[5] The applications for amendments of the statements of defence are allowed. Weatherford has not established that it would suffer prejudice of the type required if the amendments are allowed: these amendments are not the reason why Weatherford is unable to serve its 2007 statement of claim. Weatherford chose to discontinue its 2007 action without any encouragement from the applicants. Although the amendments are late, in the circumstances, Weatherford had a full opportunity to respond to the issues raised in those amendments.

[6] The proposed amendments are not hopeless: in this context, the equitable doctrines of laches and acquiescence are potentially applicable to legal claims as well as to equitable ones.

[7] The applications for summary judgment are allowed. Spoliation, as an evidentiary concept, is not applicable here against Weatherford: the evidence does not establish that, when the senior Weatherford employee Dunn destroyed records of his meetings with the defendants Addie and Anderson, he did so "to affect the litigation".

[8] A review of the uncontested evidence establishes that Weatherford had all the information it required to sue the applicants by November 30, 2005 or March 31, 2006 at the latest. In all the circumstances, the November 25, 2005 email provided Weatherford with more than a mere suspicion of the alleged wrongful activities of the applicants. Therefore, Weatherford has failed to meet the s. 3 limitations deadline.

[9] Although Weatherford's 2008 added claim to its original pleading does relate to the conduct described in the original pleading, because of the equitable doctrines of acquiescence and laches outlined in s. 10 of the Limitations Act, the applicants are granted immunity from liability that would otherwise apply as a result of the application of the curative provisions of s. 6(4) of the Limitations Act. While the original pleading was in effect, Weatherford, a sophisticated litigant, knew of the limitations issue, but deliberately chose not to serve its 2007 statement of claim naming the applicants as defendants for the tactical reason of maintaining a supply of stators from the applicants until it could replicate the German stators. In those circumstances, it would be unequitable to allow Weatherford to benefit from the curative provisions of s. 6(4) of the Limitations Act.

Cases and authority cited

[10] By Artemis Kautschuk und Kunstoff-Technik GmbH: Weatherford Canada Partnership v Addie, 2009, ABQB 39; Weatherford Canada Partnership v Addie, 2012 ABQB 215; Alberta Rules of Court, Alta Reg 124/2010; Provalcid Inc. v Graff, 2015 ABQB 574; Hryniak v Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7; Templanza v Wolfman, 2016 ABCA 1; Elkow v Sana, 2015 ABQB 803; Sticks and Stones Communications Inc. v Hole's Greenhouses & Gardens Ltd.,

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

2015 ABQB 774; Limitations Act, RSA 2000, c L-12; Central Trust Co. v Rafuse, [1986] 2 SCR 147; Quadrangle Holdings Limited v Coady, 2012 ABQB 22; De Shazo v Nations Energy Company, 2005 ABCA 241; Mohr v 477470 Alberta Ltd., 2003 ABQB 294; Goldencare Holdings Inc. v Manu Chugh Architect Ltd., 2006 ABQB 696; Rosenich v. Welke, 2003 CarswellAlta 1888; Leokadia Contracting Ltd. v Sabre Plumbing Services Inc., 2012 ABQB 585; Jacqueleyne Poff v Great Northern Data Supplies (AB) Ltd., 2015 ABQB 173; Hunter Financial Group Ltd. v Maritime Life Assurance Co., 2007 ABQB 263; Brough v Yipp, 2014 ABQB 777; Desoto Resources Ltd. v EnCana Corp., 2010 ABCA 110; S. (C.H.) v Alberta (Director of Child Welfare), 2006 ABQB 528; Barker v Budget Rent-A-Car of Edmonton Ltd., 2012 ABCA 76; Castledowns Law Office Management Ltd. v FastTrack Technologies Inc., 2012 ABCA 219; 681210 Alberta Ltd. v Hunter, 2012 ABCA 83 (Alta. C.A.); North American Road Ltd. v Hitachi Construction Machinery Co, 200B5 ABQB 847; McDougall v Black & Decker Canada Inc., 2008 ABCA 353; Schnick v Rosen 2009 ABQB 189; Great-West Life Assurance Company v King 2013 ABQB 529; Devon Canada Corporation v Canadian Pacific Railway Co 2009 ABQB 143; Barker v Budget Rent-A-Car of Edmonton Ltd. 2011 ABQB 127

[11] By Wilhelm Kaechele GmbH: Balm v 3512061 Canada Ltd. 2003 ABCA 98; Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation v Canadian Commercial Bank 2000 ABQB 440; Boyd v Cook 2013 ABCA 399; Canadian National Resources Limited v Jensen Resources Ltd. 2013 ABCA 27; M.(H.) v M.(K.) [1992] 3 SCR 6; Manitoba Metis Foundation Inc. v Canada (Attorney General) 2013 SCC 14; Zurich Insurance Co. v TD General Insurance Co. 2014 ONSC 3191; Lac Minerals Ltd. v International Corona Resources Ltd. [1980] 2 S.C.R. 574; Perry, Farley, & Onyschuck v Outerbridge Management Ltd. [2001] O.J. No. 1698; Hryniak v Maudlin 2014 SCC 7.

[12] By Weatherford Canada Partnership: Weatherford Canada Partnership v Artemis Katschuk und Kunstoff-Technik GmbH et al, 2009 ABCA 195; Weatherford Canada Partnership v Addie, 2011 ABQB 562; Weatherford Canada Partnership v Dave Addie et al, 2009 ABQB 538; Balm v 3512061 Canada Ltd., 2003 ABCA 98; Godhart v Westlake Developments Inc., 2015 ABQB 543; First Investors Corp. v Quinpak Development Ltd., 1985 CarswellAlta 72; Hryniak v Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7; Stoney First Nation v Imperial Oil Resources Limited, 2014 ABQB 408; Windsor v Canadian Pacific Railway Ltd., 2014 ABCA 108; WP v Alberta, 2014 ABCA 404; 776826 Alberta Ltd. v Ostrowercha, 2015 ABCA 49; Beier v Proper Cat Construction Ltd., 2013 ABQB 351; AT Films Inc. v AT Plastics Inc., 2014 ABQB 422; Condominium Plan 0125764 v Amber Equities Inc., 2015 ABQB 235; Meek (Trustee of) v San Jan Resources, 2005 ABCA 448; Atlanta Industrial Sales Ltd. v Emerald Management & Realty Ltd., 2006 ABQB 255; De Shazo v Nations Energy Co., 2005 ABCA 241; Sun Gro Horticultural Canada Ltd. v Abe's Door Service, 2005 ABQB 731, aff'd by 2006 ABCA 243; Poff v Great Northern Data Supplies (AB) Ltd., 2015 ABQB 173; Canadian National Resources Limited v Arcelormittal Tubular Products Roman SA, 2012 ABQB 679; Elbow River Marketing Limited Partnership v Canada Clean Fuels Inc., 2012 ABQB 277; McLaughlin v Broddy, 2006 ABQB 914; 681210 Alberta Ltd. v Hunter, 2012 ABCA 83; Intact Insurance Co. of Canada v Lombard General Insurance Co. of Canada, 2015 ONCA 764; Allen M. Linden, Lewis N. Klar, Q.C.R Bruce Feldthusen, Canadian Tort Law Cases, Notes & Materials; 13th ed. (Canada: LexisNexis Canada Inc., 2009); Saskatchewan River Bungalows Ltd. v Maritime Life Assurance Co., [1994] 2 SCR 490; Strand v Strand, 2014 ABQB 754; Zippy Print Enterprises Ltd. v Pawliuk, [1994] BCJ No. 2778; Ambrozic v Burcevski, 2008 ABCA 194; Seyedi v Nexen Inc. 2016 ABCA 24; Re: San Francisco Gifts Ltd. (Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act) 2004 ABQB 229; Seyedi v Nexen 2016 ABCA 24; Alberta Law Reform Institute, Report No. 55, December 1989, Limitations;

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

[13] By the court: Chow-Hidasi v Hidasi 2013 BCCA 73; H.E. v M.M. 2015 ONCA 813; Steward v North Metropolitan Tramways Co. (1886) 16 Q.B.D. 556 (C.A.); Bhasin v Hrynew 2014 SCC 71; Ferreira v Macedo 2016 ONSC 951; Bark-Fong v Cooper (1913) 49 S.C.R. 14; Webster v Gelinas [1941] 4 D.L.R. 495; Silver Eagle Management Inc. v Onoway (Town) 2011 ABQB 139; Paniccia Estate v Toal 2012 ABCA 397; No Limits Sportswear v 0912139 B.C. Ltd. 2015 BCSC 1698, at paras. 23 ff.; Urbas Estate v Home Savings and Loan Corp. 2015 ONSC 6399; Rivergate Properties Inc. v West St. Paul (Rural Municipality) 2006 MBCA 76.

1. Background

a) Factual

[14] The general background to this application has been set out in previous decisions: 2009 ABQB 39; 2009 ABCA 195; 2009 ABQB 538; 2011 ABQB 562; 2012 ABQB 215.

[15] It is sufficient for the purposes of these applications to say that Weatherford is a manufacturer of progressing cavity pumps, hereafter PC pumps. Alberta is the world's biggest market for those pumps. Two of the key components of those pumps are stators and rotors; a PC pump stator is a steel tube with an elastomer lining into which a rotor is inserted. The elastomers used by stator manufacturers are generally proprietary to that manufacturer, and highly confidential. Stators and rotors are then combined with other components and assembled by various manufacturers, including Weatherford, and sold to end customers in the Alberta heavy oil industry including Husky Oil, CNRL, Encana, etc.

[16] Artemis and Kaechele are German stator manufacturers. Although other companies manufacture stators, including Weatherford itself both at its Edmonton Strathcona plant and at its plant in Brazil, the two German manufacturers have a certain "cachet" in the industry. Their stators have been particularly prized in the heavy oil industry. The two German stator manufacturers are competitors with one another in the stator industry. During the period in question, Weatherford had contracts with each of the applicants for the supply of stators. The contracts did not contain exclusive production clauses; that is, Weatherford had not contracted with either of the German manufacturers to produce stators only for Weatherford. The contracts did not contain clauses prohibiting reverse engineering; that is, Weatherford had not contracted with either of the German manufacturers to prevent them from reverse engineering or replicating the stators which they produced for Weatherford for other potential customers. Even after they were served with process in these proceedings, the German manufacturers did not refuse to supply Weatherford with any product ordered by Weatherford.

[17] There are many models of PC pumps available on the market; typically, the pump models are differentiated by the total daily volume which can pass through the pump. Artemis produces 9 models of stators which have been used by Weatherford; Kaechele produces 2 such models. The ability of a particular PC pump to pump larger or smaller volumes of fluid will depend on the size of the pump and the size of the cavities created by the juxtaposition of the stator and the rotor. The cavities, which are sometimes referred to as "interior geometries" of a PC pump, are therefore important to the utility of a pump. Stators are manufactured based on specifications set for internal geometries, that is the cavity created between the stator and the rotor, and specific elastomer formulations.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

[18] Because limitations is a key component of these applications, it is necessary to have a clear outline of the chronology of the relevant events.

[19] Starting in early 2005, two key Weatherford employees, the defendants Addie and Anderson, began to consider leaving Weatherford to start up a new company that would produce interchangeable components for PC pumps and would compete with Weatherford. They approached another senior Weatherford employee, Lonnie Dunn, to ask him to join them. Dunn met with them off and on during 2005. Beginning in February 2005, Mr. Dunn made informal notes of his meetings.

[20] Starting at the latest on February 3, 2005, Weatherford considered changing the business relationship it had had with Artemis for "the last couple of decades": Weatherford would approach Artemis with a sole source agreement proposal. The proposed agreement would include the following terms: confidentiality with respect to exchanged technical information; Weatherford would become Artemis' world-wide PC pumps distributor; and, Weatherford would commit to order a certain dollar amount of product per year. Weatherford was informed by Anderson on March 2, 2005, that Artemis was not interested in making any such agreement. Renewed interest in pursuing the possibility of coming to such an agreement with Artemis was expressed by Weatherford in November, 2005. See Tab Q of the Gillis affidavit.

[21] On October 14, 2005, Addie resigned from Weatherford.

[22] On October 25, 2005, Anderson resigned from Weatherford.

[23] At about the time when Addie and Anderson left Weatherford, Mr. Dunn decided not to join them.

[24] After Dunn decided to remain with Weatherford, he destroyed the notes he had made of his meetings with Addie and Anderson.

[25] In early November, 2005, Dunn confirmed with the Weatherford management that he had had discussions with Addie and Anderson regarding the setting up of a competing business.

[26] On November 25, 2005, Lonnie Dunn, a key employee of Weatherford being the engineer who was responsible for the technical side of Weatherford's PC pump operation and a man who routinely dealt with each of the German applicants, wrote a detailed email to Bill Lane, the Vice-President of Weatherford, (see tab K, Gillis affidavit filed January 25, 2016) which included the following comments:

> As you know I have been aware of the situation developing for some time but conflicted on whether or not to take advantage of my knowledge and begin working against it. About a month ago after evaluating both sides I decided I would not participate and in light of what I saw going from the other side decided it was appropriate to begin doing some of the background work in confidence that would be required going forward. Some of the details on the consolidated product line, new stator and rotor production numbers and costs and pump configurations that I provided you and we discussed when you were here a few weeks ago were the result of that work. . . As a result of my situation I have given this much thought both in terms of what I would do if I was on either side. I wanted to share some of this with you as it may provide additional perspective for you to consider. Note that these are purely my opinions and for the most part were formulated upon my interpretation of the overall situation as opposed to my insider knowledge. Now that this is out in the open I feel like I can openly express my thoughts as the same thing would have happened had I not known in advance it would have just taken me longer to get to this point. Given that timing will be critical here and I am away next week I did not want to let any more time slip away. . . . The whole premise of the start-up's plan revolves around their existing relationships with customers and their ability to obtain and supply the rotor and stator product that still comprises the majority of the Canadian business. . . .The second part revolves around their access to the exact same pump product that the customers are using already and their knowledge that most of them are not comfortable with the high percentage of the business that we have. One thing I know that has concerned them is that over time the Strathcona product is cannibalizing the historical German product and beginning to differentiate itself in terms of performance . . . They will offer the exact same product and try to convince the customers that ours is different and unproven especially if we bring it in from Brazil. . . [t]hey will get stators from Artemis and Kaechele and rotors from . . . [f]rom the assembly end of things they only [need] . . . to deal with welding, phasing and testing which is relatively routine and it is not unrealistic that a small assembly operation can be set up in three months. That timing would be good as one would assume they have already ordered product from Artemis and Kaechele so it will arrive in about three months (early March). . . Obviously we need a strategy to complete [sic] with them as if we are offering the same product at the same price and they have the relationships we will lose a large portion of the business within six to nine months as they ramp-up capacity. . . If we are to compete on price over the long term we can't continue to offer the German . . . product as since these companies are tied in with the start-up they will get preferential pricing even if we are ordering higher quantities. . . . One thing working in our favour is being vertically integrated we should be more efficient and have better flexibility. Although all these companies are all working together they are comprised of manufacturers (Artemis, Kaechele . . .) an assembly operation (the start-up pump company) and a distributor . . . who all need to get their piece of the pie. . . . However, Artemis and Kaechele are legitimate businesses that need to make money and based on my conversations with . . . and . . . they have been squeezed quite tight over the last few years by Dave. . . . The success of our pricing opportunity in the heavy oil market lies in utilizing our internal manufacturing to reduce cost and maintain margins. . . . Note that I am not suggesting an abrupt change in supply chain but rather phasing one or perhaps both German suppliers over time (one possibility although remove [sic] would be that the Germans would cut us off and I suspect . . . will do that regardless). . . . . With this situation now in the open John will be able to factor those scenarios into the AFEs he has been working on for new rotor and stator manufacturing equipment. . . . On the technical side there would also be an extensive reengineering effort required to develop interchangeable conventional stators but it is not insurmountable as we have become very good at this by moving several German models here already . . . This situation becomes very complicated because the timing is critical and most of the options we have will take considerable time. To make matters worse the competition is already moving . . . Since we have to anticipate competition from early March there is no possibility of us being able to replace any significant German production by then as the earliest we could have stators coming back from Brazil is about four to five months and a new extruder and associated capacity here in Canada about six to eight months. As such we need to continue our relationship with the Germans for at least three to four months after which > even if we stop ordering the product on . . . and in inventory would carry us through. If we require this working relationship with the Germans it likely impacts how aggressive we want to get in terms of going after them for using our technology/designs which in turn could potentially slow down the start-up. . . .

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

>
> [Emphasis added]

[27] On December 19, 2005, Lonnie Dunn sent an email to Bill Lane, Bob McNair, Jeff Lembcke, Roland Moneta, and John Baker, all of whom are part of the management team of Weatherford. The email is entitled "Approval for Engineering Costs Associated with Strathcona Replication of German PCP Product Line", can be found at tab T of Mr. Gillis' affidavit, and includes the following:

> In follow up to the discussion in our last conference call we have now moved into active development on the project to replicate the German PCP product line at Strathcona. . . . Whereas normally these developments would be individually documented and justified through the Project and Project databases and Stage Gate Development Process, for confidentiality we have agreed to replace this formal process with a single e-mail approval based on the following . . . .
>
> [Emphasis added]

Every addressee approved Dunn's proposal. Bill Lane's email reads: "Excellent detail and plan. Approved. Full speed ahead." It goes without saying that the German manufacturers were not informed by Weatherford of its replication project.

[28] On January 11-13, 2006, Bill Lane travelled to Germany to meet with each of the applicants separately. Lane did not discuss Weatherford's replication project with the Germans.

[29] While the Weatherford team was in Kaechele's boardroom, the principal of Kaechele accidentally brought up onto a motorized whiteboard an outline of information relating to Europump. He was greatly embarrassed by this; being unable to remove the offending panel, eventually pulled the plug out of the wall in order to remove the information. In a written thank you note for the hospitality which they had received in Germany, Lane referred to this incident only obliquely by referring to the fact that he realized that Weatherford had competitors.

[30] On January 11, 2006, Lane visited the Artemis headquarters and assured himself that Artemis would continue to supply Weatherford with stators. However, Artemis continued to refuse to enter into a new, more circumscribed arrangement with Weatherford.

[31] In early 2006, that is at some time in the first quarter of 2006, Weatherford received, from one of its customers, a Europump spec sheet relating to rotors; see Dunn's questioning, October 21, 2014, at page 2123/4.

[32] On January 30, 2006, Dunn sent one of his regular, typically monthly, updating emails to Weatherford's management about the replication of the German products. That update contained the following information and recommendations:

> While it was important to kick this off aggressively it appears now that we are unlikely to suffer an immediate supply disruption and as such I would like to propose we back off on my very aggressive initial schedule. . . . . This will also allow me to focus on the Brazil development aspect as well as beginning to look at the strategy through which we can differentiate our internal products (Strathcona and Brazil) from the German products.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

[33] On February 26-28, 2006, Dunn prepared a chronological history of his dealings with Addie and Anderson.

[34] On April 11, 2006, Weatherford filed its statement of claim in this action against a number of defendants, not including the applicants. The statement of claim did, however, recite the defendants Addie and Anderson's relationships to the applicants:

> 12. Addie was a director and shareholder . . . . in BMW Monarch . . . BMW Monarch was a distributor of PC Pumps manufactured by Weatherford or its predecessors . . .
>
> 13. Addie, . . . subsequently formed a company called BMW Pump Inc. . .
>
> 14. Shortly after BMW Pump was formed, Anderson left his position with Weatherford to join BMW Pump as its Chief Engineer. . . . While with BMW Pump, Anderson made arrangements to obtain parts used for the assembly of BMW Pump products directly from supplier who supplied parts to Weatherford's PC Pump operating unit, including ARTEMIS Kautschuk und Kunstoff-Technik GmbH ("Artemis") and Wilhelm Kaechele GmbH ("Kaechele") both of which were (and continue to be) based in Germany and supplied (and continue to supply) Weatherford with stators manufactured to Weatherford's confidential and proprietary specifications . . . . Stators and rotors are key components used in the manufacturing of PC Pumps.
>
> 15. BMW Monarch and BMW Pump became competitors of Weatherford.
>
> 16. On October 9, 1997 Weatherford . . . acquired both BMW Pump and BMW Monarch by purchasing all of the shares of those companies . . . Weatherford paid Addie $1,714,286.00 for his interest in BMW Monarch and $4,883,721.00 for his interest in BMW Pump. Anderson was paid $4,883,721.00 for his interest in BMW Pump.
>
> . . .
>
> 28. Addie and Anderson had extensive and recurring contact with key suppliers of Weatherford around the world including Artemis, Kaechele and . . ., in the course of which Addie and Anderson gained and used an intimate knowledge of those suppliers' special needs, preferences, idiosyncrasies and plans.
>
> 29. Addie and Anderson had direct contact and dealings with Weatherford's key suppliers in relation to both field and shop testing of PC Pump prototypes. Both Addie and Anderson encouraged and facilitated the sharing of Weatherford confidential and proprietary information with Artemis, Kaechele and . . .
>
> . . .
>
> 58. While still employed with Weatherford . . . . Addie and Anderson . . . devised and carried out a plan to attempt to cripple Weatherford's PC Pump business while at the same time furthering the interests of [Addie and Anderson and others] by engaging, directly or indirectly, in the following wrongful acts:
>
> > a) incorporating ABC Co. Ltd. Through which the Defendants . . . are or will be manufacturing, assembling and supplying PC Pumps and PC Pump components for supply to . . . in competition with Weatherford, using Weatherford confidential and proprietary information in the possession of Addie, Anderson . . . and in the possession of Weatherford suppliers, Artemis, Kaechele, . . .

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

> b) inducing or attempting to induce . . . suppliers or other persons with whom Weatherford has relationships relating to the research, design, development, manufacturing, supply, sales and service of PC Pumps and PC Pump components to alter, leave or terminate their relationships with Weatherford;
>
> . . .
>
> f) inducing or attempting to induce suppliers of Weatherford to provide PC Pumps and PC Pump components to the Defendants, . . . which PC Pumps and PC Pump components are manufactured using Weatherford confidential and proprietary information;
>
> . . .
>
> 59. In carrying out their wrongful acts, [the defendants Addie and Anderson or others] directly or indirectly:
>
> . . .
>
> b) arranged with Weatherford's suppliers, Artemis, Kaechele, . . . to cease doing business with Weatherford or, alternatively, to supply ABC Co. Ltd., . . . or others with rotors and stators manufactured to Weatherford's confidential and proprietary specifications in order to allow ABC Co. Ltd., . . and others to supply and offer to supply PC Pumps and PC Pump components to Weatherford customers;

[35] "ABC Co. Ltd." mentioned in the pleading has now been identified as Europump.

[36] In early June, 2006. Weatherford states that it saw some of its stators in a Europump yard in Lloydminster.

[37] On October 23, 2007, Weatherford filed a new action against the same defendants as in its 2006 statement of claim, in virtually the same terms as the 2006 statement of claim, but also naming Artemis and Kaechele as defendants. That statement of claim was never served on the applicants.

[38] On January 18, 2008, Weatherford filed an application to amend its 2006 statement of claim, i.e. the claim in this proceeding, inter alia by adding Artemis and Kaechele as defendants.

[39] On March 31, 2008, the case management judge permitted Weatherford to amend its statement of claim, inter alia by adding Artemis and Kaechele as defendants.

[40] On April 7, 2008, Weatherford filed its Amended Amended Amended Statement of Claim in this action, which named these applicants as defendants.

[41] On May 14, 2008 Weatherford was granted leave by the case management judge to serve the applicants outside Canada.

[42] On June 3, 2008, Weatherford notified Artemis and Kaechele of the amended statement of claim naming them as defendants and of the issuance of an order allowing Weatherford to serve Artemis and Kaechele in Germany. In August 2008, Artemis and Kaechele were served with the amended statement of claim naming them as defendants and the order permitting Weatherford to serve Artemis and Kaechele in Germany.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

[43] On September 25 and October 27, 2008, Artemis and Kaechele filed applications to set aside the order for service outside Canada.

[44] On January 23, 2009, on the application of Artemis and Kaechele, the order for service outside of Canada was set aside.

[45] On April 22, 2009, Weatherford discontinued its 2007 action.

[46] On May 29, 2009, the Court of Appeal overturned the Q.B. order which had set aside the order for service ex juris.

[47] On January 28, 2011, Artemis and Kaechele file applications for summary judgment; those applications were dismissed by the case management judge: 2011 ABQB 562.

[48] The trial of this action has now been set to begin on January 16, 2017; it is expected that the trial will last approximately 4 months.

b) Legislative

[49] The applicable provisions of the Limitations Act are:

> s.3 Limitation periods
>
> 3(1) Subject to subsections (1.1) and (1.2) and section 11, if a claimant does not seek a remedial order within
>
> (a) 2 years after the date on which the claimant first knew, or in the circumstances ought to have known,
>
> (i) that the injury for which the claimant seeks a remedial order had occurred,
>
> (ii) that the injury was attributable to conduct of the defendant, and
>
> (iii) that the injury, assuming liability on the part of the defendant, warrants bringing a proceeding,
>
> or
>
> (b) 10 years after the claim arose,
>
> whichever period expires first, the defendant, on pleading this Act as a defence, is entitled to immunity from liability in respect of the claim.
>
> (1.1) If a claimant who is liable as a tort-feasor in respect of injury does not seek a remedial order to recover contribution under section 3(1)(c) of the Tort-feasors Act against a defendant, whether as a joint tort-feasor or otherwise, within
>
> (a) 2 years after
>
> (i) the later of
>
> (A) the date on which the claimant was served with a pleading by which a claim for the injury is brought against the claimant, and
>
> (B) the date on which the claimant first knew, or in the circumstances ought to have known, that the defendant was liable in respect of the injury or would have been liable in respect of the injury if the defendant had been sued within the limitation period provided by subsection (1) by the person who suffered the injury, if the claimant has been served with a pleading described in paragraph (A), or

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

(ii) the date on which the claimant first had or in the circumstances ought to have had the knowledge described in subclause (i)(B), if the claimant has not been served with a pleading described in subclause (i)(A),

or

(b) 10 years after the claim for contribution arose,

whichever period expires first, the defendant, on pleading this Act as a defence, is entitled to immunity from liability in respect of the claim for contribution.

(1.2) For greater certainty, no claim for contribution against a defendant in respect of damage referred to in section 3(1)(c) of the Tort-feasors Act is barred by the expiry of a limitation period within which the person who suffered that damage could seek a remedial order.

(2) The limitation period provided by subsection (1)(a) or (1.1)(a) begins

(a) against a successor owner of a claim when either a predecessor owner or the successor owner of the claim first acquired or ought to have acquired the knowledge prescribed in subsection (1)(a) or (1.1)(a),

(b) against a principal when either

(i) the principal first acquired or ought to have acquired the knowledge prescribed in subsection (1)(a) or (1.1)(a), or

(ii) an agent with a duty to communicate the knowledge prescribed in subsection (1)(a) or (1.1)(a) to the principal, first actually acquired that knowledge,

and

(c) against a personal representative of a deceased person as a successor owner of a claim, at the earliest of the following times:

(i) when the deceased owner first acquired or ought to have acquired the knowledge prescribed in subsection (1)(a) or (1.1)(a), if the deceased owner acquired the knowledge more than 2 years before the deceased owner's death;

(ii) when the representative was appointed, if the representative had the knowledge prescribed in subsection (1)(a) or (1.1)(a) at that time;

(iii) when the representative first acquired or ought to have acquired the knowledge prescribed in subsection (1)(a) or (1.1)(a), if the representative acquired the knowledge after being appointed.

(3) For the purposes of subsections (1)(b) and (1.1)(b),

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

(a) a claim or any number of claims based on any number of breaches of duty, resulting from a continuing course of conduct or a series of related acts or omissions, arises when the conduct terminates or the last act or omission occurs;

(b) a claim based on a breach of a duty arises when the conduct, act or omission occurs;

(c) a claim based on a demand obligation arises when a default in performance occurs after a demand for performance is made;

(d) a claim in respect of a proceeding under the Fatal Accidents Act arises when the conduct that causes the death, on which the claim is based, occurs;

(e) a claim for contribution arises when the claimant for contribution is made a defendant in respect of, or incurs a liability through the settlement of, a claim seeking to impose a liability on which the claim for contribution can be based, whichever first occurs;

(f) a claim for a remedial order for the recovery of possession of real property arises when the claimant is dispossessed of the real property.

. . .

s. 6 Claims added to a proceeding

6(1) Notwithstanding the expiration of the relevant limitation period, when a claim is added to a proceeding previously commenced, either through a new pleading or an amendment to pleadings, the defendant is not entitled to immunity from liability in respect of the added claim if the requirements of subsection (2), (3) or (4) are satisfied.

(2) When the added claim

(a) is made by a defendant in the proceeding against a claimant in the proceeding, or

(b) does not add or substitute a claimant or a defendant, or change the capacity in which a claimant sues or a defendant is sued, the added claim must be related to the conduct, transaction or events described in the original pleading in the proceeding.

(3) When the added claim adds or substitutes a claimant, or changes the capacity in which a claimant sues,

(a) the added claim must be related to the conduct, transaction or events described in the original pleading in the proceeding,

(b) the defendant must have received, within the limitation period applicable to the added claim plus the time provided by law for the service of process, sufficient knowledge of the added claim that the defendant will not be prejudiced in maintaining a defence to it on the merits, and

(c) the court must be satisfied that the added claim is necessary or desirable to ensure the effective enforcement of the claims originally asserted or intended to be asserted in the proceeding.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

(4) When the added claim adds or substitutes a defendant, or changes the capacity in which a defendant is sued,

(a) the added claim must be related to the conduct, transaction or events described in the original pleading in the proceeding, and

(b) the defendant must have received, within the limitation period applicable to the added claim plus the time provided by law for the service of process, sufficient knowledge of the added claim that the defendant will not be prejudiced in maintaining a defence to it on the merits.

(5) Under this section,

(a) the claimant has the burden of proving

(i) that the added claim is related to the conduct, transaction or events described in the original pleading in the proceeding, and

(ii) that the requirement of subsection (3)(c), if in issue, has been satisfied,

and

(b) the defendant has the burden of proving that the requirement of subsection (3)(b) or (4)(b), if in issue, was not satisfied….

. . .

s. 10 Acquiescence or laches

Nothing in this Act precludes a court from granting a defendant immunity from liability under the equitable doctrines of acquiescence or laches, notwithstanding that the defendant would not be entitled to immunity pursuant to this Act.

2. Procedural issues

[50] At the outset of the hearing, the parties raised several procedural issues. At the conclusion of the hearing of submissions on those issues, I reserved a decision until the conclusion of the hearing when I would address those issues in my substantive decision.

[51] Overall on the procedural issues, I have concluded that no evidence which has been led by any party on this application should be excluded from consideration for technical reasons. Rather, the court will consider all of the material submitted, having in mind, of course, that, generally, evidence which is developed contemporaneously and which is independent is more weighty than evidence which is produced after time for consideration and by the party tendering the evidence. At this stage, I will make general comments about each of the main procedural issues; as I discuss each of the substantive issues, I may come back to comment on the procedural issues which affect the substantive results.

i) Filing of Bill Lane's February,2016, affidavit

[52] Although it acknowledges that Rule 6.6 does not set deadlines for the filing of affidavits, Artemis objects to the filing of Lane's affidavit because it was filed after Weatherford had filed its written brief on this application; it states that Lane could use his affidavit as a way to reply to matters raised in the brief. Therefore, there is no technical objection to the filing of the Lane affidavit. Moreover, the court takes note of Weatherford's claim that there have been some procedural uncertainties, such as whether the applicants were applying only to amend their statements of defence or whether the applications for summary judgment would be joined to the first hearing. In those circumstances, it is not surprising that the Lane affidavit was filed after Artemis had filed its brief.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

ii) Use of Lonnie Dunn's questioning

[53] Relying on Rule 5.31(2), Artemis objects to Weatherford's use of portions of Dunn's questioning which have not been included in Artemis' position. Naturally, Weatherford cannot use Dunn's questioning in a self-serving way as, for example, an oath-helping device. On the other hand, Weatherford is entitled to ensure that any excerpt from Dunn's evidence on which the applicants rely constitutes a fair representation of Dunn's evidence. I consider that Weatherford's reliance on additional portions of Dunn's questioning is merely Weatherford's attempt to ensure fair representation of the evidence.

iii) Weatherford's use of Dunn's 2008 cross-examination

[54] Relying on Rule 6.7, Artemis objects to Weatherford's inclusion in its materials of transcripts of the cross-examination of its key employee, Dunn, conducted in 2008. These are completely different applications. Nonetheless, I view these excerpts of Dunn's evidence in the same way as indicated above, i.e. an attempt by Weatherford to ensure that a fair representation of Dunn's evidence is before the court.

iv) Use of Gillis' affidavit

[55] Weatherford objects to the Gillis affidavit on the grounds that Gillis purports to provide direct, and even on occasion opinion, evidence about some of the issues in the proceedings. Naturally, the applicants cannot use Gillis' affidavit to spin existing evidence or to create evidence; the only purpose of his affidavit is to put before the court evidence which is contained in the various records disclosed by Weatherford and in the questioning of various Weatherford representatives. I agree with Weatherford that the court cannot rely on Gillis' affidavit to summarize Weatherford's evidence, but must refer to Weatherford's actual evidence.

3. Amending the Statements of Defence

[56] The parties agree that a low threshold applies to requests to amend pleadings: they agree that the "classic rule" is that requests for amendment to pleadings should be granted unless the proposed amendment causes prejudice, is clearly hopeless, seeks to add a cause of action after the expiry of a limitation, or, is associated with bad faith: see, for example, Provalcid Inc. Artemis and Kaechele maintain that none of these exceptions are engaged.

[57] Weatherford agrees that the last two of the four exceptions do not apply, but maintains that the proposed amendments should not be allowed for two reasons. First, the amendments would cause them prejudice because they would prevent them from curing the identified limitations problem and because the request is made too late relative to the anticipated commencement of trial in January 2017. Second, insofar as the proposed amendments rely explicitly or implicitly on laches and acquiescence, the proposed amendments should not be allowed because they are hopeless: the equitable concepts of laches and acquiescence apply only to equitable claims and Weatherford's claims are, in the main, legal claims.

[58] For the reasons set out below, I have concluded that: Weatherford will not suffer prejudice of the kind required in this context, and, the proposed amendments are not hopeless.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

a) Weatherford will not suffer prejudice

[59] Weatherford claims two types of prejudice. First, it claims that since Artemis and Kaechele did not, when they challenged the order for service on them outside Canada, also challenge the order of the court which allowed Weatherford to amend its pleadings so as to add them as defendants, they prevented Weatherford from serving its 2007 statement of claim which did name them as defendants clearly within the limitations period. Second, it claims that the late applications invoking laches and acquiescence do not allow Weatherford sufficient time to respond given that a trial date has been set for January, 2017 and that a great deal of time and money has already been spent on pre-trial process.

i) The granting of an amendment at this time is not the reason why Weatherford is unable to serve its 2007 statement of claim [60] Weatherford states that its 2007 statement of claim was filed within 2 years of November, 2005 and, therefore, the 2007 claim was filed within the limitation period. I agree.

[61] Weatherford states that, when the applicants applied to set aside the case management judge's decision allowing Weatherford to serve its amended statement of claim on the applicants, the applicants did not appeal the case management judge's decision to allow the amendments which included the applicants. Weatherford suggests that if it had known, in 2008, that the applicants were intending to raise a limitations defence, it could have, would have, served the 2007 statement of claim.

[62] With respect, I cannot agree with Weatherford that the current application to add a limitations defence causes them prejudice of the type that should preclude the amendments to the statements of defence. At the outset of the analysis on this issue, I question whether the kind of prejudice claimed by Weatherford – the loss of the ability to right the substantive wrong – is the kind of prejudice which is anticipated in the Rules and in the law. The standard of non-compensable prejudice as being one of the bars to an amendment of pleadings was solidified in the Steward decision. What must be recalled about that decision is, however, that Lord Esher himself said that his formulation of the standard of conduct – "if the amendment will put [the party opposite] into such a position that they must be injured, it ought not to be made" – which formulation has subsequently been adopted by many courts, had been better, more clearly, put by Bowen L.J. when he said that an amendment to the pleadings is to be allowed "whenever you can put the parties in the same position for the purposes of justice that they were in at the time the slip was made". It is therefore the latter articulation of the principle that I will follow. It will be recalled that the Steward decision arose out of a situation where a plaintiff was injured as a result of poor road repair; the defendant filed a statement of defence. Six months after the pleadings had closed, the defendant asked for leave to amend its statement of defence to plead a contract which it had with the local vestry which shifted the responsibility for maintenance from itself to the vestry. By the time the defendant applied to amend its statement of defence, the plaintiff's right to sue the vestry was taken away by the statute of limitations. In denying the defendant leave to amend its statement of defence based on prejudice to the plaintiff, the English Court of Appeal emphasized that it was essentially impossible for the plaintiff to have discovered the contract between the defendant and the vestry. In those circumstances, granting the defendant leave to amend its pleadings would have unfairly denied the plaintiff a substantive right. In the circumstances here, there is nothing which the applicants have done which in any way precluded Weatherford from serving its 2007 statement of claim.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

[63] In any event, however, assuming that the prejudice of being unable to remediate the substantive wrong is the kind of prejudice which might prevent the amendment of pleadings, I have concluded that Weatherford has suffered no such prejudice. On an overview, it is not because the applicants are bringing this application at this stage of the proceedings that Weatherford has lost its right to serve its 2007 statement of claim: nothing the applicants have done prevented Weatherford from serving its statement of claim and, in any event, Weatherford chose to take away from itself its ability to serve its 2007 claim when it discontinued that claim in 2009. Moreover, under a Steward type of analysis, the inability of the applicants to bring this application before Weatherford disclosed its November 2005 emails was not due to a blunder or slip or carelessness on the part of the applicants, but a failure on Weatherford's part to make full disclosure.

[64] On a more detailed analysis, although the applicants knew, when they applied to set aside the order allowing service ex juris that they had been named as defendants – indeed, there could not have been an application for service ex juris unless Artemis and Kaechele had been named as defendants in the amended statement of claim – they were procedurally unable to apply to set aside the order which had allowed them to be added to the statement of claim. Indeed, the reality was that the applicants were not affected by any aspect of Weatherford's statement of claim unless the decision allowing service on them to be effected outside Canada was maintained. As a matter of law, had the applicants attempted to appeal the case management judge's decision on the amendment separately from the issue of the amendment to the pleadings by which they were added as defendants, they would surely have been taken to have attorned to Alberta's jurisdiction and would therefore have been necessarily involved in complicated lawsuit. Although in its recent decision in H.E. the Ontario Court of Appeal, albeit in the context of the best interests of children, appears to state that explicit attornment to a jurisdiction is not determinative on the issue of jurisdiction, in the circumstances here – including the fact that this is normal commercial litigation rather than family litigation – attornment by the applicants to Alberta would surely have resulted in the automatic denial of their request to set aside the order allowing service on them in Germany.

[65] What is determinative of Weatherford's claim of prejudice is that Weatherford only discontinued its 2007 claim – the one that had named Artemis and Kaechele as defendants within the limitation period – in April 2009. By April 2009, neither Artemis nor Kaechele had done anything to make Weatherford believe that they would not rely on a limitations defence. On the contrary, by April 2009, both Artemis and Kaechele had made it clear that they wanted to be removed from this lawsuit and that they would take every possible opportunity to achieve that result. In April 2009, when Weatherford discontinued its 2007 action, Artemis and Kaechele had the benefit of a QB decision which struck down the ex juris leave in this action; in other words, on April 21, 2009, Artemis and Kaechele were not properly part of this lawsuit. There was therefore no reason whatever for Weatherford to discontinue its 2007 action against them; on the contrary, there was every reason for Weatherford to maintain its 2007 lawsuit. On April 23, 2009, Weatherford had no viable action of any kind against Artemis and Kaechele: Weatherford had discontinued its 2007 action and the QB decision held that Artemis and Kaechele could not be served in Germany. By the time the Court of Appeal overturned the QB decision in May, 2009, and allowed Artemis and Kaechele to be included in this lawsuit, Weatherford had already put itself in the position where it could no longer serve its 2007 statement of claim. When Artemis and Kaechele were formally brought into this lawsuit after being served in September, 2009, they were facing a situation in which Weatherford had, on April 7, 2008, filed the order granting it leave to amend its statement of claim to add them as defendants. The time for appealing the April 2008 order had long since expired. Moreover, the applicants were entitled to assume that the case management judge who granted the order in question had, in the same way that this court must consider the exceptions to the granting of amendments to pleadings, come to the conclusion in April 2008 that giving Weatherford leave to add Artemis and Kaechele as defendants did not allow them to be added outside a limitation period. It is not realistic to think that Artemis and Kaechele would immediately in September 2009 try to challenge the April 2008 decision; nor would it be fair to criticize them for failing to have done so. In any event, even if they had done so, it was already too late to allow Weatherford to serve its 2007 statement of claim on them.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

ii) Weatherford has enough time to defend the laches and acquiescence issues

[66] The second kind of prejudice Weatherford alleges as a result of this application, particularly in relation to Kaechele's explicit reliance on laches and acquiescence and also on any implicit reliance by Artemis on laches and acquiescence, is that the application is brought too late in the proceedings, given that a trial date for January, 2017 has already been set and there has already been massive pre-trial work undertaken.

[67] Artemis and Kaechele could not have asked to amend their pleadings to plead a limitations defence earlier than the current applications.

[68] It was not until Artemis and Kaechele came into possession of the November 25, 2005 email from Dunn to Lane that the applicants had evidence emanating from Weatherford itself about the state of its knowledge of the involvement of Artemis and Kaechele in Addie and Anderson's scheme. As soon as this evidence became available to the applicants, they brought the within application.

[69] Not only does this chronology establish that Artemis and Kaechele acted at the first opportunity, the chronology also establishes that the defences filed by Artemis and Kaechele were not "blunders" or "slips" in relation to the limitations issue; they clearly could not responsibly have alleged a limitations defence until the November 2005 Weatherford documents came into their possession.

[70] As to the ability of Weatherford to defend the applications without embarking on extensive, expensive additional process, I agree that there has already been extensive disclosure by, and questioning of, all parties; every aspect of the relationship amongst the parties has been subjected to careful scrutiny. Moreover, Weatherford has been allowed to file the Lane affidavit which has given Weatherford the opportunity, unhindered, to put forward any evidence available to it on the limitations issue. Therefore, Weatherford has not suffered and will not suffer any prejudice as a result of allowing the proposed amendments.

[71] In summary on this issue, Weatherford will not suffer any of the required type of prejudice if the applications for amendment of the statements of defence are allowed.

b) The proposed amendments are not hopeless

[72] Relying on the Ontario Court of Appeal's decision in Intact Insurance, Weatherford asserts that the equitable principles of laches and acquiescence apply only to equitable claims and, since Weatherford's claims are, in the main, legal rather than equitable, there is no point in allowing an equitable defence to be advanced to its claims. With respect, Intact Insurance, and indeed all similar decisions which deal with the recent application of equitable defences to Ontario limitations legislation can be of no assistance in Alberta, where – as opposed to Ontario - there has been preservation of the use of equitable defences in Alberta's Limitations Act. The importance of that statutory distinction is emphasized by the Ontario Court of Appeal in para. 35 of its decision. The situation in Ontario is particularly stark because Ontario is a jurisdiction in which the legislation which previously maintained equitable defences then amended its legislation to remove that reference. In Ontario, there is therefore an argument that there has been a clear policy message from the legislator to the effect that limitations legislation should be addressed without reference to equitable principles; no such argument is available in Alberta.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

[73] Moreover, as many cases cited in the Intact decision itself make clear, contemporary Canadian courts are courts of both law and equity. The Supreme Court of Canada illustrated this intersection recently in Bhasin when, in dealing with the interpretation of contracts, it held:

> The principle of good faith must be applied in a manner that is consistent with the fundamental commitments of the common law of contract which generally places great weight on the freedom of contracting parties to pursue their individual self-interest. In commerce, a party may sometimes cause loss to another -- even intentionally -- in the legitimate pursuit of economic self-interest. Doing so is not necessarily contrary to good faith and in some cases has actually been encouraged by the courts on the basis of economic efficiency. The development of the principle of good faith must be clear not to veer into a form of ad hoc judicial moralism or "palm tree" justice. In particular, the organizing principle of good faith should not be used as a pretext for scrutinizing the motives of contracting parties.

[74] More prosaically, Intact Insurance itself refers to the Supreme Court of Canada decision in M.(K.) which provided an instructive outline of the fusion of courts of law and equity: see paras. 58 ff. The Supreme Court saw no principled objection to the mingling of equitable and legal principles; on the contrary, it asserted:

> It is desirable, indeed inevitable, for the two great branches of our judicial law systems to borrow from one another to achieve just and reasonable results and consistency over time.

[75] Given this type of comment in the Supreme Court's decision, it is difficult to understand how M.(K.) has come to be thought of - even in Ontario - as authority for the proposition that equitable principles cannot apply to defeat legal claims: see Ferreira at para. 31. The Supreme Court of Canada has never made any such general assertion.

[76] Although the doctrine of laches was, historically, important to deal with late-brought equitable claims since those claims were not subject to limitations statutes and the doctrine of laches was necessary to mimic the principles reflected in the law's approach to limitations in the sphere of equity, the doctrine of laches was never restricted to situations in which there was an otherwise applicable limitations statute. Ferreira itself deals with a situation where there was an application for partition and sale. In Bark-Fong, a decision which is now over 100 years old, the Supreme Court noted the potentially broad spectrum of application of the doctrine of laches:

> The question remains whether the appellants have lost their right by reason of laches. The general principle is stated in Fry on Specific Performance, at page 539:-

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

> The Court of Chancery was at one time inclined to neglect all consideration of time in the specific performance of contracts for sale, not only as an original ingredient in them, but as affecting them by way of laches. But it is now clearly established that the delay of either party in not performing its terms on his part, or in not prosecuting his right to the interference of the court by the institution of an action, or, lastly, in not diligently prosecuting his action, when instituted, may constitute such laches as will disentitle him to the aid of the court, and so amount, for the purpose of specific performance, to an abandonment on his part of the contract.

[77] It is also important to note that in the particular circumstances of Intact Insurance, the appeal court found that laches was not available on the facts. Therefore, its comments relating to the general application of laches principles to limitations as a matter of law are merely obiter.

[78] Finally, even under the decisions on which Weatherford relies, where there is a strong equitable cast to a legal claim, the concept of laches has been applied. Here, Weatherford has not relied on any contractual basis for its claims against Artemis and Kaechele; rather, it has based its claims on grounds which are redolent of equity, i.e. that the German producers acted wrongly, unfairly, in providing stators to the competitive start-up. All of Weatherford's legal claims are, at a minimum, intertwined with its equitable claim.

[79] In summary on this point, in Alberta it is not hopeless to invoke laches or other equitable principles when dealing with limitations issues. It remains to be determined, of course, whether the application of equitable principles in the circumstances of this case entitles the applicants to the relief which they seek.

c) Conclusion

[80] For the reasons set out above, the court concludes that the applications to amend the statements of defence are allowed.

4. Summary Judgment

[81] The parties agree on the general legal framework for contemporary summary judgment applications: the parties are required to put their best foot forward, and the court is entitled to, and should, grant the application if it concludes that it can fairly do so on the basis of the material put forward, that is, without requiring a trial.

a) Artemis can rely on laches and acquiescence

[82] The parties disagree, however, on whether Artemis can invoke the provisions relating to laches and acquiescence in the Limitations Act without having explicitly referred to laches and acquiescence in its pleadings. Weatherford's objection is invalid. The historical requirement of pleadings is merely to state the facts, not to state the law. This principle was concisely articulated in Webster as follows:

> 7 In my view this section means, in so far as the facts in issue in an action, are concerned, that after the facts have been established, the law as enunciated by any statute relating to the subject matter of the action, shall be made applicable to such facts by the tribunal which tries the case, without mention of the statute in the pleadings. This statement is subject to any rule of law which requires a statute to be specifically pleaded.

[83] In Silver Eagle Management, Ross J. outlined the gloss which has been added to the basic principle by Alberta's Rules of Court:

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

71 At trial, counsel for the Town submitted that he was surprised by his friend's arguments on behalf of the Developer that the Condition had not been waived, that the Purchase Agreement and Option to Repurchase were invalid, and that the agreements had been varied.

72 Section 13.6(3) of the Alberta Rules of Court, Alta. Reg. 124/2010, lists a number of arguments that must be pled in the pleadings if a party wishes to rely on them at trial:

> 13.6(3) A pleading must also include a statement of any matter on which a party intends to rely that may take another party by surprise, including, without limitation, any of the following matters:
>
> (a) breach of trust;
>
> (b) duress;
>
> (c) estoppel;
>
> (d) fraud;
>
> (e) illegality or invalidity of a contract, including the grounds;
>
> (f) malice or ill will;
>
> (g) misrepresentation;
>
> (h) payment;
>
> (i) performance;
>
> (j) release;
>
> (k) undue influence;
>
> (l) voluntary assumption of risk;
>
> (m) waiver;
>
> (n) lack of capacity or authority;
>
> (o) wilful default;
>
> (p) tender of payment;
>
> (q) a limitation period;
>
> (r) a provision of an enactment.
>
> [Emphasis added]

73 Section 109 of the old Alberta Rules of Court, Alta. Reg. 390/1968, which were in place at the time that the pleadings were filed, states as follows:

> When specific pleading required
>
> 109 A party shall in any pleading subsequent to a statement of claim plead specifically any matter, for example, performance, release, payment, any statute of limitation, statute of frauds, fraud or any fact showing illegality
>
> (a) which he alleges makes any claim or defence of the opposite party not maintainable, or

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

> (b) which, if not specifically pleaded, might take the opposite party by surprise, or
>
> (c) which raises issues of fact not arising out of the preceding pleading.

[84] In Silver Eagle Management, the town of Onoway stated that it was taken by surprise by the plaintiff's argument with respect to the status of the contract. Ross J. observed that neither party had pleaded that a material condition had not been waived or that there had been a variation of the contract. Nonetheless, she dealt with the legal arguments despite the absence of explicit pleading:

> The question of variation in this case was basically a matter of interpreting three written contracts between the parties, contracts which were clearly placed before the Court, and the interpretation of which should not have taken either party by surprise.

[85] The use of pleadings to prevent surprise is also emphasized by our Court of Appeal in Paniccia Estate; that court goes on to add that the Rules would, in certain circumstances, entitle a court to consider a matter not explicitly pled: see para. 36 ff.

[86] Here, Weatherford cannot claim that it has been taken by surprise by Artermis' position on laches and acquiescence. First, Artemis' amended statement of defence includes the following:

> 28. Further, and specifically, Artemis states that the Amended Amended Amended Statement of Claim is statute barred by operation of s. 10 of the Limitations Act, RSA, 2000 c. L-12 respecting Laches and the Plaintiff's acquiescence.

Section 10 of the Act explicitly outlines laches and acquiescence as matters which may have to be taken into account in applying the statute.

[87] Moreover, and more importantly given the stage at which the applications for amendment of the statements of defence are made, it is clear that, from at least 2007 on, Weatherford was very aware of the limitations issues: as Weatherford itself has acknowledged, a potential limitations problem is the reason for the filing of the 2007 statement of claim. In those circumstances, Weatherford cannot maintain that it is taken by surprise by Artemis' reliance on s. 10 of the Limitations Act and its reference to laches and acquiescence.

[88] In the result, in its summary judgment analysis, the court will consider laches and acquiescence in relation to the claims of both Artemis and Kaechele.

> b) The undisputed facts here establish that Weatherford knew, or should have known of its alleged cause of action against Artemis and Kaechele by November 30, 2005 or, at the latest, by March 30, 2006

[89] The parties essentially agree on the framework which must be used to weigh an application for summary judgment. As the case law reviewed in Sticks and Stones Communications Inc. emphasizes, the sufficiency of the evidence invoked in any application for summary judgment is the key. If material evidence is, or can be, disputed, a trial will usually be required and the application for summary judgment will be refused.

[90] In the context of a limitations defence, therefore, the applicant for summary judgment must satisfy the court that there are "undisputed facts that necessarily lead to the conclusion that it is plain and obvious that the plaintiff's claim is statute barred": DeShazo, at para. 19.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

[91] In this context, the first contested issue which arises is whether, as Artemis contends, the destruction of the Dunn notes results in a rebuttable adverse inference against Weatherford. After he decided to remain with Weatherford, a key employee of Weatherford, Lonnie Dunn, destroyed records he had made - i.e. notes of meetings he had had with the defendants Addie and Anderson - at a time when he knew that litigation was contemplated.

[92] I agree that the concept of spoliation as an evidentiary rule is even more well established now in Canada than it was a decade ago, and that, when it applies, it sensibly ensures that litigants will not get a litigation advantage by spoiling or destroying records that might have a negative effect on them.

[93] I also agree that, even though Dunn was clearly not taking notes of his meetings with Addie and Anderson as part of his employment with Weatherford, the evidence establishes that he destroyed his notes only after he had decided to remain in Weatherford's employ.

[94] In those circumstances, it is necessary to consider the potential application of the doctrine of spoliation on the facts of this case.

[95] I agree that Dunn's own email of November 25, 2005 indicates that, at the least by that date, Dunn was aware that litigation was being contemplated.

[96] I also agree that the evidence establishes that Dunn intentionally destroyed his records of the Addie/Anderson meetings.

[97] However, I am not satisfied that the evidence establishes that Dunn intentionally destroyed the evidence of the meetings "to affect the litigation", as our Court of Appeal put it in McDougall. Rather, I accept the evidence that Dunn was keeping the records to perform a SWOT (Strengths, Weaknesses, Opportunities, Threat) analysis for himself, i.e. as to whether it was to his advantage or disadvantage to defect to the start-up company. When he decided to remain with Weatherford, he had no further need for the records; his destruction of the records was therefore entirely personal.

[98] Even if, in Alberta, it were possible to fashion a civil remedy for unintentional destruction of evidence, see Chow-Hidasi at para. 30, for the reasons given above, there is no evidentiary basis in this case for the development of any such remedy.

[99] Finally, the evidence suggests that Weatherford never received the benefit of Dunn's actual notes of his meetings with Addie and Anderson. All Weatherford received from Dunn was general information about his meetings with Addie and Anderson, his various emails, including the email of November 25, 2005 which summarized Dunn's "personal opinions" of the situation Weatherford was facing as of that date, and other emails which are now available from Weatherford's production, along with the chronology which Dunn prepared after the destruction of his notes. From that perspective, as well as from the perspective that Dunn only became a corporate officer of Weatherford in 2007, it would be unfair to draw an adverse inference against Weatherford as a result of Dunn's destruction of personal records.

[100] In response to the application, Weatherford relies on affidavit evidence from Lane. However, I do not attach any weight to the Lane affidavit: rather than comments in 2016 about events which occurred in the past, I rely on Weatherford’s contemporary documents.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

[101] By deciding not to draw any adverse inference against Weatherford as a result of the destruction of the Dunn notes, the only evidence which is left on the applications for summary judgment establishes uncontested facts because it is all evidence from Weatherford.

[102] There is no dispute between the parties about what the undisputed facts must establish. As the DeShazo decision from our Court of Appeal clarifies, perfect knowledge of a claim is not the correct test for determining when the limitations clock starts to run:

> 31 The principle of discoverability does not require perfect knowledge. As this court noted in Hill v. Alberta (South Alberta Land Registration District) (1993), 100 D.L.R. (4th) 331 at 336 (Alta. C.A.) (leave to appeal to S.C.C. denied):
>
> > Even if the discoverability rule of limitations applies to this case (which I need not decide), it does not call for perfect certainty. It does not require discovery at all: it says something else will do instead. It suffices that "the material facts on which [the cause of action] is based ... ought to have been discovered by the plaintiff by the exercise of reasonable diligence...": Central Trust v. Rafuse... . If the plaintiff is told a fact by someone who is likely to know, surely that makes the fact known or discoverable, even if someone else disputes the fact. Very few people who sue have perfect certainty.
>
> 32 The same point is made in Owners: Condominium Plan 9421549 v. Main Street Developments Ltd., supra, where Clackson J. summarily dismissed the plaintiff's claim on the basis of undisputed facts. He said at paras. 55-56:
>
> > I am satisfied that these facts establish, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the Plaintiff knew that the buildings suffered from moisture problems and knew of the potential sequella if the problems were not rectified. This knowledge existed well before May 25, 1999. While I accept that it is possible the Plaintiff did not have perfect knowledge of the injury, that level of knowledge is not required: Peixeiro v. Haberman, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 549; Hill v. Alberta (South Alberta Land Registration District), (1993) 135 A.R. 266 (C.A.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused [1994] 1 S.C.R. viii; Ward v. Taubner, 2004 ABQB 565, 9 E.T.R. (3d) 275 (QB).
> >
> > What was obvious was that there was a problem and that there was damage or at least the real potential for damage if the problem was not addressed. In my view, that is enough.
>
> [Emphasis added]
>
> 33 De Shazo says he was lacking proof that O'Mara owned or controlled NovoMundo. He says that in July 2002 he received, for the first time, "credible factual information from the defendants that O'Mara owned NovoMundo" in the form of the statement from Wilson that NovoMundo was, as far as Wilson and others knew, owned by O'Mara. This, De Shazo says, was the missing piece of the puzzle that he needed to put his claim together. However, that statement did not add significantly to the picture De Shazo already had in February 2000.
>
> 34 In our view, the information in De Shazo's hands in February 2000 was sufficient for him to bring a claim against the appellants for an oppression remedy and in fraud, and to resist a summary judgment application to dismiss such a claim. Further, in June 2001

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

> De Shazo went so far as to obtain a legal opinion about the availability of an oppression remedy from Alberta counsel, and then changed that legal opinion and sent the doctored version to O'Mara in March 2002 to bolster his threat of litigation. As counsel for the appellants noted in argument, if this is not an appropriate case for summary judgment it is difficult to imagine what is.

[103] In this case, therefore, the real issue to be decided is: Have the applicants established, on the basis of uncontested facts, that any cause of action which Weatherford may have had against them has been defeated by application of the 2 year limit in the Limitations Act? In this context, the applicants argue that, most likely by November 30, 2005 or, at the latest, by March 31, 2006, the statutory limitation period began to toll against Weatherford and that Weatherford did not file its lawsuit against them within the required limitations period.

[104] Even if the answer to the above question is Yes, the court must then go on to consider whether the March 31, 2008 deadline has been extended by application of the provisions of s. 6(4) of the Limitations Act.

[105] Weatherford has two essential responses to the applicants' applications for summary judgment: first, until it saw stators which it identified as having been manufactured by the applicants in Europump's yard in early June, 2006, it had merely a suspicion about the activities of Artemis and Kaechele based on Dunn's hearsay evidence.

[106] Second, Weatherford argues that, even if the limitations clock would normally have started to run against it by March 31, 2006, s. 6(4)(a) allows them to add the applicants as defendants after the expiration of the relevant limitation period because the addition of the applicants as defendants is related to the conduct, transaction or events described in Weatherford's original statement of claim.

[107] For the reasons set out below, I have concluded that the applicants have met the required burden and are entitled to summary judgment dismissing Weatherford's claims against them: the limitations clock started to run against Weatherford at the latest by March 31, 2006 and, by March 31, 2008, Weatherford had not filed its claim against them. While Weatherford's April 2008 added claim against the applicants does relate to Weatherford's original pleading, because of the application of the equitable principles of acquiescence and laches, the applicants should not be deprived of limitations immunity from Weatherford's claim.

a) Indirect attack on earlier decision refusing summary judgment

[108] Obviously, the current applications for summary judgment are completely different in character – limitations defence – from the 2011 applications for summary judgment – exclusive use.

b) Best foot forward

[109] Weatherford has had the opportunity of putting forward unchallenged evidence from Lane about the limitations issue. Therefore, the court is entitled to assume that there is no additional evidence which Weatherford could advance to improve its position on the limitations issue.

[110] As indicated above, the court does not make any rebuttable adverse inference against Weatherford as a result of Dunn's destruction of the notes of his meetings with Addie and Anderson.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

[111] There is no conflict in the evidence since the applications are based on Weatherford's own evidence.

c) The two year limitations period started to run on November 30, 2005

[112] The key evidence on these applications is the November 25, 2005 email from Dunn to Lane.

[113] In determining the effect of Weatherford's receipt of the November 25, 2005 email, the court must consider the nature of the person who is sending the email, Lonnie Dunn.

[114] Mr. Dunn is not some insignificant or unreliable individual. He is a senior employee at Weatherford, with technical management of the PC pump sector, and having direct relationships not only with the defendants Addie and Anderson, but also with each of Artemis and Kaechele. He is therefore a person whose technical assessment is presumptively reliable. Also, because of his actual involvement with Addie, Anderson, Artemis and Kaechele, his opinion of the likelihood that they should be taken at their word is presumptively reliable.

[115] By the time this email was sent to Lane, Dunn had, earlier in the month of November, already "confessed" to Lane that, for many months earlier in 2005, he had met with Addie and Anderson to discuss the possibility that he would join them in starting up a company to compete with Weatherford. Even in a criminal context, where the burden of proof is much higher than in civil proceedings, a court is entitled to hear evidence from an individual - not a person in authority - to the effect that the accused made a confession to him. Evidence of that confession can be received as evidence for the truth of its content despite the fact that the evidence itself is hearsay evidence because evidence against interest has, historically, been found to be presumptively reliable. Naturally, a court – and certainly Weatherford – would be entitled to consider all of the circumstances with a view to determining whether Dunn's report of a confession by Addie and Anderson was an unreliable or false confession, or a reliable one. For example, in the circumstances here, there were no potential language problems; all the participants in the discussion not only all spoke and understood English but they all spoke and understood the technical language surrounding the production of stators. There was no suggestibility on the part of Addie and Anderson since they were the persons who brought the "opportunity" to Dunn's attention. Indeed, there is nothing in the circumstances of the confession of Addie and Anderson to Dunn and Dunn's report of that confession to Lane which puts the elements of the confession in doubt: Anderson had good relations with the German manufacturers, so it was not unlikely that he had convinced them to supply the startup with stators. Even in criminal proceedings, while it may be useful, confirmatory evidence of a confession is not necessary before the confession is admissible. In the civil sphere, having a reliable person tell it that Artemis and Kaechele were going to assist a competitive startup constituted adequate information on which Weatherford should have acted – by taking legal proceedings in much the same way as it acted by taking commercial proceedings - even in the absence of absolute proof.

[116] In determining the effect of Weatherford's receipt of the November 25, 2005 email, the court must also consider the overall context in which the email was sent.

[117] Part of that context is that there are very few stator manufacturers for the PC pump industry. Weatherford itself acknowledges that the German applicants have been very well accepted in the Canadian market. It was therefore not unlikely that arrangements would be made by a startup with the German manufacturers.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

[118] Part of that context also included the fact that Weatherford realized that its relationship with the German manufacturers was not as clear and circumscribed as Weatherford would like: Weatherford had unsuccessfully attempted to negotiate new agreements that would change the relationship which Weatherford had had with the German suppliers over a considerable period of time. In the absence of any such new agreements, Weatherford would have realized its supply vulnerabilities.

[119] Part of that context also includes the fact that Addie and Anderson had been, in the past, involved in a situation where there was some challenge to sole source production from the German manufacturers; the idea that a competitive startup would use German-produced stators was clearly not a remote, weird, odd or unlikely event.

[120] It must also be noted that the November 25, 2005 email was not an "off the cuff" statement by Dunn; it was not one of those "thoughtless press send" situations which may occur even in a commercial situation. Not only was this email preceded by a meeting between Dunn and Weatherford's Vice-President Lane during which the general issues were discussed, the email itself notes that Dunn knowingly decides to send a lengthy email despite knowing Lane's preference for short emails. Dunn also notes the need for prompt action as a way of explaining why he is taking the time to send a lengthy email.

[121] In determining the effect of Weatherford's receipt of the November 25, 2005 email, the court must finally consider the email itself.

[122] The email mentioned that "this is . . out in the open". This presumably relates to the fact that, by November 25, 2005, both Addie and Anderson had actually left Weatherford's employ; this may be confirmatory of Dunn's disclosure of Addie and Anderson's plans. The reference to the matter now being in the open relates to the fact that Dunn acknowledges that he is in a position to make recommendations as to what course Weatherford should take in light of the departure of Addie and Anderson because he knew "in advance" that they were intending to leave.

[123] The email also emphasizes that the startup is based on "the exact same pump", "exact same product", i.e. a pump which has stators manufactured by the exact same companies which are manufacturing Weatherford's stators in November, 2005, i.e. Artemis and Kaechele. Indeed, the email explicitly states that the startup will "get stators from Artemis and Kaechele".

[124] The email also addresses the issue of timing. This engineer, with this background in the industry and this background with the individuals involved says that it can be assumed "that they have already ordered product from Artemis and Kaechele".

[125] While the email uses the phrase "purely my opinions", that phrase does not refer to the underlying factual matrix. Rather, it relates to the fact that Dunn is a technical expert and he realizes that management decisions, relating for example to the initiation of an expensive replication project, are not within his domain.

[126] Assuming that Weatherford might have a few days to await some additional information from Dunn or that it might need a few days to run Dunn's information by other knowledgeable people in the organization in order to satisfy its due diligence obligation, the court arrives at

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

November 30, 2005 as the date by which Weatherford knew, or should have known, everything it needed to know to sue the applicants.

[127] Indeed, Weatherford learned nothing after November 25, 2005 which affected its decision to sue the applicants.

d) At the latest, the two year limitations period started to run on March 31, 2006

[128] For the reasons set out above, the court concludes that the limitations clock began to run against Weatherford on November 30, 2005.

[129] However, if the court were wrong it its assessment that November 30, 2005 is the critical date, it is clear that, by March 31, 2006, the clock had begun to run.

[130] The Weatherford evidence from the period after November 30, 2005 which is important in this context is the evidence of the Lane response to the Dunn email of December 19, 2005: "Full speed ahead". In other words, by December 19, 2005 at the latest, Weatherford was committed to the expenditure of time, professional resources, and money on the replication of the German stators with a view to cutting out the German applicants. Lane's affirmation to the contrary in February 2016 simply cannot be true in light of Weatherford's own documents.

[131] Relying on Seyedi, Weatherford argues that it was not in a position to sue the applicants until it had proof that they had misappropriated proprietary Weatherford information and that it did not have that proof until June 2006. That argument is untenable for at least four reasons:

- first, as the December 19, 2005 communications made clear, Weatherford took the Dunn information of November 25, 2005 and December 19, 2005 seriously enough to spend material resources on dealing with the Artemis/Kaechele problem. Lane's subsequent affidavit on this topic cannot be taken seriously;

- second, when it saw pumps in a yard in June, 2006, Weatherford could not – simply from a view of the pumps - have known who manufactured the stators. Since there is a least one American manufacturer of stators, Robinson Meyers, who had previously been involved with these companies, Weatherford would have had to acquire one of those pumps, and dismantle it to try to determine who had manufactured the stator. Yet, Weatherford immediately presumed that it was the defendants who manufactured the startup's stators and that presumption was based on the November 2005 email from Dunn;

- third, on Weatherford's own assessment of the situation, starting in November 2005, the applicants had, at the least, agreed to misappropriate Weatherford's proprietary information and that agreement had encouraged the startup competition. The misuse of the information therefore was established by the promise to Addie and Anderson that they would manufacture the exact same pump for the startup;

- fourth, No Limits Sportswear reminds me that, even if actual detriment were required to establish the third factor in the Supreme Court of Canada's outline of the tort of misuse of confidential information, the replication program on which Weatherford embarked constituted a financial detriment to Weatherford.

[132] In addition to the December 19, 2005 evidence, in early January 2006 or at the latest by the end of the first quarter of 2006 – i.e. March 31, 2006, Weatherford received evidence from a customer – therefore an independent source - consisting of the specifications for rotors. Although the applicants manufacture stators and not rotors, the stators and the rotors must fit exactly with one another. Therefore, by seeing the rotor specifications, Weatherford could deduce what stator specifications were used with those rotor specifications; Weatherford could satisfy itself of the interior geometry of the PC pumps addressed in the rotor specs. Therefore, at the latest by March 31, 2006, Weatherford knew that the startup's plan to have the Germans manufacture stators for them was real and not merely some kind of airy-fairy possibility.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

[133] In summary, although it is clear on the evidence that, by November 20, 2005, Weatherford knew everything it needed to know to sue the applicants, in addition by March 31, 2006, Weatherford had received confirmatory evidence that the startup's plan to compete by offering the same product to the marketplace was being put into operation. Therefore, by March 31, 2006, at the latest, the limitations clock started to tick against Weatherford. That clock ran out on March 31, 2008.

[134] Weatherford did not file its amendment to this statement of claim until April, 2008. Therefore, it missed the limitations deadline and its claims against the applicants are invalid.

e) For equitable reasons, the applicants should not be denied limitations immunity from Weatherford's use of the curative provisions of the limitations legislation

[135] Weatherford argues that even if it missed the two year deadline, it should have the benefit of the curative provision found in s. 6(4) of the Limitations Act.

[136] This is an awkward argument for Weatherford to advance because one of the requirements of s. 6 of the Act is that any added claim must "relate to the conduct, transaction or events described in the original pleading". The mentions of Artemis and Kaechele in the original pleading are highlighted in the Background section. In light of the original pleading, it is difficult to explain why the causes of action "added" against Artemis and Kaechele in 2008 were not clear when the original pleadings was filed. Indeed, it is difficult to identify how the "new" substantive claim against the applicants differs from the conduct outlined in the original pleading.

[137] In any event, however, assuming that s. 6(4) of the Limitations Act is available to Weatherford to extend its limitations period against them, Artemis and Kaechele argue that they should not be denied immunity from liability to Weatherford because of laches and acquiescence.

[138] In attempting to establish a purposive interpretation of s. 10 of the Limitations Act, the court looks to ALRI's Report on Limitations, which report presumably established the basis for the reform of limitations law in Alberta, and to which report even Weatherford refers. In that Report, one notes the following comment on the topic "Claims Added to a Proceeding":

> When a proceeding has been started by a timely claim, the parties will often wish to add further claims which are subject to a limitations defence. If the added claims are related to the conduct, transaction or events described in the original pleading in the proceeding, it will often be desirable, for reasons of justice and efficiency, to have them tried in a single proceeding with the original claims. The new Alberta Act will deprive a defendant of a limitations defence he would normally have to an added claim in the situation we have described, but only if requirements designed to give the defendant alternative limitations protection have been satisfied.

[139] It is therefore clear that section 6(4) in the new statute was not intended to deprive defendants of limitations protection. Indeed, the reform of limitations legislation would be a sham if a litigant could, by mere mention of a transaction, deliberately avoid or extend a limitations period.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

[140] Next we must look at the definition of acquiescence and laches.

[141] Although the factual situations in the cases are of no assistance in resolving the issues here, I agree with Weatherford's outline of the basic legal principles of acquiescence and laches as outlined by our Court of Appeal in Hunter, which then refers to the SCC decision in M.(K.). Those decisions emphasize that laches requires more than mere delay; in addition to delay there must be acquiescence to the point of waiver, or prejudice, or other potential injustice.

[142] I have earlier outlined why, in Alberta, acquiescence and laches apply to legal as well as to equitable claims.

[143] As to the notion of acquiescence, some additional perspective is provided by Urbas Estate:

> Laches and Delay also bars the Plaintiffs' claim
>
> 79 Laches is established when two conditions are fulfilled: (1) there is unreasonable delay in the commencement or prosecution of proceedings; and (2) in all of the circumstances the consequences of delay renders the grant of relief unreasonable or unjust: Rhyolite Resources Inc. v. CanQuest Resource Corp., [1999] B.C.J. No. 114 (C.A.), at para. 33.
>
> 80 There are two distinct branches to the laches doctrine. The doctrine will apply where the delay of the plaintiff (a) constitutes acquiescence, or (b) results in circumstances that make the prosecution of the action unreasonable: M.(K.) v. M.(H.), at para. 98.
>
> 81 Mere delay is insufficient to trigger laches under either of its two branches. Rather, the doctrine of laches considers whether the delay of the plaintiff constitutes acquiescence or results in circumstances that make the prosecution of the action unreasonable. Ultimately, laches must be resolved as a matter of justice as between the parties, as is the case with any equitable doctrine. The court in exercising its equitable jurisdiction must always consider the conscionability of the behaviour of both parties.
>
> 82 "Acquiescence" has various meanings. One meaning is that a plaintiff stands by and watches the deprivation of her rights and does nothing. Another is that after the deprivation of her rights and in the full knowledge of their existence, a plaintiff delays, leading to an inference that her rights have been waived: M.(K.) v. M.(H.), at para. 100
>
> 83 A plaintiff's knowledge of her rights is critical to the notion of acquiescence; however, this knowledge is to be measured by an objective standard so that the question is whether it is reasonable for the plaintiff to be ignorant of her legal rights given her knowledge of the underlying facts relevant to a possible legal claim.

[144] In Hunter, our Court of Appeal also approved the Manitoba Court of Appeal's decision in Rivergate Properties Inc. which decision includes, starting at para. 38, an explanation of why, in an appropriate situation, on the basis of the wording of the statute itself, the equitable doctrines of laches and acquiescence can provide immunity even where a statutory limitation period still has time to run.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

[145] In the result, this court must determine whether a potential injustice is caused to the applicants if Weatherford were allowed to use the curative provisions of s. 6(4) of the Limitations Act to extend a limitations deadline and deprive the applicants of a limitations defence.

[146] In deciding whether an equitable argument is available to the applicants, the court must consider the equitable position of the applicants as well as that of Weatherford. Weatherford argues that the applicants do not have clean hands because they abused private information, etc.; the problem with that argument is, of course, that these are mere allegations on Weatherford's part, and the actual subject of the lawsuit. Weatherford cannot, in this context, presume that it will be successful in its lawsuit.

[147] Weatherford also argues that the applicants knew very well what they had done and it would therefore not be unjust to delay instituting legal proceedings against them for that reason. This is an argument which is essentially similar to the first argument advanced by Weatherford, and the answer to this argument is also the same: Weatherford cannot in this context assume that it will be successful in its lawsuit against the applicants.

[148] Nor in the context of limitations can it be suggested that defendants have any obligation to move the case along or otherwise to assist a plaintiff in acting within a limitations deadline.

[149] On the contrary, as soon as Weatherford was made to disclose the November 25, 2005 email, the applicants immediately applied for summary judgment on the basis of limitations. The applicants have clean hands on this application.

[150] On the other hand, the evidence is clear that Weatherford understood the limitations problem which it faced: it acknowledges that it issued the 2007 statement of claim to protect its limitations position. Limitations statutes establish deadlines; a horseshoes response to a statutory deadline is inadequate.

[151] Weatherford is a sophisticated litigant. As the November 25, 2005 email makes clear, as of that date Weatherford understood that it had a decision to make about whether and when it would sue the applicants. If it did sue the applicants, Weatherford believed that it had to take the risk that the applicants would not continue to supply Weatherford with stators; that would have effected a commercial detriment to Weatherford because Weatherford could not, in November, 2005, yet replicate the German stators. If it did not sue the applicants in November, 2005, it could hope to maintain supply from the German applicants until Weatherford had replicated the German stators and was in a position to, itself, provide the "exact same pump" to the marketplace as the pump to which the Germans had been contributing. That was, of course, the kind of choice which Weatherford was entitled to make. Even if Weatherford's deliberate choice not to sue the applicants and to continue placing orders for stators with them does not meet the level of waiver which the doctrine of acquiescence requires, it is at the least conduct which the court can take into account in determining the equities of the situation.

[152] What is decisive here is that Weatherford chose not to comply with a known limitations period and to sit on their rights; although Weatherford describes this as a "prudent risk", Weatherford's behaviour is a classic example of laches.

[153] Although the time which elapsed between the end of the s. 3 limitation period and Weatherford's filing of a lawsuit against these applicants is not long, in all the circumstances, I have concluded that to allow Weatherford to obtain the benefit of extending the statutory s. 3 limitation period would be inequitable.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

f) Conclusion

[154] For the reasons outlined, I have concluded that there is no genuine issue for trial: the limitations issue can be fairly decided on the basis of uncontroverted evidence.

6. Costs

[155] If the parties are not agreed on costs, I may be spoken to within 30 days of the release of this decision.

2016 ABQB 188 (CanLII)

Heard on the 4th and 8th days of March, 2016.
Dated at the City of Edmonton, Alberta this 6th day of April, 2016.

J.B. Veit
J.C.Q.B.A.

