar, supra, the proof of claim was filed by one who was a party to a bill of exchange but not the holder and it was held that he was entitled to prove and receive the dividends on account thereof before having paid the holder. The defendant has a provable claim against the estate of Froment. But the holder of the note also has a provable claim for the debt; and Froment's co-makers each have for indemnity and contribution, the amounts of which might subsequently be determined. All, however, would not be entitled to prove. Each of their claims relate to the same debt and to allow proof in respect of each might result in double or treble or more proof and the payment of an amount by way of dividends beyond that which would be properly payable in respect of the debt. No proof having been filed in regard to the note in question other than that of the defendant the trustee acted properly in allowing it and the defendant is entitled to receive dividends in connection therewith and to deal with his security in the manner authorized by the Bankruptcy Act.

It is further contended that, even if the charge created under s. 6 (b) is valid, the defendant has, or at least it is estopped from denying that it has ''surrendered or abandoned it'' by reason of having permitted Froment prior to his assignment to deal with the security in a manner inconsistent with the provisions of the Act under which the charge attached and to the prejudice of the plaintiff. As to this contention I find all the facts against the plaintiff and hold that there was no abandonment or surrender of its security by the defendant.

The plaintiff's last contention is that ''The charge, if any, of the Department is a charge subject to the vested interests of third parties and, therefore, inferior to the plaintiff's mortgage.'' The charge here referred to has no reference to the charge upon live-stock purchased with the proceeds of the loan but that created by s. 6 (b), now s. 10, R.S.A. 1922, c. 65, which reads as follows:—

''10. The Department shall have a charge upon all the real and personal property within the Province of every purchaser, as security for the payment of all sums of money due or to become due under any promissory note whensoever given by the association of which he is a member.''

The note in question was signed on December 8, 1918; the above-quoted section came into force on April 19, 1921; the chattel mortgage in favour of the plaintiff was executed on October 26, 1921.

The section creating the charge in so far as the makers of the note are concerned, is retroactive and the charge is effective to bind the property of all the members of the association for the payment of any note given pursuant to the Act. That it was so intended appears from the use of the words "whensoever given" in referring to the note. "Whensoever" means "at whatever time," which includes a point of time prior to the coming into force of the section. This view is further emphasized by the reference to the notes as "due or to become due." No note could be "due" unless it had been previously given, while "become due" may refer to notes previously given but which have not matured or notes to be given in the future. The defendant has a charge as provided for in the section for the payment of the note in question.

As to the vested interests of third parties, it is quite conceivable that there may be third parties, such as bona fide purchasers, mortgagees, lienholders, pledgees and such like, who may have acquired their respective interests before the enactment of the section in question, to which interest or interests the defendant's charge would be subject. In relation to the property of the debtor, as well as that of other members of the association, the right of the department to a charge in its favour was determined by an event, the signing of the note, the happening of which was antecedent to the enactment of the statute creating it, while its extent was determined by the conditions as they existed at the time of its creation. When the defendant obtained its statutory charge it was effective against all the property of each of the members of the association. The plaintiff had no interest, vested or otherwise, in the property of the authorized assignor at the time when the defendant's charge became effective and that charge being a valid one is not subject to the plaintiff's mortgage.

The plaintiff is not entitled to the declaration asked for nor to the payment to it in priority to the defendant of the sum of $482 and the action must be dismissed.

The defendant, having consented to the reduction of its claim to the sum for which the authorized assignor was primarily liable on the note, the claim will be reduced to that amount by the trustee and the defendant allowed to realize on its security to that extent. It appearing that the defendant has a charge on all the property "real and personal" of the authorized assignor and that there are several mortgages other than the plaintiff's, the trustee is directed to require from the defendant a detailed statement setting forth full particulars of the property affected by its charge and if it be found that there are assets subject to its charge which may be realized upon and which are not subject to the claims of the other secured creditors these assets should be realized by the defendant and the proceeds applied in satisfaction of its claim. The plaintiff has leave to apply to the Court at any time in this connection.

As to the money in the hands of the trustee from the sale of property as directed by the creditors, the trustee should if the secured creditors cannot agree as to their respective rights as to the proceeds, apply to the Court for directions.

The Traders Trust Co., the trustee, will be added as a party defendant to the action.

As the plaintiff and defendant have agreed as between themselves as to costs no order will be made in regard to same. The trustee will not be subject to any costs.

Judgment for defendant.

In the Matter of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985 c. C-36, as amended and In the Matter of a Plan of Compromise or Arrangement of SemCanada Crude Company, SemCAMS ULC, SemCanada Energy Company, A.E. Sharp Ltd., CEG Energy Options Inc. And 1380331 Alberta ULC

(Re: Orleans Energy Ltd.)

Reasons for Decision
of the
Honourable Madam Justice B.E. Romaine

Introduction

[1] SemCAMS ULC seeks an order declaring that:

a) any claims that RMP Energy Inc. (formerly Orleans Energy Ltd.) ("Orleans") may have against SemCAMS with respect to contractual equalization adjustments to volumes of natural gas delivered by Orleans to SemCAMS (the "Price Adjustment Claim") pursuant to an inlet gas purchase agreement dated July 1, 2007 (the "IGPA") were compromised and released by the SemCAMS Plan of Arrangement dated July 24, 2009 (the "Plan") and the Plan Sanction Order granted on October 27, 2009;

b) in accordance with the Claims Process Order of October 22, 2008, Orleans is barred from asserting or enforcing the Price Adjustment Claim, and that such claim is extinguished; and

c) the Statement of Claim filed by Orleans on November 29, 2011 is in breach of the Plan and the Plan Sanction Order and should be struck.

[2] Orleans cross-applies for a declaration that the Price Adjustment Claim was not compromised or released by the Plan and that SemCAMS owes it $1,616,412.28.

[3] The Price Adjustment Claim relates to an accounting process (the "Rework") issued by SemCAMS in June 2011 that adjusted the amount payable by SemCAMS for natural gas purchased by it from Orleans pursuant to the IGPA in the year 2007.

[4] The Rework relates to natural gas purchases that occurred prior to SemCAMS filing proceedings under the CCAA. SemCAMS submits that a claim that arises from such Rework is thus caught and released by the Claims Process Order (which provided for a Claims Bar Date of December 1, 2008). the Plan and the Plan Sanction Order. SemCAMS also submits that Orleans was aware in early 2008, even before the CCAA proceedings had commenced, that Orleans' own reporting error had caused SemCAMS to under-allocate a substantial portion of natural gas product to Orleans in its accounting, and that credit for this under-allocation would be included in the 2007 Rework.

[5] Orleans submits that when the Plan Sanction Order was granted, it was uncertain whether Orleans would be in a net credit or net debit position as a result of the Rework, or in what amount. Thus, Orleans submits, Orleans could not predict the outcome of the Rework, and any estimate it may make would be entirely speculative. Orleans submits that it had no cause of action against SemCAMS at the time of the Plan Sanction Order, and that thus, the Price Adjustment Claim did not fall within the definition of "claim" in the CCAA and could not be compromised.

[6] Orleans submits that, to the extent that the Plan, the Plan Sanction Order and the Claims Process Order provide otherwise, these documents and orders should be interpreted to allow the Price Adjustment Claim to be unaffected, or the offending portions of the Plan and Plan Sanction Order should be severed, amended or disregarded.

Relevant Facts

[7] On July 22, 2008, SemCAMS was granted an Initial Order pursuant to s. 11(1) of the Companies Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, as amended (the "CCAA"). In a separate application on the same date, SemCanada Crude Company was also granted an Initial Order under the CCAA. On July 24, 2008, CEG Energy Options Inc. commenced proposal proceedings in bankruptcy. On July 30, 2008, the CCAA proceedings of SemCAMS and SemCanada and the bankruptcy proceedings of CEG were procedurally consolidated with other proceedings commenced under the CCAA and the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 by affiliated or related companies for the purpose of administrative convenience.

[8] The CCAA proceedings, including the stay that was imposed by the Initial Order, continued until plans of arrangement and reorganization of SemCAMS and other related entities, both in Canada and in the United States, were implemented on November 30, 2009.

[9] On October 22, 2008, the Court granted a Claims Process Order that set out the process for determining claims of creditors in the CCAA proceedings. Pursuant to this order, any creditor who failed to file a claim by December 1, 2008 (the "Claims Bar Date") was barred from asserting or enforcing any pre-filing claim.

[10] This application relates only to SemCAMS. SemCAMS is the Operator of four natural gas processing plants and natural gas gathering systems and pipelines in Alberta including the facilities at the KA Plant. Orleans is a gas producer and uses the processing facilities at the KA Plant.

[11] The KA Plant operates pursuant to a construction, ownership and operation agreement entered into among the joint owners of the plant and SemCAMS as the Operator (the "CO&O Agreement"). SemCAMS is both a joint owner and the Operator of the plant. Orleans is not a joint owner. The KA Plant is used to gather and process raw natural gas for joint owners and for third party producers.

[12] Typically, a party may have its natural gas processed at the KA Plant in two ways:

a) as a joint owner under the CO&O Agreement; or

b) as a third party user under a gas handling and processing agreement (a "Gas Processing Agreement").

[13] However, under the CO&O Agreement, joint owners are entitled to use throughput capacity in the plant in proportion to their ownership interest. Joint owners deliver raw natural gas to the plant for processing by the Operator, and when processing is complete, either take or sell the processed gas ("Sales Gas") and related products to purchasers. Joint owners retain title to their raw gas, Sales Gas and products at all times during processing.

[14] If a joint owner does not use its throughput capacity, the excess capacity can be used by other joint owners or reallocated to third party producers under Gas Processing Agreements, but joint owners have the highest priority for processing. Third party users can be shut out of the plant if joint owners use all their capacity in a given month.

[15] Under a Gas Processing Agreement between a third party user and the Operator, the third party user delivers raw natural gas to the plant for processing, and when processing is complete, either takes or sells Sales Gas and products. Third party users retain title to their raw gas, Sales Gas and products at all times.

[16] Monthly payments made by joint owners and third party users are based on projected use of the plant. Projected throughput typically varies from actual throughput, and at the end of a calendar year, there is a "thirteenth month adjustment" that reconciles projected throughput to actual throughput (the "Thirteenth Month Adjustment"). The Thirteenth Month Adjustment is often further reconciled for each year with revised information provided by owners and third party users, thus the Rework. The main distinction between the Thirteenth Month Adjustment and the Rework is that the focus of the Thirteenth Month Adjustment is on information available to SemCAMS in its capacity as the Operator of the KA Plant, while the Rework process requires more involvement from parties that deliver gas and related products to the plant.

[17] On July 1, 2007, SemCAMS and Orleans entered into the IGPA. Under the IGPA:

a) Orleans sold raw natural gas to SemCAMS in its individual capacity at the KA Plant inlets;

b) SemCAMS agreed to pay Orleans a premium for its raw natural gas, less certain amounts (as described below);

c) SemCAMS took title to the gas at the KA Plant inlets; and

d) the raw natural gas sold by Orleans to SemCAMS would be processed at the KA Plant using the capacity and priority rights held by SemCAMS by virtue of its joint ownership interest in the KA Plant.

[18] Since SemCAMS took title to the raw natural gas at the plant inlets, it could use its throughput capacity as a joint owner and Orleans would not be at risk of losing throughput capacity.

[19] The pricing for the raw natural gas under the IGPA establishes through a "netback" pricing mechanism, which provides that SemCAMS would purchase the raw natural gas from Orleans at a specified price, less the costs associated with the subsequent processing of the gas (the "Processing Costs"). SemCAMS as one of the joint owners of the KA Plant paid lower capital fees to process gas. Since the netback pricing mechanism under the IGPA is based in part on the Processing Costs, and the Processing Costs are based in part on the operating expenses paid by SemCAMS to process SemCAMS" raw natural gas at the KA Plant, the purchase price paid by SemCAMS to Orleans was subject to contractual price adjustments. The IGPA also provided Orleans with a contractual right to request an audit to verify actual throughput and adjust the purchase price accordingly. The IGPA provides that adjustments as a result of audits or otherwise shall be applied to gas purchased by SemCAMS under the IGPA as follows:

a. The Processing Agreement includes a thirteenth month adjustment clause which is hereby incorporated into this agreement so that any adjustments made pursuant to that clause, or otherwise, including, without limitation, any adjustments arising from any audits as provided for in the Processing Agreement or in the . . . CO&O Agreement . . . shall be applied to all gas purchased by SemCAMS under this Agreement. [emphasis added]

[20] SemCAMS entered into inlet gas purchase agreements similar to the IGPA with other producers. The Orleans IGPA was terminated on July 22, 2008.

[21] The Rework, like the Thirteenth Month Adjustment, is a redistribution by SemCAMS as Operator of the KA Plant of funds paid by joint owners and third party users throughout the year at the KA Plant. The joint owners and third party users that have underpaid (i.e. who have been allocated excess production or invoiced insufficient share of the costs) are invoiced by the Operator, for the amount they underpaid. The invoiced amount is paid to the Operator, for the sole purpose of redistribution by it, on a pro-rata basis, to the joint owners and third party users that have overpaid.

[22] SemCAMS asserts that the Rework is not solely within the control of the Operator, noting that it is performed in conjunction with third parties and joint owners to verify their respective costs and throughput. As described by SemCAMS, conducting a Rework is a slow process. The revised information that results in a Rework typically comes from joint owners and third parties conducting audits or from making adjustments for actual volumes delivered. SemCAMS has submitted that audits can occur up to 26 months after the end of the production year. As part of an audit, the auditor forwards its queries to the Operator who responds to such queries. The auditor can then accept or reject the Operator's response. Once the Operator has the actual throughput from joint owners and third parties (including any changes from audits), the Operator has the information to calculate the Rework.

[23] SemCAMS as Operator expects that it will likely complete a Rework for the KA Plant for all production years. It has completed a Rework for the KA Plant for 2005, 2006 and 2007 and is in the process of completing a Rework for 2008. SemCAMS as Operator will be completing a Rework for 2009, based on the revised information that the Operator has already received.

[24] SemCAMS asserts that Orleans did not properly report the production volumes that it delivered to the KA Plant during 2007 and early 2008 because it did not include analysis and volumes for the hydrocarbon liquids. In a January 31, 2008 email, SemCAMS advised Orleans that it had been apparently under-allocated the hydrocarbon liquid known as condensate. Specifically, SemCAMS advised Orleans that it appeared that Orleans has been under allocated 400.6 m3 of condensate for the production month of December 2007 alone. In an e-mail dated February 6, 2008, SemCAMS advised that it had investigated this issue and determined that the under-allocation had occurred because Orleans had not provided the required information that would allow SemCAMS to properly determine the volumes of hydrocarbon liquids delivered under the IGPA.

[25] On February 13, 2008, accounting staff from SemCAMS and Orleans met to discuss the reporting issues. SemCAMS informed Orleans that it needed to provide revised production volumes to rectify the reporting issues going forward. Orleans submits that it provided the necessary revised reports the next day, although SemCAMS submits that only some of the information was delivered at that time.

[26] The email evidence establishes that Orleans knew in April of 2008 that SemCAMS would be conducting a Rework for 2008 that would include the issue of hydrocarbon under-allocation, but that the Rework would take some time, probably over a year.

[27] Orleans concedes that it would have prepared an estimate of what it would be owed by SemCAMS to Orleans for the six months of under-allocation of hydrocarbons in 2007 under the IGPA, although its Chief Financial Officer indicated he would not recall this with certainty. Orleans submits that, until SemCAMS finalized the Rework, it had no way to quantify what the actual results would be, whether the adjustment would be positive or negative, but concedes that it would have been able to estimate the credit that Orleans would get under the Rework associated with the shortfall for condensate, subject to having to rely on the information provided by the third-party owner of the gathering system that Orleans was using to get its gas into the KA Plant. SemCAMS submits, and Orleans does not dispute, that the financial impact of the condensate under-allocation for December, 2008 was approximately $233,000. If that was typical for the six months of 2007 during which condensate was under-reported, Orleans would be entitled to credit of approximately $1.4 million.

[28] In the fall of 2008, Orleans received the Claims Process Order and became aware of the Claims Bar Date of December 1, 2008. It prepared a Proof of Claim relating to gas purchased from SemCAMS in June and July of 2008 and for Thirteenth Month Adjustments for previous time periods, but with no contingent claim for the condensate under-allocation.

[29] On August 11, 2009, the Monitor sent Orleans a Notice of Revision increasing its claim to include an unsecured claim for a price adjustment resulting from the 2008 Thirteenth Month Adjustment. Orleans challenged this treatment, alleging that the Thirteenth Month Adjustment price adjustment should be treated as an "Unaffected Claim" under the Plan. After the decision in Re: SemCanada Crude Company (Celtic Exploration Ltd.), 2010 ABQB 531, leave to appeal dismissed in Celtic Exploration Ltd. v. SemCAMS ULC, 2010 ABCA 403 (the "Celtic Decision"), Orleans withdrew its Notice of Dispute. In the Celtic Decision, I found that the Thirteenth Month Adjustment was part of Celtic's unsecured claim for the unpaid portion of what SemCAMS as purchaser under the Celtic IGPA owed for the raw gas it purchased from Celtic prior to the CCAA filing: para. 78.

[30] In September of 2010, there was communication between SemCAMS and a consultant retained by Orleans with respect to the Rework. Orleans' consultant told SemCAMS that Orleans would provide further information to SemCAMS. SemCAMS provided revised figures to Orleans and asked Orleans to confirm them.

[31] On June 30, 2011, SemCAMS sent Orleans the details of the Rework for 2007. The Rework indicated that Orleans was owed $1,616,4012.68 by SemCAMS pursuant to the IGPA as a price adjustment for gas sold by Orleans to SemCAMS from the commencement of the IGPA through December 31, 2007. SemCAMS takes the position that this is a debt compromised by the Plan and extinguished by the Plan Sanction Order.

[32] With respect to the Orleans gas that was processed at the KA Plant in 2007 prior to the commencement of the IGPA, the Rework details indicate that Orleans is owed $383,408.03. Orleans' claim for such amount was not compromised by the Plan and the Plan Sanction Order because SemCAMS as Operator of the KA Plant processed such gas pursuant to a Gas Processing Agreement with Orleans. Orleans has been paid this amount.

[33] SemCAMS has prepared a chart that details the Rework for 2007 relating to SemCAMS and the other companies that sold gas to SemCAMS prior to the CCAA proceedings under inlet gas purchase agreements. This chart indicates that SemCAMS overpaid the Operator of the KA Plant a net amount of $645,282.95 for aggregate gas purchases from inlet gas purchase agreement customers during 2007. Absent the CCAA proceedings, this amount of overpayment would be paid back to SemCAMS and redistributed to those customers, leaving SemCAMS in a net-zero position. However, SemCAMS takes the position that the price adjustments (whether overpayments or underpayments) are stayed payables and that any claims the inlet gas purchase agreement customers may have for underpayments were compromised and released by the Plan. Similarly, it takes the position that it cannot collect back any overpayments made to such customers as identified by the Rework. Consequently, SemCAMS is in a better position by the amount of $645,282.95 than it would have been had the CCAA proceedings not intervened.

[34] The 2008 Rework has not been completed.

Issues

1. Is the Price Adjustment Claim a "claim" that can be compromised under the CCAA?

2. Was the Price Adjustment Claim released and discharged by the Plan and barred by the Plan Sanction Order?

3. Should the Orleans Statement of Claim be struck out?

Analysis

Statutory Provisions and Case Law

[35] Section 2 of the CCAA defines a "claim" as being "any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind that would be a claim provable within the meaning of section 2 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act."

[36] Section 2 of the BIA defines a "claim provable in bankruptcy", "provable claim" or "claim provable" as including any claim or liability provable in proceedings under the Act.

2012 ABQB 495 (CanLII)

[37] Section 121 of the BIA defines a "claim provable" as follows:

> Claims provable
>
> 121.(1) all debts and liabilities, present or future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt shall be deemed to be claims provable in proceedings under this Act.
> (2) The determination whether a contingent or unliquidated claim is a provable claim and the valuation of such a claim shall be made in accordance with section 135. [emphasis added]

[38] Thus, claims provable in bankruptcy include contingent and unliquidated liabilities if the bankrupt is subject to such a liability on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt or becomes subject to such liability before the bankrupt's discharge by reason of an obligation incurred before bankruptcy, if such claims are determined to be probable claims by a trustee and valued as such pursuant to Section 135 of the BIA. An appeal from such determination may be made to a Court.

[39] The language of Section 121 of the BIA is echoed in part in the language of Section 19 of the CCAA as follows:

> Claims
> 19.(1) Subject to subsection (2), the only claims that may be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement in respect of a debtor company are
>
> (a) claims that related to debts or liabilities, present or future, to which the company is subject on the earlier of
>
> (i) the day on which proceedings commended under this Act, and
>
> . . .
>
> (b) claims that relate to debts or liabilities, present or future, to which the company may become subject before the compromise or arrangement is sanctioned by reason of any obligation incurred by the company before the earlier of the days referred to in subparagraphs (a)(i) and (ii). [emphasis added]

Section 19(1)(a)(ii) does not apply in this case.

[40] Case law discussing whether particular claims are "provable claims" under the BIA is therefore relevant to the same issue under the CCAA.

[41] Orleans relies on Claude Resources Inc. (Trustee of) v. Dutton (1993), 22 C.B.R. (3d) 56 (Sask.Q.B.) for the proposition that, if all of the elements establishing liability for a debt are not known or proven or if a claim is too speculative or difficult to prove it will not be a "provable claim". Claude Resources involved a statement of claim alleging breach of fiduciary duty and negligence and a claim by some of the defendants against the bankrupt company for indemnity. The Court found that there must be some element of probability about the contingent liability arising from the litigation before the Court should recognize s claim as a "provable claim", and without such element of probability, the claim was too remote or speculative: para. 30.

[42] The reasoning in Claude Resources was rejected by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Confederation Treasury Services Ltd., Re (1997), 43 C.B.R. (3d) 4, (sub nom. Confederation Treasury Services Ltd. (Bankrupt), Re (1997), 96 O.A.C. 75 (C.A.).

[43] That case similarly involved a claim arising from the potential liability of the bankrupt's auditors and former directors and officers arising from litigation against them and their claim for contribution and indemnity against the bankrupt company. The Court noted that the need for probability of liability arising from court proceedings articulated in Claude Resources was too high a threshold for the establishment of such a claim. It commented at para. 4 that, "(w)hile there may be claims so remote and speculative in nature that they could not properly be considered contingent claims", the claim of the auditors did not fall within the category. The claim was remitted back to the trial court for valuation pursuant to Section 121(2) of the BIA "upon such evidence as may be adduced by the parties in respect of such valuation".

[44] The reasoning in Confederation Treasury Services, including the rejection of the test set out in Claude Resources, was adopted in National Bank of Canada v. Merit Energy Ltd., 2001 ABQB 583, 294 A.R. 15 aff'd 2002 ABCA 5, 96 Alta. L.R. (3d) 1 at para. 77 by LoVecchio J., who noted that Section 121 of the BIA does not specify the degree of certainty required to make a claim provable. The Confederation Treasury Services reasoning was also adopted in Experienced Equipment Sales & Rentals Inc., Re, 2001 ABQB 461, 208 A.C.W.S. (3d) 453, in a situation where a claim was made pursuant to a statement of claim alleging damages for slander of title. Belzil, J. noted that the statement of claim in question disclosed a recognized cause of action that had the legal potential to be reduced to a judgment, and commented that "(i)t would be incongruous in the extreme if a Trustee rejected a claim as being too remote and speculative only to have a Court later conclude that the claim was valid and quantifiable": para. 25.

[45] In Auctioneers' Assn. (Alberta) v. Hunter, 2002 ABQB 28, 309 A.R. 290, Master Funduk undertook a thorough review of existing case law on this issue in an application for summary judgment where the plaintiff's lawsuit was started after the date that the defendant was discharged from bankruptcy and the issue was whether the defendant's liability on the guarantee that was the basis for the lawsuit was released by the order of discharge. Master Funduk thus had to consider whether the plaintiff's claim was a claim "provable in bankruptcy".

[46] The Master found that it was, relying on Abacus Cities Ltd. (Trustee of) v. AMIC Mortgage Investment Corp., [1992] 4 W.W.R. 309 (Alta.C.A.) and Confederation Treasury Services. He noted at para. 46 that Abacus Cities held that facts occurring after the date of bankruptcy based on a pre-bankruptcy contract can give rise to a claim provable in bankruptcy. The claim in Abacus Cities was for costs incurred by a mortgagee after the date of the bankruptcy based on indemnities set out in pre-bankruptcy mortgages.

[47] In Abacus Cities, the Court dealt with the argument that Section 121(2) limits future liabilities to those that can be valued before they arise. The Court conceded that future claims can be limited if they are not provable "when the trustee calls for proof", but commented that "(o)ne must take care not to overstate the rule. It does not eliminate contingent or future claims. It merely subjects them to a valuation process:" page 317. The Court thus found that Section 121(2) did not necessary defeat the mortgagees, commenting at page 319 that:

> In conclusion, no rule of law forbids simpliciter the enforcement of a pre-bankruptcy cost indemnity given by the bankrupt to a creditor for expenses incurred after bankruptcy. But a bankruptcy court may refuse to enforce that indemnity. It might refuse when enforcement would countenance abuse of the bankruptcy process; or where a creditor incurred costs other than in a "commercially reasonable fashion."

[48] Master Funduk noted in his review of case authority the comment in Re Paine; Ex parte Read, [1897] 1 Q.B. 122 that "it is now established . . . that the contingent liability of a surety who has not been called upon to pay, or has not in fact paid, forms a debt provable in the bankruptcy of the principal debtor": para. 50, citing Re Froment, [1925] 2 W.W.R. 415.

[49] The Master preferred the reasoning in Confederation Treasury Services to that of Claude Resources. He also considered the case of Ontario New Home Warranty Program v. Jiordan Homes Ltd. (1999), 43 O.R. (3d) 756 (Ont.Gen.Div.), where a claimant had made a claim against a new home warranty program relating to a discharged bankrupt and the program sued the discharged bankrupt on the basis of an indemnity provision under a guarantee. The Master pointed out that the Court in Ontario New Home Warranty had been incorrectly advised by counsel that there were no cases on point, and had made its decision in the absence of existing authority. Master Funduk distinguished Ontario New Home Warranty on the facts, but he also questioned the Court's statement that a bankrupt is not "subject to a liability" until and unless the New Home Warranty Program pays a claim. The Master noted that this statement "overlooks the fact that the bankrupt's liability is a contingent liability and section 121 recognizes contingent liabilities": para. 62. He therefore found that the Ontario New Home Warranty case had no precedential value, noting that the issue in the case before him was whether the contingent claim could be valued and, if so, what value should be given to it: para. 68. He directed that the case go to trial solely to determine the value of the liability, noting that if the liability could not be valued pursuant to Section 135 of the BIA, the defendant would not be released from any liability based on the guarantee.

[50] Orleans points out that the Master did not refer to the Queen's Bench decision of Peters v. Remington (2001), 291 AR 189 in his discussion of authorities, and submits that, thus, the Master's decision suffers from the same kind of deficiency that he criticized in Jiordan Homes. However, it is notable that while the Court of Appeal upheld the result in Peters (2004 ABCA 5), it did so on the basis of res judicata arising from a previous determination of the issue by a trustee in bankruptcy, and found the trial judge in error for considering the issue afresh. The issue identified by the Court of Appeal in Peters was a narrow one on facts that are distinguishable from this case: if a claim has already been denied in bankruptcy as offending the "rule against double proofs", can it be pursued after the proposal has been accepted: para. 1. This is a different issue from this case, where a claim was not made in the CCAA proceedings.

[51] In Harvey, Re, 2004 ABQB 773, 373 A.R. 373, a trustee in bankruptcy sought a declaration that the indebtedness of the bankrupt to Human Resources and Development Canada ("HRDC") was a claim provable in bankruptcy. HRDC took the position that its claim for recovery of an employment insurance overpayment became a debt due only when the Canada Employment Insurance Commission made a decision under Section 52 of the Employment Insurance Act that a person had received money to which he was not entitled. At para. 19 of the decision, Master Smart concluded that the claim was provable, noting that Section 121 of the BIA clearly provides that a contingent as unliquidated claim may be a provable claim. He commented that, even if Section 52 of the Employment Insurance Act created a true condition precedent to the claim, it was still a provable claim as long as it was not too remote or speculative, citing Confederation Treasury Services. Master Smart noted that:

> (a)ll of the events which gave rise to the liability to HRDC occurred prior to the bankruptcy. All that need be done by HRDC is to review its file, calculate the amount and give notice. Indeed, in this case it has already been done but in any case it cannot be said that these tasks are so difficult so as to cause one to conclude that the claim is too speculative or remote.

1. Is the Price Adjustment Claim a "claim" that can be compromised under the CCAA?

A. Was SemCAMS "subject to" the Price Adjustment Claim prior to the Plan Sanction Order?

[52] Orleans submits that SemCAMS was not "subject to" the Price Adjustment Claim at the time of the Plan Sanction Order, and that the claim is thus not a "claim" under the CCAA, since both Section 121 of the BIA and Section 19 of the CCAA requires the debt or liability to be one, present or future, that the debtor is "subject to" on the day proceedings are commenced or before discharge or plan sanction.

[53] Orleans relies on the fact that it could not have submitted an invoice for the Price Adjustment Claim prior to the completion of the Rework. This argument ignores the distinction between "debt" and "liability", both of which are included in the definition of provable claims.

[54] A "liability" is a term that can be used to describe "an unliquidated or unspecified legal obligation". A "debt" is a narrower term that refers to "a specific kind of obligation for a liquidated or certain sum": Royal Trust Co. v. H.A. Roberts Group Ltd., [1995] 4 W.W.R. 305 (Sask.Q.B.) at para. 119, cited with approval in Re West Bay SonShip Yachts Ltd., 2009 BCCA 31, 306 D.L.R. (4th) 294 at para. 22. While the Price Adjustment Claim may not have been a liquidated debt at the time of the Plan Sanction Order, it was certainly a liability that arose from the IGPA. The Price Adjustment Claim, like the Thirteenth Month Adjustment, represents a claim for the unpaid portion of what SemCAMS as purchaser under the IGPA owed to Orleans for the gas and associated liquids it purchased from Orleans prior to the CCAA filing: see the Celtic Decision at para. 78.

[55] Orleans relies on Ontario New Home Warranty for the submission that a claim is a provable claim only if the debtor actually becomes liable before his discharge. I have already referred to the lack of precedential value of that case, but note that, in any event, the Court in Ontario New Home Warranty conceded that Section 121(1) included liabilities that may come due at a future time after discharge, as long as they arose prior to discharge : para. 11. The claim in issue in Ontario New Home Warranty was an indemnity agreement that the Court found had not become a liability until after the bankrupt was discharged, a different fact scenario from the one in this case. The Court in Ontario New Home Warranty did not turn its mind to whether the claim in that case was a contingent claim.

[56] Orleans concedes that all of the obligations under the IGPA, including the Rework, existed upon the execution of the IGPA, but submits that SemCAMS was not "subject to" the Price Adjustment Claim until after the Plan Sanction Order, because no-one knew with any certainty that any liability would arise from SemCAMS to Orleans as a result of the Rework. The issue of certainty will be subject to further analysis in this decision, but this argument fails because SemCAMS was, in fact, subject to a contingent liability, future and unliquidated, arising from the under-allocation of condensation in 2007.

B. Is it necessary that Orleans have a cause of action that could lead to a judgment before a claim is a "provable claim"?

[57] Orleans submits that it had suffered no injury and had no cause of action to recover the Price Adjustment Claim at the time that SemCAMS obtained the Plan Sanction Order. It suggests that the West Bay decision stands for the proposition that a "provable claim" must be something for which the creditor could have filed a lawsuit and obtained judgment at the time of the CCAA proceedings.

2012 ABQB 495 (CanLII)

[58] I find that Orleans had suffered an "injury" at the time of the CCAA proceedings that related to the Price Adjustment Claim: it was under-allocated condensate for the six months in 2007, giving rise to a liability even though the debt was not liquidated until the Rework. The non-performance of the contract (to the extent that such non-performance existed since the under-allocation arose from Orleans' failure to properly report volumes of condensate to SemCAMS) occurred prior to the CCAA filing. The injury "matured" when the amount of the debt was ascertained with finality through the Rework.

[59] At any rate, West Bay does not stand for the bald proposition suggested by Orleans. West Bay involved a common law claim for damages for wrongful dismissal. West Bay had filed for protection under the CCAA on December 16, 2005. The employee claimant was given notice on January 17, 2006 that his employment would be terminated effective June 6, 2006. A plan was sanctioned on June 23, 2006. The claimant did not file a Proof of Claim.

[60] The Court found that this wrongful dismissal claim did not accrue from the outset of the claimant's employment, and thus did not represent a contingent liability of West Bay of the date of filing under the CCAA. It was thus not a pre-filing claim. In coming to this conclusion, Levine, J.A., commented at para. 21 that:

> The question that arises in this case is whether the existence of a contractual obligation, and the corresponding potential for a claim for damages for its breach, is a contingent liability of the party who may commit the breach. I conclude that, although there is the potential of a claim for damages, there can be no liability, contingent or otherwise, where this is no present cause of action. That is, until there is a breach of contract, there is no legal basis for any claim or any corresponding liability.

[61] She noted at para. 24 that, until termination of the contract of employment without notice, there was no injury, and that the mere possibility of a breach of contract is not sufficient to give rise to a contingent liability.

[62] The Court ultimately determined the matter on the basis that the claim for damages fell within the definition of "claim" for other reasons relating to the language of the Plan, and there was no consideration of whether the claim fell within s. 19(1)(b) of the CCAA.

[63] Interpreting section 19 in the manner suggested by Orleans, that claims must be liabilities that could be sued to judgment before the end of the CCAA proceeding, does not accord with a common sense interpretation of section 19 and the definition of "claims" under the CCAA, as these sections on their face encompass future liabilities, contingent and unliquidated that may not be payable until the future, if at all, depending on the occurrence of the contingent event.

[64] This interpretation also leads to absurd results: the original $8.6 million claim for gas sold before the Initial Order was granted would be compromised, the Thirteenth Month Adjustment would be compromised, but the Rework amount would survive the CCAA proceedings, even though it arose from the same set of circumstances. If the Rework had resulted in an amount owing by Orleans, it would have received a compromised amount on the debt owing to it by SemCAMS but would have to pay the entire amount of any overpayment back.

[65] In this case, the Price Adjustment Claim arose from an "injury" that occurred prior to the CCAA filing, a pre-filing liability that existed at the time of the CCAA filing. It gave rise to a contingent, unliquidated liability prior to the Plan Sanction Order.

C. Was the Price Adjustment Claim too uncertain at the time of the Plan Sanction Order for it to fall within the definition of "claim" under the CCAA?

[66] Orleans submits that, prior to the receipt of the Rework details, it did not know and could not have known if SemCAMS had to pay Orleans or vice-versa. That may be so, but Orleans knew that SemCAMS had under-paid it for condensate. It knew it was entitled to a credit in the Rework for the under-allocated condensate and it could, and likely did, calculate the value of that credit. If that calculation could not be made with absolute finality, it could be made with a fair degree of certainty.

[67] SemCAMS concedes that the amount owed by it to Orleans for 2007 was not finally ascertained until the Rework, as the process could result in adjustments with respect to other parties that could counter or reduce the credit, but submits that Section 19 allows a plan to compromise future and contingent claims. It is the very nature of a contingent claim that it is "a claim which may or may not ever ripen into a debt, according as some future event does or does not happen": Gardner v Newton (1916), 29 D.L.R. 276 at 281, cited by the Court of Appeal in Peters at para. 25.

[68] The Price Adjustment Claim was not too speculative to be a provable claim. It was sufficiently certain that a) SemCAMS had an obligation to pay for a price adjustment credit for 2007 arising out of the under-allocation of the condensate; b) that this would be addressed in a Rework; and c) the amount of the credit could have been calculated with some degree of certainty. Even claims made under indemnities that give rise to double contingencies have been found to be provable claims, subject to valuation, and the Price Adjustment Claim had a greater degree of certainty than this type of claim. The fact situation in this case is similar to that in Re Harvey; as in that case, the relevant underlying transaction occurred before the insolvency event, even though the debt did not come due until the occurrence of a required event.

[69] I cannot agree with Orleans' submission that requiring Orleans and other inlet gas purchase agreement customers to file contingent claims with respect to the Rework would be impractical and unworkable. As was the case in Confederation Treasury, Auctioneers' Association and Experienced Equipment Sales and Rentals, the claim may have required valuation by the Monitor or the Court, but again, that is the nature of a contingent unliquidated claim.

[70] In summary, I find that the Price Adjustment Claim is a claim that can be compromised under the CCAA.

2. Was the Price Adjustment Claim released and discharged by the Plan and barred by the Plan Sanction Order?

[71] The Claims Process Order of October 22, 2008, which was served on Orleans, makes it clear that "claim" includes contingent claims, defining "claim" as including:

> . . . any . . . claim . . . made, in connection with any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind whatsoever, and any interest accrued thereon or costs payable in respect thereof, including without limitation . . . by reasons of any breach of contract or other agreement (oral or written) . . . and whether or not any indebtedness, liability or obligation is reduced to judgment, liquidated, unliquidated, fixed, contingent, matured, unmatured, disputed, undisputed, legal, equitable, secured, unsecured, present, future, known or unknown . . . and whether or not any right or claim is executory or anticipatory in nature including . . . with respect to any matter, action, cause or chose in action whether existing at present or commenced in the future . . . [emphasis added]

Orleans did not file a Proof of Claim for the Price Adjustment Claim, or any credit owing to it arising from the under-allocation of condensate, before the Claims Bar Date of December 1, 2008, and does not apply to file a late claim.

[72] The relevant portions of Section 8.1 of the Plan are as follows:

> On the Plan Implementation Date . . . the Company . . .shall be released and discharged from any and all demands, claims, actions, causes of action, counterclaims, suits, debts, sums of money, accounts, covenants, damages . . . on account of any liability, obligation, demand or cause of action of whatever nature which any Creditor or other Person may be entitled to assert . . . whether known or unknown, matured or unmatured, foreseen or unforeseen, existing ro hereafter arising, based in whole or in part on any act or omission, occurrence existing or taking place on or prior to the Plan Implementation Date in any way relating to, arising out of or in connection with the Claims, the business and affairs of the Company whenever or however conducted . . . the Plan, the CCAA Proceedings, any Claim that has been barred or extinguished by the Claims Process Order and all Claims arising out of such actions or omissions shall be forever waived and released, all to the full extent permitted by Law; . . . [emphasis added]

[73] As I have found that the Price Adjustment Claim is a claim that may be subject to compromise under Section 19(1) of the CCAA, it is clear that it is caught by Section 8.1 of the Plan. Paragraphs 28 and 45 of the Plan Sanction Order give effect to Section 8.1 as follows:

2012 ABQB 495 (CanLII)

> 28. Pursuant to and in accordance with the Plan, any and all Affected Claims of any nature against the Company, . . . shall be forever compromised, discharged and released, and the ability of any Person to proceed against the Company in respect of or relating to any Affected Claims shall be forever discharged and restrained, and all proceedings with respect to, in connection with or relating to such Affected Claims are hereby permanently stayed, subject only to the right of Affected Creditors to receive the distributions pursuant to the Plan and this Plan Sanction Order in respect of their Affected Claims.
>
> 45. Pursuant to and in accordance with Section 8.1 of the Plan, on the Plan Implementation Date the Released Parties shall be released and discharged from any and all demands, claims, actions, causes of action . . .on account of any liability, obligation, demand or cause of action of whatever nature which any Creditor or other Person may be entitled to assert. . .whether known or unknown, matured or unmatured, foreseen or unforeseen, existing or hereafter arising, based in whole or in part on any act or omission, transaction, duty, responsibility, indebtedness, liability, obligation, dealing or other occurrence existing or taking place on or prior to the Plan Implementation Date in any way relating to, arising out of or in connection with the Claims, the business and affairs of the Company whenever or however conducted . . .any Claim that has been barred or extinguished by the Claims Process Order and all Claims arising out of such actions or omissions shall be forever waived and released, all to the full extent permitted by Law.

The Price Adjustment Claim was thus released and discharged by the Plan and has become barred and extinguished by the Plan Sanction Order.

[74] Given that I find that the Price Adjustment Claim falls within the definition of a "claim" under the CCAA, it is not necessary that I address whether the Plan Sanction Order exceeds the jurisdiction of the Court, nor is it necessary that I address whether allowing the Price Adjustment Claim to succeed would result in unequal treatment among creditors and work a prejudice on SemCAMS and the CCAA process.

3. Should the Orleans Statement of Claim be struck out?

[75] In its Statement of Claim, Orleans claims damages for breach of the IGPA, specifically amounts stated to be owing by the Rework. It was filed in breach of paragraph 25 of the Plan Sanction Order, which stays all proceedings with respect to such a claim.

[76] The Statement of Claim is accordingly struck out.

2012 ABQB 495 (CanLII)

Conclusion

[77] In summary, I find that Orleans' Price Adjustment Claim is a "claim" that can be compromised under the CCAA, that it was released and discharged by the Plan and barred and extinguished by the Plan Sanction Order.

[78] I find the Statement of Claim relating to the Price Adjustment Claim to be a breach of the Plan Sanction Order and, accordingly, I strike it.

[79] If the parties are unable to agree on costs, that issue may be addressed through written submissions, filed within 45 days.

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

CANADA
PROVINCE OF QUÉBEC
DISTRICT OF MONTRÉAL

No. 500-17-017403-034

DATE: May 15, 2013

PRESENT: THE HONOURABLE JEAN GUIBAULT J.S.C.

ROYAL BANK OF CANADA
Plaintiff
v.
CAPITAL FACTORS, INC. and
REGIONS BANK
(formerly known as UNION PLANTERS BANK OF FLORIDA)
Defendants

[1] The Plaintiff, Royal Bank of Canada (hereinafter, "RBC" or "the Bank"), which was the victim of a fraud in a certain form of kiting in April 1998, is claiming from the Defendants Regions Bank (hereinafter, "Union Bank") and Capital Factors, Inc. the sum of $12 007 800 (US$9 000 000 converted into Canadian dollars as at April 8, 1998), representing the net loss it incurred as a result of various interbank transactions between the Plaintiff and the Defendants and involving their respective clients, the company Tiagi – Tabah International Apparel Group Inc. (hereinafter, "Tiagi") in the case of RBC and its US subsidiary Global Orbit Industries Inc. (hereinafter, "Global" or "Global Orbit") in the case the Defendants.

[2] RBC claims that these two Florida financial institutions should have put an end to the kiting and to their business dealings with Global in January or February 1998 when they began to have doubts about the way in which the line of credit with Capital Factors and the bank account with Union Bank were being operated, or at least that the two Defendants showed negligence by not notifying the Royal Bank of Canada of the considerable disparity between the volume of transactions charged to Global Orbit's account with Capital Factors and the amounts advanced by the latter in relation to the purchase of accounts receivable.

[3] The Defendants do not admit any liability for the loss incurred by RBC, which, according to them, was very negligent in the operation of Tiagi's bank account. They asserted that RBC has only itself to blame for the loss thus incurred and raised several points of law on the merits of the claim, particularly as regards the law applicable to the present case and the prescription of rights to pursue remedies.

- MAIN WITNESSES PRESENTED BY RBC

1. Michel Chapdelaine

[6] Mr. Chapdelaine, who worked for the Bank for over 30 years, was manager of the Business Banking Centre at Place Ville Marie at the time of the events that concern us. He was in charge of approximately 30 employees, and particularly Denise Doucet, who was responsible for the Tiagi account from which all of the fraudulent transactions were made.

2. Denise Doucet

[7] At the time of the events, Ms. Doucet was the Account Manager directly responsible for the Tiagi account, which all of the employees from the Bank involved in this situation characterized as a non-borrowing account that operated, according to Ms. Doucet, in a completely regular manner until late March, early April 1998 when Union Bank returned a series of cheques marked “NSF” or “account closed”.

3. Carl Bruneault

[8] At the time of the events, Mr. Bruneault was a team leader in charge of five tellers at the Business Banking Centre located at 1, Place Ville Marie, from which the Tiagi account was operated.

4. Robert Mills and Ray Maddeault

[9] Robert Mills, who was Audit Manager for RBC at the time of the events, and Ray Maddeault were also involved for the Plaintiff following the discovery of the kiting scheme and the account overdraft in April 1998. At the request of RBC’s most senior executives, these two witnesses were asked to investigate all the events that gave rise to the loss incurred by RBC, in order to understand how the Bank could have incurred such a loss, introduce mechanisms to prevent the recurrence of such events, and recover the loss incurred, insofar as possible, from the institutions and individuals responsible.

[10] The Court will return in particular to the testimony of these witnesses when it analyzes the various points of law raised by, and the liability of, each party.

5. Expert witness – Martin Fafard

[11] RBC also presented, as an expert witness, forensic accountant Martin Fafard, who prepared a very interesting analysis of the flow of money between the different bank accounts in Canada and Florida, and who concluded that the banking transactions conducted by Tiagi and Global Orbit could be characterized as transactions out of the ordinary course of business.

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

- Defence, Capital Factors, Inc.

[12] As described by RBC in its Re-Amended Motion to Institute Proceedings: "Capital Factors, Inc. ("Capital Factors") is a corporation duly organized and existing pursuant to the laws of the State of Florida and is in the business of providing commercial factoring and related services".

[13] At the time with which we are concerned, Capital Factors established a business relationship with Global Orbit, a subsidiary of Tiagi, and in its capacity of lender it granted Global a stock-secured line of credit. It also agreed, through the factoring mechanism, to buy Global's accounts receivable. The total amount of credit granted to Global by Capital Factors stood at $14 000 000 as at April 1, 1998, based on the ratios agreed upon between the parties.

- WITNESSES FOR CAPITAL FACTORS

1. Javier Holtz

[14] In 1997-1998, Mr. Holtz was Manager of Union Bank and Chief Operating Officer and Vice-President of Capital Factors. If there is any liability on the part of Union Bank in this case, it is mainly because Mr. Holtz held a key position at both financial institutions and was aware of the way in which the line of credit with Capital Factors operated and, as contended by RBC, of the repercussions these transactions had on the account held by Global Orbit at Union Bank.

[15] According to RBC, Mr. Holtz knew or was in a position to know that irregular transactions were being made from the account and the line of credit with Capital Factors, in that Global Orbit's day-to-day operations and transactions were not completely out of step with the credit granted; this created a situation of "imbalance" that justified either the immediate closure of Global Orbit's account at Union Bank and an end to the financing granted by Capital Factors or, at least, an obligation for the two Defendants to notify RBC of the risk such transactions could pose for it.

2. Michael Levine

[16] The second witness presented by Capital Factors was Michael Levine, an attorney, member of the Florida Bar and General Counsel for Capital Factors. During his testimony, Mr. Levine stressed the fact that Capital Factors and Union Bank operated independently of one another. He himself had no connection with Union Bank at the time and, even though he was involved in Capital Factors' day-to-day operations, was never notified and never even suspected that Global Orbit's account was being operated improperly and that there was a risk of kiting on the part of Global Orbit or its parent company Tiagi.

[17] Mr. Levine clearly stated to the Court that at no time did either officer of Capital Factors mention improper or illegal transactions by Global Orbit within the framework of the financing granted to it by Capital Factors.

3. Ellen Ferri

[18] The third most important witness heard by the Court and presented by Capital Factors was Ellen Ferri, Account Executive and Portfolio Manager for Capital Factors in 1997-1998. Ms. Ferri's testimony is very important in this case to the extent that she was responsible for day-to-day operations and relations between Capital Factors and Global Orbit throughout the period concerned.

[19] Ms. Ferri testified with aplomb, and the Court was very impressed with her testimony and her high level of expertise in factoring. Even though she was notified about the imbalance in the operation of Global Orbit's account, she said that she never suspected kiting activities by Tiagi with risk of prejudice and loss to RBC.

4. Scott MacMillan

[20] Mr. MacMillan is also a very important witness as far as the two Defendants in this dispute are concerned. He was Ms. Ferri's immediate supervisor and was examined at length out of Court prior to the hearing of this case. His testimony as a whole was filed in the Court record.

[21] Unfortunately, his health prevented him from being present and testifying during the hearing before the undersigned. Even though this witness could not be heard, it was the answers that RBC obtained from Mr. MacMillan concerning his alleged knowledge of the improper operation of Global Orbit's account with Capital Factors and the imbalance therein that formed, according to RBC, the basis of its action.

5. Expert witness – Barkley Clark

[22] Barkley Clark, an attorney and Harvard professor, was also heard as an expert witness for Capital Factors. He was called to testify on the law applicable in Florida to banks and their affiliated financial institutions, and particularly on the obligation of confidentiality imposed on them by Florida law.

- Defence, Union Bank

[23] In its Re-Amended Motion to Institute Proceedings, the Plaintiff described Union Bank as follows:

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

> At all relevant times, Capital Factors was a wholly owned subsidiary of Capital Factors Holding, Inc. ("Capital Factors Holding") a majority owned subsidiary of Union Planters Bank of Florida F/K/A Capital Bank ("Union Bank"). Regions Bank is the successor to Capital Bank and Union Bank. In late 1998, Capital Factors Holding became a wholly owned subsidiary of Union Bank's successor-in-interest Union Planters Bank, National Association, as appears from Roy Tanis' undertakings no. 1 and 2 identified as Exhibit R-50;[2]

- WITNESSES FOR UNION BANK

1. Patricia Carol

[24] Patricia Carol was the first witness heard for Union Bank for whom she has worked since 1972. Ms. Carol has over 35 years of experience in banking and has held various positions over the years. She explained to the Court the day-to-day operation of the bank, and particularly of the account opened in the name of Global Orbit. She confirmed to the Court that there was no authority within the branch where Global Orbit's account was operated to accept overdrafts, and she made sure on a daily basis that, in accordance with the applicable regulations, there were sufficient funds in the account to cover the cheques issued by the debtor Global Orbit. She did not notice anything unusual or suspicious about the operation of the account prior to its closure in March 1998.

2. Beverly Meyers

[25] Beverly Meyers was the second witness heard on behalf of Union Bank. She was Acting Assistant Manager for Union Bank in 1997-1998. She corroborated everything that Ms. Carol said and confirmed to the Court that there was nothing unusual or suspicious about the operation of Global Orbit's account in 1997-1998.

- Third parties not party to this dispute

[26] In addition to the parties described above and the witnesses heard during the hearing for each party, it should be noted that an important role was played by other individuals and corporations who, even though they were directly involved, were neither parties nor third parties. They are:

Fayez Tabah

Georges Tabah

Mark Tabah

Stephen Tabah

George Tabah, Jr.

2 Re-Amended Motion to Institute Proceedings, dated October 25, 2012, para. 4.

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

Carla Tabah

Gary Tabah

Monah Tabah and

who are referred to collectively in any combination of one or more as "the Tabah Family", which had established a personal business relationship with RBC.

[27] At the heart of this dispute is Tiagi - Tabah International Apparel Group Inc., with all its subsidiaries and related companies, more fully described in paragraph 8 of the Re-Amended Motion to Institute Proceedings, which reads as follows:

> The Tabah Companies were in the business of apparels and were headquartered and administered out of the Executive Offices located at 9420 L'Acadie Boulevard, Montréal (Québec) but had activities in Canada and the United States. However, all strategic decision-making and financial, administrative and accounting operations conducted by and for the Tabah Companies were centered in Montréal;

[28] It was in the name of Tiagi and without any further verification other than the knowledge it had of the personal banking transactions conducted by members of the Tabah family that RBC opened what it calls a non-borrowing account in the name of Tiagi – Tabah International, and this is the bank account from which all the transactions that gave rise to the kiting fraud were made.

[29] The second important corporate entity is Global Orbit Industries Inc., a subsidiary of Tiagi that operates in the United States and deals with, as mentioned earlier, Union Bank, one of the Defendants, for banking purposes and with Capital Factors for the purposes of the credit granted to it for its operations.