Appearances:

Kenneth Fitz, McLennan Ross
For Applicant, Artemis Kautschuk and Kunstoff-Technik GmbH

Sylvia Jacob, Jacob Associates
For Applicant, Wilhelm Kaechele GmbH

Fausto Franceschi, Ward Hanson, Alison Walsh,
Dentons Canada LLP
For Respondent, Weatherford Canada Partnership

Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta

Citation: Delta Hotels No 2 Holdings Ltd v Calm Shore Ventures (1992) Inc, 2019 ABQB 434

2019 ABQB 434 (CanLII)

Date: 20190611
Docket: 1103 12977
Registry: Edmonton

Between:

Delta Hotels No 2 Holdings Ltd

Plaintiff

- and -

Calm Shore Ventures (1992) Inc, Calm Shores Ventures Inc, Jacques Whitford Limited, Stantec Inc, Hein Reichard Tomlin Inc, Schirmer Engineering Corporation, AON Fire Protection Engineering Corporation, Halsall Associates Limited, Impact Fire Safety Sales & Service Ltd, UTC Fire & Security Canada, Tyco International of Canada Ltd, Carrying on Business Under the Registered Trade Name of Simplex Grinnel, Ansul Incorporated, and ABC Co Ltd

Defendants

Reasons for Judgment
of the
Honourable Mr. Justice K.G. Nielsen

I. Introduction

[1] Delta Hotels No 2 Holdings Ltd, now known as DHL No 2 Holdings Ltd (DHL Holdings) applies to: amend the current Amended Statement of Claim to reflect its current name; to add three companies, DHL No 2 Limited Partnership (DHL Limited Partnership), bcIMC Realty Corporation (bcIMC), and DHL Hotels Limited (DHL Hotels) as Plaintiffs; to remove all of the Defendants against whom DHL Holdings has discontinued; and to make the necessary consequent amendments to the Amended Statement of Claim.

[2] The remaining Defendants consent to the Application to

(a) change the Plaintiff's name to reflect its current name;
(b) remove all Defendants against whom Discontinuances of Action have been filed; and
(c) the changes to the Amended Statement of Claim consequent upon such amendments.

[3] The remaining Defendants oppose the Application to add bcIMC, DHL Limited Partnership, and DHL Hotels as Plaintiffs.

[4] For the reasons that follow, I allow the Application to add bcIMC, DHL Limited Partnership, and DHL Hotels as Plaintiffs, as well as the amendments consequent to the addition of these Plaintiffs. Specifically, I allow the amendments proposed in paras 48 and 49 of the Amended Statement of Claim.

II. Background

[5] DHL Holdings is, and was at all material times, the title holder of the lands and building municipally located at 4404 Gateway Blvd, Edmonton, Alberta (the Hotel).

[6] bcIMC is, and was at all material times, the beneficial owner of the Hotel pursuant to a Declaration of Trust with DHL Holdings dated December 6, 2007 (the Declaration of Trust). The Declaration of Trust provides that DHL Holdings holds its interest in the Hotel as trustee in trust for bcIMC as beneficial owner.

[7] DHL Limited Partnership was at all material times the lessee of the Hotel pursuant to an Amended and Restated Operating Lease dated July 1, 2009 (the Lease). Pursuant to the Lease, DHL Limited Partnership agreed to use the Hotel and make rental payments to DHL Holdings and bcIMC as joint landlords of the Hotel. DHL Holdings alleges that the rental payments were calculated in part based upon the revenues generated by the operations of the Hotel.

[8] DHL Hotels , at all material times, provided hotel management services to DHL Limited Partnership under a Hotel Management Agreement dated July 1, 2009 (the Management Agreement). DHL Holdings alleges that the management fees under the Management Agreement were calculated, in part, based on the revenues generated by the Hotel's operations.

[9] DHL Holdings, DHL Limited Partnership, bcIMC, and DHL Hotels, at all material times, were controlled, directly or indirectly, by the British Columbia Investment Management Corporation.

[10] On or about August 26, 2009, a fire originated in the kitchen area of the Botanica Restaurant, located in the Hotel (the Fire). DHL Holdings alleges that the Fire caused damages and loss to the Hotel and its business.

[11] On August 15, 2011, DHL Holdings issued a Statement of Claim in this action. That Statement of Claim was amended on February 27, 2013. Of all of the Defendants named in the Action, only three remain.

2019 ABQB 434 (CanLII)

[12] In the Amended Statement of Claim, DHL Holdings alleges that Tyco International Canada Ltd., carrying on business under the registered trade name of Simplex Grinnel (Tyco) or its predecessors, contracted to supply and install a fire suppression system in the kitchen of the Botanica Restaurant.

[13] DHL Holdings also alleges that UTC Fire & Security Canada (UTCFS Canada), or its predecessors, contracted to test, maintain and inspect the fire suppression systems, fire extinguishers, and other life safety equipment within the Hotel, and to certify that such equipment was of the proper type, was suitable for the purpose intended, was properly installed, was adequately charged, and was capable of operating as intended.

[14] Finally, DHL Holdings alleges that the Defendant, Calm Shore Ventures (1992) Inc. (Calm Shore) contracted to clean the range hood within the Botanica Restaurant and the exhaust ducting leading from the range hood to the exterior of the Hotel.

[15] DHL Holdings alleges that the losses and damages it suffered as a result of the Fire were due to the breaches of contract or negligence of one or more of Tyco, UTCFS Canada and Calm Shore.

[16] As stated, DHL Holdings seeks to file an Amended Amended Statement of Claim adding each of bcIMC, DHL Limited Partnership, and DHL Hotels as Plaintiffs and seeking to recover the damages which each alleges to have suffered as a result of the Fire (the Proposed Amended Claim).

III. Pleadings

A. Amended Statement of Claim

[17] The Amended Statement of Claim alleges that each of Tyco, UTCFS Canada and Calm Shore contracted with the Plaintiff, namely, DHL Holdings. The damages and loss claimed are set out at para 48:

> As a result of the negligence and breaches of contract of the Defendants, or any one or more of them, the Plaintiff has suffered significant loss and damage to the Hotel and its contents, loss of revenues from the operation of the Botanica Restaurant and the Hotel during the period of repair and reconstruction and continuing thereafter, and loss of business reputation of the Hotel. Full particulars of the damages and loss have not as yet been ascertained but will be proven at the trial of this action.

[18] The relief sought is set out at para 49:

> The Plaintiff claims the following relief as against the Defendants, jointly and severally:
>
> a. Loss and damage to the Hotel and its contents in the approximate amount of $8 million [sic];
>
> b. Loss of revenues during the period of repair and reconstruction in the approximate amount of $5 million [sic];

2019 ABQB 434 (CanLII)

c. General Damages for ongoing loss of revenues and loss of business reputation in the amount of $2 million [sic];

d. Interest on the foregoing in accordance with the Judgment Interest Act, RSA 2000, c J-1; and

e. Costs of this action.

B. Proposed Amended Claim

[19] The Proposed Amended Claim alleges that Tyco, UTCFS Canada and Calm Shore each had a contract with the Plaintiffs, namely DHL Holdings and the three parties proposed to be added as Plaintiffs.

[20] The damages and losses claimed are set out at para 48:

> As a result of the negligence and breaches of contract of the Defendants, or any one or more of them, the Plaintiffs collectively have suffered significant losses and damage to the Hotel and its contents, loss of revenues from the operation of the Botanica Restaurant and the Hotel during the period of repair and reconstruction and continuing thereafter, loss of rental payments and hotel management fees and loss of business reputation to the Hotel. Full particulars and allocation of the damages and loss have not as yet been ascertained but will be proven at the trial of this action.

[21] The relief sought is set out at para 49 of the Proposed Amended Claim. The losses and damages claimed are the same as set out in the Amended Statement of Claim, but are now sought on behalf of DHL Holdings and the three parties proposed to be added as Plaintiffs.

IV. Issues

1. Should DHL Holdings be granted leave to further amend the Amended Statement of Claim by adding the three proposed Plaintiffs and making the consequential amendments although the relevant limitation period has expired?

2. Is the Application barred by the doctrines of laches and acquiescence?

V. Positions of the Parties

[22] DHL Holdings submits that the amendments set out in the Proposed Amended Claim do not change the claimed losses and damages, but merely seek to allocate them among the current and proposed Plaintiffs, namely as they pertain to the damage to real property, business interruption losses, and the loss of rental payments and hotel management fees suffered by the current Plaintiff and proposed Plaintiffs. DHL Holdings and the proposed Plaintiffs are "sister companies" and all part of the same corporate group controlled directly or indirectly by the British Columbia Investment Management Corporation and, therefore, should be permitted to allocate the losses within that group. The proposed amendments are permitted under the Alberta Rules of Court, AR 124/2010 and the Limitations Act, RSA 2000, c L-12. Further, the doctrines of laches and acquiescence do not apply here.

2019 ABQB 434 (CanLII)

[23] Tyco argues that the proposed amendments are barred by the Limitations Act. Further, Tyco argues that the Application is doomed by the doctrines of both laches and acquiescence.

[24] UTCFS Canada does not oppose the addition or substitution of bcIMC or DHL Limited Partnership to the extent these parties are seeking property damages to the Hotel and its contents or the business interruption claim in relation to the operations of the Hotel. However, UTCFS Canada does oppose the addition of parties, causes of action, and heads of damage in relation to the alleged loss of rental payments and the alleged loss of management fees.

[25] Calm Shore supports both Tyco and UTCFS Canada.

VI. Law

A. Rules of Court

[26] The following Rules of Court are germane to this Application:

> 3.62(1) A party may amend the party's pleading, including an amendment to add, remove, substitute or correct the name of a party, as follows:
>
> ...
>
> (b) after pleadings close,
>
> (i) for the addition, removal, substitution or correction of the name of a party, with the Court's prior permission in accordance with rule 3.74 [Adding, removing or substituting parties after close of pleadings] ...
>
> ...
>
> 3.74(1) After close of pleadings, no person may be added, removed or substituted as a party to an action started by statement of claim except in accordance with this rule.
>
> (2) On application, the Court may order that a person be added, removed or substituted as a party to an action if
>
> (a) in the case of a person to be added or substituted as plaintiff, plaintiff-by-counterclaim or third party plaintiff, the application is made by a person or party and the consent of the person proposed to be added or substituted as a party is filed with the application;
>
> (b) in the case of an application to add or substitute any other party, or to remove or to correct the name of a party, the application is made by a party and the Court is satisfied the order should be made.
>
> (3) The Court may not make an order under this rule if prejudice would result for a party that could not be remedied by a costs award, an adjournment or the imposition of terms.

2019 ABQB 434 (CanLII)

B. Limitations Act

[27] The following sections of the Limitations Act are germane to this Application:

> 6(1) Notwithstanding the expiration of the relevant limitation period, when a claim is added to a proceeding previously commenced, either through a new pleading or an amendment to pleadings, the defendant is not entitled to immunity from liability in respect of the added claim if the requirements of subsection (2), (3) or (4) are satisfied.
>
> ...
>
> (3) When the added claim adds or substitutes a claimant, or changes the capacity in which a claimant sues,
>
> (a) the added claim must be related to the conduct, transaction or events described in the original pleading in the proceeding,
>
> (b) the defendant must have received, within the limitation period applicable to the added claim plus the time provided by law for the service of process, sufficient knowledge of the added claim that the defendant will not be prejudiced in maintaining a defence to it on the merits, and
>
> (c) the court must be satisfied that the added claim is necessary or desirable to ensure the effective enforcement of the claims originally asserted or intended to be asserted in the proceeding.
>
> ...
>
> (5) Under this section,
>
> (a) the claimant has the burden of proving
>
> (i) that the added claim is related to the conduct, transaction or events described in the original pleading in the proceeding, and
>
> (ii) that the requirement of subsection (3)(c), if in issue, has been satisfied,
>
> and
>
> (b) the defendant has the burden of proving that the requirement of subsection (3)(b) or (4)(b), if in issue, was not satisfied.
>
> ...
>
> 10 Nothing in this Act precludes a court from granting a defendant immunity from liability under the equitable doctrines of acquiescence or laches, notwithstanding that the defendant would not be entitled to immunity pursuant to this Act.

2019 ABQB 434 (CanLII)

C. Case Law

[28] Generally, amendments should be allowed, no matter how late or careless, unless there is prejudice that cannot be repaired: Balm v 3512061 Canada Ltd, 2003 ABCA 98, at para 43.

[29] This Court has broad discretion to allow amendments to pleadings and this discretion is to be exercised generously: Andritz Ltd v Quality Fabricating & Supply Ltd, 2010 ABQB 101, at para 43. However, amendments will not be granted if the court finds:

> (a) the amendment will cause prejudice that cannot be ameliorated by costs or other measures;
>
> (b) the amendment is "hopeless", i.e. it does not disclose a cause of action and is not relevant to a cause of action;
>
> (c) the amendment would have been inappropriate as an original pleading, i.e. no amendment will be allowed if it could have been struck as being vexatious, an abuse of process, etc.;
>
> (d) the amendment is not in proper form or is unsatisfactorily particularized; or
>
> (e) the amendment is made after a limitation has passed and
>
> > (i) does not relate to the same conduct, transaction or events described in the original pleading in the proceedings;
> >
> > (ii) the defendant did not receive, within the limitation period applicable to the added claim plus the time provided by law for the service of process (a total of three years) sufficient knowledge of the added claim that the defendant will not be prejudiced in maintaining a defence to it on the merits; and
> >
> > (iii) the added claim is not necessary or desirable to ensure the effective enforcement of the claims originally asserted or intended to be asserted in the proceeding.

[30] See Andritz at para 46; Foda v Capital Health Region, 2007 ABCA 207, at para 10; S(CH) v Alberta (Director of Child Welfare), 2006 ABQB 528, at para 11; aff'd 2006 ABCA 355; Attila Dogan Construction & Installation Co v AMEC Americas Ltd, 2013 ABQB 525, at para 13, aff'd 2014 ABCA 74.

[31] Some proposed amendments will require the requesting party to tender some evidence in support. In Bard v Canadian Natural Resources, 2016 ABQB 267, Nixon J noted at para 12:

> If an amendment is ancillary, no evidence is necessary. Otherwise, the amount of evidence to support an amendment is generally low. This requirement for "modest" evidence includes amendments that allege new substantive facts; yet, even as the evidentiary threshold to amend is low, the evidence "must have some foundation in fact": Attila, supra at paras 14-16. Amendments that particularize a pre-existing claim are granted more liberally than those which effectively add new causes of action. The onus is on the applicants to adduce a modest amount of evidence to support their proposed amendments.

2019 ABQB 434 (CanLII)

[32] Similarly, in Canadian Natural Resources Ltd v Arcelormittal Tubular Products Roman SA, 2012 ABQB 679, aff'd 2013 ABCA 87, Hughes J (as she then was), relying on Balm at paras 9 and 23, noted that trivial amendments, "such as those that do not seek to impose any liability on new defendants" or amendments that are "purely ancillary," do not require evidence: at para 47. The Court went on to note at para 48:

> Amendments pleading a new cause of action or claim arising from facts already plead in existing pleadings filed in time, also require little if any evidence. In Balm, Côté JA observed at para 11:
>
> > Paragraph 37 in the amended statement of claim is new, and is clearly a new cause of action. However, though the legal conclusion pleaded is new, the acts alleged in it are not new. It is trite law that a statement of claim need not name causes of action or draw legal conclusions. It need only plead facts. So the plaintiff could merely have sent the original defendants' counsel a letter warning that he would argue at trial that proof of such and such facts already alleged in the statement of claim would constitute the cause of action of mutuality of obligations under law merchant. See 30 Hals. Laws 7 (3rd Ed. 1959).

VII. Analysis

A. Amendment to Pleadings

[33] At the outset, I note that the consents of the three proposed Plaintiffs as required by Rule 3.74(2)(a) have been filed.

[34] The addition of bcIMC, DHL Limited Partnership, and DHL Hotels as Plaintiffs and the added claims for damages for loss of rental payments and hotel management fees are outside of the relevant limitation period. Section 6 of the Limitations Act applies.

[35] So long as none of the exceptions to the general rule - that amendments should be allowed, no matter how careless or late - apply, this Court should allow the amendments.

i) Prejudice

[36] A party cannot be added to a claim if prejudice would result to a party that could not be remedied by a costs award, an adjournment, or the imposition of terms.

[37] The Plaintiff submits there is no prejudice to the Defendants if the Court allows the amendments. The Plaintiff has already provided all of the records the current and proposed Plaintiffs will rely on to prove liability and quantum. Although scheduling additional Questioning of the proposed Plaintiffs may be time consuming, it does not result in serious prejudice to the Defendants that cannot be remedied.

[38] This case is very similar to the situation in Andritz, which involved a plaintiff - Andritz Ltd. - that applied to add Andritz Inc. as a plaintiff to an action after the expiration of the limitation period. After filing its Statement of Claim, Andritz Ltd. determined that some of the damages set out in the claim were actually incurred by Andritz Inc. The background facts did not change as a result of the amendment. The damages incurred by Andritz Inc. were included in the damages already pled. In Andritz, as in this case, there were allegations of breaches of contract and duty of care.

2019 ABQB 434 (CanLII)

[39] Macklin J found there was no prejudice to the defendants that could not be ameliorated by an award of costs, amendments, or adjournments. He noted there was the possibility of inconvenience but no "serious prejudice or injustice": at para 49.

[40] Prejudice is also a factor under s 6 of the Limitations Act, and I will discuss it further when I discuss s 6.

ii) Hopeless

[41] I agree with the Plaintiff that the proposed amendments are not hopeless. The amendments merely extend previous allegations, of the existence of contractual relationships and a duty of care, to the proposed Plaintiffs.

iii) Inappropriate, Vexatious, Abuse of Process

[42] The proposed amendments are not inappropriate, vexatious, or an abuse of process.

iv) Improper Format, Insufficient Particulars

[43] The proposed amendments are sufficiently particularized. A pleading need only include facts; it is unnecessary for a pleading to contain evidence by which facts are to be proven: Andritz, at para 56.

v) Limitations Act, s 6

[44] Although the proposed amendments are outside of the limitation period they satisfy the criteria in s 6(3) of the Limitations Act.

[45] The scope of s 6 includes "applications to add or substitute a claimant or change the capacity in which a claimant sues without in any way altering the body of the pleading...": Stout Estate v Golinowski Estate, 2002 ABCA 49, at para 91.

[46] Courts use a functional approach in applying s 6. Late amendments will be allowed unless the party opposing the amendments can establish it will suffer actual prejudice: Stout Estate, at paras 97-100. In applying the functional approach, a court must determine whether the requirements in s 6(3) are met.

a) Conduct, Transaction, Event

[47] In this case, the proposed amendments arise from the same conduct, transaction, and events found in the Amended Statement of Claim. The Plaintiff says the only difference between the Amended Statement of Claim and the Proposed Amended Claim is allocation of damages: namely the loss of rental payments and hotel management fees as functions of loss of hotel revenues.

[48] The proposed amendments arise out of the Fire. The Proposed Amended Claim does not introduce any new facts or events.

b) Sufficient Knowledge to Avoid Prejudice

[49] The Defendants take the position they did not receive sufficient knowledge of the added claims and they will therefore be prejudiced in maintaining a defence. Tyco alleges the amendments would cause prejudice because the defendants would be faced with diminished ability to garner evidence necessary to address the amended claims and that key evidence is missing.

2019 ABQB 434 (CanLII)

[50] UTCFS Canada says the amendments would cause serious prejudice that is not compensable in costs, pointing to general loss of evidence, the fact that the litigation has been ongoing for more than seven years, the necessity for production of new records, Questioning, and expert reports, and the fact that necessary information is now difficult to locate or has been destroyed.

[51] The Plaintiff says the Defendants have failed to satisfy their burden of establishing they would suffer prejudice if the amendments are allowed. I agree. The Plaintiff is not alleging a new cause of action, nor is it adding new damages. Allowing the addition of the three proposed Plaintiffs, and allocating the damages between them, will not prejudice the Defendants.

c) Necessary to Ensure Enforcement

[52] Finally, adding the proposed Plaintiffs to the claim, and the further specification of the losses and damages suffered in the Fire, is necessary and desirable to ensure the effective enforcement of the claims originally asserted. As the parties who suffered the losses and damages, having the proposed Plaintiffs in the action will ensure effective enforcement.

[53] In Andritz, Macklin J held that the proposed plaintiff, Andritz Inc., was not a "true stranger" to the litigation, but rather a "sister company" to Andritz Ltd. Macklin J noted at para 81:

> ...The claim now being suggested as properly that of Andritz Inc. is fully set out in the Statement of Claim issued on behalf of Andritz Ltd. The allegations relating to the existence of a contract and a duty of care are precisely the same. The same breaches are alleged. The identical damages are claimed. The two Andritz companies are related. This is not a situation where a different claimant who has a claim against the same defendant wishes to be added as a claimant with consequent amendments alleging different causes of action and other heads of damages.

[54] The statement above applies equally to this situation. The Amended Statement of Claim and Proposed Amended Claim involve the same allegations of breaches, the same damages, and the Plaintiff companies are all related. Although the Defendants argue that the proposed amendments add new heads of damages – namely loss of rental payments and hotel management fees – it is more accurate to say these are further particulars of losses and damages already claimed by the Plaintiff. Given the Proposed Amended Claim does not increase the amount of damages claimed, it is hard to see how these are "new" heads of damages.

vi) Evidence

[55] I find the proposed amendments are ancillary amendments that do not seek to impose new liability on new defendants. Rather, the amendments seek to allocate losses among parties related to each other – "sister companies." No evidence is needed to support these proposed amendments.

B. Laches and Acquiescence

[56] Tyco, relying on s 10 of the Limitations Act, further asks this Court to deny the proposed amendments because they offend the equitable doctrines of laches and acquiescence.

2019 ABQB 434 (CanLII)

[57] Tyco alleges the Plaintiffs deliberately waited to sue and it would be inequitable to deprive the Defendants of their right to immunity. Tyco relies on Weatherford Canada Partnership v Kautschuk, 2017 ABCA 110 (Weatherford CA) which is an appeal of Weatherford Canada Partnership v Kautschuk, 2016 ABQB 188 (Weatherford QB), where the Court of Appeal held that the appellant's behaviour, in deliberately waiting to sue and sitting on its rights, created prejudice or potential injustice to the respondents.

[58] Acquiescence and laches are established when there is unreasonable delay in commencement of proceedings or prosecution, and, considering all of the circumstances, the consequences of delay render the grant of relief unreasonable or unjust: Urbas Estate, 2015 ONSC 6399, at para 79, cited by Veit J in Weatherford QB at para 143.

[59] This case is distinguishable from the situation in Weatherford. First, Weatherford involved an attempt to add new defendants to a claim, not plaintiffs. Further, in Weatherford, the plaintiff knowingly and strategically held off on suing the defendants in a timely manner, taking, what Weatherford referred to as, a "prudent risk": Weatherford QB at para 152. In Weatherford the plaintiff delayed suing the proposed defendants for business reasons. In this situation, there is no evidence of such knowledge and strategy on the part of the Plaintiff and proposed Plaintiffs.

[60] I do not find acquiescence and laches in the circumstances of this case.

VIII. Conclusion

[61] The Plaintiff's Application is allowed and the Plaintiff may file the Proposed Amended Claim.

IX. Costs

[62] The parties may speak to me within 60 days of these Reasons for Judgment if they are otherwise unable to agree on costs.

Heard on the 12th day of April, 2019.
Dated at the City of Edmonton, Alberta this 11th day of June, 2019.

K.G. Nielsen
A.J.C.Q.B.A.

Appearances:

Havelock Madill, QC and Eleni Loutas
Brownlee LLP
for the Plaintiff

2019 ABQB 434 (CanLII)

Andrew Stead and Gordana Ivanovic
McMillan LLP
for Tyco International of Canada Ltd carrying on business under the registered trade name of Simplex Grinnel

Greg Jaycock
Parlee McLaws LLP
for UTC Fire and Security Canada

Andrew Paterson
DDC Lawyers LLP
for Calm Shore Ventures (1992) Inc

2019 ABQB 434 (CanLII)

In the Court of Appeal of Alberta

Citation: Stankovic v 1536679 Alberta Ltd, 2019 ABCA 187

Date: 20190516
Docket: 1701-0329-AC
Registry: Calgary

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

Between:

William Stankovic

Respondent (Plaintiff/Defendant by Counterclaim)

- and -

1536679 Alberta Ltd

Appellant
(Defendant/Plaintiff
by Counterclaim)

The Court:

The Honourable Mr. Justice Brian O'Ferrall
The Honourable Madam Justice Frederica Schutz
The Honourable Madam Justice Jo'Anne Strekaf

Memorandum of Judgment

Appeal from the Decision by
The Honourable Mr. Justice J.T. Eamon
Dated the 18th day of October, 2017
(Docket: 1601 10040)

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

Memorandum of Judgment

I. Introduction

[1] This appeal questions whether the chambers judge on appeal should have used the summary procedure under Rule 7.3 to grant summary judgment in a foreclosure action. He made a finding that the mortgage was in default and directed that the plaintiff could proceed with enforcement proceedings before a master.

[2] This Court must consider "[i]f the record allowed the judge to make the necessary findings of fact and apply the law"; if so, "then the summary procedure should be used unless there is a substantive reason to conclude that summary disposition would not 'achieve a just result'": Weir-Jones Technical Services Incorporated v Purolator Courier Ltd, 2019 ABCA 49 at para 25 [Weir-Jones].

[3] Appellant 1536679 Alberta Ltd ("153") contends that the summary procedure should not have been used because there were unresolved material conflicts in the evidence that did not allow the chambers judge to make the necessary findings of fact and apply the law.

[4] We agree.

[5] For the reasons following, the order of the chambers judge is set aside. As this matter is remitted to the trial court, we say below only what is necessary to dispose of the appeal.

II. Previous Proceedings

A. Master in chambers

[6] Before the master in chambers, Stankovic sought both summary judgment in his foreclosure action and summary dismissal of 153's defence and counterclaim in the action.

[7] Stankovic swore an affidavit in which he annexed the parties' written agreements pre-dating the mortgage and the mortgage, deposed to 153's default thereunder and provided a calculation of the outstanding debt. The debt claimed far exceeds Stankovic's appraiser's opinion of value.

[8] The crux of 153's defence and counterclaim was that Stankovic:

> . . . was not a simple lender and mortgage holder in respect of the 77 Street Property, but an active Joint Venture party, and that the parties had collaterally agreed that there was no indebtedness owing under the James River or the 77 Street Property Mortgage to be paid independently of the 77 Street Property payment, and > the parties had agreed that the James River Mortgage was of no validity and enforceability.

153 tendered substantial affidavit evidence through its principal, Trnski, in this respect.

[9] In response to 153's evidence, Stankovic swore at para 22 of his Affidavit that:

> I have reviewed the Statement of Defence and the Counterclaim filed by the Defendant in this Action. I believe there is no defence to my claim and that the Statement of Defence is without merit. I believe that there is no merit to the whole or any part of the Counterclaim. I believe that there are no genuine issues to be tried.

He otherwise did not tender any countervailing evidence.

[10] The master dismissed Stankovic's application because 153 had put forth a substantial affidavit that recited facts which had not been challenged; Stankovic made nothing more than a very general statement in his affidavit with respect to the merits of the matter. The master found that:

> … I'm not able to grant summary judgment based upon these materials and these facts … Mr [Trnski] has put forth a substantial affidavit that recites specific facts which your client may not agree with, but your client hasn't challenged those facts. He's made nothing more than a very general statement in his affidavit with respect to the merit of the matter generally.
>
> There is at least some corroborative evidence with respect to the non-arm's-length dealing between these parties and the fact that certain aspects of them might have been interconnected. And the materials, at the very least, put forward a set of facts that at the very least and on a preliminary examination would arguably result in a defence to any claim for deficiency and perhaps even more in terms of what they reveal.

B. Court of Queen's Bench

[11] Stankovic appealed, but changed course in doing so, indicating that he was "only challenging that [any joint venture agreement] cannot challenge the mortgage"; and "[t]he only thing that matters . . . for the purposes of today's application, is whether or not the [joint venture agreement] altered the term of the mortgage".

[12] As for 153's defence and counterclaim, Stankovic now took the position that if 153 and Trnski "say there's some oral joint venture agreement and there's obligations between the parties, which, of course, we deny, but if they say that, then that could be pursued at some future date".

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

[13] On appeal, the evidentiary record was unchanged.

[14] The chambers judge stated that in his view, Stankovic's "denial of a collateral agreement that mortgage, principal and interest is not due is unassailable" because:

a) a self-serving statement in Trnski's affidavit alone was not sufficient to create a triable issue in the absence of detailed facts and supporting evidence. The statement in paragraph 22 of Trnski's affidavit was a bare assertion without any details of when the supposed express agreement was made or using what language, and without any explanation why the mortgage terms and the terms of the other agreements were drafted;

b) 153's evidence to the effect that there was an agreement that the mortgage would not be payable until subdivision and sale of the lots was clearly an agreement that modified the terms and conditions of the option agreement and the mortgage, and was excluded under the parol evidence rule;

c) while he "would not apply the parol evidence rule to permit the parties to facilitate a fraud", 153 didn't plead fraud and cannot "have it both ways" and "stop enforcement by raising hints of fraud, yet continue the fraudulent transaction and receive the financing and remain in possession of a multi-million dollar property at no cost";

d) there is no air of reality to the claim that Stankovic is estopped from insisting on its legal rights because "there is simply no evidence to suggest any representation on the part of the plaintiff that it would not enforce the mortgage";

e) if there was an obligation to fund the tax payments or other development expenses during the mortgage term, that could only be an obligation that is collateral to the vendor takeback mortgage; it cannot be one that is express or implied in the mortgage itself; and

f) no adverse inference would be drawn from Stankovic's failure to adduce evidence from the parties' joint lawyer.

[15] In the end however, the chambers judge also recognized that there were triable issues as to whether there was a joint venture agreement, a collateral agreement for Stankovic to provide funds to 153 and whether such arrangements had been breached, and made it clear that his decision was not to affect such claims. He stated:

> I want there to be a further direction in the formal order that this decision does not prejudice or affect the defendant's claim for damages under its counterclaim. If it turns out, at the end of day, that there was a joint venture agreement and there was a collateral agreement to provide funds, and, as I say, if the other legal requirements > are met, then it is not my intention to preclude the defendant from pursuing those claims. And certainly, at this point, based on the evidence I've seen, there is a triable issue because none of those allegations in this case have been rebutted by the plaintiff who also simply makes a bare assertion with respect to the existence of the joint venture agreement.

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

[16] The chambers judge granted a form of order that permitted Stankovic to proceed with the foreclosure action with the proviso that a master in chambers who had "expertise" would decide what to do in Stankovic's action; Stankovic's right to proceed was to be without prejudice to 153's right to pursue its counterclaim.

[17] 153 appealed.

III. Standards of Review

[18] As per Weir–Jones at para 10, the test for summary dismissal and the interpretation of the Alberta Rules of Court, Alta Reg 124/2010, are questions of law reviewed for correctness. Findings of fact underlying a summary dismissal are entitled to deference, as are the "chamber judge's assessment of the facts, the application of the law to those facts, and the ultimate determination on whether summary resolution is appropriate are all entitled to deference: Hryniak v Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7 at paras 81-4, [2014] 1 SCR 87; Amack v AW Holdings Corp, 2015 ABCA 147 at para. 27, 24 Alta LR (6th) 44, 602 AR 62." See also Housen v Nickolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 SCR 235; HL v Canada (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 25, [2005] 1 SCR 401; Attila Dogan Construction and Installation Co v AMEC Americas Ltd, 2015 ABCA 406 at para 9, 609 AR 313

[19] While neither the master nor the chambers judge had the benefit of this Court's recent decision in Weir-Jones, both parties made submissions at the oral hearing on how that decision impacts this appeal.

IV. Grounds of Appeal

[20] On appeal, 153 submits that the chambers judge erred in law by granting partial summary judgment and permitting enforcement on the mortgage despite his finding that triable issues existed with respect to whether there was a joint venture agreement and a collateral agreement to provide funds that was breached by Stankovic.

V. Analysis

[21] To succeed in obtaining summary disposition, Stankovic was required to demonstrate that under the mortgage, his in rem and in personam rights against 153 were unimpeded.

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

[22] Stankovic as plaintiff was required to establish "no defence". "The resisting party need not prove the opposite in order to send the matter to trial. The party resisting summary judgment need only demonstrate that the record, the facts, or the law preclude a fair disposition or, in other words, that the moving party has failed to establish there is no genuine issue requiring a trial"; there is no symmetry of burdens: Weir-Jones at para 32.

[23] We are satisfied that the chambers judge erred:

a) in finding Trnski's evidence, encapsulated in particular at paragraph 22 of his affidavit, amounted to no more than a self-serving bare assertion, and was not admissible under the parol evidence rule; and

b) in finding that the mortgage was in default, while acknowledging that there were triable issues as to whether there was an overarching joint venture and a collateral agreement to provide funds to 153 that were breached by Stankovic.

[24] The chambers judge decided Stankovic's "denial of a collateral agreement that mortgage, principal and interest is not due is unassailable" as follows:

> . . . [A] self-serving statement in an affidavit alone is not sufficient to create a triable issue in the absence of detailed facts and supporting evidence. The statement in paragraph 22 of Mr. Trnski's affidavit is a so-called bare assertion without any details of when the supposed express agreement was made or using what language, and without any explanation why the mortgage terms and the terms of the other agreements were drafted. . . . The bare assertion is not sufficient to overcome the structure of the written option agreement and the vendor takeback mortgage, both of which are signed were signed by [153].

The chambers judge also found that Trnski's "evidence about the agreement contrary to the terms of the written mortgage is not admissible" on the basis that the parol evidence rule precludes the use of evidence to add to, subtract or vary the terms of a contract.

[25] The chambers judge failed to recognize however, that the parol evidence rule is subject to a myriad of exceptions. Moreover, Sattva Capital Corp v Creston Moly Corp, 2014 SCC 53 at paras 60-61, [2014] 2 SCR 633 [Sattva] is clear:

> The parol evidence rule does not apply to preclude evidence of the surrounding circumstances. Such evidence is consistent with the objectives of finality and certainty because it is used as an interpretive aid for determining the meaning of the written words chosen by the parties, not to change or overrule the meaning of those words. The surrounding circumstances are facts known or facts that reasonably ought to have been known to both parties at or before the date of contracting; therefore, the concern of unreliability does not arise.

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

[26] Sattva was applied in IFP Technologies (Canada) Inc. v EnCana Midstream and Marketing, 2017 ABCA 157 at para 59, 53 Alta LR (6th) 96, in the context of an error of law:

> One error of law reviewed for correctness is where the trial judge fails to consider the "surrounding circumstances" or "factual matrix" of a contract. A trial judge must consider the factual matrix in interpreting a contract regardless of whether the contract is ambiguous. Therefore, it is an error for a trial judge to discount the factual matrix on the basis that the contract itself is not ambiguous. . . (citations omitted).

[27] Failing to consider the surrounding circumstances that were known or reasonably ought to have been known by the parties at the time of creation of the 2013 option agreement and mortgage, is an error of law reviewed for correctness.

[28] In our view, the chambers judge was wrong to disregard the content of Trnski's evidence that fell outside the four corners of the written documents. Trnski did not dispute that 153 signed the 2013 option agreement and the mortgage. In other words, there is no issue of authentication. 153 urged the chambers judge to consider, however, that there was a triable issue about whether the mortgage was presently enforceable by Stankovic's foreclosure action.

[29] We agree with 153's contention that the chambers judge rejected 153's evidence out of hand, in the absence of essential fact findings in the face of material, conflicting evidence. While he accepted that there were triable issues which should proceed to trial on the counterclaim with respect to the existence of an overarching joint venture agreement and a collateral agreement to provide funds to 153 and a breach by Stankovic of same, he wrongly decided that there was no triable issue as to whether the mortgage was in default and enforceable without determining those issues. 153 needed only to demonstrate that the record, the facts, or the law preclude a fair summary disposition or, in other words, that Stankovic failed to establish there is no genuine issue requiring a trial.

[30] A brief summary of the record is sufficient to underline our concerns, bearing in mind Trnski's evidence is uncontroverted but for Stankovic's bare denial.

a. The parties' relationship

[31] Trnski swore that he and Stankovic were longstanding friends and business partners who had come to various "handshake" agreements relating to the development of the 77 Street lands, a 4-acre parcel where Stankovic's principal residence was situated. Trnski stated that the deal was he and Stankovic together, would subdivide the lands into multiple executive lots that would be sold at a significant profit.

b. The components of the parties' "Joint Venture Agreement"

[32] The so-called "Joint Venture Agreement" had two parts, said Trnski. The first part included the parties' agreement that when subdivided into lots, the total value of the lands would be $5.5 million. This compared to a present value of $2.5 million for the undeveloped land, as is. Under their deal, Stankovic would receive the first $5 million from the sale of lots (being a $2.5 million income gain to Stankovic), with some adjustments; Stankovic and 153 would then share the profit above the first $5 million equally. The second part of the parties' agreement was to create a scenario whereby Stankovic could shield himself from paying taxes on the anticipated income gain; namely, he would claim as a sale of his principal residence the increased value of the land after subdivision.

[33] Trnski deposed that to achieve this desired outcome, he and Stankovic agreed that the 77 Street property would be transferred to Trsnki's company 153 at a price that would reflect the first $5 million to Stankovic, plus 50% of the increased value above that amount. Trnski produced an opinion letter dated May 13, 2010, from a law firm that explained such an arrangement, whereby "NewCo" would be specifically created for the project and would purchase the house and surplus land from Stankovic who would take back a first mortgage "due on sale of the property".

[34] Trnski deposed that the transaction was to be completed by a transfer of Stankovic's property to 153 only after the parties received a firm offer on the subdivided land. The transaction was characterized as an agreement for sale with a term of three years, being the expected subdivision and sale timeline. In an attempt to document the 77 Street transaction as being a bona fide sale by Stankovic at (the inflated) fair market value, Trnski said that Stankovic proposed registering a mortgage on the James River property (now involved in proceedings in another action, number 1501-04858). This would create the appearance that Stankovic was advancing funds to 153 to enable 153 to "pay" the $500,000 deposit on the 77 Street transaction, all in aid of lending an air of reality to Stankovic's representation that he sold his principal residence at the increased value.

[35] The parties first written document dated May 31, 2010, states a purchase price is $5.5 million, and Schedule "A" provides that 153 "shall have permission to apply to subdivide the lands at its costs"; monies purportedly due under this agreement were to be paid by June 15, 2013.

[36] In 2010, at about the same time, a $550,000 mortgage in Stankovic's favour was registered against 849450 Alberta Ltd's (Trnski's company) James River property. Trnski deposed this face amount represented the amount of the 77 Street Property deposit of $500,000, plus $50,000 that Stankovic paid for common joint venture expenses pursuant to their Joint Venture Agreement. Trnski deposed that the James River mortgage was interrelated to the parties' 77 Street Property development project, as he extensively explained in paragraphs 17-19 of his affidavit.

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

c. The expiration of the anticipated timeframe for subdivision of the lands

[37] Trnski deposed that while he and Stankovic thought that the 3 year time period from 2010 to 2013 would be sufficient to complete the 77 Street land subdivision and the sales of subdivided lots, this timeline was not realized due to problems obtaining municipal approval for the proposed subdivision. Under the May 31, 2010 written agreement, the June 15, 2013 deadline for payment came and went; no monies were paid to Stankovic.

[38] Stankovic admitted that he "did not immediately commence legal proceedings, but allowed Trnski to continue to develop the 77 Street Property even though the 2010 Agreement had expired."

d. The 2013 replacement option agreement and mortgage

[39] Stankovic deposed that he and 153 entered into a new agreement, intended to replace and be substituted for the 2010 agreement. The replacement agreement dated May 31, 2013 is entitled "This Agreement for Sale (Option Agreement)", and indicates that 153 had paid Stankovic $500,000 "the receipt and sufficiency of which is hereby acknowledged". However, it is our understanding that no such payment was made by 153 to Stankovic.

[40] In the replacement agreement, Stankovic gives 153 an option to purchase the 77 Street land, but now at the increased price of $7.5 million; the option to be exercised at any time "up to June 15, 2015, but not after such date". By letter dated October 26, 2014, 153 advised of its intention to exercise this option.

[41] $7.5 million was to be paid to Stankovic by a $500,000 non-refundable deposit, and "$7,000,000 by way of Vendor Take Back financing Interest rate: 4% annually, compounding

> Term: 2 years
>
> Type of security: first mortgage
>
> Prepayment provision: open
>
> Partial discharge on each sale of lot." [Emphasis added]

[42] Clause 3(b)(i) and (ii) provided that "[a]ll expenses and adjustable items with respect to the Property including without limitation all taxes, local improvement charges and assessments, rents, utilities and any recoveries . . . shall be adjusted and paid between the parties as of the Closing Date", defined as "on or before June 15, 2015". However, clause 23 supersedes clause 3(b)(ii), and provided:

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

> Notwithstanding anything else herein contained, even if inconsistent herewith, the closing date shall be 20 days after [153] has received the final subdivision approval for the within lands, which [153] warrants it shall apply for forthwith. [153] upon such approval shall immediately exercise the within option. (Emphasis added).

It is also clear on the record that 153 had not obtained "final subdivision approval".

[43] Additionally, the parties acknowledged in writing that Stankovic's mortgage would be paid by "[p]artial discharge on each sale of lot", as per Clause 3(a)(ii). Arguably the parties had in contemplation the anticipated subdivision and sale of individual lots. Clause 36 of the Mortgage also provided for this option as follows: "Unless the Lender has otherwise agreed to the repayment of the loan from the closing of sales of individual units or lots comprising the Lands. . .". Further, the uncontroverted evidence is that Stankovic did not accelerate payment of the full balance due under the mortgage when a "lot" was sold to his son-in-law.

[44] While the chambers judge relies heavily on the "entire agreement" Clause 17 of the May 31, 2013 option agreement, that clause is superseded by Clause 23 set out above. Moreover, entire agreement clauses are not an impediment to the duty of honesty in contractual performance. As per Bhasin v Hrynew, 2014 SCC 71 at paras 72 and 75, [2014] 3 SCR 494, the Supreme Court of Canada discussed "entire agreement" clauses and the duty of good faith as follows:

> . . . [A] party almost always has some amount of discretion in how to perform a contract. It would [be] difficult to say that a duty of good faith should be implied in this case on the basis of the intentions of the parties given the clear terms of an entire agreement clause in the Agreement. The key question before the Court, therefore, is whether we ought to create a new common law duty under the broad umbrella of the organizing principle of good faith performance of contracts.
>
> . . .
>
> [T]he entire agreement clause in [the Agreement] is not an impediment to the duty arising in this case. Because the duty of honesty in contractual performance is a general doctrine of contract law that applies to all contracts, like unconscionability, the parties are not free to exclude it.

See also Hole v Hole, 2016 ABCA 34, 612 AR 164.

[45] Trnski's evidence was that this was not a straightforward, arm's length, creditor-debtor relationship but rather a good faith understanding between friends, and if disbelieved, compelled a credibility assessment. A dispute "depending on issues of credibility, can leave genuine issues requiring a trial": Weir-Jones at para 35.

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

[46] A fair reading of Guarantee Co of North America v Gordon Capital, [1999] 3 SCR 423 at para 31, 178 DLR (4th) 1, mandates that merely conclusory or argumentative statements that have no supporting evidence besides the claims themselves, ought to be given no weight. On this authority therefore, Stankovic's conclusory statement that the appellant had "no defence" ought to be accorded little weight. On the other hand, Trnski's evidence far exceeds the threshold of "detailed facts and supporting evidence".

[47] As noted in Axxess Mortgage Fund v 117620 Alberta Ltd, 2018 ABQB 626 at paras 183-189, the legal viability of a prior oral agreement that shapes the apparently contrary features of a written instrument, has been recognized by this Court in Palachek v Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, 1991 ABCA 8 at paras 8-10, 79 Alta LR (2d) 159; see also Strother v Darc, 2016 BCCA 297 at paras 24-26, wherein the court discussed the concept of "umbrella" agreements.

[48] In Bank of Montreal v Wilder (1983), 149 DLR (3rd) 193 at para 146 (BCCA), aff'd [1986] 2 SCR 551, the British Columbia Court of Appeal found that "[u]nder the shade of the umbrella" agreement, documents were to be read and interpreted and applied as a unified whole. And further, "the umbrella agreement, as a collateral agreement, comes within the collateral agreement exception to the parol evidence rule, so long as it is a true collateral agreement, established by the evidence and not merely a unilateral oral representation in derogation from the express terms of the document . . .".

[49] Whether there was a true collateral umbrella agreement between Stankovic and 153 under which the written documents were to be read and interpreted as a unified whole, is a triable issue; indeed, the chambers judge acknowledged as much.

[50] Furthermore, 153 raised a defence in the nature of estoppel, which the chambers judge acknowledged but rejected as follows:

> There is no air of reality to the submissions that the plaintiff was estopped from enforcing the mortgage because there is simply no evidence to suggest any representation on the part of the plaintiff that it would not enforce the mortgage. Also, the defendant does not plead or provide evidence of reliance. It does not say it was induced to agree or make or exercise the option agreement by any particular commitment or representation or that it relied on any specific representation in signing an agreement containing terms contrary to what Mr Trnski now says the facts are. . . .

[51] In Ryan v Moore, 2005 SCC 38 at para 51, [2005] 2 SCR 53, the Supreme Court commented that "the doctrine of estoppel is one of the most flexible and useful in the armoury of law", and cited with approval the following passage from Amalgamated Investment & Property Co v Texas Consumer International Bank Ltd, [1981] 3 All ER 577 (Eng CA) at 584:

> . . . When the parties to a transaction proceed on the basis of an underlying assumption - either of fact or law, and whether due to misrepresentation or mistake makes no difference - on which they have conducted the dealings between them - neither of them will be allowed to go back on that assumption when it would be unfair or unjust to do so. If one of them does seek to go back on it, the courts will give the other such remedy as the equity of the case demands.

[52] The effect or outcome of promissory estoppel, if found, is that a party seeking to enforce its rights is prevented from enjoying the full benefit of a particular right.

[53] The facts underpinning an estoppel defence are crucial: what were the actions or words of the parties? Here, despite the volume of evidence relating to the assumptions underlying the parties' overall agreement, the chambers judge did not consider that 153 did not need to prove estoppel, rather it needed only to persuade the court that Stankovic could not meet his burden of proving no triable issue: Weir-Jones at para 35.

[54] We are persuaded that 153's defence and counterclaim and Trnski's evidence are factually and legally linked, and bear directly on the essential enforceability of the 77 Street Property mortgage. The chambers judge erred by granting partial summary judgment that the mortgage was in default, while at the same time finding that there were triable issues as to whether there was an overarching joint venture, a collateral agreement for Stankovic to provide funds to 153 and a breach of those arrangements. The defences advanced by 153 on the mortgage action and its claims in the counterclaim are sufficiently interconnected that it would be unjust to permit Stankovic to realize on the mortgage immediately, recover back the land and obtain a deficiency judgment against 153 while 153 would be limited to a damages claim against Stankovic to be determined at a future date. Moreover, the chambers judge's finding that there was a "default" on the mortgage involves inherent factual findings that could have res judicata implications on the issues to be determined on the counterclaim notwithstanding the chambers judge's direction to the contrary. In our view, Stankovic has not demonstrated that partial summary judgment would achieve a just result.

[55] In sum, we are satisfied there are triable issues as to the enforceability of the Stankovic mortgage, and the order under appeal does not comport with "overall considerations of fairness and the ability 'to achieve a just result'": Weir-Jones at para 40.

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

VI. Conclusion

[56] Accordingly, the appeal is allowed and the chambers judge's order is set side.

Appeal heard on February 14, 2019

Memorandum filed at Calgary, Alberta
this 16th day of May, 2019

O'Ferrall J.A.

Authorized to sign for: Schutz J.A.

Strekaf J.A.

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

Appearances:

S.C. Chimuk
J. Dhaliwal for the Respondent

J.J. Irwin
for the Appellant

2019 ABCA 187 (CanLII)

Cabot Insurance Company Limited and Rex Gilbert Moore, deceased, by his Administratrix, Muriel Smith Appellants

v.

Peter Ryan Respondent

Indexed as: Ryan v. Moore

Neutral citation: 2005 SCC 38.

File No.: 29849.

2004: December 7; 2005: June 16.

Present: McLachlin C.J. and Major, Bastarache, LeBel, Deschamps, Abella and Charron JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL OF NEWFOUNDLAND AND LABRADOR

Limitation of actions — Survival of action against deceased — Limitation periods — Estoppel by convention — Estoppel by representation — Discoverability rule — Confirmation of cause of action — Limitation period under Survival of Actions Act expiring one year after death of party to action or six months after date when letters of administration granted — Statement of claim for damages in relation to motor vehicle accident issued against defendant within two-year limitation period prescribed by Limitations Act — Defendant's death unknown to plaintiff until after shorter limitation period in Survival of Actions Act had expired — Whether doctrine of estoppel by convention or by representation applicable to prevent defendant from raising limitation defence — Whether confirmation of cause of action or discoverability rule applicable to extend limitation period of Survival of Actions Act — Survival of Actions Act, R.S.N.L. 1990, c. S-32, s. 5 — Limitations Act, S.N.L. 1995, c. L-16.1, ss. 5, 16.

Estoppel — Estoppel by convention — Requirements — Whether requirements of doctrine of estoppel by convention met.

Estoppel — Estoppel by representation — Limitation of actions — Whether defendant's silence regard-

Cabot Insurance Company Limited et feu Rex Gilbert Moore, représenté par son administratrice Muriel Smith Appelants

c.

Peter Ryan Intimé

Répertorié : Ryan c. Moore

Référence neutre : 2005 CSC 38.

Nº du greffe : 29849.

2004 : 7 décembre; 2005 : 16 juin.

Présents : La juge en chef McLachlin et les juges Major, Bastarache, LeBel, Deschamps, Abella et Charron.

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DE TERRE-NEUVE-ET-LABRADOR

Prescription — Survie d'une action intentée contre une personne décédée — Délais de prescription — Préclusion par convention — Préclusion par assertion de fait — Règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage — Confirmation de la cause d'action — Délai de prescription prévu par la Survival of Actions Act expirant un an après le décès d'une partie à une action ou six mois après la date de délivrance de lettres d'administration — Déclaration relative à un préjudice résultant d'un accident d'automobile déposée contre le défendeur avant l'expiration du délai de prescription de deux ans fixé par la Limitations Act — Demandeur apprenant le décès du défendeur seulement après l'expiration du délai de prescription plus court établi par la Survival of Actions Act — La règle de la préclusion par convention ou par assertion de fait empêche-t-elle le défendeur d'invoquer la prescription comme moyen de défense? — La confirmation de la cause d'action ou la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage a-t-elle pour effet de prolonger le délai de prescription prévu par la Survival of Actions Act? — Survival of Actions Act, R.S.N.L. 1990, ch. S-32, art. 5 — Limitations Act, S.N.L. 1995, ch. L-16.1, art. 5, 16.

Préclusion — Préclusion par convention — Conditions — Les conditions de la règle de la préclusion sont-elles remplies?

Préclusion — Préclusion par assertion de fait — Prescription — Le silence du défendeur concernant le ing shorter limitation period constitutes representation grounding estoppel.

BOA COMPEER001546

On November 27, 1997, three vehicles operated by the respondent R, the appellant M, and a third party were involved in an accident. R decided to pursue a personal injury claim against M. He was unaware that, on December 26, 1998, M had died of causes unrelated to the accident. On February 16, 1999, Letters of Administration were granted to M's administratrix. On October 28, 1999, R issued his statement of claim naming M as the defendant; it was within the two-year limitation period prescribed by the Limitations Act, but outside the limitation period under the Survival of Actions Act, namely one year after the death of a party to an action or six months after letters of administration are granted. The appellant insurer sought an order striking out the statement of claim for being out of time. R also filed an application to amend the name of the defendant in the statement of claim. The Supreme Court of Newfoundland and Labrador denied the insurer's application to have the action dismissed and granted R's application. The Court of Appeal allowed, in part, both the appeal and cross-appeal, concluding that the Survival of Actions Act applied to the action, but that the appellants were nevertheless estopped from relying upon the shorter limitation period.

Held: The appeal should be allowed on the issue of estoppel and the statement of claim struck out. The decision of the Court of Appeal should otherwise be affirmed. There are no reasons based on any legal doctrine to preclude M's estate or the insurer from relying on the Survival of Actions Act limitation period.

The discoverability rule does not apply to the Survival of Actions Act. This rule cannot be relied on where, as here, the limitation period is explicitly linked by the governing legislation to a fixed event unrelated to the injured party's knowledge or the basis of the cause of action. By using a specific event as the starting point of the "limitation clock" under the Survival of Actions Act, the legislature displaced the discoverability rule in all situations to which the Survival of Actions Act applies. [24-25] [27]

Section 16 of the Limitations Act does not apply to the Survival of Actions Act either. Any confirmation of the cause of action would have no effect on the Survival of Actions Act limitation period because the Survival of Actions Act does not create a cause of action but simply confers a right to pursue a claim notwithstanding the fact délai de prescription plus court constitue-t-il une assertion justifiant la préclusion?

Un accident impliquant trois véhicules conduits par l'intimé R, l'appelant M et une tierce personne est survenu le 27 novembre 1997. R a décidé d'intenter une action pour préjudice corporel contre M. Il ignorait que, le 26 décembre 1998, M était décédé de causes non liées à l'accident. Le 16 février 1999, des lettres d'administration ont été délivrées à l'administratrice de M. Le 28 octobre 1999, R a déposé sa déclaration désignant M comme défendeur; ce dépôt a été fait avant l'expiration du délai de prescription de deux ans fixé par la Limitations Act, mais après celle du délai de prescription prévu par la Survival of Actions Act, qui est d'un an suivant la date du décès d'une partie à une action ou de six mois suivant la délivrance de lettres d'administration. L'assureur appelant a sollicité une ordonnance de radiation de la déclaration pour cause de tardiveté. R a également présenté une demande de modification du nom de la partie défenderesse inscrit dans la déclaration. La Cour suprême de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador a rejeté la demande de l'assureur visant à obtenir le rejet de l'action et a accueilli la demande de R. La Cour d'appel a accueilli en partie l'appel principal et l'appel incident, concluant que la Survival of Actions Act s'appliquait à l'action, mais que les appelants étaient néanmoins préclus d'invoquer le délai de prescription plus court.

Arrêt : Le pourvoi est accueilli en ce qui concerne la question de la préclusion et la déclaration est radiée. La décision de la Cour d'appel est par ailleurs confirmée. Il n'y avait aucune raison fondée sur quelque règle juridique d'empêcher la succession de M ou l'assureur d'invoquer le délai de prescription fixé par la Survival of Actions Act.

La règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage ne s'applique pas à la Survival of Actions Act. Cette règle ne peut pas être invoquée dans les cas où, comme en l'espèce, la loi applicable lie expressément le délai de prescription à un événement déterminé qui n'a rien à voir avec le moment où la partie lésée en prend connaissance ou avec le fondement de la cause d'action. En désignant un fait particulier comme élément déclencheur du « compte à rebours de la prescription », le législateur a écarté la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage dans tous les cas où la Survival of Actions Act s'applique. [24-25] [27]

L'article 16 de la Limitations Act ne s'applique pas non plus à la Survival of Actions Act. Une confirmation de la cause d'action n'aurait aucun effet sur le délai de prescription fixé par la Survival of Actions Act parce que cette loi ne crée pas une cause d'action, mais ne fait que conférer un droit d'intenter une action malgré le décès that one of the parties has died. In any event, there was no confirmation of the cause of action in this case, as there was no admission of liability through the letters sent between the parties' representatives or through the payments made by the insurer to R's counsel for property damage or for medical reports. The letters and payments were intended only to promote the investigation and early resolution of certain aspects of the claim. [37] [42] [45-48]

BOA COMPEER001547

The requirements to establish estoppel by convention — a communicated shared assumption between the parties, reliance on the shared assumption and detriment — are not met. None of the letters exchanged by R's counsel and the adjuster with respect to R's personal injury claim prove the existence of a common assumption that M was alive or that the limitation defence would not be relied on. The letters lack clarity and certainty. Even if one could conclude that there was a mutual assumption between the parties, it cannot realistically be asserted that R communicated to the appellants that he shared the mistaken assumption. Moreover, R not only did not rely on the alleged assumption, but his conduct does not show an intention to affect the legal relations between the parties. The record does not disclose that R changed his position in any way on the basis of this alleged mutual assumption. Rather, the evidence suggests that he never put his mind to the shorter Survival of Actions Act limitation period. Given that there was no shared assumption or reliance, the detriment requirement does not need to be addressed. It should be noted, however, that a detriment is not established by a reduced limitation period. [63-66] [70-72] [75]

Finally, R cannot rely on estoppel by representation. Estoppel by representation cannot arise from silence unless a party is under a duty to speak. In the present case, there was no duty on the appellants to advise R of a limitation period, to assist him in the prosecution of the claim, or to advise him of the consequences of the death of one of the parties. [76-77]

Cases Cited

Referred to: Central Trust Co. v. Rafuse, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 147; Page v. Austin (1884), 10 S.C.R. 132; Kamloops (City of) v. Nielsen, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 2; M. (K.) v. M. (H.), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 6; Peixeiro v. Haberman, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 549; Fehr v. Jacob (1993), 14 C.C.L.T. (2d) 200; Snow v. Kashyap (1995), 125 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 182; Payne v. Brady (1996), 140 D.L.R. (4th) 88,

de l'une des parties. De toute façon, la cause d'action n'a pas été confirmée en l'espèce étant donné que ni les lettres (échangées entre les représentants des parties) ni les paiements effectués (par l'assureur à l'avocat de R pour le préjudice matériel ou des rapports médicaux) ne traduisent une reconnaissance de responsabilité. Les lettres et les paiements étaient seulement destinés à faire avancer l'enquête et à favoriser le règlement rapide de certains aspects de la demande d'indemnité. [37] [42] [45-48]

Les conditions pour qu'il y ait préclusion par convention — présupposition commune communiquée entre les parties, avoir agi sur la foi de cette présupposition commune (acte de confiance) et préjudice — ne sont pas remplies. Aucune des lettres que l'avocat de R et l'expert en sinistres ont échangées relativement à l'action pour préjudice corporel de R n'établit l'existence d'une présupposition commune que M était vivant ou que la prescription ne serait pas invoquée comme moyen de défense. Ces lettres manquent de clarté et de certitude. Même si on pouvait conclure à l'existence d'une présupposition commune des parties, on ne saurait réalistement affirmer que R a informé les appelants qu'il partageait leur présupposition erronée. De plus, non seulement R ne s'est-il pas fié à la présupposition dont on allègue l'existence, mais encore sa conduite ne démontre aucune intention de modifier les rapports juridiques entre les parties. Le dossier ne montre pas que R a modifié de quelque façon que ce soit sa situation en raison de la présupposition commune dont on allègue l'existence. La preuve indique plutôt qu'il n'a jamais songé au délai de prescription plus court prévu par la Survival of Actions Act. Étant donné l'absence de présupposition commune ou d'acte de confiance, il n'est pas nécessaire d'examiner le critère du préjudice. Toutefois, il y a lieu de souligner qu'un délai de prescription plus court n'est pas une preuve de préjudice. [63-66] [70-72] [75]

Enfin, R ne peut pas invoquer la préclusion par assertion de fait. La préclusion par assertion de fait ne peut pas découler d'un silence, à moins qu'une partie ne soit tenue de parler. En l'espèce, les appelants n'étaient pas tenus d'informer R de l'existence d'un délai de prescription, de l'aider à intenter son action ou de l'aviser des conséquences du décès de l'une des parties. [76-77]

Jurisprudence

Arrêts mentionnés : Central Trust Co. c. Rafuse, [1986] 2 R.C.S. 147; Page c. Austin (1884), 10 R.C.S. 132; Kamloops (Ville de) c. Nielsen, [1984] 2 R.C.S. 2; M. (K.) c. M. (H.), [1992] 3 R.C.S. 6; Peixeiro c. Haberman, [1997] 3 R.C.S. 549; Fehr c. Jacob (1993), 14 C.C.L.T. (2d) 200; Snow c. Kashyap (1995), 125 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 182; Payne c. Brady (1996), 140 D.L.R. (4th) 88, leave to appeal refused, [1997] 2 S.C.R. xiii; Burt v. LeLacheur (2000), 189 D.L.R. (4th) 193; Waschkowski v. Hopkinson Estate (2000), 47 O.R. (3d) 370; Canadian Red Cross Society (Re), [2003] O.J. No. 5669 (QL); Edwards v. Law Society of Upper Canada (No. 1) (2000), 48 O.R. (3d) 321; MacKenzie Estate v. MacKenzie (1992), 84 Man. R. (2d) 149; Justice v. Cairnie Estate (1993), 105 D.L.R. (4th) 501; Good v. Parry, [1963] 2 All E.R. 59; Surrendra Overseas Ltd. v. Government of Sri Lanka, [1977] 2 All E.R. 481; Podovinikoff v. Montgomery (1984), 14 D.L.R. (4th) 716; Wheaton v. Palmer (2001), 205 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 304; MacKay v. Lemley (1997), 44 B.C.L.R. (3d) 382; Harper v. Cameron (1892), 2 B.C.R. 365; Amalgamated Investment & Property Co. (In Liquidation) v. Texas Commerce Intenational Bank Ltd., [1982] 1 Q.B. 84; National Westminster Finance NZ Ltd. v. National Bank of NZ Ltd., [1996] 1 N.Z.L.R. 548; The "Indian Grace", [1998] 1 Lloyd's L.R. 1; The "August Leonhardt", [1985] 2 Lloyd's L.R. 28; The "Vistafjord", [1988] 2 Lloyd's L.R. 343; Canacemal Investment Inc. v. PCI Realty Corp., [1999] B.C.J. No. 2029 (QL); Capro Investments Ltd. v. Tartan Development Corp., [1998] O.J. No. 1763 (QL); Troop v. Gibson, [1986] 1 E.G.L.R. 1; Hillingdon London Borough v. ARC Ltd., [2000] E.W.J. No. 3278 (QL); Baird Textile Holdings Ltd. v. Marks & Spencer plc, [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 737, [2001] EWCA Civ 274; John v. George, [1995] E.W.J. No. 4375 (QL); Seechurn v. ACE Insurance S.A.-N.V., [2002] 2 Lloyd's L.R. 390, [2002] EWCA Civ 67; Litwin Construction (1973) Ltd. v. Pan (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 459; Vancouver City Savings Credit Union v. Norenger Development (Canada) Inc., [2002] B.C.J. No. 1417 (QL), 2002 BCSC 934; 32262 B.C. Ltd. v. Companions Restaurant Inc. (1995), 17 B.L.R. (2d) 227; Grundt v. Great Boulder Proprietary Gold Mines Ltd. (1937), 59 C.L.R. 641; Queen v. Cognos Inc., [1993] 1 S.C.R. 87.

BOA COMPEER001548

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Fatal Accidents Act, R.S.N.L. 1990, c. F-6.
Limitations Act, S.N.L. 1995, c. L-16.1, ss. 5, 16.
Survival of Actions Act, R.S.N.L. 1990, c. S-32, ss. 2, 5, 8(1).

Authors Cited

Bower, George Spencer. The Law Relating to Estoppel by Representation, 4th ed. by P. Feltham, D. Hochberg and T. Leech. London: LexisNexis UK, 2004.
Chitty on Contracts, vol. 1, 29th ed. London: Sweet & Maxwell, 2004.
Dawson, T. Brettel. "Estoppel and obligation: the modern role of estoppel by convention" (1989), 9 L.S. 16.

autorisation de pourvoi refusée, [1997] 2 R.C.S. xiii; Burt c. LeLacheur (2000), 189 D.L.R. (4th) 193; Waschkowski c. Hopkinson Estate (2000), 47 O.R. (3d) 370; Canadian Red Cross Society (Re), [2003] O.J. No. 5669 (QL); Edwards c. Law Society of Upper Canada (No. 1) (2000), 48 O.R. (3d) 321; MacKenzie Estate c. MacKenzie (1992), 84 Man. R. (2d) 149; Justice c. Cairnie Estate (1993), 105 D.L.R. (4th) 501; Good c. Parry, [1963] 2 All E.R. 59; Surrendra Overseas Ltd. c. Government of Sri Lanka, [1977] 2 All E.R. 481; Podovinikoff c. Montgomery (1984), 14 D.L.R. (4th) 716; Wheaton c. Palmer (2001), 205 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 304; MacKay c. Lemley (1997), 44 B.C.L.R. (3d) 382; Harper c. Cameron (1892), 2 B.C.R. 365; Amalgamated Investment & Property Co. (In Liquidation) c. Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd., [1982] 1 Q.B. 84; National Westminster Finance NZ Ltd. c. National Bank of NZ Ltd., [1996] 1 N.Z.L.R. 548; The « Indian Grace », [1998] 1 Lloyd's L.R. 1; The « August Leonhardt », [1985] 2 Lloyd's L.R. 28; The « Vistafjord », [1988] 2 Lloyd's L.R. 343; Canacemal Investment Inc. c. PCI Realty Corp., [1999] B.C.J. No. 2029 (QL); Capro Investments Ltd. c. Tartan Development Corp., [1998] O.J. No. 1763 (QL); Troop c. Gibson, [1986] 1 E.G.L.R. 1; Hillingdon London Borough c. ARC Ltd., [2000] E.W.J. No. 3278 (QL); Baird Textile Holdings Ltd. c. Marks & Spencer plc, [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 737, [2001] EWCA Civ 274; John c. George, [1995] E.W.J. No. 4375 (QL); Seechurn c. ACE Insurance S.A.-N.V., [2002] 2 Lloyd's L.R. 390, [2002] EWCA Civ 67; Litwin Construction (1973) Ltd. c. Pan (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 459; Vancouver City Savings Credit Union c. Norenger Development (Canada) Inc., [2002] B.C.J. No. 1417 (QL), 2002 BCSC 934; 32262 B.C. Ltd. c. Companions Restaurant Inc. (1995), 17 B.L.R. (2d) 227; Grundt c. Great Boulder Proprietary Gold Mines Ltd. (1937), 59 C.L.R. 641; Queen c. Cognos Inc., [1993] 1 R.C.S. 87.

Lois et règlements cités

Fatal Accidents Act, R.S.N.L. 1990, ch. F-6.
Limitations Act, S.N.L. 1995, ch. L-16.1, art. 5, 16.
Survival of Actions Act, R.S.N.L. 1990, ch. S-32, art. 2, 5, 8(1).

Doctrine citée

Bower, George Spencer. The Law Relating to Estoppel by Representation, 4th ed. by P. Feltham, D. Hochberg and T. Leech. London : LexisNexis UK, 2004.
Chitty on Contracts, vol. 1, 29th ed. London : Sweet & Maxwell, 2004.
Dawson, T. Brettel. « Estoppel and obligation : the modern role of estoppel by convention » (1989), 9 L.S. 16.

BOA COMPEER001549

Fridman, G. H. L. The Law of Contract in Canada, 4th ed. Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell, 1999.
Mew, Graeme. The Law of Limitations, 2nd ed. Markham, Ont.: LexisNexis Butterworths, 2004.
Wilken, Sean. Wilken and Villiers: The Law of Waiver, Variation and Estoppel, 2nd ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Newfoundland and Labrador Court of Appeal (Wells C.J.N. and Cameron, Roberts and Welsh JJ.A., and Russell J. (ex officio)) (2003), 224 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 181, 669 A.P.R. 181, 50 E.T.R. (2d) 8, [2003] N.J. No. 113 (QL), 2003 NLCA 19, reversing, in part, a decision of Orsborn J. (2001), 205 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 211, 615 A.P.R. 211, 18 C.P.C. (5th) 95, 41 E.T.R. (2d) 287, 19 M.V.R. (4th) 120, [2001] N.J. No. 284 (QL). Appeal allowed.

Sandra R. Chaytor and Jorge P. Segovia, for the appellants.

Ian F. Kelly, Q.C., and Gregory A. French, for the respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by BASTARACHE J. — We are asked to decide whether or not a shortened limitation period under s. 5 of the Survival of Actions Act, R.S.N.L. 1990, c. S-32 (see Appendix), applicable upon the death of one of the parties to an action, can be enforced against a party who had no knowledge of the death until after the limitation period had expired. The respondent, Peter Ryan ("Ryan"), argues that the answer should be no; he invoked in front of our Court and in the courts below a number of legal principles which I shall address: discoverability, confirmation, estoppel by convention and estoppel by representation. The issue of estoppel was raised for the first time by the Court of Appeal itself.

The discoverability rule dictates that a cause of action arises for purposes of a limitation period when the material facts on which it is based have been discovered or ought to have been discovered by

Fridman, G. H. L. The Law of Contract in Canada, 4th ed. Scarborough, Ont. : Carswell, 1999.
Mew, Graeme. The Law of Limitations, 2nd ed. Markham, Ont. : LexisNexis Butterworths, 2004.
Wilken, Sean. Wilken and Villiers : The Law of Waiver, Variation and Estoppel, 2nd ed. Oxford : Oxford University Press, 2002.

POURVOI contre un arrêt de la Cour d'appel de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador (le juge en chef Wells et les juges Cameron, Roberts et Welsh et le juge Russell (ex officio)) (2003), 224 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 181, 669 A.P.R. 181, 50 E.T.R. (2d) 8, [2003] N.J. No. 113 (QL), 2003 NLCA 19, qui a infirmé, en partie, une décision du juge Orsborn (2001), 205 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 211, 615 A.P.R. 211, 18 C.P.C. (5th) 95, 41 E.T.R. (2d) 287, 19 M.V.R. (4th) 120, [2001] N.J. No. 284 (QL). Pourvoi accueilli.

Sandra R. Chaytor et Jorge P. Segovia, pour les appelants.

Ian F. Kelly, c.r., et Gregory A. French, pour l'intimé.

Version française du jugement de la Cour rendu par

1 LE JUGE BASTARACHE — La Cour est appelée à décider si le délai de prescription plus court que l'art. 5 de la Survival of Actions Act, R.S.N.L. 1990, ch. S-32 (voir l'annexe), prévoit en cas de décès de l'une des parties à une action peut s'appliquer à une partie qui n'a pris connaissance du décès qu'après l'expiration du délai de prescription. L'intimé Peter Ryan prétend qu'il faut répondre par la négative; il a invoqué, devant notre Cour et devant les tribunaux d'instance inférieure, un certain nombre de règles juridiques que je vais examiner : la possibilité de découvrir le dommage, la confirmation, la préclusion par convention et la préclusion par assertion de fait. C'est la Cour d'appel elle-même qui a soulevé pour la première fois la question de la préclusion.

2 Selon la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage, une cause d'action prend naissance, pour les besoins de la prescription, au moment où les faits substantiels sur lesquels repose cette cause d'action the plaintiff by the exercise of reasonable diligence (Central Trust Co. v. Rafuse, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 147, at p. 224).

BOA COMPEER001550

3 Section 16(1) of the Limitations Act, S.N.L. 1995, c. L-16.1 (see Appendix), prescribes that confirmation of a cause of action occurs when a person acknowledges the cause of action of another person or makes a payment in respect of that cause of action. Thus, at that moment, the limitation clock is restarted, and the time before the date of the confirmation will not be counted.

4 Estoppel by convention operates where the parties have agreed that certain facts are deemed to be true and to form the basis of the transaction into which they are about to enter (G. H. L. Fridman, The Law of Contract in Canada (4th ed. 1999), at p. 140, note 302). If they have acted upon the agreed assumption, then, as regards that transaction, each is estopped against the other from questioning the truth of the statement of facts so assumed if it would be unjust to allow one to go back on it (G. S. Bower, The Law Relating to Estoppel by Representation (4th ed. 2004), at pp. 7-8).

5 Estoppel by representation requires a positive representation made by the party whom it is sought to bind, with the intention that it shall be acted on by the party with whom he or she is dealing, the latter having so acted upon it as to make it inequitable that the party making the representation should be permitted to dispute its truth, or do anything inconsistent with it (Page v. Austin (1884), 10 S.C.R. 132, at p. 164).

6 None of these doctrines can find application in the present case. I will address each of these doctrines and in most cases adopt the reasons of the Court of Appeal with mere comment. One legal concept requires more attention from this Court, given that it is being asked to develop a legal test with regard to its application: estoppel by convention.

ont été découverts par le demandeur ou auraient dû l'être s'il avait fait preuve de diligence raisonnable (Central Trust Co. c. Rafuse, [1986] 2 R.C.S. 147, p. 224).

Le paragraphe 16(1) de la Limitations Act, S.N.L. 1995, ch. L-16.1 (voir l'annexe), prévoit qu'une cause d'action est confirmée si une personne reconnaît la cause d'action appartenant à autrui ou si elle effectue un paiement à l'égard de cette cause d'action. Ainsi, le compte à rebours recommence dès lors, et le temps écoulé avant la date de confirmation ne compte pas.

Il peut y avoir préclusion par convention lorsque les parties ont convenu de présupposer que certains faits sont véridiques et constituent le fondement de l'opération qu'elles s'apprêtent à conclure (G. H. L. Fridman, The Law of Contract in Canada (4e éd. 1999), p. 140, note 302). Si les parties ont agi sur la foi de cette présupposition conventionnelle, alors, en ce qui concerne l'opération, chaque partie est précluse, par rapport à l'autre, de mettre en doute la véracité ainsi présupposée de l'exposé des faits, dans le cas où il serait injuste de permettre à l'une d'elles de revenir sur cette présupposition (G. S. Bower, The Law Relating to Estoppel by Representation (4e éd. 2004), p. 7-8).

Pour que la préclusion par assertion de fait s'applique, une assertion positive doit avoir été faite par la partie que l'on souhaite voir liée par celle-ci afin que la partie avec qui elle traitait agisse sur la foi de cette assertion, et cette dernière doit avoir agi sur la foi de l'assertion de sorte qu'il serait inéquitable de permettre à l'auteur de l'assertion d'en mettre en doute la véracité ou d'agir de quelque manière incompatible avec elle (Page c. Austin (1884), 10 R.C.S. 132, p. 164).

Aucune de ces règles n'est applicable en l'espèce. Je vais examiner chacune de celles-ci et, dans la plupart des cas, approuver les motifs de la Cour d'appel en ajoutant un simple commentaire. Une notion juridique mérite que notre Cour s'y attarde davantage étant donné qu'elle est appelée à établir un critère juridique d'application : la préclusion par convention.

BOA COMPEER001551

I. Background

A. Facts

On November 27, 1997, three vehicles were involved in an accident. They were operated by the respondent, Ryan, the appellant, Rex Gilbert Moore, and a third party (not involved in this matter), David Crummey. Ryan decided to pursue a personal injury claim against Moore. He was unaware that, on December 26, 1998, Moore had died of causes unrelated to the accident. On February 16, 1999, Letters of Administration were granted to Moore's administratrix, Muriel Smith. On October 28, 1999, Ryan issued his statement of claim; it was within the two-year limitation period prescribed by the Limitations Act, but outside the applicable six-month limitation period from the granting of the letters of administration under the Survival of Actions Act. Ryan argues that the appellant is estopped from relying upon the shorter limitation period. Alternatively, he argues that the discoverability principle or the confirmation rule apply to extend this shorter limitation period.

As this case is centred on issues related to limitation periods, it is important to recollect the important events leading up to this litigation:

November 27, 1997	The accident
November 28, 1997	Cabot Insurance Co. ("Cabot Insurance") appoints adjuster Brian Lacey to look after the claim against its insured Moore. Ryan retains counsel who contacts the adjuster advising of his retainer and that Ryan, while his injuries are being assessed, will pursue his property damage claim directly with the adjuster.

I. Contexte

A. Les faits

Un accident impliquant trois véhicules est survenu le 27 novembre 1997. Ces véhicules étaient conduits par l'intimé M. Ryan, l'appelant Rex Gilbert Moore, ainsi qu'une tierce personne (non partie à l'instance), David Crummey. M. Ryan a décidé d'intenter une action pour préjudice corporel contre M. Moore. Il ignorait que, le 26 décembre 1998, M. Moore était décédé de causes non liées à l'accident. Le 16 février 1999, des lettres d'administration ont été délivrées à Muriel Smith, l'administratrice de M. Moore. M. Ryan a déposé sa déclaration le 28 octobre 1999, soit avant l'expiration du délai de prescription de deux ans fixé par la Limitations Act, mais après celle du délai de prescription de six mois qui, aux termes de la Survival of Actions Act, commence à courir à partir de la délivrance de lettres d'homologation ou d'administration. M. Ryan prétend que l'appelant est préclus d'invoquer le délai de prescription plus court. Subsidiairement, il fait valoir que ce délai plus court peut être prolongé en vertu de la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage ou de la règle de la confirmation.