[30] Rami Chehata, President and Chief Operating Officer for Global Orbit, was also involved on a day-to-day basis in all of the transactions that concern us. Neither Mr. Chehata nor any members of the Tiagi Family were called as witnesses during the hearing, since their version of the facts was limited to the filing of the out-of-court examinations held prior to the hearing in different litigations involving one or other of the parties in this case.

[31] Lastly, there was Heller Financial Inc., a corporation in the business of providing commercial factoring and related services. Following talks with various financial institutions in previous months, Global Orbit entered into a series of agreements in winter 1998 whereby Heller would provide factoring services to Global in replacement of Capital Factors. In early April 1998, Heller thus replaced Capital Factors, for all intents and purposes, as regards all of the financing required by Global for its operations in the United States.

[32] At the hearing and in the expertise report prepared by Martin Fafard, a forensic accountant with Raymond Chabot Grant Thornton & Cie, it was mentioned that large sums seem to have passed through the Bank of Montreal. However, the evidence is silent with respect to the exact role that the bank may have played in the fraud designed by Tiagi to the detriment of RBC.

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

❖ THE KITING SCHEME

[33] The fraud involving the Tabah Family, Tiagi and Global Orbit is clearly described in the Re-Amended Motion to Institute Proceedings. For the purposes of this judgment, the Court reproduces paragraphs 12 et seq., which describe the fraud:

> 12. Starting in or about November 1997, and continuing through March or early April, 1998, there were illegal and unauthorized activities in Tiagi's RBC Account that ultimately resulted in a substantial overdraft when items that had been presented for deposit into Tiagi's RBC Account were returned. The returned items were cheques drawn by Global on an account at Union Bank ("Global's Union Bank Account") and made payable to Tiagi;
>
> 13. The activity started with two deposits, each of $200,000.00 U.S., one into Tiagi's RBC Account with a cheque from Global's Union Bank Account, and another into Global's Union Bank Account with a cheque drawn on Tiagi's RBC Account;
>
> 14. As time progressed, the amount of the deposits (and the associated withdrawals) became larger and more frequent. From time to time, Tiagi authorized the wire transfer of funds out of Tiagi's RBC Account into Global's Union Bank Account and to a bank account held by Capital Factors at First Union National Bank of Florida ("First Union Bank");
>
> 15. The amount of the items processed through Tiagi's RBC Account totaled $1.1 million U.S. in November 1997, $12 million U.S. in December 1997, $24 million U.S. in January 1998, and $101 million U.S. for the period February 25 to March 25, 1998. Substantially all of the deposits into Tiagi's RBC Account were in the form of cheques drawn on Global's Union Bank Account;
>
> 16. In or about late March 1998, Tiagi authorized certain wire transfers of funds from Tiagi's RBC account. More precisely, Tiagi authorized the following wire transfers from Tiagi's RBC Account to Global's Union Bank Account: (a) on March 19, 1998, a transfer in the amount of $3,907,344.00 U.S.; (b) on March 25, 1998, a transfer in the amount of $5,200,000.00 U.S.; and (c) on March 30, 1998, a transfer in the amount of $400,000.00. U.S. Also, Tiagi authorized the following wire transfers from Tiagi's RBC Account to an account held in the name of Capital Factors at First Union Bank: (a) on March 19, 1998, a transfer in the amount of $8,018,000.00 U.S.; (b) on March 20, 1998, a transfer in the amount of $5,451,000.00 U.S.; (c) on March 23, 1998, a transfer in the amount of $4,531,500.00 U.S.; (d) on March 30, 1998, a transfer in the amount of $5,000,000.00 U.S.; and (e) on March 31, 1998, a transfer in the amount of $10,027,000.00 U.S. Upon receiving Tiagi's authorizations, Royal Bank transferred the funds, a copy of the transfers authorizations being identified en liasse as Exhibit R-6;

17. In or about late March 1998 and early April 1998, Tiagi had deposited into Tiagi's RBC Account a number of cheques from Global that were drawn on Global's Union Bank Account and each of those cheques were returned unpaid because they were written either on an account with insufficient funds or on an account that was closed (collectively, the "Dishonored Cheques");

18. Union Bank returned unpaid the following Dishonored Cheques made payable to Tiagi: (a) (...) 30 cheques dated March 26, 1998 or March 27, 1998, in the total amount of $9,875,742 U.S.; (...) (b) 26 cheques dated March 30, 1998, in the total amount of $10,256,641.00 U.S.; (c) 16 cheques dated March 31, 1998, in the total amount of $5,265,012.00 U.S.; and (d) 16 cheques dated April 1, 1998, in the total amount of $5,022,600.00 U.S., a copy of the Dishonored Cheques being identified en liasse as Exhibit R-7;

19. On or about April 1, 1998, Global's Union Bank Account was closed;

20. As a result of the Dishonored Cheques, Tiagi's RBC Account became overdrawn, resulting in a negative balance in the account in the principal amount of $19,570,047 U.S. as of April 16, 1998 plus interest and related costs (collectively, the "Indebtedness");

❖ REPAYMENT OF THE OVERDRAFT, BANKRUPTCY OF GLOBAL ORBIT AND RECOVERY PROCEEDINGS BY THE TRUSTEE IN THE SAID BANKRUPTCY

[34] As mentioned earlier, on April 16, 1998 RBC found itself with an account overdraft and a potential loss of US$19 570 047 following the closure of the account held by Global Orbit at Union Bank, which refused to honour the cheques issued by Global on the ground of insufficient funds or an account closure. After numerous meetings between the officers of the Bank and representatives of Tiagi and Global Orbit, the total amount of the overdraft of principal and interest was repaid to RBC between April 1998 and October of that year.

[35] Following the repayment, the events more fully described in the Re-Amended Motion to Institute Proceedings occurred. The Court reproduces the relevant paragraphs:

26. On December 30, 1998, Global filed a Notice of Intention to Make a Proposal under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R. S. C. 1985, c. B-3 ("B.I.A.");

27. On February 3, 1999, as Global had failed to file the proposal, the Official Receiver issued a Certificate of Assignment rendering Global bankrupt pursuant to paragraph 50.4(8)b) of the B.I.A. and appointed Richter & Partners, Inc. ("Canadian Trustee") as trustee to the estate of Global;

28. On December 11, 1998, Global filed a Voluntary Petition for Relief under Chapter 11 of the United States Bankruptcy Code, in the Bankruptcy Court for the Central District of California ("the United States Court"), case n° LA 98-60055 ("the United States Case");

29. On April 15, 1999, an Order of the United States Court converted the United States Case into a Chapter 7, liquidation case and Alfred H. Siegel ("U.S. Trustee") was appointed interim Chapter 7 trustee;

30. On December 5, 2000, the U.S. Trustee, on behalf of Heller (who replaced Capital Factors in providing factoring services to Global), filed an Adversary Proceeding against Royal Bank alleging fraudulent and preferential transfers in connection with the agreement to repay the Indebtedness referred to above, as appears from a copy of the Complaint to Avoid Fraudulent Transfers pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 548 and, in the alternative, Preferences under 11 U.S.C. § § 548 and 547, identified as Exhibit R-8;

31. On July 17, 2001, Heller had the Trustee file a Second Amended Complaint which contained additional claims against Royal Bank for aiding and abetting, participating and conspiring in a fraud committed by Global's officers and directors and equitable subordination, as appears from a copy of the Second Amendment Complaint to Avoid Fraudulent Transfers pursuant to 11 U.S.C. § 548 and, in the alternative, Preferences Under 11 U.S.C. § § 544 and 547; For Damages For Aiding And Abetting , Joint Participation and Conspiring in Breach of Fiduciary Duties of Directors and Officers of Debtors to Debtors; and for Equitable Subordination of Any Claim Filed Pursuant to Bankruptcy Rule 3002(c) (3) Upon Avoidance of Transfers identified as Exhibit R-9;

32. On November 21, 2001, Royal Bank timely answered the Second Amended Complaint and denied all claims. At all relevant times, Royal Bank contested U.S. Trustee and Heller's claims vigorously, as appears from a copy of the Answer to Second Amended Complaint identified as Exhibit R-10;

33. On November 30, 2001, Royal Bank filed a Third Party Complaint against members of the Tabah family, Heller and Capital Factors, as appears from a copy of the Third Party Complaint (A) Against Members of the Tabah Family for: (1) Fraud; (2) Conversion; (3) Liability for Dishonored Checks; and (4) Indemnification; and (B) against Heller and Capital Factors for (5) Equitable subordination; and (6) Indemnification, identified as Exhibit R-11;

34. On April 5, 2002, the Third Party Complaint against Capital Factors was dismissed on procedural grounds, the United States Court having clearly stated that the ruling was without prejudice to any claims that Royal Bank may have against Capital Factors that could be pursued in any other forum, as appears from a copy of the Order on Third Party Defendant Capital Factors, Inc.'s Motion to dismiss Third Party Claim pursuant to Federal Rules of Civil Procedure Rules 12 (B) (1) and 12(B)(6) and a copy of the transcript of the hearing on Capital Factors' Motion to Dismiss Royal Bank's Third Party Complaint identified en liasse as Exhibit R-12;

35. On October 29, 2002, an agreement was reached between Royal Bank and the Trustee according to which Royal Bank paid to the Trustee the sum of nine million dollars, U.S. Funds, ($9,000,000.00 U.S.), as appears from the Settlement Agreement and Release entered into as of October 29, 2002 between Royal Bank, U.S. Trustee, Canadian Trustee and General Electric Capital Corporation identified as Exhibit R-13;

36. The sum of U.S. Nine Million Dollars ($9,000,000.00) was paid by the Business Services Group of Royal Bank's Branch located at 1 Place Ville Marie, in Montreal;

37. A Motion of the U.S. Trustee and Heller for Order Approving Settlement Agreement and Release with Royal Bank was filed at the United States Court. Capital Factors was served with a copy of that Motion and did not object to it, as appears from a copy of the Certificate of Service dated October 29, 2002 identified as Exhibit R-14;

38. On November 22, 2002, the United States Court granted the Motion of the U.S. Trustee and Heller for Order Approving Settlement Agreement and Release with Royal Bank, approved the Settlement Agreement and confirmed that it is, in all respects, fair, reasonable and adequate to all interested parties, as appears from a copy of the Order Granting Motion of Trustee and Heller Financial, Inc. for Order Approving Settlement Agreement and Release with Royal Bank of Canada identified as Exhibit R-15;

39. Royal Bank's decision to settle out of Court was well founded, as appears from the expert's report of Professor Kenneth N. Klee dated August 13, 2003 identified as Exhibit R-16;

40. As a result of all of the above, Royal Bank has sustained a loss of $ 9,000,000.00 U.S., which was caused by the kiting scheme to which Capital Factors and Union Bank knowingly participated;

[36] All the facts described above were adequately established to the satisfaction of the Court, and the obligation to repay Global Orbit's trustee in bankruptcy the sum of $9 000 000 that is now claimed and that is the subject of an expert evaluation on both sides, was not really contested during the proof and hearing of this case.

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

❖ THE FAULT ALLEGED AGAINST THE DEFENDANTS

[37] RBC alleged that Capital Factors was aware of the kiting scheme put in place by Tiagi and Global Orbit or that, at least, it should have continued its investigation and either closed Global Orbit's account or informed RBC that it had observed certain irregularities in the operation of the account in late January, early February 1998. This fault is alleged in particular in paragraphs 49 and 50 of the Re-Amended Motion to Institute Proceedings reproduced below:

> 49. Furthermore, in early 1998, Capital Factors noted a significant imbalance in the amount of the advances and the amount of the factored sales, as appears from a letter from Capital Factors to Global dated March 3, 1998 identified as Exhibit R-20;
> 50. It was the first time that MacMillan ever noticed this type of disparity in his experience in the commercial finance field. He was concerned that there might be something improper going on;

[38] The Bank's claim is based in particular on the testimony of Mr. Holtz, Mr. MacMillan and Ms. Ferri, who could not have been unaware of the imbalance described above, its impact and the risk faced by RBC.

[39] In addition to the testimony of these three witnesses, there is a very important document (Exhibit R-20), which the Court reproduces in full and which clearly states what Capital Factors may have known about the financial transactions conducted by Tiagi and Global Orbit, as at March 3, 1998:

Dear Rami:

As you are aware, Scott MacMillan's letter of January 9, 1998, provided Global Orbit Industries, Inc. ("Global') with sixty (60) days from that date to obtain an alternative source of financing that could provide Capital Factors, Inc. ("Capital") with an acceptable takeout commitment. According to your counsel, Bruce March, Esquire, it now appears that it may take Global up to an additional thirty (30) days to finalize an arrangement with a lender who can provide the required takeout commitment.

We have received copies of three financing proposals (from Congress, Heller Financial and First Union). Only the First Union proposal was signed, and each was contingent upon the lender's due diligence. You indicated in a telephone conversation that Global was also negotiating with BNY - Canada. Capital has received no indication that any of these lenders made a firm proposal subsequent to its due diligence, nor have you advised us if you have accepted any such proposal(s) if offered. We would appreciate knowing the status of each of the potential financing arrangements, and ask that you provide this information to us as quickly as possible.

As you know, we recently agreed to defer our audit in order to avoid "interfering" with the auditors of our prospective financing sources. However, there is certain audit information we need and I will be appreciative if you will arrange to have it provided to us promptly:

1. A list of all the bank accounts being used by Global Orbit and/or Tabah International ("Tabah").

2. Copies of the statements for all such accounts for the last four months.

3. Photo-copies of Global's and Tabah's general ledgers for the fast four months.

4. Photo-copies of Global's and Tabah's disbursements journals for the last four months.

5. A current accounts payable aging.

6. A copy of Global's and Tabah's financial statements for the quarter ended November 30, 1997.

In reviewing Global's activity with Capital Bank (now Union Planters Bank of Florida, hereafter “UPB”), we note the following (000's):

	Factored Sales	[1]Advances to Global's Account at UPB
Nov-97	$ 3,172	$ 5,211
Dec-97	3,736	20,604
Jan-98	6,123	26,155
Feb-98	1,400	44,600
Total	$ 14,431	$ 96,570

[1]Advances include wire transfers from the Royal Bank of Canada.

I am concerned by the fact that, during the period in question, advances into Global's UPB account (including wires from the Royal Bank of Canada) totaled almost $97 million, or nearly seven times Global's sales for the period. Please provide an explanation for this activity immediately.

As you are aware, we have advised George Tabah, Jr. that we would be in a position to make an advance to Global's account at UPB upon receipt of an actual wire from the Royal Bank of Canada. Scott MacMillan stated in his letter of January 9th that we could deposit funds upon timely receipt of a notice from your bank, which notice was to include a Fed Funds confirmation number. Although I made several deposits based on the bank's notices, I subsequently determined that what I believed to be a Fed Funds confirmation number was, in fact, merely a routing number. We have also determined that the wires we are receiving from the bank are arriving earlier in the day than were the bank's notices. It is unduly cumbersome to base deposits to your account on a notice from your bank when the funds needed to cover any such deposits have already been wired to our account. Also, given the magnitude of some of the recent overdrafts, we believe it only prudent to advance after the actual receipt of the wire transfer. I reiterate to you that, as indicated in Scott MacMillan's letter of January 9th, in offering to continue to provide advances and wire transferred funds to Global's UPB account, Capital continues to do so accepting no responsibility for any errors that may occur, and Global, by its acceptance of this accommodation, agrees to hold Capital harmless from any liability to which Capital might otherwise be subject absent the gross negligence or willful misconduct of its personnel.

I would appreciate a prompt response so that Capital can determine what is the most reasonable course of action to take when the sixty day termination period expires. I would also appreciate knowing if the Tabahs consummated the Counterparts ("Counterparts") transaction and, if so, if there is any commingling of funds between Global and Counterparts.

Yours truly,

Ellen E. Ferri

[40] Had Capital Factors been more diligent about continuing its investigation, according to RBC it would have concluded that Tiagi and Global Orbit were involved in kiting and closed the accounts with Union Bank and Capital Factors in February 1998 or at least notified RBC of the risks it faced, thereby preventing an account overdraft of the size of that covered by RBC in late March 1998.

[41] In short, over and above all the allegations of fault against the Defendants in the Amended Motion to Institute Proceedings, the Defendants' liability, according to the evidence presented, is based essentially on the knowledge that the aforementioned three main witnesses may have had about the imbalance, and on their lack of diligence when a more in-depth investigation would have made it possible to put an end to the imbalance without delay.

[42] Since RBC did not have a contractual relationship with the two Florida institutions, it based its claim in delict (tort in common law) on the principles of precaution and information and is of the opinion that the Defendants' liability must be assessed in accordance with Québec law. Given that RBC has its headquarters and principal place of business at Place Ville Marie, in Montréal, and that the foreseeable damage was caused by an account overdraft and the return of cheques that occurred in Québec, the conduct of the two Florida financial institutions should be assessed, according to the Bank, in light of the principles of liability applicable in Québec.

❖ THE DEFENCE

[43] In the defence to the proceedings instituted by RBC, the Defendants raised numerous points of fact and law that enabled them to assert that the Plaintiff's action had no factual or legal basis. More specifically, the Defendants raised the prescription of rights to pursue remedies, the absence of a legal basis for the action, which must be assessed in accordance with Florida law and makes no provision for any obligation or liability on the part of financial institutions in circumstances like those described above and the many faults committed by RBC, which has only itself to blame if it incurred a loss in the present case.

REASONS

❖ PRESCRIPTION

[44] As more than three years have elapsed between April 1998, date of the loss incurred by RBC, and October 1, 2003, date on which the notice of filing and RBC's action were served, the Defendants claimed that the Bank's action is prescribed under the law of Québec.

[45] In response to this argument, RBC contended that prescription was suspended or interrupted and that it was impossible to act between December 1998, when Global Orbit repaid in full the principal and interest, and the date on which it had to repay Global Orbit's trustee in bankruptcy the sum of $9 000 000 on the ground that the payment received was a preferential payment made to the detriment of Heller, such repayment having been completed on October 29, 2002 and approved by the Florida Court on November 22, 2002.

[46] According to RBC, it was therefore impossible to act and institute any proceedings whatsoever between December 1998, when it was repaid in full for the amount of its loss, and November 22, 2002, when the Court sitting in bankruptcy in the United States approved the transaction conducted with the trustee, thus obliging the Bank to repay the sum of US$9 000 000 as a preferential payment.

[47] According to the Bank, any proceedings instituted by RBC during that period would have been declared inadmissible on the ground that a repayment had been made and, therefore, no loss or damage had been incurred; it was only when it had to return the money thus received that it could claim it had valid recourse against the Defendants.

[48] In response to the Bank's arguments, the Defendants contend that there was no interruption or impossibility to act between 1998 and 2002, and that the repayment of the sum of US$9 000 000 to Global Orbit's trustee in bankruptcy constituted a novus actus and thus created a new debt that was completely independent from the original debt and that could in no way be attributable to the Defendants, thus severing the legal relationship between RBC and the Defendants.

[49] The Court cannot subscribe to such arguments; RBC properly argued that any action instituted against the Defendants between 1998 and 2002 would have been declared inadmissible on the ground that the debt was repaid in full in December 1998 and, therefore, that no damage had been incurred. The Bank's debt was the result of the loss incurred by the return of cheques in late March, early April 1998, and the repayment of up to US$9 000 000 by Global Orbit must be interpreted as not having occurred, thus putting the parties in the same position they were in immediately prior to the payment.

[50] It is the very essence of such a payment to be interpreted as null and void as regards the trustee since the creditor is obliged to return the money received. The parties are thus placed in the same position they were in prior to the completion of such payment which, generally speaking and barring exceptions, enables the creditor to present, in the bankruptcy, a claim equal in amount to the payment repaid and to participate, if applicable, in any dividends that might be distributed to all of the creditors.

[51] In this case, RBC waived its rights in the bankruptcy of Global Orbit and there was no real debate before the undersigned about the merits of the trustee's request to repay, as a preferential payment, the amount improperly received by RBC, or about its renunciation to present proof of claim in Global's bankruptcy. Therefore, the Court finds that RBC's claim of US$9 000 000 was validly presented and stemmed from both the loss incurred in 1998 and its obligation to repay the said sum to Global's trustee in bankruptcy.

[52] Furthermore, the Defendants benefited considerably from the many steps taken by RBC to be reimbursed for its loss, which at the time of the account's closure and the return of the cheques stood at roughly US$19 570 047, and any proceedings served in April 1998 would have been premature and to the detriment of the parties to this dispute, to say the least.

[53] Therefore, the Court dismisses the plea of prescription raised by the Defendants and concludes that prescription was interrupted; it was impossible to act between December 1998 and November 2002. The prescriptive period of three years was thus respected since the proceedings began on October 1, 2003.

[54] Nor can the Defendants claim that there was a novation or novus actus in this case because it is the very essence of a preferential payment and the obligation to repay, to place the parties in the same position they were in prior to the repayment.

[55] While it is not perfect, a parallel may be drawn with the law of surety. Would a surety be completely relieved of its obligations in regard to a creditor who was obliged to repay a trustee a payment received as a preferential payment, the creditor having thus lost all of its recourses as regards the surety simply because the payment was made, even though the payment must be considered set up against the trustee with an obligation to repay the sum thus received?

[56] The Court does not think so and such repayment would revive the action against both the principal and the principal's surety and it would be too easy for principals to favour a surety through collusion by making a payment that would later prove to be clearly preferential.

[57] In Précis de la faillite et de l'insolvabilité, Mtre. Paul-Émile Bilodeau wrote the following:

> D- Effets de l'annulation

[58] In the case cited, Robert J. wrote the following:

> En terminant, dans l'arrêt Re Bernard Motors Ltd (précité), il fut suggéré que le créancier principal puisse réclamer aux cautions le montant du paiement jugé préférentiel à leur égard dans le cadre d'un recours en vertu de l'article 95 L.F.I. Cependant, dans les arrêts précités, Speedy Roofing Ltd (Re) et Bank of Montreal c. Kenny (1980) 33 C.B.R. (N.S.) 11 (Man, Co, Ct.) cette hypothèse fut écartée en raison de la compétence spécialisée de la Cour en matière de faillite. Selon ces arrêts la poursuite en remboursement contre la caution devrait être intentée par le créancier principal dans une instance civile. Voilà l'état de la jurisprudence.[4] thus indirectly confirming that the parties will be placed in same the position they were in prior to the preferential payment and that an action can be instituted against a surety.

❖ JURISDICTION OF THE COURT AND THE LAW APPLICABLE IN THIS CASE

[59] The Court's territorial jurisdiction was the subject of a motion for declinatory exception on the ground that the operating company Global Orbit, which was directly involved in the fraud, had its principal place of business in Florida along with the two Defendants, Union Bank and Capital Factors, and that it would be much more appropriate to proceed in Florida than in Montréal.

[60] By judgment dated June 29, 2004, Jeannine M. Rousseau J. dismissed the motion for declinatory exception on the ground that the prejudice occurred by the Bank was in Québec and that faults on the part of the Defendants were also committed in Québec. Referring to paragraphs 57 and 58 of the motion, which read as follows, she added that:

[61] The judge also determined that it was just as appropriate to proceed in Québec as it would have been in Florida; this judgment was upheld by the Court of Appeal of Québec in a decision dated October 29, 2004.

[62] Now that the Court's territorial jurisdiction has been established, what is the applicable law? RBC claimed that, according to article 3126 of the Civil Code of Québec, Québec law should be applied in this case and that the liability of the two Florida financial institutions should be assessed in the light of this law. On the other hand, the two Defendants contended that the loss suffered by RBC and the liability of the two defendant financial institutions must be determined in accordance with Florida law.

[63] It was admitted by the Plaintiff RBC that its action has some basis only to the extent that the Court concludes that Québec law should be applied to the events concerned, and that if the Court concludes that Florida law is applicable, no liability can be attributed to Capital Factors and Union Bank.

[64] Stated differently, the obligation for the two Defendants to conduct an investigation and notify RBC that the two businesses concerned, Tiagi and Global Orbit were conducting transactions between themselves that were comparable to kiting with a risk of loss for RBC has its basis only under Québec law, and that no such obligation exists under Florida law.

[65] Article 3126 of the Civil Code of Québec invoked by RBC reads as follows:

> 3126. The obligation to make reparation for injury caused to another is governed by the law of the country where the injurious act occurred. However, if the injury appeared in another country, the law of the latter country is applicable if the person who committed the injurious act should have foreseen that the damage would occur.
> In any case where the person who committed the injurious act and the victim have their domiciles or residences in the same country, the law of that country applies.

[66] According to the general rule stated in this article, the applicable law is the law of the state where the injurious act occurred. In this case, the corporation directly involved in the kiting fraud, Global Orbit, had its head office, principal place of business and operations in Florida. The bank that returned the cheques because of insufficient funds or closure of the account is also located in Florida. Lastly, the financial institution that granted the company concerned, Global Orbit, the financing required for its operations, Capital Factors, is also located in Florida. In short, the whole cause of action originated in Florida and, in accordance with the general principle, Florida law would apply.

[67] Can RBC avail itself of the first exception provided for in article 3126, which states that "if the injury appeared in another country, the law of the latter country is applicable"? Considering that the injury appeared in Québec and, as contended by RBC, said injury caused to it was foreseeable, Québec law should apply.

[68] There is no question that the injury appeared in Québec; moreover, the Court of Appeal recognized as much in its decision regarding declinatory exception[5]. However, in light of Global Orbit's operations in Florida, should it have foreseen that injury would be caused to RBC? What law will be applicable in determining whether either of the two Florida financial institutions, i.e. Union Bank and Capital Factors, had any obligation whatsoever toward the Plaintiff RBC?

[69] Numerous times during its proceedings, RBC alleges that not only were both Defendants aware of the kiting, but they also participated and were party to the kiting scheme. Such assertions have absolutely no foundation. Not only is there no evidence of the two Defendants' participation in the kiting scheme, but furthermore, in light of the testimony heard by the Court, the latter concludes that at no time did the Defendants suspect that Tiagi and Global Orbit were committing fraud. The only facts proven by RBC are the knowledge the executive officers at Union Bank and Capital Factors might have had about what the parties characterized as an imbalance created by the transfer of funds which, at first glance, was not connected to Global Orbit's day-to-day operations, and the lack of an investigation that would either have put an end to Global Orbit's financial activities more rapidly or informed RBC of the risks it faced.

[70] The burden of proving that the damage was foreseeable lies with RBC, and mere suspicion on the part of the representatives of Capital Factors and Union Bank with regard to Global Orbit's operations was, in the Court's opinion, not enough to conclude that there was a risk of injury to another financial institution, in this case the Plaintiff RBC.

[71] The Court would venture to point out that there was absolutely nothing improper about the operation of the Union Bank account, nor the operations related to the purchase of Global Orbit's accounts receivable through factoring or even in the operation of the stock-secured line of credit.

[72] Both Union Bank and Capital Factors oversaw all operations on a daily basis. The two Defendants had every right to assume that the Plaintiff was exercising the same control to ensure that the account was being operated in a risk-free manner and in accordance with the generally accepted rules that apply in such matters. This was far from the case here, as we will see below.

[73] In addition, not only was it up to RBC to prove that the injury caused in another country was foreseeable, but it also had to establish that the two Defendants committed a fault under the legislation and regulations applicable to them, in this case Florida law.

[74] In the texts on the reform of the Civil Code[6] compiled by the Barreau du Québec and the Chambre des notaires du Québec, section 372 of Volume 3, which deals with the interpretation of article 3126, reads:

> 372. Cependant, lorsque les règles des alinéas 2 et 3 s'appliquent, il faut aussi se référer à la loi du lieu de survenance du fait générateur du préjudice pour savoir si son auteur était fautif ou négligent, car les règles de sécurité et de comportement d'un individu ne peuvent être que celles en vigueur au lieu où il se trouve au moment où il agit.

[75] When the new Civil Code was adopted in January 1994, the Minister of Justice wrote the following comments regarding the new article 3126:

> Cet article, de droit nouveau, s'inspire de la Loi fédérale sur le droit international privé suisse de 1987.
>
> Aux termes d'un arrêt de la Cour suprême du Canada dans l'affaire O'Connor c. Wray, [1930] R.C.S. 231, une demande en responsabilité civile extracontractuelle n'est recevable au Québec que si la situation constitue une cause d'action suivant le droit québécois et ne peut être justifiée selon la loi du lieu où elle est survenue : il s'agit là d'une règle qui a son origine dans le droit anglais. Auparavant, la jurisprudence appliquait la loi du lieu où le fait générateur du préjudice était survenu, suivant l'interprétation donnée au troisième alinéa de l'article 6 C.C.B.C. et suivant le droit français.
>
> L'article 3126 renoue avec la tradition et fait régir la responsabilité civile extracontractuelle par la loi de l'État où le fait générateur du préjudice est survenu. Toutefois, étant donné la difficulté que pose ce rattachement dans l'hypothèse où le préjudice apparaît dans un autre État, l'article énonce qu'en ce cas s'applique la loi de l'État où le préjudice est apparu, à condition de prouver que l'auteur devait prévoir que le préjudice s'y manifesterait. Le principe de l'application de la loi de l'État où le fait générateur du préjudice est survenu se trouve ainsi renforcé.[7]

[76] In Tolofson v. Jensen [1994], the Supreme Court enunciated the following principles:

> On the international plane, the relevant underlying reality is the territorial limits of law under the international legal order. The underlying postulate of public international law is that generally each state has jurisdiction to make and apply law within its territorial limit. Absent a breach of some overriding norm, other states as a matter of "comity" will ordinarily respect such actions and are hesitant to interfere with what another state chooses to do within those limits. . . .

> The major issue that arises in this case is this: once a court has properly taken jurisdiction (and this was conceded in both the cases in these appeals), what law should it apply? Obviously the court must follow its own rules of procedure; it could not function otherwise; see Chaplin v. Boys, supra. What is procedural is usually clear enough though at times this can raise difficult issues. In the Tolofson case, for example, the parties have raised the much debated question of whether a statute of limitation is of a procedural or substantive character. I shall deal with that issue later. I will here turn to the more common "choice of law" problem, and the principal issue in these appeals, namely, what is the substantive law that should be applied in considering the present cases?
>
> From the general principle that a state has exclusive jurisdiction within its own territories and that other states must under principles of comity respect the exercise of its jurisdiction within its own territory, it seems axiomatic to me that, at least as a general rule, the law to be applied in torts is the law of the place where the activity occurred, i.e., the lex loci delicti. There are situations, of course, notably where an act occurs in one place but the consequences are directly felt elsewhere, when the issue of where the tort takes place itself raises thorny issues. In such a case, it may well be that the consequences would be held to constitute the wrong. Difficulties may also arise where the wrong directly arises out of some transnational or interprovincial activity. There territorial considerations may become muted; they may conflict and other considerations may play a determining role. But that is not this case. Though the parties may, before and after the wrong was suffered, have travelled from one province to another, the defining activity that constitutes the wrong took place wholly within the territorial limits of one province, in one case, Quebec, in the other Saskatchewan, and the resulting injury occurred there as well. That being so it seems to me, barring some recognized exception, to which possibility I will turn later, that as Willes J. pointed out in Phillips v. Eyre, supra, at p. 28, "civil liability arising out of a wrong derives its birth from the law of the place [where it occurred], and its character is determined by that law". In short, the wrong is governed by that law. It is in that law that we must seek its defining character; it is that law, too, that defines its legal consequences.
> I have thus far framed the arguments favouring the lex loci delicti in theoretical terms. But the approach responds to a number of sound practical considerations. The rule has the advantage of certainty, ease of application and predictability. Moreover, it would seem to meet normal expectations. Ordinarily people expect their activities to be governed by the law of the place where they happen to be and expect that concomitant legal benefits and responsibilities will be defined accordingly. The government of that place is the only one with power to deal with these activities.[8] . . .

8 Tolofson v. Jensen; Lucas (Litigation Guardian of) v. Gagnon, [1994] 3 S.C.R. at 1022, 1047 and 1049-1051 [Emphasis added.].

[77] This Supreme Court case was echoed in the Hocking v. Haziza and HSBC Bank Canada judgment, particularly in paragraphs 148 et seq., in which the Court of Appeal states:

> [148] L'arrêt Unifund est particulièrement intéressant, exposant les deux volets du test du lien réel et substantiel : il ne suffit pas, en effet, d'appliquer ce test à la détermination de la compétence du for (i.e. le for saisi a-t-il la compétence nécessaire pour statuer sur le litige?), mais il faut également l'appliquer au fond de l'affaire, de manière à ce qu'en statuant sur le litige, on ne se trouve pas à donner une portée extraterritoriale au droit du for. D'ailleurs, on notera que cette approche est celle aussi que retient la Cour suprême dans l'arrêt Morguard, précité. À l'instar des auteurs McKee et Galway, on notera en effet que :
>
> > As such, it is significant that in Morguard, in finding a real and substantial connection between the action and Alberta, the Supreme Court of Canada noted that the property was in Alberta, the relevant contracts were entered into in Alberta at the time when both parties (including the defendant) resided in Alberta, foreclosure proceedings took place in Alberta where the property was located and the action for deficiency on the sale of the property needed to be consolidated with the foreclosure proceeding which took place in Alberta. [Renvoi omis] It is important to note that the Court did not find that the defendant's residence in Alberta alone at the time of the events giving rise to the action established sufficient contact with the province for it to assert jurisdiction. Nor did the Court find that either the plaintiff's residence at the time the suit was started, or the need to have the foreclosure and deficiency actions consolidated, alone constituted a sufficient connection.
>
>
> [150] Les propos de la Cour suprême dans ces affaires, qui relevaient toutes de recours individuels, sont assurément applicables aux recours collectifs. Ainsi, lorsque le juge LaForest, dans Tolofson, écrit qu'il va “de soi, par exemple, qu'il n'appartient pas à l'État A de définir les droits et obligations des citoyens de l'État B à l'égard d'actes accomplis dans leur propre pays" (paragr. 45), il aurait tout aussi bien pu écrire qu'il va de soi qu'il n'appartient pas à une province de définir les droits et obligations des citoyens d'une autre province, et ce, quel que soit le moyen employé pour arriver à cette fin. De même, lorsque le juge Binnie écrit, au paragr. 56 de l'arrêt Unifund, précité, que "[l]a limitation territoriale de la portée du pouvoir de légiférer des provinces empêche les lois d'une province de s'appliquer aux affaires qui ne présentent pas de lien suffisant avec cette dernière", il aurait pu tout aussi bien écrire “[l]a limitation territoriale de la portée du pouvoir de légiférer des provinces empêche les lois d'une province de s'appliquer aux affaires, y inclus les recours collectifs, qui ne présentent pas de lien suffisant avec cette dernière". En effet, ce qui est vrai du recours individuel ne saurait l'être moins du recours collectif : ce dernier n'est qu'un véhicule procédural et ne saurait permettre d'ignorer ou de contourner le principe constitutionnel de la territorialité des lois et des compétences judiciaires provinciales.

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

> [151] Or, c'est précisément ce qui paraît survenir en l'espèce : en autorisant un recours collectif sans même se poser la question de savoir s'il existe entre tous et chacun des membres du groupe visé (en l'espèce, les Canadiens ayant eu certains rapports contractuels avec HSBC) et le for saisi (celui de l'Ontario) un lien réel et substantiel sur le fond, le jugement ontarien qui est au cœur du litige fait apparemment en sorte de rendre applicable à tous les non-résidants de l'Ontario, et notamment aux Québécois, non seulement la procédure de reconnaissance applicable aux recours collectifs en Ontario, mais surtout le droit substantif de cette province : voilà en effet que par ce jugement ontarien dont on demande la reconnaissance au Québec, les droits des justiciables québécois ayant contracté au Québec, avec une succursale québécoise de HSBC, un contrat hypothécaire relatif à une propriété située au Québec se trouveraient déterminés par le droit ontarien, alors qu'aucun lien de quelque sorte ne les rattache à celui-ci. Ne peut-on croire qu'il y a là une atteinte directe au principe constitutionnel de territorialité.
>
> [158] Le contournement, ici, ne semble pas qu'accessoire et on pourrait vouloir arguer que le jugement ontarien attente directement à l'ordre usuel des choses juridiques, tel que décrit par le juge LaForest dans Tolofson : "[l]es gens s'attendent habituellement à ce que leurs activités soient régies par la loi du lieu où ils se trouvent et à ce que les avantages et les responsabilités juridiques s'y rattachant soient définis en conséquence", écrit-il. Or, dans notre affaire, les justiciables québécois, qui pouvaient légitimement s'attendre à ce que leurs relations avec HSBC soient régies par la loi du lieu où ils ont passé contrat et à ce que les responsabilités juridiques s'y rattachant soient en conséquence régies par le droit québécois, se trouvent assujettis au droit ontarien. En outre, la reconnaissance du jugement ontarien par l'autorité québécoise aurait l'effet de priver ces mêmes justiciables québécois de conserver et d'exercer le droit d'action que la loi de leur province leur confère, et ce, en raison de l'ordonnance d'un tribunal ontarien, appliquant le droit ontarien. De ce point de vue, et pour reprendre encore une fois certains des propos du juge LaForest dans Tolofson, la situation ne se différencie guère, à première vue du moins, de celle où l'État ontarien se serait directement mêlé de définir les droits et obligations des citoyens de l'État québécois à l'égard d'actes accomplis dans cette dernière province : dans les deux cas, il risque de s'ensuivre "des résultats inéquitables et injustes". Par ailleurs, comme il ne s'agit pas ici d'un cas où l'État ontarien cherche à réguler les "opérations intervenues entre ses propres citoyens ou résidents dans d'autres États ou provinces", il n'y aurait donc pas lieu de faire exception au principe de la compétence territoriale limitée.[9]

[78] Thus it is recognized that the principles enunciated by the Supreme Court apply in Québec and established that a law cannot have extra-territorial effect even in cases of delicts or quasi-delicts, regardless of whether it is a matter of an ordinary civil action or a class action.

[79] In the present case, the Plaintiff RBC contends that the two Defendants should have an obligation to conduct an investigation and inform a third party that is liable to suffer injury as recognized under Québec law and jurisprudence, whereas these requirements do not exist under Florida law.

[80] How can defendants be liable for injury caused outside the United States when, not only are they under no obligation to investigate and inform, but the law governing them imposes a duty of confidentiality and discretion that prohibits them from disclosing any information concerning their customers under threat of penalty?

[81] Even if by applying the reasonable person test, as suggested by RBC, to establish the foreseeability of damage, foreseeability would have to be established on the basis of a fault, as recognized by the lex loci delicti.

[82] The Court finds highly credible the expertise report submitted by the Defendants and prepared by an attorney with an excellent reputation, Barkley Clark. The annotated conclusions considered by the Court read as follows:

> 1. Opinion #1: UPB Handled the Deposit Relationship with Global Orbit in Full Compliance with Florida Law.
>
> It is my opinion that UPB handled the demand deposit account with its customer, Global Orbit, in a manner consistent with Florida law in all respects. UPB acted properly and in accordance with Florida law in the manner in which it opened the account in June 1997, in the manner it administered the deposit account throughout its life, and in the manner it closed the account (see Opinion #2).[10]
>
> 2. Opinion #2: Under Florida Law and the Contract of the Parties, UPB Properly Terminated the At-Will Deposit Relationship with Global Orbit in Marc/April 1998.[11]
>
> 3. Opinion #3: Florida Law Precluded UPB and CFI from Reporting any Suspicion of Kiting to Royal Bank (even assuming it existed and was suspected).
>
> . . .
>
> (a) No True Kiting Scheme Existed. It is my opinion that there was no check "kite" as that term is normally understood in the banking industry and American law. Kiting is a form of check fraud. A true kite requires the fraudulent drawing and depositing of checks in reciprocal deposit accounts (normally at two different banks) such that both banks assume the credit risk of paying checks drawn on uncollected funds. In a check kite, both banks give immediate credit for deposited checks, even though the deposited checks are not drawn on sufficient cleared funds and in fact are worthless. Based on the clearing time between the two banks (the "float"), artificial ledger balances are created at both banks. In other words, a kite is supported by the appearance of good funds in both accounts based on both banks' providing immediate credit for the deposited checks, yet there are no good funds represented by the checks themselves. Typically, the fictional balances at each bank involved in the kiting scheme continue to grow while the fraudster diverts funds from the accounts. At some point, the kite crashes when one of the banks decides to dishonor and return checks drawn on it to the other bank. The first bank to dishonor and return checks drawn on it before its midnight deadline will avoid any loss and the other bank, which has provided immediate credit on items deposited with it, will sustain the loss due to its credit decision to provide immediate credit to its customer's account on deposited items. The loss is reflected by the true overdraft that is created in the account of the depositary bank when the other bank (the payor bank) dishonors and returns checks drawn on it. The leading United States Supreme Court decision describing check kiting as the reciprocal assumption of credit risk is Williams v. United States, 458 U.S. 279 (1982), discussed in detail in The Law of Bank Deposits, Collections and Credit Cards, ¶ 9.01.

10 Expertise Report of Barkley Clark, dated December 8, 2009 at 5.
11 Ibid. at 12.

There was no check kite in this case because during the fraud period UPB did not receive deposits of checks into the Global Account and did not give immediate credit to such deposits, which is the premise of a check kiting scheme. Instead, UPB insisted and acted on the deposit of fully collected, cleared funds in the form of wire transfers from Royal Bank and ACH credits from CFI to cover all checks that had been presented for payment the day before to UPB. Thus, the vital ingredient of a check kite—assumption by both banks of the credit risk arising from allowing payment of presented checks against an uncollected funds balance—is missing from this case. The only bank to have made and assumed an unsecured credit risk here was Royal Bank, which provided immediate credit on checks drawn on the Global Orbit account which were deposited with Royal Bank into the account of Tiagi-Tabah and acted on that credit decision by wire transferring its own funds either directly to UPB for credit to Global Orbit's deposit account or to CFI for credit to Global Orbit's factoring line. When only one of the two banks whose accounts are controlled by the fraudsters assumes the credit risk of uncollected funds, it is doomed to end up with an overdraft when the fraud ends. This is precisely what happened here, and the loss sustained by Royal Bank was inevitable.

In contrast to a traditional check kiting scheme, the checks that were presented to UPB for payment were always covered by incoming wires or ACH credit entries, not by "worthless checks" deposited to the Global Orbit account at UPB. Unlike UPB, which always acted on good funds in processing checks and other withdrawals from Global Orbit's account, Royal Bank relied on "worthless checks" deposited by Tiagi-Tabah in its account with Royal Bank. By authorizing outgoing wire transfers, either directly to UPB or to CFI for credit to Global Orbit's respective accounts, Royal Bank assumed the full credit risk associated with its customer's fraudulent scheme, although that scheme was not a true "kite".

(b) Florida Law Prohibited UPB and CFI from Disclosing Information concerning the relationship with Global Orbit to Royal Bank.

For 40 years, the law in Florida has provided deposit customers of a bank with a right of confidentiality regarding the financial information in a deposit account. The leading case in Florida, and perhaps in the United States, is Milohnich v. First Nat'l Bank of Miami Springs, 224 So.2d 759 (Fla. 3d DCA 1969), where the court upheld a suit brought by a corporate customer for breach of an implied contractual duty not to disclose deposit account information to third parties. The court held that a bank has an implied duty not to disclose information concerning a customer's deposit account to a third party. In the course of its opinion, the Florida court broadly discussed the importance of a depositor's right of financial privacy: "Inviolable secrecy is one of the inherent and fundamental precepts of the relationship of the bank and its customers or depositors....It is implicit in the contract of the bank with its customer or depositor that no information may be disclosed by the bank or its employees concerning the customer's or depositor's account and that, unless authorized by law or by the customer or depositor, the bank must be held liable for breach of the implied contract." 224 So.2d at 760, quoting Peterson v. Idaho First Nat'l Bank, 367 P.2d 284, 290 (Idaho 1961). Based on the broad privacy principles enunciated in Milohnich, UPB was prohibited under Florida law from making any disclosures concerning Global's account activity, including any suspicions that Global Orbit was committing fraud in connection with the account. In my opinion, UPB's reporting of any suspected kite on the part of Global Orbit to Royal Bank would have been a clear violation of Florida law.

In an effort to codify and strengthen the broad privacy principle established in Milohnich, the Florida legislature in 1989 enacted a new bank privacy statute, one of the strongest in the country, codified at § 655.059, Fla. Stat. (1989). Section (2) (b) of that statute, captioned "confidentiality", provides as follows:

> (b) The books and records pertaining to the deposit accounts and loans of depositors, borrowers, members, and stockholders of any financial institution shall be kept confidential by the financial institution and its directors, officers, and employees and shall not be released except upon express authorization of the account holder as to her or his own accounts, loans, or voting rights. However, information relating to any loan made by a financial institution may be released without the borrower's authorization in a manner prescribed by the board of directors for the purpose of meeting the needs of commerce and for fair and accurate credit information. Information may also be released, without the authorization of a member or depositor but in a manner prescribed by the board of directors, to verify or corroborate the existence or amount of a customer's account when such information is reasonably provided to meet the needs of commerce and to ensure accurate credit information. In addition, a financial institution, affiliate, and its subsidiaries, and any holding company of the financial institution or subsidiary of such holding company, may furnish to one another information relating to their customers or members, subject to the requirement that each corporation receiving information that is confidential maintain the confidentiality of such information and not provide or disclose such information to any unaffiliated person or entity. Notwithstanding this paragraph, nothing in this subsection shall prohibit a financial institution from disclosing financial > information as referenced in this subsection as permitted by Pub. L. No. 106-102 (1999), as set forth in 15 U.S.C.A. s. 6802, as amended.

Section (2)(c) of the statute makes any willful violation a felony.

A bank is prohibited from divulging to another bank (other than an affiliate) any information about its customer's deposit account unless the customer gives "express authorization", or unless the information is intended to "verify or corroborate the existence or amount" of the customer's deposit account when such information is reasonably provided "to meet the needs of commerce and to ensure accurate credit information." None of these narrow exceptions would allow the report of a suspected kite to another bank. In short, a customer's right of privacy regarding the activity in its deposit account is protected by both the common law and statute in Florida.

Recently, a Florida court applied § 655.059 to prohibit the disclosure of financial information concerning a customer to a third party in a lawsuit. See Banc of America Investment Services, Inc. v. Barnett, 997 So.2d 1154 (Fla. 3d DCA 2008). The appellate court reversed the trial court's order, which had compelled Banc of America Investment Securities, Inc. to disclose financial information concerning its customer, chastising the lower court: "The court below departed from the essential requirements of law when it ordered production of documents concerning transactions in Mr. Day's account that are privileged pursuant to section 655.059(2)(b), resulting in a harmful invasion of privacy rights which cannot be remedied on appeal." 997 So.2d at 1157.

The teaching of the Banc of America decision is that the Florida privacy statute means what it says. The court also applied the statute to cover a non-bank affiliate like Banc of America Investment Services, even though that entity is not technically a "financial institution" as that term is defined in the Florida statute. The bottom line is that Florida law prohibited UPB and CFI from reporting any information in Global Orbit's account relationship, including any suspicion of a kite, to Royal Bank even if they had such a suspicion. For a more detailed discussion of a bank's duty of confidentiality regarding the deposit accounts of its customer, see The Law of Bank Deposits, Collections and Credit Cards, ¶ 3.12.[12]

4. Opinion #4: Neither UPB Nor CFI Had Any Duty to Inform Royal Bank of an Alleged Check Kiting Scheme.

The decisional law, which is discussed in detail in The Law of Bank Deposits, Collections and Credit Cards ¶ 9.03, overwhelmingly holds that there is no duty by one bank to report to the other bank a suspected kite or to take any other action on a kite. Instead, the loss remains on the bank that has the overdraft after 12 Ibid. at 14-18 [References omitted.].

> the kite ends on the basis of the UCC check collection rules. See, e.g., Mid-Cal Nat'l Bank v. Federal Reserve Bank, 590 F.2d 761, 764 (9th Cir. 1979) (defendant bank had no duty to discover and report a kiting operation to plaintiff bank; no special relationship exists and banks are at arm's length in a kiting scheme, each responsible for its own decisions to provide credit for deposited items); Frost Nat'l Bank v. Midwest Autohaus, Inc., 241 F.3d 862 (7th Cir. 2001) (as a matter of law, there is no "duty of good faith" by which a bank must disclose its suspicions of a check kite to the other bank; each bank has its own means of detecting kiting schemes and of protecting itself from the uncollected funds credit risk); Citizens Nat'l Bank v. First Nat'l Bank, 347 So.2d 964 (Miss. 1977) (trial court correctly dismissed bank's complaint charging that defendant bank was liable for failing to disclose an ongoing kiting scheme and by permitting it to continue which caused a loss to plaintiff bank; banks owe no duty, fiduciary or otherwise, to each other in a kiting scheme); Alta Vista State Bank v. Kobliska, 897 F. 2d 930, 934 (8th Cir. 1990) (applying Minnesota law) (defendant bank, which discovered the kite, owed no duty to plaintiff bank to report its suspicions about the potential kiting; "We decline to find that one bank has a duty to notify a competing bank as soon as it suspects a mutual customer is kiting checks, especially where, as here, the other bank is in just as good a position to discover the kite.")[13] . . .

Title XXXVIII Chapter 655

BANKS AND BANKING Financial Institutions Generally

655.059 Access to books and records; confidentiality; penalty for disclosure.—

(b) The books and records pertaining to the deposit accounts and loans of depositors, borrowers, members, and stockholders of any financial institution shall be kept confidential by the financial institution and its directors, officers, and employees and shall not be released except upon express authorization of the account holder as to her or his own accounts, loans, or voting rights. However, information relating to any loan made by a financial institution may be released without the borrower's authorization in a manner prescribed by the board of directors for the purpose of meeting the needs of commerce and for fair and accurate credit information. Information may also be released, without the authorization of a member or depositor but in a manner prescribed by the board of directors, to verify or corroborate the existence or amount of a customer's or member's account when such information is reasonably provided to meet the needs of commerce and to ensure accurate credit information. In addition, a financial institution and its subsidiaries, and any holding company of the financial institution or subsidiary of such holding company, may furnish to one another information relating to their customers or members, subject to the requirement that each corporation receiving information that is confidential maintain the confidentiality of such information and not provide or disclose such information to any unaffiliated person or entity.

> (c) A person who willfully violates the provisions of this section that relate to unlawful disclosure of confidential information is guilty of a felony of the third degree, punishable as provided in s. 775.082, s. 775.083, or s. 775.084.[14]

[84] Not only was RBC unable to establish that the Defendants had an obligation to conduct an investigation and inform RBC of the risk of loss under Florida law, but it has also been established that the Bank was not allowed to disclose any information whatsoever under threat of penalty.

[85] Under cross-examination, Mr. Clark admitted that the prohibition on disclosing certain information did not apply to information generated exclusively by Capital Factors separately from Union Bank, and RBC concluded from that admission that it was up to Capital Factors to complete its investigation and inform RBC of the risk it faced.

[86] According to Mr. Clark, this was not the case in this matter, where all of the information arose from the relationship between Union Bank and Capital Factors and, consequently, both Defendants were bound by the obligation of confidentiality provided by Florida law.

[87] Moreover, RBC itself, by bringing action jointly and severally against the two US financial institutions, acknowledges that the one cannot be dissociated from the other.

[88] The Court is of the opinion that Mr. Clark's credibility cannot be questioned and his conclusion to the effect that neither one of the institutions committed any fault under Florida law must be considered here.

[89] In his analysis of the scope of banking secrecy in the light of article 3079 C.C.Q., Professor Gérald Goldstein writes:

> Dans ce jugement, l'existence des obligations légales ou des droits découlant du secret bancaire (ses modalités, ses conditions, son étendue, les personnes qui y sont assujetties, ses bénéficiaires, etc.) dépend donc implicitement de la loi instituant ce secret. Mais la cour semble qualifier de façon autonome la question de l'effet de ces lois relatives au secret bancaire sur l'obtention des preuves au Québec comme une question relevant de la loi s'appliquant à la preuve. La raison en est que le juge applique la règle de conflit québécoise relative à cette matière (article 3130 C.c.Q.). Ceci ne veut pas dire que l'on doive faire régir tous les effets du secret bancaire par cette loi, loin de là. Par exemple, l'obligation pour les banques de ne pas dévoiler à des tiers — en dehors d'une procédure judiciaire d'obtention de preuve — des données sur les comptes de ses clients doit logiquement dépendre de la loi instituant le secret professionnel.[15]

[90] It is important to note that in the present case it is not a matter of evidence or procedure, but rather of substantive law in the light of which the Defendants' liability should be evaluated.

[91] To claim that the Defendants had an obligation to report information about their customer to RBC is tantamount to claiming that they should violate their own law when all of the banking transactions concerned took place in Florida, where the injurious act occurred. The Court cannot accept this argument.

[92] Lastly, section 3082 C.C.Q. states:

> 3082. Exceptionally, the law designated by this Book is not applicable if, in the light of all attendant circumstances, it is clear that the situation is only remotely connected with that law and is much more closely connected with the law of another country. This provision does not apply where the law is designated in a juridical act.

[93] In the present case, it must be concluded that, considering all attendant circumstances, it is clear that the situation is only remotely connected with Québec law, since all of Global Orbit's and the Defendants' financial activities are governed by Florida law.

[94] In conclusion, in absence of any fault on the Defendants' part under the applicable legislation, in this case Florida law, the Court, as the Plaintiff admitted, has no choice but to dismiss the motion.

❖ CONDUCT OF THE PARTIES IN THIS CASE AS EVALUATED BASED ON THE EVIDENCE SUBMITTED BY EACH ONE

➢ SUMMARY OF THE FACTS

[95] Even though the Court has ruled to dismiss the motion on the ground that Florida law should apply and that no fault was committed by the Defendants under that law, it is appropriate, without going into all of the details and without examining each and every piece of evidence introduced in this case, to examine the conduct of the parties, irrespective of the applicable law. A very brief overview of the facts will provide a better understanding of the role of each party in the present case.

[96] Global Orbit, a subsidiary of Tiagi, is a company incorporated under Florida law that operates in that state. For the purposes of its operations, it opened a bank account with Union Bank and obtained a factoring line and stock-secured line of credit from Capital Factors. On a daily basis, Global would receive agreed upon advances from Capital Factors, based on its accounts receivable and inventory, to enable it to operate, and, on a daily basis, Union Bank would inform Capital Factors of the amount needed to cover the cheques issued by Global Orbit.

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

[97] Informed of the amount needed to cover the cheques drawn on the Union Bank account, Capital Factors would contact Mr. Chehata, President and Chief Operating Officer for Global Orbit, so that he could transfer to Global's Union Bank Account or to an account held in the name of Capital Factors an amount equal to the sum required to cover the cheques drawn on the Union Bank account, and Capital Factors would transfer that sum to Union Bank.

[98] Concurrently, Global Orbit would draw on its account at Union Bank cheques made payable to Tiagi and deposited in its RBC account. As soon as the cheques were deposited by Tiagi in its RBC account, RBC would release the funds and transfer the daily sum needed to cover the amount transferred from Capital Factors to Union Bank.

[99] However, Tiagi did not have sufficient funds to cover the daily transfers to Capital Factors and it was only to the extent that the funds were immediately released by RBC, even before the clearing system was completed, that Global Orbit could have funds it would normally not have been entitled to, thereby committing fraud against RBC.

[100] In late March, early April 1998, Global Orbit ended its business relationship with Capital Factors and Union Bank, and Heller replaced Capital Factors as the new financial institution. Global Orbit's account with Union Bank was closed and the cheques drawn by Global Orbit, particularly those made payable to Tiagi, were returned marked "NSF" or "account closed".

[101] Since RBC did not place any hold on the cheques deposited by Tiagi until the clearing system was completed, and since the released funds significantly exceeded the cleared funds, RBC, as mentioned earlier, recorded a deficit of US$19 570 047.

[102] For the purposes of briefly examining the parties' conduct, the Court considered the following elements in the light of viva voce as well as documentary evidence on record:

- DEFENCE

1. DEFENDANT UNION BANK

[103] First, in the Court's opinion, the Union Bank account opened by Global Orbit was operated in accordance with the rules of good practice and the applicable legislation and regulations throughout the period concerned, and the Defendant Union Bank cannot be accused of any fault or irregularity in the operation of said account.

[104] Second, Global Orbit's account was monitored by Union Bank employees on a daily basis. At no time did Global Orbit's account at Union Bank pose a risk to the Defendant, and Union Bank always made sure to honour cheques issued by Global Orbit insofar as there were sufficient cleared funds available in the bank account to meet payment.

[105] Third, at no time did Union Bank see the cheques drawn by Global Orbit, the entire clearing system being carried out in accordance with US regulations.

[106] Fourth, at no time did employees of the Union Bank branch where the account was held suspect kiting fraud or money laundering on the part of Global Orbit or improper transactions in the account. The date chosen to close Global Orbit's Union Bank account and the transfer of sums between Capital Factors and Union Bank at the time of the account's closure are not, in the Court's opinion, connected in any way to the loss incurred by the Plaintiff. In fact, notwithstanding the testimony given by Mr. Holtz, which left the Court puzzled about all the circumstances surrounding the account's closure, the Court has no reason to dismiss the testimony given by expert witness Barkley Clark, who maintained that the account was closed in the proper manner and in accordance with the applicable legislation, including the notifying of Global Orbit by Union Bank of the account's closure when the account was transferred and financing was taken over by Heller.

2. DEFENDANT CAPITAL FACTORS

[107] The business relationship between Capital Factors and Global Orbit effectively lasted just a few months, from November 1997 to March 1998. Although it was opened by Capital Factors in summer 1997, Global Orbit's account was barely active between the time it was opened and November 1997. This is a relatively short time.

[108] It was only in her aforementioned letter of March 3, 1998 (R-20) that Ms. Ferri requested more information regarding the account's operation, when Global Orbit was on the verge of entering into new arrangements with another financial institution. Can Capital Factors be accused of not expediting closure of the account and thereby compromising the transfer of the account to another financial institution to the detriment of its customer? The Court thinks not! Capital Factors respected the financing arrangements entered into with Global Orbit at all times, and cannot be blamed for any irregularities in the account's operation.

[109] Global Orbit always respected the credit limits and ratio calculations, and Ms. Ferri at Capital Factors reviewed the account every day and never once suspected cheque kiting.

[110] As confirmed by all of the witnesses heard by the Court and whose credibility cannot be questioned, at no time did the representatives of Capital Factors suspect fraud, kiting or money laundering.

[111] In short, the only thing that RBC can accuse Capital Factors of is any knowledge Mr. Holtz, Mr. MacMillan and Ms. Ferri may have had about what the parties characterized as an imbalance in the amount of factored sales and the advances to Global's account, as well as the Defendant's failure to conduct an investigation which, according to RBC, would have enabled Capital Factors to conclude that operating in this manner was unacceptable and likely to cause injury to the Plaintiff, and their failure to inform RBC of the possible risk it faced.

[112] Capital Factors and Union Bank considered Global Orbit a good customer and, during the period in question, it represented no particular risk.

[113] Even though Mr. Holtz and the main people in charge of Global Orbit's account with Capital Factors, Mr. MacMillan and Ms. Ferri, noted—especially in late January, early February 1998—an imbalance in the account, the Court, considering:

1. all the attendant circumstances, in particular Global Orbit's dissatisfaction regarding the line of credit granted to it by Capital Factors, which it considered clearly too low,

2. Mr. George Tabah Jr.'s urging of Capital Factors to increase Global Orbit's stock-secured credit line in late January 1998 (1997 was most likely an error) (R-74) and Ms. Ferri's refusal to grant such a request, instead suggesting that Global devote its best effort within the next 60 days to find other financing without penalty (R-67),

3. the steps taken by Global Orbit to transfer its financial operations to another institution,

4. the daily verification of the account by Ms. Ferri, who always checked with RBC to make sure that funds were available for transfer to Capital Factors, and

5. the very short lapse of time between the March 3 letter (R-20) and the actual transfer of the account to Heller, finds that it would have been entirely inappropriate for the Defendants to intervene and compromise the transfer of Global's account to another financial institution, thereby leaving the door open for Global Orbit to bring an action for damages, and that no acts of fault or negligence were committed by the Defendants against the Plaintiff RBC.

- PLAINTIFF

  - LIABILITY OF THE PLAINTIFF RBC

[114] At the time Tiagi's RBC account was opened, the Bank knew absolutely nothing about this corporative entity, and the account was opened without any assessment of potential risks to the Bank. The Bank relied solely on the fact that members of the Tabah family already did their personal banking with RBC. Since it was only a non-borrowing account, RBC did not carry out a due diligence review and decided to request just the documents needed to open such an account, i.e. copies of letters patent, the names of the administrators, and a card confirming the names of individuals with signing authority.

[115] Since it was only a non-borrowing account and the Bank considered there to be no risk in this type of account, no hold was placed on deposits, even though the clearing time in Canada is a few days and between 10 and 15 days for international transactions, particularly transactions with the United States.

[116] Yet, RBC's policy regarding the negotiation of instruments D-1, which stipulates the following in particular:

> Verify items — All items presented for negotiation must be verified for date, body & figure, signed by drawer, encoding, changes initialled and clearing eligibility. Endorsement as required.
>
> Exception: Business clients unless classified as doubted.
>
> Identify financially — The unit must ensure funds are available, no restrictions, etc., for any funds released from an Account Owner's account. Units must decide if a hold is required for an item drawn on another bank or unit where the client has not been deemed "Financially Responsible".
>
> Note: Clients considered "Financially Responsible" may have the funds on deposit to cover any released amounts, or have established and/or maintained a satisfactory account history/relationship.
>
> High risk items — Throughout this folio certain situations will be referred to as "High Risk", these situations warrant extra precautions/scrutiny.
>
> . . .
>
> Items drawn on another financial institution — If an item is drawn on another financial institution, be guided by the procedures below:
>
> 1. Calling another financial institution to verify funds, although not prohibited, is strongly not recommended for the following reasons:
>
>   - their confirmation is not binding
>
>   - maker of the cheque may still place a stop payment on the item, funds may be garnisheed or item may be returned NSF, etc.

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

- customer service time is increased which incurs expenses such as telecommunication and staff costs.

2. If the presenter is financially responsible, negotiate the item or accept item on deposit.

3. If the presenter has not been financially identified, place a hold on the item for a minimum of 5 business days; items outside your Processing Area, hold at least 7 to 10 business days; US/Foreign currency items, hold a minimum 20 to 25 business days; or send on collection.[16]

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

[117] Exhibit D-8 includes a review policy to prevent the Bank from being in an overdraft situation and the following policies in particular to enable it to foil any form of kiting:

CANADA - ROYAL BANK/ROYAL TRUST

RB/RT : Reminder - Overdraft and Activity Report is to be Verified Daily

Target Audience - MCS's, Operation Centre Staff and all Staff responsible for checking DDA - Overdraft and Activity report

Introduction — An increase in losses due to kiting activity has revealed that the officer responsible for reviewing the report is not always examining the Overdraft and Activity as required.

Details — Action Required
Debits-Posted Fluctuations
Investigations/Activity
Client Relationships

Action Required — The officer responsible for reviewing the report must examine the Overdraft and Activity Report daily.

Review possible kiting activity and large balance fluctuations as outlined in Folio BBR-1-2-11 for Business Banking Units and P-3-1-6 for Personal Banking Units.

Purpose — The Overdraft and Activity Report provides 2 types of information:

16 Exhibit D-1 at 2, 41.

Overdraft section -	provides a daily record of overdrawn accounts
Activity section -	shows abnormal activity, such as large balance fluctuations which may indicate possible client "kiting".

Action — Use the activity section of the report to review possible kiting activity and large balance fluctuations.

The Manager is responsible for examining and initialling the report daily.

Note: These instructions also apply to branches which receive the report by account responsibility.

[118] Contrary to the aforementioned policies, the evidence revealed that RBC and its principal officers involved in overseeing commercial account transactions on a daily basis never reviewed the Activity Report, whereas a simple review in January or February would have enabled RBC to conclude that Global Orbit and Tiagi were likely engaged in kiting.

[119] Both Mr. Chapdelaine and Ms. Doucet, who are directly responsible for commercial accounts, were totally unaware of the kiting concept and the attendant risk of loss to RBC. However, RBC had adopted clear measures for preventing such activity from occurring. The RBC policy dealing specifically with kiting reads as follows:

B-8-1-7 Cheque Kiting

Introduction — Cheque kiting is the process of depositing a worthless cheque and covering it with another worthless cheque before the first one clears. The chain involves two or more financial institutions/branches, so at any given time there can be several cheques in the clearing system drawn on different accounts.

How cheque kiting is done — The process may include one or more of the following scenarios:

- a one time unauthorized "borrowing" situation for a customer in financial difficulty

- a large scale fraud by an individual or an organization

	- regular drawings in even dollars on the same financial institution branch - high turnover of funds.
What you can do to prevent it	Early detection of "kiting" will minimize losses. Here's what you can do: - Examine the activity section of the Overdraft and Activity Report daily for suspicious activity. - Since kiting can also be done through an Automated Banking Machine (ABM), monitor suspicious activity closely.[17]

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

[120] If the kiting was far from obvious for the two defendant US financial institutions, the same is not at all true for RBC, and if the Bank had paid the slightest bit of attention to how the account was being operated and had carried out the slightest verification, it could have prevented any and all overdrafts and loss, with little or no damage.

[121] In the Court's opinion, RBC is the author of its own misfortune and it must assume all risks associated with the immediate release of funds with no hold of any kind.

[122] Although RBC called the account opened by Tiagi at its commercial branch in Montréal a non-borrowing account, the immediate release of funds is equivalent to the Bank's granting its customers an unsecured loan with all of the inherent risks.

[123] The Plaintiff RBC devised a formula for computing the charges to be levied on customers' accounts precisely to take into account the use of funds during the clearing period.

[124] Millions of dollars flowed through Tiagi's RBC account during the period concerned, and no one who oversaw the account raised even the slightest question about the transactions in it, even though it would have been very easy to put an end to the kiting and avoid any overdraft losses.

[125] The expertise report prepared by Martin Fafard, a witness for RBC, is particularly telling in this regard. During the very short period concerned, from January to the end of March 1998, $240 000 000 flowed through Tiagi's RBC account. On February 2, 1998, for example, 22 cheques were drawn on Global Orbit's account at Union Bank for deposit in Tiagi's RBC account, and 25 cheques were deposited on February 9, all without either the teller or any of the account managers asking the slightest question, and all of the funds were immediately released without any kind of investigation or verification.

17 Exhibit D-14 at 13.

[126] On March 2, 1998, 26 cheques made payable to Tiagi were drawn on Global Orbit's account and all of them, varying between $270 000 and $285 000, were deposited in Tiagi's RBC account, without raising the slightest bit of suspicion at RBC! It went on like this throughout February and March 1998 without raising any red flags. The sole fact that 26 cheques drawn on Global Orbit's account were deposited in Tiagi's RBC account the same day was in itself highly irregular and totally unacceptable, and the Court cannot understand why RBC allowed the immediate release of such large sums using a highly irregular modus operandi, one that Martin Fafard, expert witness for RBC, characterized as transactions out of the ordinary course of business.

[127] Was it a matter of negligence, incompetence or even a lack of trained account managers at RBC? The Tribunal is afraid it cannot answer that!

[128] No other financial institution was better placed than RBC to suspect fraud and kiting, and RBC, under the circumstances, is in no position to blame Union Bank and Capital Factors for showing a lack of diligence or not conducting an investigation into accounts that were being operated in accordance with the applicable legislation and regulations.

[129] The Court finds that the two Defendants had the right to assume that RBC was aware of how the account was being operated and the potential risks involved and that it had all the means at its disposal to avoid any loss from overdrafts.

[130] During the hearing, RBC admitted that it bears a share of responsibility for its loss while stressing the fact that the Defendants committed a greater fault than it did: the only fault RBC committed was in not conducting a review. RBC is leaving it up to the Court to determine the parties' respective share of responsibility.

[131] The Court cannot take the same approach and finds that RBC bears sole responsibility for the loss and that the action should be dismissed even if the Court finds that the applicable law and concepts of liability where those of Québec.

[132] Indeed, the Court cannot accept RBC's claim that Union Bank and Capital Factors colluded to enable the fraud to continue and reach the scale it did. Nor can any knowledge either of the witnesses may have had of irregularities in the operation of the account with Union Bank or Capital Factors enable the Court to conclude that the two Defendants committed a fault in not undertaking an investigation and obtaining explanations as to the noted imbalance in the account's operation.

[133] It is paradoxical, to say the least, that RBC accuses the Defendants of willful blindness when the Bank itself and its employees did absolutely nothing to prevent such a loss from occurring. Indeed, if any fraud was committed in the present case it was because RBC released funds without knowing anything about the creditworthiness of the two corporations involved, and without the slightest monitoring of the two corporations' banking transactions between November 1997 and March 1998. If a loss was incurred, it was because RBC itself turned a blind eye by doing no verification, accepting the immediate release of funds and not daily verifying the transactions in Tiagi's account, which was operated from RBC's principal place of business in Québec, located at 1, Place Ville Marie, Montréal.

[134] Is there any need to reiterate that, as underscored at the beginning of this judgment, RBC is a major global financial institution and that it was fully equipped to avoid this kind of loss.

[135] Every day from November 1997 to January 1998, RBC would confirm to Ms. Ferri at Capital Factors that the funds were available, and from January until the time the account was closed, RBC would authorize the immediate wire transfer of funds.

[136] Under these circumstances, can one blame and accuse Capital Factors and Union Bank of not showing due diligence when RBC blindly released funds without putting a verification and protection system in place so as to prevent such a loss from occurring? The Court thinks not.

- DUTY TO INFORM UNDER QUÉBEC LAW

[137] The duty to inform only arises where there is informational vulnerability; i.e. where it is impossible for the creditor of the obligation to have informed itself.

[138] The Court adopts the ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada in Bank of Montreal v. Bail Ltée[18] which reads as follows:

> "The advent of the obligation to inform is related to a certain shift that has been taking place in the civil law. While previously it was acceptable to leave it to the individual to obtain information before acting, the civil law is now more attentive to inequalities in terms of information, and imposes a positive obligation to provide information in cases where one party is in a vulnerable position as regards information, from which damages may result. The obligation to inform and the duty not to give false information may be seen as two sides of the same coin. As I noted in Laferrière v. Lawson, supra, both acts and omissions may amount to fault, and the civil law does not make a distinction between them. Like P. Le Tourneau, "De l'allégement de l'obligation de renseignements ou de conseil", D. 1987. Chron., p. 101, however, I would add that the obligation to inform must not be defined so broadly as to obviate the fundamental obligation which rests on everyone to obtain information and to take care in conducting his or her affairs."

and at pages 586-587:

> "Without necessarily adopting that statement, I am of the opinion that Ghestin has correctly stated the nature and parameters of the obligation to inform. He describes the main elements of the obligation as follows:
>
> - knowledge of the information, whether actual or presumed, by the party which owes the obligation to inform;
>
> - the fact that the information in question is of decisive importance;
>
> - the fact that it is impossible for the party to whom the duty to inform is owed to inform itself, or that the creditor is legitimately relying on the debtor of the obligation.
>
> In my opinion, these elements are found in all cases where there is an obligation to inform.

[139] In the context of sophisticated financial institutions such as in the present instance, it is difficult if not impossible, to argue the existence of informational vulnerability, as stated by the Québec Court of Appeal in Morgan Bank of Canada c. Gulf International Bank[19] :

> [37] En l'espèce, j'estime que la présente affaire constitue l'un de ces cas où les appelantes n'avaient pas d'obligation de renseignement envers l'intimée. Premièrement, l'intimée, une banque rayonnant sur la scène financière internationale, disposait des moyens appropriés de se renseigner et n'était pas dans une « position informationnelle » vulnérable. . . .

[19] 2001 CanLII 7885 (Qc C.A.).

2013 QCCS 2214 (CanLII)

> L'obligation de se renseigner est au fond la limite imposée à l'obligation de renseignement, l'envers de la médaille. Dans la mesure, en effet, où, d'une façon générale, le contractant a la possibilité de connaître l'information ou d'y avoir accès [...], l'obligation de se renseigner vient faire échec au devoir corrélatif de renseignement de l'autre partie. Le droit ne vient pas au secours de ceux qui dorment, disait la maxime romaine. [...]
>
> Dans l'obligation d'information, le droit entend protéger le contractant contre une inégalité situationnelle, mais non contre sa propre sottise ou négligence. Le contractant doit pouvoir présumer que, en effet, que l'information générale de base, normalement disponible, est connue de son cocontractant, ou alors qu'il a décidé de ne pas en tenir compte. Aussi la Cour suprême a-t-elle pris la précaution [dans Banque de Montréal c. Bail Ltée, précité] de situer l'obligation d'information dans le contexte général où toute personne a le devoir de se renseigner raisonnablement avant de conclure un contrat.

> [50] [L]'obligation de renseignement en matière bancaire, n'est pas destinée à compenser les défaillances d'un prêteur négligent, mais à équilibrer la relation d'affaires lorsqu'une partie est en position informationnelle précaire. Le test est d'autant plus exigeant lorsque les parties en présence sont des acteurs influents de la scène bancaire bénéficiant d'une vaste expérience et de conseillers avertis.

[140] The Court concludes that RBC was never in a position of informational vulnerability and that, at all times, it had all of the information necessary to detect the kiting activity.

[141] The Court cannot allow itself to end this judgment without underlining the outstanding work and the very high level of professionalism demonstrated by the attorneys for both the Plaintiff and Defendants, both in Montréal and during the commission held in Florida.

THEREFORE, THE COURT:

[142] DISMISSES the action brought by the Royal Bank of Canada;

[143] THE WHOLE with costs, including the following expert fees:

• Stinson Morrisson Hecker LLP:	Barkley Clark	$242 699.19

REASONS FOR DECISION

HEALEY J.

Nature of the Motion

[1] This is a motion by the Royal Bank of Canada ("RBC") pursuant to Rule 20 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, seeking an order for summary judgment in the sum of $6,373,897.53, calculated as of January 22, 2008, with such judgment to be declared to be a judgment in fraud within the meaning of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-5. In the alternative, RBC moves for judgment in the sum of $989,323.64, calculated as of November 22, 2006.

History of the Proceeding

[2] This proceeding has a lengthy history, having been commenced in October 2007, and accordingly the following outlines only partially the steps taken by each party before reaching the stage where this motion could be argued. The statement of defence was struck for failure to pay costs and default judgment was obtained from Justice Boswell on January 22, 2008. The default judgment was set aside by order of Justice Mulligan dated October 9, 2009. Assignment court for the scheduling of this motion was September 21, 2010. On the day before that appearance, the defendant filed for bankruptcy. By order dated October 25, 2010 the Registrar in Bankruptcy granted leave for RBC to continue to prosecute its claim. The defendant unsuccessfully appealed that decision before Campbell J.. In his reasons, Campbell J. noted that in addition to it being a matter of discretion for the Registrar, there was ample evidence on which the Registrar could find sufficient material prejudice to RBC to justify lifting the stay and lack of equitable grounds to deny it, including the suggested inability of the bankrupt to defend.

Decision

[3] For the reasons that follow, the motion is granted and RBC shall have judgment against the defendant in the sum of $6,373,897.53, calculated as of January 22, 2008. It is hereby declared that the judgment is a judgment in fraud within the meaning of s.178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

The Evidence

[4] The defendant has not filed an affidavit responding specifically to the motion for summary judgement. He relies on three dated affidavits, the first two sworn October 20 and 22, 2010 for the purposes of his bankruptcy proceeding, and the third sworn August 8, 2011, which was submitted to the Court of Appeal in respect of a motion for security for costs[1]. It is from an affidavit of the defendant sworn January 22, 2008, filed in RBC's consolidated motion record[2], that the following evidence is provided:

[5] On the evidence of the defendant, until November 2006 he was a highly successful entrepreneur presiding over at least a dozen businesses that collectively are referred to as the Hejna Group. The Hejna Group was one of the five largest employers in Muskoka, and had interests in six marinas, boat rentals, cottage rentals, development and construction. The defendant's personal net worth was in excess of $30,000,000 and the companies were not in financial difficulty. He deposed that the combined revenue of the Hejna Group in 2006 was, to the best of his recollection, between $15 and $20 million.

[6] The defendant deposed that he was courted by RBC in order to obtain the business of the Hejna Group. At a dinner meeting held in 2005, his evidence is that banking representatives told him that RBC would allocate between $25 and $30 million in aggregate financing to finance his business operations as well as future business expansions and operations. Shortly thereafter he transferred all of his banking to RBC. His evidence is that RBC provided funding for the operation of the Hejna Group, such that the total financing package with RBC was $9 million in mortgages and lines of credit by the spring of 2006. The majority of his contact was with Wendy Sprung, the senior account manager for the branch at 5001 Yonge Street, and with Rosie Marrone at 200 Bay Street, where private banking was arranged for him. The defendant's evidence is that Ms. Sprung reassured him that RBC would look after all of his financing needs, and that the Bank did not want him to go elsewhere to obtain financing for his ventures. He has deposed that from mid-2005 until the end of November 2006, he was speaking to Ms. Sprung two to three times per week, and that she was intimately familiar with his businesses, his banking needs, and all transactions in his business accounts.

[2] Consolidated motion record, Vol. 2 of 3, tab 59

[7] In particular, his evidence is that RBC was eager to provide funding for the acquisition of three new marinas in early 2006. He deposed that RBC committed to funding for those marinas, and that, relying on those commitments, he entered into binding contracts to acquire them and waived the financing conditions. His evidence is that Ms. Sprung assured him throughout that there would be no difficulty in obtaining approval for the necessary funding, which would include a mortgage, operating line of credit, and overdraft facilities.

[8] The first of the three marina deals was scheduled to close in March 2006, the next in May 2006 and the last in July 2006. On the day before the first closing, the defendant's evidence is that he was advised by Ms. Sprung that the financing was not ready. The defendant stated that he borrowed hundreds of thousands of dollars from friends and family to close the deal because RBC was delaying the closing of the financing transaction. In his affidavit sworn August 8, 2011, the defendant deposed that on the date of their phone call, Ms. Sprung told him to deposit cheques from one of his businesses into the account of another business, through automatic teller machine ("ATM") deposits, so that RBC could certify the required funds. In the final sentence of paragraph 8 of that same affidavit, the defendant stated "I knew that Wendy monitored all of my accounts at the Bank, so she knew that this was being done". If, as the defendant suggests, Ms. Sprung specifically directed Mr. Hejna to take such a course of action, one is left wondering why this statement as to her knowledge is necessary.

[9] The defendant deposed that he told Ms. Sprung in the spring of 2006 that he needed an additional overdraft to close the marina deals since the promised financing was delayed. He stated that there were probably ten conversations over a period of four or five months, in which he advised Ms. Sprung that he needed additional overdrafts to close the deals and operate the businesses, and once the promised funding came in the overdrafts would be completely eliminated. His evidence is that he explained to Ms. Sprung that he could manage to get all of the deals closed and keep the businesses operating until the promised funding came through, if she allowed the overdrafts. Ms. Sprung allegedly assured him that RBC would support him by allowing those overdrafts to occur. The defendant's evidence is that Ms. Sprung and her staff were aware that he was writing the cheques. Between April and November of 2006, there were hundreds of cheques, at one point 40 to 50 a day representing $4 to 5 million in deposits over the ATM network. Because both the volume of cheques and the amount of the overdrafts were outside of the lending parameters, it is the defendant's evidence that someone in a more senior position than Ms. Sprung would have had to approve their clearance. It is his evidence that although in retrospect this may appear to be akin to cheque kiting, he was not intending to be deceptive. Further, the entire time that these overdraft cheques were being written, no one from RBC called him to say anything was wrong. From his conversations with Ms. Sprung, he believed that RBC was aware of the overdrafts and how they were being created.

[10] In summary, it is the defendant's evidence that he understood, because Ms. Sprung led him to believe, that he was being authorized to make inter-account and inter-company deposits and transfers to make up any shortfall that he had in funding the marina closings, and thereafter the marinas' operational expenses. Further, he says that Ms. Sprung led him to believe that she was aware that the proposed practice would result in overdrafts to the accounts due to the lack of existing funds and credit, and those overdrafts would be addressed once RBC finalized the new credit facilities.

[11] In a subsequent affidavit sworn by the defendant on September 18, 2008[3] in support of a motion to set aside the default judgment obtained in this matter, a different explanation is provided. At paragraph 75, after denying that he defrauded RBC, whether through cheque kiting or otherwise, he deposed that because RBC failed to provide him with certain promised financing in a timely manner, he used existing banking and credit facilities to address arising business commitments. Again, he states that any overdrafts that resulted from this practice were created with the knowledge and authorization of RBC, and it was at all times understood that this practice would cease once he was provided with the credit facilities promised to him and further, that any overdrafts resulting from those activities would be cleared using the new financing.

[12] At paragraph 89 of that affidavit, the defendant deposed that it was Ms. Sprung who advised him that he should cover any shortfall in purchase and operating funding by using the existing RBC banking and credit facilities available to him. His evidence is that she did so knowing that neither he nor the Hejna Group had sufficient funds or credit on account at RBC to cover the cost of the marinas' closings and/or the marinas' commitments. He was advised by Ms. Sprung that any reliance on existing banking and credit facilities would only be for a short time since the promised financing would soon be in place. As a result, he was led by RBC to understand that he was authorized to use his existing banking and credit facilities as a means of short term ad-hoc bridge financing.

[13] At paragraph 91 of that affidavit the defendant states that, acting on Ms. Sprung's authority, beginning in or around March of 2006 he began to rely on existing facilities to fund the marinas' closings and thereafter their operations. In order to maintain a positive bank balance in the various accounts, either he or his employees wrote a number of cheques and deposited them by ATM to effect inter-company transfers between those accounts. The defendant states that the transfer of large sums of money between the various business and personal accounts via ATM deposits was abnormal for those

[3] Consolidated motion record, Vol. 1 of 3, tab 11(d).

2013 ONSC 1719 (CanLII)

accounts, but at no time did anyone at RBC, prior to November 2006, take issue with this practice.

[14] In mid-August 2006, the first marina was given the credit promised, but the defendant states that it was insufficient to address the overdrafts created by both its own closing, as well as the other two. As a result, he continued the practice of relying on inter-account deposits to maintain his businesses until the promised financing for the latter two marinas was put in place.

[15] At the time of the closings of the second two marinas, RBC had yet to deliver on its promises to finance. Again Ms. Sprung urged him to keep his business with RBC. The defendant's evidence is that it was clear to him from his conversations with Ms. Sprung that she was advising him to continue with what he asserts was the authorized practice of making inter-account transfers until the promised credit facilities were put in place.

[16] Even after all of the marinas' closings, the defendant was writing and depositing a large number of cheques on a daily basis to effect inter-account transfers. The defendant asserts that each of those transactions was cleared by Ms. Sprung, or her counterpart who looked after the defendants' personal accounts, Ms. Marrone, or their staff members.

[17] From conversations that the defendant had with Ms. Sprung and Ms. Marrone, he understood that the RBC security department discussed the activity in his personal and corporate accounts with them in the spring, summer and/or fall of 2006. In relation to those inquiries, Ms. Sprung and Ms. Marone both assured him that they had addressed any security concerns that RBC may have had. He understood this to mean that Ms. Sprung and Ms. Marrone had advised RBC security that the activity in his account was authorized.

[18] On November 19, 2006 the defendant received a telephone call from Ms. Sprung and another senior banking employee asking him to come to see them in person the next day. They explained that all of his accounts had been frozen. In actuality, what occurred was that all accounts were immediately coded for deposit only, with ATM access blocked. On meeting with them the next business day, the defendant was introduced to two individuals from RBC security and was confronted with the Bank's concern over his activities. The defendant was advised that he would not be extended any further credit and was asked to find alternative financing to cover his full indebtedness to RBC, including any overdrafts.

[19] In an affidavit sworn October 23 2008, Ms. Sprung has denied any allegation that she, on behalf of RBC, authorized the defendant to commit cheque kiting as a means of interim financing. Ms. Sprung paints a very different picture from that advanced by the defendant. Her evidence is that with respect to various loan requests made by the defendant on behalf of various companies, financial information that was requested in order to allow the loan applications to be processed was never received, despite numerous requests. At all times, the defendant and his controller were aware that RBC could not even consider his request for certain financing ventures because of the lack of financial information provided. Further given the totality of the loan facilities applied for, the amount could only be authorized by a Credit Risk Manager having the authority to approve financing in the requested amount, which was beyond her own authority. She denies that she advised the defendant to cover cash flow shortfalls of one business entity by using loan facilities available and approved for a different business entity. Further, at no time did she authorize or suggest to the defendant that overdrafts be created in order to solve any cash flow shortfalls he was then facing. Her evidence is that the defendant was always aware that no overdraft privileges had been granted in any of the accounts, and in the event that an overdraft of a minor nature occurred she would either call or e-mail the defendant or his controller asking that the overdrafts be eliminated immediately.

[20] Ms. Sprung was cross-examined on this evidence. The defendant has not been able to point the court to evidence generated from that cross-examination that would rebut Ms. Sprung's testimony that there was no reason for her to disbelieve the information that she received from the defendant or his controller, which was that any inter-company transactions were being done in the normal course of inventory buying and selling among the companies. She recalls being contacted by RBC's compliance department on only two occasions about these inter-company transactions, but that after speaking with the defendant and his controller their explanations seemed plausible to her, and she relayed that information to the compliance group.

[21] Although the defendant's counsel frequently emphasized throughout argument his assertion that Ms. Sprung received daily reports, and therefore should have known of any irregular activity in the defendant's accounts, a close reading of her cross-examination transcript reveals that the daily reports only came to Ms. Sprung's attention if there was no money in the account on which a cheque or cheques had been written, and all that she would see is a net result showing a shortfall in any given account. Her evidence is clear that she did not have the means to examine the daily cheque-writing activity carried on by each of the Hejna Group entities within their account and the defendant's personal account.

[22] RBC also relies upon the evidence of James Dickson, who is employed by RBC Corporate Investigation Services ("CIS") as a Senior Manager, Forensic Accounting[4] (the "Dickson affidavit"). In a memo dated June 9, 2007, Mr. Dickson outlined his involvement in the investigation of this matter. It began on November 15, 2006 when CIS was notified of a number of irregular banking transactions involving the defendant's personal account as well as the accounts of the Hejna Group. The irregular activity identified in November 2006 involved millions of dollars in cheques that were drawn upon Hejna Group accounts both at RBC and other financial institutions each business day and deposited via ATMs to other Hejna Group accounts at RBC. In October 2006 alone, in excess of $80 million was deposited to and withdrawn from the Hejna Group accounts at RBC. In tracing this activity, CIS was able to determine that the unusual activity had been continuing and growing between January 2006 and November 16, 2006, [4] Affidavit of James Dickson sworn December 19, 2007, Consolidated Motion Record, Vol. 3 of 3, tab G.

on which date the restrictions were placed on all accounts. Once RBC understood that the net cumulative unauthorized overdraft was approximately $6 million, it also became clear that these funds were not in any of the RBC accounts. CIS then began a review and analysis of the transaction history of the accounts for 2006 which, as of the date of Mr. Dickson's memo, demonstrated the following characteristics:

(i) the volume of activity in the accounts was not consistent with the seasonal nature of the businesses, and the volume of transactions through the bank accounts was increasing significantly even though business activities would have been substantially wound down for the winter;

(ii) the majority of transactions in most of the Hejna Group accounts represented funds transferred to or from other Hejna Group entities, none of which had a significant external source of funds in comparison to the total funds deposited to the accounts;

(iii) in the period leading up to November 16, 2006, the Hejna Group accounts almost always had a positive balance;

(iv) the majority of payments were by way of cheques, signed by the defendant, which needed to be processed through the clearing system, as opposed to electronic funds transfers that would result in a simultaneous withdrawal and deposit;

(v) an artificial float was created by the foregoing which grew continuously through 2006;

(vi) funds were being transferred between companies that did not have any obvious business relationship during the period in question;

(vii) a total of $89,943,882.31 cycled through the defendant's personal account between January 1 and November 16, 2006; and

(viii) once the restrictions had been placed on the accounts, effectively breaking the cycle of irregular transactions, the RBC accounts were all significantly overdrawn. The defendant's personal account was overdrawn in the amount of $989,323.64 as of November 22, 2006.

[23] What next developed as a result of this meeting was that defendant entered into two forbearance agreements with RBC. The background to these forbearance agreements is set out in an affidavit of Raymond Chang, a Vice-President with RBC[5] (the "Chang affidavit"). RBC's evidence is that the forbearance agreements were an accommodation granted by RBC to facilitate the defendant and the Hejna Group to pursue opportunities to stabilize their financial position and to secure refinancing for payment of the indebtedness. At paragraphs 46 through 48 of the Chang affidavit, RBC explains that as of November 24, 2006, the Hejna companies were in default of various covenants under the pre-forbearance credit facilities. Just as outlined in the Dickson affidavit, RBC had discovered that large numbers of cheques for significant aggregate amounts had been flowing through and between Hejna's personal account and some of the various Hejna Group accounts to cause a dramatic artificial increase in the "float" (the time between the negotiation of the cheque and its clearance at the cheque-writer's bank). The process by which this occurred was that cheques and other forms of transfers were written between the accounts of some of the Hejna companies in a circular fashion, which caused the loan position of the companies to appear to be within the authorized limits, when in fact, the unauthorized overdraft was constantly increasing. When the unauthorized overdraft was discovered by RBC, it was determined that it amounted to approximately $6 million (almost $1 million of which related to Hejna's personal current account) over and beyond the authorized lines of credit of approximately $9.8 million. By constantly making daily large transfers by cheque and other instruments, the unauthorized overdraft was successfully shielded from detection by RBC until mid-November 2006.

[24] The first forbearance agreement was made on November 24, 2006[6]. The defendant was represented by counsel at Himelfarb, Prozanski at the time of its execution. He personally was a party to that agreement and signed on behalf of the various Hejna Group companies who were also parties to the first forbearance agreement. Recital "D" of the first forbearance agreement provides as follows:

> As at the date hereof numerous defaults exist under the Credit Facilities and Security, including, without limitation, with respect to unpermitted excesses of approximately than $6,000,000 (the "Bulge", which together with the Facility Indebtedness and any other debts, liabilities or obligations owing to the Bank now or in the future shall be referred to as the "Indebtedness") over agreed credit limits, resulting from uncovered liabilities arising from cheques written and issued by the Existing Borrowers and/or the Existing Guarantors on accounts maintained by the Existing Borrowers and/or the Existing Guarantors at the Bank. These defaults have not been cured and continue to remain outstanding. (emphasis added) under the pre-forbearance credit facilities and that RBC was entitled, without further notice or demand, to enforce its loan security; (ii) consented to the immediate enforcement by RBC of all remedies on the occurrence of an event of default under the forbearance agreement, including the appointment of an interim receiver, receiver or receiver and manager; and (iii) consented to the appointment of Grant Thornton Limited as a consultant to RBC.

[25] By virtue of Sections 5, 6 and 7 of the first forbearance agreement, the Hejna companies and the defendant himself: (i) acknowledged and confirmed the existence of defaults

[26] The forbearance granted by RBC under the first forbearance agreement was conditional on RBC receiving $1.5 million prior to January 31, 2007. This payment was not made and RBC entered into further negotiations with the defendant in order to negotiate a resolution to the outstanding issues in the banking relationship. As a result, a second forbearance agreement was entered into on February 15, 2007[7]. It included all of the parties to the first forbearance agreement together with certain other Hejna Group corporations controlled by the defendant. Again, included in the recitals to the second forbearance agreement is an acknowledgment that one of the defaults existing under the credit facilities and security included unpermitted excesses of approximately $6 million over agreed credit limits, resulting from uncovered liabilities arising from cheques written and issued by certain of the debtor companies on accounts maintained at RBC.

[27] The debtors defaulted under the second forbearance agreement, which led to RBC making a receivership application. Its application was granted by order of Justice Pepall dated April 20, 2007[8], by which Grant Thornton was appointed as interim receiver of all of the current and future assets of the defendant and the Hejna companies. Significantly, the defendant did not oppose the receivership application and, in fact, consented to the order of Justice Pepall.

[28] In September 2007, RBC sought and obtained written consent from the interim receiver to commence the within action. In its statement of claim RBC seeks a declaration that any judgment granted in the within action is a judgment in fraud within the meaning of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. The claim seeks judgment in the sum of $6,035,010.85 calculated as of November 22, 2006 and prejudgment interest thereafter, or alternatively as against the defendant the sum of $989,323.64 calculated as of November 22, 2006, being the quantum of an overdraft existing in his personal account, with prejudgment interest thereafter.

[29] The defendant does not deny that the above sums are owed to RBC, but denies any fraud or wrongdoing.

The Position of the Defendant

[30] The defendant's position is that first, there is a genuine issue for trial as to whether RBC authorized the transactions involved. Second, the defendant argues that there is a genuine issue as to whether the non-action of RBC, even if it did not specifically authorize the transactions, was such to raise in the defendant a bona fide, reasonable belief that RBC was aware of his transactions. Third, the defendant argues that RBC breached the forbearance agreements by taking steps that destroyed his credit rating and prevented him from obtaining new refinancing that would have allowed him to pay his debt with RBC. Fourth, the defendant argues that RBC has failed to act in a commercially reasonable manner in realizing on its security. Fifth, the defendant argues that RBC has failed in its duty to produce relevant documents, such that this court would be unable, on a motion for summary judgment, to have a full appreciation of the merits of the defences raised by the defendant.

Test on a Motion for Summary Judgment

[31] There are two issues to be determined on this motion:

1) Whether there is a genuine issue requiring a trial as to whether the defendant undertook conduct referred to as "cheque kiting";

2) If the answer to that question is in the negative, whether there is a genuine issue requiring a trial as to whether cheque kiting is conduct falling within s. 178 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act.

[32] The purpose of the change from "no genuine issue for trial" to "no genuine issue requiring a trial" in the test for summary judgment was to make summary judgment more readily available and to recognize that with the court's expanded forensic powers, although there may be issues appropriate for trial, these issues may not require a trial because the court has the power to weigh evidence on a motion for summary judgment. As noted in Healey v. Lakeridge Health Corp. (2010), 72 C.C.L.T. (3d) 261 (S.C.) at para. 22, aff'd (2011), 103 O.R. (3d) 401 (C.A.), "Rule 20.04(2.1) is a statutory reversal of the case law that held that a judge cannot assess credibility, weigh evidence, or find facts on a motion for summary judgment."

[33] As stated in Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Mitchell, 2010 ONSC 2227 at para. 20, the changed wording in the Rules, combined with the powers granted to the motions judge to make evidentiary determinations, necessarily permits a more meaningful review of the paper record and expressly permits the motions judge to make evidentiary determinations and credibility findings. "As a result, consistent with the new principle of proportionality in the Rules, cases or issues need not proceed to trial unless a trial is genuinely required": Cuthbert v. TD Canada Trust (2010), 88 C.P.C. (6th) 359 (S.C.) at para. 10; Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Mitchell, supra, at para. 20.

[34] To succeed on a motion for summary judgment, the moving party must establish that there is no genuine issue of material facts requiring a trial with respect to a claim or defence: Irving Ungerman Ltd. v. Galanis (1991), 4 O.R. (3d) 545 (C.A.) at. pp. 549-50;

1061590 Ontario Ltd. v. Ontario Jockey Club (1995), 21 O.R. (3d) 547 (C.A.). "[T]he test for summary judgment – whether there is a genuine issue of material fact that requires a trial for its resolution as first articulated in Irving Ungerman Ltd. v. Galanis [supra] - has not changed" under the new Rule 20: Cuthbert v. TD Canada Trust, supra, at para. 11. If the moving party establishes that there is no genuine issue requiring a trial, the respondent must then establish his claim as being one with "a real chance of success": Hercules Managements Ltd. v. Ernst & Young, [1997] 2 S.C.R. 165 at para.15.

[35] The court must take a hard look at the evidence on a motion for summary judgment to determine whether there is, or is not, a genuine issue for trial, and may freely canvass the facts and law in doing so. The moving party bears the onus of establishing that there is no triable issue; however, the responding party on a motion for summary judgment must "lead trump or risk losing": 1061590 Ontario Ltd. v. Ontario Jockey Club, supra, at p. 557. A party opposing a motion for summary judgment must show a "real chance of success" against the party seeking summary judgment: Guarantee Co. of North America v. Gordon Capital Corp., [1999] 3 S.C.R. 423 at para. 27. Although the onus is on the moving party to establish the absence of a genuine issue requiring a trial, there is an evidentiary burden on the responding party, who may not rest on the allegations or denials in the party's pleadings, but must present by way of affidavit, or other evidence, specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial: Cuthbert v. TD Canada Trust, supra, at para. 12.

[36] As stated in Dawson v. Rexcraft Storage and Warehouse Inc. (1998), 164 D.L.R. (4th) 257 (Ont. C.A.) at para. 17, "The motions judge is entitled to assume that the record contains all the evidence which the parties will present if there is a trial." It is not sufficient for the responding party to say that more and better evidence will or possibly may be available at trial. The respondent must set out specific facts and coherent evidence organized to show that there is a genuine issue requiring a trial: Pizza Pizza Ltd. v. Gillespie (1990), 75 O.R. (2d) 225 (Gen. Div.) at p. 238; Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Mitchell, supra, at para. 18.

[37] Even with the change to Rule 20, however, it is to be remembered that the purpose of Rule 20 is not to deny the parties due process. As stated in Dawson v. Rexcraft Storage and Warehouse Inc., supra, at para. 29, "[i]t is not intended to deprive plaintiffs and defendants of their day in court absent demonstrated compliance with its requirements. . . [I]ts purpose is to weed out cases at the pre-trial stage when it can be demonstrated clearly that a trial is unnecessary". This principle has been reiterated in the now leading case under Rule 20.04, Combined Air Mechanical Services Inc. v. Flesch, 2011 ONCA 764 ("Combined Air"), where at para. 38 the Court of Appeal emphasized that the purpose of the new rule is to eliminate unnecessary trials, not to eliminate all trials, and that the guiding consideration is whether the summary judgment process will provide an appropriate means for effecting a fair and just resolution of the dispute before the court.

[38] Combined Air has of course articulated the "full appreciation test" as being that which the motions judge must apply to determine whether or not a trial is required in the interests of justice. The motions judge must ask the question: can the full appreciation of the evidence and issues that is required to make dispositive findings be achieved by way of summary judgment, or can this full appreciation only be achieved by way of a trial?

[39] The defendant relies on Combined Air for the direction found at para. 51 of that judgment, which is that, in a case that calls for multiple findings of fact on the basis of conflicting evidence emanating from a number of witnesses and found in a voluminous record, a summary judgment motion generally cannot serve as an adequate substitute for the trial process. In those cases, as the defendant argues here, the motion judge simply cannot achieve the full appreciation of the evidence and issues that is required to make dispositive findings. In such cases, the full appreciation test is not met and the interest of justice requires a trial.

[40] At para. 54 of Combined Air, the court directs the motions judge to assess whether the attributes of the trial process are necessary to enable him or her to fully appreciate the evidence and the issues. Unless full appreciation of the evidence and issues is attainable on the motion record, the judge cannot be satisfied that the issues are appropriately resolved on a motion for summary judgment. The defendant argues that it is impossible for this court to come to a full appreciation of the evidence in this case because of a lack of documentary disclosure on the part of RBC, a matter which will be discussed further below.

Analysis

[41] The statement of defence filed in this proceeding does not raise the same defences argued by the defendant on this motion. Further, at his cross-examination on December 16, 2008, the defendant's counsel admitted that the only defence being raised is that the circular flow of funds was authorized by RBC, or alternatively, that RBC acquiesced in the conduct[9]. Nevertheless, I will deal with each of them for the purpose of completeness.

RBC authorized the overdrafts

[42] As he presents throughout his evidence, the defendant's primary defence is that RBC authorized the overdrafts. The allegations outlined in the statement of defence largely follow the evidence set out above: RBC promised to finance but did not do so in a timely manner, the account activity was a form of interim or bridge financing expressly or impliedly authorized by RBC through its authorized agents while RBC finalized its due diligence process, that the plaintiff was fully aware of the activities now being alleged against the defendant as cheque kiting, and the defendant at no time had formed an intent to either breach any of the lending facilities or undertake any wrongful or fraudulent activities as alleged.

[9] Transcript of the cross-examination of Roland Hejna on December 16, 2008, page 110.

[43] Throughout the defendant's affidavits is the assertion that RBC promised financing for the marina acquisitions. However, the defendant has not provided evidence as to the amount of the loans that he applied for in respect of each of the marinas. During the argument of the motion his counsel was unable to provide evidence of either the applications or the amounts. This topic was explored on the defendant's cross-examination in respect of the alleged promised financing for the second two marinas. He could not remember the dates that he applied for financing[10]. He was unable to produce a document whereby RBC committed itself to provide financing for a specific amount, although he believed that there were e-mails in existence. This theme repeats itself throughout the defendant's evidence; he states that he has been hindered from properly defending himself both because his computer had been seized when the receiver was appointed, and allegedly misplaced, and because RBC has allegedly withheld e-mails and other various documents that are relevant to the case. Both of these concerns are dealt with later in these Reasons. It was further admitted that he did not sue RBC for failure to provide financing, nor did he defend the receivership proceeding on the ground that he suffered damages due to the failure of RBC to provide financing as is now claimed[11].

[44] The second aspect of this particular defence is that Wendy Sprung or other employees of RBC expressly or impliedly authorized the very account activity that was undertaken by the defendant and his companies. As indicated earlier, such an allegation is denied by Ms. Sprung specifically. On his cross-examination the defendant admitted that what he was relying upon for his assertion that Ms. Sprung encouraged him to make inter-company deposits to obtain funding was a series of undocumented verbal discussions over the telephone on no fixed dates. He could not indicate exactly the words used by Ms. Sprung, and he admitted that he did not tell her that a circular pattern of cheques would be used. He had no specifics to give concerning his claim of authorization to cheque kiting[12]. The defendant recited one incident where Ms. Sprung advised him that he must keep the cheques that were deposited to the ATM machines below $100,000 each, otherwise there would be an automatic hold triggered. When asked whether he ever told Ms. Sprung that he was writing cheques from accounts that had no money, or writing cheques from one company to another to another all on the same day, his response was "they knew all my companies"[13]. The defendant has admitted that the unauthorized overdrafts were created by him writing and depositing inter-company cheques all on the same day in a circular fashion[14].

[45] As earlier indicated in the evidence review, the defendant and his companies were intermittently given authorized loan facilities with RBC of approximately $10 million between June 2005 and August 2006[15]. As alleged in the defendant's affidavit of September 18, 2008, Ms. Sprung told him that he should cover any shortfalls created by the financing delay by the use of existing RBC banking and credit facilities. This would infer that RBC would permit the defendant to use the authorized funds not for the purpose of the entities for which the loan facilities were established, but rather for the new companies and in particular the new marinas. Not only is this highly unbelievable given the risk assessments and due diligence that any lending institution would undertake for a new corporate entity, particularly given the defendant's own evidence that marina financing can be problematic, but Ms. Sprung's evidence confirms that the limits of the authorized lending facilities were beyond her limits of authorization. Furthermore, the fact that the defendant has obtained from RBC over $6 million beyond that authorized is directly contradictory to him accessing "existing RBC banking and credit facilities".

[46] The defendant's evidence is also that he understood Ms. Sprung to be aware that the inter-account and inter-company deposits would result in overdrafts to existing accounts due to lack of existing funds. However, until the date when restrictions were placed on the defendant's ATM banking, there were no overdrafts in any of the accounts due to the practice of the continual circular flow of funds. It was only after the forensic audit had begun that the excesses became apparent. As Ms. Sprung's cross-examination evidence confirms, the daily reports received by her would only notify her of an occasional overdraft, which she immediately addressed with the defendant or his controller because she was aware that overdrafts were not allowed.