Étant donné que la présente affaire porte sur des questions liées aux délais de prescription, il importe de rappeler les principaux faits à l'origine du litige :

27 novembre 1997	L'accident
28 novembre 1997	Cabot Insurance Co. (« Cabot Insurance ») nomme l'expert en sinistres Brian Lacey qui s'occupera de la demande d'indemnité dont fait l'objet son assuré M. Moore. M. Ryan retient les services d'un avocat, qui communique avec l'expert en sinistres pour l'informer de son mandat et l'aviser qu'en attendant que ses blessures soient évaluées M. Ryan lui présentera directement sa demande d'indemnité pour préjudice matériel.

BOA COMPEER001552

December 1997 – December 1998	Cabot Insurance pays Ryan's property damage claim directly to him. Correspondence is exchanged between Ryan's counsel and the adjuster concerning Ryan's medical condition, the adjuster seeking documentation and updates on Ryan's condition, and the counsel providing the information requested. The counsel forwards Ryan's hospital chart to the adjuster, for which Cabot Insurance reimburses counsel the $40 fee.	décembre 1997 – décembre 1998	Cabot Insurance verse directement à M. Ryan une indemnité pour préjudice matériel. L'avocat de M. Ryan et l'expert en sinistres échangent une correspondance concernant l'état de santé de M. Ryan, l'expert en sinistres sollicitant des documents et des mises à jour sur l'état de santé de M. Ryan, et l'avocat fournissant les renseignements demandés. L'avocat fait parvenir à l'expert en sinistres le dossier hospitalier de M. Ryan, pour lequel Cabot Insurance rembourse à l'avocat des frais de 40 $.
December 26, 1998	Moore dies at age 75 from causes unrelated to the accident.	26 décembre 1998	M. Moore décède à l'âge de 75 ans de causes non liées à l'accident.
January 25, 1999	The adjuster writes to Ryan's counsel seeking medical information and reiterating that the insurer would pay a reasonable fee for a medical report. He refers to Moore as "Our Insured".	25 janvier 1999	L'expert en sinistres écrit à l'avocat de M. Ryan pour obtenir des renseignements médicaux et réitérer que l'assureur est disposé à payer des frais raisonnables pour un rapport médical. Il désigne M. Moore comme étant [TRADUCTION] « Notre assuré ».
February 16, 1999	Letters of Administration of the Estate of Rex Moore are granted to Muriel Smith.	16 février 1999	Des lettres d'administration de la succession de Rex Moore sont délivrées à Muriel Smith.
April 5, 1999	Ryan's counsel forwards to the adjuster an invoice for a medical report of Ryan's examination by an orthopaedic surgeon.	5 avril 1999	L'avocat de M. Ryan fait parvenir à l'expert en sinistres une facture pour un rapport d'examen médical de M. Ryan par un chirurgien orthopédique.
July 29, 1999	The adjuster forwards to Ryan's counsel a cheque for payment of the medical report. The cheque is payable to	29 juillet 1999	L'expert en sinistres envoie à l'avocat de M. Ryan un chèque pour payer le rapport médical. Le chèque est à l'ordre du

BOA COMPEER001553

	Dr. Landells. He refers to Moore as "Our Insured".		Dr Landells. Il désigne M. Moore comme étant [TRADUCTION] « Notre assuré ».
August 16, 1999	Six months have passed since the grant of letters of administration of Moore's estate.	16 août 1999	Six mois se sont écoulés depuis la délivrance des lettres d'administration de la succession de M. Moore.
October 28, 1999	The statement of claim is issued naming Rex Moore as defendant.	28 octobre 1999	Dépôt de la déclaration désignant Rex Moore comme défendeur.
February 10, 2000	Ryan's counsel writes to the adjuster seeking payment for the cost of obtaining the chart from Ryan's family physician. He refers to Moore as "Your Insured".	10 février 2000	L'avocat de M. Ryan écrit à l'expert en sinistres pour lui demander de payer les frais exigés pour le dossier tenu par le médecin de famille de M. Ryan. Il désigne M. Moore comme étant [TRADUCTION] « Notre assuré ».
March 2, 2000	Ryan's counsel writes to the adjuster requesting payment for the chart of another physician. He refers to Moore as "Your Insured".	2 mars 2000	L'avocat de M. Ryan écrit à l'expert en sinistres pour lui demander de payer les frais exigés pour le dossier tenu par un autre médecin. Il désigne M. Moore comme étant [TRADUCTION] « Notre assuré ».
May 18, 2000	The adjuster learns of Moore's death.	18 mai 2000	L'expert en sinistres apprend le décès de M. Moore.
September 22, 2000	Ryan's counsel learns of Moore's death after attempting to serve the statement of claim.	22 septembre 2000	L'avocat de M. Ryan apprend le décès de M. Moore après avoir tenté de signifier la déclaration.
October 24, 2000	Ryan's counsel suggests to Cabot Insurance's claims examiner, Valerie Moore, in a meeting (to discuss claims unrelated to this case) that there might be a problem with the limitation period.	24 octobre 2000	Lors d'une réunion (tenue pour discuter de demandes non liées à la présente affaire), l'avocat de M. Ryan laisse entendre à Valerie Moore, une rédactrice sinistres de Cabot Insurance, que le délai de prescription pourrait poser un problème.

BOA COMPEER001554

November 9, 2000 Cabot Insurance refuses to settle Ryan's claim because the action is outside the limitation period.

9 Cabot Insurance applied to intervene in the proceedings and sought an order striking out the statement of claim for being out of time. It further claimed that the statement of claim naming a dead person as defendant was a nullity and was not capable of being amended. Ryan also filed an application to amend the statement of claim to describe the defendant as "Rex Moore, Deceased, by his administratrix, Muriel Smith".

B. Supreme Court of Newfoundland and Labrador (2001), 205 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 211

10 At the Supreme Court of Newfoundland and Labrador, Orsborn J. denied Cabot Insurance's application to have the action dismissed. First, he held that the discoverability rule did not apply to postpone the running of the Survival of Actions Act limitation period, since the fact of death was not an element of the cause of action and was not required to complete the cause of action (paras. 50-51). Second, Orsborn J. held that the confirmation provisions of s. 16 of the Limitations Act are not expressly confined to the limitation periods fixed by the Limitations Act. He saw no reason in principle why a cause of action continued under the Survival of Actions Act could not be confirmed and the limitation period fixed by that Act thus continued. He concluded that Cabot Insurance's payment for the medical report on July 29, 1999 constituted a confirmation of Ryan's cause of action. Since the action was commenced within six months of this payment, the proceeding was still within the short Survival of Actions Act limitation period and was not statute barred (paras. 52-63). Third, Orsborn J. concluded that in any event, on the facts of this case, the cause of action against Moore was not a cause of action to which the Survival of Actions Act applies. The Survival of Actions Act permits a cause of action to survive "for the benefit of or against" an estate

9 novembre 2000 Cabot Insurance refuse de régler la demande de M. Ryan parce que l'action a été intentée après l'expiration du délai de prescription.

Cabot Insurance a présenté une demande d'intervention dans l'instance et a sollicité une ordonnance de radiation de la déclaration pour cause de tardiveté. Elle a, en outre, fait valoir que la déclaration désignant une personne décédée comme défenderesse était nulle et ne pouvait pas être modifiée. M. Ryan a également présenté une demande de modification de la déclaration en vue de désigner le défendeur comme étant [TRADUCTION] « Feu Rex Moore, représenté par son administratrice Muriel Smith ».

B. Cour suprême de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador (2001), 205 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 211

Le juge Orsborn de la Cour suprême de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador a rejeté la demande de Cabot Insurance visant à obtenir le rejet de l'action. Premièrement, il a conclu que la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage ne s'appliquait pas pour reporter le point de départ du délai de prescription prévu par la Survival of Actions Act, étant donné que le décès en tant que tel ne constituait pas un élément de la cause d'action et n'était pas nécessaire pour compléter la cause d'action (par. 50-51). Deuxièmement, le juge Orsborn a estimé que l'application des dispositions de l'art. 16 de la Limitations Act, relatives à la confirmation, n'était pas expressément limitée aux délais de prescription fixés par la Limitations Act. Il ne voyait pas pourquoi, en principe, une cause d'action ayant subsisté en vertu de la Survival of Actions Act ne pouvait pas être confirmée de manière à maintenir le délai de prescription fixé par cette loi. Il a conclu que le paiement du 29 juillet 1999, que Cabot Insurance avait effectué pour le rapport médical, confirmait la cause d'action de M. Ryan. Étant donné que les procédures avaient été engagées dans les six mois suivant ce paiement, l'action respectait encore le court délai de prescription fixé par la Survival of Actions Act et n'était pas prescrite (par. 52-63). Troisièmement, le juge Orsborn

BOA COMPEER001555

(s. 2(b)). The Survival of Actions Act deals with the potential acquisition or dissipation of estate assets. However, in this case, Ryan's claim poses no risk to the assets of the estate. Instead, the risk lies on the insurer. Moore was a defendant in name only, and the real party to the action was the insurer. Thus, Ryan's cause of action was not extinguished on Moore's death (paras. 66-76). Fourth, Orsborn J. held that if Ryan's cause of action had not been confirmed and if the Survival of Actions Act was indeed applicable (which he held it was not), then the action would have been a nullity for being commenced outside the limitation period. However, as this was not the case, the plaintiff was not statute barred.

a décidé que, de toute façon, compte tenu des faits de la présente affaire, la cause d'action contre M. Moore n'était pas visée par la Survival of Actions Act. Cette loi permet qu'une cause d'action survive [TRADUCTION] « au profit » d'une succession ou « contre » celle-ci (al. 2b)). Elle traite de l'acquisition ou de la dissipation potentielles d'éléments d'actif de la succession. En l'espèce, cependant, la demande de M. Ryan ne présente aucun risque pour les biens de la succession. C'est plutôt l'assureur qui est exposé à un risque. M. Moore n'avait de défendeur que le nom, la véritable partie à l'action étant l'assureur. La cause d'action de M. Ryan ne s'était donc pas éteinte au décès de M. Moore (par. 66-76). Quatrièmement, le juge Orsborn a conclu que, si la cause d'action de M. Ryan n'avait pas été confirmée et que la Survival of Actions Act était effectivement applicable (ce qui n'était pas le cas, selon lui), alors l'action aurait été nulle pour cause de tardiveté. Toutefois, comme ce n'était pas le cas, l'action du demandeur n'était pas prescrite.

C. Court of Appeal of Newfoundland and Labrador (2003), 224 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 181, 2003 NLCA 19

C. Cour d'appel de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador (2003), 224 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 181, 2003 NLCA 19

(1) Wells C.J. (for the majority)

(1) Le juge en chef Wells (au nom des juges majoritaires)

The majority of the Court of Appeal allowed, in part, both the appeal and cross-appeal. The applications judge's order to permit the intervention of Cabot Insurance and the amendment of the statement of claim was affirmed. Wells C.J. held that the applications judge made no error in considering the existence of insurance in determining whether or not the action posed a financial risk to the estate. He nevertheless held that the applications judge erred in holding that the cause of action against Moore is a cause of action to which the Survival of Actions Act did not apply. The court explained that unless the Survival of Actions Act applies, the action will be a nullity. The right to institute a tort action after death, or continue an action after death, derives from the statute. Without such a statute, this right does not otherwise exist.

11 La Cour d'appel, à la majorité, a accueilli en partie l'appel principal et l'appel incident. Elle a confirmé l'ordonnance du juge des requêtes autorisant l'intervention de Cabot Insurance et la modification de la déclaration. Le juge en chef Wells a conclu que le juge des requêtes n'avait commis aucune erreur en tenant compte de l'existence d'une assurance pour décider si l'action présentait un risque financier pour la succession. Il a néanmoins décidé que le juge des requêtes avait commis une erreur en concluant que la cause d'action contre M. Moore n'était pas visée par la Survival of Actions Act. La cour a expliqué que, à moins que la Survival of Actions Act ne s'applique, l'action était nulle. Le droit d'intenter une action délictuelle après le décès, ou de poursuivre une action après le décès, découle de la Loi. En l'absence d'une telle loi, ce droit n'existe pas.

BOA COMPEER001556

12 The majority agreed with the applications judge that the discoverability rule does not apply to postpone the running of the limitation period under the Survival of Actions Act. Concluding that the limitation period in the statute runs from an event that occurs without regard to the injured party's knowledge, the majority deemed that allowing the application of the discoverability rule would disrupt the exception to the common law rule, the courts thereby intruding into the legislature's jurisdiction.

Les juges majoritaires ont partagé l'opinion du juge des requêtes selon laquelle la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage ne s'applique pas pour reporter le point de départ du délai de prescription prévu par la Survival of Actions Act. Concluant que le délai de prescription prévu par la Loi court à compter de la date d'un événement qui survient, peu importe que la partie lésée en ait connaissance ou non, les juges majoritaires ont considéré que l'application de la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage aurait pour effet d'écarter l'exception à cette règle de common law, les tribunaux se trouvant alors à empiéter sur la compétence du législateur.

13 The majority disagreed with Orsborn J.'s holding that the confirmation provisions of the Limitations Act also apply to the limitation period under the Survival of Actions Act. Wells C.J. held that s. 16 of the Limitations Act provides confirmation of a cause of action and not of the right to commence it. The majority pointed out that the nature of the cause of action, or whether it is confirmed, is not relevant to the date of death or of grant of probate which triggers the limitation period created by the Survival of Actions Act. Confirmation did not arise in relation to the limitation period stemming from the Limitations Act because the statement of claim was issued within two years of the collision, i.e. within the prescribed delay.

Les juges majoritaires ont exprimé leur désaccord avec la conclusion du juge Orsborn selon laquelle les dispositions de la Limitations Act relatives à la confirmation s'appliquent également au délai de prescription fixé par la Survival of Actions Act. Le juge en chef Wells a statué que l'art. 16 de la Limitations Act prévoit la confirmation d'une cause d'action et non du droit d'intenter une action. Les juges majoritaires ont souligné que la nature de la cause d'action ou la question de savoir si la cause d'action est confirmée n'est pas pertinente en ce qui concerne la date de décès ou la délivrance de lettres d'homologation qui marque le point de départ du délai de prescription établi par la Survival of Actions Act. La question de la confirmation ne se posait pas en ce qui concernait le délai de prescription résultant de la Limitations Act étant donné que la déclaration avait été déposée dans les deux ans suivant la collision, c'est-à-dire dans le délai prévu.

14 Turning to the last issue, the majority held that Moore's estate and Cabot Insurance were barred by the principle of estoppel from relying on the fact of Moore's death and the granting of letters of administration. The particular form of estoppel invoked was estoppel by convention. Wells C.J., having reviewed Canadian and foreign authorities and decisions, concluded that estoppel by convention was established (para. 79). The majority held that detrimental reliance was not required. Consequently, Cabot Insurance and Moore were estopped from pleading that Moore died or that letters of Quant au dernier point, les juges majoritaires ont conclu que la règle de la préclusion empêchait la succession de M. Moore et Cabot Insurance d'invoquer le décès en tant que tel de M. Moore et la délivrance de lettres d'administration. La forme de préclusion invoquée était la préclusion par convention. Après avoir passé en revue la doctrine et la jurisprudence canadiennes et étrangères, le juge en chef Wells a décidé que la préclusion par convention était établie (par. 79). Les juges majoritaires considéraient qu'aucun acte de confiance préjudiciable n'était nécessaire. Cabot Insurance et M. Moore administration were granted prior to May 2000 in order to invoke the shorter Survival of Actions Act limitation period. As a result, nullity could not be established and the statement of claim was amended to name the administratrix of Moore as defendant in the action.

BOA COMPEER001557

étaient donc préclus d'invoquer le délai de prescription plus court fixé par la Survival of Actions Act en faisant valoir que M. Moore était décédé ou que des lettres d'administration avaient été délivrées avant le mois de mai 2000. Par conséquent, la nullité ne pouvait pas être établie et la déclaration a été modifiée de manière à désigner l'administratrice de M. Moore comme partie défenderesse dans l'action.

(2) Cameron J.A. (dissenting)

In dissenting reasons, concurred in by Welsh J.A., Cameron J.A. disagreed with the estoppel analysis and held that it did not apply to the case at bar. After analysing case law and doctrine, she concluded that mutual misunderstanding (both parties assuming that Moore was alive) did not amount to a common assumption. The dissenting judges did not find that the letters sent by Cabot Insurance to Ryan's counsel referring to "Our Insured: Rex Moore" formed the basis on which the parties governed their conduct. The failure to commence the action within the Survival of Actions Act's limitation period was not due to any arrangement between the parties, and consequently, there was no reliance on any convention. Therefore, this principle did not apply. Ryan's action was therefore time barred. The dissenting judges would have allowed the appeal.

(2) La juge Cameron (dissidente)

15 Dans ses motifs dissidents, auxquels le juge Welsh a souscrit, la juge Cameron s'est dite en désaccord avec l'analyse de la préclusion et a décidé que cette règle ne s'appliquait pas en l'espèce. Après avoir analysé la jurisprudence et la doctrine, elle a conclu qu'une méprise de part et d'autre (les deux parties ayant cru que M. Moore était vivant) ne constituait pas une présupposition commune. Les juges dissidents n'ont pas considéré que les lettres portant la mention [TRADUCTION] « Notre assuré : Rex Moore » que Cabot Insurance avait envoyées à l'avocat de M. Ryan avaient déterminé la conduite des parties. L'omission d'intenter l'action avant l'expiration du délai de prescription fixé par la Survival of Actions Act n'était pas le fruit d'un arrangement entre les parties, si bien que l'on ne s'était fondé sur aucune convention. Par conséquent, cette règle ne s'appliquait pas. L'action de M. Ryan était donc prescrite. Les juges dissidents auraient accueilli l'appel.

II. Analysis

II. Analyse

A. Discoverability

A. La possibilité de découvrir le dommage

(1) Statutory Limitation Periods

(1) Les délais de prescription légaux

16 The situation here is governed by two limitation periods: s. 5 of the Limitations Act (see Appendix) and s. 5 of the Survival of Actions Act. The limitation period in s. 5 of the Limitations Act applies initially. Section 5 of the Survival of Actions Act superimposes itself on s. 5 at a later point in time, but does not eliminate it. This follows from the fact that the Survival of Actions Act does not create a new cause of action, as will be explained later.

Deux délais de prescription s'appliquent en l'espèce : celui prévu par l'art. 5 de la Limitations Act (voir l'annexe) et celui prévu par l'art. 5 de la Survival of Actions Act. Le délai de prescription établi par l'art. 5 de la Limitations Act s'applique au départ. Il se superpose, par la suite, au délai fixé par l'art. 5 de la Limitations Act, sans toutefois l'éliminer. Cela découle du fait que la Survival of Actions Act ne crée pas une nouvelle cause d'action, comme je l'expliquerai plus loin.

BOA COMPEER001558

17 Pursuant to s. 5 of the Limitations Act, a person can bring an action for damages in respect of injury based on contract or tort within two years of the date on which the right to do so arose. Ryan, by issuing a statement of claim on October 28, 1999, naming Rex Moore as the defendant, therefore, met the prescribed limitation period in the Limitations Act. Nevertheless, unknown to the parties, Rex Moore had died on December 26, 1998, altering the fact scenario.

18 As stated by the Court of Appeal, it is well known that at common law a personal action in tort is extinguished on the death of the victim or the wrongdoer: actio personalis moritur cum persona (see G. Mew, The Law of Limitations (2nd ed. 2004), at p. 253). Being unable to sue the estate of a deceased tortfeasor was particularly severe as it left injured survivors of motor vehicle accidents without any means of recovery. This led legislatures to enact statutes to diminish the hardship of the common law rule. The Fatal Accidents Act, R.S.N.L. 1990, c. F-6, and the Survival of Actions Act were such statutes. Under the Fatal Accidents Act, the estate of a person who died as a result of the accident, or the survivors of that person, are accorded the right to maintain an action for death by wrongful act. Also, pursuant to s. 2 of the Survival of Actions Act (see Appendix), an action vested in or existing against a person who has died can be maintained by or against the deceased person's estate. However, s. 5 of the Survival of Actions Act prohibits an action brought six months after letters of probate or administration of the estate of the deceased have been granted, and after the expiration of one year from the date of death. Hence, the provision is meant to keep the action "alive" for a specific period of time. The Survival of Actions Act imposes an additional limitation period. As eloquently affirmed by Orsborn J., the Survival of Actions Act does not create a cause of action. It grafts its provision onto an existing cause of action, one which is complete in all of its elements before the operation of the Survival of Actions Act (para. 45).

Aux termes de l'art. 5 de la Limitations Act, une action en dommages-intérêts pour préjudice, fondée sur une inexécution de contrat ou sur un délit, peut être intentée dans les deux ans suivant la date à laquelle a pris naissance le droit de l'intenter. En déposant, le 28 octobre 1999, une déclaration désignant Rex Moore comme défendeur, M. Ryan a donc respecté le délai de prescription fixé par la Limitations Act. Cependant, Rex Moore était décédé le 26 décembre 1998, à l'insu des parties, ce qui modifiait le scénario.

Comme l'a affirmé la Cour d'appel, il est bien connu qu'en common law une action délictuelle personnelle s'éteint au décès de la victime ou de l'auteur de la faute : actio personalis moritur cum persona (voir G. Mew, The Law of Limitations (2e éd. 2004), p. 253). L'incapacité de poursuivre la succession de l'auteur d'un délit civil décédé était particulièrement lourde de conséquences du fait qu'elle privait de toute possibilité d'indemnisation les survivants blessés d'un accident d'automobile. Cela a amené des législatures à adopter des lois destinées à adoucir la règle de common law. La Fatal Accidents Act, R.S.N.L. 1990, ch. F-6, et la Survival of Actions Act comptent parmi ces lois. Aux termes de la Fatal Accidents Act, la succession d'une personne décédée à la suite d'un accident ou les personnes qui lui survivent ont le droit d'intenter une action pour décès causé par une faute. De plus, aux termes de l'art. 2 de la Survival of Actions Act (voir l'annexe), une action appartenant à une personne décédée ou existant contre elle peut être intentée par ou contre sa succession. Toutefois, l'art. 5 de la Survival of Actions Act prévoit qu'aucune action ne peut être intentée après les six mois qui suivent la délivrance de lettres d'homologation ou d'administration de la succession de la personne décédée et après l'expiration d'un délai d'un an suivant la date du décès. Cette disposition vise donc à assurer la « survie » de l'action pendant une période déterminée. La Survival of Actions Act fixe un autre délai de prescription. Comme le juge Orsborn l'a si bien dit, la Survival of Actions Act ne crée pas une cause d'action. Elle greffe sa disposition sur une cause d'action existante dont tous les éléments sont présents avant que la Survival of Actions Act soit appliquée (par. 45).

BOA COMPEER001559

In the case at bar, the Survival of Actions Act has the effect of shortening the time period within which the action could be taken because "an action founded in tort may only be taken by or against the estate of a deceased person if it is commenced within that period of time that is common to both limitations periods": per Wells C.J., at para. 37.

Ryan argues that the Survival of Actions Act contemplates that a cause of action can arise under the Survival of Actions Act. I fail to see how the expression "[c]auses of action under this Act" or "an action . . . under this Act" found in ss. 8(1) and 5 respectively can be seen to indicate the creation of a new cause of action. The Survival of Actions Act expressly contemplates the survival of causes of action existing against a person who has died (s. 2). I take that to mean that the cause of action existed prior to the application of the Survival of Actions Act. The survival of a cause of action for a time and its creation are two different things.

(2) Discoverability: The Judge-Made Rule

The debate concerning the use of the discoverability principle in tort actions has been settled by this Court in Kamloops (City of) v. Nielsen, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 2, Central Trust and M. (K.) v. M. (H.), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 6.

The discoverability principle provides that "a cause of action arises for purposes of a limitation period when the material facts on which it is based have been discovered or ought to have been discovered by the plaintiff by the exercise of reasonable diligence": Central Trust, at p. 224. In some provinces, the discoverability rule has been codified by statute; in others, it has been deemed redundant because of other remedial provisions.

While discoverability has been qualified in the past as a "general rule" (Central Trust, at p. 224; Peixeiro v. Haberman, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 549, at 19 En l'espèce, la Survival of Actions Act a pour effet de raccourcir le délai dans lequel l'action pourrait être intentée parce qu'[TRADUCTION] « une action délictuelle ne peut être intentée par ou contre la succession d'une personne décédée que pendant la période de chevauchement des deux délais de prescription » : le juge en chef Wells, par. 37.

20 Selon M. Ryan, la Survival of Actions Act prévoit qu'une cause d'action peut prendre naissance en vertu de ses dispositions. Je ne vois pas comment les expressions [TRADUCTION] « causes d'action en vertu de la présente loi » ou « action [. . .] intentée en vertu de la présente loi », contenues respectivement au par. 8(1) et à l'art. 5, peuvent être considérées comme indiquant la création d'une nouvelle cause d'action. La Survival of Actions Act prévoit expressément la survie des causes d'action existant contre une personne décédée (art. 2). À mon avis, cela signifie que la cause d'action existait avant que la Survival of Actions Act soit appliquée. La création d'une cause d'action et sa survie pendant un certain temps sont deux choses différentes.

(2) La possibilité de découvrir le dommage : la règle prétorienne

21 Dans les arrêts Kamloops (Ville de) c. Nielsen, [1984] 2 R.C.S. 2, Central Trust et M. (K.) c. M. (H.), [1992] 3 R.C.S. 6, notre Cour a tranché le débat concernant l'application de la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage dans les actions délictuelles.

22 Selon la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage, « une cause d'action prend naissance, aux fins de la prescription, lorsque les faits importants sur lesquels repose cette cause d'action ont été découverts par le demandeur ou auraient dû l'être s'il avait fait preuve de diligence raisonnable » : Central Trust, p. 224. Dans certaines provinces, la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage a été codifiée; dans d'autres provinces, elle a été jugée redondante à cause de l'existence d'autres dispositions réparatrices.

23 Bien qu'elle ait été qualifiée, par le passé, de « règle générale » (Central Trust, p. 224; Peixeiro c. Haberman, [1997] 3 R.C.S. 549, par. 36), la règle para. 36), it must not be applied systematically without a thorough balancing of competing interests (Peixeiro, at para. 34). The rule is an interpretative tool for construing limitation statutes. I agree with the Manitoba Court of Appeal when it writes:

BOA COMPEER001560

> In my opinion, the judge-made discoverability rule is nothing more than a rule of construction. Whenever a statute requires an action to be commenced within a specified time from the happening of a specific event, the statutory language must be construed. When time runs from "the accrual of the cause of action" or from some other event which can be construed as occurring only when the injured party has knowledge of the injury sustained, the judge-made discoverability rule applies. But, when time runs from an event which clearly occurs without regard to the injured party's knowledge, the judge-made discoverability rule may not extend the period the legislature has prescribed. [Emphasis added.]

(Fehr v. Jacob (1993), 14 C.C.L.T. (2d) 200, at p. 206)

See also Peixeiro, at para. 37; Snow v. Kashyap (1995), 125 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 182 (Nfld. C.A.).

24 Thus, the Court of Appeal of Newfoundland and Labrador is correct in stating that the rule is "generally" applicable where the commencement of the limitation period is related by the legislation to the arising or accrual of the cause of action. The law does not permit resort to the judge-made discoverability rule when the limitation period is explicitly linked by the governing legislation to a fixed event unrelated to the injured party's knowledge or the basis of the cause of action (see Mew, at p. 55).

(3) Discoverability Principle Does Not Apply to the Survival of Actions Act

25 Ryan submits that the discoverability rule applies to the limitation period contained in s. 5 of the Survival of Actions Act. He argues that the de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage ne doit pas être appliquée systématiquement sans une évaluation complète des intérêts opposés (Peixeiro, par. 34). Cette règle est un outil d'interprétation des lois qui établissent des délais de prescription. Je partage l'opinion de la Cour d'appel du Manitoba lorsqu'elle écrit :

> [TRADUCTION] À mon avis, la règle prétorienne de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage n'est rien de plus qu'une règle d'interprétation. Dans tous les cas où une loi indique que l'action en justice doit être intentée dans un certain délai après un événement donné, il faut interpréter les termes de cette loi. Lorsque ce délai court à partir du « moment où naît la cause d'action » ou de tout autre événement qui peut être interprété comme ne survenant qu'au moment où la victime prend connaissance du dommage, c'est la règle prétorienne de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage qui s'applique. Toutefois, si le délai court à compter de la date d'un événement qui survient clairement, et sans égard à la connaissance qu'en a la victime, cette règle ne peut prolonger le délai fixé par le législateur. [Je souligne.]

(Fehr c. Jacob (1993), 14 C.C.L.T. (2d) 200, p. 206)

Voir également les arrêts Peixeiro, par. 37, et Snow c. Kashyap (1995), 125 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 182 (C.A.T.-N.).

Par conséquent, la Cour d'appel de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador a raison de dire que la règle s'applique [TRADUCTION] « généralement » lorsque la loi lie le point de départ du délai de prescription à la naissance de la cause d'action. Il n'est pas permis, en droit, de recourir à la règle prétorienne de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage dans les cas où la loi applicable lie expressément le délai de prescription à un événement déterminé qui n'a rien à voir avec le moment où la partie lésée en prend connaissance ou avec le fondement de la cause d'action (voir Mew, p. 55).

(3) La règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage ne s'applique pas à la Survival of Actions Act

M. Ryan fait valoir que la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage s'applique au délai de prescription prévu à l'art. 5 de la Survival of Actions limitation period should not begin to run until he knew, or ought reasonably to have known, the material facts which determine (i) his cause of action under the Survival of Actions Act and (ii) the limitation period. In sum, Ryan claims that the death of Moore is integral to the cause of action and that the limitation period should not start to run until he knew that he had a cause of action against the estate of Rex Moore. The appellants submit that the discoverability rule does not apply to the Survival of Actions Act as it would transcend the logic of statutory interpretation and the scheme enacted by the legislature. In addition, they say that the rule does not apply where time runs from a fixed event.

BOA COMPEER001561

Act. Il prétend que ce délai de prescription ne devrait commencer à courir qu'à partir du moment où il a pris connaissance, ou aurait raisonnablement dû prendre connaissance, des faits substantiels déterminants en ce qui concerne (i) sa cause d'action en vertu de la Survival of Actions Act et (ii) le délai de prescription. Somme toute, M. Ryan affirme que le décès de M. Moore fait partie intégrante de la cause d'action et que le délai de prescription ne devait commencer à courir qu'à partir du moment où il a découvert qu'il avait une cause d'action contre la succession de Rex Moore. Les appelants soutiennent que la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage ne s'applique pas à la Survival of Actions Act étant donné qu'elle transcenderait la logique de l'interprétation des lois et du régime établi par le législateur. Ils ajoutent que la règle ne s'applique pas lorsque le délai a pour point de départ un fait déterminé.

Like the Court of Appeal, I am of the view that the appellants' position is correct. For ease of reference, I reproduce s. 5 of the Survival of Actions Act:

26 À l'instar de la Cour d'appel, je suis d'avis que la position des appelants est correcte. Pour en faciliter la consultation, je reproduis l'art. 5 de la Survival of Actions Act :

5. An action shall not be brought under this Act unless proceedings are started within 6 months after letters of probate or administration of the estate of the deceased have been granted and proceedings shall not be started in an action under this Act after the expiration of 1 year after the date of death of the deceased.

[TRADUCTION]

5. Aucune action ne peut être intentée en vertu de la présente loi à moins que les procédures ne soient engagées dans les six mois suivant la délivrance de lettres d'homologation ou d'administration de la succession de la personne décédée, et, pour les besoins d'une action fondée sur la présente loi, les procédures ne doivent pas être engagées après l'expiration d'un an suivant la date du décès de la personne en question.

Pursuant to the Survival of Actions Act, the limitation period is triggered by the death of the defendant or the granting by a court of the letters of administration or probate. The section is clear and explicit: time begins to run from one of these two specific events. The Act does not establish a relationship between these events and the injured party's knowledge. I agree with the appellants that knowledge is not a factor: the death or granting of the letters occurs regardless of the state of mind of the plaintiff. We face here a situation in respect of which, as recognized by this Court in Peixeiro, the judge-made discoverability rule does not apply to extend the period the legislature has prescribed. Thus, I agree with the Court of Appeal that by using a specific event as the starting point of the "limitation clock", the legislature was displacing the discoverability rule in all the situations to which the Survival of Actions Act applies.

27 Aux termes de la Survival of Actions Act, le délai de prescription court à compter du décès du défendeur ou de la délivrance, par un tribunal, de lettres d'administration ou d'homologation. L'article est clair et explicite : le délai commence à courir au moment où survient l'un de ces deux faits particuliers. La Loi n'établit aucun lien entre ces faits et le moment où la partie lésée en prend connaissance. Je conviens avec les appelants que la connaissance n'est pas un facteur à considérer : le décès ou la délivrance des lettres survient indépendamment de l'état d'esprit du demandeur. En l'espèce, nous nous trouvons devant une situation où, comme notre Cour l'a reconnu dans l'arrêt Peixeiro, la règle prétorienne de

BOA COMPEER001562

28 A number of the appellate courts have dealt with the question of discoverability in the context of actions by or against estates of deceased persons. The appellants rely extensively on Payne v. Brady (1996), 140 D.L.R. (4th) 88 (Nfld. C.A.), leave to appeal refused, [1997] 2 S.C.R. xiii. While the facts of that case are very similar to the present, it is not clear whether the Court of Appeal of Newfoundland decided that the rule of discoverability did not apply because death is always a possibility or because the appellant Payne had ample time after she became aware of the death of Brady to commence her action. What is clear is the point advanced by O'Neill J.A.: the death of a prospective defendant and the possibility of a shortened period to commence an action is a reality that claimants and their counsel have to guard against: Payne, at p. 94.

29 The Nova Scotia Court of Appeal decision in Burt v. LeLacheur (2000), 189 D.L.R. (4th) 193, is invoked by the respondent. However, the reasoning of that case cannot be applied in the case at bar. In Burt, the Court of Appeal held that the discoverability rule applied to s. 10 of the Fatal Injuries Act, R.S.N.S. 1989, c. 163. The Nova Scotia Court of Appeal stated its position in the following manner (at p. 208):

> If the discoverability rule applies to a limitation period running from "when the damages were sustained" (Peixeiro) and from "the final determination of the action against the insured" (Grenier), I think it is not unreasonable to apply it to the period one year after the death so as to start time running only when the claimant knows or ought to know that the death might be a wrongful one. This, having in mind the statutory scheme of the Fatal la possibilité de découvrir le dommage ne s'applique pas pour prolonger le délai fixé par le législateur. Je suis donc d'accord avec la Cour d'appel pour dire qu'en désignant un fait particulier comme élément déclencheur du « compte à rebours de la prescription », le législateur se trouvait à écarter la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage dans tous les cas où la Survival of Actions Act s'applique.

Un certain nombre de cours d'appel ont examiné la question de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage dans le contexte d'actions intentées par ou contre les successions de personnes décédées. Les appelants invoquent abondamment l'arrêt Payne c. Brady (1996), 140 D.L.R. (4th) 88 (C.A.T.-N.), autorisation de pourvoi refusée, [1997] 2 R.C.S. xiii. Bien que les faits de cet arrêt ressemblent énormément à ceux de la présente affaire, on ne sait pas clairement si la Cour d'appel de Terre-Neuve y a décidé que la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage ne s'appliquait pas parce que le décès est toujours une possibilité ou parce que l'appelante Payne avait eu amplement le temps d'intenter son action après avoir appris le décès de M. Brady. Ce qui est clair, c'est la remarque du juge O'Neill : le décès d'un éventuel défendeur et la possibilité d'un délai de prescription plus court sont des réalités contre lesquelles les demandeurs et leurs avocats doivent se prémunir (Payne, p. 94).

L'intimé invoque l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel de la Nouvelle-Écosse Burt c. LeLacheur (2000), 189 D.L.R. (4th) 193. Toutefois, le raisonnement adopté dans cette affaire ne peut pas s'appliquer en l'espèce. Dans l'arrêt Burt, la Cour d'appel a conclu que la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage s'appliquait à l'art. 10 de la Fatal Injuries Act, R.S.N.S. 1989, ch. 163. La Cour d'appel de la Nouvelle-Écosse a exposé son point de vue en ces termes (p. 208) :

> [TRADUCTION] Si la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage s'applique à un délai de prescription qui court à compter de la date « où les dommages ont été subis » (Peixeiro) et du « règlement final de l'action intentée contre l'assuré » (Grenier), je ne pense pas qu'il soit déraisonnable de l'appliquer à ce délai un an après le décès de sorte qu'il ne commence à courir qu'au moment où le demandeur prend connaissance ou aurait

BOA COMPEER001563

Injuries Act, is no greater a stretch of the language than was made by the courts in Peixeiro, Grenier and other cases, all for the purpose of preventing a potential injustice.

We must avoid the accusation of usurping the role of the Legislature, but in my opinion to apply the discoverability rule here is consistent with what has already been done before. On the true consideration of s. 10 of the Fatal Injuries Act, time does not run simply from a fixed event, but from constituent elements of the cause of action created by the statute. [Emphasis added.]

In Burt, the death of a person for which an action can be brought under the Fatal Injuries Act does not merely refer to the time of death as provided in the Survival of Actions Act, but to a "wrongful" death. It is not an event totally unrelated to the accrual of the cause of action. Hence, the death of the person there is in fact a "constituent elemen[t] of the cause of action", contrary to the present case.

In my view, the case that best assists this Court in the present matter is the one giving rise to the Ontario Court of Appeal's decision in Waschkowski v. Hopkinson Estate (2000), 47 O.R. (3d) 370. The court had to determine the possible application of the discoverability rule to s. 38(3) of the Trustee Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. T.23, the statutory provision in Ontario permitting an action in tort by or against the estate of a deceased person and limiting the period during which such actions may be commenced. Abella J.A., as she then was, concluded, at para. 16, that the discoverability rule did not apply to the section since the state of actual or attributed knowledge of an injured person in a tort claim is not germane when a death has occurred. She explained at paras. 8-9:

In s. 38(3) of the Trustee Act, the limitation period runs from a death. Unlike cases where the wording of the limitation period permits the time to run, for example, dû prendre connaissance du fait qu'il se pourrait que le décès ait été causé par la faute d'autrui. Compte tenu de l'économie de la Fatal Injuries Act, ce n'est pas aller plus loin que les tribunaux l'ont fait dans les arrêts Peixeiro, Grenier et autres, toujours dans le but d'écarter un risque d'injustice.

Bien qu'il nous faille éviter d'être accusés d'usurper le rôle du législateur, j'estime qu'appliquer la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage en l'espèce est compatible avec ce qui a déjà été fait. Un examen attentif de l'art. 10 de la Fatal Injuries Act révèle que le délai commence à courir non pas simplement à compter du moment où survient un fait déterminé, mais dès que sont établis les éléments constitutifs de la cause d'action créée par la loi. [Je souligne.]

30 Dans l'arrêt Burt, la mention du décès d'une personne qui peut faire l'objet d'une action fondée sur la Fatal Injuries Act renvoie non pas simplement au moment du décès, comme c'est le cas dans la Survival of Actions Act, mais à un décès « causé par la faute d'autrui ». Il ne s'agit pas d'un fait dépourvu de tout lien avec la naissance de la cause d'action. Par conséquent, le décès de la personne dans cette affaire est, en fait, un « élémen[t] constituti[f] de la cause d'action », contrairement à ce qui se passe en l'espèce.

31 À mon avis, l'affaire la plus utile à notre Cour en l'espèce est celle qui est à l'origine de l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario Waschkowski c. Hopkinson Estate (2000), 47 O.R. (3d) 370. La cour devait décider si la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage pouvait être appliquée au par. 38(3) de la Loi sur les fiduciaires, L.R.O. 1990, ch. T.23, la disposition législative ontarienne qui prévoit qu'une action délictuelle peut être intentée par ou contre la succession d'une personne décédée et qui limite le délai dans lequel ces actions peuvent être intentées. La juge Abella (maintenant juge de notre Cour) a conclu, au par. 16, que la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage ne s'appliquait pas à cette disposition puisque, dans une action délictuelle, l'état des connaissances d'une personne lésée ou celui qu'on lui attribue n'a aucune pertinence en cas de décès. Elle a expliqué ceci, aux par. 8-9 :

[TRADUCTION] Aux termes du par. 38(3) de la Loi sur les fiduciaires, le délai de prescription court à compter d'un décès. Contrairement aux affaires dans lesquelles from "when the damage was sustained" (Peixeiro) or when the cause of action arose (Kamloops), there is no temporal elasticity possible when the pivotal event is the date of a death. Regardless of when the injuries occurred or matured into an actionable wrong, s. 38(3) of the Trustee Act prevents their transformation into a legal claim unless that claim is brought within two years of the death of the wrongdoer or the person wronged.

BOA COMPEER001564

The underlying policy considerations of this clear time limit are not difficult to understand. The draconian legal impact of the common law was that death terminated any possible redress for negligent conduct. On the other hand, there was a benefit to disposing of estate matters with finality. The legislative compromise in s. 38 of the Trustee Act was to open a two-year window, making access to a remedy available for a limited time without creating indefinite fiscal vulnerability for an estate. [Emphasis added.]

See also Canadian Red Cross Society (Re), [2003] O.J. No. 5669 (QL) (C.A.), and Edwards v. Law Society of Upper Canada (No. 1) (2000), 48 O.R. (3d) 321 (C.A.).

32 Ryan's cause of action arose prior to Moore's death and Ryan was well aware of his cause of action both before Moore's death and before the expiration of the Survival of Actions Act limitation period. In fact, the day following the accident, Ryan retained a solicitor to pursue a claim for damages against Moore for injuries alleged to have resulted from the accident. At that point, Ryan could have sued Moore as all the elements of his cause of action were known. He did not need to have knowledge of the death in question to prove his claim or issue and serve the statement of claim. Moore's subsequent death had no impact whatsoever on the accrual of Ryan's cause of action. Consequently, I agree with the conclusion of the applications judge, at para. 50:

The fact of death is of no relevance to the cause of action in question. It is not an element of the cause of action and is not required to complete the cause of action. Whatever the nature of the cause of action, it is existing le délai de prescription peut, en raison de sa formulation, avoir pour point de départ, par exemple, la date « où les dommages ont été subis » (Peixeiro) ou le moment où la cause d'action a pris naissance (Kamloops), aucune élasticité temporelle n'est possible lorsque la date de décès est l'élément décisif. Peu importe le moment où le préjudice a été causé ou est devenu une faute ouvrant droit à une action, le par. 38(3) de la Loi sur les fiduciaires empêche qu'il donne lieu à une action en justice, à moins que cette action ne soit intentée dans les deux ans suivant le décès de l'auteur de la faute ou de la personne lésée.

Les considérations de politique générale qui sous-tendent ce délai précis ne sont pas difficiles à comprendre. L'effet juridique draconien de la common law était que le décès écartait toute possibilité de réparation pour une conduite négligente. Par contre, il était avantageux de régler les questions de succession de manière définitive. Le compromis législatif à l'art. 38 de la Loi sur les fiduciaires consistait à ouvrir une brèche de deux ans afin de donner accès à une réparation pendant un temps limité, sans placer indéfiniment une succession dans une situation de vulnérabilité financière. [Je souligne.]

Voir aussi Canadian Red Cross Society (Re), [2003] O.J. No. 5669 (QL) (C.A.), et Edwards c. Law Society of Upper Canada (No. 1) (2000), 48 O.R. (3d) 321 (C.A.).

La cause d'action de M. Ryan a pris naissance avant le décès de M. Moore, et M. Ryan était bien au fait de sa cause d'action tant avant le décès de M. Moore qu'avant l'expiration du délai de prescription fixé par la Survival of Actions Act. En réalité, M. Ryan a, le lendemain de l'accident, retenu les services d'un avocat en vue d'intenter une action en dommages-intérêts contre M. Moore pour des blessures qui auraient été causées par l'accident. M. Ryan aurait alors pu poursuivre M. Moore étant donné que tous les éléments de sa cause d'action étaient connus. Il n'avait pas besoin d'être au courant du décès en question pour établir le bien-fondé de sa demande ou pour déposer et signifier sa déclaration. Le décès subséquent de M. Moore n'avait absolument aucune incidence sur la naissance de la cause d'action de M. Ryan. En conséquence, je suis d'accord avec la conclusion du juge des requêtes, au par. 50 :

[TRADUCTION] Le décès en tant que tel n'a aucune pertinence en ce qui concerne la cause d'action en question. Il ne constitue pas un élément de la cause d'action et n'est pas nécessaire pour compléter la cause d'action.

and complete before the Survival of Actions Act operates, in the case of a death, to maintain it and provide a limited time window within which it must be pursued. The fact of the death is irrelevant to the cause of action and serves only to provide a time from which the time within which to bring the action is to be calculated.

A further reason for the non-application of the discoverability rule is the evident impact such a rule would have on the distribution of assets to the beneficiaries. Without a time limit, an executor or an administrator would not feel free to distribute the assets of an estate until all reasonable possibilities of claim had been addressed. This would be cumbersome and unrealistic. "An estate should not be held to ransom interminably by the advancement of claims which are not proceeded with in a timely manner": MacKenzie Estate v. MacKenzie (1992), 84 Man. R. (2d) 149 (Q.B.), at para. 18, cited in Justice v. Cairnie Estate (1993), 105 D.L.R. (4th) 501 (Man. C.A.), at p. 510.

The Survival of Actions Act is itself a legislative exception to a common law rule. Thus, it would displace the intention of the legislature to "stretch" the limitation period. Borrowing the words of Marshall J.A. in Snow, at para. 43, to apply the rule of construction of reasonable discoverability to such a provision would be tantamount to mounting a fiction transcending the limits of logical statutory interpretation. Hence, it would constitute an impermissible incursion into the legislative process.

(4) Special Circumstances

Ryan submits, as an alternative, that if the discoverability rule does not apply, the limitation period should be extended because of the "special circumstances" principle. He claims that, pursuant to this principle, fairness and justice require that an innocent plaintiff should not be deprived of compensation through no fault of his own. This argument was not invoked in front of the applications judge or the Court of Appeal, and is not supported by any evidence; under these circumstances, it is, in my view, without merit.

Quelle que soit la nature de la cause d'action, elle existe et est complète avant que la Survival of Actions Act s'applique, en cas de décès, pour la maintenir et fixer un délai limité dans lequel l'action devra être intentée. Le décès en tant que tel n'est pas pertinent en ce qui concerne la cause d'action et sert seulement de point de départ pour calculer le délai dans lequel l'action devra être intentée.

33 Une autre raison de ne pas appliquer la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage est l'incidence évidente que cette règle aurait sur la distribution de l'actif aux bénéficiaires. En l'absence d'un délai, un exécuteur ou un administrateur hésiterait à distribuer l'actif d'une succession avant d'avoir examiné toutes les possibilités raisonnables de réclamation, ce qui serait peu pratique et irréaliste. [TRADUCTION] « Une succession ne devrait pas être gardée indéfiniment en otage par des réclamations non traitées promptement » : MacKenzie Estate c. MacKenzie (1992), 84 Man. R. (2d) 149 (B.R.), par. 18, cité dans l'arrêt Justice c. Cairnie Estate (1993), 105 D.L.R. (4th) 501 (C.A. Man.), p. 510.

34 La Survival of Actions Act constitue en soi une exception législative à la règle de common law. « Prolonger » le délai de prescription aurait pour effet d'écarter l'intention du législateur. Comme l'a dit le juge Marshall dans l'arrêt Snow, au par. 43, appliquer à une telle disposition la règle d'interprétation de la possibilité raisonnable de découvrir le dommage reviendrait à créer une fiction qui transcenderait les limites de l'interprétation logique des lois. Du même coup, il s'agirait d'une incursion inacceptable dans le processus législatif.

(4) Circonstances spéciales

35 Subsidiairement, M. Ryan fait valoir que, si la règle de la possibilité de découvrir le dommage ne s'applique pas, le délai de prescription doit être prolongé en raison du principe des « circonstances spéciales ». Il soutient que selon ce principe, l'équité et la justice commandent qu'un demandeur innocent ne soit pas privé d'indemnisation s'il n'a lui-même commis aucune faute. Cet argument n'a été avancé ni devant le juge des requêtes ni devant la Cour d'appel, et ne repose sur aucun élément de preuve; dans ces circonstances, je le considère non fondé.

BOA COMPEER001566

B. Confirmation

36 Ryan claims that the confirmation of the cause of action pursued under s. 16 of the Limitations Act applies to extend the limitation period contained in s. 5 of the Survival of Actions Act. He argues that the correspondence exchanged between Cabot Insurance's adjuster and his previous counsel, the payment made by Cabot Insurance for his property damage claim, as well as a payment of $500 to his previous counsel for a medical report, prove acknowledgment (as contemplated by the Limitations Act) and therefore confirmation.

37 The appellants submit that s. 16 of the Limitations Act does not apply to the Survival of Actions Act. They claim that any confirmation of the cause of action would have no effect on the Survival of Actions Act limitation period because the Survival of Actions Act does not create a cause of action but simply confers a right to pursue a claim notwithstanding the fact that one of the parties has died. Finally, they argue that there was no confirmation of the cause of action in this case as there was no admission of liability through the letters nor the payments made.

38 I agree with the appellants' position as accepted by the Court of Appeal.

39 The relevant portions of s. 16 of the Limitations Act provide:

16. (1) A confirmation of a cause of action occurs where a person

(a) acknowledges that cause of action, right or title of another person; or

(b) makes a payment in respect of that cause of action, right or title of another.

(2) Where a person against whom an action lies confirms that cause of action, the time before the date of that confirmation shall not count when determining the limitation period for a person having the benefit of the confirmation against the person bound by that confirmation.

B. Confirmation

M. Ryan prétend que la confirmation de la cause d'action prévue à l'art. 16 de la Limitations Act s'applique pour prolonger le délai de prescription fixé à l'art. 5 de la Survival of Actions Act. Il fait valoir que l'échange de correspondance entre l'expert en sinistres de Cabot Insurance et son ancien avocat, le paiement effectué par Cabot Insurance relativement à sa demande d'indemnité pour préjudice matériel et le versement de 500 $ à son ancien avocat pour un rapport médical prouvent qu'il y a eu reconnaissance (comme le prévoit la Limitations Act) et donc confirmation.

Les appelants soutiennent que l'art. 16 de la Limitations Act ne s'applique pas à la Survival of Actions Act. Selon eux, une confirmation de la cause d'action n'aurait aucun effet sur le délai de prescription fixé par la Survival of Actions Act parce que cette loi ne crée pas une cause d'action, mais ne fait que conférer un droit d'intenter une action malgré le décès de l'une des parties. Enfin, ils affirment que la cause d'action n'a pas été confirmée en l'espèce étant donné que ni les lettres ni les paiements effectués ne traduisent une reconnaissance de responsabilité.

Je partage le point de vue des appelants, qui a été retenu par la Cour d'appel.

Voici les parties pertinentes de l'art. 16 de la Limitations Act :

[TRADUCTION]

16. (1) Une cause d'action est confirmée si, selon le cas, une personne :

a) reconnaît cette cause d'action, ce droit ou ce titre appartenant à autrui;

b) effectue un paiement à l'égard de cette cause d'action, de ce droit ou de ce titre appartenant à autrui.

(2) En cas de confirmation, la période antérieure à la date de la confirmation est exclue du calcul de la prescription de l'action de la personne qui bénéficie de cette confirmation par rapport à celle qui est liée par celle-ci.

BOA COMPEER001567

(3) Subsection (2) applies only to a right of action where the confirmation is given before the expiration of the limitation period for that right of action.

. . .

(5) In order to be effective a confirmation must be in writing and signed by

(a) the person against whom that cause of action lies; or

(b) his or her agent

and given to the person or agent of the person having the benefit of that cause of action.

When a person acknowledges the cause of action of another person or makes a payment in respect of that cause of action, a confirmation of that cause of action occurs. Consequently, the time accrued before the date of that confirmation shall not be considered when determining the limitation period (s. 16(2)). Confirmation must, of course, be made prior to the expiration of the limitation period (s. 16(3)).

Section 16 can only apply to a limitation period which limits the time during which an action may be taken. Since the limitation period which arises under the Survival of Actions Act supersedes the first limitation period of the Limitations Act, and does not create or revive an action, but merely permits it to continue, s. 16 cannot apply to it as found by the Court of Appeal (para. 67).

Even if this were not the case, the facts here do not support a finding of confirmation on the part of the appellants. I will address this issue briefly as a matter of principle.

In order to establish confirmation, one of two events must be proven: (1) that the party acknowledged the cause of action; or (2) that there was a payment made in respect of the cause of action (see Mew, at p. 115).

The term "acknowledges" as used in s. 16(1)(a) of the Limitations Act has been described by Lord Denning in Good v. Parry, [1963] 2 All E.R. 59 (C.A.), at p. 61, as requiring an "admission". While

(3) Le paragraphe (2) ne vise un droit d'action que si la confirmation a lieu avant l'expiration du délai de prescription applicable à ce droit d'action.

. . .

(5) La confirmation est valide si elle est consignée dans un écrit, signée par l'une des personnes suivantes et remise à la personne qui bénéficie de cette cause d'action ou à son mandataire :

a) soit la personne visée par la cause d'action,

b) soit son mandataire.

40 Il y a confirmation lorsqu'une personne reconnaît la cause d'action d'autrui ou effectue un paiement à l'égard de cette cause d'action. Par conséquent, la période antérieure à la date de cette confirmation est exclue du calcul du délai de prescription (par. 16(2)). La confirmation doit évidemment avoir lieu avant l'expiration du délai de prescription (par. 16(3)).

41 L'article 16 ne peut s'appliquer qu'au délai dans lequel une action peut être intentée. Comme l'a conclu la Cour d'appel, l'art. 16 ne peut pas s'appliquer au délai de prescription fixé par la Survival of Actions Act étant donné qu'il supplante le premier délai de prescription fixé par la Limitations Act et ne crée pas et ne relance pas une action, mais lui permet simplement de suivre son cours (par. 67).

42 Même si ce n'était pas le cas, les faits de la présente affaire ne permettent pas de conclure à une confirmation de la part des appelants. Je vais, par principe, examiner brièvement cette question.

43 Pour prouver qu'il y a eu confirmation, il est nécessaire d'établir l'existence de l'un des deux faits suivants : (1) la partie a reconnu la cause d'action, ou (2) un paiement a été effectué à l'égard de la cause d'action (voir Mew, p. 115).

44 Le terme « acknowledges » (« reconnaît ») utilisé à l'al. 16(1)a) de la Limitations Act a été décrit par lord Denning, dans l'arrêt Good c. Parry, [1963] 2 All E.R. 59 (C.A.), p. 61, comme nécessitant une care must be shown when applying English case law, as the English Limitation Act, 1939, 2 & 3 Geo. 6, c. 21, does not provide for the acknowledgment of the "cause of action" but the acknowledgment of the "claim", it is still persuasive authority for the present interpretation.

BOA COMPEER001568

45 Thus, a party can only be held to have acknowledged the claim if that party has in effect admitted his or her liability to pay that which the claimant seeks to recover (see Surrendra Overseas Ltd. v. Government of Sri Lanka, [1977] 2 All E.R. 481 (Q.B.)). As the British Columbia Court of Appeal concluded in Podovinikoff v. Montgomery (1984), 14 D.L.R. (4th) 716, at p. 721, a person can acknowledge as a bare fact that someone has asserted (by making a claim) a cause of action against him, without acknowledging any liability. Simple acknowledgment of the "existence" of a cause of action is insufficient to meet the requirements of s. 16(1)(a). Acknowledgment must involve acknowledgment of some liability.

46 Consequently, the letters from the adjuster to Ryan's counsel (i.e. letters of November 18, 1998 and January 25, 1999) do not restart the clock as they do not constitute an admission of liability on the part of Cabot Insurance. These were obviously only requests for information and part of the normal investigation process. As submitted by the appellants, if mere investigation of claims were to constitute confirmation, then potential defendants, in order to protect limitation defence, would have no choice but to refuse to investigate until a statement of claim is issued. This would destroy the possibility of early settlements and lead to increased litigation and costs.

47 The same conclusion applies to the second way that confirmation can occur, through payment. Of importance is the fact that both payments mentioned by Ryan, payments for Ryan's medical chart

« admission » (« admission »). Bien que la jurisprudence anglaise doive être appliquée avec prudence, étant donné qu'en Angleterre la Limitation Act, 1939, 2 & 3 Geo. 6, ch. 21, prévoit non pas la reconnaissance de la « cause d'action » mais la reconnaissance de la « demande d'indemnité », cette jurisprudence reste convaincante pour les besoins de l'interprétation en l'espèce.

Ainsi, il est possible de conclure qu'une partie a reconnu la demande d'indemnité seulement si elle a effectivement admis qu'elle était tenue de payer ce que le demandeur tente de recouvrer (voir Surrendra Overseas Ltd. c. Government of Sri Lanka, [1977] 2 All E.R. 481 (B.R.)). Comme l'a conclu la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique, dans l'arrêt Podovinikoff c. Montgomery (1984), 14 D.L.R. (4th) 716, p. 721, une personne peut simplement reconnaître que quelqu'un a fait valoir (en présentant une demande d'indemnité) une cause d'action contre elle sans reconnaître quelque responsabilité que ce soit. La simple reconnaissance de l'« existence » d'une cause d'action est insuffisante pour satisfaire aux exigences de l'al. 16(1)a). La reconnaissance doit comporter une admission de responsabilité quelconque.

Par conséquent, les lettres (du 18 novembre 1998 et du 25 janvier 1999) que l'expert en sinistres a envoyées à l'avocat de M. Ryan ne font pas recommencer le compte à rebours étant donné qu'elles ne constituent pas une reconnaissance de responsabilité de la part de Cabot Insurance. Il est évident que ces lettres n'étaient que des demandes de renseignements et faisaient partie du processus normal d'enquête. Comme l'ont prétendu les appelants, si le simple fait d'enquêter sur une demande devait constituer une confirmation, alors pour conserver le droit d'invoquer la prescription comme moyen de défense, les défendeurs éventuels n'auraient d'autre choix que de refuser d'enquêter jusqu'à ce qu'une déclaration soit déposée. Cela écarterait la possibilité d'un règlement rapide et entraînerait une augmentation de l'incidence et du coût des procès.

La même conclusion s'applique à la deuxième façon de confirmer, c'est-à-dire au moyen d'un paiement. Il importe de souligner que les deux paiements mentionnés par M. Ryan, à savoir ceux effectués pour and Dr. Landells' medical report, were not evidence of liability by Cabot Insurance; nor did they indemnify Ryan, at least in part, for damages caused by the accident. Thus, they cannot be payments in respect of the "cause of action". Ryan relies on the Newfoundland Court of Appeal decision in Wheaton v. Palmer (2001), 205 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 304, for the proposition that a payment made to a physician, but sent to the plaintiff's solicitor will constitute confirmation. With respect, I am of the view that the Court of Appeal erred in this determination. I prefer the contrary position of the British Columbia Court of Appeal in MacKay v. Lemley (1997), 44 B.C.L.R. (3d) 382, at para. 21. Payment for a medical report with a cheque payable to a physician, but sent to the plaintiff's solicitor, does not constitute confirmation of the plaintiff's cause of action:

BOA COMPEER001569

> The mere fact that the payment, although made payable to the doctor, was directed through the lawyer's office for forwarding does not, in my view, bring the payment into the express wording of the section. The payment here, as in Germyn, was intended to pay to the doctor. The doctor was not a person through whom the appellant could claim. This was not a reimbursement to anyone for having paid for the medical report but a direct payment to the doctor by [the Insurance Corporation of British Columbia].

The purpose for which these types of payments and correspondence are made is critical. In this case, they were not intended as admissions of liability, but only to promote investigation and early resolution of certain aspects of the claim.

C. Estoppel

Moore's estate and Cabot Insurance submit that the majority of the Court of Appeal erred when it concluded that they were estopped from relying on the fact of Moore's death and the granting of letters of administration, thus preventing them from arguing that Ryan's action was outside the Survival of Actions Act limitation period. They claim that neither estoppel by convention nor estoppel by le dossier médical de M. Ryan et le rapport médical du D[r] Landells, ne constituaient pas une preuve de responsabilité de la part de Cabot Insurance, et n'indemnisaient pas non plus M. Ryan, en partie du moins, pour le préjudice causé par l'accident. Ainsi, ils ne sauraient être des paiements à l'égard de la « cause d'action ». M. Ryan se fonde sur la décision rendue par la Cour d'appel de Terre-Neuve dans l'affaire Wheaton c. Palmer (2001), 205 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 304, pour affirmer qu'un paiement fait à un médecin, mais envoyé à l'avocat du demandeur, constitue une confirmation. En toute déférence, j'estime que cette décision de la Cour d'appel est erronée. Je préfère le point de vue contraire que la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a exprimé dans l'arrêt MacKay c. Lemley (1997), 44 B.C.L.R. (3d) 382, par. 21. Le paiement pour un rapport médical, effectué par chèque à l'ordre d'un médecin mais envoyé à l'avocat du demandeur, ne constitue pas une confirmation de la cause d'action du demandeur :

> [TRADUCTION] J'estime que le simple fait d'avoir transmis par le bureau de l'avocat le paiement destiné au médecin n'en fait pas un paiement au sens du libellé exprès de la disposition. Le paiement effectué en l'espèce était, comme dans l'affaire Germyn, destiné au médecin. Le médecin n'était pas une personne dont l'appelant pouvait se servir comme intermédiaire pour présenter une demande d'indemnité. Il s'agissait non pas d'un remboursement destiné à une personne ayant payé le rapport médical, mais d'un paiement direct fait au médecin par [l'Insurance Corporation of British Columbia].

48 Le but de ces types de paiement et de correspondance est crucial. En l'espèce, ils étaient censés non pas constituer une reconnaissance de responsabilité, mais seulement faire avancer l'enquête et favoriser le règlement rapide de certains aspects de la demande d'indemnité.

C. La préclusion

49 La succession de M. Moore et Cabot Insurance soutiennent que les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont eu tort de conclure qu'ils étaient préclus d'invoquer le décès en tant que tel de M. Moore et la délivrance des lettres d'administration, ce qui les empêchait de faire valoir que l'action de M. Ryan avait été intentée après l'expiration du délai de prescription fixé par la Survival of Actions Act. Elles representation applies to the facts of the present case. Ryan argues that the appellants are precluded or estopped from relying on the limitation period in the Survival of Actions Act because of the application of either of these two types of estoppel.

BOA COMPEER001570

50 While the principle of estoppel is often referred to in connection with cases of waiver, election, abandonment, acquiescence and laches, in the context of commercial and contractual relationships, the case law in Canada on this subject is not as abundant as that in the United Kingdom. It is therefore useful for this Court to address the issue in some detail, especially where it has long been accepted that estoppels are to be received with caution and applied with care (see Harper v. Cameron (1892), 2 B.C.R. 365 (Div. Ct.), at p. 383).

51 The state of the law of estoppel was articulated by Lord Denning in Amalgamated Investment & Property Co. (In Liquidation) v. Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd., [1982] 1 Q.B. 84 (C.A.), at p. 122, as follows:

> The doctrine of estoppel is one of the most flexible and useful in the armoury of the law. But it has become overloaded with cases. That is why I have not gone through them all in this judgment. It has evolved during the last 150 years in a sequence of separate developments: proprietary estoppel, estoppel by representation of fact, estoppel by acquiescence, and promissory estoppel. At the same time it has been sought to be limited by a series of maxims: estoppel is only a rule of evidence, estoppel cannot give rise to a cause of action, estoppel cannot do away with the need for consideration, and so forth. All these can now be seen to merge into one general principle shorn of limitations. When the parties to a transaction proceed on the basis of an underlying assumption — either of fact or of law — whether due to misrepresentation or mistake makes no difference — on which they have conducted the dealings between them — neither of them will be allowed to go back on that assumption when it would be unfair or unjust to allow him to do so. If one of them does seek to go back on it, the courts will give the other such remedy as the equity of the case demands.

prétendent que ni la préclusion par convention ni la préclusion par assertion de fait ne s'applique aux faits de la présente affaire. Selon M. Ryan, les appelants sont préclus d'invoquer le délai de prescription fixé par la Survival of Actions Act en raison de l'application de l'un ou l'autre de ces deux types de préclusion.

Bien que la règle de la préclusion soit souvent mentionnée à l'égard d'affaires de renonciation, d'exercice d'un choix, d'abandon, d'acquiescement et de manque de diligence dans le contexte de rapports commerciaux et contractuels, la jurisprudence canadienne sur ce sujet n'est pas aussi abondante que celle du Royaume-Uni. Il est donc utile que notre Cour procède à un examen assez approfondi de la question, d'autant plus qu'il est reconnu depuis longtemps que les préclusions doivent être admises avec prudence et appliquées avec soin (voir Harper c. Cameron (1892), 2 B.C.R. 365 (Div. Ct.), p. 383).

Dans l'arrêt Amalgamated Investment & Property Co. (In Liquidation) c. Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd., [1982] 1 Q.B. 84 (C.A.), p. 122, lord Denning a décrit ainsi l'état du droit en matière de préclusion :

> [TRADUCTION] La règle de la préclusion est l'une des plus souples et des plus utiles de l'arsenal du droit. Cependant, elle a été appliquée dans une multitude d'affaires. C'est pourquoi je ne les ai pas toutes examinées dans le présent jugement. Cette règle a connu, au cours des 150 dernières années, une évolution en plusieurs étapes : la préclusion propriétale, la préclusion par assertion de fait, la préclusion par acquiescement et la préclusion promissoire. On a par ailleurs cherché à en limiter la portée au moyen d'une série de maximes : la préclusion n'est qu'une règle de preuve, la préclusion ne peut pas donner naissance à une cause d'action, la préclusion n'élimine pas la nécessité de s'interroger, et ainsi de suite. On peut maintenant considérer que toutes ces maximes forment une seule règle générale dénuée de restriction. Lorsque les parties à une opération se fondent sur une présupposition sous-jacente — de fait ou de droit — peu importe qu'elle découle d'une affirmation inexacte ou d'une erreur — qui a guidé leurs rapports —, aucune d'elles ne peut revenir sur cette présupposition lorsqu'il serait inéquitable ou injuste de lui permettre de le faire. Si l'une des parties souhaite revenir sur la présupposition, les tribunaux accorderont à l'autre partie la réparation qui s'impose en equity.

BOA COMPEER001571

The jurisprudence discloses six types of estoppel: estoppel by representation of fact, proprietary estoppel, promissory estoppel, estoppel by convention, estoppel by deed and estoppel by negligence (see Bower, at pp. 3-9). I will examine here the ones at the centre of this dispute, estoppel by convention and estoppel by representation.

(1) Estoppel by Convention

(a) Definition and Principles

The origin of the doctrine of estoppel by convention can be traced to estoppel by deed for which sealing and delivery were essential, and for which the foundation of duty lay not in the agreement itself, or any reliance thereon, but in the formal solemnity of the deed, reflecting the concern of ancient jurisprudence with form as opposed to substance. The modern rule has evolved enormously (see Bower, at pp. 179-80; T. B. Dawson, "Estoppel and obligation: the modern role of estoppel by convention" (1989), 9 L.S. 16).

Bower defines the modern concept of estoppel by convention as follows (at p. 180):

> An estoppel by convention, it is submitted, is an estoppel by representation of fact, a promissory estoppel or a proprietary estoppel, in which the relevant proposition is established, not by representation or promise by one party to another, but by mutual, express or implicit, assent. This form of estoppel is founded, not on a representation made by a representor and believed by a representee, but on an agreed statement of facts or law, the truth of which has been assumed, by convention of the parties, as a basis of their relationship. When the parties have so acted in their relationship upon the agreed assumption that the given state of facts or law is to be accepted between them as true, that it would be unfair on one for the other to resile from the agreed assumption, then he will be entitled to relief against the other according to whether the estoppel is as to a matter of fact, or promissory, and/or proprietary.

52 Six types de préclusion se dégagent de la jurisprudence : la préclusion par assertion de fait, la préclusion propriétale, la préclusion promissoire, la préclusion par convention, la préclusion du fait d'un acte formaliste et la préclusion fondée sur la négligence (voir Bower, p. 3-9). J'examinerai ici celles qui sont au cœur du présent litige, soit la préclusion par convention et la préclusion par assertion de fait.

(1) Préclusion par convention

a) Définition et principes

53 Les origines de la règle de la préclusion par convention remontent à la préclusion du fait d'un acte formaliste, pour laquelle le cachetage et la remise étaient essentiels et où le fondement de l'obligation résidait non pas dans la convention elle-même, ou dans le fait de s'y fier, mais dans le caractère solennel et officiel de l'acte, ce qui traduisait l'intérêt de la jurisprudence ancienne pour la forme plutôt que pour le fond. La règle moderne a changé énormément (voir Bower, p. 179-180; T. B. Dawson, « Estoppel and obligation : the modern role of estoppel by convention » (1989), 9 L.S. 16).

54 Bower définit ainsi la notion moderne de préclusion par convention (p. 180) :

> [TRADUCTION] La préclusion par convention, soutient-on, est une préclusion par assertion de fait, une préclusion promissoire ou une préclusion propriétale où la proposition pertinente est établie non par voie d'assertion ou de promesse faite par une partie à une autre, mais par voie d'assentiment réciproque, exprès ou implicite. Cette forme de préclusion repose non pas sur une assertion faite par une personne et crue par celle à qui elle est destinée, mais sur un exposé conjoint des faits ou du droit dont la véracité est supposée constituer, par convention entre les parties, un fondement de leurs rapports. Lorsque, dans leurs rapports, les parties ont agi en fonction de la présupposition conventionnelle qu'elles devraient tenir pour véridique l'état de fait ou de droit en question, de sorte qu'il serait inéquitable pour l'une d'elles que l'autre revienne sur cette présupposition conventionnelle, alors cette partie aura un recours contre l'autre selon qu'il s'agit d'une préclusion relative à une question de fait, ou encore d'une préclusion promissoire ou propriétale, ou les deux à la fois.

BOA COMPEER001572

55 S. Wilken, Wilken and Villiers: The Law of Waiver, Variation and Estoppel (2nd ed. 2002), at p. 223, affirms that estoppel by convention will occur where:

> (i) the parties have established, by their construction of their agreement or a common apprehension as to its legal effect, a convention basis; (ii) on that basis the parties have regulated their subsequent dealings; (iii) one party would suffer detriment if the other were to be permitted to resile from that convention.

See also Chitty on Contracts (29th ed. 2004), vol. 1, at p. 283.

56 The Court of Appeal of Newfoundland and Labrador, after a review of the case law in the United Kingdom and in Canada, formulated the following four elements which need to be proven (at para. 79):

> (i) The evidence establishes an assumption in common between the parties as to a state of facts;
>
> (ii) The parties have adopted the common assumption as the conventional basis for a transaction into which they have entered;
>
> (iii) The dispute in respect of which the estoppel by convention is asserted arises out of that transaction; and,
>
> (iv) A detriment would flow to the party asserting the estoppel if the other party is permitted to resile from the assumed stated facts.

These requirements were accepted by the respondent.

57 The appellants submit that there are six requirements for the estoppel by convention. They cite as support the New Zealand Court of Appeal decision in National Westminster Finance NZ Ltd. v. National Bank of NZ Ltd., [1996] 1 N.Z.L.R. 548, at p. 550. In fact, they simply advocate a more detailed description of the requirements also found in other foreign cases.

58 The jurisprudence in the United Kingdom is indeed abundant in contrast to that in Canada (see,

Dans Wilken and Villiers : The Law of Waiver, Variation and Estoppel (2e éd. 2002), p. 223, S. Wilken affirme qu'il y a préclusion par convention lorsque :

> [TRADUCTION] (i) les parties ont, par leur interprétation de leur convention ou par leur compréhension commune de ses effets juridiques, établi un fondement conventionnel; (ii) les parties ont réglé leurs rapports subséquents sur ce fondement; (iii) une des parties subirait un préjudice s'il était permis à l'autre partie de revenir sur cette convention.

Voir également Chitty on Contracts (29e éd. 2004), vol. 1, p. 283.

Après avoir examiné la jurisprudence du Royaume-Uni et du Canada, la Cour d'appel de Terre-Neuve-et-Labrador a énoncé les quatre éléments suivants qui doivent être prouvés (par. 79) :

> [TRADUCTION]
>
> (i) la preuve établit l'existence d'une présupposition commune aux parties quant à un état de fait;
>
> (ii) les parties ont adopté la présupposition commune comme fondement conventionnel de l'opération qu'elles ont conclue;
>
> (iii) le litige à l'égard duquel la préclusion par convention est invoquée découle de cette opération;
>
> (iv) la partie qui invoque la préclusion subirait un préjudice s'il était permis à l'autre partie de revenir sur l'état de fait présupposé.

L'intimé a reconnu ces conditions.

Les appelants affirment que six conditions doivent être remplies pour qu'il y ait préclusion par convention. À l'appui de cette affirmation, ils citent l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel de la Nouvelle-Zélande National Westminster Finance NZ Ltd. c. National Bank of NZ Ltd., [1996] 1 N.Z.L.R. 548, p. 550. En fait, ils préconisent simplement une description plus détaillée des conditions qui sont également énoncées dans d'autres décisions étrangères.

La jurisprudence du Royaume-Uni est effectivement abondante comparativement à celle qui existe

BOA COMPEER001573

e.g., The "Indian Grace", [1998] 1 Lloyd's L.R. 1 (H.L.), at p. 10; The "August Leonhardt", [1985] 2 Lloyd's L.R. 28 (C.A.), at pp. 34-35; The "Vistafjord", [1988] 2 Lloyd's L.R. 343 (C.A.), at pp. 349-53).

This Court is not bound by any of the above analytical frameworks. After having reviewed the jurisprudence in the United Kingdom and Canada as well as academic comments on the subject, I am of the view that the following criteria form the basis of the doctrine of estoppel by convention:

(1) The parties' dealings must have been based on a shared assumption of fact or law: estoppel requires manifest representation by statement or conduct creating a mutual assumption. Nevertheless, estoppel can arise out of silence (impliedly).

(2) A party must have conducted itself, i.e. acted, in reliance on such shared assumption, its actions resulting in a change of its legal position.

(3) It must also be unjust or unfair to allow one of the parties to resile or depart from the common assumption. The party seeking to establish estoppel therefore has to prove that detriment will be suffered if the other party is allowed to resile from the assumption since there has been a change from the presumed position.

See Wilken, at pp. 227-28; Canacemal Investment Inc. v. PCI Realty Corp., [1999] B.C.J. No. 2029 (QL) (S.C.), at para. 35; Capro Investments Ltd. v. Tartan Development Corp., [1998] O.J. No. 1763 (QL) (Gen. Div.), at para. 31.

(b) Application of the Law

The majority of the Court of Appeal held that estoppel by convention applied in the circumstances of this case. It concluded that there was an assumption between the parties as to a state of facts, namely: that Moore was alive; that the parties adopted this assumption as the basis upon which au Canada (voir, par exemple, The « Indian Grace », [1998] 1 Lloyd's L.R. 1 (H.L.), p. 10; The « August Leonhardt », [1985] 2 Lloyd's L.R. 28 (C.A.), p. 34-35; The « Vistafjord », [1988] 2 Lloyd's L.R. 343 (C.A.), p. 349-353).

59 Notre Cour n'est liée par aucun des cadres analytiques susmentionnés. Après avoir examiné la jurisprudence du Royaume-Uni et du Canada ainsi que les commentaires de certains auteurs sur le sujet, j'estime que les critères suivants constituent le fondement de la règle de la préclusion par convention :

(1) Les rapports des parties doivent avoir reposé sur une présupposition de fait ou de droit commune : la préclusion exige qu'une assertion manifeste émanant d'une déclaration ou d'une conduite ait créé une présupposition commune. La préclusion peut néanmoins résulter (implicitement) d'un silence.

(2) Une partie doit avoir agi sur la foi de cette présupposition commune, et ses actes doivent avoir entraîné une modification de sa situation juridique.

(3) Il doit également être injuste ou inéquitable de permettre à l'une des parties de revenir sur la présupposition commune ou de s'en écarter. La partie qui cherche à établir la préclusion doit donc démontrer que, s'il est permis à l'autre partie de revenir sur la présupposition, elle subira un préjudice en raison du changement de la situation présupposée.

Voir Wilken, p. 227-228; Canacemal Investment Inc. c. PCI Realty Corp., [1999] B.C.J. No. 2029 (QL) (C.S.), par. 35; Capro Investments Ltd. c. Tartan Development Corp., [1998] O.J. No. 1763 (QL) (Div. gén.), par. 31.

b) Application du droit

60 La Cour d'appel, à la majorité, a décidé que la préclusion par convention s'appliquait en l'espèce. Elle a conclu que les parties avaient présupposé l'existence d'un état de fait, à savoir que M. Moore était vivant, que les parties avaient convenu d'agir sur la foi de cette présupposition dans leurs their transactions relating to Ryan's claim were to be conducted; that the dispute in respect of which the estoppel was asserted arose out of the transactions between the parties in dealing with Ryan's claim; and that detriment would flow to Ryan if Moore's estate or the insurer were permitted to resile from the common assumption. As will be evidenced from the analysis below, I cannot agree with this conclusion.

BOA COMPEER001574

(i) Assumption Shared and Communicated

61 The crucial requirement for estoppel by convention, which distinguishes it from the other types of estoppel, is that at the material time both parties must be of "a like mind" (Troop v. Gibson, [1986] 1 E.G.L.R. 1 (C.A.), at p. 5; Hillingdon London Borough v. ARC Ltd., [2000] E.W.J. No. 3278 (QL) (C.A.), at para. 49). The court must determine what state of affairs the parties have accepted, and decide whether there is sufficient certainty and clarity in the terms of the convention to give rise to any enforceable equity: Troop, at p. 6; see also Baird Textile Holdings Ltd. v. Marks & Spencer plc, [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 737, [2001] EWCA Civ 274, at para. 84.

62 While it may not be necessary that the assumption by the party raising estoppel be created or encouraged by the estopped party, it must be shared in the sense that each is aware of the assumption of the other (John v. George, [1995] E.W.J. No. 4375 (QL) (C.A.), at para. 37). Mutual assent is what distinguishes the estoppel by convention from other types of estoppel (Bower, at p. 184). The courts have described communications complying with this requirement as "crossing the line". In The "August Leonhardt", at pp. 34-35, Kerr L.J. held that

> [a]ll estoppels must involve some statement or conduct by the party alleged to be estopped on which the alleged representee was entitled to rely and did rely. In this sense all estoppels may be regarded as requiring some manifest representation which crosses the line between representor and representee, either by opérations relatives à la demande de M. Ryan, que le litige à l'égard duquel la préclusion était invoquée découlait des opérations que les parties avaient conclues en traitant la demande de M. Ryan, et que M. Ryan subirait un préjudice s'il était permis à la succession de M. Moore ou à l'assureur de revenir sur la présupposition commune. Comme le montrera l'analyse ci-dessous, je ne puis souscrire à cette conclusion.

(i) Présupposition commune et communiquée

La condition essentielle de la préclusion par convention, qui la distingue des autres types de préclusion, est que les deux parties soient, au moment pertinent, [TRADUCTION] « sur la même longueur d'onde » (Troop c. Gibson, [1986] 1 E.G.L.R. 1 (C.A.), p. 5; Hillingdon London Borough c. ARC Ltd., [2000] E.W.J. No. 3278 (QL) (C.A.), par. 49). La cour doit déterminer quel état de fait a été accepté par les parties, et décider si les conditions de la convention sont assez claires et dénuées d'ambiguïté pour donner naissance à un droit exécutoire en equity : Troop, p. 6; voir également Baird Textile Holdings Ltd. c. Marks & Spencer plc, [2002] 1 All E.R. (Comm) 737, [2001] EWCA Civ 274, par. 84.

Même s'il se peut qu'il ne soit pas nécessaire que la présupposition de la partie qui invoque la préclusion ait été créée ou encouragée par la partie précluse, elle doit être commune en ce sens que chacune des parties est au courant de la présupposition de l'autre (John c. George, [1995] E.W.J. No. 4375 (QL) (C.A.), par. 37). C'est l'assentiment réciproque qui distingue la préclusion par convention des autres types de préclusion (Bower, p. 184). Les tribunaux ont affirmé que les communications qui satisfont à cette exigence sont celles [TRADUCTION] « qui passent » de leur auteur à leur destinataire. Dans l'arrêt The « August Leonhardt », p. 34-35, le lord juge Kerr a conclu que statement or conduct. It may be an express statement or it may be implied from conduct, e.g. a failure by the alleged representor to react to something said or done by the alleged representee so as to imply a manifestation of assent which leads to an estoppel by silence or acquiescence. Similarly, in cases of so-called estoppels by convention, there must be some mutually manifest conduct by the parties which is based on a common but mistaken assumption. . . .

> [TRADUCTION] [t]oute préclusion doit comporter une déclaration ou une conduite de la partie qui serait précluse, à laquelle le prétendu destinataire de l'assertion était en droit de se fier et s'est effectivement fié. En ce sens, toute préclusion peut être considérée comme nécessitant une assertion manifeste émanant soit d'une

There cannot be any estoppel unless the alleged representor has said or done something, or failed to do something, with the result that — across the line between the parties — his action or inaction has produced some belief or expectation in the mind of the alleged representee, so that, depending on the circumstances, it would thereafter no longer be right to allow the alleged representor to resile by challenging the belief or expectation which he has engendered. To that extent at least, therefore, the alleged representor must be open to criticism. [Emphasis added.]

See also The "Vistafjord", at p. 350. Thus, it is not enough that each of the two parties acts on an assumption not communicated to the other (The "Indian Grace", at p. 10). Further, the estopped party must have, at the very least, communicated to the other that he or she is indeed sharing the other party's (ex hypothesi) mistaken assumption (John, at para. 81; Bower, at p. 184).

In the present case, the record discloses 14 letters exchanged by Ryan's counsel and the adjuster with respect to the respondent's personal injury claim (A.R., vol. II, at pp. 150-70). However, none of these prove the existence of a common assumption. The letters lack clarity and certainty. The mere fact that communications occurred between the parties does not establish that they both assumed that Moore was alive. It is unlikely the question of whether Moore was alive or dead crossed the minds of either the appellants or the respondent. The fact that Ryan's counsel had originally diarized the claim as having a two-year limitation period under the Limitations Act shows that he had not turned his mind to the possibility of a shorter limitation period under the Survival of déclaration soit d'une conduite, qui passe de son auteur à son destinataire. Cette assertion peut prendre la forme d'une déclaration expresse ou découler implicitement d'une conduite, comme l'omission du prétendu auteur de l'assertion de réagir à quelque chose qui a été dit ou fait par son prétendu destinataire, qui semble manifester un assentiment donnant lieu à une préclusion par silence ou acquiescement. De même, dans les soi-disant cas de préclusion par convention, les parties doivent adopter une conduite manifeste de part et d'autre qui est fondée sur une présupposition commune, mais erronée. . .

Il ne saurait y avoir de préclusion à moins que le prétendu auteur de l'assertion n'ait dit ou fait quelque chose, ou omis de faire quelque chose, de sorte que — de manière générale entre les parties — son action ou son inaction a fait naître une certaine croyance ou attente dans l'esprit du prétendu destinataire de l'assertion, qui fait que, selon les circonstances, il ne serait plus acceptable de permettre au prétendu auteur de l'assertion de revenir sur celle-ci en contestant la croyance ou l'attente qu'elle a engendrée. Par conséquent, le prétendu auteur de l'assertion doit, tout au moins dans cette mesure, prêter le flanc à la critique. [Je souligne.]

Voir également The « Vistafjord », p. 350. Il ne suffit donc pas que chacune des deux parties agisse sur la foi d'une présupposition non communiquée à l'autre (The « Indian Grace », p. 10). En outre, la partie précluse doit, à tout le moins, avoir informé l'autre partie qu'elle partageait effectivement sa présupposition erronée (ex hypothesi) (John, par. 81; Bower, p. 184).

63

En l'espèce, le dossier révèle que l'avocat de M. Ryan et l'expert en sinistres ont échangé 14 lettres relativement à l'action pour préjudice corporel de l'intimé (d.a., vol. II, p. 150-170). Cependant, aucune de ces lettres n'établit l'existence d'une présupposition commune. Les lettres manquent de clarté et de certitude. Le seul fait que des communications aient eu lieu entre les parties n'établit pas qu'elles ont toutes les deux présupposé que M. Moore était vivant. Il est peu probable que la question de savoir si M. Moore était vivant ou mort ait traversé l'esprit des appelants ou de l'intimé. Le fait que l'avocat de M. Ryan ait, au départ, inscrit dans son calendrier que l'action était assujettie à un délai de prescription de deux ans en vertu de la Limitations Act démontre qu'il n'avait pas songé à la possibilité qu'un délai de prescription plus court s'applique en vertu de la Survival of Actions Act. En réalité notre Cour se trouve en présence d'une ignorance de part et d'autre et non d'une présupposition commune.

BOA COMPEER001576

Actions Act. Effectively, this Court is in the presence of mutual ignorance, not mutual assumption.

64 Ryan submits, and it was agreed by the Court of Appeal, that the subject line in the letters exchanged between his counsel and the adjuster which read "Your Insured: Rex Moore" or "Our Insured: Rex Moore" is self-explanatory and indicates an assumption by both parties, that Moore was alive. I strongly disagree. This is an unrealistic interpretation of the subject line in the letters. Such an expression can mean one thing only: the named insured under the automobile insurance policy was Rex Moore. The words are a mere identification of the file the undersigned is dealing with. The Court of Appeal erred by giving weight to the subject line of these letters, which, properly interpreted, provide no evidence of a mutual assumption that Moore was alive.

M. Ryan prétend, ce dont la Cour d'appel a convenu, que l'objet des lettres échangées par son avocat et l'expert en sinistres, qui se lit [TRADUCTION] « Votre assuré : Rex Moore » ou « Notre assuré : Rex Moore », est éloquent et indique que les deux parties présupposaient que M. Moore était vivant. Je ne suis pas du tout d'accord. Il s'agit là d'une interprétation irréaliste de l'objet de ces lettres. Une telle mention ne peut signifier qu'une chose : la personne assurée en vertu de la police d'assurance automobile était Rex Moore. Ces mots ne servent qu'à identifier le dossier dont traite le signataire de la lettre. La Cour d'appel a commis une erreur en accordant de l'importance à la mention de l'objet de ces lettres qui, interprétée correctement, n'établit pas l'existence d'une présupposition commune que M. Moore était vivant.

65 Nor did the fact that the parties were conferring without regard to the limitation period establish a shared assumption that the limitation defence would not be relied on. The letters contain limited and simple requests for details of the claim, and do not establish a convention between the parties (see Hillingdon London Borough, at paras. 57 and 60; Seechurn v. ACE Insurance S.A.-N.V., [2002] 2 Lloyd's L.R. 390, [2002] EWCA Civ 67, at p. 396). In fact, the matter did not proceed beyond the preliminary stage of investigating the merits of the personal injury claim. There were no negotiations or settlement discussions, no admission of liability, and no agreement to forego a possible limitation defence.

Le fait que les parties se soient entretenues sans tenir compte du délai de prescription n'établissait pas non plus l'existence d'une présupposition commune que la prescription ne serait pas invoquée comme moyen de défense. Ces lettres renferment de simples demandes de détails concernant l'action et n'établissent pas l'existence d'une convention entre les parties (voir Hillingdon London Borough, par. 57 et 60; Seechurn c. ACE Insurance S.A.-N.V., [2002] 2 Lloyd's L.R. 390, [2002] EWCA Civ 67, p. 396). En fait, l'affaire n'a pas dépassé le stade préliminaire de l'enquête relative au bien-fondé de l'action pour préjudice corporel. Il n'y a eu aucune négociation ou discussion de conciliation, aucune reconnaissance de responsabilité ou entente de renonciation à la possibilité d'invoquer la prescription comme moyen de défense.

66 Even if one could conclude that there was a mutual assumption between the parties, I am of the view that it cannot realistically be asserted that the respondent communicated to the appellants that he indeed shared the mistaken assumption. In this regard, I agree with the dissenting members of the Court of Appeal when they affirm (at para. 108):

Même si on pouvait conclure à l'existence d'une présupposition commune des parties, j'estime qu'on ne saurait réalistement affirmer que l'intimé a informé les appelants qu'il partageait effectivement leur présupposition erronée. À cet égard, je suis du même avis que les juges dissidents de la Cour d'appel lorsqu'ils affirment (par. 108) :

BOA COMPEER001577

It is true that both parties assumed Mr. Moore was alive. That, as noted above, is not sufficient to establish estoppel by convention. Prior to Mr. Moore's death, any reference to him implying he was alive was a reflection of the truth at that time. That cannot be said to be a communication which becomes the basis of a convention that they will proceed on the assumption that Mr. Moore is alive, even beyond his death. There is no direct or circumstantial evidence which would lead to such a conclusion. The question becomes: could any agreement have arisen after Mr. Moore's death? The two letters written by the adjuster after Mr. Moore's death were in error when they said "Our insured – Rex Moore" but there is no communication to the other party and acceptance that they are to govern their future conduct on that basis.

[TRADUCTION] Il est vrai que les deux parties ont présupposé que M. Moore était vivant. Comme nous l'avons déjà souligné, cela n'est pas suffisant pour établir la préclusion par convention. Avant le décès de M. Moore, toute mention de son nom laissant entendre qu'il était vivant reflétait alors la réalité. On ne saurait dire que cela constitue une communication sur la foi de laquelle les parties ont convenu d'agir en présupposant que M. Moore serait vivant, même après son décès. Aucune preuve directe ou indirecte ne permet d'arriver à une telle conclusion. Il faut alors se demander si une convention aurait pu survenir après le décès de M. Moore. Les deux lettres écrites par l'expert en sinistres après le décès de M. Moore étaient erronées lorsqu'elles mentionnaient « Notre assuré – Rex Moore », mais aucune partie n'a informé l'autre partie ou accepté que cela déterminerait leur conduite future.

(ii) Detrimental Reliance

(ii) L'acte de confiance préjudiciable

The appellants submit that detrimental reliance is a requirement that must be proven in order to find convention estoppel. I agree. The Court of Appeal erred in finding this condition fulfilled by simple proof that a detriment would flow to the party asserting the estoppel if the other party were permitted to resile from the assumed stated facts, without a finding of reliance.

67 Selon les appelants, l'acte de confiance préjudiciable est une condition dont l'existence doit être prouvée pour que l'on puisse conclure à la préclusion par convention. Je suis d'accord. La Cour d'appel a eu tort de conclure que, pour que cette condition soit remplie, il suffisait de prouver que la partie invoquant la préclusion subirait un préjudice s'il était permis à l'autre partie de revenir sur l'état de fait présupposé, sans qu'il soit nécessaire de conclure à l'existence d'un acte de confiance.

The jurisprudence and academic comments support the requirement of detrimental reliance as lying at the heart of true estoppel (see Bower, at pp. 6 and 184; John, at para. 86; Hillingdon London Borough; The "August Leonhardt", at p. 35; Litwin Construction (1973) Ltd. v. Pan (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 459 (B.C.C.A.), at pp. 469-70; Canacemal, at paras. 33-35; Vancouver City Savings Credit Union v. Norenger Development (Canada) Inc., [2002] B.C.J. No. 1417 (QL), 2002 BCSC 934, at para. 74; 32262 B.C. Ltd. v. Companions Restaurant Inc. (1995), 17 B.L.R. (2d) 227 (B.C.S.C.), at pp. 235-36).

68 La jurisprudence et la doctrine confirment que la condition de l'acte de confiance préjudiciable est au cœur de la véritable préclusion (voir Bower, p. 6 et 184; John, par. 86; Hillingdon London Borough; The « August Leonhardt », p. 35; Litwin Construction (1973) Ltd. c. Pan (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 459 (C.A.C.-B.), p. 469-470; Canacemal, par. 33-35; Vancouver City Savings Credit Union c. Norenger Development (Canada) Inc., [2002] B.C.J. No. 1417 (QL), 2002 BCSC 934, par. 74; 32262 B.C. Ltd. c. Companions Restaurant Inc. (1995), 17 B.L.R. (2d) 227 (C.S.C.-B.), p. 235-236).

Detrimental reliance encompasses two distinct, but interrelated, concepts: reliance and detriment. The former requires a finding that the party seeking to establish the estoppel changed his or her course of conduct by acting or abstaining from acting in reliance upon the assumption, thereby altering his or her legal position. If the first step is met, the second requires a finding that, should the other party be allowed to abandon the assumption, detriment will be suffered by the estoppel raiser because of the change from his or her assumed position (see Wilken, at p. 228; Grundt v. Great Boulder Proprietary Gold Mines Ltd. (1937), 59 C.L.R. 641 (Austl. H.C.), at p. 674).

69 L'acte de confiance préjudiciable englobe deux notions distinctes, mais connexes : l'acte de confiance et le préjudice. La première notion exige de conclure que la partie qui cherche à établir la préclusion a modifié sa conduite en agissant ou en s'abstenant d'agir sur la foi de la présupposition, ce

BOA COMPEER001578

70 Returning to the case at bar, even if one were to assume the existence of a communicated common assumption between the parties, there is no evidence that the respondent relied on this assumption. The evidence suggests that the respondent never put his mind to the shorter Survival of Actions Act limitation period. First, Ryan's counsel diarized the matter as a two-year limitation period. Second, the issue of estoppel by convention was raised for the first time by the Court of Appeal itself and was never discussed before the applications judge. Moreover, in the affidavit of Ryan's counsel, nowhere does he state that he believed that the adjuster intended him to act or refrain from acting in reliance on any agreement (A.R., vol. II, at pp. 137-46). From the date of the accident, November 27, 1997, to the expiry of the Survival of Actions Act limitation period, August 16, 1999, there was never any discussion by the respondent of the limitation period. On October 24, 2000, when Ryan's counsel indicated for the first time to Cabot Insurance's claim examiner that there might be a problem with the limitation period, he did not refer to a mutual understanding that Moore was to be treated as being alive for the purposes of Ryan's claim, nor did he raise the existence of an agreement.

71 It was not open to Ryan's counsel to refrain from bringing an action against Rex Gilbert Moore based solely on the limited communications between counsel. The letters relied upon were limited to the collection of medical information and documentation about Ryan's alleged injuries — nothing more. I have already spoken about the subject line; one qui a eu pour effet de modifier sa situation juridique. Lorsque la première étape est franchie, la deuxième exige de conclure que, s'il est permis à l'autre partie de revenir sur la présupposition, la partie invoquant la préclusion subira un préjudice en raison du changement de sa situation présupposée (voir Wilken, p. 228; Grundt c. Great Boulder Proprietary Gold Mines Ltd. (1937), 59 C.L.R. 641 (H.C. Austr.), p. 674).

Pour revenir aux faits de la présente affaire, même si on présumait l'existence d'une présupposition commune communiquée entre les parties, rien ne prouve que l'intimé s'est fié à cette présupposition. La preuve indique que l'intimé n'a jamais songé au délai de prescription plus court prévu par la Survival of Actions Act. Premièrement, l'avocat de M. Ryan a inscrit dans son calendrier que l'affaire était assujettie à un délai de prescription de deux ans. Deuxièmement, la question de la préclusion par convention a été soulevée pour la première fois par la Cour d'appel elle-même et n'a jamais été débattue devant le juge des requêtes. En outre, dans son affidavit, l'avocat de M. Ryan ne mentionne nulle part qu'il croyait que l'expert en sinistres souhaitait qu'il agisse ou s'abstienne d'agir sur la foi d'une convention quelconque (d.a., vol. II, p. 137-146). Entre la date de l'accident, soit le 27 novembre 1997, et la date d'expiration du délai de prescription prévu par la Survival of Actions Act, soit le 16 août 1999, l'intimé n'a jamais discuté du délai de prescription. Lorsque, le 24 octobre 2000, l'avocat de M. Ryan a indiqué pour la première fois à la rédactrice sinistres de Cabot Insurance que le délai de prescription pourrait poser un problème, il n'a pas mentionné que les parties s'étaient entendues pour traiter M. Moore comme s'il était vivant pour les besoins de la demande de M. Ryan et n'a pas soulevé non plus l'existence d'une convention.

Il n'était pas loisible à l'avocat de M. Ryan de s'abstenir de poursuivre Rex Gilbert Moore en raison seulement des communications limitées qui ont eu lieu entre les avocats. Les lettres invoquées ne concernaient que le rassemblement de renseignements et de documents médicaux concernant les blessures qu'aurait subi M. Ryan, rien de plus. J'ai cannot disregard the fact that all negotiations/communications were also done on a "without prejudice" basis.

BOA COMPEER001579

Consequently, I agree with the dissenting members of the Court of Appeal that the respondent not only did not rely on this alleged assumption, but his conduct does not show an intention to affect the legal relations between the parties. The record does not disclose that the respondent changed in any way his position on the basis of this alleged mutual assumption.

(iii) Detriment

Once the party seeking to establish estoppel shows that he acted on a shared assumption, he must prove detriment. For the plea to succeed, it must be unjust or unfair to allow a party to resile from the common assumption (Wilken, at p. 228). It is often said that the fact that there will have been a change from the presumed legal position will facilitate the establishment of detriment: "This is because there is an element of injustice inherent within the concept of the shared assumption — one party has acted unjustly in allowing the belief or expectation to 'cross the line' and arise in the other's mind": Wilken, at p. 228.

This final requirement of estoppel has been described as proving that it would be "unjust", "unconscionable" or "unfair" to permit a party to resile from the mutual assumption (see, e.g., Bower, at p. 181; John; The "Indian Grace"; The "Vistafjord"). However, it may be preferable to refrain from using "unconscionable", in order to avoid confusion with this last concept which has developed a special meaning in relation to inequality of bargaining power in the law of contracts (where we speak of unconscionable transactions, for instance) (see Litwin Construction, at p. 468).

In the case at bar, given that there was no shared assumption or reliance, the detriment criterion does not need to be addressed. I would note, however, déjà parlé de la mention de l'objet; on ne peut faire abstraction du fait que toutes les négociations et communications ont également été effectuées sous réserve de tous droits.

72 Par conséquent, je suis d'accord avec les juges dissidents de la Cour d'appel pour dire que non seulement l'intimé ne s'est pas fié à la présupposition dont on allègue l'existence, mais encore sa conduite ne démontre aucune intention de modifier les rapports juridiques entre les parties. Le dossier ne montre pas que l'intimé a modifié de quelque façon que ce soit sa situation en raison de la présupposition commune dont on allègue l'existence.

(iii) Préjudice

73 Dès que la partie qui cherche à établir la préclusion démontre qu'elle a agi sur la foi d'une présupposition commune, elle doit prouver l'existence d'un préjudice. Pour que ce moyen soit retenu, il doit être injuste ou inéquitable de permettre à une partie de revenir sur la présupposition commune (Wilken, p. 228). On dit souvent que le fait qu'il y ait eu modification de la situation juridique présupposée facilite l'établissement de l'existence d'un préjudice : [TRADUCTION] « Cela est dû au fait que la notion de présupposition commune comporte forcément un élément d'injustice — une partie a agi de manière injuste en permettant que la croyance ou l'attente "passe" dans l'esprit de l'autre » : Wilken, p. 228.

74 On a dit que cette dernière condition de la préclusion prouve qu'il serait « injuste », « inique » ou « inéquitable » de permettre à une partie de revenir sur la présupposition commune (voir, par exemple, Bower, p. 181; John; The « Indian Grace »; The « Vistafjord »). Cependant, il peut être préférable de s'abstenir d'utiliser le mot « inique » afin d'éviter toute confusion avec cette dernière notion, qui a pris un sens particulier en ce qui concerne l'inégalité du pouvoir de négociation en droit des contrats (où l'on parle d'opérations iniques, par exemple) (voir Litwin Construction, p. 468).

75 En l'espèce, étant donné l'absence de présupposition commune ou d'acte de confiance, il n'est pas nécessaire d'examiner le critère du préjudice.

BOA COMPEER001580

that a detriment is not established by a reduced limitation period, as suggested by the respondent. Limitation periods and prescriptions, in the diverse areas of the law, have the similar effect and impact. The Survival of Actions Act has provided a benefit not available at common law; this benefit cannot legitimately be characterized as unfair and unjust.

(2) Estoppel by Representation

76 Where there is no shared assumption, as in the present case, there can be no estoppel by convention, no matter how unjust the other party's conduct may appear to be. However, in some circumstances, the party seeking to establish estoppel may be able to rely on estoppel by representation, an alternative here advocated by the respondent. The added difficulty in such a case is that an estoppel by representation cannot arise from silence unless a party is under a duty to speak. Silence or inaction will be considered a representation if a legal duty is owed by the representor to the representee to make a disclosure, or take steps, the omission of which is relied upon as creating an estoppel: see Wilken, at p. 227; Bower, at pp. 46-47.

77 Ryan submits that in the present case silence constituted a representation grounding estoppel because there was a duty to disclose relevant information as it would be unfair for the appellants to benefit from non-disclosure. I disagree. In the present case, there was no duty on the appellants, who were at the time only potential defendants, to advise Ryan of a limitation period, to assist him in the prosecution of the claim, or to advise him of the consequences of the death of one of the parties. There is no fiduciary or contractual relationship here (contrast with Queen v. Cognos Inc., [1993] 1 S.C.R. 87). The appellants had no duty to exercise reasonable care, nor to divulge any information.

Je tiens toutefois à souligner qu'un délai de prescription plus court n'est pas une preuve de préjudice, comme l'a laissé entendre l'intimé. Le délai de prescription et la prescription ont, dans les divers domaines du droit, un effet et une incidence similaires. La Survival of Actions Act procure un avantage que n'offre pas la common law; on ne saurait légitimement qualifier cet avantage d'inéquitable et injuste.

(2) Préclusion par assertion de fait

En l'absence de présupposition commune, comme c'est le cas en l'espèce, il ne peut y avoir de préclusion par convention, aussi injuste que puisse paraître la conduite de l'autre partie. Toutefois, dans certaines circonstances, la partie qui cherche à établir la préclusion peut être en mesure d'invoquer la préclusion par assertion de fait, une solution que l'intimé préconise en l'espèce. La difficulté additionnelle qui se pose dans un tel cas tient au fait que la préclusion par assertion de fait ne peut pas découler d'un silence, à moins qu'une partie ne soit tenue de parler. Le silence ou l'inaction seront considérés comme une assertion si l'auteur de l'assertion avait envers le destinataire de celle-ci une obligation légale de divulguer ou de prendre des mesures, et que l'omission de le faire est invoquée comme donnant lieu à la préclusion : voir Wilken, p. 227; Bower, p. 46-47.

M. Ryan prétend que, dans la présente affaire, le silence constituait une assertion justifiant la préclusion parce qu'il y avait une obligation de divulguer les renseignements pertinents due au fait qu'il serait inéquitable que les appelants profitent de l'absence de divulgation. Je ne suis pas d'accord. En l'espèce, les appelants, qui n'étaient à l'époque que des défendeurs éventuels, n'étaient pas tenus d'informer M. Ryan de l'existence d'un délai de prescription, de l'aider à intenter son action ou de l'aviser des conséquences du décès de l'une des parties. Il n'existe aucun rapport fiduciaire ou contractuel en l'espèce (contrairement à l'affaire Queen c. Cognos Inc., [1993] 1 R.C.S. 87). Les appelants n'étaient tenus ni de faire preuve de diligence raisonnable ni de divulguer quelque renseignement que ce soit.

BOA COMPEER001581

Hence, there was no representation, no duty to speak, no intention to affect legal relations and no reliance in this case.

III. Conclusion

The legislature created an exception to the common law rule by enacting the Survival of Actions Act. It extended the rights of the parties to permit them to continue an action against a deceased. The relevant provision modifies the common law. It is not this Court's role to interfere with the scheme established by the legislature.

There are no reasons based on estoppel, or any other legal doctrine, to preclude Moore's estate or Cabot Insurance from relying on the Survival of Actions Act limitation period. Accordingly, I would allow the appeal on the issue of estoppel, affirm the decision of the Court of Appeal on the other issues, and strike the statement of claim, with costs throughout, at all levels of court.

APPENDIX

Limitations Act, S.N.L. 1995, c. L-16.1

5. [Limitation period 2 years] Following the expiration of 2 years after the date on which the right to do so arose, a person shall not bring an action

(a) for damages in respect of injury to a person or property, including economic loss arising from the injury whether based on contract, tort or statutory duty;

. . .

16. [Confirmation] (1) A confirmation of a cause of action occurs where a person

(a) acknowledges that cause of action, right or title of another person; or

(b) makes a payment in respect of that cause of action, right or title of another.

78 Il n'y avait donc, en l'espèce, aucune assertion, aucune obligation de parler, aucune intention de modifier les rapports juridiques ni aucun acte de confiance.

III. Conclusion

79 Le législateur a créé une exception à la règle de common law en édictant la Survival of Actions Act. Il a élargi la portée des droits des parties afin de leur permettre de poursuivre une action contre une personne décédée. La disposition pertinente modifie la common law. Il n'appartient pas à notre Cour de modifier le régime établi par le législateur.

80 Il n'y a aucune raison fondée sur la préclusion ou quelque autre règle juridique d'empêcher la succession de M. Moore ou Cabot Insurance d'invoquer le délai de prescription fixé par la Survival of Actions Act. Par conséquent, je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi en ce qui concerne la question de la préclusion, de confirmer la décision de la Cour d'appel relativement aux autres questions et de radier la déclaration, avec dépens dans toutes les cours.

ANNEXE

Limitations Act, S.N.L. 1995, ch. L-16.1

[TRADUCTION]

5. [Délai de prescription de 2 ans] Les actions suivantes se prescrivent par deux ans suivant la date à laquelle a pris naissance le droit de les intenter :

a) l'action en dommages-intérêts pour préjudice corporel ou matériel, y compris la perte économique découlant du préjudice, que ce soit pour un délit, une inexécution de contrat ou un manquement à une obligation légale;

. . .

16. [Confirmation] (1) Une cause d'action est confirmée si, selon le cas, une personne :

a) reconnaît cette cause d'action, ce droit ou ce titre appartenant à autrui;

b) effectue un paiement à l'égard de cette cause d'action, de ce droit ou de ce titre appartenant à autrui.

BOA COMPEER001582

(2) Where a person against whom an action lies confirms that cause of action, the time before the date of that confirmation shall not count when determining the limitation period for a person having the benefit of the confirmation against the person bound by that confirmation.

(3) Subsection (2) applies only to a right of action where the confirmation is given before the expiration of the limitation period for that right of action.

. . .

(5) In order to be effective a confirmation must be in writing and signed by

(a) the person against whom that cause of action lies; or

(b) his or her agent

and given to the person or agent of the person having the benefit of that cause of action.

Survival of Actions Act, R.S.N.L. 1990, c. S-32

2. [Causes of action to survive] Actions and causes of action

(a) vested in a person who has died; or

(b) existing against a person who has died, shall survive for the benefit of or against his or her estate.

5. [Limitation of action] An action shall not be brought under this Act unless proceedings are started within 6 months after letters of probate or administration of the estate of the deceased have been granted and proceedings shall not be started in an action under this Act after the expiration of 1 year after the date of death of the deceased.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants: Cox Hanson O'Reilly Matheson, St. John's.

Solicitors for the respondent: Curtis, Dawe, St. John's.

(2) En cas de confirmation, la période antérieure à la date de la confirmation est exclue du calcul de la prescription de l'action de la personne qui bénéficie de cette confirmation par rapport à celle qui est liée par celle-ci.

(3) Le paragraphe (2) ne vise un droit d'action que si la confirmation a lieu avant l'expiration du délai de prescription applicable à ce droit d'action.

. . .

(5) La confirmation est valide si elle est consignée dans un écrit, signée par l'une des personnes suivantes et remise à la personne qui bénéficie de cette cause d'action ou à son mandataire :

a) soit la personne visée par la cause d'action,

b) soit son mandataire.

Survival of Actions Act, R.S.N.L. 1990, ch. S-32

[TRADUCTION]

2. [Survie des causes d'action] Les actions et causes d'action :

a) appartenant à une personne décédée survivent au profit de sa succession;

b) existant contre une personne décédée survivent contre sa succession.

5. [Prescription des actions] Aucune action ne peut être intentée en vertu de la présente loi à moins que les procédures ne soient engagées dans les six mois suivant la délivrance de lettres d'homologation ou d'administration de la succession de la personne décédée, et, pour les besoins d'une action fondée sur la présente loi, les procédures ne doivent pas être engagées après l'expiration d'un an suivant la date du décès de la personne en question.

Pourvoi accueilli avec dépens.

Procureurs des appelants : Cox Hanson O'Reilly Matheson, St. John's.

Procureurs de l'intimé : Curtis, Dawe, St. John's.

BOA COMPEER001583

In the Court of Appeal of Alberta

Citation: Agrium v Orbis Engineering Field Services, 2022 ABCA 266

Date: 20220808
Docket: 2101-0020AC
Registry: Calgary

Between:

Agrium, Inc.

Appellant

- and -

Orbis Engineering Field Services Ltd., Elliott Turbomachinery Canada Inc. and Elliott Company

Respondents

- and -

Colt Engineering Corporation, Worleyparsons Canada Services Ltd., ACM Automation Inc., Invensys Systems Canada, Inc., Schneider Electric Systems Canada Inc., Rockwell Automation, Inc. and Allen-Bradley

Not Parties to the Appeal

Corrected judgment: A corrigendum was issued on August 11, 2022; the corrections have been made to the text and the corrigendum is appended to this judgment.

The Court:

The Honourable Justice Thomas W. Wakeling
The Honourable Justice Michelle Crighton
The Honourable Justice Bernette Ho

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

Memorandum of Judgment of the Honourable Justice Crighton and the Honourable Justice Ho

Dissenting Memorandum of Judgment of the Honourable Justice Wakeling

Appeal from the Order by
The Honourable Justice N. Dilts
Pronounced the 22nd day of December, 2020
Filed the 6th day of May, 2021
(2020 ABQB 807; Docket: 1601-03869)

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

Memorandum of Judgment

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

The Majority:

I. Background

[1] The appellant Agrium, Inc. (Agrium) contracted with the respondent Orbis Engineering Field Services Ltd. (Orbis) and the respondents Elliott Turbomachinery Canada Inc. and Elliott Company (collectively Elliott) to provide specified work and services that are not germane to this appeal.

[2] What is significant to this appeal is the provision in the contract (the Agrium Contract) relating to the resolution of disputes:

> 28. PROPER LAW and DISPUTE RESOLUTION:
>
> (a) Unless otherwise stated on the face of [the Agrium Contract], [the Agrium Contract] shall for all purposes be construed and interpreted according to the laws of the Province of Alberta and the federal laws of Canada applicable therein, excluding reference to conflict of laws principles. Neither the Uniform Commercial Code, nor the United Nations Convention for the International Sale of Goods shall apply to [the Agrium Contract]. Any dispute relating to [the Agrium Contract] shall be resolved by arbitration in Calgary, Alberta, Canada, pursuant to the UNCITRAL Model Law and Rules. The courts having exclusive supervisory jurisdiction with respect to the matters relating to [the Agrium Contract] shall be the courts of the Province of Alberta.

[3] A dispute arose and rather than proceed to arbitration, Agrium commenced a civil action against Orbis and Elliott only days before the limitation period expired. Thereafter, Agrium served Orbis and Elliott mere days before the time for service would have lapsed. At no time between the loss and service of the statement of claim were Orbis or Elliott aware of the loss.

[4] By the time the civil claim was served on Orbis and Elliott, the time limit for commencing an arbitration proceeding had long expired.

[5] Orbis and Elliott defended the statement of claim alleging among other general defences that the contractual arbitration provision barred the action.

[6] Two years later, Orbis and Elliott applied to the master in chambers to strike the action against them.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[7] The master dismissed the Orbis and Elliott applications. The master recognized that undue delay could not ground a stay under the Arbitration Act, RSA 2000, c A-43, after the time for arbitration had elapsed, but instead relied on his supervisory jurisdiction to stay the action on grounds of waiver and attornment on the part of Orbis and Elliott.

[8] Orbis and Elliott appealed to a justice of the Court of Queen's Bench and Agrium applied to strike both appeals on the grounds that s 7(6) of the Arbitration Act barred appeals from the master's decision.

[9] The justice in chambers heard the Orbis and Elliott appeals together with Agrium's application to strike the appeals. She first dismissed Agrium's application to strike the appeals from the master: 2020 ABQB 807 at paras 21-31. Having made that determination, she then allowed Orbis and Elliott's appeals from the master, resulting in Agrium's civil action against them being struck: at paras 44-57.

[10] Largely for the reasons given by the chambers judge, we dismiss Agrium's appeal.

II. Issue on Appeal and Standard of Review

[11] As follows, two issues arise in this appeal:

1. whether the masters' decision refusing to stay the action is a decision under s 7 of the Arbitration Act; and

2. whether s 7(6) of the Arbitration Act bars an appeal from the master in chambers to a justice of the Court of Queen's Bench.

[12] The parties agree the chambers judge did not decide the first question. In the hearing before the panel, Orbis took no position on whether this Court should remit the question or decide it. Agrium and Elliott both agreed that if the panel accepts Agrium's argument that s 7(6) bars an appeal from the master to a justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, this Court should nevertheless remit the first question to the court below for determination. Accordingly, if the panel decides that s 7(6) of the Arbitration Act bars an appeal from the master to a justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, then the matter must be remitted to the Court of Queen's Bench to determine whether the master's decision is a decision under s 7(1) of the Arbitration Act.

[13] If the panel decides that s 7(6) does not bar an appeal from the master to a justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, Agrium does not appeal the chambers judge's findings on the merits and the appeal must be dismissed.

[14] It is important to recognize that the parties do not dispute there is a valid mandatory arbitration provision in the Agrium Contract that binds the parties. There is no issue relative to the arbitrability of the dispute and the parties do not dispute that the time for commencing arbitration proceedings has expired.

[15] There is no disagreement regarding the standard of review. The issue on appeal is a question of law that engages principles of statutory interpretation to which the standard of correctness applies: TELUS Communications Inc. v Wellman, 2019 SCC 19 at para 30, [2019] 2 SCR 144.

III. Analysis

[16] The chambers judge identified the applicable principles of statutory interpretation and considered the ordinary meaning of the words used in s 7(6) of the Arbitration Act within the legislative framework governing appeals from a master. That framework includes the Court of Queen's Bench Act, RSA 2000, c C-31, the Interpretation Act, RSA 2000, c I-8, and the Alberta Rules of Court, Alta Reg 124/2010.

[17] Section 7 of the Arbitration Act reads as follows:

> (1) If a party to an arbitration agreement commences a proceeding in a court in respect of a matter in dispute to be submitted to arbitration under the agreement, the court shall, on the application of another party to the arbitration agreement, stay the proceeding.
>
> (2) The court may refuse to stay the proceeding in only the following cases:
>
> > (a) a party entered into the arbitration agreement while under a legal incapacity;
> >
> > (b) the arbitration agreement is invalid;
> >
> > (c) the subject-matter of the dispute is not capable of being the subject of arbitration under Alberta law;
> >
> > (d) the application to stay the proceeding was brought with undue delay;
> >
> > (e) the matter in dispute is a proper one for default or summary judgment.
>
> (3) An arbitration of the matter in dispute may be commenced or continued while the application is before the court.
>
> (4) If the court refuses to stay the proceeding,
>
> > (a) no arbitration of the matter in dispute shall be commenced, and

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

> (b) an arbitration that has been commenced shall not be continued, and anything done in connection with the arbitration before the court's refusal is without effect.
>
> (5) The court may stay the proceeding with respect to the matters in dispute dealt with in the arbitration agreement and allow the proceeding to continue with respect to other matters if it finds that
>
> (a) the agreement deals with only some of the matters in dispute in respect of which the proceeding was commenced, and
>
> (b) it is reasonable to separate the matters in dispute dealt with in the agreement from the other matters.
>
> (6) There is no appeal from the court's decision under this section.

[18] Section 1(1)(c) of the Arbitration Act defines "court" as follows:

> "court" means,
>
> (i) in sections 6 and 7, the Court of Queen's Bench and the Provincial Court, and
>
> (ii) in all other sections, the Court of Queen's Bench.

[19] Section 28(1)(k) of the Interpretation Act defines the "Court of Queen's Bench" as the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta.

[20] Section 2 of the Interpretation Act states that the Interpretation Act applies "to every enactment whether enacted before or after the commencement of this Act."

[21] Section 12 of the Court of Queen's Bench Act states that "[a]n appeal lies to a judge in chambers from a decision of a master in chambers."

[22] Rule 6.14 of the Rules of Court states the following:

> Appeal from master's judgment or order
>
> (1) If a master makes a judgment or order, the applicant or respondent to the application may appeal the judgment or order to a judge.

[23] The chambers judge concluded the Court of Queen's Bench Act and the Arbitration Act were not in conflict, but rather could be interpreted in a manner that made one harmonious with the other without straining the language used in either. We agree with her analysis.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[24] While there are many recognized principles of statutory interpretation, the context will define the principle or principles that are the most relevant.

[25] We agree with Agrium that the words of the statute are "to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament." Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), [1998] 1 SCR 27 at para 21, 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC).

[26] We also agree that courts should resist interpreting a statute in a way that overwhelms the statute's plain language: Re: Sound v Motion Picture Theatre Associations of Canada, 2012 SCC 38 at para 33, [2012] 2 SCR 376.

[27] As this case involves numerous pieces of legislation, it is also important to keep in mind the principles for harmonizing different statutes. In R v Ulybel Enterprises Ltd, 2001 SCC 56 at para 30, [2001] 2 SCR 867, the Supreme Court of Canada adopted Professor Sullivan's statement of those principles:

> …The presumptions of coherence and consistency apply not only to Acts dealing with the same subject but also, albeit with lesser force, to the entire body of statute law produced by a legislature. …Therefore, other things being equal, interpretations that minimize the possibility of conflict or incoherence among different enactments are preferred.

[28] It is also an important principle of statutory interpretation that conflict avoidance strategies such as the "specific overrides the general" or "reading legislation down in certain circumstances and liberally in others", should be avoided where no genuine conflict exists: see the discussion in Ruth Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes, 6th ed, (Markham, Ont: LexisNexis Canada Inc, 2014) at chapter 11. Here, Agrium's attempt to ignore the statutory right of appeal that exists between the two levels of decision making within the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta manufactures a conflict that does not necessarily exist.

[29] In the context of statutory interpretation, conflict is a narrow concept meaning the two acts under review cannot stand together and cannot both operate without interfering with the other. The Court in Toronto Railway Co. v Paget, (1909) 42 SCR 488 at 499, 1909 CanLII 10 (SCC) said this:

> It is not enough to exclude the application of the general Act that it deals somewhat differently with the same subject matter. It is not "inconsistent" unless the two provisions cannot stand together.

[30] It is also a recognized principle of statutory interpretation that legislation is presumed to have been enacted in compliance with the Constitution: Sullivan, at § 16.3. For over a hundred years, Alberta courts have characterized any deference to the decisions of provincially-appointed masters as fettering the discretionary jurisdiction of federally-appointed s 96 judges. As a result, the decision of a master in Alberta has always been subject to review by a s 96 judge, who has always heard the appeal on a de novo basis. See for example, the discussions in Polson Iron Works v Munns, (1915) 9 WWR 231, 1915 CanLII 340 (AB QB), Menduk v Gore Mutual Insurance Company, (1969) 67 WWR 573, 1969 CanLII 1069 (AB QB), Wright v Disposal Services Ltd., 8 AR 394, 1977 CanLII 619 (AB QB) at para 13, Willman v Coreman, 1979 ABCA 332 at para 20, 11 Alta LR (2d) 110 and Van Camp v Chrome Horse Motorcycle Inc., 2012 ABQB 175 at paras 15-31, 535 AR 271. At paragraph 29 in Van Camp the court states:

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

> … A rule of law based on the constitutional foundations of the respective jurisdictions of a Judge and a Master is not subject to change through an amendment to the Rules of Court.

To that we add that neither is that same rule of law subject to change through an implied amendment to a provincial statute.

[31] For these reasons, and those of the chambers judge, we decline to follow the reasoning in the Ontario decision of Wang v Mattamy Corporation, 2020 ONSC 7012, [2020] OJ No 5004. The courts in Ontario have not seen s 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 as prohibiting the province from appointing an officer of the court (a master) who may exercise some judicial functions. Thus, Ontario is more willing to give greater deference to a master's decisions, which includes permitting them to be the final word on certain types of decisions.

[32] Even if s 12 of the Court of Queen's Bench Act, which confers a right of appeal from a master to a justice of the same court, conflicts with the statutory prohibition in s 7(6) of the Arbitration Act as Agrium argues, we do not agree that the Arbitration Act is the more specific provision that would override the right of appeal in the Court of Queen's Bench Act. Rather, the provision that specifically addresses the right of appeal is that in the Court of Queen's Bench Act.

[33] We agree with the chambers judge that the two acts can be interpreted harmoniously without derogating from the rights conferred by one or the purpose intended by the other. An appeal is not available under s 7(6) of the Arbitration Act beyond the Court of Queen's Bench where the court's decision means the decision of a master that was either not appealed or the time for doing so has expired, or the decision of a justice of the Court of Queen's Bench having decided the issue. This interpretation respects the constitutional limitations on the master's decision, the statutory right of appeal in the Court of Queen's Bench Act, and the statutory intention that arbitration matters not become bogged down in multiple levels of appeal reflected in the Arbitration Act.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[34] For all of the above reasons, the appeal is dismissed and we find it unnecessary to consider the first issue.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

Appeal heard on June 15, 2022

Memorandum filed at Calgary, Alberta
this 8th day of August, 2022

Crighton J.A.

Ho J.A.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

Wakeling, J.A. (dissenting):

I. Introduction

[35] This is an important statutory interpretation and constitutional case.

[36] Agrium, Inc. appeals orders[1] of Justice Dilts dismissing applications by Agrium to strike appeals by Orbis Engineering Field Services Ltd., Elliott Turbomachinery Canada Inc. and Elliott Company, on the ground that the appeals are prohibited by section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act.[2] The appeal judge allowed the appeals and struck Agrium's actions against the respondents.

[37] I would allow the appeal.

II. Questions Presented

[38] Each of Orbis Engineering and the Elliott companies applied to the presiding master in chambers for an order striking or staying the actions Agrium commenced against them.[3] They invoked[4] section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act.[5] Master Prowse, after finding that Agrium, Orbis Engineering and the Elliott companies were bound by a mandatory arbitration agreement, dismissed their applications.[6] He held that he had "the discretion to allow Agrium's action to continue in the face of the mandatory arbitration provisions in the contracts between the parties".[7]

[39] Master Prowse did not apply section 7(2) of the Arbitration Act[8] – the provision that directs an adjudicator to grant a stay unless one of five criteria applies – because the time for arbitration had elapsed.[9]

---

[1] Appeal Records 71 & 73.

[2] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43.

[3] Appeal Records 40 & 43.

[4] The recital of the order pronounced on January 20, 2020 and filed January 31, 2020 contained this passage: "Upon the application of the Defendant Orbis Engineering Field Services Ltd. … to stay or strike the Action against it under section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act …; And upon the application of the Defendants Elliott Turbomachinery Canada Inc. and Elliott Company … to stay or strike the Action against each of them under section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act … ." Appeal Record 57 (emphasis added).

[5] Id.

[6] Agrium, Inc. v. Colt Engineering Corp., 2020 ABQB 53, ¶¶ 12 & 13.

[7] Id. (heading).

[8] R.S.A. 2000, c. 43.

[9] Id. ¶ 27.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[40] Section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act states that "[t]here is no appeal from the court's decision under this section". Section 1(1)(c) of the Arbitration Act defines "court" as follows: "in sections 6 and 7, the Court of Queen's Bench and the Provincial Court".

[41] Is a decision of a master in chambers a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench?

[42] If so, was the order of Master Prowse pronounced on January 20, 2020 and filed January 31, 2020[10] a decision under section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act? What are the benchmarks of a "decision under this section"?

[43] If the order of Master Prowse was a "decision under this section", does section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act apply and a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench has no jurisdiction to hear an appeal against Master Prowse's order?

[44] What is the effect of section 12 of the Court of Queen's Bench Act?[11] Section 12 states that "[a]n appeal lies to a judge in chambers from a decision of a master in chambers".

[45] Does section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act trump section 12 of the Court of Queen's Bench Act and preclude an appeal of Master Prowse's order under section 7(1) to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench?

[46] The respondents argue that section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867[12] – "The Governor General shall appoint the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts in each Province, except those of the Courts of Probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick" – deprives the Legislative Assembly of Alberta of the authority to make an order of a master in chambers under section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act final and not subject to appellate review by the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta – a superior court.

[47] Section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 preserves the integrity of superior courts and allows them to act as the guardians of the rule of law.

[48] Does section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 assist the respondents?

[49] If the Court of Queen's Bench had jurisdiction to hear an appeal against Master Prowse's order, did Justice Dilts make any reversible errors?

---

[10] Appeal Record 57.

[11] R.S.A. 2000, c. C-31.

[12] 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3 (U.K.).

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

III. Brief Answers

[50] The decision of a master in chambers is a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta. Master Prowse's decision is a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench.

[51] There are four benchmarks of a "decision under this section". First, there must be an application under section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act.[13] Second, the moving and nonmoving parties must have agreed to submit their differences to arbitration. Third, the nonmoving party has commenced a court action against the moving party. Fourth, a judge or a master in chambers of the Court of Queen's Bench or a judge of The Provincial Court of Alberta must issue a decision – stay the action or dismiss the stay application.

[52] Master Prowse's order was a decision under section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act. The order's recital acknowledges that the applicants invoked section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act.[14] This is not debatable. And Master Prowse concluded that the parties were bound by an agreement to submit their disputes to arbitration. This is not debatable. He posed this question:[15] "Do I have the discretion to allow Agrium's action to continue in the face of the mandatory arbitration provisions in the contracts between the parties?" There was no doubt that Agrium had commenced actions against the moving parties and that Master Prowse dismissed their stay applications.

[53] Section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act is in play. Section 7(6) deprives a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench of his or her jurisdiction to hear an appeal from an order of a master in chambers under section 7(1). This is crystal clear. "No appeal" means "no appeal".

[54] Section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 does not assist the respondents. This is so even if section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867[16] precludes Alberta from adopting a legislative regime that makes a master in chambers' section 7(1) decision final.

[55] There are two reasons.

[56] First, section 40(1) of the Supreme Court Act[17] allows the party that is dissatisfied with the section 7(1) decision to apply for permission to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. This means that a master in chambers' section 7(1) decision is not final and unreviewable. The Supreme Court of Canada is a superior court. Alberta does not have the constitutional authority to regulate

---

[13] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43.

[14] Appeal Record 57.

[15] Agrium, Inc. v. Colt Engineering Corp., 2020 ABQB 53, ¶¶ 5, 12 & 13 (heading).

[16] 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3 (U.K.).

[17] R.S.C. 1985, c. S-26.

the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada – deny the Supreme Court the jurisdiction to hear leave to appeal applications arising from section 7(1) orders.

[57] Second, a good argument may be made that a party adversely affected by a section 7(1) order may apply to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta – a superior court – for judicial review. Section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act does not preclude judicial review of a section 7(1) order.

[58] It follows that Justice Dilts had no jurisdiction to hear the appeals of Orbis Engineering and the Elliott companies and that her decision is of no effect.

[59] I would allow the appeal – Justice Dilts' order is set aside with the result that Master Prowse's order is in effect.

IV. Statement of Facts

A. Agrium Commenced a Claim Against Orbis Engineering and Others

[60] In 2013 Agrium engaged Orbis Engineering and the Elliott companies to provide services in relation to upgrading its production plant in Carseland, Alberta.[18] The purchase orders that Agrium provided to Orbis Engineering and the Elliott companies included an arbitration clause among its terms and conditions.[19]

[61] On March 22, 2014 there was a system failure at the production plant.[20]

[62] On March 18, 2016 Agrium commenced, in the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta, a claim against Orbis Engineering, the Elliott companies and seven other corporations that had been

---

[18] Statement of Claim filed March 18, 2016, ¶¶ 28-30, 58, 67 & 72. Appeal Record 7, 11, 14 & 15.

[19] Affidavit of Gabriel Salcedo (In Response to the Summary Dismissal Application of the Defendant, Orbis Engineering Field Services Ltd) filed November 1, 2019, ¶¶ 6, 8 & 10 & Exhibit C, Agrium Services Purchase Order dated June 17, 2013, Canadian Standard Purchasing Terms and Conditions ("28. PROPER LAW AND DISPUTE RESOLUTION (a) ... Any dispute relating to this Order shall be resolved by arbitration in Calgary, Alberta, Canada, pursuant to the UNCITRAL Model Law and Rules. The courts having exclusive supervisory jurisdiction with respect to the matters relating to this Order shall be the courts of the Province of Alberta. (b) Buyer [Agrium] shall include provisions within its other agreements which relate to this Order a dispute resolution provision substantially similar to that which is contained herein. Vendor [Orbis Engineering] shall participate, upon the request of Buyer, in any arbitration arising in connection with the Goods, the Services or this Order, as if the Vendor were a direct party to the issue in dispute"). Appellant's Extracts of Key Evidence 8 & 23 & Affidavit of Gabriel Salcedo (In Response to the Summary Dismissal Application of the Defendants, Elliott Turbomachinery Canada Inc. and Elliott Company) filed November 1, 2019, ¶ 6. Appellant's Extracts of Key Evidence 29.

[20] Statement of Claim filed March 18, 2016, ¶ 33. Appeal Record 7.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

involved in its facility upgrades seeking damages of just over $100 million for the resulting losses.[21]

[63] Around this time, the limitation period for invoking the arbitration process expired.[22]

[64] On March 14, 2017 Agrium served the statement of claim on Orbis Engineering and the Elliott companies ex juris.[23]

[65] On May 25, 2018 Agrium requested a statement of defence within 60 days.[24]

[66] Orbis Engineering filed its defence on June 27, 2018, denying responsibility for the losses, alternatively claiming contribution and indemnity from the other defendants.[25]

[67] On June 28, 2018 Orbis Engineering amended its defence to primarily plead the mandatory arbitration provision in its agreement with Agrium. It claimed that the court did not have jurisdiction in respect of the claim and sought a stay pursuant to the Arbitration Act.[26]

[68] The Elliott companies filed their defence on July 9, 2018, denying liability and alternatively relying on the limitation of liability in the governing contract.[27] They later claimed contribution and indemnity from the codefendants.[28]

[69] On June 24, 2019 the Elliott companies applied for permission to amend their defence.[29] The amended defence filed January 20, 2020 primarily pleaded a mandatory arbitration clause in

---

[21] Id. ¶ 108. Appeal Record 22-23.

[22] Agrium Inc. v. Colt Engineering Corp., 2020 ABQB 807, ¶ 6 ("The parties agree that service of the Statement of Claim occurred after the expiry of the limitation period for commencing arbitration"). See Arbitration Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43, s. 51(1) ("The law with respect to limitation periods applies to an arbitration as if the arbitration were an action and a matter in dispute in the arbitration were a cause of action") & Limitations Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. L-12, s. 3(1) ("Subject to subsections (1.1) and (1.2) and sections 3.1 and 11, if a claimant does not seek a remedial order within (a) 2 years after the date on which the claimant first knew, or in the circumstances ought to have known, (i) that the injury for which the claimant seeks a remedial order had occurred, (ii) that the injury was attributable to conduct of the defendant, and (iii) that the injury, assuming liability on the part of the defendant, warrants bringing a proceeding, or (b) 10 years after the claim arose, whichever period expires first, the defendant, on pleading this Act as a defence, is entitled to immunity from liability in respect of the claim").

[23] Agrium Inc. v. Colt Engineering Corp., 2020 ABQB 807, ¶ 6.

[24] Id. ¶ 7.

[25] Statement of Defence filed June 27, 2018, ¶¶ 2-3 & 10. Appeal Record 26 & 27.

[26] Amended Statement of Defence filed June 28, 2018, ¶¶ 2 & 9. Appeal Record 28 & 30.

[27] Statement of Defence filed June 9, 2018, ¶¶ 9, 10, 14-16. Appeal Record 33 & 34.

[28] Agrium Inc. v. Colt Engineering Corp., 2020 ABQB 807, ¶ 9.

[29] Id.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

the terms and conditions that Elliott Turbomachinery provided to Agrium with its quotations – requiring arbitration in New York – and alternatively a mandatory arbitration clause in the terms and conditions that Agrium included in its purchase orders to Elliott Turbomachinery – requiring arbitration in Calgary under the UNCITRAL Model Law and Rules – submitting that the court accordingly lacks jurisdiction to hear Agrium's claim and asking that the action be stayed or struck.[30]

B. Master Prowse Permitted Agrium's Claim To Continue

[70] In 2019 each of Orbis Engineering and the Elliott companies applied to have Agrium's action against them stayed or struck on the basis that the governing contracts mandated resolution by arbitration, the time for commencing arbitration had expired, and the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta had no jurisdiction to hear the action.[31] The Elliott companies added that the claims against it must also be stayed[32] if the arbitration is to take place in New York.

[71] Agrium asserted that Orbis Engineering and the Elliott companies did not move promptly in their applications and that by participating in the litigation waived their right to arbitrate and attorned to the court's jurisdiction.[33]

[72] Master Prowse held that "undue delay under section 7(2) of the Arbitration Act cannot be used to stay an action under the Arbitration Act after the time for arbitration has elapsed".[34]

---

[30] Amended Statement of Defence filed January 20, 2020, ¶¶ 7, 8, 14 & 21. Appeal Record 36-39.

[31] Application of Orbis Engineering filed March 4, 2019, ¶¶ 5-7 and Application of Elliott Turbomachinery Canada, Inc. and Elliott Company filed June 21, 2019, ¶¶ 9-11. Appeal Record 41 & 45.

[32] Application of Elliott Turbomachinery Canada, Inc. and Elliott Company filed June 21, 2019, ¶ 12. Appeal Record 45.

[33] Agrium, Inc. v. Colt Engineering Corp., 2020 ABQB 53 (Master), ¶ 8.

[34] Id. ¶ 27. A court may stay a proceeding in The Provincial Court of Alberta or the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta under section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act even if the limitation period for the commencement of an arbitration has expired. The text of section 7 supports this conclusion. Section 7(1) unambiguously directs a court to stay a proceeding commenced by the nonmoving party in contravention of a binding arbitration agreement unless one of the five conditions set out in section 7(2) apply. The expiration of the limitation period governing the commencement of arbitration proceedings is not one of the five. If the Legislative Assembly of Alberta thought the expiration of the limitation period for the commencement of an arbitration proceeding a good reason to deny a stay it could have said so. And if the Legislative Assembly subsequently concludes that section 7(2) needs to be revised it can do so. A. Scalia & B. Garner, Reading Law: The Interpretation of Legal Texts 93, 94 & 96 (2012) ("The principle that a matter not covered is so obvious that it seems absurd to recite it. … The absent provision cannot be supplied by the courts. … Judicial amendment flatly contradicts democratic self-governance"). In addition, Justice Fruman's judgment in Agrium Inc. v. Babcock & Wilcox Canada Ltd., 2005 ABCA 82, ¶ 12; 11 C.P.C. 6th 108, 112 is consistent with this position: "In this case the parties used mandatory [arbitration] language and none of the s. 7(2) exceptions apply. Because the underlying arbitration is statute-barred, the statement of claim should be dismissed". This Court expressly approved Agrium Inc. v. Babcock & Wilcox Canada Ltd. in HOOPP Realty Inc. v. A.G. Clark Holdings Ltd., 2014

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[73] Master Prowse concluded that he had the discretion to consider whether Agrium's claim should continue notwithstanding the existence of mandatory arbitration provisions in the contracts between the parties.[35]

[74] The master determined that fairness was the controlling measure: "[W]hether in the circumstances it would be unfair to a plaintiff to allow a defendant to go back on its choice to participate in litigation".[36]

[75] Master Prowse noted[37] Orbis Engineering and the Elliott companies' participation in the court process to date – including serving their defences and filing notices of claim against the codefendants – and the stage of those proceedings – no examinations yet took place and Agrium was in the process of preparing its document production – and concluded that[38] > given the 2 year or more delay in applying to stay or strike, and the participation in the proceedings (in particular, use of the proceedings to advance claims against other defendants) it would be unfair to Agrium to allow Orbis and Elliott to go back on their choice to participate in this litigation. Accordingly I dismiss the applications of Orbis and Elliott to stay or strike these proceedings against them.

C. Justice Dilts Struck Agrium's Claim

ABCA 20, ¶ 7; 31 C.L.R. 4th 173, 177, leave to appeal ref'd, [2014] S.C.C.A. No. 87 "The chambers judge correctly interpreted this Court's decision in Babcock & Wilcox, which holds that if the parties have agreed that they must arbitrate a dispute, but one party has issued a statement of claim and has not commenced arbitration within the limitation period for arbitration, then the court must strike out the claim". This answers the question Master Schlosser posed in Fath v. Quadrant Construction Ltd., 2019 ABQB 151, ¶¶ 17 & 32; 89 C.L.R. 4th 107, 114 & 121: "If a plaintiff has sued in time but has not sought arbitration, the question is whether the Court can allow the lawsuit to go ahead and, in particular, whether the Court can permit this based on the grounds in s. 7(2) of the Arbitration Act. Some cases suggest that the Court can consider whether the relief was sought in a timely way (ie. s. 7(2)(d)), or whether the lawsuit is suitable for summary disposition (ie. s. 7(2)(e)), even after the limitation has expired; though post-limitation, if the lawsuit cannot proceed, the remedy is to strike. Other cases say that you cannot. .... With respect, this divided dicta leaves me in considerable doubt about the applicability of the s. 7(2) factors in a post-limitation stay or strike application" (emphasis in original). See also B. Casey, Arbitration Law of Canada: Practice and Procedure 152 (3d ed. 2017) ("Limitation periods may apply in arbitration in the same manner as a court action. It is therefore important that counsel carefully consider whether or not an arbitration agreement applies to the dispute. If the wrong choice is made, for example an action is brought rather an arbitration, and the court later determines that the matter should be arbitrated, the limitation period may well have expired, leaving the claimant without a remedy") & K. McEwen & L. Herbst, Commercial Arbitration in Canada 3-31 (looseleaf rel. 17, 11/2020) ("If an action commenced by a plaintiff is stayed due to the applicability of an arbitration agreement and an applicable statutory limitation expires before an arbitration is commenced, the claim may be statute barred").

[35] Id. ¶¶ 12-13.

[36] Id. ¶ 30.

[37] Id. ¶¶ 41-45.

[38] Id. ¶ 51.

[76] Orbis Engineering and the Elliott companies appealed Master Prowse's decision.[39]

[77] Agrium applied to strike the appeals.[40] It invoked section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act.[41]

[78] Orbis Engineering and the Elliott companies argued that section 7(6) has no application to this case because the master's decision was not "under" section 7 of the Arbitration Act. They emphasized that Master Prowse relied on authority outside of the Arbitration Act to deny a stay and that the Arbitration Act cannot remove the authority of a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench to review a master's decision.[42]

[79] Justice Dilts accepted these arguments:[43]

> I am satisfied Elliott and Orbis are entitled to appeal the decision of the Master to a Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench. They are entitled to do so as a right if the Master's decision was not made under the Arbitration Act, and I am satisfied that they are entitled to do so notwithstanding s. 7(6) of the Arbitration Act. I say this looking at both the legislative framework governing appeals from a Master and the jurisprudence in Alberta relating to the interpretation of s. 7(6) of the Arbitration Act.
>
> ….
>
> If the Master's decision was made outside of s. 7 of the Arbitration Act, and instead was made based on some residual discretion inherent in the court, that decision can be appealed. Elliott and Orbis are entitled to access all the court processes, including appellate review: ... . If the Master's decision was made under s. 7 of the Arbitration Act, Elliott and Orbis are entitled to appeal that decision relying on s. 12 of the Court of Queen's Bench Act and the Rules of Court. Section 7(6) does not preclude an appeal of the Master's decision to a Justice in Chambers. Given this conclusion, I need not address whether the Master's decision was made under s. 7 of the Arbitration Act.

[80] In essence, Justice Dilts took the view that the bar in section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act[44] to appeals from decisions on applications to stay court proceedings in favor of arbitration should

---

[39] Notices of Appeal filed February 7, 2020. Appellant's Extracts of Key Evidence 45 & 47.

[40] Application to Strike Appeals filed February 14, 2020. Appeal Record 47.

[41] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43.

[42] Agrium Inc. v. Colt Engineering Corp., 2020 ABQB 807, ¶ 20.

[43] Id. ¶¶ 21 & 30.

[44] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43 ("There is no appeal from the court's decision under this section").

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

not, "[a]bsent express language, ... be read in a manner that would be inconsistent with ... [the] legislated right"[45] of appeal from a master's decision available under section 12 of the Court of Queen's Bench Act[46] and rule 6.14 of the Alberta Rules of Court.[47] While she accepted that a decision under section 7 made by a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench could not be appealed to the Court of Appeal, she held a decision of a master under section 7 could be appealed to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench.[48]

[81] Justice Dilts proceeded to consider the appeal on the merits. She concluded that the court has jurisdiction, as part of the supervisory function that it retains with respect to matters governed by arbitration agreements, to consider whether parties waived reliance on the arbitration clause or attorned to the court's jurisdiction regardless of whether the time to arbitrate has expired.[49]

[82] The chambers judge took the view that the analysis of waiver and attornment is not a fairness assessment as Master Prowse determined, nor is it undertaken as an analysis of undue delay that is a basis for refusing to grant a stay under section 7(2)(d) of the Arbitration Act.[50] Rather, she approached the inquiry in the context of waiver, and examined whether the defendants' conduct "indicate[d] the voluntary intention to forego reliance on the mandatory arbitration provision or an engagement ... in the merits of the [a]ction".[51]

[83] Justice Dilts determined that, on the facts of this case, the conduct of neither Orbis Engineering nor the Elliott companies was sufficient to make out a waiver of their right to arbitrate. Orbis Engineering pleaded the arbitration provision from the outset, putting Agrium on notice of its intention to rely on it, its actions in filing a defence and bringing contribution or indemnity claims against the other defendants were "largely defensive" and "are of little value in determining whether the defendant has signalled an agreement to litigate" given that rules of court required such steps be taken within a prescribed time, and applied to strike or stay the action within one year after filing its defence.[52] While the Elliott companies delayed relying on the arbitration

---

[45] Agrium Inc. v. Colt Engineering Corp., 2020 ABQB 807, ¶ 23.

[46] R.S.A. 2000, c. C-31 ("An appeal lies to a judge in chambers from a decision of a master in chambers").

[47] Alta. Reg. 124/2010 ("If a master makes a judgment or order, the applicant or respondent to the application may appeal the judgment or order to a judge").

[48] Agrium Inc. v. Colt Engineering Corp., 2020 ABQB 807, ¶ 25.

[49] Id. ¶¶ 44, 45, 47 & 48.

[50] Id. ¶ 53.

[51] Id. ¶¶ 54-55.

[52] Id. ¶ 55.

provision for over a year after filing their initial defence, this, she held, is not sufficient to constitute waiver of their right to arbitrate.[53]

[84] The orders pronounced on December 22, 2020 and filed May 6, 2021 dismissed Agrium's applications to strike the appeals against Master Prowse's orders, allowed the appeals and struck Agrium's claims against Orbis Engineering and the Elliott companies.[54]

D. Agrium Appeals Justice Dilts' Order

[85] Agrium appealed Justice Dilts' order.[55]

V. Applicable Legislation and Arbitration Provisions

A. Arbitration Act

[86] The important sections of the Arbitration Act[56] are reproduced below:

> 1(1) In this Act,
>
> …
>
> (c) "court" means,
>
> (i) in sections 6 and 7, the Court of Queen's Bench and the Provincial Court, and
>
> (ii) in all other sections, the Court of Queen's Bench.
>
> …
>
> 3 The parties to an arbitration agreement may agree, expressly or by implication, to vary or exclude any provision of this Act except sections 5(2), 19, 39, 44(2), 45, 47 and 49.
>
> …

[53] Id. ¶ 56.

[54] Appeal Records 71 & 73.

[55] Civil Notice of Appeal filed January 20, 2021. Appeal Record 75.

[56] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43 (emphasis added).

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

6 No court may intervene in matters governed by this Act, except for the following purposes as provided by this Act:

(a) to assist the arbitration process;

(b) to ensure that an arbitration is carried on in accordance with the arbitration agreement;

(c) to prevent manifestly unfair or unequal treatment of a party to an arbitration agreement;

(d) to enforce awards.

7(1) If a party to an arbitration agreement commences a proceeding in a court in respect of a matter in dispute to be submitted to arbitration under the agreement, the court shall, on the application of another party to the arbitration agreement, stay the proceeding.

(2) The court may refuse to stay the proceeding in only the following cases:

(a) a party entered into the arbitration agreement while under a legal incapacity;

(b) the arbitration agreement is invalid;

(c) the subject-matter of the dispute is not capable of being the subject of arbitration under Alberta law;

(d) the application to stay the proceeding was brought with undue delay;

(e) the matter in dispute is a proper one for default or summary judgment.

(3) An arbitration of the matter in dispute may be commenced or continued while the application is before the court.

(4) If the court refuses to stay the proceeding,

(a) no arbitration of the matter in dispute shall be commenced, and

(b) an arbitration that has been commenced shall not be continued, and anything done in connection with the arbitration before the court's refusal is without effect.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

(5) The court may stay the proceeding with respect to the matters in dispute dealt with in the arbitration agreement and allow the proceeding to continue with respect to other matters if it finds that

(a) the agreement deals with only some of the matters in dispute in respect of which the proceeding was commenced, and

(b) it is reasonable to separate the matters in dispute dealt with in the agreement from the other matters.

(6) There is no appeal from the court's decision under this section.

B. Judicature Act

[87] Section 3(b)(iv)(A) of the Judicature Act[57] is in this form:

3 The Court of Appeal

…

(b) has jurisdiction and power, subject to the Rules of Court, to hear and determine

…

(iv) all appeals or applications in the nature of appeals respecting a judgment, order or decision of

(A) a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench … .

C. Court of Queen's Bench Act

[88] The key provisions of the Court of Queen's Bench Act,[58] as they read before June 15, 2022, follow:

---

[57] R.S.A. 2000, c. J-2.

[58] R.S.A. 2000, c. C-31. Effective June 15, 2022, masters in chambers are called "applications judges". Court of Queen's Bench Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. C-31, s. 27(1)(b) ("The Lieutenant Governor in Council may amend ... [section 8(1)] so that ... officers appointed under section 8(1) are called something other than masters in chambers") & O.C. 250/2022 ("The Lieutenant Governor in Council amends section 8(1) of the Court of Queen's Bench Act by striking out "masters in chambers" and substituting "applications judges"). Consequential amendments to the remainder of the Act will come into effect on September 1, 2022. Court of Queen's Bench (Various Regulations) Amendment Regulation, Alta. Reg. 137/2022, s. 3.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

> 8(1) The Lieutenant Governor in Council may appoint officers of the Court called masters in chambers.
>
> …
>
> 12 An appeal lies to a judge in chambers from a decision of a master in chambers.

D. Alberta Rules of Court

[89] Rules 6.14(1) and 14.4(1) of the Alberta Rules of Court[59] are set out below:

> 6.14(1) If a master makes a judgment or order, the applicant or respondent to the application may appeal the judgment or order to a judge.
>
> …
>
> 14.4(1) Except as otherwise provided, an appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from the whole or any part of a decision of a Court of Queen's Bench judge sitting in court or chambers, or the verdict or finding of a jury.

E. Supreme Court Act

[90] Sections 2(1), in part, and 40(1) of the Supreme Court Act[60] read as follows:

> 2(1) In this Act,
>
> "appeal" includes any proceeding to set aside or vary any judgment of the court appealed from;
>
> …
>
> "court appealed from" means the court from which the appeal is brought directly to the Supreme Court, whether that court is one of original jurisdiction or a court of appeal;
>
> "final judgment" means any judgment, rule, order or decision that determines in whole or in part any substantive right of any of the parties in controversy in any judicial proceeding … .

[59] Alta. Reg. 124/2010.

[60] R.S.C. 1985, c. S-26.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

…

40(1) … [A]n appeal lies to the Supreme Court from any final or other judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal or of the highest court of final resort in a province, or a judge thereof, in which judgment can be had in the particular case sought to be appealed to the Supreme Court, whether or not leave to appeal to the Supreme Court has been refused by any other court, where, with respect to the particular case sought to be appealed, the Supreme Court is of the opinion that any question involved therein is, by reason of its public importance or the importance of any issue of law or any issue of mixed law and fact involved in that question, one that ought to be decided by the Supreme Court or is, for any other reason, of such a nature or significance as to warrant decision by it, and leave to appeal from that judgment is accordingly granted by the Supreme Court.

F. Constitution Act, 1867

[91] Portions of part VII of the Constitution Act, 1867[61] are set out below:

VII. Judicature

96 The Governor General shall appoint the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts in each Province, except those of the Courts of Probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

97 Until the Laws relative to Property and Civil Rights in Ontario, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the Procedure of the Courts in those Provinces, are made uniform, the Judges of the Courts of those Provinces appointed by the Governor General shall be selected from the respective Bars of those Provinces.

…

99 (1) Subject to subsection (2) of this section, the judges of the superior courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

…

100 The Salaries, Allowances, and Pensions of the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts … shall be fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada.

[61] 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3 (U.K.).

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

G. Arbitration Clauses

[92] The arbitration clause in the governing contracts[62] between Agrium and each of Orbis Engineering and the Elliott companies[63] states as follows:[64]

> 28. PROPER LAW AND DISPUTE RESOLUTION
>
> (a) Unless otherwise stated on the face of this Order, this Order shall for all purposes be construed and interpreted according to the laws of the Province of Alberta and the federal laws of Canada applicable herein, excluding reference to conflicts of laws principles. Neither the Uniform Commercial Code, nor the United Nations Convention for the International Sale of Goods shall apply to this Order. Any dispute relating to this Order shall be resolved by arbitration in Calgary, Alberta, Canada, pursuant to the UNCITRAL Model Law and Rules. The courts having exclusive supervisory jurisdiction with respect to the matters relating to this Order shall be the courts of the Province of Alberta.
>
> (b) Buyer [Agrium] shall include provisions within its other agreements which relate to this Order a dispute resolution provision substantially similar to that which is contained herein. Vendor [Orbis Engineering] shall participate, upon the request of Buyer, in any arbitration arising in connection with the Goods, the Services or this Order, as if the Vendor were a direct party to the issue in dispute.

VI. Analysis

A. The Governing Statutory Interpretation Principles

[93] The proper approach to interpreting statutory provisions is not contentious.[65]

---

[62] The applicability or effect of the mandatory arbitration provision that Elliott Turbomachinery presented to Agrium with its quotations is not before the Court.

[63] Agrium Inc. v. Colt Engineering Corp., 2020 ABQB 807, ¶ 3; Affidavit of Gabriel Salcedo (In Response to the Summary Dismissal Application of the Defendant, Orbis Engineering Field Services Ltd.) filed November 1, 2019, ¶¶ 6 & 8 & Affidavit of Gabriel Salcedo (In Response to the Summary Dismissal Application of the Defendants, Elliott Turbomachinery Canada Inc. and Elliott Company) filed November 1, 2019, ¶ 6. Appellant's Extracts of Key Evidence 8 & 29.

[64] Affidavit of Gabriel Salcedo (In Response to the Summary Dismissal Application of the Defendant, Orbis Engineering Field Services Ltd.) filed November 1, 2019, Exhibit C, Services Purchase Order dated June 17, 2013, Canadian Standard Purchasing Terms and Conditions. Appellant's Extracts of Key Evidence 23.

[65] Alexis v. Alberta, 2020 ABCA 188, ¶ 42; 8 Alta. L.R. 7th 314, 333, leave to appeal ref'd, [2020] S.C.C.A. No. 227 per Wakeling & Greckol, JJ.A. ("The basic approach to a statutory interpretation problem is easy to state") & Re:Sound v. Motion Picture Theatre Assocs. of Canada, 2012 SCC 38, ¶ 25; [2012] 2 S.C.R. 376, 386 per LeBel, J. ("The main

1. Basic Rules

[94] "[A] tribunal must read the entire statute"[66] – other parts of a statute may affect the meaning of words in the contested provision – and statutes on the same subject matter.[67] An adjudicator must understand the comprehensive statutory regime.