[47] In his affidavit of January 22, 2008 the defendant deposed that Ms. Sprung specifically authorized additional credit facilities by way of overdrafts. If this had occurred, there would be no reason for the circular cheque activity to have continued, as authorization would have been given for fresh or enlarged credit facilities without the requirement of a circular flow of funds. Further, the defendant has no specifics about how much of an overdraft his companies were granted by Ms. Sprung. His evidence on this point was:[16]

> Q: How much was the overdraft facility to be sir, a million, two million, a hundred thousand, what was it to be?
> A: Whatever it needed because it was only temporary.
> Q: No upper limit?
> A: Only she knew what's the amount.
> Q: I'm asking you, sir, this is your affidavit. I am asking you how much was the overdraft to be?
> A: I think with everything together it was somewhere around $6 million.

[48] The court finds this to be a rather convenient number apparently pulled from the air by the defendant during his cross-examination, given that the overdraft in all the accounts came to that total after the restrictions were placed on the defendant's accounts on November 16, 2006. However, as Schedule 1 to Exhibit 2 of the Dickson affidavit shows, the account activity in November, halfway through the month, was already well on its way to exceeding the previous month's activity. In the month of October, 2006, $80 million in deposits and withdrawals occurred in the defendant's personal and Hejna Group accounts. By November 16, 2006, deposits and withdrawals had already risen to close to $60 million. In other words, if the unspecified overdraft was authorized to be "around $6 million", the defendant was operating without regard to such limit in November 2006. And as noted in the Dickson affidavit, activity was escalating during months when there would have been a lull in the seasonal operation of most of these businesses.

[16] Transcript of the cross-examination of Roland Hejna on December 16, 2008, page 90

[49] The defendant also deposed that he borrowed money from friends and family in order to close the first marina purchase in March 2006. Presumably he did not need any additional funding prior to this, given that RBC had granted various loan facilities beginning in June 2005. Yet as explained in the Dickson affidavit, the circular deposit and withdrawal cycle began even before January 2006, although RBC has only analyzed those transactions occurring in the year 2006. The transactions that amount to cheque kiting also occurred in January and February 2006, even prior to the purchase of the first marina.

[50] Finally, completely unexplained in the evidence is how close to $1 million came to land in the defendant's personal account, when his defence is that his course of action was undertaken to fund the acquisition and operation of his business enterprises. Also unexplained is why close to $90 million in transactions occurred in his personal account during the time in question, from transactions undertaken with other RBC accounts as well as other financial institutions and transactions with external parties.

[51] The defendant asserts that Ms. Sprung was desperate to keep his accounts with RBC and essentially strung him along to keep his business, pacifying him as necessary in order to ensure that he did not obtain financing from another institution. He relies on an e-mail between Ms. Sprung and Vic Brownjohn, a senior risk manager, dated January 11, 2006[17]. In that e-mail Ms. Sprung was conveying that she was desperately trying to minimize adverse client impact created by a delay in providing the defendant with a verbal response from RBC before he left for a boat show. I disagree with the defendant's characterization of this document. First, as is clear from the Chang affidavit, this e-mail falls within the period in which RBC was extending credit facilities to the defendant and the Hejna Group which eventually reached approximately $10 million. This memo could have related to any one of those loan facilities and indicated no association to the acquisition of the marinas. At least one of the businesses in which the defendant was involved was the purchase of boats. Clearly the defendant and his companies would have been an important client to RBC and, as this memo shows, Ms. Sprung was conscientious in terms of attempting to provide him with good service. However, it is a significant leap of logic to use this premise as the basis for proof of the proposition that Ms. Sprung would permit and encourage the type of activity carried on by the defendant.

[17] Brief of Productions, tab 22

2013 ONSC 1719 (CanLII)

[52] The defendant also put before the court several Business Banking Transaction Requests relating to one or two of the companies comprising the Hejna Group[18]. The defendant has not cross-examined any representative of RBC other than Ms. Sprung and therefore these documents can be given no weight, as their significance was not explained in the defendant's material. However, as set out above, the Chang affidavit indicates that there were ongoing financing arrangements being made between RBC and the defendant, to which these documents obviously relate. Beyond that the court is not able to draw any conclusions that would assist the defendant.

[53] The same issue is raised by an e-mail of October 4, 2006 and an activity log printout from October 5, 2006 which refers to a hold being placed on one of the defendant's transactions that was completed through an ABM, resulting in his card being "hot carded" and the account designated as deposit only[19]. It appears from the document that the Fraud Detection Group was contacted, whereupon the hot card status and deposit only message were removed. Discussions were to take place with Fraud Detection to understand why the client was "hot carded" without consultation with the Account Management team. Again, in the absence of cross-examination this document can be given little weight. However, given that it was in the following month that investigation began into the unusual activity in the defendant's accounts, this communication is in no way an indicator that RBC was attempting to curry favour with the defendant by turning a blind eye to atypical transactions. Further, the author of the e-mail, who is a senior account manager, commercial banking, states "looks as though I will have an o/d situation again". The defendant points to that statement as evidence that RBC was aware of and acquiesced to the overdraft. However, as previously indicated, in the memo from Wendy Sprung dated August 29, 2006, she clearly communicated that the overdraft situation could not being tolerated[20]. She wrote:

> Roland the situation below, and the one you relayed to me in your message of this morning needs to be addressed with your staff at the various locations who are responsible for controlling the release of cheques. They need to understand that this practice of releasing cheques without available funds to cover needs to stop. As Mr. Dodd found out, if you release a cheque and haven't made sure that sufficient funds are on deposit to cover it when the cheque is released (not when the cheque is presented for payment) there is a risk that we won't pay it because of insufficient funds. We've also notice this with CFT on several occasions when we've been asked to send wire payments when there was no money to cover. We've allowed it in the past, assuming that it was just an oversight. However, this is now a regular occurrence so it appears > that there is a bit of inattention on the part of whoever is responsible for this company's account.

> This also seems to be the case with several of the other companies as well. This morning on my excess report not only is New Ark overdrawn, so is Proline, Boatmax & Cdn Fishing Tour. Over the past several days Mobile and Balsam have also appeared. Roland we need to talk about this because this is happening too often, and in some cases for several days in a row. There are risks for you if this continues, so we need to find a way to significantly reduce the frequency.

[54] It was suggested that this memo is proof of RBC's knowledge of his account activity, and he was entitled to rely on that knowledge to continue in the same vein. It was submitted that this court should accept that there is an air of reality to his belief. To the contrary; it is inconceivable that what is referred to in this memo as accounts being "overdrawn" is the equivalent to RBC having knowledge that the defendant had created an unauthorized overdraft in his various accounts of collectively over $6 million. If RBC had this type of concern in August 2006 with overdrawn accounts, suffice it to say that it would be exponentially alarmed upon learning that the defendant and his companies had accessed over $6 million through the method that he employed. The defendant's defence boils down to this: they failed to catch me, and therefore my conduct should be excused.

[55] In addition to the gross weaknesses in the defendant's evidence outlined above, the defendant's primary problem with advancing such a defence is the wording of the forbearance agreements, which contain clear admissions that the overdrafts were unpermitted excesses over agreed credit limits. This wording is in direct contradiction to the position taken by the defendant in this action. The defendant signed both of these agreements with the assistance of legal counsel.

[56] The defendant has attempted, without pleading such, to place the negotiations surrounding these agreements into question. At the cross-examination on his affidavit sworn September 18, 2008, the defendant's evidence was that he did not want to sign the first forbearance agreement due to the specific wording of "unpermitted excesses" but was talked into it by a "representative for the Bank", Mr. Jaffer. Mr. Jaffer is actually an employee of the court-appointed interim receiver. He also testified that he signed it because he felt that he had no other choice.[21] This is not a matter raised either in his statement of defence or the affidavit of September 18, 2008. The defendant has never attempted to secure the evidence of Mr. Jaffer on this point. Further, counsel for RBC requested an undertaking for production of the Himelfarb Proszanski file to support the allegation that the defendant's counsel had communication with RBC relating to the use of the words "unpermitted excesses", and any advice rendered to the defendant with respect to those words. The defendant's counsel refused such production, and that refusal was maintained to the date of argument of this motion. In his affidavit of documents sworn February 16, 2011 the defendant does not list any communication or documents generated by the Himmelfarb Prozanski firm as being relevant to this action.

[21] Transcript of the cross-examination of Roland Hejna on December 16, 2008, page 10 to 17

[57] With respect to the second forbearance agreement, the defendant's cross-examination evidence is again that, although represented by the Himmelfarb Prozanski firm, he was blackmailed into signing the agreement.[22] Again he has no documents or other evidence to support this bald allegation.

[58] If the defendant seriously believed that he signed the forbearance agreements under duress, while disagreeing with wording documenting that the overdrafts were created by the writing of cheques beyond the approved credit facilities, such an allegation would be central to his defence and would not have been raised for the first time at a cross-examination in December 2008, over a year after this action was commenced.

[59] As earlier indicated, the defendant did not file any material in the receivership application to dispute the order sought. This was the case even though he was in possession of the Chang affidavit, which fully set out the allegations being made against him. At paragraph 48 of the Chang affidavit, the evidence before Justice Pepall was that "by constantly making daily large transfers by cheque and other instruments, the unauthorized overdraft was successfully shielded from detection by the Bank until mid-November 2006". Given that it is the defendant's central argument that RBC had knowledge of, encouraged and/or acquiesced to these daily transfers, it makes little sense, nor is it explained in his evidence, why he did not provide the court with his version of events at the time of the receivership application. Instead, he consented to the order made.

[60] Also of significance is that the defendant has not documented that he ever objected to the content of any of the reports filed by the receiver, which refer to an "unauthorized overdraft" of approximately $6 million that was included in the defendant's indebtedness to RBC. The defendant admits that he received these reports. In its eleventh report dated November 28, 2008, the receiver wrote at page 6 that it was only after RBC's examination of the defendant on July 17, 2008 that the receiver learned that the defendant had brought a motion to set aside the judgment on the basis that the overdrafts had been approved by RBC. The receiver wrote: "Roland Hejna had not previously advised the Interim Receiver that in his view the overdrafts had been authorized by RBC". And although the receiver granted leave to RBC to sue the defendant in fraud based upon cheque kiting, he has never complained to the receiver that such leave should not have been granted, due to no cheque kiting or fraud having been committed.

[61] In his affidavit sworn October 22, 2010 the defendant deposed that he has consulted approximately half a dozen financial consultants and three bankers since 2007, all of whom confirmed to him that it is impossible to deposit an average of 20 to 30 cheques a day, totalling millions of dollars per day, and to subsequently withdraw those amounts regularly, without RBC's knowledge and consent. He states that it is simply untenable for RBC and its representatives to assert under oath that a period of six months elapsed, during which cheques totalling about $300 million were cashed without RBC's knowledge, when these deposits were about 40 times larger than his companies' normal revenue. He stated in that affidavit that he had no doubt that a banking expert would confirm this assertion. However, the defendant filed no such evidence by way of expert's report or otherwise for use on this motion, despite the time lapse of approximately 5 years. Further, the defendant has failed to show that Wendy Sprung or any account manager would have seen $80 million going through his account in one month, or $300 million in six months, despite his attempts to gain such an admission during her cross-examination.

[62] Although the evidence of Ms. Sprung discloses that she had communication with both the defendant and his controller throughout their business relationship, the complete absence of any reference to this controller in the defendant's affidavits, or evidence from this individual, permits me to draw the inference that his or her evidence would not assist the defendant on this motion or at trial in terms of supporting the allegation that the defendant's belief was bona fide and reasonable.

[63] As the Dickson affidavit shows, it took the forensic accounting department significant work to trace and document the account activity, and that even by June 2007 some transactions were still in the process of being traced. This contradicts the defendant's unsupported assertion that it would have been obvious to the compliance department, or someone in a management position senior to Ms. Sprung, that the defendant was building an artificial float throughout 2006.

[64] It is plain and obvious to this court that there is no need for trial processes to unfold in order for a determination to be made that RBC has successfully made out its claims with respect to cheque kiting. This primary defence of the defendant cannot be made out, a conclusion easily reached on the record before the court. This motion for summary judgment has been an extant since 2010 and the defendant has had ample and ongoing notice of the claims against him and the case to be met. Notwithstanding, he relies on evidence and raises arguments that are untenable given the overwhelming evidence presented by RBC, which I find proves that at no time prior to November 2006 was it aware of or prepared to permit the defendant to access additional funds beyond his approved credit facilities. Accordingly, I have been able to determine upon a full review of the record that this court can reach a full appreciation of the evidence and issues required to make dispositive findings by way of summary judgment, rendering a trial unnecessary with respect to this defence.

[65] I am in the same position with Mr. Hejna's evidence as Karakatsanis J. was in Cuthbert v. TD Canada Trust, supra, when she wrote at para. 42 and 44:

> I am satisfied that Cuthbert's evidence is not credible and does not raise an issue requiring a trial. Although I have not had the benefit of observing his demeanour during his testimony, courts have long > recognized that demeanour can be misleading and is but one factor in assessing credibility. Credibility is best tested against common sense, inherent consistency and consistency with contemporaneous and undisputed documents. I have numerous sworn statements – three affidavits and two cross-examinations – relating to this issue and numerous undisputed documents with which to test his evidence.

>
> In these circumstances, I am satisfied that there is a strong evidentiary basis upon which to make findings of credibility, to draw inferences and to weigh the evidence. I am satisfied that the interests of justice do not require that this issue should be resolved at trial….

2013 ONSC 1719 (CanLII)

The defendant held a bona fide, reasonable belief that RBC was aware of his transactions

[66] As the preceding section reviews the evidence and analysis relevant to this defence, it will not be repeated. For the same reasons set out above, the plaintiff has met the onus of showing that there is no need, in the interests of justice, for a trial.

RBC breached the forbearance agreements

[67] The defendant had not pled, nor has he demonstrated, that RBC breached the forbearance agreements. If RBC had done so, one would expect that his counsel would have raised such an obvious defence at the time of the receivership application. The defendant was represented by counsel at that time, and he has presented no evidence that such an issue was ever raised before now. Further, the order of Justice Pepall made in the receivership application indicates that it was made on consent. This negates any possibility that the defendant had any meritorious defence to the receivership application, or that it should be permitted to be raised at a trial.

[68] The defendant also does not put forth any evidence showing that he did not breach the forbearance agreements. His counsel suggests that RBC has failed to prove that he did. However, RBC has provided evidence through the first forbearance agreement that the Hejna Group was to repay $1,500,000 prior to January 31, 2007, but says that it did not. RBC cannot prove a negative. The defendant has not shown that such a sum was paid. With respect to the default under second forbearance agreement, RBC has provided evidence through such agreement that the Hejna Group was to repay $1,500,000 on or before April 15, 2007, a further $500,000 on or before May 30, 2007, $1 million on or before June 30, 2007, and was to repay all of the indebtedness in full to RBC prior to July 31, 2007. It is RBC's evidence that the defendant defaulted under the second forbearance agreement as well, and he has provided no evidence that the above obligations were met. Under the terms of both forbearance agreements, the forbearance period terminated immediately without notice on the occurrence of such default, after which RBC could proceed to exercise any right or remedy available to it.

[69] With respect to RBC's alleged involvement in destroying the defendant's credit rating, during argument of this motion the court asked the defendant's counsel to point to evidence showing that he had tried to obtain alternative financing through another commercial lender, or that his credit rating had been affected by RBC as he alleges, but no such evidence was proffered.

[70] Accordingly, with respect to this proposed defence the court is in a position to assess that there is no merit to the defence as advanced, and accordingly it is not in the interests of justice to require a trial on this issue.

RBC failed to act in a commercially reasonable manner

[71] With respect to the alleged failure to act in a commercially reasonable manner, the defendant again has not pled this in the statement of defence. The defendant argued that the evidence proffered by him, in the form of the letter from Irwin Jacobs, shows that he had an investor who was prepared to pay RBC in full, but that RBC refused to release information to Mr. Jacobs. The letter does not support such a contention; in no way does it suggest that Mr. Jacobs was committed to financing of this magnitude. The contents of the letter, in addition to being unhelpful to the defendant, is hearsay; no affidavit was obtained from Mr. Jacobs even though – along with additional hyperbole that one would not expect from a professional businessman – he wrote: "…Further, I am going to offer my side of the story to Roland's lawyer if he should need me as a witness in any litigation against RBC only because your letter to me was so outrageous and untruthful…Whatever else I have to say about you, RBC, Grant Thornton and/or anyone else on your side that was involved in the Roland Hejna disaster will most likely be said under sworn testimony in a court of law in Canada".

[72] Although the defendant asserts that there is not enough before the court for it to determine whether a full appreciation of this proposed defence can be reached, this is the only evidence that the defendant points to in support of his defence. He has not provided evidence showing that RBC improvidently liquidated assets, and indeed he could not, since the interim receiver was in charge of doing so.

[73] Accordingly, with respect to this proposed defence the court is in a position to assess that there is no merit to it as advanced, and accordingly it is not in the interests of justice to require a trial on this issue.

RBC has failed in its obligation to produce documents relevant to the defence

[74] The defendant alleges that RBC has not fully met its obligations pursuant to the Rules to produce all documents that are relevant to the action, and he infers that RBC has deliberately withheld documents that would assist in his defence.

[75] The initial hearing date for this motion for summary judgment was December 22, 2010, which was obtained at an assignment court on September 21, 2010. Counsel for RBC had given the defendant notice of his client's intention to bring forward a motion for summary judgment as early as February 1, 2010, with the request for a timetable for completion of all matters required prior to the motion. RBC's counsel was unable to secure agreements from the defendant that would permit the motion to proceed in an orderly fashion, necessitating the scheduling hearing on September 21, 2010. During the late afternoon of September 20, 2010, the defendant filed a voluntary assignment into bankruptcy. The motion was scheduled for December 22, provided that leave could be obtained prior to that date. Leave was obtained from the Registrar in Bankruptcy to continue with this action. On December 21, 2010 counsel for the defendant delivered a motion record returnable December 22, 2010, claiming that in order to properly defend the motion for summary judgment, production of all documents in the possession of RBC was required. The affidavit sworn by the defendant in support of that motion, as earlier indicated, stated that it was the intention of the defendant to retain a banking expert to review RBC's internal documentation to support his position.

[76] The motion for summary judgment came before McEwen J. on December 22, 2010, who ordered that it be adjourned on terms that each of the parties was to deliver an affidavit of documents by February 15, 2011. RBC's affidavit of documents was to include production of the credit file for all of the Hejna Group. Also, any additional responding material to the motion for summary judgment was to be delivered by April 30, 2011.

[77] RBC proceeded to deliver an affidavit of documents in accordance with the order, with the Schedule "A" to the Affidavit of Documents consisting of 53 pages.

[78] Thereafter, no effort was made by the defendant to review any of the documents listed by RBC in accordance with his request made in December of 2010. He also delivered no further responding affidavit material to the motion for summary judgment.

[79] On March 7, 2012, Lauwers J. fixed the hearing date for the motion for summary judgment to be July 30, 2012, peremptory upon the defendant. This date was pushed back to August 2, 2012 for reasons not explained to the court, but on that date the defendant's counsel appeared to seek an adjournment, advising the court that he was unaware of the date due to internal issues in his office, and stating that he wished to file further affidavits. As a term of the adjournment, a consent order was made by McKelvey J. that gave the defendant until August 17, 2012 to attend at Mr. Greenglass' office to inspect productions, and a further week to deliver a list of productions to be put before the court as agreed evidence together with any of the other productions requested by RBC. It was also agreed on consent that the next appearance would be peremptory for the defendant.

[80] The defendant took no steps to examine the documents as set out in McKelvey J.'s order.

[81] The defendant now argues that the record is not fully complete and therefore this court could not fully appreciate all of the issues set out above in this action until it is in a position to assess the extent of RBC's understanding and knowledge of the transactions in question.

[82] At para. 56 of Combined Air the court wrote:

> By adopting the full appreciation test, we continue to recognize the established principles regarding the evidentiary obligations on a summary judgment motion. The Supreme Court of Canada addressed this point in Lameman, at para. 11, where the court cited Sharpe J.'s reasons in Transamerica Life Insurance Co. of Canada v. Canada Life Assurance Co. (1996), 28 O.R. (3d) 423 (Gen. Div.), at p. 434, in support of the proposition that "[e]ach side must 'put its best foot forward' with respect to the existence or non-existence of material issues to be tried." This obligation continues to apply under the amended Rule 20. On a motion for summary judgment, a party is not "entitled to sit back and rely on the possibility that more favourable facts may develop at trial": Transamerica, at p. 434.

[83] This paragraph is a complete answer to this aspect of the defendant's argument. The fact that he has failed to be pro-active in placing what he considers to be crucial information before the court does not create, in this case, a lacuna in the court's ability to undertake analysis of and reach a full appreciation of the evidence. The court is entitled to deal with the record in its present state, on the assumption that no further or better evidence would be available at trial: Dawson v. Rexcraft, supra, at para. 17; Rogers Cable TV Ltd. v. 373041 Ontario Ltd. (1994), 22 O. (3d) 25 (Gen. Div.) at pp. 27-28; Cuthbert v. TD Canada Trust, supra, at para. 12. It was the defendant's obligation to ensure that all of the evidence on which he intended to rely was put before the court on this motion. That his counsel failed to take even the preliminary step of inspecting the voluminous documents listed in RBC's affidavit of documents, particularly when no explanation was given for that failure, should not prevent the court from dealing with this case is the law permits it to do.

[84] Although the defendant has asserted that he lost his personal computer and records, and was without funding, this can in no way explain his failure to at least inspect RBC's documents. At the time that the orders were made by Justices McEwen and McKelvey, and following, the defendant has been represented by counsel.

[85] I find the defendant's assertion that RBC has failed to meet its disclosure obligations to be without merit, and therefore has no impact on the conclusions reached with respect to the various defences raised by the defendant and discussed in the preceding sections.

Did the defendant engage in cheque kiting?

[86] I find that the plaintiff has met the onus of showing that there is no genuine issue requiring a trial in order for this court to reach the determination that the defendant knowingly undertook conduct referred to as cheque kiting. The evidence supports the conclusion that the defendant knowingly engaged in cheque kiting by inter-account deposits and withdrawals through a daily series of cheques. As set out in the Dickson affidavit, the defendant was also involving Hejna Group accounts maintained at BCP Bank, HSBC and other financial institutions.

[87] The practice of cheque kiting was explained in Royal Bank of Canada v. Location Bristar Idealease Inc., 2012 QCCS 211 (CanLII) at paras. 7-10 as follows:

> Essentially, the illegal practice of "cheque kiting" begins when a cheque is issued from a bank account whose balance is insufficient to cover it. To create confusion, money is recorded in more than one bank account at one moment in time. In most cases, the money is in transit or quite simply fictitious. The circulation of cheques between various accounts is jointly controlled. Here, the scheme was operated by the administrators of Bristar and JMB.
>
> Thus, cheques and registered funds are circulated from one bank to another and from one account to another, in a manner that maintains fictitious bank balances in some accounts while depositing the very same amounts in other accounts.
>
> Obviously, masterminds who undertake this type of fraud take advantage of the clearance periods that are inherent to cheque processing in the banking system.
> Cheques are circulated so quickly that an account at one banking institution is debited one day and credited the next. Over time, the false increase in bank balances varies from one bank to another, until one of the banks involved realizes that it is part of a kiting scheme and denounces the fraud…

[88] This is exactly what occurred in this case, although most of the transactions occurred between RBC accounts as described in the Chang and Dickson affidavits. The defendant does not deny that the cheques were deposited and withdrawn in this fashion, in order to produce cash flow. The evidence presented by RBC leads overwhelmingly to the conclusion that the defendant engaged in cheque kiting through the circular cheque-writing activity to which he admits.

Is cheque kiting an activity that falls within s. 178 of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act?

[89] Section 178 (1) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act provides:

2013 ONSC 1719 (CanLII)

> An order of discharge does not release the bankrupt from
> ...
> (d) any debt or liability arising out of fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation or defalcation while acting in a fiduciary capacity or, in the Province of Québec, as a trustee or administrator of the property of others;
>
> (e) any debt or liability resulting from obtaining property or services by false pretences or fraudulent misrepresentation, other than a debt or liability that arises from and equity claim;

[90] RBC seeks to have the judgment declared to be a judgment in fraud in order that it will survive any discharge from bankruptcy. In this case the allegations of fraud by way of cheque kiting have been pled with particularity and have been strictly proved. As set out in McKee (Re), (1997), 47 C.B.R. (3d) 70 at paras. 34-39, the test under s. 178(1)(e) is whether the bankrupt has been deceitful. Quoting from Derry v. Peek, (1989) 14 A.C. 337 (H.L.), Master Funduk summarized the law by stating that to make out deceit, there must be proof of fraud, which is proved when it is shown that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it to be true or false. To prevent a false statement from being fraudulent, there must always be an honest belief in its truth.

[91] As set out under the Analysis section of these Reasons, this court has found that the defendant could not have held an honest belief that he was acting without intent to defraud. Any explanation given by him by way of justification for obtaining over $6 million in unauthorized credit does not stand up under any scrutiny. I find that the defendant was deceitful in advising RBC that he was undertaking transactions through the ATM machines for legitimate business activities, in transferring funds to his personal account, and in undertaking transactions in a way that created an artificial float that allowed his conduct to go undetected by RBC, and that by doing so he obtained property in the form of currency to which he was not entitled. It is telling that although he admits to owing the money to RBC, he has provided no evidence of repayment of any portion of it, or even of attempts to do so.

[92] Accordingly, I find that the judgment obtained by RBC is a civil finding of both false pretences and fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the defendant, within the meaning of s. 178(1)(e) of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. Due to that finding I will not proceed with an analysis of whether cheque kiting is a fraud that falls within the ambit of s. 178(1)(d) of that Act.

Costs

[93] At the request of the court that each party submit its Costs Outline for the motion, RBC submitted a Cost Outline at the conclusion of the argument of the motion which was dated August 2, 2012, as it was prepared in anticipation of the appearance before Justice

2013 ONSC 1719 (CanLII)

McKelvey. The Costs Outline of RBC seeks a fee claim of $17,308.34 calculated on a partial indemnity rate, and $22,986.59 calculated on a substantial indemnity rate. This Cost Outline anticipated success on the motion, and therefore claimed all costs of the action except those involving prior cost awards.

[94] Counsel for the defendant submitted a Cost Outline in which total costs of the action are also claimed, which calculates partial indemnity fees at $21,640.00 and substantial indemnity fees at $36,367.50.

[95] Having regard to the factors outlined in Rule 57.07(1), it is first noted that RBC was seeking to recover a judgment of over $6 million plus interest, and was successful in doing so. The costs sought by RBC are at least commensurate with the value of its lawsuit, if not less than.

[96] In terms of complexity, the result sought by RBC is not one that should ever be made lightly and without sufficient evidence. In order to meet its evidentiary burden, considerable work was undertaken to secure the appropriate affidavits, cross-examine the defendant, prepare three volumes of a motion record and three supplementary motion records, a factum and supplementary factum and books of authorities. Additional work was necessitated by the fact that the defendant sought and obtained two adjournments of previous dates for the argument of the motion. The filing by RBC's counsel of additional material helpfully updated the court on matters transpiring between adjournments. While RBC was put to these costs, the defendant did nothing to take advantage of the additional time provided to him by these adjournments to improve upon the case presented to the court.

[97] The hearing was of vital importance to both sides due to the potential result. The material filed by RBC demonstrated that its counsel put significant effort into thoroughly preparing for this hearing, reflected in the helpful oral argument of counsel at the hearing.

[98] Turning to Rule 57.01(1)(0.a), the partial indemnity rates set out in the Costs Outline of RBC are within the Practice Direction established by the Costs Subcommittee of the Civil Rules Committee. It is noted in that Practice Direction that these are, normally, to be maximum rates when fixing partial indemnity costs. However, beyond that, the Rules require only that partial indemnity costs be awarded in accordance with Part I of Tariff A. It mandates that counsel fees be determined in accordance with s. 131 of the Courts of Justice Act and the factors set out in Rule 57.01(1). Wide discretion in fixing costs therefore remains with the court, bearing in mind the principles enunciated in the leading Ontario cases such as Anderson v. St. Jude Medical Inc. (2006), 264 D.L.R. (4th) 557 (Ont. Div. Ct.), Boucher v. Public Accountants Council for the Province of Ontario (2004), 71 O.R. (3d) 291 (C.A.), and Clarington (Municipality) v. Blue Circle Canada Inc., 2009 ONCA 722, 100 O.R. (3d) 66.

[99] However, this is a case in which fraud on the part of the defendant has been successfully made out, and therefore the court is entitled to consider that fact both under Rule 57.01(1)(g) or (i), and under the common law. The successful proof of fraud has been the basis for awards of substantial indemnity costs in our jurisprudence: Blackburn v. Midland Walwyn Capital Inc. (2005), 126 A.C.W.S. (3d) 22 (S.C.J.), aff'd 195 O.A.C. 181 (C.A.), leave to appeal refused 212 O.A.C. 397n; Reno-Depot Inc. v. Wonderland Commercial Centre Inc. (2008), 171 A.C.W.S. (3d) 477 (Ont. C.A.); Kepic v. Tecumseh Road Builders (1987), 18, C.C.E.L. 218 (Ont. C.A.); Ontex Resources Ltd. v Metalore Resources Ltd. (1990) 75 O.R. (2d) 513 (Gen. Div.); Rumble v. 853207 Ontario Ltd. (1993), 43 A.C.W.S. (3d) 716 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.). An award on this scale is granted only in rare and exceptional cases to mark the court's disapproval of either the circumstances giving rise to the cause of action, or in the proceedings, which makes such costs desirable as a form of chastisement: Mortimer v. Cameron (1994), 17 O.R. (3d) 1 (C.A.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused 114 D.L.R. (4th) vii; Stiles v. British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Board) (1989), 39 C.P.C. (2d) 74 (B.C.C.A.). In this case I have considered the magnitude of the fraud and sizeable loss to RBC, which it may never be able to recover, the length of time over which the conduct occurred, and the failure of the defendant to admit to his wrongdoing, and have determined that this is a case in which it would be appropriate to award costs on a substantial indemnity basis to deter like-minded individuals and to express the court's condemnation of the fraudulent activity.

[100] Turning to Rule 57.01(0.b), the court is required to consider the amount of costs that the defendant could reasonably have expected to pay in relation to this motion. In this case it is apparent that the defendant, through the fees sought in his own Costs Outline, was anticipating that he would pay at least as much as is being sought by RBC if it was successful on the motion.

[101] At this point in the analysis it is essential, as directed by the Court of Appeal in Boucher, to step back and consider the result produced and assess whether, in all the circumstances, the result is fair and reasonable. The first point to be made is that this action was one necessitated entirely by the conduct of the defendant, thereby putting RBC to the cost of retaining counsel to attempt to recover the monies wrongfully taken by the defendant. This action has been ongoing since 2007, and there have been a large number of interlocutory steps taken that have not been fully outlined in these Reasons. Many of these steps have involved the defendant wasting time and costs, such as failing to attend at an examination because he was experiencing jet-lag. A review of the full record reveals that the defendant's conduct lengthened the proceeding unnecessarily. Even taking into account that Mr. Greenglass has excluded from his Costs Outline those steps that have already been the subject of cost orders, despite the defendant's conduct Mr. Greenglass has spent a moderate amount of time on this file. This court is satisfied that the fees and disbursements outlined in RBC's Costs Outline on a substantial indemnity basis are fair and reasonable in all of the circumstances of this case.

[102] In addition to that, time has been spent since August 2, 2012 to again prepare for the presentation of this motion, and its argument took a full day. Mr. Greenglass did not give an indication of the time spent in this intervening period, but I am satisfied that it would have exceeded the amount of preparation shown by Mr. Klotz in his Costs Outline, given that Mr. Klotz did not prepare any further material other than a Brief of Productions prior to the hearing date. Mr. Klotz shows 9.2 hours for preparation and attendance, which will be used by the court as the measure by which to reflect the additional fees to be awarded to RBC. At the rate of $475, which is 1.5% of Mr. Greenglass' partial indemnity rate, the additional fees are $4,370 plus HST. Accordingly, the total fees to be awarded to RBC on a substantial indemnity basis are $27,924.69 inclusive of HST. To that will be added the reasonable disbursements claimed of $1,409.24 inclusive of HST, for a total cost award of $29,333.93.

[103] This court orders that a final judgment shall issue in the following terms:

Green C.J.N.L.:

[1] This appeal requires the Court to re-examine the principles applicable to joinder of third parties.

[2] The challenge on the appeal is to an application judge's decision to authorize the issuance and service of third party notices by a defendant contractor against a building designer and engineer in circumstances where the contractor was being sued by the building owner for breach of contract and negligence.

Case History

A. Relevant Pleading History

[3] The pleading history is tangled and confusing.

[4] Pakara Apartments Limited (Pakara) sued Dew Enterprises Limited (Dew) for breach of contract and negligence as a result of alleged delays and deficiencies in the construction of a septic system designed to service an apartment building being constructed for Pakara. Pakara alleged that Dew subcontracted the design of the sewage disposal system to Otto Ryan, operating as a sole proprietorship under the name "Ryan Designs." Both the proprietorship and Ryan personally were named as additional defendants.[1] The statement of claim made allegations of both negligence and (even though no privity of contract was alleged between Pakara and Ryan Designs) breach of contract against Ryan Designs.

[5] In its defence, Dew took the position that it did not subcontract the design of the sewage disposal system to Ryan Designs and that, in fact, Pakara contracted directly with Ryan Designs for the performance of this work, thereby asserting that there was privity of contract between Pakara and Ryan Designs. Dew further denied any negligence with respect to the design or the choice of designer.

[6] Ryan Designs filed a defence in which they asserted that there was no contract between them and Pakara and that their contractual relationship with Dew was limited to providing drafting, not design, services. They then issued a third party claim against Dew claiming "indemnity and contribution" for damages for which they might be held liable to Pakara assuming (but not conceding) that there was a contract between them and Pakara as alleged by Dew. They took this position because they claimed that the drafting (but not the design) of the drawings was done by them at the request of Dew. Dew responded by reasserting that it was merely the "intermediary" between Pakara and Ryan Designs for the purpose of assisting Pakara to engage a sewage system designer.

[7] Ryan Designs subsequently issued a further third party claim against Carl Knight, an engineer and the Second Appellant in this appeal, alleging that Knight directed them to make changes to the drawings, which were stamped and approved by Knight, and that if the drawings were deficient, the responsibility lay with Knight. They claimed that if, as alleged by Dew, there was a contract between Pakara and them for the preparation of the drawings and they were in some manner responsible to Pakara for any deficiencies, Knight should indemnify them because the drawings were changed at Knight's direction. Knight responded by denying any contractual relationship with any of the parties.

[1] Although the sole proprietorship, "Ryan Designs," and its principal, Otto Ryan, were named as separate defendants, the allegations against them are identical and their interests in the litigation are the same; indeed, they are legally one and the same entity. This was recognized by the applications judge in the order under appeal when he ordered that that they be "merged as one party in the style of cause." Thenceforward, they appear in the style of cause in the Trial Division as "Otto Ryan, Operating as Ryan Designs". In like manner, during the hearing of the appeal, all parties consented to an amendment in the same terms to the appeal style of cause. For convenience, I will refer to this party in this judgment as simply "Ryan Designs."

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

[8] Subsequently, Ryan Designs applied to be removed as defendant in the action. That would have involved the incidental discontinuance of their third party claims against Dew and Knight.

[9] By Order dated June 28, 2010, over the objection of Dew but with the consent of the other parties, Pakara's claim against Ryan Designs was discontinued, with respect to both the negligence and breach of contract claims. This Court was not told the reason for Pakara's consent to removal of Ryan Designs as a defendant. It would be improper, therefore, to speculate that Pakara concluded it had no direct claim against Ryan Designs, or perhaps had reached an undisclosed Perringer-style settlement agreement with Ryan Designs, or was animated by some other motive.

[10] As a result of the removal of Ryan Designs as a defendant, Ryan Designs' third party claims against Dew and Knight for contribution and indemnity were necessarily also discontinued. In addition, Dew was given leave to "make application" to join Ryan Designs, as well as Knight, as third parties in respect of a claim by Dew against them.

B. The Result of the Pleading History

[11] When the dust settled from this convoluted pleading history, what remained was a claim by Pakara against Dew for breach of contract and negligence. Although Ryan Designs was no longer named as a defendant, Pakara's statement of claim still alleged that Dew subcontracted the sewerage design work to Ryan Designs. The body of the statement of claim also continued – inconsistently with the removal of Ryan Designs as defendant and the absence of any allegation of a contractual relationship with them – to claim breach of contract (as well as negligence) against them. Counsel for Pakara confirmed during the appeal hearing, however, that it was his client's intention to amend the statement of claim to remove all claims and allegations of negligence and breach of contract against Ryan Designs.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

[12] For the purposes of this appeal, it will be assumed that Pakara's proposed amendments are effective, thus leaving Pakara's claim simply as one in contract or negligence against Dew on the basis that Dew subcontracted the work to Ryan Designs. Counsel for Pakara confirmed that Pakara was pursuing claims against Dew for both breach of contract and negligence.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

[13] Dew's defence continued to maintain that the contract for the provision of septic design services was between Pakara and Ryan Designs and not between Dew and Ryan Designs, as Pakara alleged. There remained, therefore, a fundamental factual disagreement between the parties as to the nature of the contractual and business relationship among Pakara, Dew and Ryan Designs and, to a lesser extent, Knight. It does not appear that any of these relationships were documented in writing.

C. The Interlocutory Application

[14] In accordance with the Order of June 28, 2010, Dew applied to bring Ryan Designs and Knight back into the litigation as third parties to a claim by Dew "to ensure that all parties having potential liability in this matter be brought in as parties before the Court so that the matter may be fully adjudicated" (paragraph 7 of the Application).

[15] The application was brought under Rule 12 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1986, which reads in pertinent part as follows:

> 12.02(1) Where a defendant claims against any person, who is a co-defendant or who is not a party to the proceeding, that the latter is or may be liable to the defendant for all or any part of the plaintiff's claim against the defendant, the defendant may, before the defendant issues a defence or appears on a hearing under an originating application, issue and serve a third party notice without the leave of the Court, and thereafter with leave.
>
>
> 12.03(2) An application for leave to issue a third party notice shall be supported by an affidavit stating

(a) the nature of the claim made by the plaintiff in the proceeding;

(b) the stage which the proceeding has reached;

(c) the nature of the claim made by the applicant and the facts upon which the third party notice is based; and

(d) the name and address of the person against whom the third party notice is to be issued and served.

[16] Dew described the basis for the application in this way:

> In essence [Dew] claims that [Ryan Designs] … and Carl Knight were the parties who designed [Pakara's] septic disposal system and were accountable directly to [Pakara]. Further, Ryan Designs, Otto Ryan and Carl Knight are the parties responsible for the preparation and certification of the design. They were also the parties responsible for any flaws, correction of errors and the timely submission of the design to [Pakara]. Therefore, [Dew] is claiming indemnity from the proposed Third Parties should any of the claims by [Pakara] against [Dew] for breach of contract and negligence be successful.
> [Application, paragraph 8; underlining added.]

[17] Ryan Designs opposed the application, as did Knight. Ryan Designs submitted that the claim was "a contract case and not one of fault or negligence". On this basis, they argued that because Dew took the position in its defence that it was not contractually obligated to Pakara to design the sewer system nor to subcontract out the work to anyone, and that the contract was between Pakara and Ryan Designs directly, Dew could not, on its pleadings, have any liability to Pakara and therefore there were no potential damages which Dew could pass on by way of indemnity to Ryan Designs. Accordingly, the stated objective of Dew to have all parties with potential liability before the court was not a justification to add a third party, because Pakara itself discontinued any direct claim against Ryan Designs.

[18] Knight, for his part, took the position that in addition to Ryan Designs' arguments (which he adopted), there was no pleaded relationship at all between Dew and him that could justify any third party claim.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

D. The Ruling under Appeal

[19] In an oral judgment, the applications judge granted the application and ordered that Ryan Designs and Knight be joined as third parties. The formal order did not state the basis upon which the third party claims could be made.

[20] The judge explained the purpose of Rule 12 as follows:

> …The purpose of rule 12 in large part is to avoid several difficulties in procedure, one of which is the multiplicity of actions…[T]he procedure…provides a substitute for multiple actions and disposes of issues that have some common thread to a transaction that's before the court, a transaction where there is a common thread between the plaintiff and the defendant and then the defendant and a third party and then further down, if necessary, by a third party against a fourth party and so on.
>
> It's also meant to avoid the possibility that there could be multiple actions with inconsistent findings in the different actions based on the same transaction or set of facts. It's also meant to try and avoid and save costs to the litigants.
>
> [Transcript, p. 46]

He then described the scope of the Rule:

> The rule, as I understand it, is divided into two parts and…the applicant…would have to either fall under the category of qualifying as…claiming a contribution or, in the alternative that he is claiming or falling under the category of an indemnity. The rule is split in two. It can be either/or that would ground the right of the applicant to proceed with the third party notice.
>
> [Transcript, pp. 46-47]

[21] Dealing with "the indemnity situation," the applications judge adopted the comments of Goodridge J. in Memorial University of Newfoundland v. Lundrigan

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

Group Ltd. (1985), 57 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 85 (Nfld. S.C.T.D.) as stating the current law:

> [15] Referring to indemnity, Lamonte J.A. mentioned the case of Wynne v. Tempest, [1897] 1 Ch. 110, and said that a right to indemnity is a right to be saved from loss. In the great majority of cases the right arises from a contract, express or implied, but it may be statutory or it may arise out of a relationship existing between the parties which make[s] it equitable that one should save the other from loss.

[22] The judge then explained his conclusion that a third party claim for indemnity existed in this case:

> In the present case, it appears to me that a relationship existed between all of the parties that are now before the court. [Pakara] was involved with [Dew] in the construction of a building. [Ryan Designs and Knight] in some manner provided a service for the completion of that building, all related to the same area. It wasn't like an electrician and a plumber. These were people who worked on the same design, the sewer disposal field or the sewer design, septic design and the things that went along with it. Each one of them played a role in that which is alleged by [Pakara] to have been performed wrong by [Dew]. They're saying they're primarily responsible. Initially, they've said the plaintiff [sic; should be the defendant, Dew?] was responsible as well as [Ryan Designs] but have come to an accommodation or have somehow discontinued that…
>
> Clearly, since 2007, when the first defence was filed…and then the third party notices went out, [Ryan Designs] and then later…Knight were all aware that there were allegations swirling that they had a contract with [Pakara] to do this work and they were responsible for this loss…
>
> I say that because that's part of…looking at something that arises out of the relationship between the parties which makes it equitable, that one should save the other from the loss. It's not just dealing with what's right or wrong in equity and not in a vacuum. In the context of this particular set of facts, as I know them to be from the pleadings that have been filed, there was a construction project in which all three parties, and the fourth party being [Dew], played a role in the provision of the same type of service to [Pakara] which [Pakara] is alleging went wrong. So there could be a multiplicity of actions and individual costs. There could be, on the same facts, the possibility of different findings in a situation where actions are not either amalgamated or if they're not, as in this case, the parties brought before the court in the form of third party action.
>
>
> … I have to weigh it on the basis that I believe Goodridge J. outlined [in Memorial University of Newfoundland v. Lundrigan Group Ltd.], that if there is a relationship > arising and existing between the parties which in equity, in fairness, could save one from loss, then that third party notice should be granted.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

E. The Third Party Notices

[23] It is apparent from the reasoning of the applications judge that the application to issue the third party notices was based on the notion that Dew had a potential claim to be indemnified by either Ryan Designs or Knight or both. However, the judge's reasons did not make it clear what the basis of the cause of action in indemnity was.

[24] The third party notice issued against Ryan Designs following the judge's order[2] alleged-contrary to what Pakara alleged in its original statement of claim-that Pakara contracted with Ryan Designs, not Dew, to design the sewage disposal system for Pakara's building, and Ryan Designs contracted with Knight to "review and place his professional stamp" on Ryan Designs' drawings. It alleges, further, that Ryan Designs and Knight "are solely responsible for the sewage system design that [Pakara] alleges was defective…" [and] that "it (Dew) has no liability for any of the delays and damages claimed by [Pakara] in relation to the sewage disposal system…". On those allegations, the third party notice claims :

> Indemnity from [Ryan Designs] with respect to any damages, costs or interest which [Dew] may be ordered to pay to [Pakara] in relation to the damages, interest or costs arising from the faulty design or approval of the septic sewage disposal system for [Pakara's] building.

[2] Dew had, in fact, purported to issue and serve third party notices on Ryan Designs and Knight following the judge's order of June 28, 2010, believing that leave to issue had been granted at that time. When it was subsequently discovered that all that had been ordered on June 28 was that Dew had leave to "make application" to issue third party notices, Dew made the application, resulting in the order under appeal. The Third Party Notices issued pursuant to the latter order used different language than in the prematurely-issued Notices to describe the claims Dew was making against Ryan and Knight. It is the claims set out in the latter Notices which must be considered when determining whether the judge ought to have allowed the third party claims to proceed, as they are the ones which will be used to define the issues on the pleadings for the purpose of proceeding with the action.

[25] The Third Party Notice issued against Knight contains similar allegations, to the effect that Ryan Designs engaged Knight to review and certify the drawings, following which Ryan Designs submitted the plans to Pakara. It further alleges that as a result of errors of Ryan Designs and Knight, the approval of the sewage disposal design by government authorities was delayed but that Pakara is claiming damages and costs against Dew for those delays that were caused by Ryan and Knight. The Notice then asserts that "in the event [Dew] is found liable for any damages to [Pakara]," Dew claims indemnity from Knight with respect to those damages.

Leave to Appeal

[26] This case involves an appeal from an interlocutory order that requires leave to appeal pursuant to rule 57.02(1)(a) of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1986. The parties were content to argue the issue of leave at the time of hearing of the appeal itself, as is permitted by rule 57.02(5)(c).

[27] I am satisfied that this case involves issues that require further consideration by this Court. The appellants have submitted that the applications judge did not apply the proper criteria for determining whether leave to issue a third party notice should be granted. As will become evident from the analysis contained later in these reasons, there is reason to doubt whether the applications judge described or applied the proper test. As well, other decisions in the Trial Division have expressed concern as to whether the practice followed in the course of joining third parties in some cases has in fact been within the scope of the rules. For example, Goodridge J. in Collavino v. Newfoundland (1985), 56 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 265 (Nfld. S.C.T.D.), commenting on the operation of the pre-1986 rules of court, observed:

> [19] There certainly have been cases heard in this Court where claims against third parties were not strictly claims for either contribution or indemnity. The prevalence of the practice does not justify it…

[28] Cases from this jurisdiction relied on by the parties in this appeal discuss the issue of joining third parties in the context of the language of the pre-1986 rules.

That language is different from the current Rule 12. Those cases cannot now be said to be controlling on the issue of joinder in the current context.

[29] There is a further reason for dealing with this interlocutory appeal at this juncture. As is evident from the foregoing discussion, the parties are mired in a morass of confusing, and in some cases inconsistent, pleadings. Each step in the process so far has compounded the number of permutations and combinations the parties have to consider and argue in the alternative whenever a further procedural step is taken. If the third party proceedings are allowed to stand at all or in their present form, it would be helpful, in my view, to attempt to define with clarity what issues are in fact at stake so that future proceedings and the resulting trial itself may operate with a clearer focus.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

[30] Accordingly, leave to appeal should be granted pursuant to rule 57.02(4)(a), (b) and (e) as well as rule 57.02(6).

The Appeal

A. Issues

[31] The parties each expressed the issues on appeal differently. The essence of the appeal, however, can be expressed in the following question:

> Did the applications judge err in his application of the applicable principles in exercising his discretion to join Ryan Designs and Carl Knight as third parties in respect of claims by Dew?

B. Standard of Appellate Review

[32] Issuance of a third party notice may be made as of right if the defendant does so before filing a defence (subject, of course, to a subsequent application by the third party to strike out the notice on the ground that no cause of action is disclosed or its issuance is otherwise improper). Thereafter, application for leave must be made to the court. Such an application involves a judicially-exercised discretion.

[33] On appeal, the court will only interfere with such a discretionary order where the judge who made it has exceeded his or her jurisdiction, has failed to apply or has misapplied an applicable principle or made a palpable and overriding error in his or her appreciation of the facts, or the failure to interfere would otherwise cause a manifest injustice: Langor v. Spurrell (1997), 157 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 301 (NFCA) at para. 33.

Analysis

A. Scope of the Authority to add Third Parties

[34] This application in front of the applications judge and the argument in this Court were presented on the basis of the applicability of Rule 12. No arguments were made on the basis of the relevant provisions of the Judicature Act, RSNL 1990, c. J-4 or the Contributory Negligence Act, RSNL 1990, c. C- 33. It is necessary, however, to consider the statutory basis of the scope of third party procedure before proceeding to the rules.

i. Statutory Jurisdiction

a. Judicature Act

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

[35] The starting point in considering the power of the court to authorize the issuance of a third party notice is the interrelation of sections 93 and 94 of the Judicature Act:

> 93. The court may grant to a defendant
>
> (a) in respect of an equitable estate or right, or other matter of equity; and
>
> (b) in respect of a legal estate, right or title claimed or asserted by that defendant,
>
> all the relief against a plaintiff or petitioner that the defendant has properly claimed and that the court might have granted in a proceeding instituted for that purpose by the same defendant against the same plaintiff or petitioner.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

[36] This section, which is not directly related to the disposition of the current appeal, provides the authority for a defendant in a proceeding to counterclaim against the plaintiff in the same proceeding instead of commencing a separate action. There is nothing in this provision that restricts the ability of a counterclaiming defendant to raise issues arising out of the subject matter of the plaintiff's initial claim. Thus, as against a plaintiff, as opposed to a subsequently-joined third party who is not also a plaintiff, a defendant can make any unrelated counterclaim (subject, of course, to the power of the court to sever such a counterclaim and order that it be tried separately, if the original claim and counterclaim cannot be conveniently tried together: Rule 40.12; Bank of Montreal v. H. O. House Ltd. (1978), 15 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 33 (NFCA)).

[37] Section 94, which is more directly relevant to the current appeal, provides:

> 94.(1) Relief
>
> (a) claimed under section 93;
>
> (b) related to or connected with the original subject matter of the proceeding; and
>
> (c) in a similar manner claimed against another person whether a party to the same proceeding or not,
>
> may be granted against a person who has been served with written notice of the claim under a rule or an order of the court, and that might have been granted against that person > if that person had been made a defendant to a proceding instituted by the defendant seeking relief under section 93 for a similar purpose.

>
> (2) A person served with a notice under subsection (1) is considered to be a party to the proceeding with the same rights in respect of that person's defence against the claim as if that person had been sued in the ordinary way by a defendant seeking relief under section 93.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

[38] Section 94 is the provision that authorizes a defendant to include in existing litigation a separate issue involving a claim by him or her against a person not then a party to that litigation, i.e. a third party claim. The right is not open-ended, however. Such a third party claim must be, as section 94(1)(b) indicates, "related to or connected with the original subject matter of the proceeding". Thus, unlike the right to counterclaim, which could involve a claim completely unrelated to the original action, a third party claim must arise out of, in the sense of being "related to or connected with", the original litigation. The classic situation where this connection exists is where a defendant seeks, by way of a claim for indemnity or contribution, to pass any liability to which he or she might be subject at the hands of the plaintiff on to another person.

[39] Other aspects of section 94 are problematic from an interpretation point of view. It will be noted that the section, by its terms, only authorizes third party proceedings where relief is being "claimed under section 93". Read literally, that would mean that a defendant wishing to claim against a third party must also be making a counterclaim against the plaintiff and it is only that relief that can also be claimed against the third party. Read this way, the section makes no sense, since the purpose of third party proceedings is usually not to make a claim against an existing plaintiff but against someone not already a party, and such a claim, e.g. a claim for indemnity or contribution, by its nature will not be the same cause of action forming the basis of the counterclaim.