[95] In reading statutory text a tribunal must be mindful that statutes "obviate some mischief, ... supply an inadequacy, ... [or] formulate a plan of government".[68] The goal is to identify a statutory purpose that animates the text.[69] issue in this appeal involves the application of well-known principles of statutory interpretation"). See Re Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd., [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, 41 per Iacobucci, J. ("Elmer Driedger in Construction of Statutes (2d ed. 1983) best encapsulates the approach upon which I prefer to rely. … 'Today there is only one principle or approach, namely, the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament'").

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[66] Alexis v. Alberta, 2020 ABCA 188, ¶ 43; 8 Alta. L.R. 7th 314, 334, leave to appeal ref'd, [2020] S.C.C.A. No. 227 per Wakeling and Greckol, JJ.A. See also Re Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd., [1998] 1 S.C.R. 27, 41 per Iacobucci, J. ("the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context"); Estate of Hicklin v. Hicklin, 2019 ABCA 136, ¶ 49; [2019] 6 W.W.R. 238, 255 ("an adjudicator interpreting a … statute must read the whole … statute"); K & S Lake City Freighters Pty. Ltd. v. Gordon & Gotch Ltd., 1985 HCA 48; 157 C.L.R. 309, 315 per Mason, J. ("to read the section in isolation from the enactment of which it forms a part is to offend against the cardinal rule of statutory interpretation that requires the words of a statute to be read in their context"); Panama Ref. Co. v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388, 439 (1935) per Cardozo, J. ("the meaning of a statute is to be looked for not in any single section, but in all the parts together, and in their relation to the end in view"); R. Sullivan, The Construction of Statutes 395 (7th ed. 2022) ("In looking at the Act as a whole, the courts focus on any provision or series of provisions that in their opinion is capable of shedding light on the interpretive problem at hand") & A. Scalia & B. Garner, Reading Law: The Interpretation of Legal Texts 167 (2012) ("Context is a primary determinant of meaning. A legal instrument typically contains many interrelated parts that make up the whole. The entirety of the document thus provides the context for each of its parts").

[67] Alexis v. Alberta, 2020 ABCA 188, n. 32; 8 Alta. L.R. 7th 314, n. 32, leave to appeal ref'd, [2020] S.C.C.A. No. 227 per Wakeling & Greckol, JJ.A. ("legislatures undoubtedly intend to create a network of obligations and responsibilities that are consistent and to use text in a consistent manner, even though the same subject matter is dealt with in more than one enactment"); Acciona Infrastructure Canada Inc. v. Posco Daewoo Corp., 2019 ABCA 241, ¶ 76; 91 Alta. L.R. 6th 59, 80-81 per Wakeling, J.A. ("It is necessary to examine the entire International Commercial Arbitration Act and its sister enactment, the Arbitration Act, in order to determine whether the enactments' use of the singular and plural forms are consistent. When does the plural include the singular or the singular include the plural?"); R. Sullivan, The Construction of Statutes 408 (7th ed. 2022) ("The provisions of related legislation are read in the context of others and the presumptions of coherence and consistent expression apply as if the provisions of these statutes were part of a single Act"); D. Pearce, Statutory Interpretation in Australia 119 (9th ed. 2019) ("reference may be made to similar statutes within the same jurisdiction in ascertaining the meaning of an Act before the court") & A. Scalia & B. Garner, Reading Law: The Interpretation of Legal Texts 252 (2012) ("laws dealing with the same subject … should if possible be interpreted harmoniously").

[68] Frankfurter, "Some Reflections on the Reading of Statutes", 47 Colum. L. Rev. 527, 538-39 (1947).

[69] Alexis v. Alberta, 2020 ABCA 188, ¶ 44; 8 Alta. L.R. 7th 314, 335 leave to appeal ref'd, [2020] S.C.C.A. No. 227 per Wakeling & Greckol, JJ.A. ("a tribunal must attempt to identify why the legislature passed the statute").

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[96] The completion of these necessary tasks puts the tribunal in the best position to undertake the next part of the protocol – "identify the potential permissible meanings [of the statute's words] taking into account their ordinary meanings".[70] In Alexis v. Alberta,[71] this Court stated that "[a] permissible meaning is one that a reasonable reader who uses the language correctly would give the text at the time of its production".

[97] It goes without saying that a tribunal may never give statutory text a meaning it "cannot possibly bear".[72]

[98] If the statutory text – a word, a phrase, or a sentence – bears only one plausible meaning, the interpretative inquiry is at an end.[73]

[99] Suppose city councillors receive numerous complaints that some residents are mowing their lawns after dark and disturbing the peace and quiet of neighborhoods to such a degree that

---

[70] Humphreys v. Trebilcock, 2017 ABCA 116, ¶ 109; [2017] 7 W.W.R. 343, 375, leave to appeal ref'd, [2017] S.C.C.A. No. 228. See The Queen v. D.A.I., 2012 SCC 5, ¶ 26; [2012] 1 S.C.R. 149, 166 per McLachlin, C.J. ("The first and cardinal principle of statutory interpretation is that one must look to the plain words of the provision"); The Queen v. Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, ex p. Spath, Holme Ltd., [2001] 2 A.C. 349, 397 per Lord Nicholls ("language is to be taken to bear its ordinary meaning in the general context of the statute") & Caminetti v. United States, 242 U.S. 470, 485-86 (1917) per Day, J. ("Statutory words are uniformly presumed, unless the contrary appears, to be used in their ordinary and usual sense, and with the meaning commonly attributed to them").

[71] 2020 ABCA 188, ¶ 47; 8 Alta. L.R. 7th 314, 335-36, leave to appeal ref'd, [2020] S.C.C.A. No. 227 per Wakeling & Greckol, JJ.A.

[72] Zuk v. Alberta Dental Ass'n, 2018 ABCA 270, ¶ 159; 426 D.L.R. 4th 496, 539, leave to appeal ref'd, [2018] S.C.C.A. No. 439. See A. Scalia & B. Garner, Reading Law: The Interpretation of Legal Texts 31 (2012) ("A fundamental rule of textual interpretation is that neither a word nor a sentence may be given a meaning that it cannot bear"); Alexis v. Alberta, 2020 ABCA 188, ¶ 73; 8 Alta. L.R. 7th 314, 343, leave to appeal ref'd, [2020] S.C.C.A. No. 227 per Wakeling & Greckol, JJ.A. ("Words cannot be given a meaning they cannot possibly bear"); Canada v. Canada North Group Inc., 2019 ABCA 314, ¶ 112; 437 D.L.R. 4th 122, 172, aff'd, 2021 SCC 30 per Wakeling, J.A. ("Fidelity to statutory text is a fundamental feature of statutory interpretation. Courts that ignore the text act as unauthorized legislators. They disregard the primacy of parliament and the paramountcy of the rule of law in our legal system") & SZTAL v. Minister of Immigration and Border Protection, [2017] HCA 34, ¶ 94; 347 A.L.R. 405, 429 per Edelman, J. ("where a statute employs a term in its ordinary sense there can be no warrant for the extension of the meaning beyond its ordinary sense"). E.g., Lafarge Canada Inc. v. City of Edmonton, 2013 ABCA 376, ¶ 31; 25 C.L.R. 4th 208, 216 ("To treat this Statement of Claim as a form of notification of arbitration under s. 23 does not amount to giving a liberal reading to s. 23 of the Act but bursts its conceptual boundaries").

[73] Thomson v. Canada, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 385, 399 per Cory, J. ("when the words used in the statute are clear and unambiguous, no other step is needed to identify the intention of Parliament") & Alexis v. Alberta, 2020 ABCA 188, ¶ 49; 8 Alta. L.R. 7th 314, 337, leave to appeal ref'd, [2020] S.C.C.A. No. 227 per Wakeling & Greckol, JJ.A. ("If the statutory text supports only one plausible or permissible meaning, the inquiry is complete. In this scenario there is no need to take into account the enactment's purpose"). See Canada v. Canada North Group Inc., 2019 ABCA 314, ¶ 124; 437 D.L.R. 4th 122, 176, aff'd, 2021 SCC 30 per Wakeling, J.A. ("A court has no authority to ignore or revise clear and unambiguous text that bears only one meaning just because the court considers the substantive norm embodied in the text to be unwise or dangerous").

children cannot sleep. Council passes a bylaw to ameliorate the problem: "A person in areas designated residential zones must not operate a lawn mower between 9:00 p.m. and 8:00 a.m. the next day". The bylaw does not define a lawn mower. A bylaw enforcement officer charges a person operating a reel push lawn mower with a contravention of this bylaw. The adjudicator convicts the accused, satisfied that a reel push lawn mower is a lawn mower – Webster's Third New International Dictionary of the English Language uses a picture of a reel push lawn mower to illustrate its definition: "lawn mower …: hand-operated or power-operated machine for cutting grass on lawns". This is the correct disposition. The bylaw prohibits in unambiguous terms the use of a lawn mower during prescribed hours. The text could have focused on gasoline-powered lawn mowers or lawn mowers that generate an amount of noise beyond a prescribed level but it did not.

[100] If statutory text may have more than one plausible meaning, the tribunal must "select the option that best advances the purpose that accounts for the text".[74] Section 10 of the Interpretation Act[75] confirms the merit of this part of the protocol: "An enactment shall be construed as being remedial, and shall be given the fair, large and liberal construction and interpretation that best ensures the attainment of its objects".

[101] To repeat, a tribunal must not rely on the purpose of an enactment to give text a meaning it cannot plausibly bear.[76]

[102] Suppose a workers' compensation act compensates a worker who suffers an injury arising out of and in the course of employment. Injury is defined to exclude a death attributable solely to the decision of a worker to take his or her own life. The board administering the act could not ignore the text's treatment of suicide and award compensation to the dependents of a worker who commits suicide because the board is convinced this is the right decision – the worker left a wife

---

[74] Humphreys v. Trebilcock, 2017 ABCA 116, ¶ 109; [2017] 7 W.W.R. 343, 375-76, leave to appeal ref'd, [2017] S.C.C.A. No. 228. See McBratney v. McBratney, 59 S.C.R. 550, 561 (1919) per Duff, J. ("where you have rival constructions of which the language of the statute is capable you must resort to the object ... of the statute ... [and adopt] the construction which best gives effect to the governing intention"); Celgene Corp. v. Canada, 2011 SCC 1, ¶ 21; [2011] 1 S.C.R. 3, 13 per Abella, J. ("The words, if clear, will dominate; if not, they yield to an interpretation that best meets the overriding purpose of the statute") & Hamilton v. Rathbone, 175 U.S. 414, 419 (1899) per Brown, J. ("where a statute is ... susceptible upon its face of two constructions, the court may look into ... the purpose intended to be accomplished by it, to determine its proper construction").

[75] R.S.A. 2000, c. I-8.

[76] Re:Sound v. Motion Picture Theatre Assocs. of Canada, 2012 SCC 38, ¶ 33; [2012] 2 S.C.R. 376, 389 per LeBel, J. ("Although statutes may be interpreted purposively, the interpretation must nevertheless be consistent with the words chosen by Parliament"); Shell Canada Ltd. v. Canada, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 622, 642 per McLachlin, J. ("the general object and spirit of the provision at issue can never supplant a court's duty to apply an unambiguous provision of the Act ... . Where the provision at issue is clear and unambiguous, its terms must simply be applied"); Covert v. Nova Scotia, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 774, 807 per Dickson, J. ("Although a court is entitled ... to look to the purpose of the Act ... it must still respect the actual words which express the legislative intention") & Alexis v. Alberta, 2020 ABCA 188, ¶ 74; 8 Alta. L.R. 7th 314, 343 leave to appeal ref'd, [2020] S.C.C.A. No. 227 per Wakeling & Greckol, JJ.A. ("A statute's purpose can never justify a court assigning to text a meaning it cannot bear").

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

and five children without a breadwinner. As Justice Stratas aptly explained, "[adjudicators] ... are bound by the legislation. They must take it as it is. They may not insert into it the meaning that they want".[77] Purpose never trumps text.[78]

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

2. Presumptions

[103] On occasion, consideration of a statutory interpretation presumption assists in resolving a contest as to the meaning of a statutory provision.

[104] This is the case here.

[105] Professor Sullivan states that "[i]t is presumed that the legislature intends to comply with any and all limits on its jurisdiction".[79] Justice Scalia and Professor Garner noted that "[t]he presumption of validity disfavors interpretations that would nullify the provision or the entire instrument – for example, an interpretation that would cause ... a statute to be unconstitutional".[80]

[106] The Queen v. McKay[81] illustrates this presumption. A Township of Etobicoke bylaw prohibited a residential property owner from displaying a sign not expressly authorized by the bylaw – a for-sale or no-trespassing sign, for example, were expressly authorized.

[107] During a federal election, the McKays, Etobicoke residential property owners, displayed a small election sign endorsing a federal New Democratic Party candidate. They were charged with and convicted of breaching Etobicoke's no-sign bylaw.

---

[77] Williams v. Canada, 2017 FCA 252, ¶ 50; 417 D.L.R. 4th 173, 189 per Stratas, J.A. See Alberta v. McGeady, 2014 ABQB 104, ¶ 23; [2014] 7 W.W.R. 559, 571, aff'd, 2015 ABCA 54, leave to app. ref'd, [2015] S.C.C.A. No. 91 per Wakeling, J. ("No ... decision maker can ignore substantive statutory provisions because it believes [the statutory provisions produce] ... unfair results and adopt another norm which it is satisfied produces a more satisfactory result").

[78] Weir-Jones Technical Services Inc. v. Purolator Courier Ltd., 2019 ABCA 49, ¶ 190; 442 D.L.R. 4th 9, 125 per Wakeling, J.A. See A. Scalia & B. Garner, Reading Law: The Interpretation of Legal Texts 57 (2012) ("purpose … cannot be used to contradict text or to supplement it. Purpose sheds light only on deciding which of various textually permissible meanings should be adopted") (emphasis in original).

[79] R. Sullivan, The Construction of Statutes 516 (7th ed. 2022).

[80] Reading Law: The Interpretation of Legal Texts 66 (2012).

[81] [1965] S.C.R. 798. See also The Queen v. Sharpe, 2001 SCC 2, ¶ 33; [2001] 1 S.C.R. 45, 75 per McLachlin, C.J. ("If a legislative provision can be read both in a way that is constitutional and in a way that is not, the former reading should be adopted"); Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038, 1078 per Lamer, J. ("this Court ... should ... not interpret legislation that is open to more than one interpretation so as to make it inconsistent with the Charter and hence of no force or effect. Legislation conferring an imprecise discretion must therefore be interpreted as not allowing the Charter rights to be infringed") & Panama Ref. Co. v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388, 439 (1935) per Cardozo, J. ("when a statute is reasonably susceptible of two interpretations, by one of which it is unconstitutional and by the other valid, the court prefers the meaning that preserves to the meaning that destroys").

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[108] The Supreme Court of Canada, satisfied that Etobicoke had no authority to regulate the use of federal election signs,[82] invoked the presumption in favor of validity – "if words in a statute are fairly susceptible of two constructions of which one will result in the statute being intra vires and the other will have the contrary result the former is to be adopted"[83] – and acquitted the McKays. There were two options – a federal election sign is either a sign captured by the bylaw because the text of the bylaw utilizes general terms or it is not, because the municipality has no authority to regulate federal election signs and it is presumed the municipality would not enact an ultra vires bylaw.

[109] Had the Etobicoke Bylaw expressly prohibited a residential property owner from displaying a sign during a federal election identifying the property owner as a supporter of a candidate, the property owner, if charged with a contravention of the bylaw, would have been forced to challenge the constitutionality of the bylaw.[84] The presumption in favor of validity would not have assisted the property owner – there was no plausible construction that was constitutional.

B. Section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act Prohibits Appeals Against an Order of a Master in Chambers Under Section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act to a Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta

1. The Purpose of the Arbitration Act

[110] A review of the Arbitration Act[85] as a whole makes it very clear that the Act recognizes the value of arbitration as a desirable dispute resolution option and directs courts to do what is required to make the arbitration process efficacious and do nothing that will impair the efficaciousness of the arbitration process.[86] Doing so furthers the two principles underlying arbitration legislation:

---

[82] The Queen v. McKay, [1965] S.C.R. 798, 804 per Cartwright, J.

[83] Id.

[84] The Queen v. Conway, 2010 SCC 22, ¶ 97; [2010] 1 S.C.R. 765, 810 ("barring a constitutional challenge to the legislation, no judicial fiat can overrule Parliament's clear expression of intent").

[85] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43.

[86] ENMAX Energy Corp. v. TransAlta Generation Partnership, 2022 ABCA 206, ¶ 29 ("The overarching purpose of arbitration legislation is to promote adherence to agreements, efficiency, and fairness and to lend credibility to an important dispute resolution process: ... . Arbitrations are intended to provide a faster and less expensive process to resolve disputes") & B. Casey, Arbitration Law of Canada: Practice and Procedure 319-20 (3d ed. 2017) ("All of the Domestic and International Acts start with the basic proposition that no court is to intervene in matters governed by the respective Act, except as the Act provides. ... The clear mandatory language displaces the concept that the courts have an overriding or inherent supervisory jurisdiction over arbitration tribunals. .... The courts have four general roles in the arbitration process: 1. Requiring parties to honour their obligations under arbitration agreements; 2. Supervising the conduct of the arbitration and the arbitrators to the extent permitted by law, if the place of arbitration is within the jurisdiction of the court; 3. Where requested, providing assistance in the conduct of the arbitration, usually, but not necessarily, when the place of arbitration is within the jurisdiction of the court; and 4. Enforcing arbitral awards regardless of where they were made").

parties should be permitted to determine for themselves the dispute resolution mechanism they wish to use and ought to be held to that agreement, and when they choose arbitration courts should be minimally involved[87] in that process.[88]

[111] Accordingly, the Arbitration Act does not bestow a prominent role on the courts. This Court's judgment in Lamb v. AlanRidge Homes Ltd.[89] confirms this: "[S]ection 7(6) reflects an important policy consideration, namely that the process of determining whether the parties should proceed with arbitration, or legal proceedings, should not become bogged down by resort to the appeal process".

[112] Section 6 of the Arbitration Act confirms the limited role of the courts:

> 6 No court may intervene in matters governed by this Act, except for the following purposes as provided by this Act:
>
> (a) to assist the arbitration process;

---

[87] B. Casey, Arbitration Law of Canada: Practice and Procedure 319 (3d ed. 2017) ("While many in the arbitration field speak of court 'intervention', the courts in Canada, for the most part, have come to recognize that commercial arbitration has evolved to become an important dispute resolution mechanism and today it is more appropriate to speak in terms of court 'involvement' where necessary to facilitate the arbitral process. Courts and arbitral tribunals have both come to recognize the need for and the contribution of the other. Together ... [they] provide a sophisticated regime for the resolution of commercial disputes in Canada").

[88] TELUS Communications Inc. v. Wellman, 2019 SCC 19, ¶¶ 52 & 55; [2019] 2 S.C.R. 144, 178 & 179 per Moldaver, J. ("The policy that parties to a valid arbitration agreement should abide by their agreement gives effect to the concept of party autonomy — which, in the arbitration context, stands for the principle that parties should generally be allowed to craft their own dispute resolution mechanism through consensual agreement ... . The policy ... goes hand in hand with the principle of limited court intervention in arbitration matters. This latter principle finds expression throughout modern Canadian arbitration legislation ... and has been described as a 'fundamental principle underlying modern arbitration law' ... . This principle is embedded most visibly in ss. 6 and 7 of the Arbitration Act") & Alberta Law Reform Institute, Arbitration Act*:* Stay and Appeal Issues Final Report (2013) v ("ALRI reaffirms the two fundamental principles underlying the Alberta Act: the principle of party control and the principle of restricted court intervention"), ¶¶ 10, 12 & 14 ("The law of arbitration rests on the principle of party control. The parties' freedom to contract governs the arbitration process and must be respected. As a general rule, party control means that the parties can make whatever agreement they want concerning what is to be arbitrated, how issues will be identified, how the arbitrator will be chosen and what the rules of the arbitration will be. The parties agree to participate in the arbitration. .... Party control is a fundamental principle underlying the Alberta Act. .... In the Alberta Act and Uniform Act, the principle of party control is balanced against the principle of equal and fair treatment. Party control should be overridden only when needed to ensure equal treatment and fairness between the parties") & 19 ("Another fundamental principle underlying modern arbitration law is that court involvement or intervention in the arbitration process should be strictly limited. In many ways, this principle is a counterpart to the principle of party control. If parties choose to resolve their disputes privately outside the public court system, they should be left to that choice and not be subject to court intervention, except as needed to determine validity of the arbitration agreement or to ensure standards of basic procedural fairness for the arbitral process").

[89] 2009 ABCA 343, ¶ 14; 312 D.L.R. 4th 719, 723, leave to app. ref'd, [2009] S.C.C.A. No. 520.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

> (b) to ensure that an arbitration is carried on in accordance with the arbitration agreement;
>
> (c) to prevent manifestly unfair or unequal treatment of a party to an arbitration agreement;
>
> (d) to enforce awards.

[113] As Justice Moldaver recently observed,[90] "[section] 6 [of Ontario's Arbitration Act] signals that courts are generally to take a 'hands off' approach to matters governed by the Arbitration Act". This applies equally to Alberta's legislation.[91]

[114] Section 7 also makes it clear that parties that have agreed to submit their disputes to arbitration can expect a court, in the absence of exceptional circumstances catalogued in section 7(2), to order them to honor their commitments.[92] This a court does by staying an action.[93]

[115] Section 7(6) plays an important role in ensuring that courts do no more than is necessary to ensure the integrity of an arbitration agreement. While a party may invoke section 7(1) claiming that it and the nonmoving party have agreed to arbitrate their disputes, the Act allows only the original court to determine the merits of a stay application.[94] By denying appeals of section 7

---

[90] TELUS Communications Inc. v. Wellman, 2019 SCC 19, ¶ 56; [2019] 2 S.C.R. 144, 180 per Moldaver, J. Section 6 of Ontario's Arbitration Act, S.O. 1991, c. 17, mirrors Alberta's legislation: "No court shall intervene in matters governed by this Act, except for the following purposes, in accordance with this Act: 1. To assist the conducting of arbitrations. 2. To ensure that arbitrations are conducted in accordance with arbitration agreements. 3. To prevent unequal or unfair treatment of parties to arbitration agreements. 4. To enforce awards".

[91] Alberta Law Reform Institute, Arbitration Act*:* Stay and Appeal Issues Final Report ¶ 21 (2013) ("One of the Alberta Act's main features is the statutory enshrinement of the fundamental principle of restricted court intervention. Section 6 prohibits court intervention except for specified purposes as provided by the Act. This principle is further reflected in restricted court authority to refuse a stay of court proceedings under section 7 and to hear appeals under section 44").

[92] Id. ¶ 26 ("If a party to an arbitration agreement commences a court proceeding regarding a dispute covered by that agreement, the Alberta Act is designed to force that party to honour the agreement to arbitrate, except in very limited and specified circumstances [as set out in section 7]").

[93] TELUS Communications Inc. v. Wellman, 2019 SCC 19, ¶ 51; [2019] 2 S.C.R. 144, 177-78 per Moldaver, J. ("Issuing a stay of court proceedings is one of the ways in which courts may give effect to the policy that the parties to a valid arbitration agreement should abide by their agreement. ... [A] stay of court proceedings is simply 'an indirect method of enforcing an arbitration agreement'").

[94] The Alberta Law Reform Institute confirmed the desirability of its approach. Alberta Law Reform Institute, Arbitration Act*:* Stay and Appeal Issues Final Report ¶¶ 85-88 (2013) ("Section 7(6) of the Alberta Act provides that a Court of Queen's Bench decision under section 7 cannot be appealed to the Court of Appeal. Case law modifies this absolute prohibition, however, by providing that an appeal is not barred where a stay is refused because the arbitration agreement is held to be invalid or otherwise inapplicable. If the appellate court reaches the contrary decision and holds that the arbitration agreement is indeed valid and applicable, the case will then be remitted to the lower court to decide decisions made by a master in chambers or a judge of The Provincial Court of Alberta to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench or a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta to the Court of Appeal, the Act directs parties to abide by the finding of the original decision maker asked to determine if the nonmoving party must be held to its promise to arbitrate disputes.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

2. Permissible Meanings of Section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act

a. The Meaning of Section 7(6) Is Indisputable

[116] Section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act[95] – "[t]here is no appeal from a court's decision under this section" – indisputably states that a party to an agreement that contains a mandatory arbitration the stay application. That stay decision cannot then be appealed. A respondent proposed that section 7(6) be amended to allow an appeal, with leave, of any stay decision. The respondent submitted that this would allow the Court of Appeal 'to clarify legal differences arising amongst Queen's Bench judges, without the need for legislative reform.' No modern Canadian arbitration statute provides for an appeal of a stay decision. ... The policy in this area uniformly curtails appeals in the interest of finality and preventing delay in the arbitral process. The Supreme Court of Canada would more than likely respect this policy as well. ALRI does not support broadening section 7(6) to provide a general ability to appeal stay decisions"). Cf. Uniform Law Conference of Canada, Uniform Arbitration Act (2016), s. 7(7) ("A party may appeal a decision of a court under this section [Stay of court proceedings]") & 6 ("Commentary: ... Subsections 7(5) and (6) of the previous Uniform Arbitration Act ... suggests that where a court finds that it is not 'reasonable' to separate matters required to be arbitrated from those not required to be arbitrated, the court could refuse a stay, and that the court's finding on that issue is final and binding. The new text deletes subsections 7(5) and (6). This is consistent with the approach recommended by the Alberta Law Reform Institute").

---

[95] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43. See also The Arbitration Act, 1992, S.S. 1992, c. A-24.1, s. 8(6) ("There is no appeal from the court's decision pursuant to this section"); The Arbitration Act, C.C.S.M., c. A120, s. 7(6) ("There is no appeal from the court's decision under this section"); Arbitration Act, 1991, S.O. 1991, c. 17, s. 7(6) ("There is no appeal from the court's decision"); Arbitration Act, R.S.N.B. 2014, c. 100, s. 7(6) ("There is no appeal from the court's decision"); Arbitration Ordinance, 2011 H.K.L. No. 38, s. 20(8) ("A decision of the court to refer the parties to arbitration under – (a) article 8 of the UNCITRAL Model Law, given effect to by subsection (1); or (b) subsection (2), is not subject to appeal. (9) The leave of the court making a decision to refuse to refer the parties to arbitration under – (a) article 8 of the UNCITRAL Model Law ... is required for any appeal from that decision") & Federal Arbitration Act, 9 U.S.C. § 3 ("Stay of proceedings where issue therein referable to arbitration. If any suit or proceeding be brought in any of the courts of the United States upon any issue referable to arbitration under an agreement in writing for such arbitration, the court in which such suit is pending, upon being satisfied that the issue involved in such suit or proceeding is referable to arbitration under such an agreement, shall on application of one of the parties stay the trial of the action until such arbitration has been had in accordance with the terms of the agreement, providing the applicant for the stay is not in default in proceeding with such arbitration") & § 16 ("Appeals ... (b) Except as otherwise provided in section 1292(b) of title 28, an appeal may not be taken from an interlocutory order – (1) granting a stay of any action under section 3 of this title"). With the exception of British Columbia and Quebec, those provinces that do not bar appeals of stay decisions appear to have retained the stay application language found in the Arbitration Act, 1889, c. 49, s. 4 (U.K.) ("If any party to a submission, or any person claiming through or under him, commences any legal proceedings in any court against any other party to the submission, or any person claiming through or under him, in respect of any matter agreed to be referred, any party to such legal proceedings may at any time after appearance, and before delivering any pleadings or taking any other steps in the proceedings, apply to that court to stay the proceedings, and that court or a judge thereof if satisfied that there is no sufficient reason why the matter should not be referred in accordance with the submission, and that the applicant was, at the time when the proceedings were commenced, and still remains, ready and willing to do all things necessary to the proper conduct of the arbitration, may make an order provision and is either the moving or nonmoving party to an application for a stay of a court action under section 7(1) may not appeal an order adverse to its interests made by a judge of The Provincial Court of Alberta, a master in chambers or a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta to a court established by an enactment of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta – a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta[96] or the Court of Appeal of Alberta.[97]

b. Key Section 7(6) Queries

[117] Three questions must be asked when considering the effect of section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act.

i. A Decision of a Master Is a Decision of the Court of Queen's Bench

[118] Is the decision of a master in chambers of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta a "decision" of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta?

[119] It is.

[120] The Court of Queen's Bench Act[98] stipulates that masters in chambers are "officers of the court". The fact that masters in chambers are not judges[99] of the Court of Queen's Bench does not mean that their decisions are not decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench.

---

staying the proceedings") (emphasis added). See Arbitration Act, R.S.N.S. 1989, c. 19, s. 7; Arbitration Act, R.S.P.E.I. 1988, c. A-16, s. 7; Arbitration Act, R.S.N.L. 1990, c. A-14, s. 4; Arbitration Act, R.S.Y. 2002, c. 8, s. 9; Arbitration Act, R.S.N.W.T. 1988, c. A-5, s. 10(2) & Arbitration Act, R.S.N.W.T. 1988, c. A-5, s. 10(2). Prince Edward Island enacted the Arbitration Act, S.P.E.I. 1996, c. 4, repealing the current act, but this new act has not been proclaimed. Prince Edward Island, Table of Public Acts (updated May 2022) 7. It introduced Bill 50, setting out a new arbitration act, that was first read on February 22, 2022. Section 6(7) of that act provides that "[a] party may appeal a decision of the court under this section".

[96] Court of Queen's Bench Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. C-31, s. 2(1).

[97] Court of Appeal Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. C-30.

[98] R.S.A. 2000, c. C-31, s. 8(1).

[99] The Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta "consists of ... 74 other judges, who shall be called justices of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta". Court of Queen's Bench Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. C-31, s. 3(1)(c). A specific judge of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta is properly referred to as "Justice Smith". See S. Bigelow, Legal Etiquette and Court-Room Decorum 9 (1955) ("[A high court judge] should never be addressed or referred to as 'Judge Jones', an unpardonable error, although intimately, he may be called 'Judge'"). "Judge" or "judges" are the proper terms if the reference is not to a specific judge or judges of the Court of Queen's Bench. E.g., Court of Queen's Bench Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. C-31, ss. 3-7, 7.1, 9, 12, 13, 24, 24.1 & 26 & Alberta Rules of Court, Alta. Reg. 124/2010, rr. 1.6, 4.13-.18, 4.21, 9.4 & 14.4.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

ii. A Section 7 Decision Has Four Components

[121] What is a "decision under this section"?

[122] This is not a challenging query.

[123] Section 7 of the Arbitration Act[100] answers this question.

[124] A "decision under this section" has four components.

[125] First, there must be an application under section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act.[101]

[126] Second, the moving and nonmoving parties must have agreed to submit a difference the subject of the court proceeding to arbitration.[102]

---

[100] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43.

[101] Hnatiuk v. Assured Developments Ltd., 2012 ABCA 97, ¶ 40; 15 C.L.R. 4th 28, 38 ("The duty in s 7(1) of the Arbitration Act to stay the suit in favor of arbitration, applies only if that is sought 'on the application of another party to the arbitration agreement'. Here no party moved for a stay, even at trial"). The fact that the applicant invoked section 7 is not, by itself, determinative. But it is an essential criterion. Cf. Toronto Standard Condominium Corp. No. 1628 v. Toronto Standard Condominium Corp. No. 1636, 2020 ONCA 612, ¶ 91; 454 D.L.R. 4th 126, 154 per Jamal, J.A. (" I would ... reject ... [the] proposition, that s. 7(6) bars an appeal from any motion brought under s. 7. Section 7(6) refers to a 'decision', not to 'a motion brought', under s. 7. To state the obvious, a motion may be brought on one statutory basis, but the court's decision may be made on a different basis. Citing s. 7 in a notice of motion does not bar an appeal to this court. What matters is the statutory basis of the motion judge's 'decision' – whether the court's decision was made under s. 7") (emphasis in original).

[102] A.G. Clark Holdings Ltd. v. HOOPP Realty Inc., 2013 ABCA 101, ¶¶ 3 & 13; 361 D.L.R. 4th 101, 105 & 107 ("If the Agreement provides for the mandatory arbitration of disputes, then pursuant to s 7(1) of the Arbitration Act, HOOPP's court proceeding must be stayed to allow the arbitration to proceed (subject to the court's discretion to refuse to stay the proceeding in certain circumstances set out elsewhere in s 7). …. [I]f the motion judge holds there is no applicable arbitration agreement upon which the proceedings could be stayed, then s 7(6) cannot be successfully invoked to bar an appeal"); Lafarge Canada Inc. v. City of Edmonton, 2013 ABCA 376, ¶ 23; 25 C.L.R. 4th 208, 214 ("Whether an agreement contains a mandatory and relevant arbitration clause is a matter of contractual interpretation and has implications, inter alia, for whether the appeal bar in s. 7(6) of the Arbitration Act applies to the situation"); Federal Arbitration Act, 9 U.S.C. § 16(b)(1) ("Except as otherwise provided in section 1292(b) of title 28, an appeal may not be taken from an interlocutory order … granting a stay of any action under section 3 of this title"); Eggiman v. Martin, 2019 ONCA 974, ¶ 8, leave to appeal ref'd, [2020] S.C.C.A. No. 44 ("There is no appeal to this court from the order of the motion judge. Section 7(6) is very clear on this point. If it is determined that the arbitration provision applies to the issue that is raised in the proceeding, and thus s. 7 is invoked, then s. 7(6) precludes any appeal from the decision rendered respecting the motion to stay, whether that order grants or refuses the stay"); Abbey Resources Corp. v. Andjelic Land Inc., 2020 SKCA 125, ¶ 22 per Richards, C.J. ("The trial judge concluded that the arbitration clauses in the leases between Abbey and Andjelic did not apply in the circumstances at hand. As a result, he did not make a 'decision pursuant to this section' as per s. 8(6) of the Arbitration Act. Abbey is therefore not barred from pursuing this appeal") (emphasis added); Brown v. Murphy, 59 O.R. 3d 404, 408 (C.A. 2002) per Charron, J.A. ("a decision by the motions court that a matter was not subject to arbitration under the terms of the arbitration agreement fell outside the scope of s. 7 and a right of appeal lay to this court from that decision") (emphasis added) & Huras v.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[127] If a court in a section 7 application determines that the parties have agreed to submit all the differences the subject of the court proceeding to arbitration and stays the court proceeding, the order staying the court proceeding is not appealable.[103]

[128] Suppose P, a prominent professional athlete, and L, a lawyer, enter into an agency agreement whereby P agrees to retain L to negotiate P's employment contract with X and endorsement agreements for a fee dependent upon a number of complex variables. Both P and L agree to submit any differences relating to fees L earns under the agreement to arbitrator W for final resolution. L successfully negotiates P's employment contract with X and endorsement contracts with an automobile manufacturer, a watchmaker, a clothier, a distiller, a hotelier, and others. P and L cannot agree on the fee P must pay L for the automobile manufacturer and watchmaker endorsement contracts and L sues P. P invokes section 7 of the Arbitration Act and applies to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench for a stay of L's proceeding. The court orders a stay – L's claim is a difference covered by their agency agreement and must be submitted to arbitration. Section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act applies. The Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction to hear an appeal by L.

[129] The opposite would be the case – the order is subject to appeal – if the Court of Queen's Bench determined that none of the differences the subject of a court proceeding were a difference under an arbitration agreement and dismissed a stay application.[104]

[130] Suppose L told a newspaper reporter that P abused his wife and used cocaine. The reporter's newspaper published these allegations. They were widely circulated. As a result, the automobile manufacturer and the watchmaker cancelled their endorsement contracts with P. P sues

---

Primerica Financial Services Ltd., 137 O.A.C. 79, ¶ 10 (2000) ("Where there is no arbitration clause, the Arbitration Act, 1991 has no application, or putting it another way, the dispute lies beyond the scope of s. 7. It follows that if the court has decided that the Act is not applicable, then the prohibition against an appeal in s. 7(6) is equally not applicable"). Contra, Tatlow v. Carolina Homes Inc., 2010 ABQB 412, ¶ 7 (the Court of Queen's Bench held that it had no jurisdiction to hear an appeal against a Provincial Court decision holding that the arbitration term did not apply to the dispute the subject of the proceeding).

[103] B. Casey, Arbitration Law of Canada: Practice and Procedure 366-67 (3d ed. 2017) ("Under the Domestic [arbitration] Acts, the court's decision on a motion to stay a proceeding in the face of arbitration is said to not be subject to appeal. However, if the Domestic Act does not apply, there is no prohibition on appealing. For example, if the court at first instance finds that there is no arbitration agreement, ... [or] the matter is not arbitrable, then the Domestic Act is not applicable and there is no prohibition on appealing. ... It is now well established that prohibition respecting appeal does not preclude an appeal from an order refusing to grant a stay on the ground that the matter is not subject to arbitration").

[104] K. McEwen & L. Herbst, Commercial Arbitration in Canada 3-183 (looseleaf rel. 17, 11/2020) ("a decision by the motions court that a matter (or, where applicable, all the claims) is not subject to arbitration under the terms of the arbitration agreement falls outside the scope of the stay provision and a right of appeal lies to the court of appeal from that decision").

L for defamation. L applies for a stay of P's defamation action. P and L never agreed to submit the issue of defamation to arbitrator W. A stay would be inappropriate.

[131] If a court determines that the parties have agreed to submit some of their differences the subject of a court proceeding to arbitration but not all and stays, under section 7(5), the differences the parties have agreed to submit to arbitration and allows the other differences to be litigated or stays all of the differences in the court proceeding, such an order is not appealable.

[132] Suppose under the agency agreement L's entire fee on endorsement contracts is paid from the first of the periodic endorsement payments made to P. P claims that L owes him a portion of the fee P has already paid L. P sues L for defamation and claims that L owes P for a portion of the sums P has already paid L for the endorsement agreements with the automobile manufacturer and the watchmaker. L, relying on section 7 of the Arbitration Act, applies to the Court of Queen's Bench for a stay of P's court proceeding. The court, citing section 7(5), grants the stay of P's proceeding satisfied that it would be unreasonable to separate the differences and to have arbitrator W resolve the contest as to the fees owed and the court resolve the defamation action. The two are too closely connected to separate them. The Court of Appeal would have no jurisdiction, on account of section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act, to hear an appeal by L.

[133] Had the court come to the opposite conclusion and, on account of section 7(5) of the Arbitration Act, stayed the difference relating to the fees owed and allowed the defamation action to proceed, the Court of Appeal would also be without jurisdiction to hear an appeal against a partial stay.

[134] Or there may be a controversy as to the applicability of concepts that deprive the terms of the parties' agreement of their force – such as waiver[105] – or a debate as to the applicability of the criteria under section 7(2) of the Arbitration Act. If the court adjudges that the difference the [105] A. Swan, J. Adamski & A. Na., Canadian Contract Law 132 (4th ed. 2018) ("The party who waives strict compliance with the contract may not – or at least not without giving notice – insist on punctual and exact performance"); J. McCamus, The Law of Contracts 305 (3d ed. 2020) ("The doctrine of waiver is commonly illustrated by reference to the decision of the House of Lords in Hughes v. Metropolitan Rwy Co. In this case a landlord had given a notice to the tenant pursuant to the terms of the lease, requiring that certain repairs be made by the tenants within six months. The tenant replied that he was willing to do the repairs but he would like to enter into negotiations for the sale of the leasehold interest to the landlord and further indicated that he would not undertake the repairs during negotiations to that end. The negotiations broke off a few months later and when six months from the initial notice to repair had expired, the landlord purported to treat the lease as forfeited and brought an action to eject the tenant from the premises. The House of Lords dismissed the claim on the basis that the 'course of negotiation ... of the parties' had led the tenant to believe that the time limit for repairs would not be strictly enforced by the landlord and accordingly, that the landlord would not be permitted to enforce it. The landlord had waived his right to insist on strict performance of the agreement and could not now insist on doing so") & E. Farnsworth, Contracts 523 (4th ed. 2004) ("A common ground for excuse of a condition is that, after the contract was made, the obligor promised to perform despite the nonoccurrence of the condition or despite a delay in its occurrence. Such a promise is known as waiver").

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

subject of the court proceeding is the subject of an agreement to arbitrate, the dissatisfied party cannot appeal.

[135] It makes no sense to insulate an original court's order from an appeal in order to expedite the arbitration process in the absence of a judicial determination that the parties agreed to submit the difference the subject of a court proceeding to arbitration.[106]

[136] Third, the nonmoving party has commenced an action in the court against the moving party.[107] A party to an arbitration agreement cannot claim that another party has dishonored the arbitration agreement until the other party has actually commenced an action.

[137] Fourth, the adjudicator – a judge or a master in chambers of the Court of Queen's Bench[108] or a judge of The Provincial Court of Alberta – must issue a decision – stay the action commenced

---

[106] Courts in Alberta have heard appeals from decisions involving stay applications under section 7 if there was no applicable arbitration agreement. E.g., A.G. Clark Holdings Ltd. v. HOOPP Realty Inc., 2013 ABCA 101; 361 D.L.R. 4th 101, rev'ing 2012 ABQB 567 (allowed appeal from decision of chambers judge who dismissed application to strike or stay under section 7 the action because the contract clause did not make arbitration mandatory but rather made it available and required it only for disputes not resolved by other means including mediation, finding that the chambers judge misinterpreted the agreement that did make arbitration mandatory and remitting the matter back for determination on remaining issues, also concluding that section 7(6) did not bar the appeal because it does not apply to a decision that there is no applicable arbitration agreement upon which the proceedings could be stayed, such as that arbitration is not mandatory, but it would bar that court's determination on the remaining issues); Millennial Construction Ltd. v. 1021120 Alberta Ltd., 2005 ABQB 533 (dismissed appeal from unreported decision of master who declined to grant a stay under section 7, on the basis that arbitration was only an option and not mandatory under the contract so that section 7 does not apply and alternatively dismissed the stay application for undue delay, without discussing section 7(6)) & Young v. Dollar Financial Group Inc., 2013 ABCA 264; 364 D.L.R. 4th 341, aff'ing 2012 ABQB 601; 356 D.L.R. 4th 346, leave to appeal ref'd, [2013] S.C.C.A. No. 399 & [2013] S.C.C.A. No. 400 (dismissed appeal from decision of chambers judge who dismissed motion to stay proceedings under section 7(1) because the arbitration clauses in the consumer contracts at issue did not govern).

[107] Agrium Inc. v. Babcock & Wilcox Canada Ltd., 2005 ABCA 82, ¶ 12; 11 C.P.C. 6th 108, 112 per Fruman, J.A. ("In this case the parties used mandatory language and none of the s. 7(2) exceptions apply. Because the underlying arbitration is statute-barred, the statement of claim should be dismissed") & HOOPP Realty Inc. v. A.G. Clark Holdings Ltd., 2014 ABCA 20, ¶ 7; 31 C.L.R. 4th 173, 177, leave to appeal ref'd, [2014] S.C.C.A. No. 87 per Paperny, J.A. ("The chambers judge correctly interpreted this Court's decision in Babcock & Wilcox, which holds that if the parties have agreed that they must arbitrate a dispute, but one party has issued a statement of claim and has not commenced arbitration within the limitation period for arbitration, then the court must strike out the claim [under rule 3.68 of the Alberta Rules of Court]").

[108] See Wang v. Mattamy Corp., 2020 ONSC 7012, ¶ 17 per Penny, J. ("Master Muir's decision 'falls squarely' within the provisions of s. 7. Accordingly, it is not appropriate for the court to engage in an analysis of the Master's decision because any review of it is precluded by s. 7(6)"), review ref'd, 2021 ONSC 2635 (Div. Ct.) ¶¶ 6-7 per Favreau, J. ("In his endorsement, the motion judge identified the correct test for deciding whether to extend the time for an appeal, which includes consideration of the merits of the appeal. He ... correctly found that section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act, 1991 is a complete bar to the appeal. Section 7(6) of the Act provides that there is no appeal from a decision of the court staying an action on the basis of an arbitration clause. ... I agree with the motion judge that, based on section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act, 1991, the proposed appeal is devoid of any merit").

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

by the nonmoving party or dismiss the stay application allowing the nonmoving party to prosecute the action.[109] A ban against an appeal cannot be effective until there is a decision that might otherwise have been appealed.[110]

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

---

[109] Lafarge Canada Inc. v. City of Edmonton, 2013 ABCA 376, ¶ 38; 25 C.L.R. 4th 208, 217 ("Therefore, there has been no decision whether the City by its conduct waived its right to insist on the arbitration clause and attorned to the trial jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench or whether a motion for a stay has been unduly delayed such that the Court of Queen's Bench should exercise its jurisdiction under the Arbitration Act to refuse to stay the action"); Lamb v. AlanRidge Homes Ltd., 2009 ABCA 343, ¶ 11; 312 D.L.R. 4th 719, 723, aff'ing 2009 ABQB 170; 309 D.L.R. 4th 214, leave to appeal ref'd, [2009] S.C.C.A. No. 520 ("We have concluded that the decision of the chambers judge was made under section 7 [dismissed a stay application and allowed arbitration to proceed in part], so that subsection (6) applies, and no appeal lies to this Court") & Brown v. Murphy, 59 O.R. 3d 404, 407-08 (C.A. 2002) per Charron, J.A. ("the bar under s. 7(6) [of Ontario's Arbitration Act, 1991] applied to any decision by the motions court under s. 7 to grant or refuse a stay of 'a proceeding in respect of a matter to be submitted to arbitration under the agreement' within the meaning of s. 7(1)") (emphasis omitted). See B. Casey, Arbitration Law of Canada: Practice and Procedure 366-67 (3d ed. 2017) ("Under the Domestic Acts, the courts' decision to refuse a stay of proceedings or, alternatively, its decision to stay court proceedings and permit the arbitration to continue is said to be not subject to appeal. However, if the Domestic Act does not apply, there is no prohibition on appealing. For example, if the court at first instance finds that there is no arbitration agreement, the matter is not arbitrable, then the Domestic Act is not applicable and there is no prohibition on appealing. ... If the stay is under the court's inherent power to control its own proceedings and not under the Domestic Act then normal appeal rights also flow. ... It is now well-established that prohibition respecting appeal does not preclude an appeal from an order refusing to grant a stay on the ground that the matter is not subject to arbitration").

[110] Courts in Alberta have considered appeals from decisions involving stay applications under section 7 where the decisions related to arbitration but were not made under section 7, sometimes considering the applicability of the section 7(6) bar on appeals. E.g., Lafarge Canada Inc. v. City of Edmonton, 2013 ABCA 376; 25 C.L.R. 4th 208, rev'ing 2012 ABQB 634 (allowed appeal from decision of chambers judge who dismissed application to strike under r. 3.68 or stay under section 7 a claim and declare that arbitration is past limitation period on the basis that there was no limitations defence and the statement of claim constituted notice of arbitration, finding that the claim could not be notice of arbitration and remitting matter back to the Court of Queen's Bench to decide stay application, noting that section 7(6) did not prevent the appeal because the chambers judge did not finally decide whether the claim should be stayed) & International Resource Management (Canada) Ltd. v. Kappa Energy (Yemen) Inc., 2000 ABCA 236; 266 A.R. 175 (denied application for summary dismissal of appeal from decision of chambers judge who dismissed appeal from decision of master who granted a stay of proceedings under section 7 on condition that applicant pay into a trust account the invoices in dispute in the action before it can proceed with the arbitration, condition that the respondents had cross-applied for, on the basis that section 7(6) does not bar the appeal because both the master and chambers judge imposed conditions on the arbitration, not on the stay, so it is not a decision under section 7; the Court later allowed the appeal, set aside the chambers judge's order imposing the condition and granted a unconditional stay: 2001 ABCA 146; 281 A.R. 373). Contra, Yaworski v. Gowling Lafleur Henderson LLP, 2013 ABCA 21, aff'ing 2012 ABQB 424, leave to appeal ref'd, 459 N.R. 395 (note) (dismissed appeal from decision of chambers judge who granted a stay of proceedings against personal plaintiff pending arbitration between plaintiff's professional corporation and the defendant under section 7 and under section 18 of Judicature Act insofar as court had no jurisdiction with respect to personal plaintiff under section 7 because he was not a party to the arbitration agreement, agreeing that two sections combined provided the jurisdiction to grant the stay and noting that the arbitration would give the plaintiff, through his personal corporation, effectively everything he sought in the claim, without discussing section 7(6)); Hnatiuk v. Assured Developments Ltd., 2012 ABCA 97; 15 C.L.R. 4th 28, rev'ing 2010 ABQB 258; 92 C.L.R. 3d 216 (allowed appeal from decision of trial judge who dismissed action commenced after an arbitral award was made on the ground

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

iii. The Prohibition Against Appeals Applies to Decisions of Both Masters in Chambers and a Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench

[138] Does the prohibition against appeals apply to decisions of both masters in chambers and judges of the Court of Queen's Bench?

[139] It does.

[140] The operative words in section 7(6) are "[t]here is no appeal". This is straightforward.

[141] A party adversely affected by a decision of a judge of The Provincial Court of Alberta or a master in chambers is bound by it unless a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta has authority to hear an appeal on account of section 46(1) of the Provincial Court Act[111] – "Any party may appeal a decision of the Provincial Court to the Court of Queen's Bench" – or section 12 of the Court of Queen's Bench Act[112] – "An appeal lies to a judge in chambers from a decision of a master in chambers" – and allows the appeal.

[142] Because section 7(6) prohibits appeals of a section 7 order, a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench has no jurisdiction to hear an appeal against a section 7 order of a judge of the Provincial Court or a master in chambers.

[143] If a moving party applied for a stay to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, a party adversely affected by the subsequent section 7 decision is bound unless the Court of Appeal has authority to hear an appeal on account of section 3(b)(iv)(A) of the Judicature Act[113] – "The Court of Appeal ... (b) has jurisdiction and power, subject to the Rules of Court, to hear and determine ... (iv) all appeals ... respecting a judgment, order or decision of (A) a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench" – and allows the appeal.

---

of res judicata because parties should have raised the issues in the claim during the arbitration, on the basis that no one applied for a stay under section 7 and the defendant waived his right to arbitration and attorned to the court's jurisdiction by participating in the litigation for years, and even if an application under section 7 were made the delay for it would be gross, without mentioning section 7(6)) & New Era Nutrition Inc. v. Balance Bar Co., 2004 ABCA 280; 245 D.L.R. 4th 107, rev'ing in part 2003 ABQB 509 (allowed appeal from part of decision of chambers judge who dismissed application for declaration to stay arbitration (not litigation) in favour of concurrent court proceedings in which the applicant relied on, among others, multiplicity of proceedings and abuse of process, staying the arbitration under the court's "residual jurisdiction to prevent unfairness set out in section 6(c)" on the basis that litigation was necessary as it involved parties not subject to the arbitration agreement and the legislature's amendments to section 7 recognizes that multiple proceedings on the same matter are undesirable, without discussing section 7(6) and where no party sought a stay of the court proceedings under section 7).

[111] R.S.A. 2000, c. P-31.

[112] R.S.A. 2000, c. C-31.

[113] R.S.A. 2000, c. J-2.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[144] Because section 7(6) prohibits appeals of a section 7 order, the Court of Appeal has no jurisdiction to hear an appeal against a section 7 order of a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta.

[145] There is only one plausible or permissible meaning that section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act bears. A party that is bound by a mandatory arbitration agreement and adversely affected by a stay application decision under section 7 of the Arbitration Act may not appeal a decision of a judge of The Provincial Court of Alberta or a decision of master in chambers to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench or a decision of a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench to the Court of Appeal.

[146] This means that a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench had no jurisdiction to hear an appeal against the decision of Master Prowse.

[147] In order for the Arbitration Act[114] to allow appeals from a master in chambers to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, section 7(6) would have to look like this: "There is no appeal from a decision of a judge of The Provincial Court of Alberta to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench or of a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench to the Court of Appeal under this section". This version – by making no mention of a decision of a master in chambers – does not, in any way, deprive section 12 of the Court of Queen's Bench Act – "An appeal lies to a judge in chambers from a decision of a master in chambers" – of its full force.

3. General Provisions in the Judicature Act, the Alberta Rules of Court, and the Court of Queen's Bench Act that Allow Appeals of Queen's Bench Decisions Do Not Assist the Respondents

[148] As already noted, section 3(b)(iv)(A) of the Judicature Act[115] expressly states that the Court of Appeal has the general jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals from judgments, orders or decisions of a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench. To similar effect is rule 14.4(1) of the Alberta Rules of Court:[116] "Except as otherwise provided, an appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from the whole or any part of a decision of a Court of Queen's Bench judge sitting in court or chambers ... ."

[149] Section 12 of the Court of Queen's Bench Act states that "[a]n appeal lies to a judge in chambers from a decision of a master in chambers". So does rule 6.14(1) of the Alberta Rules of Court: "If a master makes a judgment or order, the applicant or respondent ... may appeal the judgment or order to a judge".

---

[114] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43.

[115] R.S.A. 2000, c. J-2.

[116] Alta. Reg. 124/2010.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[150] But these provisions are general grants of authority. Specific statutory provisions may limit a general grant of authority. Professor Sullivan explains this concept:[117] "When two provisions are in conflict and one of them deals specifically with the matter in question while the other has a more general application, the conflict may be resolved applying the specific provision to the exclusion of the more general one". So do Justice Scalia and Professor Garner:[118] "If there is a conflict between a general provision and a specific provision, the specific provision prevails. … Under this canon, the specific provision is treated as an exception to the general rule". Justice Scalia and Professor Garner also explain why:[119] "Jeremy Bentham supplied the rationale: '[T]he particular provision is established upon a nearer and more exact view of the subject than the general, of which it may be regarded as a correction'. Or think of it this way: the specific provision comes closer to addressing the very problem posed by the case at hand and is thus more deserving of credence". I agree. "It makes no sense to apply a general rule as opposed to a specific rule to a fact pattern expressly dealt with by the specific rule".[120]

[151] Suppose parents tell their teenage daughter at the start of her grade-twelve year that her curfew is midnight. But they also tell her and her date to her grade-twelve graduation celebration that she must be home by 2 a.m. the night of the prom. A reasonable observer would understand that the ordinary curfew is still in force for all evenings except the evening of the grade-twelve prom. There is a specific curfew for prom night that supersedes the general curfew.

[152] Section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act[121] is a specific rule for appeals of section 7(1) stay application orders. It applies in this case – not the general provisions incorporated in the Judicature Act,[122] the Court of Queen's Bench Act[123] and the Alberta Rules of Court.[124] As a result, the [117] The Construction of Statutes 354 (7th ed. 2022). See also Morton v. Mancari, 417 U.S. 535, 550-51 (1974) per Blackmun, J. ("Where there is no clear intention otherwise, a specific statute will not be controlled or nullified by a general one, regardless of the priority of enactment") & The Queen ex rel. Vezina v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp., 84 C.C.C. 3d 574 (Ont. C.A. 1993), leave to appeal ref'd, [1993] S.C.C.A. No. 524 (Canada Elections Act provisions regulating broadcasters' obligations during a federal election to provide paid and free time to registered political parties, and not the Broadcasting Act's general requirement that broadcasters treat accredited political parties equitably, govern the obligation of broadcasters during federal general elections).

---

[118] Reading Law: The Interpretation of Legal Texts 183 (2012).

[119] Id.

[120] Acciona Infrastructure Canada Inc. v. Posco Daewoo Corp., 2019 ABCA 241, ¶ 176; 91 Alta. L.R. 6th 59, 105 per Wakeling, J.A.

[121] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43.

[122] R.S.A. 2000, c. J-2, s. 3(b)(iv)(A).

[123] R.S.A. 2000, c. C-31, s. 12.

[124] Alta. Reg. 124/2010.

Judicature Act, the Court of Queen's Bench Act and the Alberta Rules of Court do not assist the respondents.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

C. Decisions of a Master in Chambers Under Section 7 of the Arbitration Act Are Subject to Appellate or Judicial Review

[153] Mr. Drewry, Q.C., counsel for Orbis Engineering, and Mr. Popowich, counsel for the Elliott companies, argue that section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act[125] contravenes section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867[126] if it is interpreted to insulate decisions of a master in chambers under section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act from appeals to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench. They ask us to interpret section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act so that it will comply with section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 – allow a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench to hear an appeal from a decision of a master in chambers.

[154] The argument,[127] as I understand it, goes as follows. First, masters in chambers are appointed by the provincial legislature. Second, a legislature cannot assign to a master the authority that a superior court justice appointed under section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 would have. Third, because masters do not have authority "in their own right", a master cannot fetter the discretion of a Court of Queen's Bench judge, and as "final determination of a dispute between the parties must be done by a judge", a master's decision must always be subject to appeal. Fourth, on this basis, section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act cannot bar appeals from a master's decision even if they are entirely under section 7 of that act because doing so would grant the master authority that is the "exclusive purview" of a superior court judge.

[155] It is necessary to explore some of these points.

---

[125] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43.

[126] 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3 (U.K.).

[127] Factum of the Respondent Orbis Engineering Field Services Ltd. ¶¶ 83-84, 88 & 89-92. See also Factum of the Respondents Elliott Turbomachinery Canada, Inc. and Elliott Company ¶¶ 63-76.

[156] It is not contentious that section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867[128] places limits on the authority that a provincial legislature may delegate or assign[129] to masters over and beyond the authority vested in this office prior to July 1, 1867.[130]

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

---

[128] 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3 (U.K.).

[129] P. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada § 7:15 (5th ed. looseleaf rel. 2021-1) ("The courts have held that the provincial Legislatures may not confer on a body other than a superior, district or county court judicial functions analogous to those performed by a superior, district or county court. This little separation of powers doctrine has been developed to preclude evasion of the stipulations of ss. 96 to 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867. If ss. 96 to 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 were read literally, they could easily be evaded by a province which wanted to assume control of its judicial appointments. The province could increase the jurisdiction of its inferior courts so that they assumed much of the jurisdiction of the higher courts; or the province could vest higher-court jurisdiction in a newly-established tribunal, and call that tribunal an inferior court or an administrative tribunal. It is therefore not surprising that the courts have added a gloss to s. 96 and the associated constitutional provisions. What they have said is this: if a province invests a tribunal with a jurisdiction of a kind that ought properly to belong to a superior, district or county court, then that tribunal, whatever its official name, is for constitutional purposes a superior, district or county court and must satisfy the requirements of s. 96 and the associated provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867. This means that such a tribunal will be invalidly constituted, unless its members (1) are appointed by the federal government in conformity with s. 96, (2) are drawn from the bar of the province in conformity with ss. 97 and 98, and (3) receive salaries that are fixed and provided by the federal Parliament in conformity with s. 100"); L. Abrams & K. McGuinness, Canadian Civil Procedure Law 155 (2d ed. 2010) ("as provincial appointees, masters cannot be vested with the essential jurisdiction of a section 96 judge under the Constitution Act, 1867") & G. Watson & D. McKay, Holmsted and Watson: Ontario Civil Procedure § 7:26 (looseleaf rel. no. 3, July 2022) ("Masters were provincially appointed court officers. By s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867, the federal government is given the exclusive power to appoint 'the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts.' Since masters were not so appointed, there are constitutional limits to the power that can be given to them"). See also MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725, 737 per Lamer, C.J. (s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 ... limits both Parliament and the provincial legislatures") & Ontario v. Victoria Medical Building Ltd., [1960] S.C.R. 32, 43 (1959) per Judson, J. ("everything the Master does must be authorized by the Rules of Practice, The Judicature Act or some other statute. This does not mean, however, that the Legislature can assign any and all work to him. Section 96 operates as a limiting factor. If this were not so, there would be nothing to prevent the withdrawal of any judicial function from a s. 96 appointee and its assignment to the Master").

[130] G. Watson & D. McKay, Holmsted and Watson: Ontario Civil Procedure § 7:26 (looseleaf rel. no. 3, July 2022) ("Stated generally, subject to the jurisdiction acquired and exercised by masters prior to Confederation, a master could not exercise judicial power which historically could be exercised only by superior and district court judges: ... . This constitutional limitation was well established; less clear was the actual extent of the limitation. Moreover, the issue of what jurisdiction could be given to the master was merely a small part of the larger 's. 96 problem,' i.e., what decision-making powers might the provinces assign to non-s. 96 courts or to provincial tribunals that are not courts at all. ... [T]he accepted general approach was to enquire whether the impugned function was one performed by the master at the time of Confederation. If so, it might be assigned to a master. If not, then the question was whether the jurisdiction was of the type usually exercised by a superior court judge or only 'proper' to be exercised by such a judge: ... . It is at this point that the case law becomes somewhat vague and confusing. It seems that the master might be given jurisdiction over steps designed to ready the case for trial, where one is necessary, and to police and enforce the rules of practice. However, the master could not be given jurisdiction to determine in a final manner the rights of the parties, at least where there was a genuine dispute as to those rights"); P. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada § 7:15 (5th ed. looseleaf rel. 2021-1) ("the difficulty lies in the definition of those functions that ought properly to belong to a superior, district or county court. The courts have attempted to fashion a judicially enforceable rule which would separate 's. 96 functions' from other adjudicatory functions. The attempt has not been successful, and it is difficult to predict with

[157] There are two constitutional rules that arise from the "Judicature" part of the Constitution Act, 1867.[131]

[158] First, the purpose of the "Judicature" part of the Constitution Act, 1867 is to preserve the role of superior courts – the judges of which are appointed by the federal government[132] to courts established by a province – as the guardians of the rule of law.[133] Superior courts ensure that there confidence how the courts will characterize particular adjudicatory functions") & L. Abrams & K. McGuinness, Canadian Civil Procedure Law §2.120-121 (2d ed. 2010) ("In several of the provinces of Canada, a varying extent of jurisdiction is exercised by judicial officers of the court designated as 'masters' ... . In England, the office of master may be traced back several centuries, at least to the Court of Chancery. The masters were officers of that court, who would hear certain points in relation to Chancery cases assigned to them by the Chancellor. The chief of these offices – that of the Master of the Rolls – subsequently was re-classified into one of the most important of the judicial postings in England: effectively, the Master of the Rolls is the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal. The offices of the other masters were abolished in 1852. In their place chief clerks were appointed, who exercised a jurisdiction in Chambers. In 1897, the name of the office was changed back to master. In the Courts of Common Law, the office of master was created in 1837. By the statute creating the office, masters were made officers of the court and were to be appointed to conduct the civil business thereof. In 1867, it was provided that the judges might empower the masters to transact all the business transacted by a judge in chambers not affecting the liberty of the subject"). See also Polson Iron Works v. Munns, 24 D.L.R. 18, 21-22 (Alta. Sup. Ct. Chambers 1915) per Harvey, C.J. ("in England the office of Master is several centuries old in the Court of Chancery. The Master were officers of the Court, but the chief of them, the Master of the Rolls subsequently developed into one of the most important of the judges and the offices of the others were subsequently abolished in 1852 and in their stead were appointed Chief Clerks who exercised a jurisdiction in Chambers. In 1897 the name was again changed to 'Master.' In the common Law Courts the office of Master was created in 1837. By the statute creating the office they were called officers of the Court, and were to be appointed to conduct the civil business thereof and in 1867 it was provided that the Judges might empower them to transact all the business transacted by a Judge in Chambers not affecting the liberty of the subject. In ... [Halsbury] vol. 9, 66 under the head of 'Officers', sec. 5, we find sub.-sec. 3, 'Masters of the Supreme Court.' In para. 142 it is stated that their duties are '(1) The control and superintendence of the central office of the Supreme Court (2) judicial work in Chambers, and (3) issuing directions in points of practice.' From the foregoing it is apparent that at the time of passing of the B.N.A. Act judicial work of the character now assigned to the Master in Chambers was being performed in both the English and Canadian Courts by persons designated by the name 'Master' or some other name, who, by the statutes providing for these offices, were termed 'officers' and not 'Judges' of the Court"); Ontario v. Victoria Medical Building Ltd., [1960] S.C.R. 32, 43 (1959) per Judson, J. ("I am content to adopt the judgment of Harvey C.J.A. in Polson Iron Works v. Munns for its account of the historical origins of the office [of master] and the broad outlines of the jurisdiction") & S.B.I. Management Ltd. v. 109014 Holdings Ltd., 1981 ABCA 235, ¶ 2; 128 D.L.R. 3d 89, 90, leave to appeal granted, [1981] S.C.C.A. No. 372 per Lieberman, J.A. ("The office of Master in Chambers evolved in England over a period of approximately two centuries until, in 1837 the Superior Court (Officers) Act, 1837 (U.K.), c. 30, authorized the appointment of officials to be known as 'Masters of the Court'. That office developed into the present office of 'Queen's Bench master'. The office of Master in Chambers was first established in Alberta in 1913 by the Statute Law Amendment Act, 1913 (Alta.), c. 9, which Act amended the Judicature Ordinance, C.O.N.W.T. 1898, c. 21. The Judicature Ordinance had been inherited from the Northwest Territories by Alberta when it became a province in 1905. The power of the Province to create the office of Master in Chambers emanates from s. 92, para. 14 of the British North America Act, 1867").

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[131] 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3 (U.K.).

[132] The federal government also compensates superior court judges. Judges Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. J-1.

[133] W. Lederman, Continuing Canadian Constitutional Dilemmas 184-85 (1981) ("even though a statute has been enacted by a provincial legislature that is within provincial powers, nevertheless it may raise issues of interpretation is a concordance between the tasks a legislature assigns to a lower court or a statutory delegate and the decisions made by a lower court or a statutory delegate. A lower court or statutory delegate has no jurisdiction to make a decision not within its assigned responsibilities.

[159] Second, a province cannot assign to an inferior court or an administrative tribunal it has created powers that a superior court must have to serve as the guardian of the rule of law.[134] Superior courts have essential or core powers that a province may not abridge.[135] and application that must be entrusted as an original matter to the provincial superior court, as constituted under section 96 of the B.N.A. Act. In other words, there is a guaranteed core of issues arising under valid provincial statutes that the province must assign to its provincial superior court as a matter of original jurisdiction. Title to land is one example, and unlimited jurisdiction to interpret contracts in general is another. ... [Section 96] compels a province to set up the superior courts on the English model ... and it compels the provinces to give them something to do. Our whole history points to this as a safeguard for the rule of law in our country") (emphasis in original). See MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725, 754 per Lamer, C.J. ("The core jurisdiction of the provincial superior courts comprises those powers which are essential to the administration of justice and the maintenance of the rule of law") & O. Martineau and Sons Ltd. v. City of Montreal, [1932] A.C. 113, 121 (P.C. 1931) (Que.) per Lord Blanesburgh ("[Section 96 is] ... the means adopted by the framers of the ... [British North America Act, 1867] to secure the impartiality and the independence of the Provincial judiciary").

---

[134] P. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada § 7.15 (5th ed. looseleaf rel. 2021-1) ("the provincial Legislatures may not confer on a body other than a superior, district or county court judicial functions analogous to those performed by a superior, district or county court. ... It is ... not surprising that the courts have added a gloss to s. 96 and the associated constitutional provisions. What they have said is this: if a province invests a tribunal with a jurisdiction of a kind that ought properly to belong to a superior, district or country court, then that tribunal whatever its official name, is for constitutional purposes a superior, district or country court and must satisfy the requirements of s. 96 and the associated provisions of the Constitution Act 1867. This means that such a tribunal will be invalidly constituted, unless its members (1) are appointed by the federal government in conformity with s. 96, (2) are drawn from the bar of the province in conformity with ss. 97 and 98, and (3) receive salaries that are fixed and provided by the federal Parliament in conformity with s. 100").

[135] Re Residential Tenancies Act, [1981] 1 S.C.R. 714, 748 per Dickson, J. (the Court upheld an opinion of the Ontario Court of Appeal opining that a provision in The Residential Tenancies Act bestowing on the Residential Tenancy Commission to order the eviction of tenants was unconstitutional on the ground that this was within the protected jurisdiction of Ontario's Superior Court: "The Residential Tenancy Commission is charged with the function of interpreting contracts and enforcing contractual rights through the exercise of the impugned powers. The Commission is to be empowered to do what a superior court has always done. It is clearly a Superior Court quoad those powers. The statutory provisions conferring those powers are therefore invalid"); Reference re Section 6 of the Family Relations Act, S.B.C. 1978, c. 20 as amended, [1982] 1 S.C.R. 62, 112-13 per Estey, J. (the Court upheld in part an opinion of the British Columbia Court of appeal that the Family Relations Act constitutionally authorized the Provincial Court to issue guardianship and custody family law orders: "[the] purpose and role [of section 96] ... is in no way jeopardized by the increasing recognition of the implementation of valid provincial programs through provincial administrative and judicial agencies. This will continue to be the case so long as that which is assigned to the provincial body does not have the effect in substance of conferring on that body a judicial function which 'broadly conform[s] to the type of jurisdiction exercised by the superior, district or county courts'"); Québec v. Farrah, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 638 (the Court upheld a decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal declaring unconstitutional a provision in Quebec's Transport Act that granted the Quebec Transport Tribunal exclusive and final appellate jurisdiction on any question of law from any decision of the Quebec Transport Commission, usurping the supervision role of Quebec's Superior Court); Crevier v. Québec, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 220, 238-39 (the Court allowed an appeal against a decision of [160] Orbis Engineering[136] does not take issue with the ability of a master to render a decision under section 7 of the Arbitration Act.[137] Rather, its contention appears to be that the master's decision cannot be final as only section 96 judges can make final determinations of parties' rights – which rests on the implicit premise that a decision under section 7 is a final determination of the rights of the parties.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[161] There is a difficulty with this. It conflates the "finality" of a decision that provides a resolution which brings the parties' dispute to an end – e.g., summary judgment or a trial decision – with that decision being "final" in the sense of not being subject to appeal – e.g., where the decision is protected by a privative clause or made by a court of last resort.

[162] For its position that a master's decisions must always be subject to review by a superior court judge, Orbis Engineering relies on numerous authorities that discuss the validity of specific grants of authority to a master.[138] the Quebec Court of Appeal reversing an order of the Superior Court quashing a decision of the Professions Tribunal that Quebec's Professional Code authorized it to decide questions of law arising from decisions of discipline committees and insulating it from judicial or appellate review) & McEvoy v. New Brunswick, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 704, 718-19 (the Court reversed the judgment of New Brunswick's Court of Appeal opining that Parliament could bestow exclusive jurisdiction on an inferior court to adjudicate indictable offences: "It has long been the rule that s. 96, although in terms an appointing power, must be addressed in functional terms lest its application be eroded. What then, is the relation between the proposed new statutory Court and s. 96? This is the key constitutional issue in the present case and, as we view the matter, the result is to defeat the new statutory Court because it will effectively be a s. 96 Court").

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

---

[136] The Elliott companies seem to generally mirror the position of Orbis Engineering. Factum of the Respondents Elliott Turbomachinery Canada, Inc., and Elliott Company ¶¶ 48-49, 62, 64 & 67-68 ("A decision of a Master is only an interim decision pending a determination by a judge, unless a party accepts it by electing to not appeal. The legislature would not have intended to make such decisions 'unappealable' without expressing that, as Justice Dilts correctly stated. There is long-standing expectation and judicial culture in Alberta that no decision of a Master is final ... . Justice Dilts was correct in that the purpose of section 7 is to limit appeals to the Court of Appeal – and it is not to foreclose appeal to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench. Statutes are not in conflict, the sound policy that all decisions of first instance need be reviewable is maintained, and the constitutional entitlement to have a case heard by a judge is maintained. ... Section 96 of The Constitution Act, 1867 operates as a limiting factor on Masters' powers: the power of a federally appointed Justice prevails over that of a provincial appointee such as a Master in chambers. .... Elliott submits that barring an appeal from a Master to a Queen's Bench Justice would fetter the jurisdiction of the Justice, offending section 96 ... . The effect of section 96 is that parties are entitled to a hearing before a federally appointed Justice"). They add that Agrium has no right to appeal Justice Dilts' decision to this court. Id. ¶¶ 32 & 110.

[137] Factum of the Respondent Orbis Engineering Field Services Ltd. ¶ 103 ("if this Court determines that s. 7(6) of the Arbitration Act may bar an appeal from a master, Orbis submits the bar to appeal would only apply to decisions of a master which clearly fell within the parameters of s. 7").

[138] E.g. Wright v. Disposal Services Ltd., 80 D.L.R. 3d 671, 674 (Alta. Sup. Ct. Trial Div. 1977) per Laycraft, J. ("It was urged upon me during argument that as the master had exercised his discretion, I should follow the practice of appellate courts and not interfere with that discretion even if I disagreed with the result, unless it was plainly based on wrong principle. In my opinion, however, the rule followed by the Appellate Division in an appeal from a trial judge involving an exercise of discretion does not apply to an appeal from the decision of a master in chambers. While that decision is entitled to the greatest respect, the discretionary jurisdiction possessed by a superior court trial judge cannot be fettered in any way by the previous decision of the master. The superior court judge possesses that jurisdiction by virtue of his federal appointment under the powers given the federal Crown by the British North ... [America] Act. His status resulting from that appointment cannot be diminished by the decision of the master appointed by the provincial Crown"); Menduk v. Gore Mutual Ins. Co., 67 W.W.R. 573, 574 & 577 (Alta. Sup. Ct. 1969) per Sinclair, J. ("Counsel for the appellant says, in effect, that the appeal should be heard as though the application were being made de novo. On the other hand, counsel for the respondent urges that the appeal be treated as though it were from a discretionary order of a judge. .... [I]t is clear that an appeal to a judge of the supreme court from a discretionary decision of a master is to be treated as a review and a rehearing. The judge is in no way fettered by the previous exercise of the master's discretion, and is entitled to exercise his own discretion as though the matter came before him for the first time"); Ontario v. Victoria Medical Building Ltd., [1960] S.C.R. 32, 38 (1959) per Kerwin, C.J. ("Notwithstanding the fact that mechanics' liens were unknown at the time of Confederation, my view is that Pomeroy [in Equity Jurisprudence ss. 1268-9] correctly stated the nature of the action given by The Mechanics' Lien Act [as 'ordinary equitable actions resulting in a decree for sale and distribution of the proceeds identical in all their features with suits for the foreclosure of mortgages by judicial action'] and that ... the jurisdiction conferred upon the Master by subs. (1) of s. 31 of The Mechanics' Lien Act broadly conforms to the type of jurisdiction exercised by the Superior, District or County Courts at Confederation"), 41-42 per Judson, J. ("This is not a case where the Province has appointed a new judicial officer to preside over a newly created court or tribunal but one where the Province has increased the jurisdiction of a judicial officer already appointed by the Province. There is no question here of the use of a device to create a new s. 96 court with a new s. 96 judge under another name. What is happening is that work is being redistributed within the s. 96 court itself and new work assigned to a provincially appointed judicial officer. In a sense it is not even an exclusive assignment when a judge of the court, on motion by one of the parties, has the power of removal under s. 31(2). Nevertheless, it is my opinion that the judgment under appeal is well founded and that this legislation is in conflict with the appointing power under s. 96 of the British North America Act, and I reach this conclusion for two reasons — the nature of the jurisdiction which is conferred upon the Master and the fact that he is given the power of final adjudication in these matters, subject to the usual right of appeal to the Court of Appeal as from a single judge"); Polson Iron Works v. Munns, 24 D.L.R. 18, 22 (Alta. Sup. Ct. Chambers 1915) per Harvey, C.J. ("It is perfectly clear, of course, that the legislature could not provide for the office [of master] either specifically or generally and leave the executive or the Judges to give him a jurisdiction which would make him practically a Judge, but, in my opinion, that has not been done here. The Judge's chief duty is to determine the rights of parties in the first instance by trial, and subsequently on appeal. The practice and procedure is for the purpose of accomplishing these results, advantageously and expeditiously. The work in Chambers is practically all leading up to trial and appeal. It is to this subsidiary work that the Master's jurisdiction is confined. The order under consideration is perhaps the nearest approach to determining the rights of parties by trial that the rules authorize the Master to make. But in reality, he is not trying the rights of the parties. He is determining that there is no real issue to be tried. It is only when such a situation is found to exist that the Master is authorized to give a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. When he gives a judgment in favor of the defendant apparently all he does is to give effect to and enforce some rule of practice e.g. for failure to prosecute the action as required by the rules. The Master has no jurisdiction in trials or in appeals and all of his acts are subject to review by a judge. His office is essentially that of an officer preparing litigation for its legitimate purpose, viz. a trial of the rights of the parties which is exclusively reserved for the judges to whom it essentially belongs. His duties, therefore, while largely judicial in their character, do not constitute him a judge since from them are reserved the essential duties of a judge"); Colonial Investment & Loan Co. v. Grady, 24 D.L.R. 176, 176, 178 & 179 (Alta. Sup. Ct. App. Div. 1915) per Stuart, J. ("the Legislative Assembly of Alberta provided a special method of procedure for the enforcement of rights under mortgages, encumbrances and agreements of sale. Section 3 of that Act reads as follows: – 'All proceedings to secure or enforce any right, remedy or obligation under a mortgage, encumbrance or agreement of sale, or in respect of the lands, moneys, covenants, conditions, stipulations or agreements described or contained therein, shall be brought before a Master in Chambers in the Supreme Court of Alberta under the provisions of this Act and as nearly as may be in accordance with the practice and procedure of the said Court.' .... [T]he Master was 'to have jurisdiction to hear all evidence, adjourn all hearings, grant all orders, pronounce all judgments, and to do all other

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[163] It is not clear how these cases support Orbis Engineering's position. Given its concession that a master may render a decision under section 7, the only issue arising from the argument as framed is whether the absence of a right to appeal to a Court of Queen's Bench judge renders Alberta's assignment of jurisdiction to the master ultra vires the Alberta legislature.

[164] It would seem that the argument comes down to whether a provincial legislature can assign to a master decision-making authority that can properly rest in that office but that is insulated from appeal to a section 96 judge.

[165] The argument assumes that a decision of a master in chambers is not subject to appeal or judicial review.

[166] As I will explain, this is not the case.

[167] A determination that section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act[139] prohibits appeals from orders of a master in chambers under section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench does not mean that a decision of a master in chambers is immune from appellate or judicial review.

[168] First, an order of a master in chambers under section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act is, for the purpose of section 40(1) of the Supreme Court Act,[140] a "final or other judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal or of the highest court of final resort in a province ... in which judgment can be acts or things that may be necessary in finally disposing of such proceedings,' and this subject only to certain conditions of procedure and certain enactments by way of substantive law which in no way limited his final and complete jurisdiction. It is obvious that it was left entirely in the discretion of the Master to decide whether or not he should exercise powers which were undoubtedly as full and complete as those held by a Judge of the Supreme Court. He could, indeed, if he thought best, direct an action to be brought or an issue to be tried, but it was still open to him to hear oral evidence as at a trial and to give as full and as final a judgment as a Judge of the Court could give, no matter what issue of fact, e.g., fraud or other ground of defence, might have been raised. He was to do all this 'in the Supreme Court.' It seems to me that it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that by such legislation the Master was constituted in effect a Judge of the Supreme Court with a jurisdiction limited indeed to its extent but not in its content, that is, limited to a certain very important branch of litigation, but practically unlimited within that sphere, and subject only with respect to his final judgment to an appeal to the Appellate Division in the same way as a final judgment of any ordinary Judge of the Supreme Court. For this reason I think the legislation was ultra vires of a Provincial Legislature, inasmuch as it was inconsistent with the appointing power expressly given to the Dominion in the B.N.A. Act") (emphasis in original) & S.B.I. Management Ltd. v. 109014 Holdings Ltd., 1981 ABCA 235, ¶¶ 41, 42 & 60; 128 D.L.R. 3d. 89, 100 & 105 per Lieberman, J.A., leave to appeal granted, [1981] S.C.C.A. No. 372 ("That a Master, in the proper case, can grant summary judgment is beyond dispute. ... In the present case, the Master held that there was no triable issue. He was on the facts entitled and, I might say, compelled to so find. The question becomes whether granting an order for possession in these circumstances can be regarded as analogous to granting summary judgment. In my view, it can. .... Applying the threefold test to the situation faced by the Master in this case, I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that he did have jurisdiction to grant the order for possession").

---

[139] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43.

[140] R.S.C. 1985, c. S-26.

had in the particular case" and, with leave of the Supreme Court of Canada, may be appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada.[141] The Supreme Court of Canada is a superior court.[142] It follows that an order of a master in chambers under section 7(1) of the Arbitration Act is not immune from appellate review. This, in my opinion, is a complete answer to Orbis Engineering's constitutional argument.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

---

[141] Uber Technologies Inc. v. Heller, 2020 SCC 16, n. 5 per Abella & Rowe, JJ. ("if the motion judge had issued a stay under the ... [Arbitration Act], no appeal to the Court of Appeal would have been available (... [Arbitration Act] s. 7(6)). A direct appeal to this Court with leave would still have been permissible"); Argentina v. Mellino, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 536, 545 per La Forest, J. ("This appeal is brought under s. 41 [now section 40(1)] of the Supreme Court Act ... which in broad terms empowers this Court to grant leave to appeal from any final or other judgment of the highest court of final resort in a province, or a judge thereof, in which judgment can be had in a particular case. The Act again underscores the breadth of the provision in s. 2(1) by defining 'the court appealed from' as 'the court from which the appeal is brought directly to the Supreme Court, whether such court is one of original jurisdiction or a court of appeal', and 'final judgment' as 'any judgment, rule, order or decision that determines in whole or in part any substantive right of any of the parties in controversy in any judicial proceeding'. On a plain reading of these provisions ... it [is] obvious that s. 41 applied to the present case. The decision of Waite J., from which this appeal is taken, finally dismissed the application for extradition") & Le Syndicat des employés de bureau de l'Hydro-Québec v. Québec, [1973] S.C.R. 790, 791 ("The Court, being of the opinion that the judgment of the Honourable Jean Saint-Germain of the Superior Court, granting ... the petition presented by the Attorney General of the Province of Quebec under s. 99 of the Labour Code of Quebec, is, in law, a judgment from which an appeal lies to the Court of Appeal of the Province of Quebec, it follows that no appeal lies from that judgment to this Court under s. 41 [now section 40(1)] of the Supreme Court Act").

[142] Lederman, "The Independence of the Judiciary" 34 Can. B. Rev. 769, 1175 (1956) ("Section 101 of the B.N.A. Act contemplates the establishment of federal superior courts. This arises from the use of the word 'court' in the section, and indeed the 'General Court of Appeal for Canada' would necessarily and preeminently be a superior court on the English model. To consider that section 101 could mean anything else would be so incongruous as to be absurd"). See Addy v. Canada, 22 D.L.R. 4th 52, 60 (Fed. Ct. Tr. Div. 1985) per Grant, J. ("the Supreme Court of Canada and the Federal Court of Canada are superior courts within the meaning of s. 99(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867, and that the judges of both ... courts are ... superior court judges"). A court is presumably either superior or inferior. There is no third option. But the terms may take on different meanings depending on context. See P. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada § 7:14 (5th ed. looseleaf rel. 2021-1) ("Do the provisions of ss. 96 to 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, dealing with appointment, payment and tenure of higher court judges, apply to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Federal Court of Appeal, the Federal Court, the Tax Court of Canada and the higher territorial courts? There is no doubt that those courts are 'superior courts'). See also Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, s. 35(1) ("In every enactment … 'superior court' means (a) in the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador, the Supreme Court, (a.1) in the Province of Ontario, the Court of Appeal for Ontario and the Superior Court of Justice, (b) in the Province of Quebec, the Court of Appeal and the Superior Court in and for the Province, (c) in the Province of New Brunswick, Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta, the Court of Appeal for the Province and the Court of Queen's Bench for the Province, (d) in the Provinces of Nova Scotia, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island, the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of the Province, and (e) the Supreme Court of Yukon, the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories and the Nunavut Court of Justice, and includes the Supreme Court of Canada, the Federal Court of Appeal, the Federal Court and the Tax Court of Canada") (emphasis added).

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[169] Second, given that a master in chambers is not a section 96 superior court judge, it is arguable that a party may apply to a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench for judicial review[143] of a master in chambers' decision under section 7 of the Arbitration Act.[144] While it is true that the availability of an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada under section 40(1) of the Supreme Court Act would cause a reviewing court to consider whether this is a sufficient reason to decline to hear a judicial review application,[145] it is not obvious to me what the outcome of that issue would be.

[170] If the judicial review court concluded that section 40(1) of the Supreme Court Act[146] provided an adequate alternative remedy, it may decline to grant any relief. If the court came to the opposite conclusion, it may decide to grant a judicial review remedy.

[171] Section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act[147] does not deprive section 40(1) of the Supreme Court Act of its force.

[172] First, Alberta does not have the constitutional authority to regulate the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.[148] Only Parliament has the authority to do so.[149] As a result, the presumption of [143] D. Jones, Q.C. & A. de Villars, Q.C., Principles of Administrative Law 7 (7th ed. 2020) ("Superior courts have the inherent power to review the legality of administrative actions performed by statutory delegates; in other words, they have the inherent power to judicially review the actions or decisions of statutory delegates. This inherent power of judicial review is the natural consequence of the courts' role to interpret the meaning of statutes, including determining the ambit of statutes which grant powers to statutory delegates. Courts decide whether administrative actions are ultra vires. Superior courts have historically used the prerogative remedies of certiorari, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto and habeas corpus to exercise supervisory jurisdiction over inferior courts and statutory delegates") (emphasis added).

---

[144] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43.

[145] Harelkin v. University of Regina, [1979] 2 S.C.R. 561, 592 per Beetz, J. ("I have reached the conclusion that appellant's right of appeal to the senate committee provided him with an adequate alternative remedy [to judicial review]. In addition, this remedy was in my opinion a more convenient remedy for appellant as well as for the university in terms of costs and expeditiousness") & Chad Investments Ltd. v. Longson, Tammets & Denton Real Estate Ltd., 20 D.L.R. 3d 627, 631 (Alta. Sup. Ct. App. Div. 1971) per McDermid, J.A. ("It is a wrongful exercise of judicial discretion, unless there are special circumstances, to grant an order of certiorari where the party aggrieved has been given an effective right of appeal which the party has not taken advantage of and which has expired"). See D. Jones, Q.C. & A. de Villars, Q.C., Principles of Administrative Law 602 (7th ed. 2020) ("the existence of a statutory right of appeal may result in a court exercising its discretion to refuse to grant judicial review of a statutory delegate's decision, and, as a result, deny the remedies available on judicial review").

[146] R.S.C. 1985, c. S-26.

[147] R.S.A. 2000, c. A-43.

[148] L. Watt, G. Ragan, G. Régimbald, J. Beedell & M. Estabrooks, Supreme Court of Canada Practice (2022) 1.1 ("Where a provincial statute has removed the right of appeal to a provincial court of appeal, a direct appeal will lie to the [Supreme] Court with leave. In other words, a province cannot constitutionally deprive litigants of an appeal to the Court by legislating that there shall be no further appeal from a judgment of a provincial appellate court").

[149] Crown Grain Co. v. Day, [1908] A.C. 504, 507 (P.C.) (Can.) per Lord Robertson ("It is to be observed that the subject in conflict [the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada] belongs primarily to the subject-matter committed validity means that section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act only limits the jurisdiction of judges of the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Appeal – courts established by provincial legislation[150] – to hear appeals against orders of masters in chambers and judges of the Court of Queen's Bench respectively.

[173] Second, if Alberta does have the constitutional authority to preclude appeals from a master in chambers or a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench to the Supreme Court of Canada, which I am satisfied it does not, the doctrine of dominion paramountcy[151] resolves the conflict between section 7(6) of the Arbitration Act and section 40(1) of the Supreme Court Act in favor of the Supreme Court Act. As Professor Lederman opines, if the dominion paramountcy doctrine is engaged, "provincial legislation is suspended or inoperative".[152] to the Dominion Parliament, namely, the establishment of the Court of Appeal for Canada. But, further, let it be assumed that the subject-matter is open to both legislative bodies [Manitoba and Parliament]; if the powers thus overlap, the enactment of the Dominion Parliament must prevail") & Re Sutherland, 134 D.L.R. 3d 177, 181 (Man. C.A. chambers 1982) per Huband, J.A. ("The Payment of Wages Act purports to make the decision of the County Court Judge 'final'. But the Supreme Court Act recognizes the possibility of an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from any 'final or other judgment of the highest court of final resort in a province'. For the purposes of the Payment of Wages Act, there can be no doubt but that the provincial legislature has endeavoured to constitute the County Court as the Court of final resort in a Province. But in doing so, the provincial legislature has not attempted to foreclose an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada"). See P. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada § 8:5 (5th ed. looseleaf rel. 2021-1) ("If a province would prefer that litigation in a field within provincial jurisdiction be finally disposed of at the level of the provincial court of appeal, it cannot constitutionally give effect to that preference").

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

[150] Court of Queen's Bench Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. C-31 & Court of Appeal Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. C-30.

[151] Lederman, "Classification of Laws and the British North America Act" in Legal Essays in Honour of Arthur Moxon 202 (J. Corry, F. Cronkite & E. Whitmore eds. 1953) reprinted in W. Lederman, Continuing Canadian Constitutional Dilemmas 244-45 (1981) ("it is a principle of our constitution that in the event of a collision between a federal law and a provincial law each valid under the double-aspect theory, the federal features of the former law are considered in the last analysis more important than the provincial features of the latter") & Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, ¶ 32; [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, 30 per Binnie & LeBel, JJ. ("the doctrine of federal paramountcy ... recognizes that where laws of the federal and provincial levels come into conflict, there must be a rule to resolve the impasse. Under our system, the federal law prevails").

[152] Lederman, "Some Forms and Limitations of Co-Operative Federalism", 45 Can. B. Rev. 409, 417 (1967) ("In the event of conflict, the judicial doctrine of dominion paramountcy is to the effect that federal legislation prevails and provincial legislation is suspended or inoperative").

VII. Conclusion

[174] I would allow the appeal – the order under appeal is of no effect with the result that the order of Master Prowse remains in force.

[175] I acknowledge the very high quality of counsel's written and oral arguments.

Appeal heard on June 15, 2022

Memorandum filed at Calgary, Alberta
this 8th day of August, 2022

Wakeling J.A.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

Appearances:

D.J. McDonald, Q.C./M. Deyholos
for the Appellant

R.B. Drewry, Q.C./A.F. Jeffs for the Respondent, Orbis Engineering Field Services Ltd.

C.J. Popowich/K.L. Reiffenstein for the Respondents, Elliott Turbomachinery Canada Inc. and Elliott Company

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

Corrigendum of the Memorandum of Judgment of the Honourable Justice Crighton and the Honourable Justice Ho

Dissenting Memorandum of Judgment of the Honourable Justice Wakeling

---

Page 51 - Counsel has been changed from L.K. Feehan to A.F. Jeffs for the Respondent, Orbis Engineering Field Services Ltd.

2022 ABCA 266 (CanLII)

CED Guarantee, Indemnity and Standby Letters of Credit § 134

Canadian Encyclopedic Digest

Guarantee, Indemnity and Standby Letters of Credit

Prepared by Kevin McGuinness, LL.B., LL.M., S.J.D., Steele Raymond Professor of Business Law, Bournemouth University, England; Member of the Law Society of Upper Canada and the Law Society of England and Wales: October 1996, Updated by the legal editorial staff of Thomson Reuters Canada: January 2025

XIII. Indemnities

D. Miscellaneous

---

§ 134. Indemnification Against Own Negligence

Topic Summary

The law presumes that any indemnity given to a person is not intended to extend to loss or cost arising by reason of that person's own negligence or the negligence of his or her employees or agents. [1] However, as noted above, there is no absolute prohibition against the provision of an indemnity to a person against his or her own negligence—indeed, public liability insurance would scarcely exist if there was such a prohibition—and therefore the question whether a particular contractual or other indemnity affords such protection is one of construction. [2] Nevertheless, in construing contractual indemnities other than insurance contracts, there is a strong bias in the courts against interpreting the indemnity as affording protection against the indemnified person's own negligence. [3] By and large, the courts' attitude in construing indemnity provisions is stricter than that which they adopt in construing the scope of exclusion clauses. [4]

Absent an express provision dealing with negligence, [5] a right to indemnity will be inferred only where it arises by necessary implication, that is, where no interpretation of the indemnity agreement is possible other than that it must extend to negligence in order for the provision to be given meaning. Specifically, if the words used in the agreement are wide enough to encompass negligence, the court will consider whether there is some non-negligent base of liability that is neither remote nor fanciful which the parties might have had in mind when drafting the contract. If such an alternative liability exists, then the court will construe the indemnity not to apply to the indemnified person's own negligence. [6]

© 2025 Thomson Reuters Canada Limited.

Footnotes

1 Walters v. Whessoe Ltd. (1968), 6 Build. L.R. 23 (C.A.); E.E. Caledonia Ltd. v. Orbit Valve Co. Europe, [1993] 4 All E.R. 165 (Eng. Q.B.).

2 Smith v. South Wales Switchgear Ltd. (1977), [1978] 1 All E.R. 18 (U.K. H.L.).

3 E.E. Caledonia Ltd. v. Orbit Valve Co. Europe, [1993] 4 All E.R. 165 (Eng. Q.B.).

4 Livingstone v. Roskilly, [1992] 3 N.Z.L.R. 230; Smith v. South Wales Switchgear Ltd. (1977), [1978] 1 All E.R. 18 (U.K. H.L.).

5 Hancock Shipping Co. v. Deacon & Trysail (Private) Ltd., [1991] 2 Lloyds Rep. 550 (Q.B.).

WESTLAW EDGE CANADA Copyright © Thomson Reuters Canada Limited or its licensors (excluding individual court documents). All rights reserved.

6 Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry Ltd., [1945] 1 All E.R. 244 (Eng. C.A.); Canada Steamship Lines Ltd. v. R., [1952] A.C. 192 (Canada P.C.); E.E. Caledonia Ltd. v. Orbit Valve Co. Europe, [1993] 4 All E.R. 165 (Eng. Q.B.); Kocherkewych v. Greyhound Canada Transportation Corp. (2006), 2006 CarswellBC 808 (B.C. S.C.) (indemnity clause not containing express language exempting corporation from negligence of its own employees; words not wide enough in their ordinary meaning to cover such consequence; such liability being remarkable obligation and requiring very clear words; corporation's interpretation contradicted by other clause in agreement; clause directed to other non-fanciful heads of damage).

End of Document

Copyright © Thomson Reuters Canada Limited or its licensors (excluding individual court documents). All rights reserved.

HMF-28 Requisite elements of the tort of fraudulent misrepresentation.

Halsbury's Laws of Canada - Misrepresentation and Fraud (2023 Reissue), 2023 Reissue

Margaret Isabel Hall, Shirley Margolis (Main Title Contributors)

(Updates prepared by LexisNexis Canada Inc.)

HMF*-28

Halsbury's Laws of Canada - Misrepresentation and Fraud (2023 Reissue) (Jovellano, Margolis) > IV. Fraudulent Misrepresentation Founded in Tort > 1. The Tort of Fraudulent Misrepresentation > (2) Requisite Elements of the Tort

IV. Fraudulent Misrepresentation Founded in Tort

1. The Tort of Fraudulent Misrepresentation

(2) Requisite Elements of the Tort

Requisite elements of the tort of fraudulent misrepresentation.

Cumulative Supplement - Current to December 15, 2023

Note 2

Chaba v. Khan, [2020] O.J. No. 4465, 2020 ONCA 643 (Ont. C.A.), leave to appeal refused (sub nom. Swat Emeraldmine and Marketing Inc. v. Chaba) [2020] S.C.C.A. No. 442 (S.C.C.). See also Rana v. Ramzan, [2023] O.J. No. 4668, 2023 ONSC 5792 (Ont. S.C.J.); Kramer v. Collins, [2023] O.J. No. 4723, 2023 ONSC 6011 (Ont. S.C.J.).

HMF-28 Requisite elements of the tort of fraudulent misrepresentation.

The requisite elements to establish the tort of fraudulent misrepresentation may be summarized as follows:

1. A false representation of fact made by the defendant to the plaintiff;
2. Some level of knowledge of the falsehood of the representation on the part of the defendant (including recklessness);
3. That the false representation caused the plaintiff to act (the plaintiff's actions were caused by their reliance on the defendant's representation); and
4. That the plaintiff's actions resulted in a loss to the plaintiff.[1]

Requirement of intention uncertain. Historically, a fifth element has been applied: a requirement of intention, on the part of the defendant, that the false representation be acted upon by the plaintiff, in addition to the plaintiff relying and thereby acting on the false statement.[2] Various courts have characterized this element as the defendant's intention to "induce" the plaintiff to act on the misrepresentation, an element separate and apart from the plaintiff's actually being induced to act by their belief in, and subsequent reliance on, the veracity of the false statement. However, there is some uncertainty as to whether a defendant's intention that the false representation be acted on remains a necessary element of a fraudulent misrepresentation claim.[3] Should it constitute a necessary element for such a claim, an intention may be proven directly with evidence, or inferred from the lack of evidence of a credible explanation for the actor's concealment or false representation.[4]

Misrepresentation must have been made to the plaintiff. A plaintiff must not merely show that they relied on the representations of the defendant that the latter knew were false or made recklessly without care for their truth or falsity.[5] The plaintiff must also demonstrate that the defendant made the false statement of fact directly to the plaintiff or, in the alternative, made the misrepresentation with the intent that the plaintiff would rely and act upon it.[6]

Reliance is a subjective test. The element of reliance is essential to proving a claim of fraudulent misrepresentation.[7] In determining whether a plaintiff has proven the element of reliance when making a claim for the tort of deceit, courts apply a subjective test[8] and ask whether the defendant's misrepresentation was material to the plaintiff and thereby induced them to act.[9]

Implied existence of a legal duty. While the requisite elements for fraudulent misrepresentation do not require there to be a legal duty owed by the defendant to the plaintiff, an implied duty will be found.[10] The implied duty relates to a representor's responsibility to avoid making a statement of fact to a representee that they know to be false, or recklessly without care for its truth or falsity, with the intention that the representee would rely and act upon it.[11] Where the representor knowingly makes a false statement of fact that the representee relies upon to their detriment, the representor breaches the implied legal duty, and the representee has a case for fraudulent misrepresentation.[12]

Footnote(s)

1 Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. v. Hryniak, [2014] S.C.J. No. 8 at paras. 18-21, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 126 (S.C.C.). See also Bank of Montreal v. 1870769 Ontario Inc., [2022] O.J. No. 4237, 2022 ONSC 5100 (Ont. S.C.J.).

2 Midland Resources Holding Limited v. Shtaif, [2017] O.J. No. 1978 at para. 162, 2017 ONCA 320 (Ont. C.A.), citing Amertek Inc. v. Canadian Commercial Corp., [2005] O.J. No. 2789 at para. 63, 76 O.R. (3d) 241 (Ont. C.A.), leave to appeal refused [2005] S.C.C.A. No. 439 (S.C.C.); Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Deloitte & Touche, [2003] O.J. No. 2069 at para. 21, 172 O.A.C. 59 (Ont. S.C.J.), citing Parna v. G. & S. Properties Ltd., [1970] S.C.J. No. 81, 15 D.L.R. (3d) 336 at 344 (S.C.C.); Chaba v. Khan, [2020] O.J. No. 4465 at para. 15, 2020 ONCA 643 (Ont. C.A.), referring with approval to Mariani v. Lemstra, [2004] O.J. No. 4283 at para. 12, 246 D.L.R. (4th) 489 (Ont. C.A.), leave to appeal refused [2004] S.C.C.A. No. 355 (S.C.C.). See also Silver v. Imax Corp., [2009] O.J. No. 5585 at para. 76, 86 C.P.C. (6th) 273 (Ont. S.C.J.), leave to appeal refused [2011] O.J. No. 656, 2011 ONSC 1035 (Ont. Div. Ct.), citing Carom v. Bre-X Minerals Ltd., [1998] O.J. No. 1428 at paras. 24-25, 20 C.P.C. (4th) 163 (Ont. Gen. Div.), where the Court held that this element of the action is met where a plaintiff demonstrates that the defendant intended that a class of persons including the plaintiff, and not merely the plaintiff, would rely upon the misrepresentation.

3 Trump v. Singh, [2016] O.J. No. 5285 at para. 141, 2016 ONCA 747 (Ont. C.A.), leave to appeal refused [2016] S.C.C.A. No. 548 (S.C.C.). In that case, the Court held that "… it is not clear from the case law that an intention that the false representation be acted on is a necessary element of a fraudulent misrepresentation claim", citing Bruno Appliance and Furniture, Inc. v. Hryniak, [2014] S.C.J. No. 8 at para. 21, 2014 SCC 8, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 126 (S.C.C.), and Bhasin v. Hrynew, [2014] S.C.J. No. 71 at para. 88, 2014 SCC 71, [2014] 3 S.C.R. 494 (S.C.C.). See also Nguyen v. Adas, [2022] O.J. No. 1930 at para. 55, 2022 ONSC 2541 (Ont. S.C.J.).

4 Precision Drilling Canada Limited Partnership v. Yangarra Resources Ltd., [2017] A.J. No. 1194 at para. 32, 2017 ABCA 378 (Alta. C.A.). See also Caroti v. Vuletic, [2022] O.J. No. 3955 at para. 547, 2022 ONSC 4695 (Ont. S.C.J.).

5 997219 Ontario Inc. (c.o.b. Lightning Capital) v. Mantella, [2002] O.J. No. 372 at para. 24 (Ont. S.C.J.) citing Lewis N. Klar, Tort Law, 2d ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1996), at 495.

6 997219 Ontario Inc. (c.o.b. Lightning Capital) v. Mantella, [2002] O.J. No. 372 at para. 24 (Ont. S.C.J.) citing Lewis N. Klar, Tort Law, 2d ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1996), at 495.

7 Kelemen v. El-Homeira, [1999] A.J. No. 1279 at para. 7, 73 Alta. L.R. (3d) 399 (Alta. C.A.), leave to appeal refused [2000] S.C.C.A. No. 140 (S.C.C.) citing Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, 17th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1995) at 732.

8 Kelemen v. El-Homeira, [1999] A.J. No. 1279 at para. 10, 73 Alta. L.R. (3d) 399 (Alta. C.A.), leave to appeal refused [2000] S.C.C.A. No. 140 (S.C.C.).

9 Kelemen v. El-Homeira, [1999] A.J. No. 1279 at para. 7, 73 Alta. L.R. (3d) 399 (Alta. C.A.), leave to appeal refused [2000] S.C.C.A. No. 140 (S.C.C.) citing Clerk & Lindsell on Torts, 17th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1995) at 732.

10 Re Bozzo, [2005] O.J. No. 2037 at para. 25, 10 C.B.R. (5th) 1 (Ont. S.C.J.).

11 Re Bozzo, [2005] O.J. No. 2037 at para. 25, 10 C.B.R. (5th) 1 (Ont. S.C.J.).

12 Re Bozzo, [2005] O.J. No. 2037 at para. 25, 10 C.B.R. (5th) 1 (Ont. S.C.J.).

End of Document

HGI-113 Meaning and scope of contractual indemnities.

Halsbury's Laws of Canada - Guarantee and Indemnity (2022 Reissue)

Alison Manzer, Charles Newman, Marc Mercier, Jennifer Wasylyk, Corina Capmare (Main Title Contributors)

HGI-113

Halsbury's Laws of Canada - Guarantee and Indemnity (2022 Reissue) (Manzer, Newman, Mercier, Wasylyk, Capmare) > III. Assessing the Liability of the Surety > 3. Non-Guarantee Indemnities > (1) Contractual Indemnities Distinguished from Similar Obligations

III. Assessing the Liability of the Surety

3. Non-Guarantee Indemnities

(1) Contractual Indemnities Distinguished from Similar Obligations

HGI-113 Meaning and scope of contractual indemnities.

A contract of indemnity is one in which the promisor undertakes to indemnify the promisee against a liability or loss, independent of whether there is default by some other person.[1] As obligations which require one party to make good the loss of another, contracts of indemnity may be said in broad terms to include such agreements as guarantees[2] and insurance contracts,[3] but contracts of indemnity are not limited to agreements of these types. Indeed, the term “indemnity” is most often used to describe original (primary) obligations to indemnify, rather than collateral agreements in the nature of a guarantee. Accordingly, an indemnity agreement may be a stand-alone as an obligation, and unlike a guarantee is not necessarily dependent for its survival either upon the existence or continuation of some other primary obligation.[4]

Indemnities distinguished from insurance contracts. It is customary to distinguish insurance contracts from indemnities generally[5] (such non-insurance indemnities being termed “simple indemnities”). At common law, the right of an insured party arose as soon as the event specified in the insurance contract occurred. Thus where a person was covered by a policy of liability insurance, that person might claim under their policy in respect of any liability which that person incurred as soon as the liability arose, and it was immaterial that the insured had not first discharged that liability.[6] In contrast, at common law, a right to obtain indemnification in respect of a potential liability did not become enforceable at law until such time as the liability has been discharged[7] (as the right to claim at law was founded in debt), although the contrary was in general the case in equity.[8] With the fusion of the courts of law and equity in the mid-19th century, this particular distinction between insurance and indemnities has in large measure ceased to be of significance. However, there remain distinctions between insurance contracts and indemnity agreements, which continue to have practical ramifications. For instance, unlike insurance contracts, a simple contract of indemnity is not one in which the protected party must act with the utmost good faith. Moreover, a simple contract of indemnity may secure the party entitled to the indemnity against a loss that is known to have already been suffered.[9]

Footnote(s)

1 Canadian General Insurance Co v. Dube Ready-Mix Ltd., [[1984] N.B.J. No. 50](), 52 N.B.R. (2d) 66 (N.B.C.A.), and see generally: Pontifex v. Foord (1884), 12 Q.B.D. 152 (Q.B.); Tritton v. Bankart (1887), 56 L.J. Ch. 629 (Ch.); Speller v. Bristol Steam Nav. Co. (1884), 13 Q.B.D. 96 (C.A.); Credit Foncier Trust Co. v. Zatala Holdings Inc., [[1986] B.C.J. No. 516](), 48 B.C.L.R. (2d) 25 (B.C.C.A.).

2 In Harburg India Rubber Comb. Co. v. Martin, [1902] 1 K.B. 778 at 784 (C.A.), Vaughan William L.J. describes guarantees as the class of indemnity that is required by the Statute of Frauds to be in writing.

3 Castellain v. Preston (1883), 11 Q.B.D. 380 at 386 (C.A.).

4 British Columbia v. Clearwater (Canada) Hatcheries Ltd., [[1994] B.C.J. No. 1787](), 95 B.C.L.R. (2d) 396 (B.C.S.C.).

5 Goulston Discount Co. v. Clark, [1967] 2 Q.B. 493 (C.A.).

6 Re Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society Ltd., Liverpool Mortgage Ins. Co. Case, [1914] 2 Ch. 617 (C.A.); Re Eddystone Marine Insurance Co., [1892] 2 Ch. 423 (Ch. D.).

7 See, for instance, Goddard v. Vanderheyden (1771), 3 Wils. 262, 2 Black. W. 795, 96 E.R. 467 (K.B.); Reynolds v. Doyle (1840), 1 Man. & G. 753, 133 E.R. 536 (C.P.).

8 Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society Ltd. v. Munich Reinsurance Co. (1915), 31 T.L.R. 572 (Ch. D.).

9 In the Marriage of Langford (1992), 110 F.L.R. 396 at 400 (Aust. Fam. Ct.), per Nygh J.

End of Document

HBC-306 Specific exclusions.

Halsbury's Laws of Canada - Business Corporations (2022 Reissue)

Ruth I. Wahl, Maurice Coombs (Main Title Contributors)

(Updates prepared by LexisNexis Canada Inc.)

HBC-306

Halsbury's Laws of Canada - Business Corporations (2022 Reissue) (Wahl, Coombs) > XIV. Shareholder Remedies > 2. The Oppression Remedy > (8) Procedural Considerations > (d) Bars to Action

XIV. Shareholder Remedies

2. The Oppression Remedy

(8) Procedural Considerations

(d) Bars to Action

Specific exclusions.

Cumulative Supplement - Current to June 1, 2024

Note 1

(MB) Limitation of Actions Act, C.C.S.M. c. L150 should read Limitations Act, C.C.S.M. c. L150.

HBC-306 Specific exclusions.

There are a number of cases that deal with bars to oppression relief.[1] For instance, it has been held that the oppression and derivative action remedies will not be permitted to be used by minority shareholders to extort benefits from the majority shareholders or other controlling group in the corporation.[2] Relief is available to a claimant under s. 241 of the Canada Business Corporations Act and its equivalents if, and only if, the applicant can establish that the applicant has suffered detriment in their capacity as a complainant.[3] In the ordinary case, where the corporation abandons the course of action on which the complainant's application is based, no order will be made, for in such a case the abandonment constitutes the remedy.[4] More generally, the oppression remedy is not intended to require (nor to empower) the courts to review every decision made within a corporation. It does not offer a general right of appeal from the internal decision-making process of the corporation.[5] The court may refuse a remedy where there has been prolonged delay in bringing an application in regard to oppressive conduct.[6] However, this principle should not be too far extended. Ordinarily, in the case of equitable relief, delay will bar action only where the potential claimant was aware of the facts giving rise to the cause of action and failed to proceed. Since potential claimants will often possess only limited knowledge about what is transpiring in relation to the corporation, its business or affairs, as a practical matter it may be difficult for them to determine whether they have a realistic chance of a claim, even though they may be dissatisfied in some general way with the manner in which the business or affairs of the corporation are being conducted. Moreover, the voluntary withdrawal of a shareholder from active participation in a corporation does not prevent that shareholder from seeking relief under the oppression remedy, nor does the fact that the shareholders allowed the directors to run the business for a prolonged period of time without demanding that annual meetings be held or financial statements provided. The obligation is upon the directors of a corporation to call annual meetings of shareholders, to carry out their other corporate governance duties and to account for their administration of the corporation, not upon the shareholders to superintend the directors.[7]

Footnote(s)

1 As to the application of the (MB) Limitation of Actions Act, R.S.M. 1987, c. L150 (now (MB) Limitation of Actions Act, C.C.S.M. c. L150), to oppression proceedings, see Jaska v. Jaska, [1996] M.J. No. 579, 30 B.L.R. (2d) 104 (Man. C.A.). As for whether a complainant may reject a reasonable compromise and insist upon taking the dispute to court, see Re A Company (No. 00836 of 1995), [1996] 2 B.C.L.C. 192 (Ch. D.).

2 Mason v. Intercity Properties Ltd., [1987] O.J. No. 448, 59 O.R. (2d) 631 (Ont. C.A.), leave to appeal refused [1987] S.C.C.A. No. 402, 62 O.R. (2d) ix (S.C.C.).

3 (CAN) Canada Business Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-44, s. 241. See Diligenti v. RWMD Operations Kelowna Ltd., [1976] B.C.J. No. 38, 1 B.C.L.R. 36 (B.C.S.C.).

4 V.F. Erickson Consultants Ltd. v. Ventures West Minerals Ltd., [1990] B.C.J. No. 1111 (B.C.C.A.).

5 Zephyr Holdings Pty Ltd. v. Jack Chia (Australia) Ltd. (1989), 7 A.C.L.C. 239, per Brooking J. (S.C. Vic.); see also Thomas v. H.W. Thomas Ltd., [1984] 1 N.Z.L.R. 686, 2 A.C.L.C. 610 (C.A.).

6 Jaska v. Jaska, [1996] M.J. No. 579, 141 D.L.R. (4th) 385 (Man. C.A.). In Zhao v. Li, [2020] O.J. No. 671, 2020 ONCA 121 (Ont. C.A.), the Court addressed aspects of how limitation periods apply to oppression remedy claims under the (ON) Business Corporations Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. B.16. Following the sale of a business, claims arose for: failure to share the proceeds of sale and profits for the preceding year; and dissolution of the business without the complainant's knowledge. These were singular discrete oppressive acts rather than ongoing oppression. The failure to share proceeds and profits claims were statute-barred, since they were discoverable before the expiry of the limitation period, while the claim based on the dissolution of the corporation was not statute-barred, since the dissolution occurred later.

7 See, generally, Bernhardt v. Main Outboard Centre Ltd., [1994] M.J. No. 521, 17 B.L.R. (2d) 219 (Man. Q.B.).

End of Document

HGI-114 Circumstances under which the right to indemnity may exist.

Halsbury's Laws of Canada - Guarantee and Indemnity (2022 Reissue)

Alison Manzer, Charles Newman, Marc Mercier, Jennifer Wasylyk, Corina Capmare (Main Title Contributors)

HGI-114

Halsbury's Laws of Canada - Guarantee and Indemnity (2022 Reissue) (Manzer, Newman, Mercier, Wasylyk, Capmare) > III. Assessing the Liability of the Surety > 3. Non-Guarantee Indemnities > (1) Contractual Indemnities Distinguished from Similar Obligations > (a) Distinguished from Right to Damages

III. Assessing the Liability of the Surety

3. Non-Guarantee Indemnities

(1) Contractual Indemnities Distinguished from Similar Obligations

(a) Distinguished from Right to Damages

HGI-114 Circumstances under which the right to indemnity may exist.

Although there is a similarity in their respective practical consequence, a right to be indemnified is not the same as a right to recover damages.[1] A right to recover damages is a legal right in favour of a plaintiff to be compensated by a defendant for injuries recognized at law, which were suffered by the plaintiff as a result of the wrongful conduct of the defendant. A right of indemnity may exist where the plaintiff has suffered no injury[2] at the hands of the person who is obliged to indemnify, and even where the wrong giving rise to the claim for indemnity was committed by some third party,[3] or where no wrong has been committed by any person but the indemnifier is nonetheless obliged to make good a loss which has been suffered by the claimant.

As compared to right to recover damages for breach of contract. A right to recover the damages occasioned by a breach of contract is the converse of a contractual right to an indemnity. Where a contractual right of indemnity exists, the right to an indemnity constitutes a term of the contract and forms part of the contract between the parties.[4] A right to damages for breach of contract, on the other hand, arises as a consequence of the breach of the original bargain which the parties made. A right to recover damages for breach of contract is not part of a contract; it is an incident that the law attaches to a breach of the contract, rather than a provision of the contract itself.[5]

As compared to right of damages for tortious injury. A similar distinction exists in the case of a right of damages for tortious injury. Every person has a right at common law to recover the amount of the damages occasioned to them as a result of the tortious conduct of another person.[6] That right is not founded upon any principle of implied contract, but is a legal right in favour of a plaintiff to be compensated for the injuries suffered at the hands of a wrongdoer. Nevertheless, when it comes to ascertaining the measure of damages that the plaintiff has suffered, it may be that indemnity will properly express the measure of damages.[7]

Footnote(s)

HGI-114 Circumstances under which the right to indemnity may exist.

1 McFee v. Young (1905), 1 W.L.R. 383 at 385 (N.W.T.S.C.), per Wetmore J.; Birmingham & District Land Co. v. London & North Western Rlwy. (1886), 34 Ch. D. 261 at 274 (C.A.), per Bowen L.J. and at 276, per Fry L.J.

2 While a claim for damages may be made only in respect of injuries that are recognized at law, a claim based upon a right of indemnity is not so limited. Thus the parties to a contract may provide for a right of indemnity to compensate the protected party against forms of loss that do not generally represent types of injury which the law will recognize (legal costs on a solicitor-and-client basis, being just one common example). However, in order to claim the benefit of an indemnity it is necessary to prove that the event to which the indemnity relates has occurred, otherwise a plea of non damnificatus may be raised in defence of a claim under the indemnity: Leeming v. Smith, [1877] O.J. No. 232, 25 Gr. 256 (Ont. Ct. Ch.); Sutherland v. Webster, [1894] O.J. No. 17, 21 O.A.R. 228 (Ont. C.A.).

3 Compare the definition found in s. 124 of the Indian Contract Code Act, 1872, c. 9: “A contract by which one party promises to save the other from loss caused to him by the conduct of the promisor himself, or by the conduct of any other person, is called a contract of indemnity.”

4 McLean v. Dinning, [1922] S.J. No. 50, 63 D.L.R. 507 (Sask. C.A.).

5 Birmingham & District Land Co. v. London & North Western Ry. (1886), 34 Ch. D. 261 at 274-75 (C.A.), per Bowen L.J., and at 276, per Fry L.J.

6 As to the difference between a right of indemnity and a right to relief over in third party proceedings, see Australian Newsprint Mills Ltd. v. Canadian Union Line Ltd., [1953] B.C.J. No. 118, [1953] 2 D.L.R. 828 (B.C.C.A.), affd [1954] S.C.J. No. 21, [1954] S.C.R. 307 (S.C.C.).

7 Birmingham & District Land Co. v. London & North Western Ry. (1886), 34 Ch. D. 261 (C.A.). See also McLean v. Tinsley, [1849] O.J. No. 179, 7 U.C.R. 40 (U.C. Ct. Q.B.).

End of Document

CED Contracts § 189

Canadian Encyclopedic Digest

Contracts

Prepared by Warren H.O. Mueller, B.A., LL.B., LL.M., Q.C., and D. Morgan, B.A., LL.B, LL.M.: September 2008, Updated by the legal editorial staff of Thomson Reuters Canada: January 2025

XII. Express Terms; Performance of Contract

B. Performance

---

§ 189. Duty of Good Faith in Performing Contracts

Topic Summary

The legal characterization of the relationship between contracting parties largely determines their obligations to each other. [1] The graduated obligations arising between commercial contracting parties have been ordered in a three-tiered theoretical framework which is often cited in recent Canadian judgments: [2] "the unconscionability standard", "the good faith standard" and the "fiduciary standard". [3] Although all three standards are concerned with the extent to which one contracting party is obliged to acknowledge and to respect the interests of the other, each standard, in setting its own limits, proceeds from a different premise. Thus, "unconscionability" accepts that one party is entitled as of course to act self-interestedly in his or her actions toward the other; however, it protects those who are vulnerable in the contracting process from loss or improvidence to that party in the bargain. [4] "Good faith", while permitting a party to act self-interestedly, also positively requires that such party, in his or her decisions and actions, have regard to the legitimate interests of the other party. [5] The "fiduciary" standard enjoins one party to act in the interests of the other—that is, to act selflessly and with undivided loyalty. [6] The demarcation where one standard of behaviour ends and another begins is not always clear. [7] The duty of good faith is not a fiduciary duty, and it does not extend to create new, unbargained rights. [8]

The courts recognize that there is an organizing principle of good faith that underlies and manifests itself in various more specific doctrines governing contractual performance. That organizing principle is simply that parties generally must perform their contractual duties honestly and reasonably and not capriciously or arbitrarily. [9]

Not every contract imposes actionable good faith obligations on contracting parties. While good faith is an organizing principle of Canadian contract law, it manifests itself in specific circumstances. In particular, its application is generally confined to existing categories of contracts and obligations. [10]

Canadian courts have traditionally proceeded quite cautiously in recognizing duties of good faith in the performance and enforcement of contracts. [11] References in judicial decisions to good faith obligations have usually been made where the result of the case has been determined by the application of other, more established, legal principles, such as that regarding implied terms. [12] Thus, unlike the situation in Quebec [13] and the United States, [14] where a duty of good faith in the performance of commercial contracts was broadly recognized, Canadian courts took more time in developing a comprehensive and principled approach to good faith obligations in commercial contracts. In particular, they have not recognized a stand-alone duty of good faith that is independent from the terms expressed in a contract or from the objectives that emerge from its provisions, [15] although the law in this regard is currently unsettled. [16] Lastly, the Supreme Court of Canada recently held that it is time to take two incremental steps in order to make the common law less unsettled and piecemeal, more coherent and more just with regard to contracts. The first step is to acknowledge that good faith contractual performance is a general organizing principle of the common law of contract which underpins and informs the various rules in which the common law, in various situations and types of relationships, recognizes obligations of good faith contractual performance. The second is to recognize that there is a common law duty which applies to all contracts to act honestly in the performance of contractual obligations. [17] As for the concept of bad faith, it is flexible, and its content will vary from one area of law to another. [18]

WESTLAW EDGE CANADA Copyright © Thomson Reuters Canada Limited or its licensors (excluding individual court documents). All rights reserved.

Canadian courts have recently expanded the range of "special" relationships giving rise to a duty of good faith beyond those traditionally giving rise to fiduciary obligations, such as trusts, [19] partnerships, [20] joint ventures, [21] and agency, [22] and the relationship of utmost good faith created by an insurance contract, [23] as well as such situations as tendering contracts, [24] mortgagees in possession, [25] grantors exercising rights of first refusal, [26] and termination of long-standing contractual arrangements. [27] For example, the courts have regarded employment contracts as having unique characteristics setting them apart from ordinary commercial contracts, giving rise to an obligation to act in good faith in the termination of an employee. [28] And franchise arrangements have been characterized as contracts of adhesion, giving rise to good faith obligations. [29] However, parties to ordinary commercial contracts, which are usually not characterized by vulnerability and trust, are generally not subject to a general and overriding good faith obligation. [30] Where a duty of good faith exists, not every breach of contract will be a breach of the duty of good faith. [31] Canada's law of conflicts as administered by the courts is based on precedents rooted in English jurisprudence. [32] Lastly, the Supreme Court of Canada recently held that it is time to take two incremental steps in order to make the common law less unsettled and piecemeal, more coherent and more just with regard to contracts. The first step is to acknowledge that good faith contractual performance is a general organizing principle of the common law of contract which underpins and informs the various rules in which the common law, in various situations and types of relationships, recognizes obligations of good faith contractual performance. The second is to recognize that there is a common law duty which applies to all contracts to act honestly in the performance of contractual obligations. [33]

Canadian courts have generally accepted that once a contract has been entered into, [34] the parties must perform their respective obligations in good faith, even if there is no express contractual provision to this effect in the contract itself. This duty of good faith performance either arises by operation of law, within the parameters of what the court considers to be fair dealing between the parties [35] or, alternatively, is an implied term of the contract, [36] particularly where required to give the agreement business efficacy. [37] Cases in which a duty of good faith has been implied have been viewed as falling into three broad categories: [38] (i) those imposing a duty to co-operate in achieving the objectives of the agreement; [39] (ii) those imposing limits on the exercise of discretionary powers provided for in the contract; [40] and (iii) those precluding parties from evading contractual duties, such as by engaging in conduct not strictly prohibited by the letter of their agreement, but that effectively defeats the other party's contractual rights. [41] A duty of good faith may also arise from one party's representations or undertakings to the other party. [42] Whether or not a party under a duty of good faith has breached that duty will depend on all the circumstances of the case, including whether the party subject to a duty of good faith conducted itself fairly throughout the process. [43] Lastly, whether or not there is good faith is dependent on the facts, circumstances and contractual terms. [44]

The Supreme Court of Canada has expanded the duty of honest performance. Parties to a contract can breach the duty of honest performance by knowingly misleading the other party, even if the misleading action is silence. To "knowingly mislead" can include half-truths, misleading actions, or failing to correct a misrepresentation that the representing party believed was true at the time of the representation, but later learned was false. Whether a party has knowingly mislead the other party is largely fact-specific, and deference must be shown to the trial judge who weighs the evidence. Outright lies are not requisite to a finding of a contractual breach. [45]

The remedy for breach of the duty of honest performance is expectation damages, putting the party in the position it would have been had the duty not been breached. [46]

WESTLAW EDGE CANADA Copyright © Thomson Reuters Canada Limited or its licensors (excluding individual court documents). All rights reserved.

© 2025 Thomson Reuters Canada Limited.

Footnotes

1 Machias v. Mr. Submarine Ltd. (2002), 2002 CarswellOnt 1176 (Ont. S.C.J.) (citing Finn, "The Fiduciary Principle", in Youdan, ed., Equity, Fiduciaries and Trusts (Carswell, 1989)); Leopold v. Leopold (2000), 2000 CarswellOnt 4707 (Ont. S.C.J.).

2 Hodgkinson v. Simms (1994), 1994 CarswellBC 438 (S.C.C.); Lac Minerals Ltd. v. International Corona Resources Ltd. (1989), 1989 CarswellOnt 126 (S.C.C.); Babcock v. Canada (Attorney General) (2005), 2005 CarswellBC 937 (B.C. S.C.); Trophy Foods Inc. v. Scott (1995), 1995 CarswellNS 218 (N.S. C.A.); Shelanu Inc. v. Print Three Franchising Corp. (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 2038 (Ont. C.A.); 978011 Ontario Ltd. v. Cornell Engineering Co. (2001), 2001 CarswellOnt 1290 (Ont. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (2001), 2001 CarswellOnt 3809 (S.C.C.); Peel Condominium Corp. No. 505 v. Cam-Valley Homes Ltd. (2001), 2001 CarswellOnt 579 (Ont. C.A.); Rogers & Rogers Inc. v. Pinehurst Woodworking Co. (2005), 2005 CarswellOnt 7190 (Ont. S.C.J.); Engels v. Richard Killen & Associates Ltd. (2002), 2002 CarswellOnt 2435 (Ont. S.C.J.); affirmed (2004), 2004 CarswellOnt 62 (Ont. C.A.); Machias v. Mr. Submarine Ltd. (2002), 2002 CarswellOnt 1176 (Ont. S.C.J.); Leopold v. Leopold (2000), 2000 CarswellOnt 4707 (Ont. S.C.J.); Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Graat (1992), 1992 CarswellOnt 136 (Ont. Gen. Div.); affirmed (1997), 1997 CarswellOnt 340 (Ont. C.A.); Gregoric v. Gregoric (1991), 1991 CarswellOnt 3151 (Ont. Gen. Div.); Bank of Montreal v. McIntosh (1995), 1995 CarswellSask 281 (Sask. Q.B.).

3 Owners, Strata Plan LMS 3905 v. Crystal Square Parking Corp. (2020), 2020 SCC 29 (S.C.C.) (notion of unconscionability discussed); Finn, "The Fiduciary Principle", in T.G. Youdan, ed., Equity, Fiduciaries and Trusts (Carswell, 1989).

4 Uber Technologies Inc. v. Heller (2020), 2020 SCC 16 (S.C.C.) (allows courts to set aside unfair agreements that stray far from ideals of free, equal and fair contracting); see also Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Ohlson (1997), 1997 CarswellAlta 1050 (Alta. C.A.) (unconscionability, like undue influence and duress, aiming to temper ideal of freedom to contract with need to prevent abuse and protect the weak; doctrine permitting application of judicial discretion to excuse obligant from performing contract); Deforest v. Deforest (1982), 1982 CarswellSask 175 (Sask. C.A.) ("constructive fraud" in equity including two related but distinct notions: agreement subject to rescission if obtained by "undue influence" or constituting "unconscionable bargain"); Zhao v. Chandi 2022 BCSC 1574 (B.C. S.C.) (facts showing there was no inequality in bargaining power between parties court also adding that agreement was not improvident).

5 Wastech Services Ltd. v. Greater Vancouver Sewerage and Drainage District (2021), 2021 SCC 7 (S.C.C.) (party must exercise its discretion reasonably, that is, in manner connected to underlying purposes of discretion granted by contract; no breach of duty to exercise contractual discretion in good faith in exercising contractual discretion to allocate waste volumes without also compensating for financial consequences of allocation); Massey v. Massey (2022), 2022 ONSC 5150 (Ont. S.C.J.) (while "appropriate regard" for other party's interests will vary depending on context of contractual relationship, it does not require acting to serve those interests in all cases; court adding that it merely requires that party not seek to undermine those interests in bad faith); Finn, "The Fiduciary Principle", in T.G. Youdan, ed., Equity, Fiduciaries and Trusts (Carswell, 1989).

6 1698496 Ontario Ltd. v. Zoberi (2015), 2015 CarswellOnt 16178 (Ont. S.C.J.) (fiduciary obligation requiring very "high obligation" of loyalty); Finn, "The Fiduciary Principle", in T.G. Youdan, ed., Equity, Fiduciaries and Trusts (Carswell, 1989); see also Hodgkinson v. Simms (1994), 1994 CarswellBC 438 (S.C.C.) (concept of "vulnerability" being golden thread uniting such related causes of action as breach of fiduciary duty, undue influence, unconscionability, and negligent misrepresentation).

7 Machias v. Mr. Submarine Ltd. (2002), 2002 CarswellOnt 1176 (Ont. S.C.J.).

8 Rio Algom Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General) (2012), 2012 CarswellOnt 1200 (Ont. S.C.J.).

9 Sheik v. Lebovic Enterprises Limited (2021), 2021 ONSC 8512 (Ont. S.C.J.); Martens v. The Manitoba Public Insurance Corporation (2021), 2021 MBCA 102 (Man. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (2022), 2022 CarswellMan 292 (S.C.C.) (duty of good faith with regard to insurance discussed); 100 Bloor Street West Corp. v. Barry's BootCamp et al. (2022), 2022 ONSC 5054 (Ont. S.C.J.); affirmed, 2023 ONCA 247 (Ont. C.A.) (duty to exercise discretion in good faith will be breached where exercise of discretion is unreasonable in that it is unconnected to purposes for which discretion was granted); 2264052 Ontario Inc. (Louch & Louch) v. Brockville Centre

WESTLAW EDGE CANADA Copyright © Thomson Reuters Canada Limited or its licensors (excluding individual court documents). All rights reserved.

Development Corp. (2022), 2022 ONCA 610 (Ont. C.A.) (court explaining that underlying principle does not impose duty of loyalty or of disclosure, or require party to forego advantages flowing from contract; instead, it is merely requirement not to lie or mislead other party about one's contractual performance).

10 Atlantic Lottery Corp. Inc. v. Babstock (2020), 2020 SCC 19 (S.C.C.) (alleged contract not fitting within any of established good faith categories, nor did plaintiffs advance any argument for expanding those recognized categories); C.M. Callow Inc. v. Zollinger (2020), 2020 SCC 45 (S.C.C.) (organizing principle of good faith not treated as free-standing rule, but instead, manifests itself through existing good faith doctrines).

11 Mesa Operating Ltd. Partnership v. Amoco Canada Resources Ltd. (1994), 1994 CarswellAlta 89 (Alta. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (1994), 1994 CarswellAlta 1092 (S.C.C.) (general obligation expressed in terms of good faith not obvious part of contract law in England and Canada); Transamerica Life Canada Inc. v. ING Canada Inc. (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 4834 (Ont. C.A.) (Canadian courts not recognizing independent stand-alone duty of good faith, creating new, unbargained-for rights and obligations or permitting alteration of contract's express terms; rather, courts implying duty of good faith with view to securing performance and enforcement of contract made by parties); Ascent Financial Services Ltd. v. Blythman (2006), 2006 CarswellSask 83 (Sask. Q.B.); affirmed (2007), 2007 CarswellSask 390 (Sask. C.A.) (court declining to decide whether independent duty of good faith existing, as finding defendants breaching good faith requirement in performance of agreement transferring business); Newswest Corp. v. Glendar Holdings Ltd. (2001), 2001 CarswellSask 457 (Sask. Q.B.) (trial courts more willing to apply concept of good faith than appellate courts, which largely uphold trial decisions without specific reference to good faith obligation; too soon to conclude Canadian courts having recognized as general principle that contracts to be performed in good faith); but see Bhasin v. Hrynew (2014), 2014 CarswellAlta 2046 (S.C.C.) (Supreme Court of Canada creating new common law duty under broad umbrella of good faith performance of contracts and holding that there is general duty of honesty in contractual performance).

12 Transamerica Life Canada Inc. v. ING Canada Inc. (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 4834 (Ont. C.A.) (motions judge erring by striking plea of purchaser of shares regarding seller's duty to disclose facts coming to its attention during due diligence potentially prejudicing purchaser's position); Newswest Corp. v. Glendar Holdings Ltd. (2001), 2001 CarswellSask 457 (Sask. Q.B.) (trial courts more willing to apply concept of good faith than appellate courts, which largely uphold trial decisions without specific reference to good faith obligation; too soon to conclude Canadian courts have recognized as general principle that contracts must be performed in good faith); see also Belobaba, "Good Faith in Canadian Contract Law", Special Lectures of the Law Society of Upper Canada (Richard De Boo Publishers, 1985), p. 73; Bridge, "Does Anglo-Canadian Law Need a Doctrine of Good Faith?" (1984), 9 Can. Bus. L.J. 385, 413; McCamus, "The Duty of Good Faith Contractual Performance at Common Law" (paper presented to the N.J.I.: Civil Law Seminar, Contract Law: From Form to Remedies, Osgoode Hall Law School, May 17, 2000 (unpublished)); Tetley, "Good Faith in Contract, Particularly in the Contracts of Arbitration and Chartering" (2004), 35 JMLC 561.

13 Banque canadienne nationale c. Soucisse (1981), 1981 CarswellQue 110 (S.C.C.); Hôtel de l'Aéroport de Mirabel inc. c. Aéroports de Montréal (2002), 2002 CarswellQue 1372 (C.S. Que.); affirmed (2003), 2003 CarswellQue 1768 (C.A. Que.) (duty to negotiate in good faith recognized in Quebec law); Churchill Falls (Labrador) Corp. v. Hydro-Québec (2018), 2018 SCC 46 (S.C.C.) (good faith conferring broad, flexible power to create law and served as basis for court to intervene and to impose on contracting parties obligations that are based on notion of contractual fairness); C.M. Callow Inc. v. Zollinger (2020), 2020 SCC 45 (S.C.C.) (duty to act honestly in performance of contract precluded active deception; court reasoning that by exercising termination clause dishonestly, group breached duty of honesty on matter directly linked to performance of contract, even if ten-day notice period was satisfied and irrespective of motive for termination).

14 United States Uniform Commercial Code, art. 1, s. 1-304; Kang v. Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada (2013), 2013 CarswellOnt 1909 (Ont. C.A.); Corbin, Perillo, Murray, Corbin on Contracts, Vol. 3 (Matthew Bender), s. 541, p. 95; Restatement of the Law (2d) of Contracts (American Law Institute Publishers, 1981), s. 205.

15 Aldo Group Inc. v. Moneris Solutions Corp. (2015), 2015 CarswellOnt 4734 (Ont. S.C.J.) (Canadian courts not recognizing stand-alone duty of good faith that is independent from terms of contract or objectives that emerge from those provisions); Martel Building Ltd. v. R. (2000), 2000 CarswellNat 2678 (S.C.C.) (tenant not owing duty of care to landlord in renewal negotiations such that negligence claim could be made for economic loss arising out of conduct of negotiations); Princeton Light & Power Co. v. MacDonald (2005), 2005 CarswellBC 1254 (B.C. C.A.) (while Canadian courts not recognizing independent duty, standard electricity supply contract including duties of good faith and fair dealing; bad faith conduct evident); 1193430 Ontario Inc. v. Boa-Franc (1983) Ltée (2005), 2005 CarswellOnt 5661 (Ont. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (2006), 2006 CarswellOnt 2317 (S.C.C.) (both parties believing contract obliging them to act in good faith; questionable whether general duty of good faith could require party to disclose change in ownership to other party, since creating new, unbargained-for obligation independent from contract's terms and parties' objectives); Transamerica Life Canada Inc. v. ING Canada Inc. (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 4834 (Ont. C.A.) (Canadian courts not recognizing independent stand-alone duty of good faith, creating new, unbargained-for rights and obligations or permitting alteration of contract's express terms; rather, courts implying duty of good faith with view to securing performance and enforcement of contract made by parties); Rogers & Rogers Inc. v. Pinehurst Woodworking Co. (2005), 2005 CarswellOnt 7190 (Ont. S.C.J.); Amaren Corp. v. Cara Operations Ltd. (1999), 1999 CarswellOnt 350 (Ont. Gen. Div.) (while no independent duty of good faith and fair dealing in Ontario, duty existing to fulfill obligations of contract in good faith); Ascent Financial Services Ltd. v. Blythman (2006), 2006 CarswellSask 83 (Sask. Q.B.); affirmed (2007), 2007 CarswellSask 390 (Sask. C.A.) (court declining to decide whether independent duty of good faith existing, as party breaching good faith requirement in performing agreement transferring business); but see Bhasin v. Hrynew (2014), 2014 CarswellAlta 2046 (S.C.C.) (Supreme Court of Canada creating new common law duty under broad umbrella of good faith performance of contracts and holding that there is general duty of honesty in contractual performance); Gateway Realty Ltd. v. Arton Holdings Ltd. (1991), 1991 CarswellNS 320 (N.S. T.D.); affirmed on other grounds (1992), 1992 CarswellNS 518 (N.S. C.A.) (law requiring contracting parties to exercise rights honestly, fairly and in good faith; duty breached when party acting in "bad faith", defined as conduct contrary to community standards of honesty, reasonableness or fairness); LeMesurier v. Andrus (1986), 1986 CarswellOnt 670 (Ont. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (1986), 74 N.R. 239 (note) (S.C.C.) (vendors and purchasers owing duty to each other to perform contract honestly and in good faith; "approach may be merely an example of the development of an independent doctrine of good faith in contract law at least in the performance of contracts"); TSP-Intl Ltd. v. Mills (2006), 2006 CarswellOnt 4037 (Ont. C.A.) (contractor, exercising discretionary contractual power, making unilateral contractual decisions defeating contractual objectives; trial judge finding conduct not according with objective community standards of reasonableness and fairness; however, appellate court finding that duty of good faith, not pleaded by parties, should not be ruled on); Ascent Financial Services Ltd. v. Blythman (2006), 2006 CarswellSask 83 (Sask. Q.B.); affirmed (2007), 2007 CarswellSask 390 (Sask. C.A.) (plaintiffs purchasing goodwill of defendants' business and parties forming new business; after parties falling out, plaintiffs purchasing defendants' shares, and defendants later breaching non-competition and non-solicitation agreements; defendants, owing obligation to use best efforts to transfer their clients to new business, breaching duty of good faith in performance of contract; defendants owing plaintiffs fiduciary duty independent of contract based on power to affect plaintiffs' interests); see also McCamus, The Law of Contracts (Irwin Law, 2005), p. 806; McCamus, "The Duty of Good Faith Contractual Performance at Common Law", Civil Law Seminar, Contract Law: From Form to Remedies (Osgoode Hall Law School, Toronto: May 17, 2000); Belobaba, "Good Faith in Canadian Contract Law", Special Lectures of the Law Society of Upper Canada (Richard De Boo Publishers, 1985), p. 73; Swan, "Whither Contracts: A Retrospective and Prospective Overview", Special Lectures of the Law Society of Upper Canada 1984-Law in Transition: Contracts (Richard De Boo Publishers, 1984), p. 125.

WESTLAW EDGE CANADA Copyright © Thomson Reuters Canada Limited or its licensors (excluding individual court documents). All rights reserved.

16 Martel Building Ltd. v. R. (2000), 2000 CarswellNat 2679 (S.C.C.) (although tenant not owing duty of care to landlord in renewal negotiations such that negligence claim could be made for economic loss arising out of conduct of negotiations, whether contractual negotiations to be governed by duty of good faith described as "question for another time"); Princeton Light & Power Co. v. MacDonald (2005), 2005 CarswellBC 1254 (B.C. C.A.); Stelco Inc., Re (2006), 2006 CarswellOnt 335 (Ont. C.A.) (specific wording in memorandum of understanding calling on parties to negotiate and pursue opportunities in good faith; existence of stand-alone duty of good faith, independent from terms expressed in contract, not settled; not plain and obvious that statement of claim should be struck); Transamerica Life Canada Inc. v. ING Canada Inc. (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 4834 (Ont. C.A.) (motions judge erring by striking plea of purchaser of shares regarding seller's duty to disclose facts coming to its attention during due diligence potentially prejudicing purchaser's position); 530888 Ontario Ltd. v. Sobeys Inc. (2001), 2001 CarswellOnt 240 (Ont. S.C.J. [Commercial List]) (conflicting authority and academic debate about independent good faith duty in contract law; erroneous to conclude such claim could not possibly succeed); McColl-Frontenac Inc. v. Petro-Canada Inc. (1998), 1998 CarswellOnt 6224 (Ont. Gen. Div.) (court holding, without deciding, that assuming independent common law obligation of good faith was developing in Canadian contract law, no such duty in light of bargain made by parties).

17 Bhasin v. Hrynew (2014), 2014 CarswellAlta 2046 (S.C.C.); Canaccord Genuity Corp. v. Pilot (2015), 2015 CarswellOnt 16345 (Ont. C.A.) ("two incremental steps" doctrine applied); Addison Chevrolet Buick GMC Ltd. v. General Motors of Canada Ltd. (2016), 2016 ONCA 324 (Ont. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (2017), 2017 CarswellOnt 1201 (S.C.C.) (duty of good faith in performance of contractual obligations discussed; Court of Appeal reversing decision to strike claim that duty of good faith owed by franchisor to franchisee, despite lack of direct contractual relationship, based on vulnerability of franchisee, level of control and special obligations; not plain and obvious that claim could not succeed; novel claim requiring decision based on full record); Mayotte v. Ontario (2016), 2016 CarswellOnt 2647 (Ont. S.C.J.) (court rejecting claim from private issuers of vehicle licences under contract with province that remuneration unreasonable and in bad faith as a matter of substance; no precedent for commercial reasonableness being tethered to outcome as opposed to process or performance; no indication that discretion of province used in bad faith during process of determining remuneration); Northrock Resources v. ExxonMobil Canada Energy (2017), 2017 CarswellSask 393 (Sask. C.A.) (duty of good faith must not be used to circumvent plain language of contract; defendant in context of right of first refusal did not lie or mislead); Wastech Services Ltd. v. Greater Vancouver Sewerage and Drainage District (2021), 2021 SCC 7 (S.C.C.) (discussion of breach of good faith; court found that arbitrator erred in concluding that breach of duty of good faith occurred whenever party failed to give "appropriate regard" to other's interests in absence of finding that contract had been "eviscerated" or "nullified" and in finding "dishonesty" and thus breach of duty of good faith without any element of dishonesty, improper motive, of bad faith as understood in existing law); Mohamed v. Information Systems Architects Inc. (2018), 2018 ONCA 428 (Ont. C.A.) (defendant employer breached agreement by failing to terminate in good faith, and triggered right to damages that was not contemplated by agreement).

WESTLAW EDGE CANADA Copyright © Thomson Reuters Canada Limited or its licensors (excluding individual court documents). All rights reserved.

18 Cramer v. Focus Group Holding Inc. (2013), 2013 CarswellAlta 215 (Alta. Prov. Ct.); Gateway Realty Ltd. v. Arton Holdings Ltd. (1991), 1991 CarswellNS 320 (N.S. T.D.); affirmed on other grounds (1992), 1992 CarswellNS 518 (N.S. C.A.) (law requiring contracting parties to exercise rights honestly, fairly and in good faith; duty breached when party acting in "bad faith"); Health Care Developers Inc. v. Newfoundland (1996), 1996 CarswellNfld 352 (Nfld. C.A.).

19 See §§ 51, 52, 74; Trusts.

20 Prothroe v. Adams (1997), 1997 CarswellAlta 681 (Alta. Q.B.) (defendants, as partners appointed to negotiate proposed terms of potential merger, standing in fiduciary relationship to other partners); Brew v. Rozano Holdings Ltd. (2006), 2006 CarswellBC 1813 (B.C. C.A.) (partners owing each other equitable duty of good faith); Merklinger v. Jantree No. 3 Ltd. Partnership (2004), 2004 CarswellOnt 6659 (Ont. S.C.J.) (general partner breaching fiduciary duty toward limited partner); Moffat v. Wetstein (1996), 1996 CarswellOnt 2148 (Ont. Gen. Div.); leave to appeal refused (1997), 1997 CarswellOnt 633 (Ont. Gen. Div.) (individual partner owing fiduciary duty to partnership generally as well as fellow partners); see also 337965 B.C. Ltd. v. Tackama Forest Products Ltd. (1992), 1992 CarswellBC 119 (B.C. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (1993), 161 N.R. 159 (note) (S.C.C.) (defendant's duty as managing partner not that of trustee, but more like duty owed by governing director to corporation); Zawadzki v. Matthews Group Ltd. (1999), 1999 CarswellOnt 1681 (Ont. S.C.J. [Commercial List]); affirmed (2001), 2001 CarswellOnt 5023 (Ont. C.A.) (since assignee of partnership interest not becoming "partner" in partnership venture, absent agreement to that effect, assignee not inheriting obligations of utmost good faith and honesty flowing from being partner).

21 Awad v. Dover Investments Ltd. (2004), 2004 CarswellOnt 3805 (Ont. S.C.J.); additional reasons at (2005), 2005 CarswellOnt 369 (Ont. S.C.J.) (parties negotiating joint venture, involving special duty of utmost good faith); Wonsch Construction Co. v. National Bank of Canada (1990), 1990 CarswellOnt 135 (Ont. C.A.) (joint venturer unable to make secret profit by dealing directly with another joint venturer's bankers to secure direct benefits in liquidation of joint venture's assets and payments of its debts); see also WHA 820 Holdings Ltd. v. Daymax Management Inc. (2003), 2003 CarswellBC 3103 (B.C. S.C.) (agreement requiring each party to bear proportionate responsibility for any liabilities incurred by defendants respecting development project, giving rise to good faith obligation on part of defendants, including duty to plaintiffs to disclose activities affecting project).

22 See §§ 43 to 46, 47; Agency; see also Trophy Foods Inc. v. Scott (1995), 1995 CarswellNS 218 (N.S. C.A.) (while principal and agency relationship giving rise to fiduciary duties, extent of such duties vary; equitable duties imposed should reflect nature of relationship and, particularly, terms of contract between commercial parties).

23 Shea v. Manitoba Public Insurance Corp. (1991), 1991 CarswellBC 60 (B.C. S.C.) (insurer's exclusive discretionary power to settle claims placing insured at insurer's mercy; insured's vulnerability imposing on insurer duties of good faith and fair dealing, requiring at least as much consideration to insured's interests as to own interests, and disclosure of all material information touching on insured's position in litigation and settlement negotiations); Ernst & Young Inc. v. Chartis Insurance Co. of Canada (2014), 2014 CarswellOnt 891 (Ont. C.A.) (duty to act in good faith separate from duty to compensate for loss covered by policy and thus giving rise to separate and independent cause of action); see also Plaza Fiberglass Manufacturing Ltd. v. Cardinal Insurance Co. (1994), 1994 CarswellOnt 661 (Ont. C.A.) (excess insurer's duty to act in good faith not giving rise to general fiduciary duty); Manifest Shipping Co. v. Uni-Polaris Shipping Co. (2001), [2001] 2 W.L.R. 170 (U.K. H.L.); see also § 6 (regarding good faith during negotiations), §§ 117, 259; Insurance.

24 Martel Building Ltd. v. R. (2000), 2000 CarswellNat 2678 (S.C.C.) (full extent of obligation of fair and equal treatment to be determined from tender documents); M.J.B. Enterprises Ltd. v. Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. (1999), 1999 CarswellAlta 301

WESTLAW EDGE CANADA Copyright © Thomson Reuters Canada Limited or its licensors (excluding individual court documents). All rights reserved.

(S.C.C.) (implied obligation that only compliant bid would be accepted); Double N Earthmovers Ltd. v. Edmonton (City) (2005), 2005 CarswellAlta 276 (Alta. C.A.); affirmed (2007), 2007 CarswellAlta 36 (S.C.C.) (duty of fairness to bidder not including obligation to investigate allegations concerning capacity of another bidder to comply with own bid prior to acceptance); J. Oviatt Contracting Ltd. v. Kitimat General Hospital Society (2002), 2002 CarswellBC 1506 (B.C. C.A.) (hospital able to rely on privilege clause, as no bad faith found); Chinook Aggregates Ltd. v. Abbotsford (Municipal District) (1989), 1989 CarswellBC 203 (B.C. C.A.) (implied term of fairness inherent aspect of tendering process; unannounced local preference policy breaching duty to treat all bidders fairly); Rockwood v. Eastern Newfoundland & Labrador Regional Health & Community Services Board (2004), 2004 CarswellNfld 178 (N.L. T.D.) (privilege clause clearly reserving right not to proceed with tender; board, required to act fairly and in good faith, not obliged to any bidder to pay more than it felt it could afford, investigate other financing sources, or rework objectives to award contract to particular bidder); Health Care Developers Inc. v. Newfoundland (1996), 1996 CarswellNfld 352 (Nfld. C.A.) (doctrine of good faith part of law of tendering for government contracts; bad faith to award something other than contract B, to fail to reject non-compliant tenders, or to award contract B on basis of undisclosed preference); Provincial Fence Products Ltd. v. Conception Bay South (Town) (2013), 2013 CarswellNfld 233 (N.L. T.D.) (town acting in good faith in call for tenders; evidence supported town's reasons for cancelling tender as being budgetary in nature); but see McNamara Construction Co. v. Newfoundland Transshipment Ltd. (2002), 2002 CarswellNfld 124 (Nfld. T.D.) (good faith not implied in construction contract on basis of either intention of parties or implication by law; unlike public tendering cases, circumstances not engaging broad issues of public policy and interest); see also § 6 (regarding good faith in negotiations), § 10; Building Contracts.

25 Canadian Bank of Commerce v. Munro (1925), 1925 CarswellAlta 130 (S.C.C.); Business Development Bank of Canada v. Parkview Holdings Ltd. (2000), 2000 CarswellNfld 125 (Nfld. T.D.) (common theme running through "deficiency" applications being requirement that mortgagee always to act in good faith); Federal Business Development Bank v. Ralph (1988), 1988 CarswellNfld 82 (Nfld. C.A.) (mortgagee breaching duty to act in good faith to take reasonable precautions to obtain best available price); Frost Ltd. v. Ralph (1982), 1982 CarswellNfld 66 (Nfld. C.A.) (mortgagee not acting in good faith when price realized significantly short of true value of property sold, when acting wilfully and recklessly in conduct of sale, or when failing to take reasonable precautions or act in prudent manner to obtain proper price).

26 GATX Corp. v. Hawker Siddeley Canada Inc. (1996), 1996 CarswellOnt 1434 (Ont. Gen. Div. [Commercial List]) (grantor of right of first refusal must act reasonably and in good faith; duty not discharged where essential purpose of sale to third party being to frustrate right of first refusal); Landymore v. Hardy (1991), 1991 CarswellNS 102 (N.S. T.D.) (grantor of right of first refusal required to offer property at lowest fair market price that prepared to accept; relations to be characterized by good faith and reasonableness); but see 1376273 Ontario Inc. v. Knob Hill Farms Ltd. (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 2239 (Ont. S.C.J.); affirmed (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 4936 (Ont. C.A.) (in case of exercise of simple option to purchase, no duty of good faith on vendor to remind purchaser of expiry date of option or to tell purchaser that request for extension will be denied); Morningstar Homes Ltd. v. 545918 B.C. Ltd. (2005), 2005 CarswellBC 96 (B.C. S.C.) (option to purchase; term requiring reasonable efforts to register subdivision plan not required as matter of business efficacy).

27 Valley Equipment Ltd. v. John Deere Ltd. (2000), 2000 CarswellNB 13 (N.B. Q.B.) (dealer awarded damages against manufacturer for breach of duty of good faith; "reasonableness" read into cancellation clause in dealer agreement; termination of long-term relationship based on resignation of dishonest and disloyal general manager not reasonable); see also Klewchuk v. Switzer (2003), 2003 CarswellAlta 867 (Alta. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (2004), 2004 CarswellAlta 426 (S.C.C.) (parties having long-standing business arrangements to provide charities with locations and services for operating casinos; defendant meeting duty of good faith by negotiating with plaintiff after concluding that agreement frustrated by change in gaming laws; agreement to negotiate not carrying obligation to lease casino facility at any price); Sultani v. Blenz The Canadian Coffee Co. (2005), 2005 CarswellBC 877 (B.C. S.C.); affirmed (2005), 2005 CarswellBC 2862 (B.C. C.A.) (franchise agreement containing entire agreement clause but no provision for renewal; while relationship between parties imposing duty of good faith upon franchisor short of fiduciary duty, duty of fair dealing not compelling party to renew expiring relationship when not commercially reasonable to do so); 530888 Ontario Ltd. v. Sobeys Inc. (2001), 2001 CarswellOnt 600 (Ont. S.C.J. [Commercial List]) (no inherent right to force franchisor to enter into new sublease with franchisee where sublease agreement expiring and containing no option to renew); see also § 6 (regarding duty of good faith in negotiating in context of long-term relationship).

28 Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd. (1997), 1997 CarswellMan 455 (S.C.C.) (unlike ordinary commercial contract, power inequality informing all aspects of employment relationship and requiring courts to hold employers to duty of good faith and fair dealing in manner of dismissal; breach of obligation compensable by adding to length of notice period; however, dismissed employee having no right to sue in contract or tort for bad faith conduct in manner of dismissal); see also McKinley v. BC Tel (2001), 2001 CarswellBC

WESTLAW EDGE CANADA Copyright © Thomson Reuters Canada Limited or its licensors (excluding individual court documents). All rights reserved.