[40] The answer to this conundrum is found in the legislative history of sections 93 and 94. Their genesis is found in the English Judicature Act, 1873, 36 & 37 Vict., c. 66, which essentially encompassed the essence of both sections 93 and 94 in one provision. The English provision found its way into section 13(3) of the Newfoundland Judicature Act of 1889, 52 Vict., c. 29 which under the heading "Counterclaims and third parties" provided:

(3.) The said Court and every Judge thereof, shall also have power to grant to any defendant in respect of any equitable estate or right, or other matter of equity, and also in respect of any legal estate, right, or title claimed or asserted by him, all such relief against any plaintiff or petitioner as such defendant shall have properly claimed by his pleading, and as the said Court, or any Judge thereof, might have granted in any suit instituted for that purpose by the same defendant against the same plaintiff or petitioner; and also all such relief relating to or connected with the original subject of the cause or matter, and in like manner claimed against any other person, whether already a party to the same cause or matter or not, who shall have been duly served with notice in writing of such claim pursuant to any rule of Court or any order of the Court, as might properly have been granted against such person if he had been made a defendant to a cause duly instituted by the same defendant for the like purpose; and every person served with any such notice shall thenceforth be deemed a party to such cause or matter, with the same rights in respect of his defence against such claims as if he had been duly sued in the ordinary way by such defendant.

(Italics added.)

[41] The non-italicized words correspond to the current section 93. The italicized words correspond to section 94. It will be seen that the original section was attempting to deal with two related but different issues: the assertion of counterclaims between existing parties and the assertion of third party claims against non-parties. It did not tie the scope of one jurisdiction to that of the other.

[42] This provision remained unchanged in all material respects through the statutory consolidations of 1896 (CSN 1896, c. 50, s. 13(3)), 1916 (CSN 1916, c. 83, s. 25(3)), 1952 (RSN 1952, c. 114, s. 25(3)) and 1970 (RSN 1970, c. 187, s. 21(c)). At the time of the re-enactment of the judicature provisions in 1986, however, the section was split into the two related sections that today are sections 93 and 94: Judicature Act, SN 1986, c. 42, ss. 91 and 92. It was at this point that the reference to relief claimed under what is now section 93 was inserted. This is the only substantial change in the language of the sections.

[43] When viewed from this historical perspective, it appears that, in the effort by the consolidator to divide a very long one-sentence section into two, the reference in section 94 to relief claimed under section 93 was an attempt to maintain some linguistic continuity between the two sections in accordance with the original legislative scheme. Arguably, the change in the structure of the provisions was not intended to affect the substance of the original language. The infelicitous manner in which it was done should not be allowed to effect a major substantive change to the original intent as to the scope of third party procedure. Where a statute is consolidated or re-enacted, the presumption is that the legislature did not intend to make any substantive change in the law; rather, it is treated as declaratory of the existing law. See Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes, 5th ed. (Markham, ON: Lexis Nexis, 2008), pages 653-659; Pierre-André Coté, The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada, 4th ed. (Toronto, ON: Carswell, 2011), pages 112-113; Interpretation Act, RSNL 1990, c. I-19, s. 31(2); Statutes and Subordinate Legislation Act, RSNL 1990, c. s-27, s. 5(1)(d) and (g). While the 1986 enactment was not technically undertaken as part of a general statutory consolidation and revision, the 1986 statute did involve a general consolidation and reorganization of all Supreme Court judicature provisions that had been enacted since 1970, including the previous creation of appeal and trial divisions of the Court, and, as well, provided for the merger of the District Court into the Supreme Court. In so doing, it did not appear to change substantively any of the other foundational provisions of the Court relating to its procedural jurisdiction.

[44] I am satisfied, therefore, that the insertion of the references to relief being claimed under section 93, in section 94, was not intended to attenuate substantively the scope of the previous jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to permit third party proceedings. I would read the reference to relief being claimed in section 93 as meaning simply that relief of the type ("such relief") that could be claimed in a counterclaim can also be claimed against a third party ("against any other person, whether a party to the same cause or matter or not") provided it is "relating to or connected with" the original subject of the action. Alternatively, had I not reached this conclusion, I would have been prepared, in the special circumstances of this case, to treat paragraph 94(1)(a) as being omitted from the statute completely on the ground that to retain it would produce an absurdity in that it would virtually eliminate the possibility of utilizing third party proceedings, a result that would make the procedural law in this jurisdiction completely out of step with that in every other Canadian jurisdiction. That could not have been intended by such an incidental linguistic change. Where it appears that the words chosen by the drafter of the statute lead to an absurd result or one that could not have been intended, the court is entitled to disregard them. See Sullivan, supra, pages 173-177.

[45] I conclude, therefore, that section 94 of the Judicature Act continues to confer jurisdiction on the Supreme Court to allow for independent claims to be initiated by third party procedure regardless of whether they amount to claims for indemnity or contribution, provided the claim is related to or connected with the original subject matter of the action.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

b. Contributory Negligence Act

[46] The other statutory provision that is tangentially relevant to the issues engaged here is the Contributory Negligence Act, which provides:

> 3. Where damage or loss has been caused by the fault of 2 or more persons, the court shall determine the degree in which each was at fault, and where 2 or more persons are found at fault they shall be jointly and individually liable to the person suffering damage or loss, but as between themselves, in the absence of a contract express or implied, they shall be liable to make contribution to and indemnify each other in the degree in which they are respectively found to have been at fault.
>
> 7. Where it appears that a person not a party to an action is or may be wholly or partly responsible for the damages claimed, that person may be added as a party defendant or may be made a 3rd party to the action, upon the terms that are considered just.

[47] At common law, there was no contribution between tortfeasors: Merryweather v. Nixon (1799), 8 T.R. 186; 101 E.R. 1337 (K.B.); Churchill v. Young (1981), 35 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 412 (NFCA). In other words, a concurrent tortfeasor did not acquire any rights, merely by paying the whole of the judgment, against any other tortfeasor who was partly responsible for the damage. The right to claim contribution or indemnity as between concurrent tortfeasors therefore depends solely on the Contributory Negligence Act.

[48] These provisions create a right to contribution between two or more tortfeasors who cause damage by their "fault" (section 3) and provide the procedural mechanism by which the right can be asserted and adjudicated if all tortfeasors have not been brought before the court at the suit of the plaintiff

(section 7). Section 7 allows a non-party in a tort claim to be brought in as a third party with a view to ensuring that the person so brought in will contribute to any judgment that might ultimately be made, if the third party is also found to be at fault. This procedure exists outside of the procedures set out in the Rules of Court which apply in other circumstances.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

[49] A defendant seeking to invoke the provisions of section 7 must allege in his defence that the putative third party is at least partly at fault. Alleging simply that the defendant is not responsible at all and that the putative third party is wholly responsible is not sufficient: Seabord Construction Ltd. v. Pack & Noel Ltd. & Canadian National Railway (1970), 1 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 331 (Nfld. S.C.); Churchill v. Young. There must be an issue, even if it is an alternative claim, of some kind of potential joint responsibility for the tort alleged by the plaintiff. (It may be possible to have joinder of a non-party as an additional defendant where it is alleged that that person is wholly responsible for the damage or loss claimed by the plaintiff, but it is not necessary to say any more about this in the context of the current case.)

ii. Rules

[50] Rule 12.02 (1) provides that where a defendant claims against any person "who is not a party to the proceeding" that that person is or may be liable to the defendant "for all or any part of the plaintiff's claim against the defendant", the defendant may (with or without leave, depending on the circumstances) join that person as a third party.

[51] It is to be noted that the rule is not limited in express terms to claims for indemnity or contribution from the third party. There is only a requirement that the defendant assert some sort of claim "for all or any part of the plaintiff's claim against the defendant".

[52] The wording of this provision is to be contrasted with the pre-1986 rule. Order XV, rule 43 provided in pertinent part:

> 43. Where a defendant claims to be entitled to contribution, or indemnity over against any person not a party to the action, he may, by leave of the Court or a Judge issue a notice (hereinafter called the third party notice) to that effect, stamped with the seal of the Court.

[53] Under the former rule, the only basis for asserting a third party claim was if the claim could be fitted under the rubric of a claim for indemnity or contribution. This was the ruling of Goodridge J. in Canadian Acceptance Corp. v. Victoria Insurance Co. of Canada et al. (1983), 46 Nfld & P.E.I.R. 44 (Nfld S.C.T.D.) where he wrote at paragraph 161 that "third party procedures under the rules of this court involve contribution and indemnity only", and in Collavino Inc. v. Newfoundland (1985), 56 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 265 (Nfld. S.C.T.D.) at paragraph 19 where he observed, as quoted earlier, "the prevalence of the practice [of making third party claims that were not strictly claims for either contribution of indemnity] does not justify it." See also Memorial University of Newfoundland v. Lundrigan Group Ltd. (1985), 57 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 85 (Nfld. S.C.T.D.) at paras. 6-11 and 35.

[54] A claim for indemnity is a claim that another party save the indemnity-claimant harmless against loss or damage which the indemnity-claimant has incurred or suffered or will incur or suffer at the hands of another, and to reimburse the claimant in respect of such loss or damage. The claim may arise from an express contract, by implication of law or from statute. An example of a claim to indemnity arising from implication of law is where an act is done at the request of another, the act turns out to be injurious to a third party and in consequence of doing the act the doer incurs liability to the third party (Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North Western Railway Co. (1886), 34 Ch. D. 261 (C.A.)). Other diverse examples include: (i) where an agent incurs loss while lawfully carrying out the mandate of his or her principal; (ii) where a principal suffers loss by incurring liability to a third party as a result of the wrongful actions of his or her agent or employee; (iii) where a trustee causes a co-trustee to incur costs through the trustee's negligent management of the trust; and (iv) where an obligation arises in equity from the relationship between the parties, such as between trustee and beneficiary. While the circumstances where an obligation to indemnify arises by implication of law are diverse, they are not open-ended. The obligation cannot be imposed simply by the exercise of ad hoc discretion. As noted by Goodridge J. in Collavino, at paragraphs 18-21, just because a party may have a claim for damages over against a third party does not entitle him or her to a claim in indemnity or contribution. This was the traditional English position as enunciated in Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North Western Railway Co, supra., at pages 272 and 274-275, which was cited and relied on by Goodridge J. in Collavino at paragraphs 15-16 and Lundrigan at paragraphs 18-19.

[55] A claim for contribution, on the other hand, is in one sense a claim to a partial indemnity. However, the basis of the right is different. As noted by Goodridge J. in Collavino at paragraph 18, the right to contribution is based on general principles of justice involving the equitable sharing of responsibility among persons who are jointly responsible for a claimed loss. It usually arises as between joint debtors, contractors, trustees, sureties or tortfeasors. In the case of contribution between joint tortfeasors, that type of third party claim is now governed by the Contributory Negligence Act.

[56] The application of the former rule respecting joinder of third parties therefore focused on whether a recognized category of indemnity or contribution was claimed. If not, the rule was inapplicable and the procedure was unavailable even if there was potentially a claim over against a third party for damages in negligence or under a separate contract. The question now arises whether the scope of the right to join someone as a third party is so limited under the current rule.

[57] The current rule does not, as noted, refer to the words "contribution or indemnity". It does, however, focus on circumstances where the putative third party "is or may be liable to the defendant for all or any part of the plaintiff's claim against the defendant" (emphasis added). It could be said, therefore, that the only circumstance where a person could be brought into the litigation as a third party is where the defendant is claiming to pass on to the third party all or a part of what the defendant is found liable for to the plaintiff. The traditional way in which that could be done was, of course, by way of claims for contribution or indemnity. On this analysis, the phrase "is or may be liable to the defendant for all or any part of the plaintiff's claim against the defendant" is simply another way of saying "contribution or indemnity" and the scope of the current rule has not been effectively expanded.

[58] I do not accept this interpretation. In the first place, there appears to have been a conscious change in use of language in the drafting of the rule. That is normally taken as an indication of an intention to change the law. Secondly, a more expansive interpretation is consistent with the broader language of section 94 of the Judicature Act . As noted, this section is the statutory authorization for third party procedure. It contemplates a person being joined as a third party whenever the defendant is making a claim "related to or connected with the original subject matter of the proceeding". That language extends beyond contribution or indemnity claims, inasmuch as it does not require the defendant to claim to pass on liability for the plaintiff's claim to the third party. All that would appear to be required is to show that the defendant's cause of action against the third party arises out of the same general factual and/or legal matrix of the extant issues between the plaintiff and defendant.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

[59] In England the case law recognized that the English equivalent of section 94 was broader in scope than was specifically authorized by their "contribution and indemnity" rule (which was essentially the same as Newfoundland's previous rule). However, the English Court of Appeal regarded the rules of court as limiting the application of the broader statutory language. See McCheane v. Gyles, [1901] 1 Ch. 287 (C.A.) and Wynne v. Tempest, [1897] 1 Ch. 110. In this jurisdiction, the decisions in Collavino and Lundrigans can also be said to stand implicitly for the same proposition, although there was no express reference to section 94 in those decisions.

[60] With all due respect to the early English authorities (the English rules were amended in 1929 to allow third party claims, in addition to contribution and indemnity, where the defendant claimed relief "relating to or connected with the original subject matter of the action", i.e. in substantially the same terms as the authorizing statute), I would approach the matter differently. In my view, if the statutory provision confers jurisdiction on the Court to allow third party procedure where the claim is "related to or connected with the original subject matter of the proceeding", then that is the scope of the third party jurisdiction that the Court has. The rules of court are merely the means whereby the Court purports to give guidance as to how the Court's adjudicative jurisdiction will generally be exercised. If the rules are expressed or interpreted to circumscribe more narrowly the circumstances where third party proceedings will be allowed, that would effectively involve the Court in wrongfully declining its jurisdiction. Thus, even if the rule is expressed in a manner that, if literally applied, would be tantamount to declining jurisdiction, that does not mean that the Court cannot exercise its jurisdiction in other circumstances not contemplated by the rule.

[61] Accordingly, the provisions of section 94 are controlling and should inform the interpretation and application of the current rule 12.02. The touchstone for determining whether the court should exercise its discretion to allow a third party claim should therefore be whether the third party claim is related to or connected with the original subject matter of the proceeding.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

[62] A third reason why the rule should be given a more expansive interpretation is found in case law construing similarly worded provisions in other jurisdictions. In Burry et al. v. Centennial Properties Ltd. et al. (1979), 38 N.S.R. (2d) 450 (N.S.S.C., App. D.), motion for leave to appeal to SCC refused (1979), 35 N.S.R. (2d) 630, a condominium corporation sued the developer under a homeowner's warranty for building deficiencies. The developer-defendant third partied the contractor for damages for breach of contract and negligence, claiming the deficiencies were attributable to the contractor's faulty workmanship. There was no express contract of indemnity between the developer and the contractor. The contractor argued that it could be found liable as a third party only when the third party was bound by an agreement to indemnify the defendant from liability to the plaintiff (which was not the case on the facts) and not when their claim was based merely on a contractual obligation which happened to be similar to the one under which the defendant was liable to the plaintiff. This argument was rejected.

[63] The Nova Scotia Court of Appeal held that Nova Scotia's rule 17.02, the equivalent of our rule 12.02, should be construed to allow the claim. After tracing the history of the linguistic development of the English and Nova Scotian judicature provisions and rules, Hart J.A. explained:

> [31] I am unable … to confine the rule so narrowly [i.e. to encompass only claims for indemnity and contribution]. There are no words, as in the former rule, that limit proceedings to cases of "contribution or indemnity", and, in my opinion, the wording of s. 17.02 is broad enough to cover the situations envisaged by the rule adopted in this province in 1960 [i.e. a provision similar to the revised English rule which contemplated, in addition to contribution or indemnity claims, claims for relief "related to or connected with the original subject-matter of the action"]. All the defendant must show is that the plaintiff is claiming against him something for which the third party is liable to the > defendant and it then becomes convenient to have the common issues tried at the same time unless good reason is shown by one of the parties to convince the Court that it would be unfair to have a joint trial of the two causes. The wording of our present rule encompasses not only situations in which contribution or indemnity is involved but also those other circumstances referred to in…the modern English rule.

>
> [32] The only real limitation on the use of third party proceedings is contained in the Judicature Act where the second cause of action must be "relating to or connected with the original subject of the proceeding", but once that connection is established then procedurally all common issues should be tried and disposed of at the one time.
>
>
> [35] Surely, as here, where one party undertakes an obligation to provide a housing unit to its customer "constructed in a thorough and workmanlike manner" and then contracts with another party to construct that unit in a similar manner, and it was subsequently alleged that the unit was not properly constructed, there are sufficient common issues to justify the holding of a single trial in which all parties may participate and in which the rights of all parties will be determined in accordance with the findings of the Judge.
>
> [36] The defendant would simply know that if he was liable for failure to live up to his contractual obligation to the plaintiff he could pass this obligation over to the third party, who did not agree to indemnify him, but did agree to do all the things necessary to enable him to meet his obligations to the plaintiff. This, in my opinion, is the plain meaning of the words in rule 17.02.
> (Emphasis added.)

[64] Although the conclusion reached in Burry was helped by the fact that the Nova Scotia Judicature Act had been amended in 1960, in language which tracked English amendments, to refer not only to indemnity and contribution claims but also other claims for relief "relating to or connected with the original subject-matter of the action", the reasoning in the case – to the effect that the language of Nova Scotia's rule 17.02 encompassed more than indemnity and contribution – is equally applicable to the Newfoundland rule. Furthermore, section 94 of our Judicature Act contains the same critical language as the Nova Scotia and English statutory provisions both before and after their 1960 amendment.

[65] Burry stands, at the least, for the proposition that a rule of court in the words of our rule 12.02 encompasses claims by a defendant against a third party where the defendant is seeking to recoup from the third party for losses to which the defendant is exposed as a result of a claim by the plaintiff regardless of whether, technically, the defendant's claim is for indemnity or contribution (see paragraphs 35 and 36 in Burry quoted above). In fact, the analysis and comment in paragraphs 31 and 32 reproduced above can also support an even broader interpretation which gives primacy to the statutory language rather than to the language in the rule, namely, that a claim could be made against a third party by a defendant even though he is not seeking to pass on to the third party the losses associated with the plaintiff's claim against the defendant but instead wishes to assert a completely separate cause of action that happens to arise out of the same factual matrix of the claim made by the plaintiff and the defendant and to use that claim to offset his losses associated with the plaintiff's claim against him.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

[66] It should also be noted that Hart J.A. in Burry also commented by way of obiter dicta that had a claim been made by the defendant against the third party in negligence as well as in contract, third party joinder might well have been justified on that basis as a claim of apportionment of liability, or contribution, under the Nova Scotia equivalent of our Contributory Negligence Act on the basis that both the defendant and third party owed a duty of care to the plaintiff. See paragraphs 20 and 34. Since negligence had not been pleaded against the third party, however, it was not necessary to decide that point in that case.

[67] A fourth reason to construe rule 12.02 to encompass claims additional to those of contribution and indemnity is that such a construction is more consonant with the underlying purpose of third party procedure. The purpose of the procedure is to prevent multiplicity of actions and to enable the Court to prevent the same question or claims resulting from the same factual circumstances from being tried twice with possibly different results. (See also Fitzpatrick v. A. Harvey & Co. Ltd. et al.(1986), 59 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 144 (Nfld. S.C.T.D.) at para. 147 where the additional related purposes of allowing the third party to defend the plaintiff's claim saving costs and preventing the plaintiff from enforcing a judgment against the defendant before the third party issue is determined, are mentioned at paragraph 14.) Claims against third parties arising out of the circumstances surrounding the plaintiff's claim against the defendant but not strictly involving claims for contribution and indemnity can also fall within these policy objectives. This is certainly the view expressed in Burry, when the Court concluded on the facts of that case that "there are sufficient common issues to justify the holding of a single trial in which all the parties may participate and in which the rights of all parties will be determined…" (paragraph 35).

[68] Accordingly, I conclude, contrary to the assertion in Canadian Acceptance Corp. v. Victoria Insurance Co. of Canada et al., supra to the effect that third party procedure "should not be used in 'claims over' grounded in negligence" (paragraph 161), (or, I would add, claims for damages under a separate contract that did not provide for indemnity), the current rule now allows for those types of claims to be asserted within the third party procedure contemplated by rule 12.02. This means that one does not approach the question of whether the claim is "for all or any part of the plaintiff's claim against the defendant" on the basis of whether, within the rules relating to contribution or indemnity, such liability as a matter of law can be passed on to the third party. Rather, the question is, as a practical matter, can the defendant, by asserting a separate claim arising out of the same factual circumstances and by recovering damages from the third party on the basis of the third party's involvement in those circumstances, effectively make the third party ultimately answer in whole or in part for the losses that have occurred? To the extent that Canadian Acceptance, Collavino and Lundrigan stand for the narrower proposition that third party claims are limited to contribution and indemnity, they should now be regarded as overruled.

[69] Whether third party procedure as contemplated by section 94 of the Judicature Act would also allow, outside the words of rule 12.02, a third party claim that is not "for all or any part of the plaintiff's claim against the defendant" and not dependent in any sense on liability between plaintiff and defendant (provided it still can be said to be "related to or connected with the original subject-matter of the proceeding") is not necessary to be decided in this case and is better left for another day.

B. Procedure for Making a Third Party Claim

[70] The current rules allow a defendant to issue and serve a third party notice without leave of the Court at any time before the defendant files a defence. Once a defence has been filed, however, leave of the Court must be obtained. In situations where leave is not required, therefore, it is possible that a third party notice that makes claims that do not fall within the scope of rule 12.02 may be issued. In those cases, the appropriateness of making a third party claim may nevertheless be raised on an application for directions under rule 12.06(1) or on an application to strike the notice under rule 14.24. In situations where leave to issue is required, the appropriateness of the proposed third party procedure may be dealt with on the leave application. In either situation the considerations are the same.

[71] It is common practice for a defendant who wishes to third party another person to set out in the statement of defence the factual circumstances that justify the claim. Dew has not done so here. However, subject to any irremediable prejudice that may be caused to other parties, that is not fatal to its position. There is nothing in the rules that makes it mandatory.

[72] The nature of the third party claim and "the facts upon which the third party notice is based" must, however, at the very least, be set out in the affidavit supporting the third party application: rule 12.03(2)(c). Furthermore, the facts so relied on must not be inconsistent with the facts pleaded in the defence (rule 14.10) unless they are pleaded in the alternative (rule 14.08: Montana Band v. Canada, [1991] 2 F.C. 273 (Fed. T.D.), aff'd on appeal [1993] 2 C.N.L.R. 134 (FCA)). Failing that, a party must seek leave to amend the factual substratum of the defence before proceeding with the third party application.

[73] On the third party application, the Court must address whether the nature of the claim falls within the scope of third party claims allowed by the rules (or by the Contributory Negligence Act where the claim alleges joint tortfeasors). Although the rules require that all existing parties be given notice of the application, the intended third party (unless already a party in another capacity) need not be given notice or be heard at that stage. This means that if, following service of the notice, the third party believes the procedure is not appropriate, the objection can be raised on an application for directions or for striking out. In practice, notice to the intended third party is often given and the third party appears and may be heard. In the current case, the third parties were heard on the application.

[74] In addition to determining whether the nature of the claim is within the scope of third party procedure, the Court must also consider practical questions related to whether, from a logistical and timing point of view, the third party claim can be accommodated within the contemplated litigation between the plaintiff and defendant. The granting of leave, or the determination of whether a third party claim should be set aside, is a discretionary matter. In exercising the discretion the court must be animated by considerations of justice and fairness to all parties or potential parties. Thus, if the timing of the application to join the third party may compromise a trial between the plaintiff and defendant that is imminent, the Court may exercise its discretion to refuse joinder even if the claim is such that it falls within the scope of the rule: Chain Stores Limited v. Blundon's Realty Limited et al. (1976), 17 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 327 (Nfld. S.C.T.D.).

[75] Although the third party issues substantively only involve the defendant and third party, the plaintiff nevertheless has an interest in the outcome of a third party joinder application because he or she might be adversely affected both with respect to delay of the proceedings and costs: Canadian Paraplegic Assn. (Newfoundland and Labrador) Inc. v. Sparcott Engineering Ltd. (1997), 150 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 203 (NFCA) at para. 20.

[76] Factors other than delay of the proceeding and proximity to an existing trial date that may be considered include the possibility that the inclusion of third party issues in the trial would unduly complicate the disposition of the trial (Bow Valley Husky (Bermuda) Ltd. v. Saint John Shipbuilding Ltd. (1991), 93 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 104 (Nfld. S.C.T.D.) or would "embarrass or delay the trial or [be] otherwise inconvenient" within the meaning of rule 40.13. It has also been suggested in some cases that a lack of an explanation for delay in making an application to join the third party may justify exercising the discretion to deny the application (Stanford v. Lawton's Drug Stores Ltd., 2013 NLTD(G) 161 at para 20); in most cases, however, delay in applying would not normally, in itself, result in refusal unless another party can show prejudice as a result of the joinder (Congregation of the Sisters of Mercy of Newfoundland v. Stokes Management Ltd. (2002), 217 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 153 (Nfld. S.C.T.D.) at para. 22; Churchill v. Eveleigh, 2012 NLTD(G) 39, 320 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 342 at paras. 25-27), such as substantial increased cost or interference with an existing trial date or significantly prolonging the time before the matter would get to trial.

[77] On an application to join a third party, the accompanying affidavit should not be "limited to a perfunctory recitation of the chronology of events that have occurred to date but [should encompass] a requirement that the applicant make serious efforts to provide the judge information to enable the judge to have as good an overall sense as possible of the impact of the application on the future progress of the proceeding" (Canadian Paraplegic Assn. at paragraph 20).

[78] At the end of the day, the burden is on the applicant for the issuance of the third party notice to justify its issuance.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

Considerations

A. Positions of the Appellant

[79] Ryan Designs and Knight take the position that Dew, as the applicant for the issuance of the third party notice, did not show and could not have shown any reason for joining them as a third party. They argue that the judge's expressed reasoning for ordering joinder (because a relationship existed between all parties which makes it fair and equitable that the third parties save Dew from loss) cannot form a sufficient basis of a decision to join them. It is not simply a sense of perceived fairness and equity which can provide a justification; there must, instead, be a recognized cause of action that is apparent from the pleadings. Without that, it is not enough merely allow third party proceedings solely because it might be more convenient to have all parties involved before the court.

[80] Essentially, Ryan Designs claims, citing Collavino, that Dew must show that there was a contract, either express or implied by law, between Dew and Ryan Designs whereby Ryan Designs was obligated to indemnify Dew with respect to any potential claims made by Pakara, the plaintiff, against Dew. Relying on Dew's defence, to the effect there was no sub-contract between Dew and Ryan Designs but, rather, a direct contract between Pakara and Ryan Designs, Ryan Designs submits that no possible claim for indemnity could be made out. Again relying on Collavino, Ryan says there must be an obligation to indemnify and not simply a right to claim damages over against the third party. Implicit in this argument is that rule 12.02 is limited to claims for contribution and indemnity.

[81] Ryan Designs also submits that Dew could not claim contribution from Ryan Designs on the basis that they were joint tortfeasors because "the parties in this case are not joint tortfeasors as it is a contract case" (Appellant's Factum, paragraph 8).

[82] While supporting Ryan Designs' submissions, Knight additionally submits that on the pleadings and in the affidavit supporting the application there is even a more tenuous connection between Knight and Dew and/or Pakara than there is involving Ryan Designs. The absence of a pleaded relationship of responsibility is, Knight submits, fatal to any claim by Dew that would justify being dragged in as a third party.

B. Analysis of Applications Judges' Approach

[83] The applications judge erred when he concluded that "the applicant…would have to either fall under the category of qualifying as…claiming contribution or, in the alternative that he is claiming or falling under the category of indemnity". For reasons expressed above, rule 12.02 is not limited to claims for indemnity or contribution. That said, it does not follow that the judge had an open-ended discretion to join parties based solely on a perception that it would be "equitable", based on the relationships of the parties and intended third parties, to join a person as a third party even if it might have the incidental effect of eliminating a multiplicity of actions and possible inconsistent findings.

[84] The applications judge ultimately concluded that a third party claim for indemnity existed in this case. He reached that conclusion on the basis of the quotation from Wynne v. Tempest referred to by Goodridge J. in Lundrigan to the effect that a right to indemnity "may arise out of a relationship existing between the parties which makes it equitable that one should save the other from loss." Read in context, that statement does not allow a judge, whenever he thinks it equitable, to declare a right to indemnity to exist just because there is a close relationship between or among the parties. There are established relationships where the principles of equity recognize that a person may, because of the relationship, be obligated in conscience, i.e. in equity, to indemnify another from loss. An example given by Chitty J. in Wynne was:

> Such an obligation [to indemnify] arises in equity from the relation of the parties where two trustees are liable for a breach of trust and one has applied the trust fund to his own use; in that case the trustee who has so misapplied the fund is liable to indemnify his co-trustee. (p. 113).

[85] By concluding that a right to indemnity existed on the pleaded facts without considering whether the relationship was one which was recognized in equity as imposing on the conscience of the potential third party an obligation to save the defendant from loss, the applications judge also erred.

[86] It does not follow from these conclusions of error, however, that the decision reached by the applications judge was necessarily incorrect. There may be other bases, considering the true scope of rule 12.02 or the application of the Contributory Negligence Act, on which the issuance of third party notices could be justified. It is necessary to consider the third party claims against Ryan Designs and Knight separately.

C. Third Party Claim Against Ryan Designs

[87] The starting point in determining whether a third party claim by a defendant is supported by a recognized cause of action is the initial statement of claim. That pleading identifies the nature of the claim to which the defendant is exposed and which the defendant wishes to pass on, in whole or in part, to the putative third party or for which the defendant wishes the third party to face ultimate responsibility. In this case, Pakara claims damages from Dew based on breach of contract and negligence with respect to the construction and design of the apartment septic system by engaging Ryan Designs by way of subcontract to design the system. Pakara therefore claims that Dew engaged Ryan Designs by contract to do the work at issue.

[88] The second place of focus is the defence of the defendant. This defines the position of the defendant and helps identify whether the defendant is asserting that there is a risk of liability to him or her which could be passed on to the third party or for which the defendant considers the third party is ultimately responsible in a chain of responsibility. In this case, Dew's fundamental position is that it did not agree to subcontract the impugned work to Ryan Designs but that Pakara contracted directly with Ryan. That is an assertion that Dew had nothing to do by way of contract or breach of tortious duty with respect to the septic design work. Dew's position is summarized in paragraphs 8 and 19 of its Defence as follows:

> 8. … [Dew] denies it ever had any responsibility for the subcontracting of the sewage disposal design or for ensuring the sewage disposal design was put through the proper government approval process. [Dew] states that responsibility for preparing a sewage disposal system for [Pakara's] apartment complex was the sole and exclusive responsibility of [Ryan Designs].
> 19. In summation, [Dew] denies that his work on the design of [Pakara's] apartment building was done negligently or in breach of contract with [Pakara].

The defence is a straightforward denial of any liability with a request for dismissal of the action. In essence, Dew is saying that Pakara has sued the wrong party.

[89] Viewed in isolation, this position does not justify any third party pleading. There is nothing to which, on Dew's position, it can be exposed that needs to be passed on to anyone else. Viewed against Pakara's statement of claim, however, it is obvious that there is a risk of exposure to Dew because the court might ultimately side with Pakara's version of the facts. In that scenario, Dew would face potential liability which it might wish to try to pass on.

[90] Although there is nothing in Dew's defence that pleads any position in the alternative to Dew's stated position that it has no contractual or tortious relationship with Ryan Designs, that is not, as indicated previously, fatal to Dew's position. The basis for a third party claim need not be stated in the defence. It is necessary, however, for a basis for a claim to be disclosed and asserted in the third party notice that is ultimately issued (especially where it can be issued without leave of the court) and as well in the affidavit supporting an application for leave to issue a notice: rule 12.03(2)(c).

[91] It is necessary therefore to examine Dew's third party application to see if a potential third party claim has been set up. The only assertions in Dew's Interlocutory Application, which was verified by affidavit, that are germane to the current discussion involve four points: (i) a reference to Pakara's statement of claim against Dew (paragraph 1); (ii) the assertion that Ryan Designs and Knight should be joined "to ensure that all parties having potential liability in this matter be brought in as parties before the Court so that the matter can be fully adjudicated" (paragraph 7); (iii) the assertion that Ryan Designs and Knight were "directly accountable" to Pakara and were "the parties responsible for the preparation and certification of the design" and "for any flaws and correction of errors" (paragraph 8); and (iv) a conclusory statement that "therefore" Dew claims indemnity from Ryan Designs and Knight "should any of the claims by [Pakara] against [Dew] for breach of contract and negligence be successful" (paragraph 8).

[92] Item (i) is relevant because it indicates the potential exposure of Dew to liability at the hands of Pakara, if Pakara's version of the facts is ultimately accepted, on the basis that Dew engaged Ryan Designs by virtue of a subcontract and requested them to do the septic design work. Item (ii) is irrelevant because, as noted previously, the prospect of having all involved parties before the court so that the matter can be "fully adjudicated" is not in itself a sufficient justification for joining third parties. Item (iii) does not, by itself, assist a third party claim because it is in effect a disclaimer of all responsibility; although it could be said to assert a possible tortious duty of care ("directly accountable") owed by Ryan Designs to Pakara, it does not also assert that a duty of care is owed jointly by Ryan Designs to Dew as well as Pakara. Item (iv) is an assertion of a right to indemnity as an alternative position if Pakara is successful in its claim that there was a contract between it and Dew and a corresponding subcontract between Dew and Ryan Designs.

[93] The third party notice may also be looked at to glean how the applicant conceptualizes the third party claims. Regrettably, in this case, it is of little help. The notice asserts that Dew has "no liability" for the damages claimed by Pakara and that Pakara's claims "are entirely the responsibility" of Ryan Designs and Knight. It does go on, however, and claim "indemnity" from Ryan Designs for damages, costs and interest "which [Dew] may be ordered to pay to [Pakara]", without stating the basis on which the right to indemnity is being asserted.

[94] This is very thin pleading indeed. It may well leave Dew open to being required to respond to a demand for particulars. It would have been preferable for the applications judge to have required Dew to submit particulars of its proposed third party claim before considering the application further. Nevertheless, it is enough of an indication as to the nature of the type of claim that Dew is asserting. While Dew does not state anywhere the basis on which the indemnity claim is made, it is a fair inference from a reading of Pakara's statement of claim, Dew's defence and the third party application as a whole that Dew is claiming, in the alternative to its view of the facts, that if Pakara's assertions of a contract with Dew, followed by a request by Dew, by way of subcontract with Ryan Designs, that Ryan Designs prepare the septic system design, a right of indemnity arises in the event Ryan Designs did not do the design properly. It is this assertion, which is implicit in the approach Dew has taken to this matter in the pleadings, that must be evaluated as to whether a basis for third party proceedings exists.

[95] In the first place, there is no basis for Dew to claim that it has a claim for damages over against Ryan Designs for negligence (which even though such a claim does not fall within the concept of indemnity is nevertheless covered, in principle, by the scope of rule 12.02 as discussed earlier). Dew does not plead, even in the alternative, a duty of care in tort owed by Ryan Designs to Dew nor are any particulars of negligence asserted. Furthermore, there is nothing in Pakara's statement of claim which could be said, even on Pakara's version of the facts, to allege any tortious relationship between Dew and Ryan Designs as the basis of a duty of care owed by Ryan Designs to Dew. The pleadings are completely deficient with regard to setting up such a claim.

[96] Secondly, in the circumstances, the contribution provisions of the Contributory Negligence Act do not provide a basis for a third party claim here. Those provisions depend on their being alleged, either directly or in the alternative, that the claimed loss was caused "by the fault of 2 or more persons" (section 3). It is only in such circumstances that it could be argued that one tortfeasor can claim contribution from the other for losses to which both contributed. In this case, that would mean there must be a possibility that both Dew and Ryan Designs could be held jointly responsible on the basis of a duty of care owed by each of them to Pakara. See Stanford v. Lawton's Drug Stores Ltd., 2013 NLTD(G) 161 at para. 13. No duties of care have been pleaded by Dew, even in the alternative, as owing by Dew and Ryan Designs to Pakara. Dew has supplied no pleaded facts which would go to support the scenario of fault of both Dew and Ryan Designs contributing to the loss to Pakara.

[97] While it is true that Pakara, in its yet-unamended statement of claim, alleges negligence against both Dew and Ryan Designs, thereby setting up a potential for contribution claims between Dew and Ryan Designs if Pakara's version of the facts is ultimately accepted, Pakara has since discontinued its action against Ryan Designs and has, as indicated earlier, stated its intention to amend the statement of claim to remove all allegations of negligence and breach of contract against Ryan Designs. This appeal proceeded on that basis. There is nothing arising from Pakara's pleading, therefore, that can be relied on by Dew to raise the possibility of a contribution claim against Ryan Designs (indeed, Dew based its application on indemnity alone, not contribution) without Dew amending its own pleadings and re-applying to make a third party claim on this basis.

[98] Thirdly, no express or contractual indemnity is pleaded, simply an obligation to indemnify without asserting how such obligation arises on the facts. Consequently, there is no basis for claiming an express right of indemnity.

[99] That leaves two questions: (i) whether it can be said Dew has sufficiently claimed an indemnity arising by operation of law, and (ii) whether Dew may third party Ryan Designs on the basis of a claim of breach of contract not amounting to an indemnity. While, as I have said, the pleadings leave a lot to be desired, the indemnity claim may be able to be supported on the basis of a claim by Dew, in the alternative, that if Dew is responsible to Pakara under a contract between them, and Dew in fact requested Ryan Designs to perform the design work, a right to claim indemnity from Ryan Designs arose if Ryan Designs did not perform their work adequately, thereby causing Dew to breach its contract with Pakara. While the evidence at trial might well not establish this factual scenario, it remains a possible conclusion to which the court might come.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

> [I]f A. requests B. to do a thing for him, and B. in consequence of his doing that act is subject to some liability or loss, then in consequence of the request to do the act the law implies a contract by A. to indemnify B. from the consequences of his doing it.

[101] The situation thus described is, of course, the reverse of the situation here, where the indemnity is being sought from the requested party. It does not follow in the reverse situation, however, that an implied obligation to indemnify would necessarily arise simply from the party being requested undertaking the work. In Birmingham, Fry L.J. observed at p. 276:

> When a man contracts that he will do a thing, it can hardly be taken as implying a contract as to what will arise if he does not do the thing. In the same manner with regard to tort, the right to damages for tort does not arise from any implied contract that if I do wrong I will indemnify the person wronged for the wrong I have done. It is the common law right which everyone has to damages for a wrong which has been done to him. Therefore the right to such damages is not a right to indemnity…

Something more is required before a right to indemnity can arise. The situation has to be such that from the relationship of the parties, it was understood or implied that by doing the work the requested party was undertaking that if it was done incorrectly, he or she would stand behind the work and indemnify the requestor from resulting loss. It was put this way by Bowen L.J. in Birmingham at p. 274:

> [A right to indemnity arises] by implied contract if the true inference to be drawn from the facts is that the parties intended such indemnity, even if they did not express themselves to that effect, or if there is a state of circumstances to which the law attaches a legal or equitable duty to indemnify, there being many cases in which a remedy is given on an assumed promise by a person to do what, under the circumstances, he ought to do.

[102] While it is impossible to tell at this point whether this scenario is a likely result, it cannot be discounted entirely. Even if such an implied indemnity cannot be said to have been contemplated, however, a claim by Dew against Ryan Designs for damages for breach of contract for failing to design the septic system properly clearly remains a possibility on Pakara's version of the facts and as an alternative claim by Dew. As noted previously, rule 12.02 permits a claim over for damages even if the claim does not amount to a claim for indemnity. This is recognized in Burry, where Hart J.A. commented:

> [35] Surely, as here, where one party undertakes an obligation to provide a housing unit to its customer "constructed in a thorough and workmanlike manner" and then contracts with another party to construct that unit in a similar manner, and it was subsequently alleged that the unit was not properly constructed, there are sufficient common issues to justify the holding of a single trial in which all parties may participate and in which the rights of all parties will be determined in accordance with the findings of the judge.

[103] In the current context, therefore, depending on how the evidence unfolds and what findings the trial judge makes, it is possible that Dew could have a claim against Ryan Designs to be indemnified for losses Dew faces at the hands of Pakara on the basis that, having been requested to undertake the work in a competent manner and undertaking it, Ryan Designs was implicitly undertaking that if it was not competently performed, Ryan Designs would indemnify Dew from any resulting loss. Alternatively, and perhaps more likely, Dew could have a claim against Ryan Designs for damages for breach of contract. Either of these types of claims can be the subject of third party proceedings.

[104] Of course, at this point all of this is speculative. One of the reasons for this is the high level of abstraction with which all of the claims have been made and the fundamental disagreement between Dew and Pakara as to who contracted with whom (presumably - and surprisingly - because the engagements were not reduced to writing or evidenced in writing). The result has been an absence of particulars that might better define the scope of claims being advanced, especially against third parties in the event alternative scenarios come to pass.

[105] Nevertheless, given the state of the pleadings and the possibility that a third party claim could arise for the reasons earlier expressed, it would be inappropriate not to allow the third party claim to proceed against Ryan Designs on the bases mentioned. It would be important, however, for further particulars of the claim to be provided on the alternative basis that Dew will not be able to establish its claim of lack of any responsibility. Perhaps when further discoveries are undertaken or the basis of Pakara's position otherwise becomes clearer, it will be easier to flesh out such alternative claims. This Court has the power on appeal to allow amendments to pleadings, especially where the matter has not yet proceeded to trial and the substantive issues between the parties remain to be decided: rules 15.09 and 57.23(1)(b); Kavanagh v. Newfoundland (Minister of Education), 2000

NFCA 2, 183 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 282 at paragraph 15. Dew should therefore be given leave to amend its third party claim.

[106] Finally, I would observe in passing that none of the discretionary factors that might nevertheless justify the Court in refusing leave to issue the third party notice – even if a potential third party claim was disclosed as discussed previously in paragraphs 74-77 – were not raised on the original application and hence do not need to be addressed here.

2014 NLCA 11 (CanLII)

D. Third Party Claim Against Knight

[107] Many of the foregoing comments also apply to Knight except in one important respect. There is nothing in any of the pleadings, including Pakara's statement of claim, to suggest that Knight's engagement was as a result of any request from or subcontract with Dew. Thus, the bases upon which Dew could justify third party proceedings against Ryan Designs do not apply to Knight. There is no basis therefore for allowing the third party claim in that respect to proceed. The third party notice against Knight should therefore be set aside.

Conclusion and Disposition

[108] The appeal should be allowed in part. The order of the applications judge authorizing the joinder of Carl Knight as a third party should be set aside with costs on a party and party basis being paid by Dew.

[109] The appeal against the order of the applications judge authorizing the joinder of Otto Ryan, operating as Ryan Designs should be dismissed with costs payable by Otto Ryan to Dew on a party and party basis.

[110] Counsel for Pakara Apartments Ltd. appeared at the request of the Court to clarify certain pleading and procedural matters but did not participate in the substantive issues engaged on the appeal. No costs order should be made for or against their client.

[111] Dew Enterprises Ltd. should also be granted leave to amend its third party claim against Otto Ryan to further particularize, as an alternative claim, the bases upon which its claim for indemnity is being pursued.

SAID v. BUTT.

[1919. S. 3219.]

1920
June 11, 14, 25.

Contract—Formation—Identity of contracting Party—Material Element—Sale of Theatre Ticket—Procuring Breach of Contract—Servant of contracting Party—Liability.

The plaintiff desired to be present at the first performance of a play at a theatre. He knew that, in consequence of his having made certain serious and unfounded charges against some members of the theatre staff, an application for a ticket in his own name would be refused. He therefore obtained a ticket through the agency of a friend who bought the ticket at the theatre without disclosing that it was for the plaintiff. By order of the defendant, the managing director of the theatre, the plaintiff was refused admission to the theatre on the night in question. The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendant for maliciously procuring the proprietors of the theatre to break a contract for the admission of the plaintiff to the theatre, alleged to have been made by them with the plaintiff by the sale of the ticket:—

Held, that the non-disclosure of the fact that the ticket was bought for the plaintiff prevented the sale of the ticket from constituting a contract as alleged, the identity of the plaintiff being in the circumstances a material element in the formation of the contract; and that the action therefore failed.

Semble, a servant who, acting bona fide within the scope of his authority, procures the breach of a contract between his employer and a third person, is not liable to an action of tort at the suit of that third person.

ACTION tried by McCardie J. without a jury.

The facts, material to this report, were as follows: The plaintiff was a Russian gentleman of independent means. The defendant was the chairman and managing director of the Palace Theatre, Ld. (hereinafter referred to as the company), the proprietors of the Palace Theatre, London.

In July, 1919, a light opera was produced at the Palace Theatre by the company under an agreement with the plaintiff. During the run of the opera differences arose between the plaintiff and the defendant, and the plaintiff made serious charges against the defendant and other officials of the theatre with regard to the sale of tickets for the performances of the opera. These charges were in fact without foundation, though the plaintiff believed them to be true, and they were deeply resented by the defendant and other officials of the theatre. The opera was withdrawn on October 18, and December 23 was fixed as the date of the first performance of a new play at the Palace Theatre. The plaintiff desired to be present at the performance on December 23. He twice applied to the company in his own name for a ticket, but his application was refused. The plaintiff, therefore, knowing that any application in his own name would be rejected asked a friend of his, a Mr. Pollock, to buy a ticket for him. Mr. Pollock accordingly bought, in his own name, a ticket from the company for a seat at the performance on December 23 without disclosing, and the company and its staff did not know, that the ticket was bought for the plaintiff. If they had known they would have refused to supply the ticket. The plaintiff paid Mr. Pollock for the ticket, and on the evening of December 23 the plaintiff went to the theatre in order to occupy during the performance of the new play the seat for which the ticket had been bought by Mr. Pollock. The defendant happened to see the plaintiff in the vestibule of the theatre, and he thereupon gave orders to the attendants that if the plaintiff had a ticket he was not to be allowed to occupy his seat and his money was to be returned to him. In consequence of these orders the plaintiff was refused admission to the performance, and he left the theatre. The money paid for the ticket was offered to him but he declined to take it.

The plaintiff claimed in this action damages against the defendant on the ground that he wrongfully and maliciously procured the company to break a contract made by the company with the plaintiff by selling to the plaintiff a ticket for a seat entitling him to witness the performance at the theatre on December 23.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 25. MCCARDIE J. delivered a written judgment which after stating the facts continued as follows: Upon the above facts the plaintiff claims damages against the defendant upon the ground that he wrongfully and maliciously procured the Palace Theatre, Ld., to break the contract made by selling to the plaintiff a ticket entitling him to witness the first performance of "The Whirligig" on December 23, 1919. The circumstances (so far as I have as yet narrated them) appear to be simple, but the questions of law raised by the able arguments of counsel are in many ways novel, and one at least is of great general importance. It is well to state at once one or two points with regard to theatres which seem to be well established. In the first place it is settled by Hurst v. Picture Theatres (1): (a) that the purchaser of a ticket for a seat at a theatre has a right to enter and stay and witness the whole performance provided that he behaves properly and complies with the rules of the management; and (b) that the licence granted by the sale of the ticket includes a contract not to revoke the licence arbitrarily. This was the view of Buckley and Kennedy L.JJ., and is now the law, although I confess that I recognize the weighty nature of the dissenting judgment of Phillimore L.J. based on Wood v. Leadbitter. (2) If therefore the purchaser of a ticket is physically removed without adequate reason from his seat, and turned out of the theatre, he may bring an action for assault. This is a cogent decision, and it certainly affords a large measure of protection to the purchasers of tickets (whether for reserved or unreserved seats) at theatres or the like places of entertainment. The plaintiff in Hurst's Case (1) had paid sixpence, and had received a metal check which entitled him to an unreserved seat. So, too, the purchaser of a ticket is protected if he fails to find an unoccupied seat. In that case he may leave the theatre and demand the return of his money: see Lewis v. Arnold. (3) On the other hand the theatrical proprietor is safeguarded by the rule of law (inter alia) that every contract for admission is subject to the implied condition that the person admitted shall behave properly. This rule I do not dwell upon. I need only say, however, that a member of the audience is entitled to express either his approval or his disapproval of the performance, provided he acts reasonably and with due regard also to the rights of the other members of the audience. If he abuses his privilege, then the management, upon his refusal to leave after being requested to do so, are justified in removing him from the theatre, and in using a reasonable amount of force for the purpose: see per Scrutton J. in Jay v. New Bedford Palace of Varieties. (1) The limits to the rights of approval or disapproval are incidentally referred to in Clifford v. Brandon (2) and Gregory v. Duke of Brunswick. (3)

Now in the present case there is no claim for assault, inasmuch as no assault was actually committed; nor is it suggested that there was any false imprisonment. The case against the defendant rests solely on the ground that he procured the Palace Theatre, Ld., to break its contract with the plaintiff. Before the plaintiff can succeed he must establish that there was a binding and subsisting contract between the Palace Theatre and himself on December 23: see Long v. Smithson (4), per Avory and Shearman JJ. In other words, the plaintiff must bring himself within the words of Lord Macnaghten in Quinn v. Leathem (5), who there said: "A violation of legal right committed knowingly is a cause of action, and that it is a violation of legal right to interfere with contractual relations recognised by law if there be no sufficient justification for the interference."

Mr. Hastings submitted that no valid contract existed on December 23 between the Palace Theatre, Ld., and the plaintiff. Broadly put, he contended that the Palace Theatre had never knowingly contracted with the plaintiff for the sale of a ticket for his own use, and that upon discovering that the plaintiff was in fact the purchaser of a ticket for the stalls they would be entitled to put an end to any apparent contract upon the ground that where personal considerations enter into a contract error as to the person with whom the contract is made annuls the contract. This contention rested on the case of Smith v. Wheatcroft (1), decided by Fry L.J., then Fry J. In that case the learned judge cited with approval Pothier, Traité des Obligations, s. 19, where it is said: "Whenever the consideration of the person with whom I am willing to contract enters as an element into the contract which I am willing to make, error with regard to the person destroys my consent and consequently annuls the contract. . . . . On the contrary, when the consideration of the person with whom I thought I was contracting does not enter at all into the contract, and I should have been equally willing to make the contract with any person whatever as with him with whom I thought I was contracting, the contract ought to stand." This passage was also cited with approval by Smith L.J. in the well-known case of Gordon v. Street. (2)

Before I mention the other authorities on the matter it is best to state some further facts which bear on this branch of the case. A first night at the Palace Theatre is, as with other theatres, an event of great importance. The result of a first night may make or mar a play. If the play be good, then word of its success may be spread, not only by the critics, but by the members of the audience. The nature and social position and influence of the audience are of obvious importance. First nights have become to a large extent a species of private entertainment given by the theatrical proprietors and management to their friends and acquaintances, and to influential persons, whether critics or otherwise. The boxes, stalls and dress circle are regarded as parts of the theatre which are subject to special allocation by the management. Many tickets for those parts may be given away. The remaining tickets are usually sold by favour only. A first night, therefore, is a special event, with special characteristics. As the plaintiff himself stated in evidence, the management only disposes of first night tickets for the stalls and dress circle to those whom it selects. I may add that it is scarcely likely to choose those who are antagonistic to the management; or who have attacked the character of the theatre officials. [The learned judge stated in detail the facts with regard to the ticket obtained by the plaintiff through Mr. Pollock and continued:] The Palace Theatre officials had no idea that they were selling a ticket to an agent of the plaintiff. If they had known it, they would at once have refused to supply a ticket. I find as a fact that the plaintiff used the name of Mr. Pollock in order to disguise that he himself was the purchaser; and I also find that the plaintiff well knew that the Palace Theatre would not have sold him personally a ticket for December 23, 1919. I am satisfied that Mr. Pollock himself was aware of the above-mentioned circumstances. I may point out that a theatre stands on a wholly different footing from a public inn, or a public service such as a railway. A public inn, for example, is under a common law duty to supply to all who come provided that accommodation exists; and provided also that the guest is of proper character and behaviour. But a theatre stands upon a wholly different footing. It may sell or refuse to sell tickets at its own option. The public cannot compel a theatre to grant admission.