1335 (S.C.C.) ("… obligations [of good faith and fair dealing] subsist throughout the employment relationship until, and including its termination" (in obiter)); Babcock v. Canada (Attorney General) (2005), 2005 CarswellBC 937 (B.C. S.C.) (implied obligation of good faith not extending beyond dismissal; applying only to manner of dismissal); Gismondi v. Toronto (City) (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 1498 (Ont. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (2004), 2004 CarswellOnt 718 (S.C.C.) ("Wallace damages" not limited to employer's acts at very moment of dismissal; in appropriate circumstances may include employer's conduct both pre- and post-termination, but only as component of manner of dismissal); Barnard v. Testori Americas Corp. (2001), 2001 CarswellPEI 29 (P.E.I. C.A.) (employment contracts not carrying implied term of good faith and fair dealing); Bower v. J.M. Schneider Inc. (1986), 1986 CarswellBC 397 (B.C. C.A.) (trial judge erroneously implying term to ensure employee's mortgage subsidy payment continuing to end of reasonable notice of termination; court unable to rewrite business contracts to impose own notion of fairness or to imply term contradicting contractual express term).

29 Joo v. Shin (2005), 2005 CarswellBC 1460 (B.C. S.C.) (franchisor terminating relationship by bad faith conduct, substantially nullifying benefits for which franchisee contracted); Ismail v. Treats Inc. (2004), 2004 CarswellNS 24 (N.S. S.C.) (applicable duty of care in franchise relationship one of good faith, including requirement to prepare accurate pro forma statements and generally to disclose accurate financial information); Shelanu Inc. v. Print Three Franchising Corp. (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 2038 (Ont. C.A.) (franchisors owing duty of good faith to franchisees even apart from Arthur Wishart Act (Franchise Disclosure), 2000); Triple 3 Holdings Inc. v. Jan (2004), 2004 CarswellOnt 2649 (Ont. S.C.J.) (franchisor, abusing power and acting dishonestly, liable for $350,000 in punitive damages); Pizza Pizza Ltd. v. 805837 Ontario Inc. (1997), 1997 CarswellOnt 5494 (Ont. Gen. Div.) (no evidence of lack of good faith on part of franchisor in calculating payments to be made under agreements, and no evidence that calculations inaccurate); Perfect Portions Holding Co. v. New Futures Ltd. (1995), 1995 CarswellOnt 3126 (Ont. Gen. Div.); Courtesy Chrysler (1987) Ltd. v. Chrysler Canada Inc. (2012), 2012 CarswellAlta 1843 (Alta. Q.B.); see also McKinlay Motors Ltd. v. Honda Canada Inc. (1989), 1989 CarswellNfld 9 (Nfld. T.D.) (franchisor allocating limited resources or products among various distributors required to act in good faith and not rely on pretexts for action outside scope of circumstances contemplated by contract); Erinwood Ford Sales Ltd. v. Ford Motor Co. of Canada Ltd. (2005), 2005 CarswellOnt 1954 (Ont. S.C.J.) (duty imposed on car manufacturer to act fairly to dealership, as relationship akin to franchise; decision to terminate dealership agreement exercised unfairly and in bad faith); but see Sultani v. Blenz The Canadian Coffee Co. (2005), 2005 CarswellBC 877 (B.C. S.C.); affirmed (2005), 2005 CarswellBC 2862 (B.C. C.A.) (franchise agreement containing entire agreement clause but no provision for renewal; while relationship between parties imposing duty of good faith upon franchisor short of fiduciary duty, duty of fair dealing not compelling party to renew expiring relationship when not considered commercially reasonable to do so); 530888 Ontario Ltd. v. Sobeys Inc. (2001), 2001 CarswellOnt 600 (Ont. S.C.J. [Commercial List]) (no inherent right existing to force franchisor to enter into new sublease with franchisee where sublease agreement expiring and no option to renew); see also § 6 (regarding good faith during negotiations).

30 Lac Minerals Ltd. v. International Corona Resources Ltd. (1989), 1989 CarswellOnt 126 (S.C.C.) (fiduciary relationships not to be presumed in commercial contracts, as equity's drastic remedies reserved for special circumstances; instead, parties should protect themselves by contract); Weiss v. Schad (2002), 2002 CarswellOnt 1498 (Ont. C.A.) (share purchase agreements not falling into special class of contracts of utmost good faith imposing obligation to disclose); 962789 Ontario Ltd. v. Newmarket Plaza Ltd. (2006), 2006 CarswellOnt 5086 (Ont. S.C.J.) (landlord and tenant relationship not analogous to franchise relationship; landlord having no control over day-to-day operation of tenant's business, and lease being typical commercial bargain between parties of equal bargaining power; landlord not owing tenant duty of good faith regarding type of business it leased vacant premises to); Rogers & Rogers Inc. v. Pinehurst Woodworking Co. (2005), 2005 CarswellOnt 7190 (Ont. S.C.J.) (supplier and installer of store fixtures claiming manufacturer breached good faith in misappropriating business opportunity; as relationship between parties not fiduciary, no duty of good faith on manufacturer in fiduciary capacity and no operative good faith standard breached; provided manufacturer not breaching restrictive covenant, entitled to act in own self-interest without regard to supplier's interests); see also Terra Energy Ltd. v. Kilborn Engineering Alberta Ltd. (1999), 1999 CarswellAlta 141 (Alta. C.A.); reconsideration / rehearing refused (1999), 1999 CarswellAlta 348 (Alta. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (2000), 253 N.R. 193 (note) (S.C.C.) (duties of loyalty and avoidance of conflict of interest inherent in fiduciary relationship unlikely to be implied in absence of such relationship; while code of professional ethics cannot create fiduciary relationship, may be considered in determining scope of fiduciary relationship); 978011 Ontario Ltd. v. Cornell Engineering Co. (2001), 2001 CarswellOnt 1290 (Ont. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (2001), 2001 CarswellOnt 3809 (S.C.C.) (no duty of good faith in negotiations where no special relationship between parties; mentor relationship not displacing normal contractual principle of self-reliance, since defendant in ascendant position; plaintiff not having good faith obligation to disclose clear and visible termination provision to defendant who signed agreement without reading it; defendant's trust in plaintiff insufficient to create good faith obligation); Courtesy Chev Olds Ltd. v. Hadfield (2006), 2006 CarswellOnt 1937 (Ont. S.C.J.) (defendant owing implied contractual duty of good faith to car lessee to notify of proposed repairs and allow inspection prior to repairs; also breaching duty by not showing labour rates and hours spent in billing to customer); but see Peel Condominium Corp. No. 505 v. Cam-Valley Homes Ltd. (2001), 2001 CarswellOnt 579 (Ont. C.A.) (developer marketing condominium project designed around recreation area to be conveyed to condominium corporations, but then deciding to develop it; duty of good faith to condominium owners owing due to manner in which developer marketed property, unequal bargaining power, and owners' lack of access to information concerning future development of recreation area lands); Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Brown (1999), 1999 CarswellOnt 4107 (Ont. S.C.J.) (bank, making loan to debtors under conflict of interest, having duty to act in good faith, regardless of lack of prior or fiduciary relationships between bank and debtors); Computer Workshops Ltd. v. Banner Capital Market Brokers Ltd. (1988), 1988 CarswellOnt 107 (Ont. H.C.); affirmed (1990), 1990 CarswellOnt 1445 (Ont. C.A.) (implied term in contract for supply of computer hardware that vendor not to sell similar system to competitor; customer's trust and confidence in supplier creating fiduciary duties); Ascent Financial Services Ltd. v. Blythman (2006), 2006 CarswellSask 83 (Sask. Q.B.); affirmed (2007), 2007 CarswellSask 390 (Sask. C.A.) (plaintiffs purchasing goodwill of defendants' business and parties forming new business; after parties falling out, plaintiffs purchasing defendants' shares, and defendants later breaching non-competition and non-solicitation agreements; defendants, owing obligation to use best efforts to transfer their clients to new business, breaching duty of good faith in performance of contract; defendants owing plaintiffs fiduciary duty independent of contract based on power to affect plaintiffs' interests).

WESTLAW EDGE CANADA Copyright © Thomson Reuters Canada Limited or its licensors (excluding individual court documents). All rights reserved.

31 Shelanu Inc. v. Print Three Franchising Corp. (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 2038 (Ont. C.A.).

32 Wallace v. Canadian Pacific Railway (2013), 2013 CarswellSask 432 (S.C.C.).

33 Bhasin v. Hrynew (2014), 2014 CarswellAlta 2046 (S.C.C.).

34 Bhasin v. Hrynew (2014), 2014 CarswellAlta 2046 (S.C.C.); see § 6 (existence of a duty of good faith in the negotiation of contracts).

35 O'Neill v. General Motors of Canada Ltd. (2013), 2013 CarswellOnt 9803 (Ont. S.C.J.) (duty of good faith inherent in employment relationship; court thus concluding that duty of good faith favouring plaintiff's claim that benefits could not be reduced after employee had retired); Ward v. Manufacturers Life Insurance Co. (2007), 2007 CarswellOnt 8048 (Ont. C.A.); Gateway Realty Ltd. v. Arton Holdings Ltd. (1991), 1991 CarswellNS 320 (N.S. T.D.); affirmed on other grounds (1992), 1992 CarswellNS 518 (N.S. C.A.) (good faith standard breached when party acting in bad faith manner in performing contract, contrary to community standards of honesty, reasonableness or fairness; insistence on good faith requirement in discretionary conduct in contractual formation, performance and enforcement fulfilling courts' obligations to justly resolve disputes between contracting parties); LeMesurier v. Andrus (1986), 1986 CarswellOnt 670 (Ont. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (1986), 74 N.R. 239 (note) (S.C.C.) (purchaser refusing to close purchase and sale agreement because fence and curb of driveway placed over lot line by less than one foot; reliance on rescission clause not justified; vendors and purchasers owing duty to each other to perform contract honestly and in good faith; “approach may be merely an example of the development of an independent doctrine of good faith in contract law at least in the performance of contracts”); Elite Specialty Nursing Services Inc. v. Ontario (2002), 2002 CarswellOnt 2575 (Ont. S.C.J.) (exercise of discretion in allocation of nursing care cases among several facilities; explicit recognition of doctrine of good faith making law more certain, understandable and fair, and avoiding judicial interpretive contortions to obtain desired result); but see Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd. (1997), 1997 CarswellMan 455 (S.C.C.) (dismissed employee having no right to sue in contract or tort for bad faith conduct in manner of dismissal; however, unlike ordinary commercial contract, power inequality informing all aspects of employment relationship, requiring courts to hold employers to duty of good faith and fair dealing in manner of dismissal; breach of obligation compensable by adding to length of notice period); Slate Ventures Inc. v. Hurley (1996), 1996 CarswellNfld 64 (Nfld. T.D.); affirmed (1997), 1997 CarswellNfld 203 (Nfld. C.A.) (vendor of shares in slate quarry owing duty not to nullify reasonably expected benefits by personally exploiting another quarry project; contract creating reasonable expectations of parties by implication and not based on any good faith doctrine); Transamerica Life Canada Inc. v. ING Canada Inc. (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 4834 (Ont. C.A.) (implied duty of good faith not having gone so far as to create new, unbargained-for rights and obligations, nor used to alter contract's express terms); see also Waters, “Corporate Behaviour and Equity's Standards of Conduct” (2004), C.L.R. (3d) 248 (arguing that good faith doctrine of equity going beyond literal and implied terms of contract, and emphasizing spirit of agreement and fairness prevailing between parties); Stack, “The Two Standards Of Good Faith In Canadian Contract Law” (1999), 62 Sask. L. Rev. 201 (one standard of good faith relying on concepts like commercial standards, fair play, fairness, and reasonableness; second standard relying on expectations and intentions of contracting parties as manifested in their contract; court applying first standard looking to a tort-like norm outside parties' agreement to decide if bad faith has occurred, while court employing latter arriving at appropriate standard of conduct by interpreting parties' agreement).

WESTLAW EDGE CANADA Copyright © Thomson Reuters Canada Limited or its licensors (excluding individual court documents). All rights reserved.

36 Slate Ventures Inc. v. Hurley (1996), 1996 CarswellNfld 64 (Nfld. T.D.); affirmed (1997), 1997 CarswellNfld 203 (Nfld. C.A.) (vendor of shares in slate quarry owing duty not to nullify reasonably expected benefits by personally exploiting another quarry project; contract creating reasonable expectations of parties by implication and not based on any good faith doctrine); Cherubini Metal Works Ltd. v. New Brunswick Power Corp. (2007), 2007 CarswellNB 183 (N.B. Q.B.); affirmed (2008), 2008 CarswellNB 628 (N.B. C.A.) (implied contractual duty of good faith and fairness in tendering process not applicable when owner does not award tender to lowest bidder, as long as all criteria to be applied are considered); see also Manifest Shipping Co. v. Uni-Polaris Shipping Co. (2001), [2001] 2 W.L.R. 170 (U.K. H.L.) (good faith duty in performing contract being contractual obligation arising from contract and subject to remedies provided by contract); Waddams, The Law of Contracts, 7th ed. (Thomson Reuters Canada Limited, 2017), § 514 (test of good faith is objective, empowering the court to grant relief from agreements, or clauses that are highly unreasonable or unfair).

37 Dynamic Transport Ltd. v. O.K. Detailing Ltd. (1978), 1978 CarswellAlta 62 (S.C.C.) (implied obligation on vendor in purchase and sale situation to act in good faith and take all reasonable steps to complete sale, including steps to subdivide if condition for carrying out sale; only way to give agreement business efficacy); see also § 162.

38 CivicLife.com Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General) (2005), 2005 CarswellOnt 4228 (Ont. S.C.J.); reversed in part on other grounds (2006), 2006 CarswellOnt 3769 (Ont. C.A.) (implied term of contract to build internet portal that government would act in good faith so as not to nullify software developers' reasonable expectations); see also McCamus, The Law of Contracts (Irwin Law, 2005); McCamus, "Abuse of Discretion, Failure to Cooperate and Evasion of Duty: Unpacking the Common Law Duty of Good Faith in Contractual Performance" (2005), 29 Advocates' Q. 72.

39 CivicLife.com Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General) (2005), 2005 CarswellOnt 4228 (Ont. S.C.J.); reversed in part on other grounds (2006), 2006 CarswellOnt 3769 (Ont. C.A.) (implied term of contract to build internet portal that government would act in good faith so as not to nullify software developers' reasonable expectations; parties' intention that government would facilitate co-operation); see also McCamus, The Law of Contracts (Irwin Law, 2005); McCamus, "Abuse of Discretion, Failure to Cooperate and Evasion of Duty: Unpacking the Common Law Duty of Good Faith in Contractual Performance" (2005) 29 Advocates' Q. 72; Waddams, The Law of Contracts, 7th ed. (Thomson Reuters Canada Limited, 2017), § 505; see also cases cited in § 191.

40 Mesa Operating Ltd. Partnership v. Amoco Canada Resources Ltd. (1994), 1994 CarswellAlta 89 (Alta. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (1994), 179 N.R. 80 (note) (S.C.C.) (party unable to exercise contractual power in way substantially nullifying contractual objectives or causing significant harm to other party contrary to parties' original purposes; defendant failing to consider both main methods of pooling under royalty agreement, contrary to industry practice and parties' expectations); Shelanu Inc. v. Print Three Franchising Corp. (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 2038 (Ont. C.A.) (discretion under contract must be exercised reasonably, fairly and with regard to how other party's interests affected); EdperBrascan Corp. v. 177373 Canada Ltd. (2000), 2000 CarswellOnt 4084 (Ont. S.C.J.); affirmed on other grounds (2002), 2002 CarswellOnt 698 (Ont. C.A.) (contracting parties obliged to act in good faith in some circumstances, such as duty to use best efforts, and in exercise of discretion (in obiter)); Greenberg v. Meffert (1985), 1985 CarswellOnt 727 (Ont. C.A.); leave to appeal refused (1985), 64 N.R. 156 (note) (S.C.C.) (contract providing that payment of commission to real estate agent after termination of agreement being at agency's sole discretion; agency required to act reasonably, fairly, and with regard to how other party's interests affected); Elmdale Investments Ltd. v. Myers (2001), 2001 CarswellOnt 4499 (Ont. S.C.J.) (purchaser obliged to act in good faith in dealing with conditions set out in agreement of purchase and sale; not entitled to exercise discretion capriciously); see also P. & G. Cleaners Ltd. v. Johnson (1995), 1995 CarswellMan 187 (Man. Q.B.) (vendor of shares having absolute right to withhold consent to purchaser acquiring shares in related company, unless business efficacy necessitating limitation of reasonableness; however, minimal duty to act in good faith existing); Muhammad v. Mental Health Program Services of Metropolitan Toronto (2006), 2006 CarswellOnt 5013 (Ont. S.C.J.); affirmed (2008), 2008 CarswellOnt 2370 (Ont. C.A.) (contract stipulating that transfer of contract could be unreasonably withheld; implied duty of good faith would contradict terms of contract); Degelder Construction Co. v. Dancorp Developments Ltd. (2000), 2000 CarswellBC 1484 (B.C. S.C. [In Chambers]); affirmed on other grounds (2002), 2002 CarswellBC 2218 (B.C. C.A.) (mortgagee held to subjective duty of acting in good faith; no implied term placing objective duty upon mortgagee to reasonably exercise powers under mortgage); McCamus, The Law of Contracts (Irwin Law, 2005); McCamus, "Abuse of Discretion, Failure to Cooperate and Evasion of Duty: Unpacking the Common Law Duty of Good Faith in Contractual Performance", (2005) 29 Advocates' Q. 72; see also § 192.

41 Canada Deposit Insurance Corp. v. Canadian Commercial Bank (1998), 1998 CarswellAlta 1088 (Alta. Q.B.) (debt restructuring agreement creating reasonable expectation that company would sell designated assets and give proceeds to bank when unable to pay dividends or redemptions; company breaching duty of good faith by refusing to sell designated assets); Princeton Light

WESTLAW EDGE CANADA Copyright © Thomson Reuters Canada Limited or its licensors (excluding individual court documents). All rights reserved.

& Power Co. v. MacDonald (2005), 2005 CarswellBC 1254 (B.C. C.A.) (duties of good faith and fair dealing implied elements of standard electrical utility supply contract; utility acting in bad faith in unreasonably back-billing customer, justifying punitive damages); Transamerica Life Canada Inc. v. ING Canada Inc. (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 4834 (Ont. C.A.) (duty of good faith may be implied to secure performance and enforcement of contract made by parties, or to ensure that parties not acting in manner eviscerating or defeating agreement's objectives); Optimal Space Inc. v. Margana Holdings Inc. (2005), 2005 CarswellOnt 1687 (Ont. S.C.J.) (commercial leases subject to implied duty of good faith in performance; party's attempts to destroy integrity of contract amounting to bad faith, and presence of bad faith excluding existence of good faith); see also Kubota Canada Ltd. v. Merchant Private Ltd. (1997), 1997 CarswellOnt 1685 (Ont. Gen. Div.) (good faith equally applicable to all contracts, including leasing and financing agreements; allowing lessor to retain payment resulting from lessee's mistake in failing to give notice under technical provisions of lease inconsistent with good faith and fair dealing); McCamus, The Law of Contracts (Irwin Law, 2005); McCamus, "Abuse of Discretion, Failure to Cooperate and Evasion of Duty: Unpacking the Common Law Duty of Good Faith in Contractual Performance" (2005), 29 Advocates' Q. 72; but see M.A. Hanna Co. v. Sydney Steel Corp. (1995), 1995 CarswellNS 45 (N.S. S.C.); Potter, Q.C., annotation); see also §§ 191 to 192.

42 Markakis v. Yuck (2003), 2003 CarswellAlta 208 (Alta. Q.B.) (defendant's representations when soliciting investment in business ventures from plaintiffs carrying undertaking that defendant would act reasonably and in good faith, arising both as matter of contractual interpretation and by operation of law); see also No. 151 Cathedral Ventures Ltd. v. Gartrell (2003), 2003 CarswellBC 2974 (B.C. S.C.) (since land owners extracting undertaking from developer to advise them of any disadvantage resulting from contract's implementation, reasonable for developer to expect owners not to take advantage of it; owners, contrary to such known expectation, deliberately delaying advising developer until expiry of deadline for condition removal, that developer's draft new offer considered repudiation of contract; breach of implied term of good faith); but see Galaxy Sports Inc. v. Umbro Holdings Ltd. (2005), 2005 CarswellBC 481 (B.C. S.C.) (relationship between parties nothing other than licensor/licensee in commercial enterprise; merely negotiating toward acquisition agreement not creating fiduciary relationship; representations not made with intention of promoting sale of licences).

43 Shelanu Inc. v. Print Three Franchising Corp. (2003), 2003 CarswellOnt 2038 (Ont. C.A.).

44 Strategy Summit Ltd. v. Remington Development Corp. (2011), 2011 CarswellAlta 1616 (Alta. Q.B.).

45 C.M. Callow Inc. v. Zollinger (2020), 2020 SCC 45 (S.C.C.) (counterparty's actions and statements led party to mistakenly believe that winter contract would be renewed; breach of duty of honest performance).

46 C.M. Callow Inc. v. Zollinger (2020), 2020 SCC 45 (S.C.C.) (court rejected reliance damages that measured damages according to loss party suffered from relying on other party's dishonesty).

End of Document

Copyright © Thomson Reuters Canada Limited or its licensors (excluding individual court documents). All rights reserved.

In the Court of Appeal of Alberta

Citation: Paterson v. Hamilton, 1996 ABCA 143

Date: 19960404
Docket: 16415
Registry: Calgary

1996 ABCA 143 (CanLII)

Between:

George G. Paterson,
The Estate of R.J. Ritchie Paterson

Appellants
(Plaintiffs)

- and -

Frederic C. Hamilton, Hamilton Brothers Exploration Company, Hamilton Brothers Petroleum Corporation, Hamilton Brothers Oil & Gas Corporation and Hamilton Brothers Oil Company

Respondents
(Defendants)

And Between:

Southern Hills Investments Ltd., John Souther, Nancy L. Souther, C.W. Roenisch III, Ronald D. Lepan, The Estate of Isaac Hashman, and The Estate of Dr. Francis M. Christie

Appellants
(Plaintiffs)

- and -

Frederic C. Hamilton, Hamilton Brothers Exploration Company, Hamilton Brothers Petroleum Corporation, Hamilton Brothers Oil & Gas Corporation and Hamilton Brothers Oil Company

Respondents
(Defendants)

The Court:

The Honourable Madam Justice Conrad
The Honourable Madam Justice McFadyen
The Honourable Mr. Justice O'Leary

Memorandum of Judgment
Delivered from the Bench

COUNSEL:

W.E. Code, Q.C. and T.N. Cotter, for the Appellant (Plaintiffs)

D.J. McDonald, Q.C. and R.F. Smith, for the Respondent (Defendants)

W.E. Code, Q.C. and T.N. Cotter, for the Appellant (Plaintiffs)

D.J. McDonald, Q.C. and R.F. Smith, for the Respondent (Defendants)

1996 ABCA 143 (CanLII)

MEMORANDUM OF JUDGMENT
DELIVERED FROM THE BENCH

CONARD, J.A.:

[1] You ought to know that old habits die hard. At the last minute, we are still finishing our judgment. In any event, we are prepared to give judgment this morning. The decision of this Court is divided. Mr. Justice O'Leary will give the majority decision and I will give the dissenting decision.

O'LEARY, J.A.: (for the majority):

[2] The Plaintiffs have appealed two rulings made by Kent, J. during the course of trial. The Defendants have applied to stay the Notice of Appeal on the ground that it is premature, that it is a disruption of the trial process, and an abuse of process.

[3] The trial commenced in May, 1995. There have been approximately 75 days of trial. The Plaintiffs have closed their case except for completion of the evidence of a rebuttal witness and the Defendants have closed their case. The issue which has precipitated the rulings which are now under appeal first arose during the evidence of the last, or close to the last, witness of the Defendants, one Huddleston. The Plaintiffs first made this application following completion of his evidence and during the course of the evidence of the rebuttal witness.

[4] The trial is essentially over. It can be completed within, perhaps, two weeks including completion of the evidence and argument. The trial is scheduled to resume on April 22.

[5] During the examination of the witness Huddleston, it came to light that the witness had sworn a deposition in the United States proceedings and that the deposition had not been disclosed in the Defendants' production. The document was obtained and the examination of the witness was completed with the benefit of the deposition transcript.

No objection has been made with respect to the late production of that document. Any potential prejudice which existed has apparently been remedied.

[6] The existence of the unproduced Huddleston deposition transcript led counsel for the Defendants to make further enquiries with his clients and it was discovered that there are several other similar deposition transcripts which had not been produced. Counsel made this fact known to counsel for the Plaintiffs as well as to the Court. As a result of this, Plaintiffs' counsel made an application to the Trial Judge in December of last year seeking various forms of relief, including a mis-trial or, alternatively, a stay of proceedings or an adjournment sine die.

[7] The Trial Judge looked at selected parts of the documents which had then been produced and made a ruling on December 15, 1995. That ruling is the first subject of the appeal.

[8] Later, in early January of this year, further documentation was produced. That resulted from issues raised by the Plaintiffs when they were permitted to re-open their case and call evidence from another witness. Those new documents consisted largely of micro-fiche records of journal entries in respect of inter-company financial transactions or movements of assets among the various Hamilton companies. These matters were not considered relevant by the Defendants in the first instance and were not made the subject of production.

[9] The Plaintiffs made a further application, similar to the first, and the Trial Judge again reviewed those parts of the documents which counsel selected as relevant and made a ruling on February 28, 1996 dismissing the Plaintiffs' application. That ruling is the second subject-matter of the appeal before this Court.

[10] In her December ruling, the learned Trial Judge formulated a test for determining whether or not a remedy should be made available where there has been late production of relevant documents. The test is set out in her Reasons for Judgment. She formulated this test after first taking into account a number of criteria, including the duty of a party to litigation to make continuous production during the litigation including the trial. After a review of the material produced in the light of the evidence introduced at the trial to that point, the Trial Judge applied the test she had formulated and ruled that the Plaintiffs were not entitled to any of the remedies sought and that the trial should proceed.

[11] The February ruling was to the same effect.

1996 ABCA 143 (CanLII)

[12] It has long been accepted that this Court will not entertain appeals from rulings or orders made in the course of a trial unless there are exceptional or unusual circumstances. To entertain such appeals would seriously compromise the trial process. The question is whether these circumstances justify the Court in examining the rulings made by the learned Trial Judge to determine if they were right or wrong and to either grant a remedy or order the trial to continue to completion.

[13] Exceptional or unusual circumstances justifying interference in the trial process must be such as to demonstrate that it would be manifestly unjust to one or both of the parties to let the trial proceed on the basis of the ruling appealed and that such injustice cannot be adequately redressed if the trial is allowed to continue without the correctness of the ruling being tested in this Court.

[14] The Plaintiffs say that the rulings are not rulings made in the course of trial but are, rather, rulings on an application in the nature of an interlocutory motion, in respect of which the Plaintiffs are given the right to appeal under Rule 505. We do not agree. The applications here were made to the Trial Judge in the course of the trial. Rules and policy considerations applicable to rulings made in the course of the trial apply equally here.

[15] It is clear from reviewing the material filed and from the submissions of counsel that if this Court hears the appeal, the appeal can only be resolved in one of two ways: by directing a mis-trial or by ordering the trial to continue (in effect dismissing the appeal).

[16] It is evident that there can be no “half-way house” here; that this is not a case which can be “patched-up” by directing further discoveries or other similar remedies. That could only be done, in any event, if this Court were to decide that the Trial Judge’s rulings were wrong and that brings us back to the fundamental question of whether this Court should interfere in these circumstances or not.

[17] The foregoing considerations militate in favour of staying the Notice of Appeal, and letting the trial process proceed to completion. The correctness of the rulings made by the Trial Judge will be subject to scrutiny on appeal if an appeal is taken.

[18] This is not a case where the trial can be “saved” by making orders of various kinds, such as for additional examinations for discovery, re-opening of the parties respective cases and things of that nature. As we have already said, there are only two realistic options available to this Court should the appeal proceed.

[19] We see no additional prejudice to the Plaintiffs if the Notice of Appeal is stayed and the trial allowed to proceed to completion. The Plaintiffs argue that they will be prejudiced if they are forced to complete the trial and then appeal the judgment, because findings of fact will have been made on an inadequate discovery. The Court of Appeal would be reluctant to overturn findings of fact, even if made on the basis of inadequate discovery and possibly a consequent inadequate examination of witnesses.

1996 ABCA 143 (CanLII)

[20] We do not agree with that argument. The position here is similar to any error which occurs in the course of a trial. If an appellant convinces this Court that evidence was improperly admitted or rejected, or if a procedural matter results in unfairness to one of the parties, this Court has never had difficulty in providing an appropriate remedy, despite findings of fact made by the trial judge.

[21] There is also the question of the prejudice of having to mount a full appeal in order to have the issues resolved. If the Plaintiffs are unsuccessful at trial, they are likely to appeal in any event, regardless of what remedial action this Court might take should the appeal be permitted to proceed.

[22] If the Plaintiffs are successful at the trial, then the issues raised become largely academic. They would still be bound of course by the evidence at trial and this might result in prejudice on an appeal by the other side. On balance, however, the potential prejudice to the Plaintiffs arising from refusal to let this appeal proceed is greatly outweighed by the prejudice which will result to both parties from the declaration of a mis-trial, and we believe that that remedy or the dismissal of the appeal are the only practical potential results should the appeal proceed.

[23] The position of the Defendants should also be kept in mind. We should not decide this application on the basis of any presumption of wrong-doing on the part of the Defendants or their counsel. The Trial Judge made it very clear that her decision was not based on any such presumption and we should proceed on the same basis. We are not in a position to make any findings in this regard.

[24] We fail to see how this appeal can be allowed to proceed without it being characterized as “second guessing” the Trial Judge. In our view it would be a serious compromise of the principle, long recognized in this Court, that we will not interfere with the trial process except in exceptional circumstances. This principle is particularly applicable here where the trial is virtually completed and the only reasonable remedy, as we have said on several occasions, which could be open to this Court on the appeal would be to either dismiss the appeal or to direct a mis-trial with the result that the trial would have to be commenced again from the start.

1996 ABCA 143 (CanLII)

[25] Counsel for the Defendants accepted that staying the Notice of Appeal would not bar the Plaintiffs from raising the matters now complained of on appeal, should they be unsuccessful at the trial and eventually appeal to this Court.

[26] For the reasons which I have stated, the application to stay the Notice of Appeal is allowed.

McFADYEN, J.A.:

[27] I agree with the decision and the Reasons of Mr. Justice O'Leary.

CONRAD, J.A. (dissenting):

[28] As stated by Mr. Justice O'Leary, the issue before this Court is whether this appeal should be dismissed or stayed as being premature or an abuse of process.

[29] I am of the view that this application for dismissal should be denied and the appeal proceed. Any panel that hears this appeal would, of course, have the opportunity to revisit this issue on its own motion should they feel after a review of fuller evidence than is currently available to us that the issue of a mistrial should be reserved until after the conclusion of the trial.

[30] My brother O'Leary has outlined briefly some of the background leading up to this application and I would simply add a few comments and observations in that regard.

[31] The late disclosure of documents in this case is vast. There were, according to the Plaintiffs, in excess of 1,900 documents produced by the Respondents since the trial commenced. Approximately 208 of those documents were not produced until after the Appellant had closed its case. Those documents alone consisted of thousands of pages of documents. As Mr. Justice O'Leary described, some of the depositions first came to light during the cross-examination of the expert, Mr. Huddleston.

[32] Prior to trial, the Respondents' counsel had sent a letter to the Appellant saying that all of the trial transcript and depositions from a related U.S. trial had been disclosed. Without suggesting that counsel has done anything intentionally wrong, that statement was inaccurate and the depositions of many witnesses came to light following the cross-examination of Mr. Huddleston. Huddleston's deposition alone was some 656 pages long.

[33] One of the depositions that was not disclosed was that of Mr. Betts, who was apparently involved with Mr. Huddleston in the collection of facts underlying the Huddleston opinion evidence. That deposition has not been disclosed to the date of this appeal.

1996 ABCA 143 (CanLII)

[34] O'Leary, J.A. referred to the late disclosure of journal entries, indicating transfers between various of the Respondent companies and Ex Co. These entries were contained on a microfiche of accounting and journal entries. The existence of the microfiche was not disclosed. The Appellants argue that there is a very significant entry of that microfiche supporting the allegations in the Statement of Claim. The Respondent says he did not recognize that they were relevant until after the re-opening of the Plaintiffs' case. In any event, it is not disputed that the microfiche is relevant to the issues in dispute, and that it was not produced.

DISCUSSION

[35] In arriving at my decision, I agree with the general principle that this Court does not entertain appeals from rulings made mid-trial except in exceptional circumstances, for fear of compromising the trial process. However, as Chief Justice Laycraft made clear in the Alberta Tank Ltd. decision (1987), 53 Alt a. L.R. (2d) 190, this Court should not refuse to exercise its jurisdiction to hear an appeal and wait for final verdict where a later review will not produce a just result. Thus, the practical point in this appeal is whether a miscarriage of justice will occur if the trial proceeds. I am of the view it will.

[36] In applying the above principle to the facts of the case under appeal, it is important to identify the reason the problem in this case exists. It arises totally from the failure of the Respondents to produce not just a few documents, but many documents, on a timely basis.

[37] Thus, there is a second fundamental principle which is at stake in this case. There is a fundamental obligation of a party to an action to provide all of the documents relating to the matters in issue. There is a danger that if we allow cases to proceed to trial where there has been a massive failure of production of documents, it will diminish the obligation to produce in a timely fashion, as it may be seen as an advantage to withhold production. Conversely, halting proceedings raid-trial may prompt such appeals. It is with these two fundamental requirements of our judicial system in mind that I approach this appeal.

[38] In my view, this case is quite different from the Cascade Development Corporation Limited case (1988), 63 Alta L.R. (2d) 394 where the trial judge ruled the document was irrelevant. In the case at bar the documents are all admitted to be relevant. It is admitted that they should have been produced. They simply were not produced. Nor is there any evidence to say why they were not produced. It is true that counsel has said it was an oversight -and I am not suggesting otherwise - but there is no evidence to explain how the oversight occurred. Were the documents thought to be lost? Where were they? Were they in the solicitor's possession and he just simply overlooked producing them? Were they docuraents that everybody forgot about? All of that is unknown. What is know is that they were not produced, without explanation.

1996 ABCA 143 (CanLII)

[39] Again, I do not suggest by these comments that any sinister intent was involved; but, with respect, I take a somewhat different view of this than my colleagues. Where he says we should not presume wrongdoing by the Defendants, I say there is wrongdoing - not in the sense of intentional wrongdoing because I cannot make that decision on this evidence, but in the sense of an extensive failure of production.

[40] The principle of production is vital to the civil litigation process. In commercial litigation such as the type involved in this case, the plaintiffs rely absolutely on full and complete production and discovery. The obligation rests on the party to produce, not on the party requesting production. I accept that frequently there is a casualness about production in our courts, where counsel agree between themselves that documents will continue to be produced throughout the course of the trial. That does happen from time to time, but when that happens there is also generally an accommodation between parties as to the need to remedy any prejudice that may exist as a result of that late production. When they cannot agree, of course rulings will have to be made; but the responsibility for that production does not shift.

[41] The problems that have arisen in this case are created not by the Trial Judge's ruling, for she was forced to make rulings, but by the extensiveness of the failure to disclose what are conceded to be relevant and producible documents. Not only did they fail to provide, but in the case of the depositions there was representation - albeit innocent - that all deposition evidence had been produced. The Plaintiffs were entitled to rely on that. They did not need to go looking for those depositions. That statement was not correct.

[42] Thus, when I view the issues of injustice, I am not as concerned here with the position of the Defendants/Respondents as my colleagues. I do so not because I conclude that the Defendants intentionally set out to do something wrong, but because the problems that have been created are their doing, whether inadvertent or not.

[43] I also, with respect, do not share the same view as my colleagues with respect to the issue of this being an all-or-nothing situation. In my view, the findings that it must be either a mistrial, or nothing, cannot be made until after the appeal of the rulings. If the Trial Judge is right in all of her conclusions, except perhaps the failure to produce one document, then perhaps the trial could be saved by allowing the Appellants to cross-examine and reopen the case with respect to that evidence. If, on the other hand, the production is so disastrous that it cannot be saved, should the Plaintiffs be forced to proceed to try to salvage what they can in rebuttal evidence with what they accurately describe as having one arm tied behind their back?

1996 ABCA 143 (CanLII)

[44] Taking everything into consideration, I conclude on the facts of this case that justice cannot be done if this application is granted. In summary, I arrive at that decision for the following reasons:

[45] Firstly, this case is not the normal case necessitated by a, ruling during the course of trial relating to admissibility of evidence or rulings made to deal with a few documents produced in an untimely fashion, or other such rulings as may arise from time to time throughout a trial; rather, this is a case necessitated by an extensive failure to produce of admittedly relevant documents. While counsel continued on, once they knew of some of the documents, I do not think they should be penalized when at some point in the trial they realize that they cannot continue on properly without prejudice.

[46] Secondly, the Trial Judge was in a difficult spot. She looked at the late production and concluded that there were no issues raised by the new production. It will be remembered that she did not have all of the new production in front of her but made her decision on the basis of the examples put forward which she described as being examples most prejudicial to the Plaintiffs. She felt that the evidence in those examples was already available, and thus refused any adjournment for re-examination with respect to much of the production. In my view, if she were wrong on any of those issues and there is any possibility that an adjournment could resolve the issue in time to save the trial, that opportunity will be lost if this motion is granted. Injustice will occur. For instance, the Trial Judge concluded that Mr. Jenny's deposition, where he said he knew that the expert had not concurred with the $18.00-$20.00 price being suggested for the Ex Co shares was no different than an earlier letter from Hamilton which suggested that they could not have concurrence from the expert without further investigation. The Appellant, on the other hand, argues that the Hamilton document can be understood to mean that the expert couldn't concur without further research, whereas the statement of Jenny is the first statement indicating that one of the directors knew that the appraiser did not actually concur with the $18.00-$20.00 price. If the appeal court thought the trial judge erred in regard to that one witness only, they could allow examinations for discovery with hopes of saving the trial, as opposed to having to order a new trial later. That will not be an option open at the end of the day.

1996 ABCA 143 (CanLII)

[47] I recognize that that similar problems frequently arise with respect to mid-trial rulings. However, in most cases the problem is not created by such an extensive failure of production. Moreover, in this case there has already been an extensive adjournment from December until April 22. It is not a case of interrupting a trial that is in full flow.

[48] Thirdly, if, on the other hand, the appeal court is of the view that the failure of production is so vast the trial cannot be saved, they can direct a new trial immediately if it is obvious that one is needed, if, on the other hand, the trial proceeds, the appellant will never have the advantage of arguing the full prejudice of the non-production because they will have been prevented from obtaining the derivative evidence that might appear should cross-examination be felt proper.

[49] Fourthly, while the trial is at rebuttal stage, we are not talking about a couple of days of trial remaining. There are still two weeks anticipated. That is a significant time and, indeed, is longer than many trials in total. Moreover, if the Trial Judge is wrong that this evidence is not significant, the Plaintiffs are being forced to continue with rebuttal without the benefit of cross-examination on the new documentary evidence and the derivative evidence that may come to light as a result of such cross-examination. They have the prejudice, not just the ones referred to by them as enumerated by Mr. Justice O'Leary, but the prejudice of expense, time, money, and completion of a trial after disclosure.

[50] Finally, and perhaps most importantly, it is the wrong message to send to persons who fail to produce on the same scale that production failed in this case. The benefit of the continued trial should not operate in the favour of the person who created the serious problem. Morever, at the appeal, this Court will have the benefit of full transcripts and no doubt the documents that were not produced. They are in a much better position to evaluate the deferring of the decision with respect to the mistrial than this panel and, in my view, this motion for dismissal at this time should be dismissed.

[Discussion]

CONRAD, J.A.: The Court is of the view in this situation that it should be costs in the cause.

1996 ABCA 143 (CanLII)

Opron Construction Co. Ltd.
(plaintiff) v. Her Majesty The Queen in Right of Alberta
(defendant)
(Action No. 8403-37500)

Indexed As: Opron Construction Co. v. Alberta

Alberta Court of Queen's Bench Judicial District of Edmonton
Feehan, J.
March 17, 1994.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

Counsel:

W.J. Kenny, Q.C., A.J. Beames and G.G. Ortt, for the plaintiff;

A.P. Hnatiuk, Q.C., D.H. Lewis and C.A. Graham, for the defendant.

This action was heard before Feehan, J., of the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench, Judicial District of Edmonton, who delivered the following judgment on March 17, 1994.

Table Of Contents Para. No.

Introduction 1

Findings of Fact 21

The Landowner Reports 28

Evolution and Chronology of the Dam Design 51

Embankment - Stage I Contract . . . 56

Creation of the As Built Or As Constructed Drawings of Stage I . . . 64

The Design Changes Between Stage I and Stage II 76

The Contract Documents 77

Reliance 203

The Site Tour 216

The Contract Award 247

BOA COMPEER001681

The Plaintiff's Estimate of Granular Material - The Background & Assumptions 258

Mobilization and Commencement of Construction (1982) 305

Opron's Approach to Work 322

Granular Mining and Losses 341

Maio Construction Western Ltd. . . . 349

The Maio Construction Insolvency 356

The Pervious Borrow Work 365

Tri-Alta 369

Plaintiff's Planning & Construction Operations - 1983 385

Plaintiff's Bidding Errors 398

Equipment Selection/Productivities . 406

Analysis of Relevant Information Not Disclosed in the Contract 450

Alberta Environment's Determination of What Information Was to be Included in the Stage II Tender Documents 466

The Law 492

Adverse Inferences 768

Is Opron Construction Ltd. The Proper Plaintiff 770

Quantum Assessment 791

Summary 914

Introduction

[1] Feehan, J.: The plaintiff, Opron Construction Co. Ltd. ("Opron"), claims damages against the defendant arising out of the Stage II contract for construction of the Paddle River Dam ("PRD"). Opron, in response to an invitation to tender issued by the Department of Environment of the Government of Alberta, bid to perform work called for on a unit price basis. Opron's claim arises primarily from three main areas of the work:

(a) the pervious borrow;

(b) the downstream foundation;

(c) the north abutment.

[2] Opron claims against the defendant:

(a) for breach of contract, including

(i) breach of express terms;

(ii) breach of implied terms requiring full disclosure and good faith;

(b) concurrently, or alternatively, for liability in tort on the basis of deceit and negligent misrepresentation.

[3] The issues in this case include:

(a) Was there actionable misrepresentation and actionable nondisclosure? I will find that there was.

(b) Is the defendant liable for breach of contract? I will find that it is.

(c) Is the defendant liable concurrently or alternatively in tort for such misrepresentations and nondisclosure, either in deceit or negligence, or both? I will find that it is, for both.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

(d) Does the contract limit or negative the liability of the defendant? I will find that it does not.

(e) What is the proper measure of Opron's damages? $875,000 plus interest.

[4] The Paddle River Valley (PRV) in the area of the dam is up to approximately one-half kilometre wide. The Paddle River itself during normal flow, which is most of the year, occupies only a small portion of this wide valley. The valley bottom in the vicinity of the PRD is flanked on either side by steep walls approximately 30 metres in height.

[5] The Paddle River is subject to severe periodic flooding and was known by the defendant to flood since the earliest settlement of this area. The flooding occurred most frequently in the spring, during runoff, and in the summer following heavy rainfall. The river was usually lowest in the fall and winter.

[6] The PRD is an earthfill dam designed to serve as a flood control structure. Water is stored during the high river flows and released when the river flows are low. In this way, flooding of agricultural land downstream and adjacent to the Paddle River was expected to be controlled.

[7] Alberta Environment undertook numerous investigations, both before and after the government's public announcement. These investigations were to determine the location of the dam, the nature, availability and suitability of materials for construction and for the design of the dam itself.

[8] After investigating several potential sites, the location of the dam was finalized in December of 1980. The design of the dam embankment was finalized in the spring of 1981. Numerous changes were made to the embankment design through the course of construction. Some of these changes will be referred to later.

[9] Alberta Environment and Thurber Construction Limited (TCL) (Thurber) working under its direction designed the dam and conducted investigations which led to the design.

[10] The PRD was to be constructed in phases or stages over a period of years. It was actually constructed between mid-1981 and 1985.

[11] The main stages of construction were:

(a) Embankment Stage I - This contract's main purpose was to divert the river from the middle of the valley to the south abutment, prepare the foundation for the low level outlet works, excavate a portion of the foundation for the embankment, construct a portion of the embankment, and excavate a portion of the north abutment.

This work was carried out by Thompson Bros. (Constr.) Ltd. ("Thompson Bros.") between August and December of 1981.

(b) Outlet Works Stage I - This contract's main purpose was to construct the intake structure, conduit, gate chamber and the stilling basin of the low level outlet works.

This work was carried out by Stuart Olson Construction between January and August of 1982.

(c) Embankment Stage II - This contract's main purpose was to complete the foundation excavation for the embankment, complete the excavation of the north abutment, excavate the south abutment, conduct rough excavation of the spillway chute, construct the remainder of the embankment to its final cross section, construct the gate access shaft and supply and place the riprap on the upstream slope of the embankment.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

This work was primarily carried out by the plaintiff between August 1982 and December 1983.

(d) Spillway - This contract's main purpose was to construct the spillway inlet chute, and stilling basin.

This work was carried out by Ellis-Don Construction between May and December of 1983.

(e) Gates and gate house - The main purpose of these contracts were to supply and install the gates in the low level outlet gate chamber and construct the gate house and install the operating controls.

[12] The defendant had determined that there was not enough clay available to build a homogeneous embankment out of clay with the required flattened slopes. The only design option which remained available was a zoned embankment.

[13] The defendant then embarked on the construction of Stage I of the embankment for the dam. This phase of construction called for work in three separate areas which were to have significant impact on the Stage II work; the pervious borrow, the north abutment and the downstream foundation. We pause here to note that the terms "pervious borrow", "gravel" and "coarse alluvium" are synonymous, and have been used interchangeably throughout.

[14] Under the Stage I contract the contractor was to excavate and place 181,000m^3 of gravel, leaving approximately 1,200,000m^3 of gravel to be placed during Stage II. The gravel for Stage I was to come from specified pervious borrow areas. Calculations had determined that these specified areas would yield all of the volume required for the Stage I work. During the Stage I construction successive re-designs were made which reduced the gravel requirements by over 20%. Despite the reduction, the Stage I contractor was unable to recover all of the necessary gravel from the specified pervious borrow areas. The defendant was forced to make an additional pervious borrow area available to the Stage I contractor.

[15] During the course of the Stage I contract, the Stage I contractor excavated more overburden than had been expected and predicted, despite having recovered less gravel. These events had a substantial cost impact to Alberta Environment but had no cost impact on the Stage I contractor. He had been paid for every cubic metre of excavation performed without regard to volumes actually placed. He was then paid a second unit rate for volumes placed. He was, therefore, paid for excavating all the overburden necessary to locate and recover the gravel.

[16] The second area of the Stage I work of import to the Stage II contractor was the north abutment.

[17] Under the terms of the Stage I construction, the contractor was to excavate the north abutment foundation area to the surface of clay till and backfill the area to the level to which the rest of the embankment was constructed. After completion of the North Abutment foundation excavation, the defendant directed the contractor to excavate further into the toe or base of the slope. When the contractor complied with this direction, a slide, covering half of the distance of the upstream side of the north abutment, occurred. The defendant directed that only temporary repairs be made. The slide was stabilized with a berm built at the base and all of the cracks of the slide were filled in. The material for filling in the cracks and building the berm was dozed down the slope from above the slide and contained organics. The work was done under freezing conditions and without compaction. The effect of the repair work performed was to obliterate the slide from view.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[18] The third area of the Stage I work of import to the Stage II contractor was the downstream foundation area.

[19] The Stage I contractor was directed by the defendant to place waste material into the old channels and oxbows and other low lying areas in that area immediately downstream of the embankment as it was then designed. The Stage I contractor complied with this direction and placed waste in that area until December. This waste was saturated. It was not compacted. It spread out beyond the old channels and oxbows. The area was then levelled and landscaped over. It was capped off with dry clay-type material. The effect of the work in this area was two-fold. Firstly, the natural ground conditions in the area were hidden from view. Secondly, the waste that had been buried in the area was also hidden from view.

[20] All three of the foregoing items of work became the subject of design and other changes between Stage I and Stage II. The experiences of the Stage I contractor in all three areas were not conveyed to the Stage II bidders. All three areas have become the subject of this claim brought by the Stage II contractor.

Findings Of Fact

[21] This trial lasted some 14 months. As a result, this judgment will be very long. In order to help the reader I intend, here and now, to set out certain findings of fact. The rest of this portion of the judgment will be in support of those findings. I will then deal with the law and then with quantum.

[22] Concerning the upstream pervious borrow: I will find that the defendant was in possession of a great deal of relevant information that they did not disclose to the bidders. Some of that information could have been had by the bidders by asking for it. However, other important essential information, information that would have helped the bidders prepare their bids, was concealed from the bidders. I will find the defendant to have been deceitful. I will find that the deceit caused the plaintiff to suffer substantial losses. I will also find breach of contract by the defendant.

[23] Concerning the north abutment: I will find that the defendant had information concerning a slide and its manner of repair, which information would have been of great help to the bidders, and that the defendant negligently misrepresented the situation to the bidders thus causing the plaintiff substantial losses. I will also find breach of contract by the defendant.

[24] Concerning the downstream foundation: I will find that the defendant had information concerning certain channel deposits that would have greatly aided the plaintiff in preparing its bid, and that that information was deceitfully withheld from the bidders. I will find that as a result the plaintiff suffered substantial losses. I will also find breach of contract by the defendant.

[25] I will find the defendant to be in breach of express terms of the contract.

[26] However, I will find that the plaintiff's bidding estimates and their execution of the works were done in a negligent manner and that the plaintiff is therefore the author of a substantial portion of its losses.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001685

[27] Concerning quantum: I will find that, although the plaintiff suffered many losses, it did not suffer anything like the amount claimed, and that of the losses suffered, a great many were the plaintiff's own fault.

The Landowner Reports

[28] In May 1981, the defendant requested EBA Consultants (EBA) to update their 1979 Arnold Landowner Report (the Gust property having already been purchased) and to also prepare similar reports in respect of a number of properties further upstream from Gust which would, in part, now fall within the influence of the reservoir as it is envisaged with the dam located at site Maa. The defendant advised EBA that ...

> "the purpose of the report is to provide a dollar value of the granular resources. The report will be used in negotiations for purchase of the land. The owners of the land will be contacted by your representatives and advised of the investigation. They may suggest appropriate places to put pits or boreholes and these should be recognized as legitimate requests in order to satisfy the owners of our best intentions."

[29] As a result of these investigations, both EBA and TCL prepared geotechnical reports estimating gravel reserves in which comment was made on the geology of the area and on prior gravel mining operations. These engineering firms were selected and instructed by the engineers employed by the Design and Construction Branch headed up by J.W. Thiessen, project manager for Alberta Environment. Both consultants had contact with the landowners and obtained details as to prior mining operations, which information was provided to the defendant.

[30] During the course of the investigation leading to the acquisition of these lands, the Land Acquisition Branch of Alberta Environment came into possession of information concerning gravel excavated and sold in the past from these lands both to the County of Lac Ste. Anne and to Alberta Transportation. This information was made known to others in Alberta Environment. All of the geotechnical reports commissioned for the purposes of the land acquisition proceedings were available and the contents known to the Design and Construction Branch and its engineers.

[31] The first consultant to report to Alberta Environment on the issue of the geology of the PRV was EBA in 1979. Between 1979 and 1981, the defendant received numerous reports from EBA, TCL and Dr. Mollard, an expert in photographic interpretation, which provided a geological history of the valley. Invariably, these consultants reported that based on geologic history, the gravel deposit in the valley was segmented or often absent in some areas as a result of the actions of the Paddle River. The reports also provided details of the prior mining, referred to above.

[32] Subsurface investigations, by their nature, consist of making reasoned and supportable inferences of the conditions which will be encountered based on relatively few direct observations of those conditions. The direct observations are taken from test pits and boreholes. It is the geology and the geologic history of an area which allows, or possibly disallows, the observations from test pits to be extended to those unseen areas between the test pits. If the geologic history of an area is consistent with a uniform or continuous deposit, then it can be reasonably inferred that the strata of material in test pits extends between the test pits. If the geologic history of an area indicates the deposit to be of an erratic, pocketed and segmented nature, then, unless the test pitting is performed at a spacing commensurate with the scale of variation in the deposit, the information in those test pits cannot be relied upon as being representative of the subsurface conditions which exist between the pits. The geology of an area will serve to determine the parameters required for a representative program of test pit exploration. The geology will also provide the framework for an appropriate understanding of the information obtained from a test pitting program.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[33] Alberta Environment's own investigations began in the mid-1970's. Until January of 1981, all of the design work was performed internally by Alberta Environment. Alberta Environment also carried out all of the investigations, either directly itself or by utilizing the services of consultants hired to carry out specific tasks. Following the announcement of the dam construction, Alberta Environment created an Implementation Committee. It was through this committee as well as through meetings of smaller groups (such as the Geotechnical group) that the information gained through the investigation process was disseminated throughout Alberta Environment.

[34] Alberta Environment first received detailed information regarding the gravel deposits from Alberta Transportation and the County of Lac Ste. Anne in 1977. From this time on, it was known to Alberta Environment, generally, and in time by each of Thiessen, Ruttan, Nicolson and Campbell, all of Alberta Environment, that the gravel deposits in the PRV had been mined extensively, dating back to at least 1958. Alberta Transportation and the County of Lac Ste. Anne had mined gravel, in substantial quantities, at different times and from different locations throughout that part of the PRV which was to become the Stage II upstream pervious borrow area. Both the County of Lac Ste. Anne and Alberta Transportation information and records which came into the possession of Alberta Environment described the nature of the gravel deposit they encountered, in nearly identical terms, as patchy, occurring in pockets, poor in quality and having much overburden.

[35] R. Brittain, an employee of the Geotechnical Branch of Alberta Environment, prepared a memorandum in which he recorded that Alberta Transportation and the County of Lac Ste. Anne had removed a volume in excess of approximately 200,000m^3 from the Gust and Smith properties, both in the valley. Brittain described the nature of the gravel deposit left behind on the Smith property after the prior mining activities as "gopher-holed" and in "small isolated pockets". A copy of this memorandum was provided to Campbell.

[36] EBA, a consultant retained by Alberta Environment to perform granular evaluations, and TCL, initially hired for a similar purpose (TCL was initially retained in November of 1980 to prepare a granular evaluation for the Smith property and TCL was subsequently retained in January of 1981 to design the embankment), both prepared numerous reports which identified the areas of the valley from which gravel had been previously extracted. Alberta Environment itself prepared a drawing which clearly and explicitly showed some of the areas of the Stage II pervious borrow which had been mined for gravel previously.

[37] TCL recognized and reported that the prior mining activities would have a significant and detrimental effect on the volumes of available gravel which had been calculated based upon test pits. TCL recommended that detailed investigations be carried out with respect to the effect that the prior mining had had on the volumes of gravel apparently available in the PRV and to improve the accuracy of those calculations.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[38] Neither the reports of EBA and TCL nor Alberta Environment's own drawing showing the prior mining, nor the information from the County of Lac Ste. Anne and Alberta Transportation, nor any of the other internal documents created by Alberta Environment concerning prior mining were provided to Stage II bidders. Bidders were not advised, in the contract documents, of the existence of these documents.

[39] A total of 12 reports were prepared by EBA and TCL. These reports, prepared between March of 1979 and September of 1981, were provided to Alberta Environment for use in their negotiations with the former landowners in the area of the PRV that was to become the reservoir of the dam. These reports also fully covered the area that was subsequently designated in the Stage II contract documents as the upstream pervious borrow area.

[40] The consultants were requested by Alberta Environment to determine the volumes of gravel which existed on the properties and to assign a market value to that gravel. Both consultants approached their commission in essentially the same fashion. Based on various investigations, including field trips, test pitting and air photo evaluations, both consultants provided, as an overview, a geological description of all the materials in the river valley. The gravel identified was categorized as marketable or not marketable. Estimates of the value of the marketable gravels were provided. It is the overview geological descriptions provided in these reports which are of the most interest to this case. EBA described the gravel as being "buried channel deposits". EBA further reported that the erosive action of the river had "often segmented" that deposit. TCL describes, in the landowner reports they prepared, that the erosive effects of the river made the gravel "often absent in some areas".

[41] The descriptions of the gravel deposit contained in the landowner reports was corroborated by a report prepared at the request of Alberta Environment by Dr. Jack Mollard and provided to Alberta Environment in December 1979. Dr. Mollard was hired as an expert in air photo interpretation. Dr. Mollard, in a letter to Alberta Environment, which predated his report, expressed amazement at the complexity of the geology in the site area. Dr. Mollard also commented that the borrow situation appeared to be tough. He later stated in his report that the material in the PRV was complexly layered and variable in composition. Dr. Mollard described the valley as having "patches of thin gravel". He reported expecting small quantities only which would be available from "seemingly small and scattered patches" but that this should be checked. Dr. Mollard reported there was a scarcity of good-looking granular prospects in the PRV. As a consequence of that observation Dr. Mollard went to the effort and expense of obtaining information additional to that supplied to him by Alberta Environment to extend his search for granular material farther afield from the PRV.

[42] Dr. Mollard provided a second report which was received by Alberta Environment in March of 1980. In that report, Dr. Mollard provided a geological history which confirmed a deposit entirely consistent with what EBA had described as a "buried channel deposit". That report was received by, and its contents were known to, Alberta Environment.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[43] Alberta Environment carried out its own internal air photo analysis of the PRV. This analysis was reported in June of 1980 and the report concluded that sources of gravel in the PRV were rare.

[44] The first report prepared by TCL, after it was retained in January of 1981, was a preliminary appraisal of the geology of the dam site area. This report was received by Alberta Environment in early March of 1981. The various materials which made up the alluvium, including the gravel, were described by this report as being "distributed in an erratic pattern as a consequence of the complex shifting of the Paddle River channel".

[45] The Stage I Embankment contract was completed in December of 1981. The final quantity measurements for that contract were completed by Alberta Environment by March of 1982. The Stage II tender documents were published in late May of 1982. Initially the Stage I contract called for the placement of 181,000m^3 of pervious borrow material from the PRV by the Stage I contractor. The Stage I contract incorporated a two-item payment structure for the pervious borrow work. One payment unit measured and paid for all excavation from the pervious borrow area regardless whether the excavated material was overburden or gravel. A second payment unit measured and paid for the volume of gravel that was actually recovered and placed in the embankment. As such, the contractor was reimbursed for all of the overburden which he excavated, regardless of the volume of gravel (if any) that existed below that overburden. The risk of the nature of the distribution of the gravel in the pervious borrow area was therefore retained by the owner.

[46] The Stage I contract afforded Alberta Environment the opportunity to physically observe on a large scale the actual nature of the gravel deposit and to satisfy themselves of the conditions that would be encountered subsequently during the Stage II contract. TCL had recommended in its report dated August 20, 1981 that Alberta Environment take advantage of this opportunity and use the Stage I contract as a large scale model for the Stage II work. Alberta Environment was aware of this recommendation by TCL.

[47] Alberta Environment did not disclose to the bidders for the Stage II contract its knowledge of the conditions which would be encountered in the pervious borrow areas.

[48] There was nothing in the Stage II tender package which disclosed the extent or location of prior mining which had taken place. There was nothing in the Stage II tender documents which disclosed the nature of the gravel deposit which had been encountered by either Alberta Transportation or the County of Lac Ste. Anne during those prior mining activities. There was nothing in the Stage II tender package which disclosed the effects of those prior mining activities on the gravel deposit which remained behind.

[49] Some of these reports are listed on a single sheet of paper which Ruttan testified he had prepared prior to Alberta Environment publishing the Stage II tender package. Alberta Environment had not included this single page list anywhere in the four volumes and hundreds of pages of tender information that was provided. This single page list was not attached to a multi-page information document prepared by Ruttan which was handed out to contractors who attended the site visit. This single page list was not incorporated into an addendum which was issued to bidders by Alberta Environment during the tender period. This single page list was never given to Opron and came to light only during this litigation.

[50] Alberta Environment did, however, change the payment terms for the pervious items for the Stage II contract such that there was only a single payment unit in the Stage II contract based upon the volume of gravel actually placed in the dam. The effect of this change was to force the Stage II bidders to include, within their submitted prices, all costs associated with the anticipated volume of overburden. This change, which Alberta Environment instructed TCL to make, shifted the risk and the cost of an increase in the overburden to gravel ratio, as had occurred during the Stage I contract, away from Alberta Environment and squarely onto the shoulders of the contractor.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001689

Evolution And Chronology Of The Dam Design

[51] In January of 1981, Geo-Physi-Con was commissioned to perform a resistivity survey. This was the same method of subsurface exploration that had been attempted unsuccessfully by EBA in 1979. Geo-Physi-Con's report was received by Alberta Environment at the end of February 1981. Alberta Environment knew that the resistivity survey carried out by Geo-Physi-Con was of little or no value in the evaluation of the granular deposits that was under way at the time. Alberta Environment knew that the resistivity survey could not distinguish between overburden and granular materials. As a result, the survey did not provide any information of use in determining whether the gravel was continuous or not. Ken Tedder of the Geotechnical Branch prepared a memorandum which was extremely critical of the Geo-Physi-Con report and called into question the reliability and usefulness of the results. Alberta Environment, however, then provided, without caution or caveat, a copy of the Geo-Physi-Con report to TCL for their use in evaluating the gravel deposit in the contract documents.

[52] TCL prepared a borrow pit investigation report in March of 1981. In this exhibit, TCL reported sand and gravel volumes present in the PRV. Those sand and gravel volumes were stated to be calculated based on an assumption of continuity of the sand and gravel in the valley. The calculation of volumes could not be reliably or accurately performed without continuity. TCL relied on the Geo-Physi-Con report to confirm their assumption of continuity:

> "The results of the resistivity survey by Geo-Physi-Con Ltd. indicated that over the area of their investigation, the granular alluvium is nearly continuous over the entire valley. This is contrary to the theory that the coarse alluvium is restricted to old channel deposits, and confirms the assumption of continuity used in making estimates of quantities."

[53] Alberta Environment knew that the Geo-Physi-Con report could not be used to support an assumption of continuity. None of the investigations carried out prior to March of 1981 by Alberta Environment, EBA, Dr. Mollard or, indeed by TCL themselves, supported continuity. In fact, all of the reports and information in the possession of Alberta Environment to that time demonstrated that the gravel deposit was actually segmented, pocketed and discontinuous rather than continuous. TCL made a serious technical error in relying upon Geo-Physi-Con to confirm an assumption of continuity. Alberta Environment knew of but did nothing to correct that error.

[54] TCL prepared a second, and the final borrow material investigation report which was provided to Alberta Environment in August of 1981. This report also relied upon the Geo-Physi-Con report to confirm the assumption of continuity which was made in order to perform the volume calculations performed.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[55] Yet, the Thurber (TCL) Report which was included in the contract documents (tender package) read: "The gravel has an expected common thickness of approximately 1.0 to 3.0 metres." I will return to this.

Embankment - Stage I Contract

[56] The Stage I Embankment contract, performed by Thompson Bros. between August and December of 1981, had, as its main purpose, diversion of the river from its original course to the south side of the valley and preparation and construction of the foundations of the dam. Opron's contract in Stage II was to complete the construction of the embankment.

[57] The dam, itself, was flanked by abutments on each end known as the north abutment and the south abutment. The abutments were to be constructed by excavating into the valley walls on both ends of the dam and removing the overlying soil until competent material upon which to found the dam was exposed. The amount of excavation required was dictated by the lines and grades shown on the contract drawings as well as the characteristics of the material itself.

[58] On the south side, Thompson Bros. had constructed a diversion channel for the Paddle River. This was a temporary diversion required to be removed and backfilled by the Stage II contractor after the permanent conduit was made operable. The south valley wall was virtually untouched by the Thompson Bros.

[59] Across the valley floor stretching from the temporary river diversion on the south side of the valley to a point close to the north side valley wall, Thompson Bros. had excavated the foundation of the embankment. Thompson Bros. had placed both pervious and impervious fill materials which formed the base of the permanent embankment.

[60] During the late fall of 1981, Thompson Bros. excavated the toe of the north abutment slope having completed excavation of the foundation to the level of clay till. During the final excavation a slide occurred extending over approximately 70 metres, which was one half of the distance of the north abutment upstream of the centerline of the dam. Slide material slid out along the base of the excavation. The escarpment of the slide was nearly as deep as the height of an average man.

[61] Temporary repairs were performed in December of 1981 which consisted of construction of a berm at the toe of the slope to prevent further sliding by pushing down material from above to fill in the existing foundation excavation and to dress and cover over the area of the slide. Owing to the temporary nature of the work and the time of year, the only compaction applied was track packing by the dozing equipment. There was no inspection or testing of this material and no requirement that it meet the normal specifications for fill placement.

[62] In the course of Stage I, the designated pervious borrow area was exhausted, despite the fact that Alberta Environment had reduced the required volumes from 181,000m^3 to approximately 142,000m^3, a reduction of approximately 20%. An additional pervious borrow area was provided to allow the Stage I contractor to recover even the reduced volume required. In addition to the gravel not being recovered in the volumes that had been expected, there was a substantial increase in the volume of overburden excavated.

[63] As a part of the Stage I contract, Thompson Bros. was directed by Alberta

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

Environment to fill in the old river channels and oxbows in area downstream of the dam. These areas were filled as directed with waste material and then landscaped over with a layer of clay-type material.

Creation Of The As Built Or As Constructed Drawings Of Stage I

[64] After the completion of the Stage I contract, one of Ruttan's responsibilities as the Resident Engineer was to create the record or As Constructed drawings for Stage I. Such drawings are often referred to as the As Built drawings. Exhibit 615I was one of those drawings. That drawing, which was "Certified as Constructed" by Ruttan on February 23, 1982, showed darkly shaded old river channels and oxbows in the area immediately downstream of the embankment constructed by Thompson Bros. in what became the downstream foundation excavation area under the Stage II contract. In addition to the dark shading, there were text and arrows indicating that the old channels had been "filled to ground level with waste material". This drawing, together with the other As Built drawings that were created, were sent by Alberta Environment to TCL for their use in preparing drawings for subsequent contracts.

[65] TCL prepared the Stage II contract documents, including drawings, in draft form and sent them to Alberta Environment for review and comment. Included in the draft Stage II drawings sent by TCL to Alberta Environment on March 26, 1982 only one month after Ruttan had certified Exhibit 615I as being accurate, were two As Built drawings. One of these was Drawing 3 of 28. This showed the same area depicted in the "Certified As Constructed" drawing, Exhibit 615I.

[66] Ruttan, having been the resident engineer on Stage I, was in a unique position to carefully and thoroughly review the As Built drawings that were to be published by Alberta Environment as part of the Stage II tender documents. Ruttan acknowledged that TCL sent the draft drawings to Alberta Environment for review. He testified that he did a review of Drawing 3 of 28, but that it was just a "general review". He admitted that there was no notation on that drawing that the channels had been filled to ground level with waste and no shading of the channels. He testified that he did not discover the omission until Opron was working on Stage II. As will be seen later, he did nothing even then to inform Opron of this fact. His evidence disclaiming prior knowledge of this deletion of the critical notation regarding waste must be considered in this context.

[67] The evidence establishes that an As Built drawing is to be, and was understood by Opron to be, a complete and accurate record of all previous construction activities. Such a drawing is to include all features of note. Further, the absence of a feature from an As Built means that such a feature does not exist.

[68] Ruttan confirmed that As Built drawings are created to include features of note and features that are considered to be material and relevant. He agreed that the notation about waste could and should have been on the As Built, Drawing 3 of 28, contained in the Stage II tender documents.

[69] Thiessen also confirmed that the relevant information from the Stage I certified As Constructed drawings should have been included in the Stage II tender drawings.

[70] Dr. Matheson, called as an expert by Alberta Environment, testified that a review of contract drawings by the design agency or owner should take place prior to tender for the purpose of insuring that the As Built drawings accurately represent the condition of the work as it exists. He agreed that it would have been appropriate to include in the Stage II tender documents any certified As Constructed drawings from Stage I.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[71] Nicolson, the officer of the defendant, acknowledged at discovery that it would have been material for the Stage II contractor to know that waste material had been placed in the old channels. He testified that the only way contractors would have known that the channels had been filled with waste would be either if Alberta Environment was good enough to tell them or if they went out and dug it up. The evidence confirms, as admitted by Nicolson, that Alberta Environment did not tell the contract bidders and only after the contract was awarded did Opron dig it up.

[72] The plaintiff's ordinary witnesses testified that they were not aware that waste had been buried in the downstream foundation excavation area by the Stage I contractor. Schindell, Mulyk, Hutton and Cameron all testified that their approach to the job would have changed had the true conditions been disclosed in the As Built drawing.

[73] Cameron testified that indeed, in order to determine the expected conditions to be encountered in the foundation areas of the dam, and to gain an appreciation of the subsurface conditions, he looked at the logs for the test pits and boreholes in that area. He understood that the test pits in the area would describe the material in that area and would be representative of the material in that area. In order to form his conclusions as to what material existed in the area of the downstream foundation, Cameron relied on what was shown in the logs in the area, and he viewed what was on the surface when he went on the site visit. He expected that Alberta Environment would have told them if there was something markedly different between what was in the test pit and borehole logs in the tender documents and what was actually in the downstream foundation area.

[74] Ruttan admitted that he knew, as of the date of the site visit for the Stage II contract, that there had been waste buried in the downstream foundation during Stage I. He also admitted that he knew, as of that same date, that the test hole logs actually within the area of the downstream foundation that the Stage II contractor would have to excavate, did not disclose the existence of the buried waste. Indeed, the logs that were provided to the Stage II contractors could not have disclosed the waste, as they were all dug before Thompson Bros. buried the waste. Ruttan further admitted that he did not tell the contractors at the site visit that the logs could not necessarily be taken as being indicative of the nature of all of the material that was in that area.

[75] A further omission from the drawings included in the Stage II tender documents was the failure to disclose on Drawing 7 of 28 the repair work performed as a result of the slide in the north abutment in the late fall of 1981.

The Design Changes Between Stage I And Stage II

[76] Opron was not told that the work upstream and downstream of the existing Stage I embankment was as the result of a design change between Stage I and Stage II. These design changes were the result of movements in the dam foundation. Since it had not been contemplated that these areas would be used as foundations for the dam, the areas were not treated as such. Opron, having been given no notice of the design change, had no reason to suspect the area had not been treated as a foundation zone or that waste was buried there. It would seem unlikely that a contractor would suspect that an owner would bury waste under one contract only to be re-excavated under the next. That was a further reason the absence of the notation of buried waste on the As Built drawing and of any reference to a design change was so critical.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001693

The Contract Documents

Representations With Respect To Pervious Borrow

[77] Section of the Contract

"1.13 Soil Conditions and Data

"The Engineer has obtained certain information regarding the soil conditions in the area covered by the Contract. The approximate locations of all boreholes and test pits within the area of the dam site are shown on the drawings and the logs of these holes are given in Schedule F.

"The soil information for the pervious borrow area is shown on the drawings so that the Contractor can evaluate his operation for Borrow Excavation. Geotechnical cross sections of the impervious borrow area, and the south abutment area are shown on the drawings. No interpretations of these cross sections have been provided and the Contractor is responsible for any interpretation which he, or others employed by him make from this information.

"Included in Schedule E is a report entitled 'Geotechnical Information for Contract Bidders'. Other technical reports, photographs, and information may be viewed by Tenderers, by arranging a meeting with Alberta Environment.

"The accuracy of this information is not guaranteed and in no circumstances whatever shall the Engineer be held responsible or liable to the Contractor for any consequences resulting from the strata, ground water and/or conditions as actually encountered being different from those implied in this information. Additional payments on such grounds will not be made in any circumstances."

[78] The first paragraph of section 1.13 of the General and Detailed Specifications of the contract documents is an express representation and warranty that the locations of all of the boreholes and test pits in the area of the dam site were to be shown on the contract drawings. Further, logs for all of those boreholes and test pits were to be included in Schedule F, being volumes 3 and 4 of the contract documents, "Soils Data".

[79] Alberta Environment did not show on the contract documents, nor provide logs for, the following borehole or test pit logs that were within the area of the dam site. These logs would have provided information that would have been relevant to contractors with respect to the distribution of the pervious borrow: M22, M476; M477; M478; M479, M480; M597; PR-BA5-3; M256.

[80] Dr. Matheson agreed that the model presented, fairly represented the materials shown in each of the six borehole logs contained in Exhibit 843. He identified that the cluster of six borehole logs was located approximately on the centerline of the dam, just south of the eventual location of the conduit. He agreed that the borehole logs were within approximately a 7 metre by 7 metre square, approximately as represented by the model. He agreed that in the area of the six boreholes, the gravel ranged in thickness from over three metres in one place to no gravel at all in another place, with other holes showing depths between those two extremes. He confirmed what was visible to the eye, namely, that there did not appear to be any pattern to the distribution of the gravel in the area illustrated by the model. He agreed that over the area shown by the model, the gravel was extremely variable, and certainly not continuous. If only borehole M22 had been put in, there would be a finding of no gravel, and if only borehole M477 had been drilled, there would have been a finding of over three metres of gravel.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[81] In response to questions by the court, Dr. Matheson testified that in the triangular area formed by boreholes M476, M477 and M479, he, as an expert, would say that there was a probability that there would be gravel between. When questioned as to how far away from that triangle he would move before he changed his mind as to the probability of finding gravel, Dr. Matheson testified 10 to 15 metres would not be unreasonable. I take it that beyond that distance, he was not prepared to predict a "probability" of gravel.

[82] Confirmation of that came from Dr. Matheson when he said that he would not say, between any two test pits that were 50 metres apart, that the gravel would be continuous if gravel was shown in each. His evidence was clearly that the strip logs that are 50 metres apart in the contract documents would not show if the gravel was continuous between them. The gravel between two test pits is not necessarily continuous and in fact could be absent. If it is absent, the absence could be caused either by the actions of the river or by the actions of man. It naturally follows that if it cannot be said that the gravel between any two striplogs is continuous, then the strip logs cannot be said to accurately indicate the distribution of the gravel.

[83] Dr. Matheson further testified that even in his "heartland" (which is the area near the dam with gravel), which he referred to as an anomaly because all of the test pits in the area, covering the entire valley floor between stations 71+000 and 71+600, showed some gravel, Dr. Matheson would not say that the gravel in that area was in a continuous deposit. He then modified his evidence to say that statistically, the test pits "indicated" in that area that there was a very low probability of finding significant areas between the test pits where there is no gravel.

[84] This evidence from Dr. Matheson of what the "indication" was of the nature the gravel deposit in the "heartland" must be contrasted with the evidence of what the actual distribution of the gravel was. In 1982, Maio Construction started to work in what they called "Area 1". As shown on Exhibit 702, Area 1 is located squarely within Dr. Matheson's heartland. Maio, his superintendent Adams, his foreman Grespan and his backhoe operator Perconi, all testified with respect to the gravel deposits actually found in the field. To a man they testified that there were large areas where there was no gravel, and that this nature of deposit was encountered as soon as they started to work in Area 1. (I Accept That Evidence Of Maio, Adams, Grespan And Perconi)

[85] The plaintiff also operated in the "heartland" in 1983, and did not find any areas where the gravel did not start and stop abruptly. Finally, I note that there was test pitting done by J.A. Cameron, site engineer and project manager for the plaintiff, between areas stripped in 1983, some of which was in the "heartland". One such test pit, shown to Dr. Matheson and not plotted on the defendant's summary of test holes, showed no gravel.

[86] In summary, I find, as confirmed by all of the evidence of witnesses who worked in the field, that in the "heartland", the gravel was segmented, pocketed and erratic throughout.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[87] Clearly, logs for boreholes in such close proximity to each other, as the missing test holes were, showing a noncontinuous distribution of gravel over distance of a few metres, would have been relevant to contractors estimating the Stage II contract. Contrary to the express representation that all boreholes had been shown, and all logs produced, these logs do not appear anywhere in the Stage II contract documents.

[88] Exhibit 844 is a compilation of the borehole and test pit logs for three more holes in the area of the dam site that were not included in the Stage II contract documents. The three holes are approximately 13 metres apart. The most northerly shows approximately 1 metre of gravel, the middle one no gravel, and the most southerly one, approximately 1.3 metres of gravel. That distribution most likely, according to Dr. Matheson, would have been the result of erosion, or the activities of man. He agreed that the problem is in predicting where the river has had its effect. Again, I find that these holes which were not shown or provided in the Stage II contract documents would have been of significance to contractors bidding on the Stage II contract.