Under these circumstances, the question is whether the plaintiff, as an undisclosed principal of Mr. Pollock, can claim that a binding contract existed between the Palace Theatre, Ld., and himself. Now, the principle stated in Pothier on Obligations (already cited) is a broad one. It should not, of course, be unduly applied; but it is one of practical utility. The matter is thus put in Fry on Specific Performance, s. 229: "The law seems now to be that where one person is deceived as to the real person with whom he is contracting, and that deception either induces the contract or renders its terms more beneficial to the deceiving party, or more onerous to the deceived, or where it occasions any other loss or inconvenience to the deceived party, there the contract cannot be enforced against him; but that where none of these circumstances can be shown to follow from the deception, the contract may be enforced." This passage seems to accord with Fellowes v. Lord Gwydyr. (1) The principle was recognized by Knight Bruce V.-C. in Nelthorpe v. Holgate (1); and the observations of that distinguished judge are most instructive. It is the basis of the decision in Boulton v. Jones. (2) It was actually applied by North J. in Archer v. Stone. (3) It is cogently illustrated by the decision of the Court of Appeal in the well-known case of Gordon v. Street (4) (already cited), the facts of which I need not state. It is not impaired but merely distinguished by the decision of Horridge J. in Phillips v. Brooks. (5) It may be usefully considered in the light of such cases as Hill v. Gray (6) and Whurr v. Devenish. (7)

(1) (1826) 1 Sim. 63.

In my opinion the defendant can rightly say, upon the special circumstances of this case, that no contract existed on December 23, 1919, upon which the plaintiff could have sued the Palace Theatre. The personal element was here strikingly present. The plaintiff knew that the Palace Theatre would not contract with him for the sale of a seat for December 23. They had expressly refused to do so. He was well aware of their reasons. I hold that by the mere device of utilizing the name and services of Mr. Pollock, the plaintiff could not constitute himself a contractor with the Palace Theatre against their knowledge, and contrary to their express refusal. He is disabled from asserting that he was the undisclosed principal of Mr. Pollock.

It follows, therefore, that the plaintiff has failed to prove that the defendant caused any breach of a contract between the Palace Theatre, Ld., and himself.

I realize, however, that the question is one of difficulty; and I, therefore, deem it right to mention the other legal points which arose in the case. One of those points is of such importance that I feel it my duty to deal with it. Let me, therefore, assume that the plaintiff had established a valid contract between the Palace Theatre, Ld., and himself, upon which he could have sued as a principal. The defendant's counsel submitted that even upon such assumption the present action must fail, because the defendant in procuring the breach of contract was acting only as the managing director of the Palace Theatre, Ld. This submission was ably and fully argued by counsel on both sides. It is well to point out that Sir Alfred Butt possessed the widest powers as the chairman and sole managing director of the Palace Theatre, Ld. He clearly acted within those powers when he directed that the plaintiff should be refused admission on December 23. I am satisfied, also, that he meant to act and did act bona fide for the protection of the interests of his company. If, therefore, the plaintiff, assuming that a contract existed between the company and himself, can sue the defendant for wrongfully procuring a breach of that contract, the gravest and widest consequences must ensue. This is the more apparent when it is remembered that it is not necessary to prove actual malice against a defendant in order to establish a cause of action against him for knowingly procuring the breach of a third person's contract with the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff suffers pecuniary damage: see Pratt v. British Medical Association (1), citing South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co. (2)

If the plaintiff is right in his contention, it seems to follow that whenever either a managing director or a board of directors, or a manager or other official of a company, causes or procures a breach by that company of its contract with a third person, each director or official will be liable to an action for damages, upon the principle of Lumley v. Gye (3), as for a tortious act. So, too, with the manager or other agent of a private firm, who does the like thing. This far-reaching result of the principle here suggested by the plaintiff is emphasized, when it is remembered that in an ordinary action for breach of contract the plaintiff recovers his pecuniary loss only; whereas in an action for wrongfully procuring a breach of contract the damages against the wrongdoer are at large, and may vastly exceed the sum recoverable in a mere claim for breach of contract against the contractor: see Pratt v. British Medical Association (1) and Exchange Telegraph Co. v. Gregory. (2).

Mr. Disturnal for the plaintiff argued with great vigour that though the results may be remarkable, yet the principle asserted by the plaintiff is sound. He points out the breadth of the language employed in the well-known cases on the subject from Lumley v. Gye (3) to the present time. I agree that the language is wide in its scope. The proposition is stated with unrestricted diction: that a person who without just cause knowingly procures a man to commit a breach of his contract with another, whereby the latter suffers pecuniary damage, is liable to an action for tort. But I conceive that none of the judges was thinking of such a case as the present. I have searched in vain for any decision which indicates that a servant is liable in tort for procuring a breach of his master's contract with another. If such a cause of action existed, I imagine that it would have been successfully asserted ere this. The explanation of the breadth of the language used in the decisions probably lies in the fact that in every one of the sets of circumstances before the Court the person who procured the breach of contract was in fact a stranger, that is a third person, who stood wholly outside the area of the bargain made between the two contracting parties. If he is in the position of a stranger, he will be prima facie liable, even though he may act honestly, or without malice, or in the best interests of himself; or even if he acts as an altruist, seeking only the good of another: see the decisions cited in Pratt's Case (4) and the Glamorgan Coal Case. (5)

But the servant who causes a breach of his master's contract with a third person seems to stand in a wholly different position. He is not a stranger. He is the alter ego of his master. His acts are in law the acts of his employer. In such a case it is the master himself, by his agent, breaking the contract he has made, and in my view an action against the agent under the Lumley v. Gye (1) principle must therefore fail, just as it would fail if brought against the master himself for wrongfully procuring a breach of his own contract. This, I think, is the true answer to the ingenious arguments of Mr. Disturnal on behalf of the plaintiff upon this point. To hold otherwise might create at least three actions whenever a managing director or other authorized agent knowingly procured a breach of the employer's contract. First, an action based on contract against the employer for the pecuniary loss caused by the breach of contract; secondly, an action for tort against the agent who had procured the breach of contract, wherein the damages would be at large and might include every element of annoyance, inconvenience, or indignity; and thirdly, an action against the employer himself for the tortious wrong committed by his authorized agent in procuring the employer to break his contract with the plaintiff. This extraordinary result shows, I think, that the contention of the plaintiff in this case cannot be sound. If the plaintiff here be right in his submission, then the flood-gates of litigation would indeed be widely opened.

I hold that if a servant acting bona fide within the scope of his authority procures or causes the breach of a contract between his employer and a third person, he does not thereby become liable to an action of tort at the suit of the person whose contract has thereby been broken. I abstain from expressing any opinion as to the law which may apply if a servant, acting as an entire stranger, or wholly outside the range of his powers, procures his master to wrongfully break a contract with a third person. Nothing that I have said to-day is, I hope, inconsistent with the rule that a director or a servant who actually takes part in or actually authorizes such torts as assault, trespass to property, nuisance, or the like may be liable in damages as a joint participant in one of such recognized heads of tortious wrong. This point was incidentally dealt with by the Court of Appeal in the recent case of Belvedere Fish Guano Co. v. Rainham Chemical Works. (1)

If I had been in favour of the plaintiff on the preceding points the question as to whether he had what is technically known as "just cause" for procuring a breach of contract would have arisen for decision. I ventured to refer to that most difficult question in Pratt's Case. (2) It was touched upon by Astbury J. in his luminous judgment in Valentine v. Hyde (3), and by P. O. Lawrence J. in his cogent observations in Davies v. Thomas (4), just affirmed by the Court of Appeal. (5) It is not necessary to deal with the point in this litigation; I need only say that it may well be that "just cause" exists in the present case. If the plaintiff had here established a cause of action I should have been called on to assess damages. Upon the whole circumstances of the matter, and in the view I form that the defendant did not act with any actual malice to the plaintiff on the night of December 23, I should have assessed those damages at the nominal sum of 40*s.* only. But for the reasons I have given, this action fails, and it must be dismissed with costs.

In the Matter of the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985 c. C-36, as amended and In the Matter of a Plan of Compromise or Arrangement of SemCanada Crude Company, SemCAMS ULC, SemCanada Energy Company, A.E. Sharp Ltd., CEG Energy Options Inc. and 1380331 Alberta ULC

(Re: Celtic Exploration Ltd.#2)

Reasons for Decision
of the
Honourable Madam Justice B.E. Romaine

Introduction

[1] Celtic Exploration Ltd. applies for relief arising from the suspension of an inlet gas purchase agreement (the "IGPA") that it had entered into with SemCAMS ULC. The IGPA was suspended in July, 2008 in connection with SemCAMS' filing for protection under the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, as amended, and was the subject of reasons for decision dated August 27, 2010, cited as 2010 ABQB 531 (the "IGPA decision"). Leave to appeal the IGPA decision was denied on December 17, 2010.

[2] Celtic seeks an order (i) permitting it to file a late amended claim for damages arising from the suspension of the IGPA for the period from July 22, 2008 (the date of the Initial Order in the CCAA proceedings) to and including November 30, 2009 when the Plan of Arrangement (the "Plan") came into effect and SemCAMS emerged from the protection of the CCAA (the "CCAA Period"), and (ii) declaring that its claims for suspension damages for the periods from December 1, 2009 to and including September 30, 2009 (the "Post Plan Implementation Period") and from October 1, 2010 onwards (the "Post October 2010 Period") are not Affected Claims compromised, barred and released by the Plan or otherwise.

[3] Alternatively, in the event that the Court finds that the suspension damages claims for the Post Plan Implementation Period and the Post October 2010 Period are subject to the claims process established under the CCAA proceedings (the "Claims Process") and are therefore Affected Claims as defined in the Plan, Celtic seeks an order permitting it to file a late amended claim for those damages.

[4] SemCAMS objects to Celtic's application and, in response, has brought an application pursuant to which it seeks an order declaring that (i) Celtic's proposed damages claim, including its claim for suspension damages arising from the CCAA Period, the Post Plan Implementation Period and the Post October 2010 Period, is subject to the Claims Process, (ii) the proposed damages claim is an Affected Claim within the meaning of the Plan that was comprised, released and barred by the Plan and the order approving and sanctioning the Plan dated October 27, 2009 (the "Sanction Order"), and (iii) Celtic is precluded from filing a late or amended claim. SemCAMS also seeks an order declaring the Statement of Claim filed by Celtic with respect to the proposed damages claim to be a breach of the Plan and the Sanction Order, and directing that it be struck out.

[5] The Bank of America (the "BA") as Agent on behalf of the Secured Lenders of SemCAMS (as defined in the Plan) supports SemCAMS' application in so far that it submits that, if the proposed damages claim by Celtic is an Affected Claim, it should be declared to be barred, extinguished and released by the Plan and Sanction Order and Celtic should not be allowed to file any late or amended claim.

Issues

[6] The main issues arising from these applications are as follows:

a) Are Celtic's claims for suspension damages for the Post Plan Implementation Period and/or the Post October 2010 Period "Affected Claims" under the CCAA proceedings, and therefore subject to the Claims Process?

b) Should Celtic be allowed to file a late amended claim for suspension damages during the CCAA Period? If Celtic's claims for suspension damages for the Post Plan Implementation Period and/or the Post October 2010 Period are "Affected Claims", should Celtic be allowed to file a late claim for these damages?

c) Should Celtic's Statement of Claim be struck out?

Analysis

a) Are Celtic's claims for suspension damages for the Post Plan Implementation Period and/or the Post October 2010 Period "Affected Claims" under the CCAA proceedings and therefore subject to the Claims Process?

2012 ABQB 489 (CanLII)

[7] As part of a Settlement Agreement dated March 18, 2011 and approved by the Court, Celtic agreed that, if its claim for suspension damages for the CCAA Period was found not to be barred by the Claims Process Order, it would not take the position that this portion of its damages claim would be other than an unsecured claim compromised by the Plan. Thus, the only issue with respect to any damages that Celtic submits it may have a claim to during the CCAA Period is whether Celtic should be allowed to amend its previously filed Proof of Claim to include damages arising from the suspension of the IGPA during this period. This issue will be discussed later in this decision.

[8] However, Celtic submits that its claims for damages arising from the suspension of the IGPA for the Post Plan Implementation Period and/or the Post October 2010 Period are not subject to compromise under the Plan.

Relevant Facts

[9] To understand the submissions that have been made on this issue, it is necessary to refer to some of the long and complicated history of this claim and the prior litigation between the parties. I described in paragraphs 3 through 53 of the IGPA decision the nature of the contractual relationship between SemCAMS and Celtic and what occurred between July 22, 2008, the date of the Initial Order under the CCAA, and February, 2010 when the application that resulted in that decision was heard, and those paragraphs are incorporated into this decision for clarity.

[10] I found in the IGPA decision that an agreement had been reached between SemCAMS and Celtic to suspend the IGPA because of SemCAMS' inability to market sales gas and related product as a result of the CCAA proceedings: para. 103. I found that parties to a contract may by mutual agreement suspend a contract even if the contract itself does not specifically provide for suspension: para. 110. Specifically, I found that Celtic purported to suspend the IGPA, given SemCAMS' anticipatory breach of its obligations to market the sales gas and products, and that SemCAMS agreed to the suspension.

[11] Celtic submits that I made a finding of fact in the IGPA decision that Celtic had exercised a right under the IGPA to suspend delivery of natural gas, and identifies that right as arising from Section 10.2 of the Gas EDI Base Contract for Sale and Purchase of Natural Gas that forms part of the IGPA. This is an out-of-context interpretation of paragraph 111 of the IGPA decision. Section 10.2 of the Gas EDI Base Contract was not in issue before me at the time of the IGPA decision, and I made no finding that the mutual agreement to suspend the contract arose from any right specifically referred to in the IGPA. At any rate, as SemCAMS notes, the precondition of notice of the intention to exercise Section 10.2 required by the contract was never given by Celtic to SemCAMS at the time of suspension. There was only an anticipatory, and not an actual, breach of the IGPA at the point of suspension. In its submissions on this point, Celtic ignores the fact that Section10.2 of the Gas EDI Base Contract only allows a short-term suspension, and not the lengthy suspension that I found the parties had agreed to. This provision has no connection or application to the finding of suspension I made in the IGPA decision.

[12] Celtic submits that it had a unilateral right to reinstate performance under the IGPA effective October 1, 2010 for various reasons. SemCAMS disagrees, but submits that whether or not Celtic had that unilateral right makes no difference to the issue of whether the damages claims for either the Post Plan Implementation Period or the Post October 2010 Period are subject to the CCAA proceedings and should have been part of the Claims Process, or whether these claims were released and discharged by the Plan and the Plan Sanction Order. I agree that, given the decisions I have reached on these issues, it is not necessary that I make any findings with respect to the merits of the reinstatement issue, other than the comments I have made with respect to the applicability of Section 10.2 of the Gas EDI Base Contract and comments made in the IGPA decision.

[13] Prior to the Claims Bar Date of December 1, 2008 set out in the Claims Process Order, Celtic filed a Proof of Claim against SemCAMS that did not include a contingent or other claim for suspension damages arising from the IGPA.

[14] SemCAMS held a meeting of its creditors to consider the Plan on October 8, 2009. It received the requisite creditor support and applied for, and was granted, the Sanction Order on October 26, 2009. Celtic voted on the Plan and was served with a copy of the Sanction Order. The Plan Implementation Date was November 30, 2009.

[15] After the application that resulted in the IGPA decision was heard, but before a decision was released, Celtic purchased an interest in the KA Plant and became a party to the CO & O Agreement with SemCAMS and the other joint owners of the KA Plant. In July, 2010, correspondence was exchanged between SemCAMS and Celtic on the issue of whether gas delivered by Celtic to the KA Plant would thenceforth be processed pursuant to the CO & O Agreement or the IGPA. Celtic advised SemCAMS on September 7, 2010 that it proposed to reinstate deliveries under the IGPA effective October 1, 2010 for all of its gas other than gas that was dedicated to the KA Plant by reason of the CO & O Agreement. On September 30, 2010, SemCAMS advised Celtic that Celtic's change in status to a joint owner of the KA Plant and a counterparty to the CO & O Agreement made it impossible to reinstate the IGPA unless it was first amended to address certain issues, including exclusion of Plant Area Gas. Further correspondence followed.

[16] On October 15, 2010, SemCAMS set out the terms of an amended IGPA that at the time SemCAMS was willing to execute. Celtic did not accept these offered terms.

[17] On February 14, 2011, Celtic advised SemCAMS that it took the position that it had unilaterally reinstated performance of the IGPA effective October 1, 2010, and that SemCAMS was therefore in breach of the agreement. The following day, it filed a Statement of Claim alleging that the granting of the Initial Order under the CCAA Proceedings was an event of default under the IGPA, and that Celtic, as the non-defaulting party, suspended performance of all transactions under the IGPA with the agreement of SemCAMS. Celtic claims damages arising from this suspension.

[18] SemCAMS advised Celtic on March 17, 2011 that, in its opinion, the IGPA could not be reinstated unilaterally, and restated its pervious position. SemCAMS also advised Celtic that, if it was found that Celtic could unilaterally reinstate the IGPA effective October 1, 2010 (which SemCAMS denied was the case), SemCAMS gave notice of termination of the IGPA effective March 31, 2013.

[19] Pursuant to the Settlement Agreement, SemCAMS and Celtic jointly instructed the Monitor to hold the amount of $900,000 of surplus funds in the SemCAMS' Ordinary Creditors Pool under the Plan as a reserve for the damages claims. The Settlement Agreement also provides that in the event the damages claims, or any portion of such claims, are determined to be Affected Claims compromised by the Plan and that such Affected Claims are not determined to be barred by the Claims Process Order, the Plan or the Plan Sanction Order, Celtic will only be entitled to a distribution from the damages reserve of the lesser of 4% of such proven damages claim and the amount in the damages reserve, if any. The Monitor is currently holding the damages reserve.

Analysis

[20] On the issue of whether the damages claims for the Post Plan Implementation Period and the Post October 2010 Period are compromised or otherwise affected by the CCAA proceedings, Celtic references Section 19 of the CCAA, the Plan itself, the Plan Sanction Order and what it refers to as the purpose of the CCAA.

[21] The relevant portions of Section 19(1) of the CCAA are as follows:

> 19.(1) Subject to subsection (2), the only claims that may be dealt with by a compromise or arrangement in respect of a debtor company are
>
> (a) claims that relate to debts or liabilities, present or future, to which the company is subject on the earlier of
>
> (i) the day on which proceedings commenced under this Act, and
>
> . . .
>
> (b) claims that relate to debts or liabilities, present or future, to which the company may become subject before the compromise or arrangement is sanctioned by reason of any obligation incurred by the company before the earlier of the days referred to in subparagraphs (a)(i) . . . [emphasis added]

2012 ABQB 489 (CanLII)

Section 19(2) does not apply in this case.

[22] As noted by SemCAMS, Section 19(1) was not proclaimed in force until September 18, 2009, which was after the Initial Order was granted, but prior to the Sanction Order. It may thus be argued that Section 19(1) does not apply to this issue, but I am satisfied that it would not make a difference to Celtic's application if former Section 12 was the applicable statutory provision, and I have conducted the analysis under Section 19.

[23] Celtic submits that Section 19(1) permits the compromise of debts and liabilities in respect of two time periods: the period up to commencement of proceedings under the CCAA and claims that relate to debts or liabilities to which the debtor may become subject before the Sanction Order in respect of obligations incurred by the debtor before the commencement of proceedings.

[24] This interpretation of Section 19(1) ignores the words "that relate to liabilities, present or future" that modify the term "claims". It is clear that SemCAMS was subject to the possibility of liability under the IGPA before the CCAA proceedings commenced. The claims for suspension damages are claims that relate to the IGPA and to the suspension of the IGPA that occurred as a result of the CCAA proceedings. Section 19(1) does not limit the claims that may be dealt with by a Plan under the CCAA to presently existing liabilities. This is made clear by the addition of the word "future" in both Section 19(1)(a) and Section 19(1)(b).

[25] The claims relating to the suspension of the IGPA during the CCAA Period and beyond are exactly the kind of anticipatory, future claims that are referenced in Section 19(1). A "claim" for the purpose of the CCAA includes any indebtedness, liability or obligation that would be provable under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3, as amended: Section 2(1) of the CCAA. Section 121(1) of the BIA defines "provable claims" as being:

> . . . (a)ll debts and liabilities, present and future, to which the bankrupt is subject on the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt, or to which the bankrupt may become subject before the bankrupt's discharge by reasons of any obligation incurred before the day on which the bankrupt becomes bankrupt . . .

[26] Section 121(2) of the BIA makes it clear that this includes contingent or unliquidated claims, with the procedure for evaluating contingent or unliquidated claims described in Section 135. Section 20(1)(a) of the CCAA describes how the amount of an unsecured claim that is a provable claim under the BIA may be determined by a court on summary application if it is not admitted by the debtor company.

[27] It may well have been difficult to value a contingent claim for future suspension damages that was filed before the Claims Bar Date, but that is often the nature of a contingent or future claim. In particular, there may have been issues relating to when the IGPA could reasonably be reinstated. As noted by SemCAMS, contingent claims are routinely filed in CCAA proceedings and in proceedings under the BIA.

[28] In Abacus Cities Ltd. (Trustee of) v. AMIC Mortgage Investment Corp, [1992] 4 WWR 309 (AltaCA), a fact scenario that occurred after the date of bankruptcy based on a pre-bankruptcy contract was held to give rise to a claim provable in the bankruptcy. The issue was whether mortgagees could claim in the bankruptcy for costs incurred after the date of bankruptcy, where the claims for costs were based on indemnities by the bankrupt found in pre-bankruptcy mortgages.

[29] The trustee in Abacus Cities submitted that future claims had to be limited to those that could be valued before they arise, and that a future liability that could not be calculated in advance could not be a provable claim. The Court commented as follows at page 318:

> I agree that this rule can limit future claims that otherwise fall within the scope of entitlement. In fact, some may not be provable when the trustee calls for proof . . .
> One must take care not to overstate the rule. It does not eliminate contingent or future claims. It merely subjects them to a valuation process: . . .

[30] SemCAMS concedes that Celtic would not have known by the Claims Bar Date if and when the IGPA would be reinstated, but argues that Celtic could have claimed damages on the assumption that the IGPA would not be reinstated. There could have been a summary determination of the claim or a reservation for the full amount of claimed damages. Or, the Court may have determined that the contingent claim was too remote or speculative to be properly considered a contingent claim and thus not a provable claim: Re Confederation Treasury Services Ltd. 1997 CarswellOnt 31 43 CBR (3d) 4, (sub nom. Confederation Treasury Services Ltd. (Bankrupt), Re) 96 OAC 75 at para. 4.

[31] Celtic submits that, if this was an ordinary action alleging breach of contract, it could not claim continuing damages for any future period of time in the absence of a repudiation of the contract. It therefore submits that it would not have a claim for the alleged suspension damages after the Plan Implementation Date that could be subject to compromise. While it may be true that a creditor cannot sue for contingent damages in the ordinary course, the legislative framework of the CCAA and the BIA allows debtor companies to deal with contingent claims in insolvency proceedings. There was no reason why Celtic could not have filed such a claim.

[32] In a similar argument, Celtic submits that, in order for its claim for suspension damages to be a claim that arises prior to the Plan Implementation Date, it must be an amount of damages that Celtic would have been entitled to recover within the CCAA Period. Again, this ignores the fact that the provisions of the CCAA and the BIA allow the debtor to deal with future and contingent claims within the ambit of the CCAA proceedings.

[33] Celtic also submits that its claim for suspension damages does not fall within the type of claim that can be compromised as set out in Section 19(1) because it is not a "debt". That is true, but a provable claim may be a "debt" or a "liability". As noted by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Re West Bay SonShip Yachts Ltd., 2009 Carswell BC 139, 2009 BCCA 31, [2009] BCWLD 1230, 71 CCEL (3d) 45, 49 CBR (5th) 159, [2009] 4 WWR 415, 89 BCLR (4th) 82, 265 BCAC 203, 446 WAC 203, 306 DLR (4th) 294 at para. 22, "liability" is a broad term that is most often used to describe an unliquidated or unspecified legal obligation, and "debt" is a narrower term that means a specific kind of obligation for a liquidated or certain sum. The definition of "claim" under the CCAA includes both.

[34] Celtic relies in its submissions on the fact that the IGPA was not repudiated. Section 19(1) does not restrict the type of claims that may be compromised under CCAA proceedings to claims arising solely from repudiated contracts. Section 19(1)(b) anticipates that claims may arise by virtue of the CCAA proceedings themselves, and allows the debtor company to put forward for approval by its creditors an arrangement that would compromise those claims. The claim for damages for suspension of the IGPA is that type of claim. It arises from and relates to the suspension of the IGPA that occurred by reason of the CCAA filing, and the inability of SemCAMS as a result of such filing to continue to market the Celtic gas.

[35] Celtic itself concedes that there is no basis in the IGPA itself to distinguish its right to damages before the Plan Implementation Date of November 30, 2009 and after. The obligation to pay damages arising from the suspension is not a a new breach of the IGPA that occurred after the Plan Implementation Date, but a claim of continuing damages that arise from the suspension of the IGPA, whether or not Celtic has the right to unilaterally reinstate the agreement.

[36] I find that the claim for suspension damages as it relates to the Post Plan Implementation Period is a claim that may be dealt with by a compromise under Section 19(1) of the CCAA.

[37] Celtic seeks to distinguish its claim for suspension damages for the Post October 2010 Period onward on the basis that SemCAMS' alleged refusal to accept deliveries under the IGPA after Celtic unilaterally purported to reinstate the agreement was a "distinct" breach of the IGPA, and not the same as either the failure to make payments under the IGPA which precipitated the suspension, or the suspension itself which gives rise to an obligation to pay damages as long as it remains in effect.

[38] I cannot agree that this alleged refusal to reinstate the IGPA was a fresh breach, even if Celtic was entitled to act unilaterally. The issue of reinstatement of the IGPA and whether it could be accomplished unilaterally or required the consent of both parties is an issue that arises from the suspension, and is not a new issue under the IGPA. Celtic seeks to distinguish the IGPA as an executory contract, the non-performance of which can give rise to new breaches, but it is not the non-performance of a properly reinstated executory contract that is at issue here, but when and how the IGPA is to be reinstated. The damages claimed for the alleged breach in the Post October 2010 Period are the same type of damages claimed for the preceding periods. It is not necessary for the analysis of the issue before me that I decide whether Celtic was entitled to unilaterally reinstate the IGPA, and I do not do so. However, I find that the claim for suspension damages in the Post October 2010 Period also is a "claim" that may be dealt with by a compromise under Section 19(1) as this claim does not arise from a fresh breach.

2012 ABQB 489 (CanLII)

[39] I turn next to the portions of the Plan that may be relevant to the issue of whether the damages claim for the Post Plan Implementation Period and the Post October 2010 Period were compromised; Section 8.1 of the Plan states as follows:

> On the Plan Implementation Date . . . the Company . . .shall be released and discharged from any and all demands, claims, actions, causes of action, counterclaims, suits, debts, sums of money, accounts, covenants, damages . . .on account of any liability, obligation, demand or cause of action of whatever nature which any Creditor or other Person may be entitled to assert . . .whether known or unknown, matured or unmatured, foreseen or unforeseen, existing or hereafter arising, based in whole or in part on any act or omission, transaction, duty, responsibility, indebtedness, liability, obligation, dealing or other occurrence existing or taking place on or prior to the Plan Implementation Date in any way relating to, arising out of or in connect with the Claims, the business and affairs of the Company whenever or however conducted, . . the Plan, the CCAA Proceedings, any Claim that has been barred or extinguished by the Claims Process Order and all Claims arising out of such actions or omissions shall be forever waived and released, all to the full extent permitted by Law; . . .

[40] As I have found that the claim for suspension damages during the Post Implementation Period and the Post October 2010 Period are claims that may be subject to compromise under Section 19(1) of the CCAA, it is clear that they are caught by Section 8.1 of the Plan. Paragraphs 28 and 45 of the Sanction Order give effect to Section 8.1 as follows:

> 28. Pursuant to and in accordance with the Plan, any and all Affected Claims of any nature against the Company, . . . shall be forever compromised, discharged and released, and the ability of any Person to proceed against the Company in respect of or relating to any Affected Claims shall be forever discharged and restrained, and all proceedings with respect to, in connection with or relating to such Affected Claims are hereby permanently stayed, subject only to the right of Affected Creditors to receive the distributions pursuant to the Plan and this Plan Sanction Order in respect of their Affected Claims.
> 45. Pursuant to and in accordance with Section 8.1 of the Plan, on the Plan Implementation Date the Released Parties shall be released and discharged from any and all demands, claims, actions, causes of action . . .on account of any liability, obligation, demand or cause of action of whatever nature which any

> Creditor or other Person may be entitled to assert. . .whether known or unknown, matured or unmatured, foreseen or unforeseen, existing or hereafter arising, based in whole or in part on any act or omission, transaction, duty, responsibility, indebtedness, liability, obligation, dealing or other occurrence existing or taking place on or prior to the Plan Implementation Date in any way relating to, arising out of or in connection with the Claims, the business and affairs of the Company whenever or however conducted . . .any Claim that has been barred or extinguished by the Claims Process Order and all Claims arising out of such actions or omissions shall be forever waived and released, all to the full extent permitted by Law: . . .

[41] As noted by SemCAMS, the only potential events of default under the IGPA at the time it was suspended were SemCAMS' insolvency and its commencement of CCAA proceedings. Any claim for damages arising from the suspension constitute an Affected Claim. Those potential events of default were cured by the stay imposed under the Initial Order and by the Sanction Order, which provided for a waiver of all defaults. The Affected Claims are caught by the release and discharge contained in section 8.1 of the Plan, which was given effect by the Sanction Order.

[42] Celtic submits that it would be inconsistent with the general purposes of the CCAA if SemCAMS and its counterparties remained bound by existing contracts, but SemCAMS could not be compelled to fully perform its obligations as they arise as a result of the Sanction Order. That would certainly be true if it was in fact the case. However, while Celtic and SemCAMS have not been able to resolve their difference over what is required or necessary to reinstate the IGPA, that does not mean that SemCAMS has been relieved of its obligations under the agreement, or relieved from a claim for damages arising from the suspension.

[43] The fact that the IGPA was suspended by mutual agreement and not terminated implies an obligation to reinstate the agreement when the impediment to performance, here the CCAA proceedings, has ceased to exist. However, changes in the status and positions of the parties in the interim must also be taken into consideration, and it is on that issue that the parties are unable to agree. If SemCAMS failed to agree to the reinstatement of the IGPA on terms that adequately reflected the changed circumstances, the continued suspension would give rise to a damages claim.

[44] However, such a claim would be an Affected Claim within the meaning of the CCAA proceeding that could be, and was, compromised by the Plan and the Sanction Order.

b) Should Celtic be allowed to file a late amended claim for suspension damages during the CCAA Period? If Celtic's claims for suspension damages for the Post Plan Implementation Period and/or the Post October 2010 Period are "Affected Claims", should Celtic be allowed to file a late claim for these damages?

2012 ABQB 489 (CanLII)

[45] Celtic submits that, in the event its claims for suspension damages are found to be Affected Claims under the CCAA proceedings, it should be permitted to amend its previously-filed Proof of Claim to claim such damages. While Celtic divides its claims into three periods: the period it characterizes as the "CCAA Period", the Post Plan Implementation Period and the Post October 2010 Period, I have found that the claims for damages for suspension of the IGPA for all of these periods fall within the definition of "claims" for the purpose of Section 19 and were thus subject to compromise by the Plan and the Sanction Order.

[46] The only distinction that may be made among these three periods of time with respect to a late filing application relates to whether the claim for suspension damages for the CCAA Period would be an amendment to the Proof of Claim filed by Celtic on November 28, 2008 or a new claim.

[47] I find that the claims for suspension damages for all three periods of time are new claims. The previously filed Proof of Claim related to amounts owing for the delivery of raw gas to the KA Plant in the months prior to the Initial Order. The proposed claims for suspension damages relate to losses incurred as a result of the suspension of the IGPA after the Initial Order was granted, arising from Celtic's inability to sell its gas to third parties at the same price it would have received under the IGPA. Thus, there is no reason to distinguish among the three periods of time with respect to the question of whether Celtic should be allowed to file a late claim.

[48] I must agree with the BA and SemCAMS that Celtic's application to file a claim or claims for suspension damages at this late date is extraordinary. Celtic did not file its application until April, 2011, approximately two and a half years after the Claims Bar Date of December 1, 2008 and approximately one and a half years after the Plan Implementation Date of November 30, 2009.

[49] In para. 26 of Re Blue Range Resources Corp, 2000 ABCA 285, the Court of Appeal set out the appropriate criteria to apply to late claims in CCAA proceedings:

1. Was the delay caused by inadvertence and if so, did the claimant act in good faith?

2. What is the effect of permitting the claim in terms of the existence and impact of any relevant prejudice caused by the delay?

3. If relevant prejudice is found, can it be alleviated by attaching appropriate conditions to an order permitting late filing?

4. If relevant prejudice is found that cannot be alleviated, are there any other considerations that may nonetheless warrant an order permitting late filing?

[50] As I noted in Re BA Energy Inc., 2010 ABQB 507 at para. 34:

2012 ABQB 489 (CanLII)

> . . .in identifying these criteria and applying them to specific late claims, Wittmann, J.A. favoured a "blended approach", taking into consideration both the standards set out under the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, and the U. S. Bankruptcy Rules, and informed by concepts drawn from the approaches taken in a variety of areas of law when dealing with late notice or delays in process. It is clear from the nature of the criteria that the question of whether a late claim should be accepted is an equitable consideration, taking into account the specific circumstances of each case.

1. Inadvertence and Good Faith

[51] Celtic submits that "inadvertence" should not be taken too literally. However, Wittmann, J.A. noted at para. 27 of Blue Range that "inadvertence" in the context of the first criterion includes carelessness, negligence or accident and is unintentional.

[52] Celtic's failure to make a timely claim was not unintentional. It submits that it "simply" did not perceive it had a right to damages because it did not believe that the IGPA had been suspended. Celtic was aware of the CCAA proceedings from the time of the Initial Order and retained counsel with respect to the proceedings throughout. It filed a Proof of Claim for a different kind of claim. It cannot argue that its failure to file a claim was careless, negligent or accidental: it was Celtic's deliberate choice, acting with the advice of counsel, to maintain its position that the IGPA had not been suspended, but amended, without providing for the possibility that this position would be found to be incorrect and that it may have a claim for damages arising from a suspension. The financial implications to Celtic if the IGPA was found to be suspended were made clear to it when it received draft third party gas processing agreements from SemCAMS on August 26, 2008. In fact, Celtic itself calculated its suspension losses for the period from July 22, 2008 to September 30, 2009 in an affidavit filed in response to the application that resulted in the IGPA decision.

[53] Celtic submits that the possibility of suspension damages must also have been apparent to SemCAMS and the BA before the Plan was negotiated and presented to creditors. That is beside the point: the Claims Process in CCAA proceedings requires creditors to identify and to file their claims or be barred from pursuing them. It is not up to the debtor company to guess at potential claims, or whether creditors will decide to pursue them.

[54] Celtic also submits that its claims for suspension damages are not claims for a "debt". While this is true, the Claims Process provides for contingent claims for liabilities and that is what SemCAMS submits Celtic should have filed.

[55] The Claims Process Order of October 22, 2008, which was served on Celtic and its counsel, makes it clear that "claim" includes contingent claims, defining "claim" as including:

> . . . any . . . claim . . . made, in connection with any indebtedness, liability or obligation of any kind whatsoever, and any interest accrued thereon or costs payable in respect thereof,

> including without limitation . . . by reasons of any breach of contract or other agreement (oral or written) . . . and whether or not any indebtedness, liability or obligation is reduced to judgment, liquidated, unliquidated, fixed, contingent, matured, unmatured, disputed, undisputed, legal, equitable, secured, unsecured, present, future, known or unknown . . . and whether or not any right or claim is executory or anticipatory in nature including . . . with respect to any matter, action, cause or chose in action whether existing at present or commenced in the future . . .[emphasis added]

The Monitor's Seventh Report dated October 21, 2008 provided a thorough summary of the claims process.

[56] Had Celtic filed its claim for suspension damages, current and future, such claim would have been determined during the Claims Process or there would have been a reservation for the full amount of its claimed damages.

[57] The first criterian of the Blue Range analysis requires that I consider whether Celtic acted in good faith.

[58] SemCAMS and the BA submit that Celtic knew it had a potential claim for damages arising from the suspension of the IGPA as early as August 28, 2008, more than three months prior to the Claims Bar Date, or at any rate, by September 22, 2008, when it sent a letter to SemCAMS asserting that it had not in fact suspended the sale of gas under the IGPA. Celtic had by August 21, 2009 received the Plan and the Monitor's 20th Report, which identifies and alerts stakeholders to the fact that Affected Claims, which by definition include contingent claims, will be compromised, discharged and released under the Plan. Certainly, the question of suspension damages was a live issue during the application that led to the IGPA decision of August 27, 2010, and Celtic was well aware from submissions that were made that SemCAMS took the position that any such claim was barred by the Claims Process Order and compromised under the Plan. Despite all this, Celtic did not bring its application to file a late claim until April, 2011. I cannot find that Celtic acted in good faith by delaying its claim.

2. Prejudice Caused by the Delay

[59] Celtic submits that, since during the application that gave rise to the IGPA decision, SemCAMS has indicated that it may, under certain conditions, consider agreeing to a late - filed claim for suspension damages. It argues that this is an indication that there is in fact no prejudice to SemCAMS or the ordinary creditors from its late claims. SemCAMS' offer to accept a late filed claim was made at a far earlier date than this application for leave to file a late claim, and at a time when the claim was for far less than the amount now claimed.

[60] SemCAMS points out that several of the conditions to this offer to accept a late claim have not been met. The mere fact that SemCAMS considered agreeing to a late claim at an earlier time and under different circumstances does not indicate lack of prejudice now.

[61] Celtic concedes that a late claim will prejudice the BA and its group of secured creditors, but submits that this should not be a factor since the BA has already agreed to an Ordinary Creditors' Pool, and the size of that pool will not increase as a result of granting leave to Celtic to amend its Proof of Claim.

[62] As I indicated in Re BA Energy, the objective of a claims procedure order is to attempt to ensure that all legitimate creditors come forward on a timely basis. A claims procedure provides the debtor company and the Monitor with the information necessary to fashion a plan that may prove acceptable to the requisite majority of creditors, given the financial circumstances of the debtor, and that may be sanctioned by the Court. The fact that accurate information relating to the amount and nature of claims is essential for the formulation of a successful plan requires that the specifics of a claims procedure order should generally be observed and enforced, and that the acceptance of a later claim should not be an automatic outcome. The applicant for such an order must provide some explanation for the late filing and the reviewing court must consider any prejudice caused by the delay.

[63] The claims procedure process was developed to give creditors a level playing field with respect to their claims and to discourage tactics that would give some creditors an unjustified advantage. Situations that give rise to concerns of improper manipulation of the process by a creditor must be carefully considered.

[64] Celtic's proposed suspension damages claim would represent an approximately 22% increase in the total value of Ordinary Claims filed against SemCAMS. The new claim increases Celtic's total claims by about 66%. The Plan and the Monitor's Report made it clear that the Secured Lenders represented by the BA agreed to refrain from making a claim against SemCAMS in respect of their first-ranking, fully secured claim in part because they would receive the surplus remaining in the Ordinary Creditors Pool after the claims of ordinary creditors had been satisfied. It is a reasonable inference that this decision was made on the basis of claims that had been filed as of the Claims Bar Date, which did not include the Celtic $22.5 million suspension damages claim.

[65] One of the tests for prejudice is whether a late claim causes another creditor to lose a realistic opportunity to do something it might otherwise have done: Blue Range at para. 40. While it is true that the secured lenders as represented by the BA were likely aware that Celtic may have a potential claim for suspension damages, they were also entitled to rely on the Claims Bar Process, the release provisions of the Plan and the Sanction Order to expect some finality.

[66] In Blue Range, the applications to accept late claims were made within a few months of the plan sanction order. Here, the delay is much longer, and the decision in Blue Range is clear that the timing of the late claim with respect to the stage of proceedings is a key consideration: para. 36.

[67] If Celtic is able to file a late claim for suspension damages, the Secured Lenders could receive up to $900,000 less than they otherwise would. This is a material and significant claim, in contrast to the relatively minor value of late claims in Blue Range that were filed after that plan was implemented.

[68] It is noteworthy that the Secured Lenders did not have to consent to the amount that was made available to Ordinary Creditors in the Ordinary Creditors' Pool, as they had clear priority for their claim of approximately US $2.939 billion.

[69] This application also gives rise to a potential issue of unequal treatment among creditors. There were other unsecured creditors with claims arising from inlet gas purchase agreements. If Celtic's application is successful, it is not impossible that such creditors would seek to file similar late claims for suspension damages.

[70] I find that there is relevant prejudice to other creditors arising from the delay, and I am not satisfied that such prejudice can be alleviated by attaching any conditions to an order permitting late filing.

3. Other Considerations

[71] It is relevant that Celtic brings its application to file a late claim after the Plan has been sanctioned and implemented. In Re T. Eaton Company Limited et al, May 5, 1999 98-CL-2586 (Ont. S.C.J.), Blair J. noted, in a case where notification of the claims bar process had "fallen through the cracks" with respect to one creditor such that she had no opportunity to file a claim, that permitting a creditor to file a late claim after plan sanction and implementation "is tantamount to altering or modifying the Plan", and that the jurisdiction to allow such a late claim should thus be "exercised sparingly and in exceptional circumstances only", citing Algoma Steel Corp. V. Royal Bank (1992), 11 C.B.R. 3d 11. While these comments pre-dated Blue Range, which is now the law in Alberta on this issue, the timing of such an application with reference to plan implementation is relevant to the issue of prejudice.

[72] As previously described, this claim would be paid out of the Ordinary Creditors' Pool. It is clear that this large claim was not anticipated when the Pool was structured as part of the Plan and the BA consented to the Plan. The Plan specifically provides that it cannot be modified without the prior consent of BA as Agent of the secured creditors, acting reasonably, and, in the circumstances, it cannot be said that BA is acting unreasonably in opposing the application.

[73] SemCAMS and the BA submit that to allow a creditor with full knowledge of the CCAA Proceedings and the Claims Process to ignore the Claims Bar Date and file a significant new claim more than two years after such date would throw the entire CCAA restructuring process into disrepute. I must agree. Celtic has no good or satisfactory reason to offer as to why it failed to file a contingent claim for suspension damages within a reasonable time. It decided on this strategy for its own reasons, and at its own peril. None of the factors set out in Blue Range or in

BA Energy favour its application. The policy reasons that emphasize the need for certainty and finality in an approved and sanctioned plan and fairness of treatment to all creditors outweigh the prejudice to Celtic of disallowing a late claim. The application to file a late claim for suspension damages is thus dismissed.

2012 ABQB 489 (CanLII)

c) Should Celtic's Statement of Claim be struck out?

[74] Celtic alleges in its Statement of Claim that the granting of the Initial Order in the CCAA Proceedings was an event of default under the IGPA and that Celtic, as non-defaulting party, suspended performance of all transactions under the IGPA with the agreement of SemCAMS. I have found that the suspension damages claimed under the Statement of Claim are Affected Claims that may be, and were, compromised by the Plan and the Plan Sanction Order. Paragraph 44 of the Plan Sanction Order provides as follows:

> Any and all Persons shall be and are hereby stayed from commencing, taking, applying for or issuing or continuing any and all steps or proceedings . . . declarations or assessments, commenced, taken or proceeded with or that may be commenced, taken or proceeded with against any Released Party in respect of all Claims and any other matter which is released pursuant to paragraphs 45 to 47, inclusive, of this Plan Sanction Order and Article 8 of the Plan.

[75] The filing of the Statement of Claim is thus a breach of the Plan Sanction Order and accordingly is struck out.

Conclusion

[76] In summary, I find that Celtic's claims for damages arising from the suspension of the IGPA, whether they arose during the CCAA Period, the Post Plan Implementation Period or the Post October 2010 Period are "Affected Claims" under the CCAA proceedings, subject to the Claims Process and to being compromised by the Plan. I dismiss Celtic's application to file an amended or new late claim for these damages. I find the Statement of Claim claiming such suspension damages to be a breach of the Sanction Order and, accordingly, I direct that it be struck out.

[77] If the parties are unable to agree on costs, that issue may be addressed through written submissions filed with 45 days.

JUDGMENT

Introduction:

2012 ONSC 2767 (CanLII)

[1] Greed is a vice that makes normally rational people act irrationally. It plays exceeding well into the old maxim “If it looks too good to be true it usually is”. This case proves that both theories are alive and well.

[2] The plaintiffs invested funds with the defendant Marlon Hibbert and his assorted companies, all of which are also defendants.

[3] The investments were lost. The defendants have consented to judgment for the principal amount but not interest. The plaintiffs now seek interest and a declaration that they were defrauded of these funds by the defendant Hibbert and his wife, the defendant Verna Hibbert, and assorted defendant companies. They also seek a declaration that the defendants fraudulently conveyed their home from a joint tenancy to Verna solely contrary to The Fraudulent Conveyances Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. F.29.

Facts:

[4] Marlon Hibbert is a Pastor and founder of Dominion World Outreach Ministries. Verna is his wife and they owned as a joint tenants 48 Reginald Lamb Crescent in Markham, Ontario. The corporate defendants were all incorporated by the defendant Marlon Hibbert at various times with him as the sole shareholder, president and directing mind.

[5] There are 5 sets of plaintiffs, all of whom invested various sums of money with the defendant Marlon Hibbert in and around late 2006 through 2008. All heard of the defendant generally by word of mouth through members of the defendant’s church or his brother-in-law, Jessie Solomon, also a plaintiff.

[6] There is no evidence that the defendants actively recruited any of the plaintiffs. Indeed I find as a fact that the plaintiffs approached the defendant Marlon Hibbert. It does appear, however, that he would pay a referral fee to an investor who referred another investor. It is unclear from the evidence before me as to whether any of the plaintiffs ever received such a referral fee. There was also evidence of some workshops put on by the defendant and a video produced by him. There is no evidence any of these plaintiffs invested because of such programs.

[7] The defendant Marlon Hibbert traded in the currency exchange market. He had no training, experience or formal education in investments other than self taught. Neither he, nor any of his companies, were ever registered with any regulatory body or government agency.

[8] The plaintiffs would not be considered sophisticated investors, however, they generally had some post secondary education, families and responsible jobs.

[9] In all cases the plaintiffs would hear of the defendant Marlon Hibbert and approach him to see if he would invest funds for them. He would explain that he traded in the currency exchange market; that he guaranteed a 5 % return per month or 8 ½ % per month if the funds were locked in for 1 year; he and the respective plaintiff would sign a contract for the amount of the investment where it was written that he personally would guarantee the principal amount and the interest payment.

[10] In most cases the plaintiff would invest $10,000.00 to start, get a copy of the contract with the guarantee and would start to receive the monthly interest payment or a monthly investment statement showing the monthly interest amount being added to the principal.

[11] The plaintiffs, after receiving the interest over a period of time, would then invest further funds, usually without any solicitation by the defendants, with the same written guarantee.

[12] Over time monthly interest payments were missed and phone calls were not returned. The plaintiffs started to demand the return of their funds and the defendant stalled and made excuses. It finally became clear that the investments were lost and a cease trading order was issued by the Ontario Securities Commission as a result of complaints to it by some investors. The defendant alleges these losses were as a result of the recession and volatility of the markets such that the investments lost money. No evidence was produced by him to indicate that any investments were even made never mind whether they ever made a profit.

Analysis:

[13] The plaintiffs claim that the defendants defrauded them in a classic “ponzi scheme”.

[14] The plaintiffs allege fraud on the basis that the investment funds were pooled; that the defendant Marlon Hibbert used the funds to finance the business to pay himself, to purchase vehicles, make donations to charities of his choice and to give himself and his wife loans, and dishonestly misappropriated their funds. All of which is true. As well he has not accounted for the funds, nor provided any documentation to show where they went or how they were lost.

[15] The plaintiffs have clearly proven a breach of contract. The defendant Marlon Hibbert guaranteed the principal the plaintiffs invested and the rate of return, as unrealistic as the amount was.

[16] The gullibility of the plaintiffs in believing the misrepresentations of the defendant, or lack of care on their part in failing to make an independent investigation, is no defence to an action based on fraud. It does not lie in the mouth of one who makes a statement on which another relies to say that the other was careless in believing him. Mikealice Management Corp. and Dr. Michael Laiv. De Thomas Financial Corp. et al 2003 CanLII 43753 (ON SC).

[17] Criminal Fraud requires proof of (a) a dishonest act involving "deceit, falsehood or other fraudulent means" which (b) causes detriment or deprivation to the victim. R. v. Theroux, [1993] 2 S.C.R.

[18] In a civil action there need not be a false representation; it is sufficient if there is a fraudulent means. Harland v. Fancsali, [1993] O.J. No. 961.

[19] To find "deceit' or "falsehood" the trier of fact must determine whether there was an actual representation that a situation was of a certain character, when, in reality, it was not. R. v. Theroux, supra. Para. 18

[20] The issue is determined objectively, by reference to what a reasonable person would consider to be a dishonest act. Courts have found that the concealment of important facts, the unauthorized diversion of funds, the unauthorized use of an investors' funds and the unauthorized taking of funds to be fraudulent. R. v. Theroux, supra. Paras16, 17; R. v. Currie, [1984] O.J. No. 147 (Ont.C.A.).

[21] Fraud also requires a person to be aware of the risk posed to another's interests. The subjective awareness can be inferred from the evidence. It may also be established by evidence showing that the perpetrator was willfully blind or reckless as to the conduct and the truth or falsity of any statements made. R. v. Theroux, supra. at paras. 26 and 28.

[22] A sincere belief or hope that no risk or deprivation would ultimately materialize does not establish an absence of fraud:

> "A person who deprives another person of what the latter has should not escape criminal responsibility merely because, according to his moral or personal code, he or she was doing nothing wrong or because of a sanguine belief that all will come out right in the end. Many frauds are perpetrated by people who think there is nothing wrong in what they are doing or who sincerely believe that their act of placing other people's property at risk will not ultimately result in actual loss to those persons. If the offence of fraud is to catch those who actually practise fraud, its mens rea cannot be cast so narrowly as this."
> R. v.Théroux, supra, at para.36)

[23] The defendant testified that he was simply a bad bookkeeper and businessman; that he had sloppy business and accounting practices; and that he was the victim of worldwide financial markets gone awry. I disagree.

[24] The defendant Marlon Hibbert was totally unbelievable as a witness. He failed to produce material that would clearly have been in his possession such as trading records, trading accounts, and bank accounts for the various companies. He consistently had a selective memory about where money went, loans to him and his wife, his church or other charities in which he was involved. Certainly some of the letters sent by him to investors were false and misleading and when questioned on those he had no plausible explanation. He was evasive in much of his testimony for example he refused to concede he was investing the plaintiff's money and insisted the companies he controlled were doing the investing. He spoke of some of the accounts being frozen but produced no evidence to show what was in them. The cheque register he produced showed d/m/y being switched back and forth and has obviously been produced after the fact. He was unable to recall how he paid himself or on what basis. He testified he told every investor that he had no assets or investments to back up his guarantee yet none of the plaintiffs recall any such discussion. I accept the evidence of the plaintiffs. I totally reject the evidence of the defendant Marlon Hibbert as unworthy of belief.

[25] I also find as a fact that the plaintiffs did no due diligence regarding the defendants and the investment scheme. It strikes this court as somewhat incredulous that they really felt, as they testified, that there was no risk to their money which was going to generate an annualized 60% return in the mid to late 2000's. They are not credible when they all testify they felt their investment was safe and without risk because of the guarantee and that the defendant Marlon Hibbert was a pastor. However, nothing turns on their lack of credibility on this narrow aspect of the case because the issue is whether they were defrauded regardless of their lack of due diligence and stupidity. *Mikealice Management Corp.*supra.

[26] It had become clear by early 2009 that the defendant Marlon Hibbert had been unable to repay funds as requested by his investors. He had been stalling them and testified that he hoped to recoup the losses. I also find as a fact that he knew he had many very disgruntled clients, that he had lost all their investments and that he had no way of repaying what he owed to them. He admitted as much in cross-examination when he acknowledged that he knew he owed millions at that time.

[27] The evidence is uncontroverted, and admitted by the defendant, that he used the investment funds, at least partially, for his own use, the use of his wife, personal loans, lease payments for expensive cars, and donations to charities of which he was closely tied, and in some cases paid by. None of these arrangements were ever communicated to the plaintiffs. Many of these payments occurred and continued long after he had stopped paying those who had invested with him. It is evident that he lied to investors as to his success as an investor in the foreign exchange markets. He lied to them by providing monthly statements that consistently showed a profit when in fact the investments were showing significant losses. He lied to his clients about why funds were not being repaid when requested and provided a litany of excuses that were patently untrue. As a result of his actions the plaintiffs lost all they invested with him.

[28] I have no hesitation in finding that the defendant Marlon Hibbert knew he was acting dishonestly. Any reasonable person looking at these facts would also conclude that he was acting in a dishonest and deceitful manner. As a result of his dishonest actions the plaintiffs suffered significant financial losses. I conclude that the plaintiffs have proven fraud against all of the defendants except the defendant Verna Hibbert.

[29] There is no evidence before me that the defendant Verna Hibbert was anything other than the wife of the defendant Marlon Hibbert. There was nothing presented to me to indicate she played any role in these investments, the investment companies or in dealings with the plaintiffs. She signed none of the contracts with the plaintiffs in any capacity. Indeed counsel for the plaintiffs conceded in his closing argument that he was unable to produce any evidence to implicate the defendant Verna Hibbert and the actions against her should be dismissed.

[30] I find that the defendant Marlon Hibbert met with Mr. and Mrs. Morelli, who are not plaintiffs in this action but who had invested with him. They met on April 4, 2009 at the defendant Marlon Hibbert's office.

[31] At this meeting the Morrelli's, in a very forceful way, demanded their money back. The defendant instead offered them his home to hold in trust if he failed to pay them within 2 weeks. He signed a promissory note to that effect. He agreed in cross examination that when he signed the promissory note he could not fulfill it and knew that it was false.

[32] The defendants Marlon and Verna Hibbert went to see a lawyer on April 6, 2009 and on April 7, 2009 their house at 48 Reginald Lamb Cres., Markham, Ontario, which they had held as joint tenants, was transferred, for love and affection, to Verna Hibbert solely. They have continued to live in the home ever since.

[33] Mr. and Mrs. Hibbert testified that the transfer was completely coincidental and had absolutely nothing to do with the potential liabilities of the defendant Marlon Hibbert. They testified over the course of the trial and in earlier sworn affidavits and discoveries to 5 different versions of why they "just happened" to transfer their house out of their joint names. They claimed it was for estate purposes; to save taxes; being threatened by Mr. Morelli; or that the defendant was a counselor to prisoners and worried as to what would happen to the house if he was killed by a prisoner.

[34] I find none of these explanations, when viewed in the context of the large amounts of money owing to these plaintiffs who had demanded a return of their funds, and the promissory note he signed to Mr. Morelli, to have any credibility whatsoever. Indeed the defendant acknowledged in cross examination that he knew at the time he transferred his interest in the house that he owed millions, and specifically knew that he owed substantial amounts to the plaintiffs. I also find as a fact that he knew he had no way of repaying what he owed.

[35] Intent under the act is made out by various badges of fraud as set out in Beynon v. Beynon, [2001] O.J. No. 3653. The defendants in this case, with the transfer of their house, have met almost all of the non exhaustive list set out in the above case.

[36] I find as a fact that the defendants Marlon and Verna Hibbert intentionally planned to defeat these plaintiffs and save their house from these creditors.

[37] I therefore find that the conveyance of 48 Reginald Lamb Cres., Markham, Ontario on April 7, 2009 contravened S. 2 of The Fraudulent Conveyances Act. R.S.O. 1990 c. F29 in that the conveyance of their real property was done with the intent to defeat and defraud the plaintiffs, who were creditors, of just and lawful damages and amounts lawfully owing to them and the conveyance is therefore void.

Conclusion:

[38] The plaintiffs already have judgment for their principal amount on consent.

2012 ONSC 2767 (CanLII)

[39] There will be judgment for the plaintiff Marcia Dixon in action CV-11-631-SR, based on her undisputed affidavit and the defendant Marlon Hibbert agreeing to the amount of principal owing, for the principal amount of $190,000.00 as against all defendants except Verna Hibbert.

[40] There is a finding and a declaration that the judgments against the defendants in favour of the plaintiffs was as a result of the fraud of the defendant Marlon Hibbert and the corporate defendants.

[41] All actions for amounts owing will be dismissed as against the defendant Verna Hibbert.

[42] All plaintiffs will have interest on their judgments up to the date of trial at 5% per month as per the guarantee in the contracts signed personally by the defendant Marlon Hibbert and signed by him on behalf of the various defendant corporations less any interest paid.

[43] The plaintiffs will have post judgment interest fixed pursuant to the Courts of Justice Act.

[44] The transfer of 48 Reginald Lamb Cres., Markham, Ontario on April 7, 2009 is declared null and void and title will revert back to Marlon and Verna Hibbert as joint tenants forthwith.

[45] If the parties are unable to agree on costs they may submit their respective positions on 3 double spaced pages in addition to any offers and draft bills of costs within 30 days.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT OF THE HONOURABLE MADAM JUSTICE PICARD

2000 ABCA 256 (CanLII)

THE COURT:

[1] This case raises the issue of when a stranger to a trust will be held liable for the breach of that trust.

[2] Mr. David Speirs (Speirs) and Mr. Louis Mix (Mix), the respondents, were found not to be personally liable for a breach by Sorrel Resources Ltd. (Sorrel), of a trust relationship it had with Sorrel 1985 Limited Partnership (the Partnership), the appellant. Sorrel is not a party to this action.

FACTS

[3] Speirs was the president and Mix the treasurer of Sorrel, an oil and gas exploration company. Both were also directors. Speirs has a degree in geophysics while Mix is a chartered accountant. Both had considerable experience in the oil and gas industry.

[4] The Partnership was set up so that Sorrel would have funds to pursue the goal of making money from the acquisition, exploration, development and operation of oil and gas properties to the benefit of both.

[5] The limited partnership agreement (LPA) under which the Partnership operated was largely drafted by Speirs and executed by Speirs and Mix on Sorrel's behalf. Sorrel was the general partner in the Partnership, with the responsibility of managing it on behalf of all partners.

[6] Sorrel then entered into a joint venture agreement (JVA) with the Partnership, under which Sorrel was appointed as the manager or operator of the joint venture. Speirs and Mix executed the JVA on behalf of Sorrel itself and also, in Sorrel's capacity as general partner, on behalf of the Partnership. The JVA allowed them to draw funds from the Partnership, as required, to pay its share of the expenses of the oil and gas exploration.

[7] The JVA provided that the Partnership would be responsible for 80% of the costs incurred under the joint venture while Sorrel would be responsible for 20%. The interest acquired by each was in the same percentages. (At a later date, as a result of another party becoming involved, these figures changed; but this fact does not affect the case.)

[8] In addition to the JVA and LPA, the relationship between Sorrel and the Partnership was also regulated in part by the provisions of the 1981 Canadian Association of Petroleum Landmen Operating Procedure (CAPL). These three documents ("the Agreements") are the basic agreements which governed the relationship between the parties.

[9] A bundle of documents, based around the LPA and the JVA, was presented to investors as a package and some 47 individuals and corporations subscribed for a minimum of $80,000 each. Investors became members of the Partnership.

[10] The system or design for drawing funds from the Partnership was set up by Mix in consultation with Speirs and was straightforward. An "authority for expenditure" (AFE), along with a detailed statement of the costs and expenses it represented was prepared by Sorrel. While it could be signed by any of Speirs, Mix or Mr. Salt, another officer of Sorrel, it was usually signed by Speirs, who testified that he was intimately familiar with what was being put forward for approval and would make sure the AFE was in order. (AB553 and 670). The AFE was provided to an employee hired for the Partnership. She would draw a cheque based on it that was usually signed by Speirs and Mix. (Speirs, Mix and Salt, were authorized to sign cheques on the account of the Partnership. Two signatures were required.) The cheque was then deposited in Sorrel's general account at a bank.

[11] Under the JVA it was clear that Sorrel was not entitled to make cash calls in advance of expenditure except with respect to clearly defined categories of costs: in particular, for costs of drilling, completion and equipping wells.

[12] In the late summer or early fall of 1985, prior to the AFE system being put in place, Mix had concerns about the process. In his testimony he described a concern that there remained a "partnership identity" on the Partnership funds drawn down (AB 766). At Mix's request, Sorrel's lawyer reviewed the relevant agreements and gave the opinion that funds should not be commingled. Mix went on to consult Sorrel's firm of accountants, who told him that commingling of funds was not contrary to accounting practices or the Agreements. It appears that Mix's broad concern that the funds belonged to the Partnership came to be narrowed to the question of whether they could be commingled with Sorrel's funds, after they were drawn down. The responses left open the question of the use to which Sorrel could put Partnership funds once drawn down.

[13] Speirs also had concerns about responsibilities to the Partnership, particularly with respect to its funds. He testified that he put clause 7.11 in the LPA, which prohibited commingling except as authorised, "to ensure the limited partners that their capital contributions [would not be commingled] before they were needed for oil and gas expenditures" (AB 569). Further, he said he put in another term (clause 7.12) "because I was aware that I owed duties to more than one party and that I would be constantly in a conflict of interest position" (AB 570). Under that clause, there is deemed to be no conflict of interest or breach of fiduciary duty if there is compliance by the general partner with the terms of the agreement. He said the JVA between the Partnership and Sorrel was necessary "because the same party was both manager of the program and the general partner of the Partnership." (AB 572) He testified that he did not want the Partnership to have a concern that Sorrel would have access to the Partnership's bank account for "anything other than effectively...the operations of the partnership, so that Sorrel could just not sign cheques willy-nilly on their accounts." (AB 572).

[14] On December 19, 1985, the joint venture began operation when Sorrel signed a farmout agreement with Shell Canada Resources Ltd. This was a standard type of agreement under which Sorrel would drill and equip two wells. Unfortunately, about that time the price of oil began to drop dramatically, causing a profoundly negative effect on the industry and on Sorrel's operations.

[15] Speirs testified that because of the collapse in oil prices no drilling was undertaken in the latter part of December and throughout January (AB 693). Although drilling was supposed to begin during the third week in January, it did not begin on the first well until February 4, 1986 and ceased by February 25, 1986. On the second well, drilling began on March 10, 1986 and ceased on April 6, 1986. Because Sorrel did not complete its commitments under the farmout agreement with Shell, it did not acquire any interest under that agreement. (This point seems to have been missed by the trial judge. Under the JVA, the CAPL operating procedures, which permit commingling, apply only where an interest has been acquired. However, as will be discussed later, commingling is not determinative of the responsibility of the parties.)

[16] In the eleven days following the signing of the farmout agreement, Sorrel made two cash calls on the Partnership funds, totalling $760,000. There were further cash calls and funds received and deposited in Sorrel's general account: in March 1986, $211,200 and $138,000 in April. Thus between December 1985 and the end of April 1986, Sorrel drew over $1,000,000 out of the Partnership and placed it in its general account.

[17] In the course of evidence it became clear that Sorrel made unrestricted use of the funds transferred from the Partnership to Sorrel for its own expenses. Speirs acknowledged that these funds were used to pay Sorrel's expenses, including staff payroll (AB 694). Mix agreed that the funds were used to pay all manner of expenses including Sorrel's payroll, rent and even revenue owed to joint venture partners and expenses on other wells (AB 839). This evidence was confirmed by Julia Murray, a chartered accountant with Touche Ross who was placed in Sorrel's office as the "resident" trustee in bankruptcy in charge of analysing its books and records.

[18] Mix admitted that there was no "tracing source of receipts to use of funds". While accepting that he did not make any effort to see that the funds drawn from the Partnership were used to pay the costs on the well being drilled for the Partnership, he said he believed that this was consistent with generally accepted accounting practice (AB 840).

[19] Furthermore, there was provision in CAPL for the direct refund to the Partnership of monies not used for costs of the joint venture, or alternatively this could have been done through an updated AFE or a credit on account with adjustment for interest. There is however no indication that any of these occurred.

[20] There was evidence that as of the end of December 1985, Sorrel had received invoices relative to the drilling of the two wells that totalled $2,349.67. During the period February 27 to

April 16, 1986, Sorrel received invoices for the drilling totalling $569,219.22. As Sorrel had a policy of not paying invoices until 60 to 75 days after they were received, monies from the Partnership were not actually required until, at the earliest, sometime in late April. As events turned out, although over $1,000,000 was transferred, only $32,845.44 was used toward payment of costs of the two wells.

[21] Both Speirs and Mix had concerns about Sorrel's financial position in December, 1985. However they differed on how to deal with it. Sorrel had a working capital deficit, which Mix defined as "an excess of current liabilities over current assets". The effect was that Sorrel had problems with its line of credit from the bank and needed money to meet its obligations under the LPA. At a meeting in early December of 1985, Sorrel's directors were advised that there was a projected shortage of $763,000 as of December 31, 1985 and of $1,331,000 as of March 31, 1986. (In April, Mix realized this was underestimated by $560,000 (AB 781-2)). Sorrel took measures to deal with this bleak financial picture including raising funds through a share issue. However, Mix testified that the monies so raised did not address the working capital problem as at March 31, 1986. Sorrel also restructured its line of credit with its bank, Société Générale.

[22] In April 1986, Sorrel's auditors placed a note on its 1985 financial statement, stating that the recent rapid decline in oil prices, together with the company's working capital position, threatened the ability of the company to sustain its operations, realize the value of its assets and discharge its liabilities in the normal course of business (AB 798).

[23] By April 26, 1986 Mix was extremely concerned about Sorrel's financial viability and suggested cutbacks. Speirs did not agree and believed Sorrel could be pulled out of its difficulties. Mix resigned. The documentation for the final draw on the Partnership funds, in April, was not signed by him but by Salt. His liability must be viewed accordingly.

[24] It became clear during Mix's evidence (AB 872) that Sorrel had been unable to meet its loan repayment obligations as of December 1985. Instalments were due of around $50,000 each month, but no payments were made in the five months from December until the receivership. Sorrel was in negotiations with the bank, Société Générale, seeking to extend its line of credit. As part of those negotiations, Speirs and Mix signed an agreement committing Sorrel to payment of a loan installment of $768,333, due on April 15, 1986. Both Speirs and Mix gave evidence that they had not kept a copy of the agreement, and had failed to appreciate that an installment was due. The bank subsequently demanded full payment of the loan, finally putting Sorrel into receivership on May 2, 1986. At trial, Speirs and Mix claimed that Sorrel had access, through its line of credit and its bank balance, to sufficient funds to have made the loan payment. However, the fact remains that they did not use those funds to make that payment. Equally, they had not used these available funds to pay Sorrel's own expenses; nor had they taken steps to obtain other funds to do so. They had been using the $1,000,000 drawn from the Partnership.

[25] In the result, the monies received from the Partnership came under the bankruptcy proceedings. In an action arising out of the receivership, this court affirmed the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench that there was a trust relationship between the Partnership and Sorrel, and that funds remaining in the Partnership bank account were held in trust for the partners. See Bank of Nova Scotia v. Société Générale (Canada) (1988), 58 Alta. L.R. (2d) 193.

2000 ABCA 256 (CanLII)

2000 ABCA 256 (CanLII)

An Earlier Relevant Decision

[26] The relationship between Sorrel and the Partnership was analysed by this court in the decision already mentioned, Bank of Nova Scotia v. Société Générale (Canada). It was found to be a trust relationship. The Court reviewed the terms of CAPL (under which Sorrel was defined as an operator and the Partnership a non-operator) and concluded as follows, at p.198:

> In brief, the agreement reflects confidence of the non-operators in Sorrel as operator and expressly provides that Sorrel keep them informed, account to them and in general act for their benefit.

[27] The Court found that the authorized commingling of Sorrel's funds with those of the Partnership did not negate the finding of a trust and was an aid to the smooth implementation of the overall arrangement. However, the Court made it very clear that Sorrel was not permitted to use the funds for its own purposes (at p.201):

> Sorrel was not permitted to use the funds as its own; its authority over the funds was restricted to the purposes of the agreement and those purposes, in general terms, were to act for the benefit of the non-operators.

[28] Thus, the Court concluded that Sorrel was at all material times in a fiduciary relationship with the Partnership, and the funds were impressed with a trust. It also found that Sorrel had to act for the benefit of the Partnership in the use of its funds and was not permitted to use the funds for itself.

[29] It follows that a use by Sorrel of Partnership funds for its own purposes was a breach of the trust.

The Trial Decision

[30] The trial judge held, as he was bound to do by the previous decision of this court, that a trust existed between Sorrel and the Partnership. However, he found no basis upon which to hold Speirs or Mix liable. That decision is appealed, as is his decision that any judgment should not include an amount that would have been available under a government grant, the Petroleum Incentive Program (PIP), and his decision that the Partnership should pay the costs of a third party, Sorrel's accountants. The trial judgments are reported at (1997) 198 A.R. 55 (as to liability) and (1997) 204 A.R. 7 (as to quantum and third party costs.)

[31] The trial judge found that funds drawn from the Partnership were deposited into Sorrel's operating account and were used by it for purposes other than to pay for the expenses authorized in the JVA and LPA. He found that Sorrel had used funds to pay some of its own overhead and general operating costs and said that by doing so it breached the trust.

[32] He found that commingling after an AFE was acceptable in the industry. (It is to be remembered that this Court said as much in the earlier decision.) He built on that foundation to find that even using Partnership funds to pay Sorrel's own bills was accepted industry practice. At (1997) 198 A.R. 55 at 65 he said:

> An important part of [the Partnership's] claim appears to be that [Sorrel] transferred the funds into its account with the knowledge that they would not be used immediately (or even within the near future) to pay [the Partnership] accounts. Further, that they would be used in the interim to pay, among other things, [Sorrel's] accounts. I am satisfied that what [Sorrel] was doing was an accepted practice at the time. Given that situation, even if it did constitute a breach of trust, it was not fraudulent and dishonest nor morally reprehensible.
> (Emphasis and party names supplied)

[33] In concluding that Speirs and Mix were liable neither as trustees nor as constructive trustees, the trial judge recognized that the applicable starting point for the analysis is the definitive case of Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd. (1993), 108 D.L.R. (4th) 592 (SCC).

[34] On this appeal, the Partnership alleges that the trial judge erred in failing to properly apply the tests set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Air Canada. While the Partnership did not abandon its argument that Speirs and Mix were liable as trustees, the primary thrust of its appeal was that Speirs and Mix were constructive trustees, liable for "knowingly assisting" in Sorrel's breach of trust. The Partnership also appeals the finding of a reduction for any PIP payment and the decision on third party costs.

2000 ABCA 256 (CanLII)

2000 ABCA 256 (CanLII)

Issues

[35] The Partnership alleges the following errors in the trial decision:

1. An incorrect application of the test for "knowing assistance" established in Air Canada and thus failure to find Speirs and Mix liable.

2. The failure to find Speirs and Mix liable as trustees of the Partnership.

3. Deducting PIP grants from the damage assessment.

4. The award of third party costs against the Partnership.

[36] The second issue can be quickly dealt with. I agree with the submissions of Speirs and Mix that there is no basis for finding that they were direct trustees of the Partnership, either in the Agreements or in their actions. The trial judge committed no error in concluding that there was no individual fiduciary relationship between either and the Partnership. The personal liability of Speirs and Mix must be determined on the basis of whether each is a constructive trustee.

THE TRUST

The Law

[37] The determination of whether Speirs and Mix are liable as constructive trustees requires reference to Air Canada v. M & L Travel Ltd., supra, and particularly the judgment of Justice Iacobucci writing for six members of the Court. (Justice McLachlin (as she then was), the seventh member of the panel, concurred in the result but expressed concern about placing the decision on wider principles than necessary.)

[38] In a later case, Gold v. Rosenberg (1997), 152 D.L.R. (4th) 385, Justice Iacobucci explained and restated the tests he created in Air Canada. The principles he set out were repeated in a later decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, Citadel General Assurance Co. v. Lloyds Bank Canada et al. (1997), 152 D.L.R. (4th) 411. (Justice McLachlin concurred in this case.)

[39] In Air Canada, Justice Iacobucci's judgment outlines the ways that a stranger to a trust may become liable for the breach of trust by another. These are (i) trustee de son tort, where the stranger acts as trustee, and which is inapplicable in this case; (ii) "knowing receipt", where the stranger knowingly receives funds in breach of trust, and which is also inapplicable; and (iii) "knowing assistance", where the stranger knowingly assists in a breach of trust. Only the third of these, where the stranger knowingly assists in the breach of trust, is relevant to this case.

[40] The origins of this third basis for liability lie in Barnes v. Addy (1874), 9 Ch. App. 244, where Lord Selborne LC said (at p.252), that strangers to a trust are not to be liable "unless they assist with knowledge in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees." In Air Canada, Justice Iacobucci identified two main issues requiring review under this test: the nature of the breach of trust and the degree of knowledge required of the stranger. Using them as his markers, he reviewed the law and its interpretation by English and Canadian courts.

Degree of knowledge of the stranger

[41] The knowledge required is actual knowledge. However, reckless or wilful blindness will also suffice (Air Canada at p.608). The knowledge must be of the existence of the trust and of what is being improperly done in breach of it: Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Herbert Smith & Co. (No.2),[1969] 2 All E.R. 367 (C.A.) at 379. If the trust arises from contract, knowledge depends on the familiarity or involvement of the stranger with the contract (Air Canada at pp.608-609). Justice Iacobucci noted that the knowledge requirement will not generally be a difficult hurdle to overcome in cases involving directors of closely held corporations because, if active, they usually have knowledge of the actions of the corporate trustee.

[42] Constructive knowledge, however, is not enough to fix liability for knowing assistance (Air Canada at p.609). Constructive knowledge is knowledge of a set of circumstances that would indicate the facts to an honest person, or knowledge of facts that would put an honest person on inquiry. It is insufficient because knowledge of this sort is not sufficient to bind the stranger's conscience in a case of knowing assistance, although it may be sufficient in a case of knowing receipt: Air Canada at p.609; Re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, [1987] Ch. 264 at 285.

Nature of the breach of trust

[43] Justice Iacobucci found that there are two lines of authority on this topic. One flows from Barnes v. Addy, and requires participation by the stranger in a dishonest and fraudulent design. The other, arising from Canadian cases and referred to as a 'modified standard', holds that an innocent or negligent breach of trust may be enough if the stranger is the controlling or directing mind of a corporate trustee and knowingly assists in the breach of trust. Proof of fraud or dishonesty has not been required.

[44] Justice Iacobucci explained that the modified standard reflects a difficulty with the application of the strict Barnes v. Addy standard to cases where the corporate trustee is actually controlled by the stranger to the trust. He recognized the difficulty in analysis that arises when the trustee is a corporation, which can only act through human agents who are strangers to the trust. He pointed out that the inquiry as to the nature of the breach of trust is whether the actual breach of trust was fraudulent and dishonest (in the equitable sense), not whether the stranger's actions should be so characterized. Justice Iacobucci emphasized that Barnes v. Addy clearly states that a stranger will be liable if he or she knowingly assisted the trustee in a fraudulent and dishonest breach of trust and therefore it is the trustee's actions which must be examined. He concluded that it is unnecessary to find that the stranger acted in bad faith or dishonestly.

[45] Finally, Justice Iacobucci proposed an approach that he considered was consistent with both lines of authority. He said (at p. 618):

> I would therefore 'take as a relevant description of fraud the taking of a risk to the prejudice of another's rights, which risk is known to be one which there is no right to take.' In my opinion this standard best accords with the basic rationale for the imposition of personal liability on a stranger to a trust which was enunciated in Re Montagu's Settlement Trusts, supra, namely, whether the stranger's conscience is sufficiently affected to justify the imposition of personal liability. In that respect, the taking of a knowingly wrongful risk resulting in prejudice to the beneficiary is sufficient to ground personal liability. This approach is consistent with both lines of authority previously discussed.

[46] In summary, following Air Canada, in a case of knowing assistance, the stranger to the trust must have knowledge of the trust and of what is being improperly done. That knowledge should be actual, although recklessness or wilful blindness will suffice. Constructive knowledge will normally not be enough.

[47] In considering the "nature of the breach of the trust", the breach by the trustee must be separated from the actions of the stranger. The breach of trust by the trustee must be "dishonest and fraudulent", in the equitable sense. Justice Iacobucci said that "dishonest and fraudulent" includes the "taking of a knowingly wrongful risk resulting in prejudice to the beneficiary". Thus, the personal liability of a stranger depends on whether the stranger "knowingly assisted" in the "dishonest and fraudulent design" which, to repeat, includes the "taking of a wrongful risk resulting in prejudice to the beneficiary". (As to whether there is a difference in meaning between the terms "dishonest" and "fraudulent", the comments of an English judge are interesting. In Belmont Finance Corp. Ltd. v. William Furniture Ltd. (No.1), [1979] 1 All E.R. 118 (CA) at 130, Lord Buckley said he did not see a distinction and opined that using them together does not add to the extent of dishonesty required.)

[48] In Gold, Justice Iacobucci reviewed what he had done in Air Canada. He said he adopted the definition of "knowing assistance" from Barnes v Addy, however, he defined a "dishonest and fraudulent design" to include "the taking of a knowingly wrongful risk resulting in prejudice to the beneficiary" (at p. 394).

[49] As for the measure to be taken of the knowledge of the stranger of the breach of trust, in Air Canada, Justice Iacobucci said he must have "actual knowledge that what is being done is improperly in breach of that trust" (at p. 608). In Gold, he said, it must be proven that the stranger "participated knowingly" in the breach of trust (at p. 394).

[50] In Gold, Justice Iacobucci set out three requirements for the finding of liability. I have changed the names from his list to those appropriate from the facts of this case:

(1) there was a trust;

(2) the named trustee, Sorrel, perpetrated a dishonest and fraudulent breach of trust; and

(3) Speirs or Mix participated in and had actual knowledge of Sorrel's dishonest and fraudulent breach of trust.

[51] The Air Canada definition of fraud and the special position of the director of a closely held corporation as regards knowledge, must be kept in mind and imported into the above requirements.

[52] In a very helpful article, "Constructive Thinking? The Supreme Court's Extension of Constructive Trusts to Banks on the Basis of Constructive Notice of a Breach of Trust by a Customer" (1998) 31 Can. Bus. L.J. 1, Bradley Crawford Q.C. reviews Air Canada, Gold, and Citadel and provides his own summary of the lessons from the cases.

Application of Air Canada test

[53] There is no better way to understand these principles than to see how they were applied by Justice Iacobucci. The facts in Air Canada were: the trust was between a travel agency and Air Canada, the respondent. Under the terms of the working agreement between them, all monies taken in by the travel agency were held in trust for Air Canada, although they were deposited in a general operating account in the bank. The travel agency had a line of credit with the bank and, when difficulties arose, the bank called in a demand loan and withdrew monies from the general operating account. The appellant, as a director and shareholder of the travel agency, was well aware of its relationship with Air Canada and with the bank. The issue was whether, as a stranger to the trust, he should be held personally liable.

[54] Justice Iacobucci found that the travel agency, as trustee, knew that the ticket monies were held in trust for Air Canada, and were not for the general use of the travel agency. He found that the travel agency knew that any positive balance in its general account was subject to the bank's demands and that by placing monies in that account it took a risk to the prejudice of the rights of the beneficiary, Air Canada, which risk was known to be one it had no right to take. Thus, he held the breach of trust by the travel agency was dishonest and fraudulent from an equitable standpoint.

[55] Justice Iacobucci found that the appellant had participated or assisted in the breach of trust by virtue of his action in managing the financial affairs of the travel agency. With respect to the knowledge requirement, although the appellant was not involved with the day-to-day operation of the travel agency, he had a general knowledge of the agreements and banking operandi. Most importantly, he knew that trust funds were being deposited in the general bank account which was subject to the demand loan of the bank. Thus, Justice Iacobucci found that even if the appellant could argue he had no subjective knowledge of the breach of trust, given the facts of which he did have subjective knowledge, he was wilfully blind to the breach or reckless in his failure to realize there had been a breach.

2000 ABCA 256 (CanLII)

Application of the Law

[56] The first step in the analysis of the possible personal liability of Speirs and Mix is to focus on the trust itself and on the trustee, Sorrel. As mentioned earlier, this Court found that a trust relationship existed between the Partnership and Sorrel and that Sorrel held the Partnership funds in trust. Thus, it follows that Sorrel's use of them for its own benefit was a breach of that trust.

[57] Following the same analysis as Justice Iacobucci, I will deal with the nature of the breach of trust and the degree of knowledge of the stranger.

The Nature of the Breach of Trust

[58] It is the nature of the breach of trust that must be of concern rather than the intent or knowledge of the strangers to the trust. As Justice Iacobucci pointed out, where the trustee is a corporation, the inquiry into breach by the trustee is conceptually difficult because the corporation can only act through human agents, who are technically strangers to the trust. Based on this Court's earlier decision, the breach of trust was Sorrel's use of Partnership funds for its own benefit. Speirs and Mix were the relevant human agency through which Sorrel operated. They set up and monitored all systems for the transfer funds from the Partnership to Sorrel. They designed the system whereby Sorrel could, through their authorisations and signatures, quickly draw down funds from the Partnership, place them in its general account and use them. This action also meant that Partnership funds were in Sorrel's general account and thus vulnerable to creditors.

[59] Does Sorrel's action meet the test set out in Barnes v. Addy, of "dishonest and fraudulent" design, or to use the words approved by Justice Iacobucci in Air Canada, was there the "taking of a risk to the prejudice of another's rights, which risk is known to be one which there is no right to take"? Clearly, in light of the analysis above, it does. The breach of trust by the trustee must be fraudulent, and it is unnecessary to find that the stranger acted in bad faith or dishonestly but only that he "knowingly assisted" in the breach. In other words, it is necessary that Speirs or Mix knowingly assisted the trustee, Sorrel, in taking a known risk, that there was no right to take, to the prejudice of the rights of another.

[60] As set out in the analysis of the evidence, both Speirs and Mix acknowledged that Sorrel used Partnership funds for its own benefit, for all manner of expenses including payroll, rent and even to pay revenue to other joint venture partners and for expenses on other wells. The trial judge made a finding of fact to this effect. There is no issue about the fact that funds not paid out for the benefit of the Partnership (and funds not used by Sorrel for its own benefit) were not refunded to the Partnership. Mix acknowledged that there was no monitoring of the use of these funds. It was some of those funds that were seized by the bank as part of the bankruptcy proceedings and were the subject of the earlier case before this Court. In effect, Sorrel treated the Partnership as a bank during the relevant time frame.

[61] There are two aspects of the way in which Sorrel dealt with Partnership funds that must be discussed at this point with the above test in mind. The first, that of commingling, took up most of the trial; the second is the issue of timing with respect to the draws or cash calls. It was the entire focus on these two features of the actions of Speirs and Mix that caused the trial judge to fall into error by incorrectly applying the Air Canada test.

[62] Both the LPA (7.11) and the JVA (13.3) state that funds of the Partnership shall not be commingled with Sorrel's funds. However, this Court, in its earlier decision, accepted the fact that commingling was authorized and found that it did not preclude the creation of a trust. An examination of the record shows that the issue of commingling dominated the trial. In the end, the trial judge found that it was a practice in the industry to commingle and that in doing so neither Speirs nor Mix knowingly participated in any fraudulent or dishonest activity. Thus, although other interpretations may have been possible, it has been found that simply commingling the Partnership funds with those of Sorrel after a cash call was not a breach of trust by Sorrel. It follows that the actions of Speirs and Mix in commingling the funds could not be the basis for their personal liability.

[63] The second, the cash calls and their timing, is central to the breach by the trustee and the consequential liability of Speirs and Mix because it was the means by which funds came to be in the general account of the trustee, Sorrel, and therefore available to it for its own benefit and at risk to the actions of creditors, just as in Air Canada.

[64] There is provision in the documents for advance cash calls. Under clause 3.3 of the JVA, the Partnership agreed to "advance such Capital Contributions to pay Partnership Costs as and when invoiced by Sorrel." The definition of Partnership Costs included: "80% of Drilling Costs, Completion Costs and Equipping Costs with respect to Earning Wells." Drilling Costs were further defined as: "[T]he amount spent or to be spent (exclusive of Completion and Equipping Costs) in respect of drilling. Coring, logging and testing a well for the recovery of Oil and Gas...". Thus, the only categories of costs for which funds could be drawn down in advance were for drilling, completion and equipping. All other costs had to be incurred and all but paid prior to draw-down, and were to be reimbursed separately.

[65] It was the AFE with back-up documentation that allowed the advance draws. Speirs testified that he was intimately familiar with what was being put forward and made sure each AFE was in order. Mix would then review it and they both would sign it.

[66] A review of Sorrel's situation at the end of December 1985 is rather telling. Drilling had been suspended because of the drop in the price of oil. Sorrel had a serious working capital deficit which Speirs and Mix were well aware of. There were outstanding invoices for drilling of only approximately $2,500. Yet AFE's were used to bring $780,000 from the Partnership into Sorrel. There was evidence, with which Speirs and Mix agreed, that Sorrel used these monies to pay its own operating costs, including rent and payroll.

[67] Drilling did commence in February and more funds were drawn down from the Partnership. Unfortunately the low oil prices and the working capital deficit continued. Sorrel was not only in the position of having used Partnership funds for purposes other than to benefit the Partnership but through its financial situation, taking a risk that the funds it held under the terms of the agreements, and on trust for the Partnership were vulnerable to creditors.

[68] The failure to make a critical payment to a bank, the Société Générale (Canada), crystallised the losses. The consequent receivership precluded any possibility of repayment of the moneys taken in breach of trust. While the explanation that Sorrel kept no copy of the critical documents and therefore the payment was forgotten, is unfortunate, it does not operate to reduce liability in any way.

[69] Applying the test to Speirs and Mix, they did knowingly assist Sorrel in obtaining cash advances and knowingly assisted in the use of those funds for Sorrel's benefit, which was a breach of the trust. Clearly, given Sorrel's financial position, the market and the consequential delay in drilling, Speirs and Mix knowingly assisted Sorrel in risking the loss or attachment by creditors of those funds and this risk was known to them. I find that Sorrel was, through Speirs and Mix, taking a risk it knew it had no right to take, to the prejudice of the rights of the Partnership. The breach of trust was, therefore, dishonest and fraudulent, according to the test in Air Canada.

Degree of knowledge of the stranger

[70] There is clear evidence that Speirs and Mix knew of the existence of the trust. It motivated Speirs to draft the documents in a particular way because of duties he knew he owed to more than one party and because of the risk of conflict of interest. Interestingly, Speirs testified that he did not want the Partnership to have a concern that Sorrel would have access to the Partnership's bank account for "anything other than effectively ... the operations of the partnership, so that Sorrel could not just sign cheques willy-nilly on their accounts". Mix described his concern about commingling that flowed from his knowledge that there remained a "partnership identity" on the Partnership funds drawn down.

[71] This same knowledge supports a conclusion that they knew that when the funds were being used for Sorrel's operational expenses, in circumstances in which they knew that Sorrel did not have funds of its own to otherwise cover those expenses, what was being done was improper. This was actual knowledge.

[72] As for the reality that Partnership funds were, through Sorrel's vulnerability, put at risk of being seized by creditors, even if Speirs and Mix did not have actual knowledge of this situation, they were certainly wilful and reckless. They had subjective knowledge that Sorrel had a serious working overdraft, the market was depressed and they were refinancing. It is relevant here that they were fully informed as to Sorrel's financial weakness and the use of Partnership funds to support Sorrel's operation. Furthermore, the failure to deal with the payment to the bank, that fateful step that finally put Sorrel into bankruptcy, was certainly reckless with a predictable and disastrous result for the Partnership funds.

[73] Going back to the steps set out in Gold, with some amplification, and applying them to the facts in this case:

(1) There was a trust between Sorrel and the Partnership.

(2) Sorrel perpetrated a dishonest and fraudulent breach of trust when through a "dishonest and fraudulent design" that is through the "taking of a knowingly wrongful risk resulting in prejudice to the beneficiary", Sorrel used Partnership funds for its own benefit, thereby depriving the Partnership of them, and retained those funds in its own general account when it did not have sufficient funds of its own to pay its own expenses, thereby putting them at risk to action by creditors. The potential risk was realised when Sorrel failed to make a payment on its bank loan.

(3) Speirs and Mix each participated in and had actual knowledge of Sorrel's "dishonest and fraudulent breach of trust", that is, the "taking of a knowingly wrongful risk resulting in prejudice to the beneficiary". Each had actual knowledge that funds from the Partnership were being used for Sorrel's benefit, in breach of the trust. Each had subjective knowledge of Sorrel's vulnerable financial position and the depressed market. Given those known facts, each was reckless and wilfully blind to the risk the situation presented to the Partnership's trust funds in Sorrel's general account.

[74] In the result, Speirs and Mix are personally liable to the Partnership for Sorrel's breach of trust, with the exception, with respect to Mix, of the final cash call, where he was not involved in any way.

[75] Furthermore, although little evidence seems to have been directed to this point at trial and thus there was no finding by the trial judge, Speirs and Mix gained an indirect benefit through use of the Partnership funds to meet Sorrel's operating expenses, which was their company and employer, and was in turn obliged to pay, and did pay, their salaries (AB 641). This benefit is not irrelevant to the analysis applied to Speirs and Mix, where equitable principles are implicit in every step. It is interesting that in Air Canada, at the end of his analysis of the knowledge of the stranger, Justice Iacobucci noted that it was relevant that the stranger benefited from the breach of trust.

[76] Furthermore, as Justice La Forest said in the Citadel case, "knowing assistance" is fault-based liability. That being the case, it is appropriate to take a loss/benefit view of the facts. The loss to the Partnership was significant. Over $1,000,000 was drawn down over a short period of time. While it could be argued that the cash calls were initially properly executed, the funds drawn down were not used in accordance with the stipulated purpose of paying the Partnership's expenses. The reality was that the largest part of the funds was deposited in Sorrel's account in late December, when drilling was on hold and no accounts for drilling costs were even due, much less invoiced. The system allowed Sorrel to obtain Partnership funds quickly and efficiently, so there was no need for Sorrel to have drawn them down early. By contrast, the benefit to Sorrel was significant. The Partnership funds in its general account no doubt made it look more financially robust than it really was, and allowed current expenses to be paid.

[77] The confirming test to be applied to the facts of this case is from Montagu's Settlement Trusts: is a stranger's conscience sufficiently affected to justify the imposition of personal liability? The answer, based on the facts of this case and the application of the Air Canada test, has to be yes.

The Errors by the Trial Judge

[78] As I have already stated, I find no merit in the appellant's argument that the trial judge erred in not finding that Speirs and Mix were in a direct fiduciary relationship with the Partnership.

[79] The appellant also alleges that the trial judge erred in failing to conclude that Speirs and Mix were liable as constructive trustees, and specifically alleges that the trial judge failed to properly apply the "knowingly assistance" part of the Air Canada test.

[80] Further, the appellant says the trial judge erred in accepting the practice of the industry as a defence and finding that it could override specific fiduciary obligations.

[81] The respondents took the position that they did not know of the trust between the Partnership and Sorrel. Their argument was that, if there was such a trust, it was not breached because Sorrel intended to use the funds to pay Partnership debts. The argument is not only not persuasive in light of the circumstances, but irrelevant in view of this Court's previous finding that Sorrel was not entitled to use the Partnership funds for its own purposes, whether before or after a cash call was executed.

2000 ABCA 256 (CanLII)

[82] As regards the actions of each, it was their position that since there was no evidence of dishonesty or fraud they could not be held liable.

[83] The trial judge outlined the issues, as he saw them, as follows: (at p. 62)

> The issues in this action, as defined by the plaintiff, are firstly, whether the relationship between [Sorrel] and the [Partnership] was one of trust. If there was a breach of the trust, was it fraudulent and dishonest? Did the individual defendants know of the existence of the trust? Were the individual defendants themselves fiduciaries? If they were, did they breach their duty to the [Partnership]?
>
> Perhaps the issues might be summed up in this way:
>
> Did the individual defendants have a fiduciary duty to the plaintiff? If so, did they breach that duty in transferring funds into [Sorrel's] account and allowing those funds to be used for purposes other than [Partnership] business?

[84] Missing from the statement of the issues is the analysis necessary to assess whether Speirs and Mix were constructive trustees, that is whether either "knowingly assisted" in Sorrel's breach. There is a merging of the analysis for liability as a direct trustee and as a constructive trustee.

[85] However, later in his judgment, the trial judge acknowledges the argument of counsel for the Partnership on "knowingly assisted" and sets out extracts of the Air Canada judgment and says he accepts it as the law.

[86] He characterizes the appellant as seeking to attach "blameworthiness" to Speirs and Mix. In applying the Air Canada tests he points out that the Agreements allow for advance cash draws and commingling and finds that these practices are accepted by both the oil and gas industry and the auditing and accounting community. He also noted that Sorrel had every intention of paying the bills related to the wells. He found that the actions of the bank, Société Générale, came as a "complete and disastrous surprise".

[87] He concluded his analysis as follows: (p.65)

> An important part of the [Partnership's] claim appears to be that [Sorrel] transferred the funds into its account with the knowledge that they would not be used immediately (or even within the near future) to pay [Partnership] accounts. Further, that they would be used in the interim to pay, among other things, [Sorrel] accounts. I am satisfied that what [Sorrel] was doing was an accepted practice > at the time. Given that situation, even if it did constitute a breach of trust, it was not fraudulent and dishonest nor morally reprehensible.

>
> With respect to the individual defendants, they were strangers to the trust and were not constructive trustees. Given their frame of mind at the time–that they believed what [Sorrel] was doing was acceptable and quite proper–they can hardly be said to have acted in bad faith or dishonestly. They were not taking any risk which they knew they had no right to take.
> (Emphasis supplied)

[88] Although the trial judge did review the conduct of Speirs and Mix on the basis of the appellant's argument that they were liable as constructive trustees using the Air Canada test, he made several errors of law and an error of fact.

Errors of Law

[89] Under the Air Canada test, it is not necessary that the actions of the strangers, Speirs and Mix, be "dishonest", "blameworthy" or in "bad faith". Indeed Justice Iacobucci said, at pp. 617-18:

> It must be remembered that it is the nature of the breach of trust that is under consideration at this point in the analysis, rather than the intent or knowledge of the stranger to the trust. That is, the issue here is whether the breach of trust was fraudulent and dishonest, not whether the appellant's actions should be so characterized.
>
> It is unnecessary therefore, to find that the appellant himself acted in bad faith or dishonestly.

[90] Thus, the trial judge erred in concluding that Speirs and Mix could not be liable because they did not act in bad faith or dishonestly. The test under Air Canada was whether either "knowingly assisted" in the "dishonest and fraudulent" design, that is in Sorrel taking "a risk to the prejudice of another's rights, which risk is known to be one which there is no right to take". The trial judge did not properly apply the Air Canada test and thus made an error of law. On a proper analysis Speirs and Mix must be found to have "knowingly assisted" Sorrel in its breach of trust with the Partnership.

[91] Although the trial judge accepted that Sorrel breached its trust with the Partnership by using Partnership funds for its own benefit, he found that it was an accepted practice in the oil and gas industry for parties in a trust relationship and that it was therefore not dishonest, fraudulent or morally reprehensible.

[92] The first question raised by this finding is whether it could be said that there is such a practice and, secondly, even if there is, whether it is a defence to a clear breach of trust.

[93] In fact there was expert evidence from the chief financial officer of an oil and gas company that, like Sorrel, acted as a general partner in numerous limited partnerships, such as the Partnership. He stated that limited partnership funds were used only to pay limited partnership costs and not to finance the general operations of the general partner.

[94] An examination of the record of the trial shows that the evidence focused on whether commingling of funds was accepted practice. There is insufficient evidence on the record to warrant a finding that there was an accepted practice of allowing such a breach of fiduciary duties.

[95] In any case, fiduciary duties cannot be overridden or destroyed by an accepted practice. The standard of care is set by the court, with reference to accepted practice, but the court may in certain circumstances find that the practice itself is negligent. (See Roberge v. Bolduc, [1991] 1 S.C.R. 374 (practice of notaries regarding title searches fell below standard of care); Waldick v. Malcolm, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 456 (local custom of not salting or sanding ice negligent in face of statutory duties); ter Neuzen v. Korn, [1995] 3 S.C.R. 674 (standard medical practice found to be negligent).) It is not acceptable for a trustee to use trust funds for its own purposes, even in the expectation that it will be able to repay those funds.

[96] It was an error of law for the trial judge to conclude that the accepted practice in this case (even if it existed), which breached fiduciary duties, shielded either the trustee or the strangers to the trust from liability.

Of fact

[97] The trial judge found that Speirs and Mix “were not taking any risk which they knew they had no right to take”. That finding of fact is not supported by the evidence. I will not review the evidence again but both Speirs and Mix knew that Sorrel was using Partnership funds for its own benefit. They knew that Sorrel was making cash calls when drilling had not even occurred nor invoices rendered, and that Sorrel would not have to pay for the drilling costs for months. They also knew Sorrel was seriously cash starved. Sorrel drew down more than $1,000,000 and placed it into its general account, and Speirs and Mix knew that those funds were being used for Sorrel’s operating expenses, and also that they were vulnerable to creditors. It was an error of fact to find they did not know that Sorrel was taking a risk it had no right to take.

2000 ABCA 256 (CanLII)

[98] The standard of review of an error of fact is palpable and overriding error: see Toneguzzo-Norvell v. Burnaby Hospital, [1994] 2 W.W.R. 609, at para.13, per McLachlin J. I consider that there is such an error in the judge's assessment of the facts.

Conclusion on Trust

[99] The trial judge made errors of law and of fact. On a proper application of the law as set out in Air Canada, Speirs and Mix must be held liable for the loss suffered by the Partnership from Sorrel's breach of trust. However, as Mix did not participate in the final cash call, his liability must be reduced by the amount of the last cash call.

DAMAGES

[100] In a supplementary judgment, the trial judge held that, had he found a breach of fiduciary duty, he would have set the quantum of damages in the amount of $1,076,000, from which he would have deducted amounts received by Partnership, namely: $250,000 which was received from monies paid into court through the bankruptcy proceedings and the amount of $191,000 received by the Partnership as a Petroleum Incentive Payment (PIP). The Partnership appeals the ruling on the PIP. The argument is that they "are entitled to receive the amount of the funds improperly handled which would include the $191,000".

[101] The starting point, as LaForest J. noted in Hodgkinson v. Simms, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 377 at p. 440, is that "the proper approach to damages for breach of a fiduciary duty is restitutionary", and referred to "the need to put special pressure on those in positions of trust and power" (at p. 452). Although in that judgment he recognised that there is to be some flexibility in remedies in equity and, in particular, that they should not be out of proportion with the defendant's behaviour (at p. 444), Trustees must be held to a high standard of care. Speirs and Mix are prima facie liable, together with Sorrel, for the full amount that was misappropriated by Sorrel.

[102] The argument for crediting the PIP is grounded in the nature of the Partnership as an investment. Thus, the funds appropriated by Sorrel would have been spent on the wells, and the PIP was part of the money that would have come back from those wells. According to this argument, the Partnership cannot have its funds and the PIP that those funds created.

[103] The problem with this argument is that it contradicts the basic restitutionary approach already outlined. Furthermore, the relevant causal link must be between the misappropriation of the joint venture funds and the PIP. The PIP does not amount to a repayment of the misused funds. It was an incentive paid by the government, and qualification for the incentive was based on the activities of the joint venture. While drilling the wells created the circumstances which led to the PIP, it would have been received whether or not there was a breach of fiduciary duty. It cannot, from this point of view, be used to reduce liability.

[104] In the case quoted above, LaForest J. continued: “the appellant is entitled to be put in as good a position as he would have been in had the breach not occurred.” In the present case, had the breach not occurred, the Partnership funds would not have been drawn down or, if they had, they would only have been used to pay the authorized costs. Those costs that were paid have already been deducted. (I leave aside the question of whether the creditors whose debts arose out of the drilling could have made a claim on these funds.) The PIP would still have been received. The trial judge made an error in principle in his assessment of damages. The Partnership is therefore entitled to the full amount of $1,076,000, less the $250,000 paid into court.

COSTS

[105] The trial judge awarded third party costs against the appellant in a separate ruling (Sorrel 1985 Limited Partnership v. Sorrel Resources Ltd. (1997), 204 A.R. 7). The trial judge was aware that the usual rule is that an unsuccessful plaintiff (here the Partnership) will not be charged with third party costs. However, he found this to be an unusual case as the third party was the firm of accountants upon whose advice Mix and Speirs had relied, and awarded costs on the grounds that the joinder was inevitable.

[106] The judge’s ruling was based on the failure of the plaintiff at trial. In view of my conclusion that Mix and Speirs are constructive trustees and personally liable to the Partnership, that basis for the award of third party costs against the Partnership has disappeared. The award of costs is accordingly overturned. The joinder of the third party may have been inevitable, but the success of the plaintiff on appeal raises the question of the liability of the accountants to Sorrel, Speirs and Mix, which was not ruled upon by the judge.

CONCLUSION

[107] The appeal as to liability and damages is allowed and the respondents, Speirs and Mix are jointly and severally liable to the appellant in the amount of $688,000. Speirs is also liable for an additional $138,000. The appeal of the award of third party costs is also allowed.

[108] With respect to interest, while I recognise that ordinarily there would be an award of pre-judgment interest, I must also recognise that it is appropriate in certain circumstances to grant relief. In my view, in all of the circumstances of this case, it is appropriate to award interest from the date of the trial judge’s decision in this action, that is, March 10, 1997. The rate of interest will be that prescribed in accordance with the Judgment Interest Act, S.A. 1984, c. J-0.5.

Memorandum of Judgment

The Court:

I. Overview

[1] James Metcalfe appeals a judgment finding him jointly and severally liable in tort along with Tru-Square Homes Ltd, in which he owns 99% of the shares. The trial judge found a breach of the standard of care owed to the respondents Craig and Georgina Swanby in the construction of their residence by Tru-Square. The claim advanced is a pure economic loss claim; there is no allegation of personal injury or actual property damage sustained by the Swanbys.

[2] There is no contest over the trial judge's findings that the contracts or the amendment or amendments to the contracts were between Tru-Square and the Swanbys, and that "no contractual remedy is available as against Metcalfe". There is also no contest over the trial judge's findings that Mr Metcalfe's actions throughout the construction project were not "sufficient to constitute fraud", nor whether Mr Metcalfe induced a breach of contract.

[3] The only substantive issue on appeal is whether the trial judge erred in finding Mr Metcalfe jointly and severally liable for the wrongful acts of Tru-Square.

[4] For the reasons below, the appeal is allowed.

II. Facts

[5] The Swanbys purchased land west of Carstairs in 2009 or 2010 for the purpose of constructing a family home. They initially retained a designer of large custom-built homes and an architectural draftsperson. Drawings were complete by mid to late 2010.

[6] The Swanbys had seen Tru-Square signs on homes in the Carstairs area and Mr Metcalfe was the next-door neighbour of Ms Swanby's brother.

[7] The Swanbys contacted Mr Metcalfe to see whether Tru-Square would be interested in acting as general contractor for the construction of the house. Mr Metcalfe initially turned down the prospect of this contract on behalf of Tru-Square, indicating that he was "looking to wind-up his construction business and was not really interested in taking on the project".

[8] In the spring of 2011, the Swanbys contacted Mr Metcalfe again and he indicated Tru-Square was "possibly interested, but only in terms of construction to the lock-up stage", including pouring the foundation, framing, and installation of doors and windows.

2023 ABCA 224 (CanLII)

[9] In July and August 2011, Mr Metcalfe provided the Swanbys with several quotes on the project. The initial quote was for $500,000 to complete construction to the lock-up stage. The second quote, dated July 6, 2011, was for $578,875.40, adding interior drywall and exterior stucco to the original lock-up quote. The Swanbys advised that for financing purposes their bank required a quote for the entire cost of building the home, including all interior finishing. So a third quote was provided, dated August 4, 2011, totalling $1,064,348 for the entire construction project. A fourth quote was provided on August 21, 2011, listing a number of items totalling $352,251 with an addition of $659,510 for a total of $1,011,761.

[10] On August 22, 2011 the Swanbys entered into one or more contracts with Tru-Square. The contracts were always only with Tru-Square, not Mr Metcalfe, and Mr Metcalfe signed the contracts only as the principal of Tru-Square, and not in a personal capacity. Despite the signing of multiple contracts, the parties agreed on August 22, 2011 that Tru-Square would build the house "to the lock-up stage only, with framing to start in late September 2011 and completion to lock-up stage by early 2012".

[11] Construction work began in September 2011, with Tru-Square acting as general contractor and all actual work being completed by subcontractors. Mr Metcalfe was not present during construction over significant periods of time from 2011 to 2013.

[12] In May 2013, an issue arose with respect to leaking windows and water leaking through the soffits. Tru-Square took the position that fixing windows was not its responsibility, and shortly thereafter left the construction site and never returned.

[13] On or about July 17, 2013, Ms Swanby served Mr Metcalfe with a letter listing extensive alleged deficiencies. The Swanbys hired a different general contracting firm to begin investigative and demolition work, and a building envelope engineer and structural engineer to identify construction and building code deficiencies. Remediation work began in July or August 2014 and the Swanbys took possession of a fully remediated house in late August or early September 2015, more than two years after the initial occupancy date.

[14] On September 13, 2013, the Swanbys filed a statement of claim against Tru-Square, Mr Metcalfe, and his spouse Joyce Metcalfe. The claim was amended on March 12, 2014. They alleged 49 separate deficiencies which they said were "the result of a deliberate plan to cut corners, deviate from the Building Contract requirements, the Plans, and the Code, and to obtain the Plaintiffs' funds without providing the value or quality that the Plaintiffs paid for". They alleged the house was unsafe and not fit for habitation and pleaded that "Tru-Square is liable to the Plaintiffs for breach of contract".

[15] The Swanbys additionally alleged that both Tru-Square and Mr Metcalfe were "liable to the Plaintiffs in negligence", had "engaged from the outset in a fraudulent scheme", had "committed a fraud on the County and the building approval process", engaged in a "fraudulent effort to cover up the Deficiencies", and deliberately mispresented the state of the project. They pleaded that Mr Metcalfe was "personally liable for such fraudulent conduct", and asked for aggravated damages, punitive damages, and injunctive relief. They sought a tracing of funds, an accounting, a declaration that they had an interest in a property owned by the Metcalfes, to which they said funds had been diverted, and damages of $1,000,000 for "breach of contract, negligence, conspiracy, unjust enrichment, breach of trust, breach of fiduciary duty, and fraud".

[16] A statement of defence was filed on September 17, 2014, a counterclaim was filed on April 23, 2014, and a trial was conducted over 26 days, commencing April 8 and completed on November 28, 2019.

[17] Reasons for Decision were issued March 18, 2022 (2022 ABQB 215) and the notice of appeal was filed April 14, 2022.

III. Trial Judge's Decision

[18] In his 772-paragraph decision, the trial judge comprehensively reviewed the facts and the allegations of deficiencies in the Swanby home. He concluded that the initial agreement reached between Tru-Square and the Swanbys on August 22, 2011 was to complete the house only to lock-up. He said Mr Metcalfe was "on site only occasionally during the framing process" and the "project did not proceed as rapidly as expected". He found that Tru-Square and Mr Metcalfe left the construction site in May or June 2013 and never returned. As a result, the Swanbys hired other parties to find and repair deficiencies and complete construction of the house.

[19] As to the Swanbys' allegation that Tru-Square and Mr Metcalfe should be held concurrently liable in contract and tort, he said it "makes no practical difference whether a case is assessed as a tort claim or a contract claim" as the "measure of damages is the same", but that contractual liability is limited to the specific contracting parties, except in cases of lifting the corporate veil.

[20] On this point he concluded:

> . . . Tru-Square breached its contract with the Plaintiffs. Contrary to their agreement, numerous aspects of the construction failed to meet Code standards, let alone the higher standard advocated by the Plaintiffs and their experts. Further, Tru-Square failed to provide proper supervision of the subcontractors.

However, as noted, he found that whatever its terms, the contract "was with Tru-Square only, not with Metcalfe", and that "no contractual remedy is available as against Metcalfe".

[21] As to liability in tort, the trial judge repeated three times that Mr Metcalfe acted in a negligent manner. He said Mr Metcalfe "was certainly negligent in his oversight of the project and in his dealings with the Plaintiffs" and he and Tru-Square together were "careless, even negligent" in billing for work not completed. He concluded by finding "the Defendants jointly and severally liable in tort for breach of the duty of care owed to the Plaintiffs in the construction of the Plaintiffs' residence". What he meant, of course, was that assuming a duty of care, they were in breach of the established standard of care. However, all three references involve Mr Metcalfe, sometimes collectively with Tru-Square, acting in his corporate capacity in the contractual relationship between Tru-Square and the Swanbys. None of those instances point to individual, independent liability on the part of Mr Metcalfe.

[22] The trial judge said the Swanbys sought to establish liability for Mr Metcalfe's "negligent performance of [his] contractual obligations", "via a number of different routes": inherently dangerous work, fraud, piercing the corporate veil, or inducing breach of contract. He did not say they sought to prove concurrent liability in tort as a separate route to liability, a claim different than piercing the corporate veil or these other allegations.

[23] In first addressing inherently dangerous work, he found the as-built condition of the deck "posed a significant risk to users of the deck and the outdoor space accessed from the basement directly beneath the deck", such that the "deck construction was inherently dangerous". He found "the as-built condition of the Bonus Room staircase posed a significant risk to the various trades who may have had occasion to use it during the course of construction" and to others who may have used the staircase in the future had it not been repaired.

[24] The trial judge said that in considering inherently dangerous work as one possible means to liability, he was "satisfied that [his] findings do not require proof of actual injury to persons or of actual collapse", relying upon Vargo v Hughes, 2013 ABCA 96, paras 26, 27, 43, 544 AR 99. However, he acknowledged it was "not clear . . . that Vargo permits the Plaintiffs to recover from Metcalfe personally, as opposed to from Tru-Square". It appears the trial judge did not find inherently dangerous work by itself as a means of finding liability in negligence for Mr Metcalfe. The Swanbys agree that the trial judge "left open Metcalfe's personal liability for dangerous defects".

[25] On the question of fraud, as indicated, the trial judge was "not satisfied that Metcalfe's failure to disclose the construction deficiencies is sufficient to constitute fraud", and he was "not prepared to find that his conduct [in his oversight of the project and dealings with the Swanbys] amounted to fraud". He also found the Swanbys had not established fraud with respect to invoices alleged to be "for work not completed" and "goods and services that were not provided". He concluded: "I am not prepared to find that Metcalfe's conduct was fraudulent, though I will say that I consider this case very close to the line".

[26] The trial judge reviewed numerous cases on piercing the corporate veil, although he blurred this analysis with that for concurrent liability in tort. He found that "Tru-Square was not a mere shell incorporated for the purpose of carrying out a wrongful act" and that it had operated as a successful, legitimate home-building business for some time prior to the events in question. On the other hand, he found that "Metcalfe treated himself and Tru-Square interchangeably and intermingled the corporation's affairs with his own" including mingling his and his wife's "personal money with Tru-Square's", thereby treating Tru-Square as his "alter ego". He concluded:

> . . . the combination of the sheer number of construction deficiencies, their pervasive nature affecting many aspects of the residence, the physical danger posed by some of these deficiencies, [and] Metcalfe's ultimate abandonment of the project rises to a level that warrants looking through the corporate shield.

[27] As a result, he found that "personal liability should attach to Metcalfe in these circumstances". This was reinforced by a finding that Mr Metcalfe had cancelled a general commercial insurance policy in the name of "Tru-Square Homes, o/b Jim Metcalfe", "as soon as the windows leaked and a substantial amount of water leaked into the interior of the residence" and also cancelled his Workers' Compensation Board coverage, such that "Metcalfe's failure to maintain insurance coverage should be visited upon him rather than the Plaintiffs".

[28] Finally, the trial judge rejected the Swanbys' claim against Mr Metcalfe for inducing breach of contract.

[29] In sum, the trial judge's decision rested on piercing the corporate veil, along with an apparent determination, without substantive analysis, that Mr Metcalfe and Tru-Square were jointly liable in tort.

IV. Grounds of Appeal

[30] Mr Metcalfe submits the trial judge erred in law in determining that the corporate veil should be pierced, and made errors of fact in accepting the evidence of the Swanbys and their witnesses over his evidence and that of his witnesses.

V. Standard of Review

[31] The standard of review on questions of law is correctness, on questions of fact is palpable and overriding error, and on questions of mixed law and fact is palpable and overriding error unless there is an extricable error of law: Housen v Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, paras 7-37, [2002] 2 SCR 235.

VI. Analysis

[32] The concept of separate legal personality was established in Salomon v Salomon & Co, [1897] AC 22, 22-32, 51-54 (HL), in which the court said: "either the limited company [is] a legal entity or it [is] not. If it [is], the business belong[s] to it and not to Mr. Salomon"; and further, "the company is at law a different person altogether from subscribers to the memorandum". That distinction is the "corporate veil" between the company and its owner.

[33] The Alberta Business Corporations Act, RSA 2000, c B-9, ss 16(1), 46(1), provides for a corporation establishing a separate corporate personality from its shareholders, with no exception for single shareholder corporations. Additionally, the Interpretation Act, RSA 2000, c I-8, s 16, provides that the establishment of a corporation vests in the corporation the right to contract and be contracted with in its corporate name, makes the corporation liable to be sued in its corporate name, and exempts from personal liability individual members of the corporation.

[34] Courts are generally unwilling to lift or pierce the corporate veil unless required to do so by statute or in the face of extraordinary circumstances: Kevin P McGuinness, Canadian Business Corporations Law, 3rd ed (Toronto: LexisNexis, 2017), vol 1, 7.47. It requires a court to disregard the fundamental principle of separate identity and view the corporation as an "agent" or "puppet" of its controlling shareholder.

[35] However, this is not truly a case of piercing the corporate veil. It is a case of alleged concurrent liability in tort. The analysis is completely different. The fundamental flaw in the trial judge's reasoning is his failure to distinguish between these two distinct doctrines, an error in principle.

[36] The two separate concepts are discussed in Driving Force Inc v I Spy-Eagle Eyes Safety Inc, 2022 ABCA 25, paras 48-49, 466 DLR (4th) 292:

> Liability in tort is primarily personal; a tort arises when the tortfeasor breaches a duty imposed on him or her by the law of tort. Corporations are considered to be separate legal persons, with their own rights and obligations; their shareholders and directors are not personally liable for the corporation's obligations. Corporations, however, can only act through human agents, and any corporate tort generally involves concurrent human actions. There is thus a conflict between these two basic principles: personal liability in tort, and the separate legal personality of corporations.
>
> This engages two separate but overlapping concepts. There are some occasions where the law will "lift the corporate veil", and find the directing minds behind the corporation responsible for the liabilities and obligations of the corporation. These situations are, however, an exception to the general rule that there is no personal liability for corporate obligations. The related concept is when the corporation and its human agents are concurrently liable in tort. When an individual is found to be concurrently liable for a tort committed in the name of a corporation, this is not truly an instance of "lifting the corporate veil". The liability of the individual is based on his or her breach of an individual duty owed in tort, not by lifting the corporate veil to impose the corporation's duty or liability on the individual.

[37] As set out in Hogarth v Rocky Mountain Slate Inc, 2013 ABCA 57, para 110, 542 AR 289 and Hall v Stewart, 2019 ABCA 98, para 18, 82 Alta LR (6th) 233, there are a number of factors to be considered in determining whether concurrent personal liability should be imposed for corporate torts:

(a) Whether the negligent act was committed while engaged in the business of the corporation, and whether the negligence of the employee was contemporaneous with that of the corporation;

(b) Whether the individual was pursuing any personal interest beyond the corporate interest;

(c) Whether the director or corporate representative owed a separate and distinct duty of care towards the injured party;

(d) Whether the conduct was "in the best interests of the company";

(e) Whether the plaintiff voluntarily dealt with the limited liability corporation, or had the corporate relationship "imposed" on it;

(f) The expectations of the parties;

(g) Whether the tort was "independent";

(h) The exception in Said v Butt, [1920] 3 KB 497 [where the director or servant actually takes part in or authorizes such torts as assault, trespass to property, nuisance, or inducing breach of contract];

(i) The nature of the tort, and particularly whether it was an intentional tort;

(j) Whether the damage was physical or economic.

See also Driving Force, paras 64-66; Parks v McAvoy, 2023 ABCA 211, paras 45, 51; and Blacklaws v Morrow, 2000 ABCA 175, paras 48, 50, 51, 66, 81, 187 DLR (4th) 614, leave ref'd [2001] 1 SCR vii.

[38] The trial judge found that Mr Metcalfe acted in a negligent manner in his oversight of the project and dealings with the plaintiffs, and acted with carelessness in billing for work not properly completed. The finding of "negligence" means that the standard of care was breached. Personal liability on Mr Metcalf, however, depends on him owing a separate, personal duty of care in tort.

2023 ABCA 224 (CanLII)

[39] Applying the criteria in Hogarth, Hall, and Driving Force, any negligent act committed was while Mr Metcalfe was engaged in the business of the corporation, and contemporaneous with that of the corporation. There was no finding by the trial judge that Mr Metcalfe was pursuing any personal interest beyond the corporate interest, despite the allegations of fraud. There was no finding by the trial judge that Mr Metcalfe owed a separate and distinct duty of care towards the Swanbys, separate and apart from that owed by Tru-Square. Mr Metcalfe acted in the interests of Tru-Square, and not for some individual and distinct interest of his own. The Swanbys voluntarily dealt with Tru-Square; they did not have the corporate relationship imposed on them. The expectations of the parties were that Tru-Square would act as a general contractor supervising subcontractors in the construction of the Swanbys' home. Mr Metcalfe was personally out of the country for much of that contract period, and the Swanbys were aware for the most part of his proposed extended absences.

[40] There is no evidence that any allegations of tort against Mr Metcalfe were independent from allegations of tort or breach of contract against Tru-Square. The alleged torts against Mr Metcalfe were in pure economic loss, a non-intentional tort, not the type of tort in which concurrent liability has been employed: assault, trespass, nuisance, or personal injury.

[41] All of these factors point to the conclusion that there is no independent tort liability on the part of Mr Metcalfe, separate and apart from the liability found in Tru-Square. The only available remedy for the Swanbys is against Tru-Square. Personal liability cannot be imposed on human agents of the corporation just based on "the circumstances of the case", as the trial judge implied.

[42] The trial judge erred in specifically determining not to follow binding precedent, Hall and Hogarth, when he said he found those cases "difficult to reconcile" with earlier cases, and that "each case will be specific to its own context and circumstances". The trial judge was bound by those decisions. The reason the trial judge found these cases "difficult to reconcile" is because he conflated the concepts of concurrent liability in tort and piercing the corporate veil. Hall and Hogarth address concurrent liability in tort; the trial judge dismissed these cases in the context of piercing the corporate veil.

[43] Additionally, the trial judge placed too much reliance on this Court's decision in Aubin v Petrone, 2020 ABCA 13, paras 21-24, 33-36, 40, 59, 68, 100 Alta LR (6th) 10. Aubin is a post-judgment decision about how a family property judgment can be executed when family wealth is tied up in a corporation, and one spouse, the directing will and mind of the corporation, is purposely blocking payment. Aubin is not a case of piercing the corporate veil in order to make the shareholder liable for the obligations of the corporation. If anything, it is the opposite: an attempt to make the corporation liable for the family law obligation of the shareholder. Nor is it a case of concurrent liability by the shareholder and the corporation in tort. It involves a sui generis situation, and has little application outside family law. However, before judgment is obtained, the principles of piercing the corporate veil and the concurrent liability in tort apply equally in family law. As indicated in Driving Force, para 54, Aubin has "little to offer outside that context", as it was coloured by considerations of corporate oppression.

[44] As a result, the trial judge's conclusion that "personal liability should attach to Metcalfe in these circumstances" was unprincipled and unjustified, as the route to that conclusion was in error.

VII. Conclusion

[45] The appeal is allowed. Mr Metcalfe is not jointly liable for the negligence of Tru-Square.

ENDORSEMENT

[1] This motion to strike arises in the context of four proceedings that I am case managing. The action bearing court file number CV-22-00689774 is commonly referred to by the parties as "the main action" or "the fraud action". Several of the defendants in that action[1], referred to collectively here as "the Arbour defendants", recently issued a third-party claim against PricewaterhouseCoopers and Mr. Poechman. The Arbour defendants' third-party claim seeks contribution and indemnity from the third parties for any amounts for which the Arbour defendants are found liable to the plaintiffs in the main action. I refer to the plaintiffs as the plaintiffs or the Wekerle group.

[2] The third parties, PwC and Mr. Poechman, move to strike the claim against them on the basis that it discloses no reasonable cause of action. The third parties also argue that the claim is so devoid of material facts that it is fatally deficient and ought to be struck. They argue that the claim's deficiencies are fundamental and cannot be cured by amendments. Therefore, leave to amend should not be granted.

[3] The Arbour defendants argue that amendments are not required, but, in the alternative, they should be granted leave to amend if the pleadings are struck.

[4] To understand the arguments, the underlying action must be reviewed.

The Main Action

The amended statement of claim

[5] The statement of claim was issued on November 4, 2022, and amended on May 17, 2024. The amended claim is extensive. What follows is a bare overview of its contents, particularly as they relate to the Arbour defendants.

[6] The allegations in the claim arise from a business relationship between Mr. Wekerle and Mr. Arbour. In brief, in about 2014, Mr. Wekerle began to purchase some of BlackBerry's real estate in Waterloo, Ontario. Mr. Wekerle incorporated separate holding companies for the purchase of each property (the various Waterloo Innovation Network Inc. (or WIN) plaintiffs, referred to as the WIN Holdcos). Wekerloo Developments Inc. is an investment holding company and the parent company of the WIN Holdcos.

[7] Mr. Wekerle also incorporated the defendant WIN PM as the property management entity for the properties purchased by each WIN Holdco.

[1] Mark Allen Arbour, Waterloo Innovation Network PM Inc., Tammy Marie Arbour, Tyson James Comtois-Arbour, and 2427204 Ontario Ltd.

2025 ONSC 1456 (CanLII)

[8] Mr. Wekerle met Mr. Arbour and hired him initially as a property manager for the Holdcos's properties. Over time, Mr. Arbour's responsibilities increased. Mr. Wekerle made Mr. Arbour a signing officer for the WIN Holdcos and WIN PM, and Chief Operating Officer of Wekerloo.

[9] In 2019, Mr. Wekerle transferred the shares of WIN PM to Mr. Arbour. Mr. Wekerle claims that the transfer was temporary, and that he remained the beneficial owner of WIN PM. Mr. Arbour disagrees.

[10] The claim alleges that several years after the WIN PM share transfer, Mr. Wekerle hired Deloitte to obtain some financial information from Mr. Arbour about WIN PM and the WIN Holdcos. Mr. Arbour, according to the claim, was not very responsive and resigned abruptly shortly thereafter. The claim alleges that Mr. Wekerle then discovered that the Arbour defendants had perpetrated a significant fraud against the Wekerle group. The claim alleges, among other things, that Mr. Arbour unlawfully sold assets, misappropriated funds, received secret commissions, and gave himself and others unauthorized bonuses, diverting millions of dollars from the Wekerle group for the personal benefit of the Arbour defendants.

[11] The amended claim seeks damages in the amount of $15 million and other relief for fraud, conspiracy, conversion, breach of trust, breach of contract and unjust enrichment. In addition to the Arbour defendants, the plaintiffs claim against some legal and real estate professionals.

[12] Additionally, one of the defendants in the main action is Corey Delaney. Mr. Delaney is a chartered professional accountant. The claim alleges Mr. Delaney was engaged to provide financial and accounting advice to WIN PM and the WIN Holdcos. The claim alleges that "Delaney's failure to identify and investigate various badges of fraud resulted in the issuance of materially misleading financial statements." The plaintiffs sue Mr. Delaney for breach of contract, negligent misrepresentation, and negligence. The plaintiffs allege Mr. Delaney breached his duty of care to the Wekerle Group, and that "he knew or ought to have known it was reasonably foreseeable that a breach of Delaney's duties of care would result in injury to the Wekerle Group."

[13] The claim alleges that "[y]et more [of Arbour's frauds] were carried out in coordination with the McCarter Grespan Defendants, the Broker Defendants, and Delaney."

The crossclaims

[14] Mr. Delaney defended the action in a statement of defence and crossclaim dated November 21, 2022. That pleading states that Mr. Delaney "assisted WIN PM on a part-time basis in maintaining rent rolls, providing revenue forecasting and financial reporting, and assisted in carrying out due diligence for possible new properties. He was not responsible for any bookkeeping duties." Mr. Delaney identifies Mr. Poechman as the controller of WIN PM and the WIN Holdcos from 2019 to June 30, 2022. Mr. Delaney pleads that he relied on the accuracy of the bookkeeping and financial records prepared by others, and on the accuracy of the financial statements provided by PwC.

2025 ONSC 1456 (CanLII)

[15] Mr. Delaney crossclaims against Mr. Arbour and WIN PM for contribution and indemnity for any amounts for which he is found liable to the plaintiffs. He does not assert third-party claims against PwC, Mr. Poechman, or anyone else he identifies in his pleading as assisting with the bookkeeping and financial records.

[16] The Arbour defendants, in a pleading dated January 19, 2023, defended the claim and crossclaimed against Mr. Delaney (and the other non-Arbour defendants) for contribution and indemnity with respect to any relief obtained by the plaintiffs against them.

The third-party claim

[17] On October 30, 2024, the Arbour defendants issued a third-party claim against PwC and Mr. Poechman. The claim seeks contribution and indemnity for any amounts for which the Arbour defendants may be found to be responsible to the plaintiff in the main action.

[18] The third-party claim is not lengthy. For ease of reference, I set out its salient paragraphs here:

> 3. The Third Party Plaintiffs repeat and rely on the facts stated in their Statement of Defence and Counterclaim. The Third Party Plaintiffs also rely upon the facts set out in paragraphs 176 to 183 of the Statement of Claim against Delaney to the extent necessary for this Third Party Claim.
>
> Third Parties
>
> 4. From 2014 to 2022, Delaney and PwC were responsible for preparing financial statements, rent rolls, financial forecasts and financial estimations for Wekerloo, WINPM and Wekerloo's subsidiary corporations in addition to Wekerle's personal tax returns. PwC also prepared and generated invoices for WINPM in relation to work performed for Wekereloo and its subsidiary corporations which invoices were paid by WINPM.
>
> 5. Poechman replaced Deanna Guitard and was the controller of WINPM from March 2019 to June 2022. As controller, Poechman prepared QuickBooks accounts for PwC to review and provided tax advice with respect to preparation of WINPM and Wekerloo Financial Statements and Tax Returns, which has a direct impact on the financials and tax obligations of Arbour and WINPM.
>
> 6. The administrator login credentials for WINPM's QuickBooks Online Account, were in the power, control and possession of Delaney and Poechman. Poechman was also responsible for HST filings, and monthly payroll source deductions of WINPM, Wekerloo and its subsidiary corporations.
>
> 7. From 2014 to January 1, 2019, Wekerloo, WINPM and Wekerloo subsidiary corporations were related corporations and allocations of shareholder loans and other payments were made by the Third Party Defendants. PwC, Poechman and

2025 ONSC 1456 (CanLII)

Delaney acknowledged that after January 1, 2019, WINPM, Wekerloo, Wekerloo subsidiary corporations and Wekerle were no longer related parties from a tax point of view. Notwithstanding this knowledge, the Third Party Defendants continued to treat WINPM as a related party and thus continued to make entries in the books and accounts on the basis of related party status for the transfer of funds to and from Wekerle's Shareholders Account, which should not have been made in view of the end of the related party status among the above corporations and persons as of January 1, 2019, when Arbour became the Sole Shareholder and Director of WINPM.

8. After January 1, 2019, Wekerloo, including its subsidiary corporations, Wekerle and WINPM were no longer “related” parties for tax purposes, yet the Third Party Defendants negligently continued to prepare WINPM's Financial Statements and Tax Returns along with the Financial Statements and Tax Returns for Wekerloo and other subsidiary corporations.

9. The Third Party Defendants owed a duty of care to Arbour and WINPM in relation to the preparation of tax returns and financial statements in accordance with tax law and to provide their services in accordance with the standard of care of a reasonably competent tax professional providing such advice and services. The Third Party Defendants breached their duty and standard of care as set out above.

10. In addition, PwC, Delaney and Poechman had an obligation to advise Arbour and WINPM of a conflict of interest which existed in the circumstances when they represented WINPM and Arbour on the one hand and Wekerloo and Wekerloo's subsidiary corporations and Wekerle on the other hand with respect to the same issues. Arbour and WINPM were adverse in interest to Wekerloo, Wekerloo subsidiary corporations, Wekerle and other corporations owned by Wekerle. PwC, Delaney and Poechman owed fiduciary duties with respect to the provision of tax advice to Arbour and WINPM and had conflicting interests by continuing to represent Wekerloo, Wekerloo subsidiary corporations and Wekerle after Arbour purchased the shares on WINPM on or about January 1, 2019. The Third Party Defendants breached their duties by failing to perform their services in accordance with tax law and reasonably competent tax professionals and failing to advise of a conflict of interest that existed at that time.

11. The Third Party Plaintiffs claim contribution and indemnity in respect of the claims made against Arbour and WINPM in relation to provision of tax advice, preparation of financial statements and tax returns, and inaccurate and incomplete entries made in the Books of WINPM and failed to properly address payments made to and from WINPM and Wekerloo in relation to the Parties' Shareholders Account which were the responsibility of Delaney, Poechman and PwC.

Liability of Third Parties

> 12. In the event the Plaintiffs are successful in the main Action, which claims are denied by the Third Party Plaintiffs, such damages were caused and/or contributed to by the negligence and/or breach of contract by the Third Party Defendants as set out above.

[19] That is, the third-party claim alleges the third parties provided the Arbour defendants with negligent advice and services regarding tax and HST filings, source deductions, treatment of shareholder accounts, tax returns, and financial statements not being prepared in accordance with tax law. In addition, the claim alleges that the third parties breached their fiduciary duties to the Arbour defendants by failing to advise the Arbour defendants that there was a conflict of interest since they worked for both the Arbour defendants and the Wekerle group after Arbour's share purchase of WIN PM in January 2019.

Striking a pleading as disclosing no cause of action

[20] To strike a pleading under rule 21.01(1)(b) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.). 1990, Reg. 194, the moving parties must show that it is plain and obvious that a claim cannot succeed; it must have no reasonable prospect of success: R. v. Imperial Tobacco, 2011 SCC 42, [2011] 3 SCR 45, at para. 17.

[21] The facts alleged in the pleading are to be accepted as true unless they are patently ridiculous or incapable of proof: Imperial Tobacco, at para. 22; r. 21.01(1)(b).

[22] The bar for the party moving to strike a claim is high. The pleading must be read generously in favour of the claimant.

[23] At the same time, motions to strike are a useful tool in weeding out hopeless claims and promoting litigation efficiency: Imperial Tobacco, at paras. 19-20.

[24] Claimants must clearly plead the facts. The facts as pleaded are the basis on which the court evaluates the possibility of the claim's success: Imperial Tobacco at para. 22.

[25] Here, the claim is only for contribution and indemnity. Presumably, this is because the case was brought within two years of the service of the statement of claim, but not within two years of the underlying actions complained of. The claim does not seek damages for alleged breach of contract, breach of fiduciary duty, or negligence on the part of the third parties to the Arbour defendants. The third-party claim must be analyzed as what it is on its face – a claim for contribution and indemnity.

The claim for contribution

Governing principles

[26] The law governing contribution among joint tortfeasors was recently reviewed by Centa J. in Mulchan v. Evans, 2022 ONSC 5354, at paras. 23-28.

2025 ONSC 1456 (CanLII)

[27] Justice Centa reviewed the three categories of tortfeasors: joint tortfeasors who act together to cause the same damage, several tortfeasors whose separate acts combine to cause the same damage, and several tortfeasors whose acts combine to cause different damage. The first two categories of tortfeasors, whose conduct causes the same damage, are concurrent tortfeasors.

[28] Under the common law, joint tortfeasors (the first category) were jointly and severally liable to a plaintiff who had been harmed, while several concurrent tortfeasors (the second category) were severally liable. There was no right of contribution between several tortfeasors (the second and third categories).

[29] The Negligence Act, (now R.S.O. 1990, c. N.1) changed the common law, with the result that all concurrent tortfeasors (the first two categories) are jointly and severally liable to the injured party. Further, the Negligence Act provides for a statutory right of contribution and indemnity for concurrent tortfeasors. There remains no right of contribution among several tortfeasors whose acts caused different damages (the third category).

[30] While the Arbour defendants do not plead the Negligence Act in their third-party claim, their counsel made it clear in submissions that they intend to rely upon the Act in advancing their claim. The relevant provisions of the Negligence Act are the following:

> 1. Where damages have been caused or contributed to by the fault or neglect of two or more persons, the court shall determine the degree in which each of such persons is at fault or negligent, and, where two or more persons are found at fault or negligent, they are jointly and severally liable to the person suffering loss or damage for such fault or negligence, but as between themselves, in the absence of any contract express or implied, each is liable to make contribution and indemnify each other in the degree in which they are respectively found to be at fault or negligent.
> 2. A tortfeasor may recover contribution or indemnity from any other tortfeasor who is, or would if sued have been, liable in respect of the damage to any person suffering damage as a result of a tort by settling with the person suffering such damage, and thereafter commencing or continuing action against such other tortfeasor, in which event the tortfeasor settling the damage shall satisfy the court that the amount of the settlement was reasonable, and in the event that the court finds the amount of the settlement was excessive it may fix the amount at which the claim should have been settled.
>
>
> 5. Wherever it appears that a person not already a party to an action is or may be wholly or partly responsible for the damages claimed, such person may be added as a party defendant to the action upon such terms as are considered just or may be made a third party to the action in the manner prescribed by the rules of court for adding third parties.

2025 ONSC 1456 (CanLII)

Positions of the parties

The third parties

[31] The third parties argue the Arbour defendants' claim for contribution cannot possibly succeed against them. In order for a claim for contribution to succeed, the person from whom contribution is sought must owe a duty to the plaintiff: Imperial Tobacco at para. 29; Becker v McMurter, 2015 ONSC 4207, 51 C.L.R. (4th) 161, at para. 33. The third-party claim alleges no such duty. Rather, it alleges that the third parties owed a duty of care to the Arbour defendants, not the plaintiffs. This cannot ground a claim for contribution.

The Arbour defendants

[32] The Arbour defendants disagree that in order to sustain a claim for contribution, the third parties must owe a duty to the plaintiff. They rely on case law which I will discuss below and on rule 29.01(a) which provides:

> 29.01 A defendant may commence a third party claim against any person who is not a party to the action and who,
>
> (a) is or may be liable to the defendant for all or part of the plaintiff's claim;

Analysis

Rule 29.01(a)

[33] Rule 29.01(a) cannot, in my view, supplant the substantive law concerning when a claim for contribution and/or indemnity may be available. That is, if there is a possible claim for contribution and/or indemnity against the third parties, the third-party claim is properly brought under rule 29.01(a). Rule 29.01(a) confers the ability to bring a claim but still requires that there be a viable legal basis for the defendant's claim. Rule 29.01(a) works in concert with the right to claim contribution and indemnity in order to bring efficiency to proceedings and avoid a multiplicity of proceedings. It provides the appropriate procedure for a properly founded claim.

The Negligence Act and the case law

[34] As noted, the Arbour defendants do not plead the Negligence Act, but raise it in their factum. The Arbour defendants do not plead that they are joint tortfeasors with the third parties, nor did they suggest such a theory of the case in their factum or in oral argument. Rather, they claim that the third parties are joint tortfeasors with Mr. Delaney and that they, the Arbour defendants, are the aggrieved party. They do not plead that the third parties breached any obligations to the plaintiffs. The breaches are all claimed to be towards the Arbour defendants.

[35] Under the Negligence Act, however, the Arbour defendants can only claim contribution and indemnity from joint tortfeasors. They do not allege that the third parties are joint tortfeasors with the Arbour defendants towards the plaintiffs. Rather, they allege that the third parties are joint tortfeasors with Mr. Delaney towards the Arbour defendants.

[36] The Supreme Court of Canada has held that in order for a claim for contribution to succeed, the person from whom contribution is sought must owe a duty to the plaintiff: Imperial Tobacco at para. 29.

[37] The Arbour defendants rely on Tuffnail v. Meekes, 2020 ONCA 340; 449 D.L.R. (4th) 478. There, Mr. Tuffnail had attended a wedding reception, after which he was seriously injured as a passenger in a car accident. Mr. Tuffnail and his family sued the driver of the car, the groom who had hosted the reception, and State Farm, his own automobile insurer from whom he had purchased underinsured motorist coverage. State Farm brought a third-party claim against the bartender for contribution and indemnity. State Farm alleged the bartender was negligent and/or breached the Liquor License Act, thereby causing or contributing to the accident. Because State Farm had not caused or contributed to Mr. Tuffnail's damages, it could not assert a right of contribution and indemnity against the bartender under s. 1 of the Negligence Act. Rather, it sought contribution and indemnity through its subrogated third-party claim.

[38] The court noted that in exercising its right of subrogation, an insurer advances only the cause of action that the insured would otherwise have against the tortfeasor. The court had to determine whether State Farm could proceed by way of a third-party claim in its own name. The third-party claim alleged negligence on the part of the third party vis-à-vis the plaintiff. The court stated at para. 50:

> I would add that even if an insurer's objective in bringing a third party claim is only to protect its right to subrogate in relation to amounts it is called upon to pay the insured plaintiff, and the insurer accordingly restricts its third party claim to a claim in contribution for amounts it is required to pay the insured plaintiff, such a claim is necessarily founded on the third party's potential responsibility for causing the insured's damages.

[39] I do not agree with the Arbour defendants' submission that in Tuffnail, the court "confirmed that direct liability to the plaintiff is not a prerequisite for the valid contribution claim and it is sufficient that the third party is potentially liable for the defendant's damages." Indeed, the court specifically noted that the claim was predicated on the third party's potential responsibility for causing the insured, that is, the plaintiff's, damages. The case considers the position of an insurer who proceeds by way of subrogated claim. The insurer stands in the place of the insured (in Tuffnail, the insured was the plaintiff). The insurer is advancing the claim the plaintiff would have had against the third party. Liability of the third party to the plaintiff was certainly required.

[40] The Arbour defendants also rely on Ottawa Carleton Standard Corporation No. 838 v. Redevelopment Group, 2019 ONSC 7005, 8 C.L.R. (5th) 346, at para. 19 for the proposition that third parties need not owe a duty to the plaintiffs to ground a claim for contribution and indemnity. That case does not support that proposition. Quite the opposite. That case provides that a defendant does not need an independent cause of action to make a third-party claim – it is sufficient that the third party owe a duty of care to the plaintiff.

[41] The question is not, as the Arbour defendants argue in their factum, whether a claim is available against parties not named by the plaintiffs in the original lawsuit. I agree with the Arbour defendants that of course it is. That is the nature of a third-party claim and specifically adverted to in section 5 of the Negligence Act. But that does not answer the question of whether a third-party claim for contribution must allege a duty owed to the plaintiff.

[42] I find, in accordance with Imperial Tobacco and the case law that follows it, that in order to claim contribution from the third parties, the Arbour defendants would have to allege the third parties owed duties to the plaintiff. The third-party claim makes no such allegation, nor was such an alternative position put forward in argument. In essence, the third-party claim as currently drafted is a claim for damages disguised as a claim for contribution. The claim for contribution cannot stand, given there is no alleged duty owing from the third parties to the plaintiff, and no basis on which the third parties and the Arbour defendants are said to be, or could be found to be, concurrent tortfeasors.

The claim for indemnity

Governing principles

[43] A right to indemnity may only arise by express or implied contract, or by implication if the circumstances demand a legal or equitable right to indemnify. *Addison & Leyen Ltd. v. Fraser Milner Casgrain LL*P, 2014 ABCA 230, 1 Alta. L.R. (6th) 166, at para. 22.

[44] A right to indemnity under an implied contract is different from a right to damages: Addison at para. 23.

[45] I will summarize the principles below, but I believe that excerpts from the case law are instructive on the genesis and scope of indemnification.

[46] In McFee v. Joss, (1925), 56 O.L.R. 578 (C.A.), [1925] 2 D.L.R. 105, the Court of Appeal explained where an implied indemnity may exist. There, the driver of the car had been negligent. The car's owner had been ordered to pay damages as the result of the negligent driver's accident. The court considered whether the negligent driver should have to indemnify the owner of the car for the damages that resulted from his conduct, which the owner had been required to pay. The court reasoned as follows.

> …[A]n implied contract of indemnity arises in favour of a person who, without fault on his part, is exposed to liability and compelled to pay damages on account of the negligence or tortious act of another, provided the parties were not joint tortfeasors in such a sense as to prevent recovery; that is, where the act done is not clearly illegal it itself. This right of indemnity is based upon the principle that every one is responsible for his own negligence, and if another is, by a judgment of a

> Court, compelled to pay damages which ought to have been paid by the wrongdoer, such damages may be recovered from the wrongdoer.

[47] The Alberta Court of Appeal in Addison explained the roots of implied indemnity as being found in the principles of unjust enrichment. The court explained as follows:

> [34]… First, the common law of implied indemnity is rooted in the principles of restitution and unjust enrichment. An indemnity permits the reimbursement of damages paid by an innocent party to a third party on behalf of the true wrongdoer, where that wrongdoer should otherwise have been liable to pay. A right to reimbursement through an implied indemnity does not arise in every situation in which A becomes liable to C in connection with the negligence of B. That connection must be supported by a theory of legal or equitable liability between the third party and the party against whom the indemnity is sought (Ryan v Dew Enterprises Ltd at para 54).
>
> [35] A simple statement of this requirement is provided by Professor Charles Mitchell in his text, The Law of Contribution and Reimbursement (New York: Oxford University Press, 2003) at 5: "Claims for contribution and reimbursement lie between two parties who both initially owe legal liabilities to a third party" (emphasis added). Put another way, the circumstances must be such that the putative party against whom the indemnity was sought could have been liable to the third party for all or part of the claim against the party seeking the indemnity.
>
> [40] An implied indemnity may arise where the wrongdoer's negligence causes damage to a third party for which the party seeking the indemnity is held liable. However, there must be a connection between the wrongdoer, the third party, and the damage.

[48] I note that the references to "third parties" in these excerpts equate to plaintiffs in the case before me.

[49] As stated by the Newfoundland Court of Appeal and cited by the Alberta Court of Appeal in Addison, "An example of a claim to indemnity arising from implication of law is where an act is done at the request of another, the act turns out to be injurious to a third party and in consequence of doing the act the doer incurs liability to the third party": Ryan v Dew Enterprises Ltd, 2014 NLCA 11, 347 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 274, at para. 54.

[50] Equitable indemnity is a narrow doctrine: Imperial Tobacco at para. 147; Addison at paras. 29-30.

[51] To summarize, the right to indemnification may arise by express contract or by implication. A right to be indemnified is different than a right to damages. The implied right to be indemnified may arise in two ways. First, there may be an implied contract between the party seeking indemnification and the indemnifier. Second, where one person is compelled to pay damages that ought to have been paid by the "real" wrongdoer, those damages may be recovered from the wrongdoer. A party will be entitled to claim indemnification where the party is an innocent party who has been compelled to pay damages that were caused by another party in whole or in part. A party may claim indemnity from a party who could have been liable directly to a third party for all or part of the claim against the party seeking the indemnity.

Position of the parties

The third parties

[52] The third parties argue that there can be no claim for indemnity against them. As there is no express contract for indemnification, the Arbour defendants must be relying upon an implied indemnity. The third parties argue that, in order for there to be a right to indemnity, there must be a causal connection between the alleged wrongdoing of the party seeking indemnity, and the alleged wrongdoing of the proposed indemnifier. Here, they argue, there is no possible causal connection between the claim against the Arbour defendants and the Arbour defendants' claim against the third parties.

[53] That is, the statement of claim alleges the Arbour defendants engaged in various intentional wrongdoing, including wrongly taking control of WIN PM, misappropriating funds, taking secret commissions, and failing to repay a personal loan. The third-party claim alleges that the third parties breached their duty of care owed to the Arbour defendants in relation to the preparation of tax returns and financial statements, failed to advise the Arbour defendants of a conflict of interest in that the third parties provided services to both the Arbour defendants and the Wekerle group, and wrongly treated WINPM as a related party and thus continued to make entries in the books and accounts on the basis of related-party status when they should not have done so.

[54] The third parties argue there is no way to connect the claims of intentional misfeasance made in the amended statement of claim against the Arbour defendants with the claims that the third parties failed to give proper tax advice, failed to prepare proper financial statements, and caused inaccurate entries in WIN PM's books. Further, the third parties argue that indemnification is sought for liability that is wholly attributable to the Arbour defendants' own fraudulent or oppressive conduct. As stated by this court: "A defendant is not liable for any injuries for which the defendant's negligence is not a cause. Where a Plaintiff limits its claim to the damages that can be attributed to the fault of the Defendant, a third-party action for contribution and indemnity is properly struck out": Becker at para. 25.

The Arbour defendants

The Arbour defendants argue that they are entitled to seek contribution and indemnification even if the allegations against them are characterized as allegations of fraud. They argue that Tzaras v. Tzaras, 2016 ONSC 4717, 132 O.R. (3d) 471, stands for the proposition that contribution and indemnity can be sought even in cases of fraud.

Analysis

[55] I return to the pleadings to ground the analysis.

[56] The third-party pleading seeks contribution and indemnity in respect of the claims made against Arbour and WINPM related to the provision of tax advice, preparation of financial statements and tax returns, inaccurate and incomplete entries in WINPM's books, and failure to properly address payments made to and from WINPM and Wekerloo in relation to the parties' shareholders accounts.

[57] The amended statement of claim does not claim against the Arbour defendants or Delaney for anything to do with tax advice. Therefore, there can be no claim for contribution and indemnity for amounts owing by the Arbour defendants to the plaintiffs for such claims.

[58] With respect to the remainder of the allegations the Arbour defendants make, the amended statement of claim alleges:

- Arbour would direct the controller, Lisa Biefer, on how to record transactions and enter bookkeeping, including inter-company journal entries that were later used by Delaney to construct financial records (at para. 105)

- Arbour directed tenants to pay rent to WIN PM instead of the WIN Holdcos. Arbour would direct Biefer to record the rent payments through WIN PM, not Wekerloo. As a consequence, WIN PM owes the WIN Holdcos. about $2,400,000 in rent (at paras. 109-111)

- Arbour misappropriated and transferred a large tax refund received by WIN 2 to WIN PM (at paras. 114-115)

- Arbour directed Delaney and McCarter Grespan to refuse Wekerle's access to financial documentation, and to release such documentation only to Arbour (at para. 127)

[59] The allegations in the amended statement of claim against Mr. Delaney, relied on by the Arbour defendants in the third-party claim, are that Mr. Delaney should have identified and investigated various badges of fraud, and that his failure to do so resulted in the issuance of materially misleading financial statements. Mr. Delaney was required to ensure that the financial statements did not contain false or misleading information. He should have made reasonable inquiries to determine whether reported information was accurate. His failure to inform himself that the Arbour Group was engaging in misfeasance resulted in the issuance of materially misleading financial statements.

[60] The plaintiffs allege that the Arbour defendants engaged in intentional acts to perpetrate a fraud and misappropriate funds. They allege that part of this was carried out by Mr. Arbour instructing Ms. Biefer about how she was to record transactions in the company's books, on which Mr. Delaney later relied.

[61] The third-party claim pleads no connection between the third parties and the plaintiffs' claimed damages. There is no allegation in the third-party claim that the third parties owed duties to the plaintiffs or caused the plaintiffs' damages. Nor is it alleged that the third parties directed the Arbour defendants or anyone else to participate in the Arbour defendants' alleged misdeeds, or that the third parties participated in those alleged misdeeds, or that they were required to and failed to identify or investigate the Arbour defendants' misdeeds.

[62] There is no allegation of an express or implied contract for indemnity. There is no suggestion that the third parties are the "real" wrongdoers vis-à-vis the plaintiffs' claims, and that it would be inequitable for damages to be paid by the Arbour defendants when they were caused by the third parties. There is no suggestion that the third parties could have been liable directly to the plaintiffs for all or part of the claim against the party seeking the indemnity.

[63] I do not find that the Tzaras case assists the Arbour defendants. That case considered whether the doctrine of ex turpi causa (that a party should not be able to pursue damages in connection with its own wrongful act) applies to prevent a third-party claim for contribution and indemnity. The third parties were alleged to have perpetrated a fraud. It is not a case where someone alleged to have perpetrated a fraud brought a third-party claim based on negligence for indemnification of the fraud.

[64] In my view, Tzaras is best understood if considered in the context of the proposition that an implied indemnity will arise where the party from whom the indemnity is sought could have been liable in whole or in part to the party who received the damages award. In Tzaras, the third parties were alleged to be part of the fraud.

[65] This case is the opposite. The Arbour defendants seek indemnification for their allegedly fraudulent acts, but do not allege the third parties were part of those acts. They allege the third parties engaged in torts against them, not in any wrongdoing they may have committed against the plaintiffs.

[66] I agree with the third parties that there is no connection pleaded between the damages the plaintiffs claim to have sustained and the purported actions of the third parties. The pleading does not allege a situation in which the Arbour defendants may have to pay the plaintiffs for actions caused by or contributed to by the third parties.

[67] Whether the pleading could sustain a claim for damages from the third parties to the Arbour defendants is not the issue. The issue is whether it can sustain a claim for indemnity. I find that it cannot, as drafted, for the reasons above.

Disposition on striking of the claim

[68] In summary, the claim is struck as disclosing no reasonable cause of action because the third-party claim:

- alleges no duties owing to the plaintiffs;
- does not allege that the third parties are joint tortfeasors with the Arbour defendants toward the plaintiffs;

2025 ONSC 1456 (CanLII)

- does not allege the third parties could have been liable to the plaintiffs for all or part of the claim;

- does not suggest or identify any unjust enrichment or other equitable unfairness that would result from the Arbour defendants not being able to seek indemnity from the third parties; and

- does not demonstrate any connection between the wrongdoing alleged by the plaintiffs against the Arbour defendants, the damages the plaintiffs claim to have suffered, and the actions pleaded in the third-party claim to have been engaged in by the third parties.

Leave to Amend

[69] The third parties state the cause of action is fatally flawed and cannot be cured by an amendment. They argue that the defects are not a matter of drafting that could be cured with an amendment. The only cure would be to change the pleading fundamentally, to plead a different theory of the case. The third parties argue that amendments are not intended to allege whole new theories of liability, but to cure defective drafting in support of the theories that are alleged.

[70] The Arbour defendants state that they should be granted leave to amend if there are deficiencies in the claim.

[71] I accept the Arbour defendants' submission that a claim "should be read generously to accommodate drafting deficiencies", and that "pleadings should be struck out without leave to amend only in the clearest of cases, especially if the deficiencies in pleadings can be fixed by amendment and there is no prejudice to the responding party in granting leave to amend": Lorion v 1163957799 Quebec Inc., 2015 ONSC 2417 at paras. 14-16.

[72] The courts have explained when leave to amend should not be granted as follows:

> Leave to amend the claim should not be granted where there is no reason to suppose that the party can improve their case by amendment, or if an entirely new cause of action would have to be set up by way of amendments that prejudiced the defendants: Miguna v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2005 CanLII 46385 (Ont. C.A.).: Dean v. ICCRC, 2020 ONSC 2486, at para. 35.

[73] In accordance with my reasons above, the new claim will have to look very different from the claim as currently drafted in order to survive further attack. However, the third parties did not allege any prejudice that would flow from granting leave to amend, even if the amendments significantly change the foundation of the claim. In these circumstances, heeding the words of Dean v. ICCRC set out above, I find that the Arbour defendants should be granted leave to amend the third-party claim. The amended claim must meet the legal tests described above to sustain a claim for contribution and/or indemnity. It must plead the material facts, in more detail than was contained in the original third-party claim, in support of the allegations. It must not be a claim for damages disguised as a claim for contribution and indemnity.

Disposition

[74] The third-party claim is struck with leave to amend within the parameters set out above. A fresh as amended third-party claim shall be served by March 21, 2025.

[75] The parties are encouraged to agree upon costs. If they are unable to agree, the third parties may make costs submissions of no more than three double-spaced pages within seven days. The Arbour defendants may respond with the same page limits within seven days thereafter. There shall be no reply submissions without leave. Submissions may be sent to my judicial assistant at linda.bunoza@ontario.ca.

The rules set out in the Bills of Exchange Act have required supple mentation by the courts to take account of other means of giving notice, especially through the clearing system. Notice may be given by telegram,[53] and presumably also now by telex or fax. Whether notice by any means other than by receipt of the dishonoured bills is notice of dishonour is a question of fact, so that a telephone communication might in the circumstances only be a warning about dishonoured bills sent but not yet received.[54] The onus of proving dishonour is on the person alleging it.[55]

Where a cheque is presented for payment through the clearing system, it is presumed that it will be dishonoured through the system[56] so that the collecting bank will not learn of the dishonour until the cheque is returned to it, as is required by the clearing rules within one day following its receipt.[57]

Once a cheque has been dishonoured, the collecting bank is entitled to reverse the provisional credit[58] in its customer's account. Today, provision for reversal of a provisional credit is normally made in the banker and customer contract; this common law right has been long established in England[59] although, quite remarkably, less well so in Canada where it has only been clearly accepted since the mid-1970s.[60] Normally, the bank will have recourse to reversal of a provisional credit where the account of the customer has sufficient funds, but where the account is in overdraft or reversal of the provisional credit does not yield the full amount of the dishonoured cheque, the bank still has enforceable rights in relation to the cheque.[61] The bank may either enforce such rights against the drawer of the cheque or other parties liable on it,[62] or against its own customer.[63] The precise legal status of a bank and the nature of its rights flowing from the dishonoured cheque and the failed reversal of the provisional credit are unclear.[64] It could not be a holder in due course since it would have had notice of dishonour, nor are there any obvious continuing rights in the cheque left from before sending it for collection, so that the rights must be of a restitutionary nature. The bank may be a holder for value.[65] Any surplus recovered by the bank should be given to the customer.[66]

It remains to note that a bank cannot exclude responsibility entirely for liability in collection.[67]

3. The "Owner's" Causes of Action Against a Collecting Bank

Although a collecting bank is under a duty at common law to collect cheques and instruments on behalf of its customer, in so doing it risks dealing with the instrument or its proceeds in violation of the interests of some person having title or prior possessory rights in it.