[89] The second paragraph of this section of the contract is a clear direction to contractors that the soil information for the pervious borrow area that is shown on the drawings is provided specifically to each contractor so that he could evaluate his operations for the excavation of pervious borrow. This must, by a plain meaning of the section, be understood to mean that the drawings provided for the pervious borrow area, P1 to P19, can be used, and further, can be relied upon as being accurate in conducting an evaluation for borrow excavation.

[90] Evidence was led by both the plaintiff and the defendant about the use that could be made of the strip logs that were provided for the pervious borrow. It was Cameron's evidence, which was not challenged, that in order to be of use in the evaluation of borrow operations, the soil information in the strip logs on the drawings must be representative of the material between them. Only by calculating volumes of material, and being able to determine where in the valley that material could be found, would a contractor be able to "evaluate his operation", as set out in this section.

[91] Ruttan agreed that the contract documents had been published with the intention that they be relied upon. He also testified that the results of the test pitting that had been done by Alberta Environment prior to the tendering of this contract were set out on the drawings intentionally in a manner that was convenient for the contractors use in preparing estimates and so that the contractors could use conventional means of estimating quantities such as an average end area method.

[92] Thiessen, the project manager, confirmed that contractors were entitled to rely on the information in the tender documents to prepare their bids, and indeed, he expected that they would rely on the information.

[93] Alberta Environment's witness on geotechnical matters, Dr. Matheson, agreed that contractors read and are entitled to rely on the accuracy of contract documents. Dr. Matheson, during the course of cross-examination on the model and the test pit logs that were not provided to the Stage II contractors, acknowledged that the owner, or his consultant, must conduct the investigations and prepare the data for contractors. The contractors, in what Dr. Matheson described as a reasonably short time, must make an assessment of the data provided to them to determine volumes, procedures of operation, and equipment.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[94] Every witness that was involved in bidding for this project in 1982 gave evidence that their bid involved evaluation of the gravel operation and the estimating of the cost for the same based on the tender documents, and in particular, on the cross sections indicating the distribution of gravel in the pervious borrow area as shown on the drawings. Maio relied upon the strip logs in order to plan his areas of operation, as shown in Exhibit 702.

[95] Expert witnesses called by the plaintiff confirmed that the way in which a contractor would evaluate his borrow operation would be by making calculations from the strip logs, and planning his operations based on the strip logs contained in the contract.

[96] Similarly, Johnston, the defendant's estimating expert, acknowledged that in 1982, the contractor that he had assisted in preparing a bid on this project had performed calculations based on the strip logs to determine quantities of overburden and gravel and to determine where in the valley the gravel would be found. Johnston was of the understanding that the contract documents could have been used in the field to specifically choose the areas of operations for pervious borrow.

[97] I find as a fact that the plaintiffs were misled by section 1.13.

[98] Section of the Contract

"6.3.3. Pervious Borrow Excavation

"Pervious borrow excavation shall involve all stripping and excavation to the depth necessary to remove all the required gravel material from the pervious borrow area. The boundaries of the pervious borrow area are shown on the drawings and the distribution of pervious borrow in the pervious borrow area is indicated by the strip logs shown on the drawings. The contractor shall be responsible for any interpretations, deductions and conclusions which he, or others employed by him, make from this information. (underlining mine)

"No pervious borrow excavation shall be made outside the limits shown on the drawings and as described in subsection 6.5.2."

[99] Section 6.3.3 of the General and Detailed Specifications in the contract documents was published by Alberta Environment to contractors, including the plaintiff. Section 6.3.3, on a plain reading, told the contractors that the strip logs for the pervious borrow indicated the material that would be found between them. This was an express representation and warranty, and it was not true.

[100] On cross-examination Dr. E.C. McRoberts, geophysicist and expert witness for the plaintiff, testified that his reading of section 6.3.3 was that a contractor would understand that the material in the test pits represented the material that was between them, and in his opinion, such an understanding was reasonable based on a reading of section 6.3.3. He was also asked on cross-examination whether he knew what the plaintiff's employees had taken from section 6.3.3. His evidence was that he understood that they had taken section 6.3.3 as indicating that the test pits represented the material between them. He also testified that the understanding held by Opron was what he understood when he read the section.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001697

[101] Section 6.3.3, as further strengthened by the Thurber Report, and section 4.2 in particular, tells the contractor that the gravel is continuous.

[102] Dr. McRoberts further stated that to suggest that the words in section 6.3.3 "the distribution of the pervious borrow in the pervious borrow area is indicated by the strip logs" meant that the vertical distribution of the material in each strip log was indicated by that strip log, as did the defendant's counsel, and said nothing about the material between, could not be what was meant. It would be tautological, or irrelevant, to tell a contractor that the vertical distribution of material in a strip log was shown by the strip log, because that is self-evident. Further, as soon as each test pit was excavated, and then back filled, any vertical distribution that may have existed had ceased to exist at that location. I find that the distribution had to mean, and indeed, could really only mean, the distribution between the test pits.

[103] Section 6.3.3 is a geological interpretation, provided to the bidders, that the gravel was continuous. The drawing of lines between the tops and bottoms of the gravel shown in adjacent strip logs shows the distribution of pervious borrow in the pervious borrow area, as stated by section 6.3.3. This distribution, as indicated, was not in fact correct in Dr. McRoberts' opinion, but it is what the contract said the distribution was. That continuity assumption, as shown by the drawing of the lines between adjacent strip logs, as illustrated for example on Exhibit 615K, Ma's cross sections, is what the contract told contractors was accurate and was the actual distribution of gravel.

[104] Members of Opron's bid team also gave evidence that they had read section 6.3.3 of the contract documents. Simmonds, chief estimator for the plaintiff, testified that he understood from that section that the pervious borrow that was necessary to build the dam would be found in the pervious borrow area, and that its distribution would be indicated by the strip logs. He understood that the gravel would be in continuous seams, and that they could determine quantities of material by drawing cross sections using the strip logs, and then using an average end area method of calculation.

[105] LePage, an engineer in the employ of the plaintiff, who actually performed the gravel quantity calculations during the tender period, testified that he understood from section 6.3.3 that the gravel was continuous. He did not consider that he needed to make any interpretations from the information provided in the tender documents. All that he was required to do was to take the information provided and perform a quantitative exercise, by calculations using the average end area method. When he had completed drawing his cross sections, he considered that the lines he had drawn accurately reflected the distribution of the gravel in the pervious borrow area. When he had completed his calculations, he considered that he had made an accurate quantification of the gravel based on the tender information.

[106] Cameron, on his reading of section 6.3.3, understood that the strip logs were representative of the gravel that was in the valley. If there were adjacent test pits showing 2 metres of gravel, you would find 2 metres of gravel between them. Because the strip logs indicated the distribution of gravel in the valley, they could be used to estimate and plan the work. You could also use them to calculate volumes of gravel, and corresponding volumes of overburden, which was vital given the pay structure for gravel on this job.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[107] It was Cameron's evidence that if the test pits were not representative of distribution of the material in between them, they could not have been used to calculate volumes. The volume calculation method relies on the fact that the test pits are representative, and can be used to predict not only quantity but distribution of gravel. The fundamental interpretation, that the test pits were representative of the distribution of the gravel in the valley, was made by Alberta Environment and provided to bidders in the contract. After the fundamental interpretation had been made for the contractors, it boiled down to a mathematical calculation.

[108] On cross-examination, Cameron said that he read the contract and he understood the plain meaning of what was written in it, including the fundamental interpretation, that the test pits represented the pervious borrow distribution. Alberta Environment, through the contract documents, told the contractors what the strip logs were for, told the contractors that the strip logs represented the nature and the distribution of the gravel, and told the contractors that they were to use the strip logs to assess the nature and distribution of the gravel and to evaluate their operations. All Opron did was rely on the information represented in the contract, and use it to calculate volumes for the bid.

[109] P. Hutton, general manager of the plaintiff's western division, also read section 6.3.3 of the contract documents. He understood from that section that the strip logs could be used to determine the ratio of overburden to gravel, using an average end area method, and to determine price, because the distribution of the material was indicated by those strip logs.

[110] Hutton understood that the illustration in the contract documents, including section 6.3.3, was that the gravel was continuous between strip logs. That continuity was carried forward into Opron's calculations and pricing. Without that illustration of continuity, Opron could not have done average end area calculations.

[111] Similarly, it was Hutton's evidence that without the illustration of continuity, which was a major factor in Opron's selection of its method of operation and its equipment, it would have been very difficult to price the job, if not impossible, without conducting extensive field investigations. The evidence at trial is that it would not have been possible to duplicate the defendant's investigations of the pervious borrow area in the short tender period.

[112] In addition to reading the contract documents, including section 6.3.3, Hutton looked at the strip logs. He knew from the contract that the strip logs were included to illustrate to the contractors the distribution of the gravel. The contract provided the continuity assumption and represented that the test pits indicated the distribution of the pervious borrow in the pervious borrow area. Hutton assigned the task of equating the illustration with the physical numbers, by performing calculations, to an engineer who worked for Opron. The gravel deposit was described, and backed up by technical information. If one chose not to accept the interpretations provided by Alberta Environment, Hutton understood that you would be on your own.

[113] In preparation of his work to arrive at a quote for a subcontract of the pervious work, Maio read the contract documents and reviewed the drawings. He understood that section 6.3.3, in conjunction with the Thurber Report, and the drawings said that there was a gravel layer in the valley that was represented by the logs. The logs were contained in the contract documents to show the distribution of the gravel, and there would be a continuity of gravel between the logs. Based on the continuity of gravel between test pits, the test pits could be used to perform volume calculations. If there had not been continuity between the logs, it would not have been possible to calculate either the gravel or the overburden. Each strip log is the information at the test hole location itself. The distribution being indicated by the strip logs, as stated in section 6.3.3, meant that Maio could take that information from the strip logs, and spread it over the area that was being examined.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[114] Maio did not consider that he was required to make any interpretations with respect to the distribution of gravel. The interpretation of continuity had already been made, and was given in the contract. The only interpretations, conclusions or deductions that Maio had to make were limited to the selection of the type of material they would include in their calculations.

[115] There was no caution in the contract documents to the effect that the strip logs were not necessarily representative of the material that was between them. In fact, the contract documents contained representations to the contrary. It was because of the representations contained in the contract that Maio performed his computations in the way that he did.

[116] Mulyk, who prepared an estimate for another bidder for the PRD Embankment Stage II contract, read section 6.3.3. It showed him the area that he would be mining, the depths of the gravel and overburden, how long his haul would be, where he would start his operations, and what method of operation he would use. From section 6.3.3, he understood that any two adjacent test pits would indicate the distribution of material between them. He could look at the strip logs, and see the depth of the deposit through the valley floor, how wide the deposit was, how far up and down the valley he would have to go, and the amount of overburden associated with the identified gravel.

[117] If what was represented by the adjacent strip logs was not what was anticipated by Alberta Environment to be present between the adjacent strip logs, then in Mulyk's experience, Alberta Environment would have dug another hole, and included the log of the hole in the contract documents.

[118] Mulyk gave evidence that he agreed with Maio's understanding of the gravel deposit, and his selection of areas 1, 2 and 3, as basically matching what Myluk's understanding and concept of the distribution of the gravel was in 1982 when he bid the job.

[119] Mulyk was also asked to review the cross sections as drawn by LePage. He testified that the lines on that drawing depicted exactly what he expected from the contract documents in terms of the distribution of the gravel between test pits.

[120] Based on the strip logs and the contract documents, Mulyk did not expect that, if he had gotten the job, he would encounter gravel in pockets, or areas where there was no gravel. He expected that in the field, he would find a seam across the valley, on average between 1 and 3 metres deep. That is the understanding on which he based his pricing. He did not expect, and he did not get any indication from the contract documents, that the gravel would be erratic, segmented or pocketed. He did not even have the "slightest inkling" that that was the true nature of the deposit. If the deposit was erratic, segmented or pocketed, he would have expected to be told that in the contract documents. In his experience, with the Department of Transportation, if a deposit is erratic between test pits, you will put another test pit between them. If these contract documents had indicated that the gravel was erratic, segmented or pocketed, his pricing would have been "way up there".

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[121] It was the evidence of Paget, the construction expert called by the plaintiff, that section 6.3.3 was a clear and definitive geological interpretation that the owner provided to the contractors. It was a statement of horizontal distribution. It was a very positive statement that the strip logs would represent that horizontal distribution, not that it "may" or it "could". Section 6.3.3 says that the distribution "is" indicated. A contractor would read that section and apply it, in conjunction with the geotechnical information, and simply do a mathematical calculation to determine quantities. Because the owner had supplied the interpretation of the distribution of the pervious borrow, the contractor did not have to.

[122] It was Paget's conclusion that the nature of the distribution of pervious borrow that was illustrated in the contract documents was a basically continuous deposit, on average between 1 and 3 metres thick. He performed mathematical calculations as a contractor would have, based on the contract documents, and concluded that there was sufficient gravel represented to be present to build the dam and that there was a strip ratio of approximately 1.2 to 1 based on the contract documents.

[123] It was Paget's evidence that the geotechnical engineers should have done enough holes to satisfy them that their interpretation of the distribution of gravel that they gave to the contractors was correct. If they were not satisfied that the strip logs indicated the lateral distribution of the gravel, they should have drilled in-fill holes. It would not have been possible, in Paget's opinion, to do a geotechnical evaluation in the one month that was available in the tender period. It was clear that the owner had been in the valley for years, and had provided a summary report of the geotechnical conditions. If he was going to bid, the contractor had no choice but to accept the defendant's information.

[124] Ruttan agreed that if the purpose of the test pits is to indicate the distribution of the gravel, then it is necessary to have spacings between the test pits that are adequate to enable one to be confident that what is between the test pits is represented by what is in them. In an erratic or highly variable deposit, Ruttan agreed that the spacings may need to be down to as close as 25 feet.

[125] Ruttan testified that during the course of the Stage I contract, he suggested that for Stage II, Alberta Environment should do a better job of delineating the gravel. He made that suggestion so that the contractors, at the time of tender, could determine from the contract documents, the distribution of economical gravel in the valley. The government intended the contract documents to indicate the distribution of gravel so that the contractors could prepare their tenders and determine such things as what their overburden to gravel ratio would be and what their haul distances would be. In order to do those things, Ruttan testified that it would be necessary for the contractors to know the distribution of the gravel and where they would likely find it when they went out to do their work.

[126] Alberta Environment's idea, according to Ruttan, was to indicate the distribution of the pervious borrow in the pervious borrow area for the purposes of the Stage II tender in such a way that tenderers could easily understand it and employ conventional and recognized estimating means to prepare their tenders. As set out in section 6, Alberta Environment intended that the contractors rely on the contract documents.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[127] Ruttan agreed that the Stage II contractors should have been able to rely on the strip logs as indicating the distribution of the gravel for the purposes of estimating the work, including determining volumes, overburden to gravel ratios, haul distances, equipment types, scheduling and sequencing and method of operations, so that he could arrive at his price.

[128] Ruttan testified that to make an average end area calculation, such as Ma, an engineer in the employ of Alberta Environment, did in the spring of 1983, the results of which are shown on Exhibit 340, it is necessary to either assume continuity or it has to be a given. If you are told that the distribution of the gravel between the strip logs is indicated by the strip logs, you can make an average end area calculation. Ruttan also acknowledged that if the distribution of the gravel between strip logs is not as indicated by the strip logs, you would get a different calculation.

[129] Ruttan was aware that a bidder would be expected to bid differently if he could predict the nature of the deposit that he was going to be working in than if he could not.

[130] Dr. Matheson, the expert in geotechnical matters called by the defendant, testified that although it was not standard practice to include geotechnical interpretations to bidders in contract documents, an owner could say in his contract documents that the strip logs indicated the distribution of gravel.

[131] It was Dr. Matheson's evidence that he made his conclusions and arrived at his opinions based on his assumption that the distribution of the gravel was indicated by the strip logs. He also used the assumption for the purpose of making his volume calculations that he testified to.

[132] He then testified that the strip logs in the contract could be used to make a reasonable estimate of the quantity of gravel in the whole valley, but not to determine what kind of equipment he would use, how he would recover the gravel, or how much was even recoverable. There was absolutely no caution of any kind included in the contract documents to suggest that the information was accurate enough to support quantity calculations, but not accurate enough to support the other essential components of a bid. It was not enough in the case of the Stage II embankment contract, with only one payment unit for gravel, to calculate a quantity of gravel. It was critical to the contractor, as confirmed by all witnesses, plaintiff and defendant alike, for the contractor to determine his overburden to gravel ratio. In order to do this, it was necessary to know how much gravel there was in a given area, and how much overburden would have to be removed to get to that gravel. It was essential to determine how far the gravel, once found, had to be hauled. In order to do this it was necessary to know where the gravel would be found. It was crucial that the contractor know how the gravel was deposited, so that an appropriate method of operation and appropriate equipment could be selected. If a contractor could not determine these things from the strip logs, he could not have priced the job. It is not possible, in my view, to reconcile the positions taken by Dr. Matheson that, firstly, you could accurately calculate volumes of gravel within 1 or 2%, but secondly, that you could not use the source of those calculations, namely, the strip logs, for planning your operation.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[133] Dr. Matheson agreed on cross-examination that due to the action of the Paddle River on the gravel in the valley, there has been random erosion. The river had moved all over the valley over the years. The action of the Paddle River could be expected to substantially affect the concentration, uniformity and distribution of the gravel deposit between two test pits. Due to the action of the Paddle River, there could be less gravel or even no gravel between two test pits. This is the case with test pits that are 50, 40 or even 30 metres apart. The river had impacted on the distribution of the gravel in the Paddle River valley, and the impact was as a result of the laying down of the gravel by the river, and the erosion of the gravel after it was laid down.

[134] It was Dr. Matheson's evidence that between any two test pits, there may have been changes in the depth and the extent of the deposit created by the movement of the river that is not indicated by the depth of the gravel shown in the test pits on either side. Dr. Matheson confirmed that the distribution of gravel between any two test pits is not predictable, nor indicated by the test pits, to the extent that the gravel between the test pits has been either eroded by the river or removed by mankind.

[135] Thiessen, the defendant's project manager, was aware that the specifications in the contract documents provided that the distribution of pervious borrow was indicated by the strip logs. He expected that a contractor would make an estimate of the quantities assuming continuity between the test pits as shown in the strip logs. Any technologist could make an estimation of volume, using established principles, if he was given the right information. Thiessen also knew that the Stage II contractor was required to submit a pervious borrow development plan, showing his method and location of work. Thiessen knew that the contractor would have to determine the distribution of gravel from the strip logs in order to prepare that plan and to determine where to start excavation. He also knew that the contractor would use the strip logs to determine and estimate the overburden to gravel ratios.

[136] Thiessen also admitted that in any area where there were two adjacent strip logs, each showing gravel, and the gravel in between those strip logs has been removed, then those strip logs would not indicate the distribution of the gravel between them. In the area of test pits M323, M1182, M1183 and M1189, all on the Smith property, Thiessen agreed that the strip logs indicated that there was gravel between them, in an average depth of 1.4. In fact, in that area, there had been prior mining between those four holes. Thiessen agreed that the distribution of gravel between those four test pits, to the extent that prior mining had removed it, was not indicated by the strip logs. He agreed that the strip logs themselves do not show the prior mining in that area.

[137] Bevis Osterman was called by the defendant to give evidence concerning estimating and construction. He made some quantity calculations in order to give his evidence. He admitted that in order to do so, he had to accept that the strip logs showed where the gravel was, and he assumed that there was gravel between adjacent strip logs showing gravel.

[138] Osterman testified that his quantity calculation was that there was approximately 1,000,000m^3 within the area of the permanent pool, below elevation 695. That figure was accurate provided the distribution of gravel was indicated by the strip logs. If the distribution was not as indicated, Osterman testified that the contractor may end up having to go elsewhere for gravel. He also acknowledged that the contractor may have ended up stripping overburden off of areas where there was no gravel. The degree of difference between what was indicated and what was there would determine how different the contractor's excavation area would have been from what he had planned. Osterman agreed that if you had to move more overburden to get gravel, the costs of the operation would increase, and the duration of the job may be extended.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001703

[139] Russ Gerrish, an expert in the finding of gravel, was called by the defendant. He plotted the contract test pits onto a computer model, and generated from that model various drawings. Those contours illustrate what Gerrish expected was the distribution of the pervious borrow based on the tender documents. Gerrish admitted that the computer program that he used to generate his contours assumed continuity between each two points. If the strip logs did not indicate the distribution of the gravel, the program would not generate accurate results or contours. The Stage II contract documents told him that the strip logs did indicate the distribution of the pervious borrow, and consequently Gerrish testified that he was able to create the contours.

[140] Gerrish understood from looking at the contract documents that he could delineate areas of the most economical gravel from the contract documents. The contract documents told him that there was a generally continuous deposit, and using that information, he interpolated between test pits to determine concentrations of gravel. Those concentrations are part of what is given and represented in the information that is presented in the contract documents. From the contract documents, contractors would determine their concentrations, and plan the operation based on that information. Gerrish expected that contractors bidding on this job would have done an exercise similar to what he did to delineate economical gravel.

[141] In the course of his cross-examination, Gerrish was taken to a number of places where his contour drawing indicated that gravel was present, and where test pitting in 1983 indicated that in fact there was no gravel. Gerrish agreed that in these instances, the distribution of gravel indicated by the contract documents was that there was gravel when in fact there was none.

[142] Gerrish indicated that there was no way to tell from the contract documents where the river had moved through the valley historically. He agreed that where it did move through the valley, it shifted, eroded and changed the distribution of the gravel. The action of the Paddle River could have segmented the gravel, as reported by EBA or could have resulted in the gravel often being absent in some locations.

[143] Because of the action of the Paddle River, it was Gerrish's evidence that in the PRV it was not possible to predict where gravel would be found until it was dug up. Having regard to the action of the Paddle River on the gravel in the valley, the contract was incorrect in stating that the distribution of gravel was indicated by the test pits, and in giving an indication of continuity, because, due to the effect of the river, it was not possible to know where the river had been, where there were empty spaces, or where the pockets of gravel were. These things could not be predicted with certainty in the PRV, and that was because the river had reworked the deposit and made it erratic.

[144] Gerrish, after being referred to the model that was entered as Exhibit 841 in this trial, said that it may be the case that in actual fact, the distribution of gravel between strip logs is not indicated by the strip logs, because there is no continuity between the strip logs, the continuity having been interrupted by the actions of the Paddle River. This was an admission by the defendant's own expert witness that the representation that the distribution was indicated was wrong.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[145] Gerrish agreed that it would be important to a contractor to know if the deposit he was going to work in was continuous or erratic. Such knowledge would affect a contractor's approach to a job, and his method of operation. An estimate of costs would be approached quite differently if the deposit was erratic as opposed to continuous.

[146] Gerrish candidly admitted, when he was asked if he could say if the distribution of the pervious borrow in the pervious borrow area was indicated by the strip logs, that he could not "say exactly where the gravel is and isn't".

[147] I find as a fact that the plaintiffs were misled by section 6.3.3.

Part Of The Contract

Report No. TCL 82-14, "Geotechnical Information for Contract Bidders": The Thurber Report

[148] Having reviewed the Thurber Report, Dr. McRoberts was of the opinion that most, if not all contractors would see the Thurber Report as a comprehensive statement, and would look no further. He noted that the Thurber Report was prepared specifically for the contract bidders, to allow them to become familiar with the site, and not for other experts, nor for the owner.

[149] I find that it is significant that this report was said to have been prepared for contract bidders. This must be contrasted with what various witnesses testified was standard practice, namely that the geotechnical information in contract documents is expressed as being for the owner. I also note that in the Catre decision, in which the Court of Appeal found that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by exclusion clauses, the following clause appeared:

> "The information pertaining to the data as shown has been compiled for the use of the Department of Highways. No responsibility will be assumed by the Department for the correctness or completeness of the data shown and should any such data be found incorrect or incomplete the contractor shall have no claim on that account."

[150] No such disclaimer appears in this case, and in fact, as noted, the Thurber Report was prepared for the use of the contractors, and not for the use of the owner.

[151] Simmonds read the Thurber Report during the tender period. He understood that the purpose of the report was to provide contractors bidding the project with sufficient information so that they could produce a competitive bid to the owner. Upon reading all of the soils information and reviewing the drawings, it was Simmonds' view that the Thurber Report was quite an extensive report that it contained enough information to allow Opron to price the work.

[152] LePage also read the Thurber Report during the tender period. He understood from the introduction that the purpose of the report was to provide information to bidders as to the existing conditions on site. On reading the report, he gained an understanding of the geology and of the pervious borrow in particular. It was his understanding from the report in its entirety that the pervious borrow would be found in a continuous and uniform deposit.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001705

[153] Cameron gave evidence that he had read the Thurber Report during the tender period. The introduction to the report set out its purpose. He understood that, as a summary, the report summarized all of the information that was available, for the use of the bidders. The introduction indicated to Cameron that everything that he needed to know about subsurface conditions for the project was in the report, which appeared to be complete, and in the drawings.

[154] The title of the Thurber Report was of significance to Hutton. It was unusual, in his experience, to see a report prepared for specifically for the bidders, as opposed to having been prepared for the owner. The level of exploration and thoroughness seemed such that Hutton could not see any area in which he should look behind the report, even if he had thought of it. Given the owner, Alberta Environment, he saw no reason, whatsoever, to doubt the accuracy of what was represented to them.

[155] Given his knowledge that there would have been detailed work done before the tender of Stage II, Hutton understood the report to be a summary of the work leading up to the preparation of the report, prepared so that those unfamiliar with the site could gain an understanding of it. He understood that for the purposes of tendering, TCL 82-14 was a focused compilation of all of the pertinent information that contractors needed, to be able to bid the job.

[156] Mulyk testified that he was not used to getting such reports with contract packages. It was his experience that reports prepared for owners, and not contractors, would be provided, if anything. As a result of the Thurber Report stating that it had been prepared for contract bidders, Mulyk went through it thoroughly, assuming that it would really help him in his bid. Having the report made his bid more competitive. Without this report, there would have been more guesswork involved. He would have built in more risk factors, and would have submitted a higher bid.

[157] Given the title of this report, and the introduction to the report, Maio understood that this document, having been prepared for this project specifically and for the bidders, would include all information that a person contemplating submitting a tender would require to submit a proposal. He took from the introduction that the report would summarize all pertinent conditions that a tenderer would need to be familiar with in order to bid.

[158] Ruttan agreed that Alberta Environment had intended to present, to bidders, a summary of site investigations conducted by Alberta Environment, which they intended bidders to rely upon. It was his evidence that the Thurber Report was prepared specifically for contract bidders, and agreed that the purpose of the report was as set out in the introduction.

[159] Dr. Matheson, one of the experts called by the defendant, agreed that the Thurber Report had been prepared for the bidders, to allow those unfamiliar with the site to become familiar. He described the purpose of including the geology section of the report as being to provide the framework within which the contractors, as they were bidding the job, could consider what was shown on the strip logs.

[160] I find that the Introduction to the Thurber Report represented to the bidders that the report was prepared specifically for them; that the defendant intended the bidders to rely on the information provided; and that the report purportedly accurately and comprehensively summarized, omitting only needless detail, the geological information that had been obtained by the defendant over the course of the investigations leading up to the Stage II contract.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

The Thurber Report

"Section 2. Brief Description of Proposed Construction

"The final dam will be constructed to an elevation of 710.8 metres which is approximately the elevation of the surrounding upland. The high level outlet will be a concrete spillway on the south abutment and the low level outlet will consist of a reinforced concrete conduit through the dam embankment. The dam will be constructed with a clay core and gravel shells, with stabilizing berms on both the upstream and downstream sides. All materials with the possible exception of the coarser fraction of the upstream slope erosion protection are available within close proximity of the dam site."

[161] Section 2 of the Thurber Report represented to all of the bidders for the Stage II contract that the only material that they might need to get from an off site source was riprap. All other material, which obviously included 2A gravel, was represented as being available within close proximity to the dam site.

[162] Simmonds testified that this representation confirmed other statements in the contract documents that the granular material would be available, and it gave him a further level of comfort.

[163] Cameron understood from section 2 of the Thurber Report, together with the rest of the information in the tender package, that all of the material that they needed in terms of clay and gravel, with the possible exception of riprap, would be available to them on site.

[164] Hutton also read section 2 and understood from that section that all of the material that they needed, including the gravel and with the possible exception of some of the riprap, would be available within the construction area made available to the contractor by Alberta Environment.

[165] Maio similarly took comfort from this representation in the Thurber Report. In terms of the work that he was intending to bid upon, this statement assured him that he would be able to find enough 2A, and sufficiently good 2B material to be processed, within the immediate area of the dam, meaning the pervious borrow area.

[166] I find as a fact that the plaintiff was misled by this section:

"3. Geology (paragraph 4)

When the glacial lakes drained, the Paddle River cut down through the lake clays and glacial till to form the present river valley. Sand, silt and gravel were deposited by the river and cover the valley bottom to an average depth of about 5 metres, typically from 2.5 m. to 6 m."

[167] The resident engineer, Ruttan, was aware, when he read the Thurber Report, that the geology section made no mention of the fact that the Paddle River had meandered all over the valley bottom. He was aware, from all of the information that had been gathered, that the process of the river meandering had had an effect on the gravel deposit, and that the river had redistributed the gravel. That effect had been such that with test pits 100 metres by 50 metres apart it was not possible to predict with any certainty, or even with a high degree of reliability, whether there would be gravel between any two test pits, and if so, its depth.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[168] Ruttan admitted that there was no mention made to the bidders at the site visit conducted by Alberta Environment, that they should look beyond the contents of the geology section of the Thurber Report, that the geological summary that had been provided was incomplete, because it did not mention the effects of the Paddle River on the gravel, or that there was other information in the possession of Alberta Environment that either expanded upon, or differed from, the geological summary that had been provided.

[169] Paget, the construction expert called by the plaintiff, testified that his understanding from reading the geology section in the Thurber Report was that there was a uniform blanket across the valley floor consisting of sand, silt and gravel. Taken together with the rest of the contract, Paget would have expected the gravel to be found in a continuous layer. He did not gain any impression from the contract documents that the gravel was erratic or segmented by the actions of the Paddle River.

[170] I find as a fact that the plaintiff was misled by this section:

> "4.2 Pervious Borrow (paragraph 1)
>
> The pervious borrow is one unit of the alluvium located in the base of the valley. The overburden overlying the gravel is variable over the site and ranges from clean sand to sandy silt and clay, which is generally moist to wet. The gravel is generally underlain by firm to stiff clay till at depths ranging from approximately 2.5 to 6 metres. The gravel has an expected common thickness of approximately 1.0 to 3.0 metres. In isolated pockets and channels, the clay till surface is deeper than the maximum stated above, and in some locations it does not exist. The water table within the alluvial sediments varies according to the season. However, it has generally coincided with the surface of the gravel material at approximately 1.0 to 1.5 metres depth. The approximate elevation of the Paddle River during the period of test pit exploration was near the top surface of the gravel." (underlining mine)

[171] As set out in the Hardy Report, prepared for Opron and submitted to Alberta Environment in December of 1983, the following information was conveyed by the description of the gravel found in section 4.2 of the Thurber Report:

> 1. Gravel is typically 1.0 to 3.0 metres thick.
>
> 2. Gravel is typically covered by 1.0 to 1.5 metres of overburden.
>
> 3. The gravel deposit is generally uniform.

[172] At trial, Dr. McRoberts, one of the authors of the Hardy report, testified that the reference to gravel in section 4.2 was a reference to gravel as a unit of the alluvium. A unit is a geologic term, and the gravel in that unit was described by Thurber as having an expected common thickness. The use of the word "unit" implies continuity. Given the absence of any mention of the effect of the Paddle River on the gravel, section 4.2, in conjunction with the geology section in the Thurber Report, was effectively a statement that the gravel was continuous. That, in Dr.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

McRoberts' opinion, as supported by all witnesses who actually worked in the field with this deposit, was not a correct statement.

[173] It was Dr. McRoberts' evidence that the use of the phrase "expected common thickness" was a departure from standard practice, and very clearly indicates what Thurber thought the deposit was. Dr. McRoberts reviewed the series of reports written by Thurber after the receipt of the Geo-Physi-Con report in March of 1981, up to and including the Thurber Report, TCL 82-14. He was of the opinion that not only did the contract documents, including the Thurber Report, say that the gravel was continuous, but they fully intended to convey that it was continuous.

[174] Dr. Matheson agreed that the use of this phrase conveyed a view held by Thurber, and testified that it was not necessarily an industry standard way of expressing a view. It was Dr. Matheson's evidence that in any area where the gravel had a depth of less than 1 metre between two test pits where each test pit showed a metre or more of gravel, the statement that the gravel has an expected common thickness of 1 to 3 metres was incorrect.

[175] To Simmonds, section 4.2 confirmed that the gravel was in a seam-like deposit. On cross-examination, he testified that he expected, based on this section, to find gravel in this seam-like deposit between 1 and 3 metres thick. He noticed that there were test pits included in the contract documents that showed gravel less than 1 metre thick. This did not concern him, because he knew that Thurber had produced the soils report, they had summarized their information, and they had spelled out specifically what a contractor could expect to find. These facts gave him a comfort zone and a confidence that they could do their take-offs from the test pits.

[176] LePage also gave evidence on cross-examination about this section. His reading of section 4.2 told him that the gravel in the valley was constant and uniform, and that led him to believe that there was no problem in doing quantitative calculations of the gravel from the test pits by using recognized methods.

[177] Cameron, Hutton, Mulyk and Maio all testified that they considered the description of the gravel provided in section 4.2 in the Thurber Report as a confirmation of the understanding that they had gained from the contract overall, and in particular, section 6.3.3, that the gravel was deposited in a seam, and was continuous across the valley floor.

[178] From his reading of this section, and section 6.3.3 of the contract, Cameron fully expected LePage to prepare his quantity calculations using the test pits. Based on his understanding that the test pits represented what was in the valley, Cameron testified that he understood that a volume calculated, using the test pit data, would be the volume that was in fact in the valley.

[179] Hutton read this section as specifically confirming that the average end area method of calculating gravel volumes in the Paddle River valley was an appropriate method. He understood, based on his overall review of the contract documents, including the Thurber Report and the drawings, that the representation was that there was sufficient quantities of gravel below 695 to complete the project, and that the gravel would be found in a continuing layer of varying thickness, that would be suitable for a strip mining operation.

[180] Dr. McRoberts testified that as a result of the statements made in section 4.2, which meant that the granular material between strip logs was uniform and continuous, it was very appropriate for a contractor to use a conventional method of calculating quantities.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[181] M.A. Dee, project manager for the plaintiff in 1983, had reference to the Thurber Report in the work that he did to plan for the 1983 pervious borrow operations, after the receivership of Maio Construction. He assumed that Thurber had done a proper geotechnical interpretation, and he placed heavy reliance on the written report. From the Thurber Report, he understood that gravel was deposited throughout the valley and that the depth of the gravel would vary between 1 and 3 metres. Counsel for the defendant suggested to Dee that there was, in fact, gravel in 90% of the valley. It was Dee's evidence that if they had found gravel in seams in even 90 percent of the areas they worked in 1983, they would not have noticed breaks in their planned operation. Dee believed in and relied on the accuracy of the geotechnical analysis performed by Thurber until he got to the field, where he saw from the physical evidence that the report was incorrect.

[182] Paget, the construction expert called by the plaintiff, testified that in his experience, the word "common" has a meaning similar to that conveyed in the expression "lowest common denominator". The use of that word in section 4.2, as opposed to simply making a statement of expected thickness, communicated to him that Thurber was reporting on more than just an average thickness, and that the use of the word meant that the geotechnical engineers intended to convey that the gravel, in thickness of 1 to 3 metres, was "basically all over".

[183] Most, if not all, contractors would see section 4.2, and section 6.3.3, as clear, simple and unequivocal statements of continuity of the gravel, and would proceed on that basis to do their volume estimates and planning.

[184] Indeed, it was clearly on the basis of a continuity of gravel that Opron, Maio Construction, the Caribou-Estabrook joint venture and even Double N estimated and planned their work.

[185] In the best possible light, section 4.2, standing alone, was ambiguous. If section 4.2 standing by itself was ambiguous, I need only to have reference to the context in which it was set, namely the whole of the contract, including section 6.3.3, to remove any such ambiguity or equivocation inherent in it. In the context of the whole contract, I have no trouble finding, and I do so find, that the section 4.2 was clearly a representation to the contractors that the gravel in the valley would be found in a continuous layer.

> "4.2 Pervious Borrow (paragraph 4)
>
> ... For this Embankment - Stage II Contract the drawings include a detailed grid pattern of test pits plotted on cross sections at regular intervals within the pervious borrow areas. These cross sections show a geotechnical strip log for each test pit and have been provided for the Tenderers to assess the distribution of gravel in the pervious borrow area."

[186] I note here, however, that the evidence before me was clear that a significant number of the test pits shown in the contract documents for the pervious borrow area were not on the grid pattern at all. As reviewed above, of the 71 test pits in Dr. Matheson's "heartland", 51 were off the grid. Dr. Matheson agreed that over 150, or 35 to

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

40% of the test pits included in the contract documents were off the grid, rather than on the grid.

[187] It was Dr. McRoberts' opinion that the 150 test pits that were located off the grid were definitely biased in favour of finding gravel, and that the balance, of approximately 250, should be viewed with suspicion.

[188] It was Cameron's evidence that he understood, from paragraph 4 of this section, that the test pits had been provided to the contract bidders all neatly laid out on cross sections so that they could calculate and determine the volumes of overburden and gravel, and also, so that the contractors could determine where the gravel would be found in the valley.

[189] Maio took particular note of the fact that the test pits that were provided with the contract documents were laid out on a grid. He took that to be a direction that they should use the cross sections to calculate volumes of overburden and gravel in the valley.

[190] I find as a fact that the plaintiff was misled by section 4.2.

Thurber Report (Paddle River Alluvium Subsection)

> "Approximately 800,000 cubic metres of granular material may be mined from the pervious borrow area for use in the construction of the pervious zones of the embankment."

[191] It is important to note that as at the date of the Thurber Report, May 7, 1982, the pervious borrow area was defined in the contract documents, section 6.5.2, as being the downstream pervious borrow area, as shown on the drawings, and the upstream pervious borrow area below elevation 695. The area above 695 did not became a potential extension to the defined pervious borrow area until the Addendum was published by Alberta Environment on June 14, 1982.

[192] This section clearly represented to the contract bidders that approximately 800,000 cubic metres of granular material could be mined out of the downstream pervious borrow area and the upstream pervious borrow area below elevation 695. As Dr. McRoberts testified, the 800,000m^3 of Paddle River Alluvium from which 1 percent riprap could be recovered must have been a reference to gravel, as it would not have been possible to get gravel sizes large enough for riprap out of either sand or silt.

[193] Cameron understood the section to mean that there was at least the quantity of 800,000m^3 available. He considered that number to be the approximate volume they would have to mine in order to place the contract quantity of 691,000m^3 in the dam or in stockpiles. Given that this reported volume corresponded to Cameron's concept of the total amount that would have to be mined in order to place the contract quantities, net of all losses, he derived a further level of assurance concerning the gravel deposit from this section of the Thurber Report.

[194] Maio similarly had determined during his estimating work that he would need to mine 800,000m^3 in order to actually place the 691,000m^3 required by the contract. He felt comfortable with his concept when he read this section, as it appeared to him that someone had spent considerable time preparing the documents and had arrived at the same conclusions concerning the pervious borrow that he had.

[195] Mulyk also took reassurance from this section of the Thurber Report that the required volume of gravel was available right in the pervious borrow area as staked out by Alberta Environment in the tender documents. He understood that the 800,000m^3 was made up of the contract quantity plus an allowance for shrinkage and loss.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[196] Hutton also testified, during cross-examination, that he discussed this section of the Thurber Report with Thiessen after the tenders closed. Thiessen explained to him that they would be permitted to mine 800,000m^3 from the valley, which would be enough to yield the required contract quantities, and after that, they would have to stop mining. Thiessen did not dispute this evidence given by Hutton.

[197] Paget also reviewed this section of the Thurber Report. He understood it to be a statement not of all of the gravel that was in place in the defined pervious borrow area, but as a statement that one would have to handle this volume in order to obtain the required contract quantities.

[198] Thiessen testified that he would not dispute that Thurber's expectation, as reflected in this section, that a contractor would have to mine 800,000m^3 in order to get 691,000m^3 into stockpiles or the embankment, as required by the contract.

[199] I note here that in the area actually worked by Maio Construction in 1982 and up to February of 1983, the contract documents indicated that just over 800,000m^3 of gravel existed. As I have reviewed elsewhere, contrary to the representations in the contract documents as to the volume of gravel which existed in the areas worked by Maio Construction, only approximately 400,000m^3 of gravel was actually recovered.

[200] I find as a fact that the plaintiff was misled by this subsection.

[201] Having considered the foregoing, I find the contract documents for the PRD - Stage II Embankment Contract, as published to prospective tenderers, included the following representations:

A. Pervious Borrow

(1) The approximate locations of all boreholes and test pits within the area of the dam site were shown on the drawings and the logs of these holes were given in "Schedule F" (Section 1.13 shown on the drawing so that the contractor could evaluate his operation for Borrow Excavation (Section 1.13)). The drawings included a detailed grid pattern of test pits plotted on cross sections at regular intervals within the pervious borrow area. These cross sections showed a geotechnical strip log of each test pit and were provided for the bidders to assess the distribution of gravel in the pervious borrow area (Thurber Report, section 4.2, page 5).

But the gravel deposit in the Paddle River valley was actually erratic, segmented and pocketed. The spacing of the test pits included in the contract was not close enough to enable a prediction of gravel between any two test pits showing gravel. Consequently, as cautioned by Ma in April of 1983, the test pits could not be used to accurately calculate volumes of gravel. Similarly, the test pits could not be used to calculate overburden, determine overburden to gravel ratios, determine haul distances, select equipment or a method of operation or price the work. (Sections 4.1.1 and 4.1.7 and sections 5 and 7.6)

(2) The distribution of pervious borrow in the pervious borrow area was indicated by the strip logs on the drawings (Section 6.3.3 General and Detailed Specifications).

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

But the distribution of the gravel was erratic and the test pits were not spaced sufficiently close to indicate the gravel that existed between them. As stated above, the spacing of the gravel pits was not close enough to indicate the gravel that existed between them. (Section 4.1.2 and section 7.6)

(3) A summary of the site soil conditions providing geotechnical information for contract bidders was included in the contract documents to give those unfamiliar with the site some understanding of the site conditions and project design in a relatively short time. (Title to the Thurber Report and section 1).

But as I have found above, the Thurber Report was not an accurate or comprehensive summary of the geotechnical information in the possession of Alberta Environment and it failed to disclose essential information, particularly the effect of the action of the Paddle River on the gravel deposit and the fact of prior mining. It did not allow bidders to become familiar with the site conditions as represented. (Section 4.1.3 and section 5)

(4) The geology of the area surrounding the site of the Paddle River Dam was as summarized in the Thurber Report. Sand, silt and gravel were deposited by the Paddle River and covered the valley bottom to an average depth of 5 metres, typically from 2.5 to 6.0 metres. The gravel had been deposited in, and covered, the valley bottom, by the river. The river had no effect of significance on the gravel since its deposition (Thurber Report Section 3, Geology).

But the river had had a significant effect, and was a material feature of the geology having caused the nature of the gravel deposit encountered by the plaintiff to be segmented. The omission of any mention of the river or its effect on the gravel deposit rendered that which was stated false. (Section 4.1.5, section 5 and section 7.6)

(5) The gravel had an expected common thickness of 1.0 to 3.0 metres (Thurber Report Section 4.2).

But the gravel in the Paddle River valley was segmented, pocketed and erratic. It did not occur in anything like a continuous layer of 1 to 3 metres thick. This representation was false. (Section 4.1.6, section 5 and section 7.6)

(6) All materials with the possible exception of a coarser fraction of the Upstream Slope Erosion Protection were available within close proximity of the dam site (Thurber Report, section 2).

But as is shown in the review of the actual conditions encountered in the pervious borrow area in 1982 and 1983, not all of the gravel required for the project was available on site. (section 7.6) This representation was false. (section 4.1.4)

(7) 800,000m^3 of gravel, which could be mined from the pervious borrow areas downstream of the dam and upstream below the 695 elevation, would be enough to yield to the contractor the contract requirement of 691,000m^3 in place in the dam or in stockpiles (TCL 82-14, volume 2, section 8, Paddle River Alluvium, page 9)

But there was not enough gravel below the 695 contour to meet the contract requirements. (section 4.1.8 and section 7.6)

(8) The pervious borrow areas were well explored, and the strip logs from that well explored borrow area could be used as the basis for a proper estimate. (drawings P1 to 19, volume 5)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

But as I have found above, the pervious borrow area was not a well-explored borrow area. The strip logs could not be used as the basis for a proper estimate. The test pits were biased in favour of finding gravel, and were not representative of the gravel in the valley. (section 4.1.9)

(B) Downstream Foundation

(9) The extent of the work performed by the Stage I contractor was shown on the drawings that were included in the contract. (General and Detailed Specifications, section 1.1.2, Work by Others, (a) Embankment Stage I, page 1)

But work was performed by the Stage I contractor which was not shown on the drawings at all. The As Built drawings of the downstream foundation area were not accurate and did not show the buried waste. (section 4.2.1 and section 5.6)

(10) All of the test pits and boreholes in the area of the dam site were shown on the drawings and logs for each were included in the contract. (section 1.13 of the General and Detailed Specifications, page 14)

But not all of the test pits which would have been relevant to the contract bidders were provided. (section 4.2.2 above)

(11) No work of significance to the Stage II contractor had been performed in the area of the downstream by the Stage I contractor. (Drawing 3 of 28, Topographic Plan of Site, Embankment Stage I - As Built, Outlet Works Stage I - Under Construction By Others; Drawing 4 of 28, Typical Sections, Embankment Stage I - As Built, Outlet Works Stage I - Under Construction By Others; TCL 82-14, Volume 2, Descriptions of work performed during Stage I as contained in section 2, Brief Description of Proposed Construction, paragraph 2, section 3, Geology, paragraph 5, section 4.1, Impervious Borrow, paragraph 2 and section 5, Excavation, paragraph 1)

But the Stage I contractor had worked in the area of the downstream foundation excavation area in placing waste in this area, as directed by Alberta Environment. Alberta Environment had documented this work on drawings and had surveyed the actual extent of the work. (sections 4.2.3, 4.2.4, and 4.26)

(12) The conditions to be encountered in the downstream foundation excavation were represented by the test pit and borehole logs contained in the contract and on the drawings. (Volumes 3 and 4 of the Contract and TCL 82-14, Volume 2, section 5, Excavation)

But the test pits in the contract documents did not represent the conditions encountered in the downstream foundation excavation area. (section 4.2.5 and section 7)

C. North Abutment

(13) The extent of the work performed by the Stage I contractor was shown on the drawings that were included in the contract. (General and Detailed Specifications, section 1.1.2, Work by Others, (a) Embankment Stage I, page 1)

But the extent of the work in the north abutment performed by the Stage I contractor was not shown on the drawings. (section 4.3.1 and section 5.7)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

(14) No work, other than that shown on the contract drawings, had been performed in the area of the north abutment by the Stage I contractor. (Drawing 3 of 28, Topographic Plan of Site, Embankment Stage I - As Built, Outlet Works Stage I - Under Construction By Others; Drawing 6 of 28, Excavation Plan; Drawing 7 of 28, Detailed Excavation Plan and Excavation and Fill Sections, North Abutment; TCL 82-14, Volume 2, Descriptions of work performed during Stage I as contained in section 2, Brief Description of Proposed Construction, paragraph 2, section 3, Geology, paragraph 5, section 4.1, Impervious Borrow, paragraph 2; and section 5, Excavation, paragraph 1)

But the extent of the work was not disclosed in the contract documents. (sections 4.3.2, 4.3.3 and 4.3.5 and section 5.7)

(15) The conditions to be encountered in the north abutment excavation were represented by the test pit and borehole logs contained in the contract and as shown on the drawings. (Volumes 3 and 4 of the Contract and TCL 82-14, Volume 2, section 5, Excavation)

But the test pits in the contract documents did not represent the conditions encountered in the north abutment foundation area. (section 4.3.5 and section 7)

(16) The slide that occurred during the execution of the Stage I contract was a small slide. (TCL 82-14, Volume 2, section 3, Geology, paragraph 5)

But the slide that occurred during the Stage I construction was significant. (section 4.3.5)

(17) The ground level at which the Stage II contractor would start work in the foundation of the north abutment was the limit to which the Stage I contractor had excavated. Beneath that limit would be naturally occurring and undisturbed material. (Drawing 7 of 28, Detailed Excavation Plan and Excavation and Fill Sections, North Abutment)

But in any area where the slide had occurred, or the berm had been built, or fill had been placed, the line in question did not shown a "limit of excavation". (section 4.3.5)

(18) No portion of the slide still existed and the material beneath the Stage I excavation limits would be naturally occurring and undisturbed. (General and Detailed Specifications, section 1.1.2, Work by Others, (a) Embankment Stage I, page 1; Drawing 3 of 28, Topographic Plan of Site, Embankment Stage I - As Built, Outlet Works Stage I - Under Construction By Others; Drawing 6 of 28, Excavation Plan, Drawing 7 of 28, Detailed Excavation Plan and Excavation and Fill Sections, North Abutment; TCL 82-14, Volume 2, Descriptions of work performed during Stage I as contained in section 2, Brief Description of Proposed Construction, paragraph 2, section 3, Geology, paragraph 5, section 4.1, Impervious Borrow, paragraph 2; and section 5, Excavation, paragraph 1)

But contrary to the representations contained in the contract documents, the slide had not been removed. It had only been masked. The Stage II contractor, unbeknownst to him, had to remove it as part of his excavation work. (section 5.7 and section 7)

D. Alberta Environment Had Furnished All Geotechnical Information With The Contract Documents

(19) All of the geotechnical information

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

that was relevant for bidders, except for a "report summarizing the results of test pits in the pervious borrow area that [sic] the presence of oversize material" relating to riprap, and "Sand and Gravel Resources of the Whitecourt Area, Alberta", both of which were referred to by title in the Thurber Report, was included in the information that provided with the contract documents. (General and Detailed Specifications, section 1.13; TCL 82-14, section 1, Introduction; TCL 82-14, section 8, Other Geotechnical Information; TCL 82-14, section 9, Summary of Sources of Subsurface Information)

But Alberta Environment was in possession of numerous reports, drawings and memoranda which provided geotechnical information. These sources of information were not included, by reference or by summary, in the contract documents. The existence of these sources of information was not disclosed in the contract documents. (section 4.4 and section 5)

[202] I find as a fact that the defendant was deceitful concerning the upstream pervious borrow and the downstream foundation excavation area and negligently misrepresented the conditions in the north abutment.

Reliance

[203] The contract documents, as published by Alberta Environment, were intended by Alberta Environment to be relied on by the bidders. Contractors were not expected to verify the accuracy of what was represented in the contract documents. The contract documents contained interpretations and these interpretations were made for the contractors' use in preparing their tenders, again without independent verification of accuracy.

[204] Ruttan testified that he knew that contractors would, and indeed, he expected contractors to rely upon the information contained in the contract documents as published by Alberta Environment. In fact, the pervious borrow information was specifically set out in a manner to be convenient and suitable for the contractors' use in preparing their bids and so that they could use a conventional means of estimating quantities such as an average end area method.

[205] The contractors were given the logs and interpretations, as contained in the Thurber Report and elsewhere in the contract, for their use in preparing tenders. They were expressly told in the contract documents that the distribution of gravel was indicated by the strip logs (section 6.3.3). Ruttan agreed that in order to do an estimate, a contractor should be able to rely on the logs as indicating the distribution of the pervious borrow in the pervious borrow area for the purposes of determining his overburden to gravel ratios, his haul distances, his equipment, his scheduling and sequencing, his method of operation and his price for pervious borrow.

[206] Ruttan also agreed that the Thurber Report was bound into the contract documents and had been compiled and prepared for the contract bidders. It was intended that it could be used by those unfamiliar with the site so that they could obtain some understanding of the site in a relatively short time. Indeed it was styled "Geotechnical Information for Contract Bidders". This was not a general report or a report done for the engineer's or owner's use in the design of the dam. It was prepared and included specifically for contractors to rely on.

[207] Alberta Environment, in general, and Ruttan, specifically, knew that to prepare bids, contractors would have to do quantity takeoffs, arrive at equipment selections, consider and develop a plan of work, price components of the work and assemble all of the information together to arrive at a bid. In the time frame available, about five weeks as compared to the several years that Alberta Environment had to carry out its investigations, Ruttan did not expect contractors to attempt to verify the accuracy of the design other than by reading the documents. He expected the contractors to rely on the information published for them.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[208] Ruttan also expected that contractors would rely on the As Built drawings contained in the contract documents as being accurate, although he also testified that the As Built drawings in these contract documents were not intended to be complete. Alberta Environment included test logs in the areas of the downstream foundation and the north abutment to provide information that was representative of the anticipated site conditions. Ruttan acknowledged that he was aware that the type of deposit that is expected to be encountered would affect a bidder's approach to his tender, his equipment choice, his sequencing and planning, his method of operation and his price.

[209] Thiessen, the project manager for the PRD, agreed that contractors needed the best possible information they could get. He acknowledged that contractors were entitled to rely, and he expected them to rely, on the information they were given in the contract documents. Contractors for this particular job had to be able to determine the overburden to gravel ratio due to the new payment structure that placed the risk of finding gravel on the contractor. Thiessen understood that the way the contractors calculated that ratio depended on the information that they were given in the contract documents.

[210] The defendant's officer, Nicolson, admitted that it would not have been possible for contract bidders to duplicate the investigations made by Alberta Environment prior to completion of the Stage II contract documents.

[211] Based on the representations in the contract documents, Cameron, project manager, and the other members of the Opron estimating team understood that the gravel was in a continuous seam. They understood, as stated in the contract documents, that the test pits could be used to predict the distribution of the gravel. This representation allowed Opron to estimate the quantity of gravel and the ratio of overburden to gravel, to plan the work, to identify the areas of work and where the gravel existed and to choose strip mining as the method of operation in the pervious borrow area.

[212] Hutton, Opron's western general manager, confirmed that as a result of the pricing structure for the gravel in this contract, Opron knew they had to recover all of the costs for locating gravel, removing overburden, excavating gravel and hauling it to the dam from one unit price based on gravel in place in the dam. The payment structure made it critical for Opron to know where the gravel was actually deposited, how it was deposited and how far from the dam it would be found. Opron was only able to make all of these calculations and price the job because the contract told them that the distribution of gravel was indicated by the strip logs and gave them an assurance of continuity. Had Opron been aware that the gravel, rather than being as represented, was actually erratic and segmented, it would have been unable to do the necessary calculations, especially within the time frame of the tender period.

[213] In order to determine what material could be expected in the foundation areas of the dam, Cameron, who performed the majority of the evaluations for impervious materials during the tender period, relied on the information in the contract and on what he saw at the site visit. He understood that the information contained in the test pit and borehole logs was representative of the material that would be encountered in the areas.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001717

[214] The defendant called as one of their expert witnesses, Harold Johnston ("Johnston"). Johnston was a consultant to Double N Construction in 1982 for the purpose of assisting that company in preparing an estimate for this project. Johnston testified that he did not look at any additional information at the time of tender. He considered that the information provided in the tender package was ample and he also had a time element to adhere to. He considered that the tender package could be used to submit a reasonable and accurate bid. He relied upon the package, including the Thurber Report, as being accurate for the purposes of the work that he did in preparing the tender.

[215] I find as a fact that the plaintiff relied on the information supplied by the defendant in the contract documents.

The Site Tour

[216] During the tender period, the defendant arranged a site visit for all prospective tenderers. This site visit was held on June 9, 1982. Representatives from a number of companies attended, in total approximately 50 people. All participants were free to make such other site visits as they deemed necessary and appropriate. Some parties availed themselves of the opportunity to revisit the site.

[217] Three representatives of the plaintiff attended, only two of whom were directly involved in preparation of the plaintiff's estimate. Three other individuals, who were directly involved in the bid preparation, did not attend. The plaintiff did not make any additional visits during the tender period. After the tender closing date, Maio made private visits on at least two occasions.

[218] Prior to the commencement of the site visit, those present were provided with a package of basic introductory information to allow them some familiarity with the project and location. The documents set out that the design was evolving and would continue to evolve as the project progressed.

[219] Representatives of the defendant and of the design team were present to explain the project, answer questions and cause test holes to be dug, both in random locations and where requested. The Stage I portion of the project was discussed and questions asked in that regard were answered. The presence of the Stage I contractor was pointed out to allow questions to be asked of it as well. Additionally, those present were allowed to wander where ever they wished and do what they wanted to ensure their familiarity with the site and conditions likely to be expected. They were also advised that additional information and documentation was available in Edmonton and could be reviewed on request. The plaintiff's personnel never availed themselves of that opportunity.

[220] The site visit commenced with all attendees arriving at the north abutment. From there they were able to look at the dam site itself, all areas of required excavation and those other working areas in near proximity to the dam. They next went to the downstream foundation area and stopped at the conduit outlet works. They were able to walk in and around the downstream foundation excavation area. They were able to observe or walk into the downstream pervious borrow area as well as all areas containing stockpiles and all work areas both expected for use by themselves or being used or which had been used by earlier contractors. Encompassed in that was the ability of all visitors to walk along side of and on top of the embankment as it then existed.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[221] The site tour group then travelled along a road built on top of the clay cut off in order to drive along the downstream foundation excavation area by the diversion area and into the area upstream of the dam as it then stood. In doing this they were also able to observe the south abutment area and water flowing through the diversion area. (The tour stopped at the river diversion).

[222] The group stopped along the upstream side of the embankment again allowing visitors the opportunity of viewing and walking around that area as well as portions of the Stage I pervious borrow.

[223] The group continued into the upstream pervious borrow area where a number of stops were made. First, the group stopped at existing test holes which had earlier been dug, and then at areas where test holes were excavated in the visitors' presence.

[224] At all locations where the tour stopped, participants understood that they were able to go anywhere and observe or do anything they wished in order to enable themselves to become familiar with the project and the area in which it was being constructed.

[225] Approximately eight test holes were dug by backhoe during the site visit, in a variety of locations, in the course of the trip upstream. The first two or three test holes which were dug did not locate any gravel. The remainder, however, did locate gravel of varying thickness at varying depths covered by varying types and amounts of overburden which overburden was also of a widely varying moisture content.

[226] At the conclusion, those present were returned to the starting point, from which point they were then free to do whatever they required or deemed necessary to prepare themselves to be in a position to bid on Embankment Stage II.

[227] Ruttan, the defendant's resident engineer, conducted the site visit and carried out a commentary as the tour progressed. He answered those questions put to him as well.

[228] He was a graduate engineer, had been resident engineer on the Paddle River Project during and prior to Embankment Stage I, and was familiar with conditions at the site. He remained the resident engineer for all phases of the PRD.

[229] During Ruttan's commentary, he mentioned that a slide had occurred in the north abutment during Stage I excavation work, that the slide had been repaired, that additional information in the form of reports and photos was available, that permanent relief wells would be later constructed within the foundation excavation area, that previous mining had occurred within parts of the reservoir and that a gravel stockpile beyond the 695 contour belonged to others and was not available for use.

[230] Johnston, a long time consulting engineer to the construction industry, and an individual who had previously estimated, bid and also constructed earth fill dams, was present at the site visit although representing another contractor (Double N Construction). During the site visit, he noted a number of items which assisted him in helping Double N create an estimate for Embankment Stage II.

[231] In the north abutment he noticed that no vegetation remained on the slopes. It had been cleared and stripped. As a result, he expected that the slopes would be wetter and harder to work with than the test holes for that area were likely to indicate. He noticed the gap between the north abutment and the embankment - though relatively dry at the site visit - and believed that during construction it would require extreme care and considerable effort as it would collect water.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001719

[232] He indicated that the downstream pervious borrow area looked wet - water from the conduit outlet works was being pumped there on the date of the site visit. The fact that the dam was a flood control structure located on a valley bottom was also of significance to him.

[233] In the upstream pervious borrow area, Johnston observed a number of previously excavated test pits. They were filled with water and the top of the water level was generally at or near the top of the gravel located in the pit. He also noticed that, at times, water had percolated, in places upwards of a foot, above the gravel layer making the overburden wet. As a result, Johnston expected to be working with wet overburden in mining for gravel.

[234] Similarly, after watching excavation of some test holes in areas further upstream, he noted that at times the gravel was very wet (the hoe was excavating both water and gravel). Johnston concluded that extensive de-watering would be required in the pervious borrow areas as well as in the foundation areas. In his trip up the valley, Johnston also noted other areas which had to some extent been mined previously and recalled being told the same by Ruttan.

[235] With respect to the pervious borrow area, he recognized that it was to be a tough job requiring extensive planning, much water control and carefully controlled operations to ensure that mining losses would be kept to a minimum.

[236] After the site visit and review of the contract documents, Johnston viewed Embankment Stage II as a risky, difficult job, particularly in its early stages.

[237] At the site visit, none of the plaintiff's representatives asked any questions, made any notes, took any photos, or made any detailed investigations in respect of any items. I fault the plaintiff in this regard.

[238] Both Cameron and Hutton noted that the downstream pervious borrow area looked wet and might be hard to work in. They noted that the conduit contractor was pumping water into areas where, were the plaintiff successful, it would have to excavate. They noted that there were some existing stockpiles of various materials in and near those same areas which would have to be dealt with in some fashion.

[239] Similarly, with respect to the area of the downstream foundation excavation, they noted that it had been and was being used as a lay down or construction area by other contractors. They also noted that it appeared to have been dressed or levelled. Both noted that the previously existing river channel and old oxbow, which formerly had run through that area, were no longer in evidence or existence. They noted that the conduit contractor had placed a pile of granular material in that area and also made note of some other piles of material there. In their review of the contract documents during the estimate period, they also noted that some test holes in the valley bottom contained fill material.

[240] None of the plaintiff's site visit team investigated any of the locations in the downstream foundation excavation area where they had noted previous work, stockpiles or dressed conditions to determine the type or nature of the material which may have been placed there or to determine the nature of the material existing there or to determine any subsurface conditions in that area which would likely be encountered when it was being excavated.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[241] With respect to that portion of the site visit upstream of the dam, the plaintiff's representatives observed the excavation of test holes and both Cameron and Hutton felt that those holes were representative of what their previous review of the contract documents indicated to them was likely to have been expected in the pervious borrow areas. As for Schindell, Opron's superintendent, he noticed that the gravel varied in depth and nature from test hole to test hole and recalled that some disclosed no gravel.

[242] Both Schindell and Cameron noticed some areas which appeared to have been mined previously, at least to some extent. As well, the plaintiff's representatives recalled noting an area within the upstream pervious borrow where a stockpile of granular material was stored and which had been indicated as belonging to others and therefore not available as construction material on the project.

[243] During the site visit, Hutton indicated that a number of prospective tenderers asked about various of the Stage I contractor's experience and that both the owner's representatives present at the site and the Stage I Contractor himself responded to those questions.

[244] Despite the prior knowledge of Alberta Environment, however, no further mention was made of the Stage I experience, the buried waste in the downstream foundation area, the prior mining in the upstream pervious borrow area or the erratic nature of the pervious borrow deposit. Passing reference only was made to the slide which had occurred in the north abutment. Neither the slide nor the buried waste in the downstream foundation area were apparent upon visual examination. No list of other geotechnical reports was included in the prepared handout distributed to bidders.

[245] The following features were known to Alberta Environment at the time of the site visit. These features were or should all have been known to Ruttan, and obviously to Nicolson and Ramage of Alberta Environment, as well, but were not mentioned.

(a) The Paddle River had meandered all over the valley. This process had been occurring since the last Ice Age some 10,000 to 15,000 years ago. In so doing, the river had affected the deposit of gravel making it unpredictable and according to Ruttan, inconsistently variable which he conceded meant "erratic". By Ruttan's definition, it was a "dog's breakfast". This was a feature of the area.

(b) No mention of the action of the Paddle River was made in the Thurber Report, (although Ruttan denies having known this as of the date of the site visit because he did not read it). Obviously Ramage would have known this because he was a co-author of the report.

(c) Prior reports from Alberta Transportation and the County of Lac Ste. Anne confirmed that the gravel was in pockets, and prior reports from EBA and TCL confirmed the effect of the action of the Paddle River on the gravel deposit.

(d) Gravel had not been found in continuous or contiguous layers of one to three metres during excavation of the pervious borrow area by the Stage I contractor; it was segmented and noncontinuous.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001721

(e) Gravel had not been recovered in the planned or expected quantities from the pervious borrow area in the Stage I contract.

(f) Significant prior mining had been done in the upstream pervious borrow area of the Stage II contract area. (This had been communicated to Alberta Environment by Alberta Transportation and the County of Lac Ste. Anne as early as September, 1977. The location of some of this prior mining had been plotted on a drawing by Alberta Environment. Other areas of prior mining had been plotted by EBA and TCL and were shown on landowner reports prepared by these consultants which were available and known to the engineers of Alberta Environment Design and Construction. Quantities of prior mining were also estimated by those consultants in their reports).

(g) The design of the dam had been changed between Stage I and Stage II, including:

- the footprint of the dam had been extended downstream over an area now requiring excavation, backfill and the construction of a berm. This extension was over the old channels and old oxbows of the Paddle River;

- the deletion of approximately half a million cubic metres of gravel from the embankment;

- a slide approximately half the length of the north abutment upstream of the centre line of the dam had occurred, requiring a re-design in the area of the slide so as to now require excavation by the Stage II contractor of the slide area and the removal of the temporary berm which had been built at the toe of the slope to restrain any further potential slide activity.

(h) Only temporary repairs had been effected to the slide in the north abutment. These repairs were not shown on the As Built drawings.

(i) Waste had been buried in the old channels and oxbows in the downstream foundation area and such waste extended beyond the actual channels. This area had then been bladed off and dressed up so that neither the buried waste nor the original ground were any longer visible.

(j) Surveys had been taken in the downstream foundation area so that measurements of quantities of buried waste material could be made in that area.

(k) The results of test pits in the downstream foundation area were taken from test pits dug before the waste was buried in that area. Those test pits obviously did not disclose the existence of this waste.

(l) The reference to "waste" on the certified As Constructed drawing of Stage I dated February 23, 1982, did not appear on the As Built drawing, sheet 3 of 28, for Stage II.

(m) The Stage I Excavation Limit shown on drawing 7 of 28 as having existed from the Stage I contract in the north abutment upstream of the centre line actually showed a limit of fill placed by the Stage I contractor.

[246] With this knowledge in mind and with an appreciation of its materiality to the bidders, Ruttan, Nicolson and Ramage proceeded to give the prospective bidders a tour of the site for the purpose of pointing out features to enable the contractors to more accurately prepare their tenders, all in the hope of securing the best price.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

The Contract Award

[247] Tenders closed June 29, 1982. Opron was the low bidder. After investigation, Alberta Environment was satisfied that Opron was capable of performing the work. During the course of the evaluation, Thiessen met with Hutton and confirmed Opron's proposed approach to the pervious borrow. Opron subcontracted the excavation and hauling of the gravel to Maio Construction. The securing of a subcontract for the gravel was financially advantageous to Opron based on the price submitted and agreed upon.

[248] Maio, whose firm specialized in earthworks excavation, performed his own quantity takeoff utilizing a standard average end area method and concluded that, based on the contract documents, a strip mining operation was the most feasible method of excavation of the gravel. By letter dated July 15, 1982, Maio Construction provided a quotation to Opron. This was followed by discussion between Hutton and Maio and the revision of the initial quotation by letter dated August 13, 1982. By that time, the work had already begun.

[249] It was understood and agreed that Maio Construction would produce gravel to the dam at a rate that would match Opron's rate of production. Maio Construction also agreed to supply the 2B material and the riprap.

[250] Maio Construction planned to strip and load the gravel with backhoes and to haul the gravel to the dam with a fleet of its own Mack trucks.

[251] The securing of a subcontract price for the excavation and hauling of the 2A and 2B gravel as well as the riprap secured a margin for Opron on this portion of the work of $724,737 and accordingly reduced Opron's risk.

[252] Opron's contract was for the construction of an earthfill embankment. The embankment included seven different types or zones of material. The contract dictated that the various zones of the embankment be constructed at the same rate. The contract also dictated that construction begin in the north abutment, the excavation and backfill of which was critical to the work to be performed in the first year.

[253] The dam centerline ran roughly north/south. The base of the dam was approximately at elevation 677 and the crest of the dam was to be at approximately elevation 711.

[254] Contract Drawing 17 of 28 is a cross section through the embankment showing the location of 6 of the 7 required zones of material. Zone 2B is not shown on this drawing and it was required in only a few specialized locations in the embankment. The seven zones of material can be broadly grouped as impervious (or dirt) and pervious (or gravel) materials. Zones 1, 3, 4 (also referred as common fill), 5 and 6 were the impervious materials. These materials were obtained from the four impervious excavation items in the contract, foundation and abutment excavation, spillway excavation, conduit exit excavation and impervious borrow excavation. Zones 2A and 2B were the pervious materials and these materials were to be obtained from the pervious borrow areas.

[255] There were several restrictions imposed upon Opron's approach to the project by the terms of the contract and these restrictions dictated the sequencing of the work. The individual zones of material had to be placed in conjunction with each other such that adjacent zones of material did not differ in elevation by more than 600 millimetres. This meant that the rate of production of the various zones had to be co-ordinated to ensure that material for each zone was available to be placed in the correct proportions. This zone differential requirement also had the effect of restricting progress on the embankment to the rate of progress of the slowest zone.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001723

[256] Special Provision 11 imposed further restrictions by providing for liquidated damages of $5,000 per calendar day of delay for failure to complete each of the following four items by the dates given, were:

(a) Zone 2B stockpile, spillway excavation, excavation for and placement of the berm south of spillway excavation, and vacate spillway area and south access road by November 15, 1982;

(b) all fill to elevation 684m north of the closure area by November 15, 1982;

(c) all work north of dam centerline station 1 + 350 and provide access from the north to the access shaft by October 15, 1983;

(d) completion of all work on this contract by December 15, 1983.

[257] Placement of the fill in the embankment was dictated by the contract documents to begin at the lowest level which was the north abutment. Before commencing the placement of fill on the main embankment, the north abutment foundation areas had to be excavated and prepared to accept fill material. Ruttan, during the first site meeting on July 26, 1982, repeated and reinforced this requirement.

The Plaintiff's Estimate Of Granular Material - The Background & Assumptions

[258] A review of the plaintiff's estimating process establishes that a number of required construction activities were not provided for. Similarly, a number of required operations were not specifically costed out and some were inaccurately dealt with.

[259] LePage was assigned the task of doing cross sections of the upstream and downstream pervious borrow areas to establish an estimate of the quantities of gravel likely to be in existence in those areas, together with an estimate of the quantities of overburden required to be removed to expose that gravel deposit.

[260] He does not recall the nature of the instructions given to him as to how to do this work nor does he recall who gave him those instructions.

[261] LePage went about the process of estimating quantities of available gravel through the use of an average end area calculation. He can not recall the criteria he used in order to determine from an individual test hole what to include as gravel and what to include as overburden. He felt he exercised no judgment in respect of the information contained in the test hole logs as set out in contract drawings P1 - P19, once he determined the depth of overburden in a test hole and the depth of gravel in a test hole. He made no attempt to determine what the expected horizontal distribution of gravel would be between adjacent test holes.

[262] He did not make any assumptions in respect of the depth of gravel located in a test hole to establish a minimum cutoff to account for either possible losses in excavation or minimum practicalities of recovery. Nor did he qualify his estimate to account for any risk factor in light of the wide variance in the depth of gravel shown in different test holes. He merely drew straight lines between these adjacent test pits that he used which contained gravel - irrespective of physical features that may have interrupted those lines.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[263] Where test pits contained no gravel and, at the edges of the valley, he assumed, for estimate purposes, that the gravel ended mid-way between a pit with gravel and a pit with no gravel or midway between the last pit and the edge of the valley. LePage then calculated the quantities of overburden contained between the lines he had drawn and the natural ground line. Similarly, for gravel he calculated quantities found between his drawn lines showing the top and bottom of his assumed layer.

[264] The method adopted by LePage (average end area) to do his estimate of pervious quantities, while one of a number of similar methods, is commonly used within the construction industry to calculate estimates of quantities of both surface and expected subsurface deposits.

[265] All such methods start from the basis of certain real information (the result of a test hole program usually excavated on the basis of a grid of some sort) followed by an assumption of continuity of some sort; either between pits (for example if a deposit is shown to exist at two locations, it is assumed to exist between those locations whereas if it only exists at one location, it must end somewhere between the location where it exists and the location where it does not), or to a certain point at a certain depth in a certain area.

[266] Each different method used will arrive at a different interpretation of the profile between pits and yield different estimates of quantity. (i.e. in the average end area method, the material between pits is assumed to vary uniformly; in the block method, the area influenced by a pit has a profile which is uniform in depth with an abrupt change when one reaches another area influenced by a different pit; with a contour method, the area between pits will vary unevenly; when averaging is used, the material is assumed to be uniform in depth for the whole area).

[267] Once that assumption is made, a mathematical calculation can be done to determine the estimated quantity located within a particular area. The expertise and judgment of an estimator lies in determining where, for quantification purposes only, he should draw his line, and what material he should include in his calculations in order to arrive at an estimated quantity.

[268] Once that is done, he has merely obtained an estimate of quantity. It is not and can not be any proof that a deposit exists in that quantity at any exact location. There could equally be more or less. It is an averaging calculation only.

[269] The validity and reliability of that mathematical calculation must now be determined or assessed in light of the expected variability of the deposit itself which is ascertained from a review of the totality of available information. The validity and reliability of an estimated quantity necessitates an experienced assessment of risk of whether the estimated quantity is likely to exist in that amount. LePage did none of this additional assessment.

[270] He was not, to his recollection, made privy to any of the information obtained from their site visit and made no use of such information in his estimate of gravel and overburden quantities. He used only the contract drawings.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[271] LePage was somewhat unfamiliar with the soil classification system used by the defendant in the contract documents however he did not review any literature to familiarize himself with the system being used in order to assist him in the work he did.

[272] Upon completion of his estimate of quantities, LePage commenced preparation of a contour drawing based again on the test holes set out in the contract documents. (The same data he used in his previous calculations).

[273] Hutton requested that LePage create a contour drawing as a result of having noticed that the test holes indicated a variance in the depth of gravels located in various parts of the upstream pervious borrow area.

[274] For this activity, he directed LePage to exclude from his contour and from his calculations all gravel layers with a depth that was less than 2 feet, in that he felt that such layers would be difficult to excavate and not economical to mine. He also felt that such thin layers could be excessively wet. However, when his forces were to go into the field in 1983, they would strip mine all areas.

[275] Neither LePage's contour work nor his average end area calculations were checked by anyone from the plaintiffs' operation. Hutton reviewed the contour after it was prepared and says he used it in work he did on the estimate.

[276] Cameron was unaware of what materials and soil categories LePage included as gravel and as overburden. At no point however did Cameron contact LePage, who incidently worked in the same room and office as Cameron, to determine for himself just what criteria LePage had used.

[277] Prior to this time, neither LePage nor Cameron had any experience with searching for, locating, quantifying, or mining granular material or for that matter any other specific material from a river valley flood plain where one could expect to encounter a high water table. Both were also unaware of the nature or quantity of losses one could expect in such process.

[278] Simmonds, although not a field person (he had been an estimator for a variety of companies since his arrival in Canada some 16 years before), and although he too had never worked on the construction of a zoned embankment or excavated or mined granular material from a river valley flood plain, was however aware that within the mining process (his experience was coal mining in Great Britain) a contractor could expect to lose material from the top of a deposit through the stripping process and similarly would leave material unmined at the bottom of a deposit, again as part of the mining process. However, in the plaintiff's estimate work, Simmonds was not involved in any decisions relating to any of the pervious borrow operations.

[279] Similarly, Schindell, although experienced in mining granular in western Canada, and although familiar with mining losses at the top and bottom of deposits, and although familiar with the variability of granular deposits found in flood plains in western Canada, was not utilized in any planning or estimating operations dealing with the pervious borrow aspect of the job.

[280] During preparation of the plaintiff's estimate, it decided to treat all of the impervious excavation items in the same fashion because in the bid team's view, it was all bulk excavation work. The equipment they chose and the productivities they used were based on bulk handling operations. They recognized that work from the top of the abutments and from the impervious borrow pit was easier and would be more productive than work from the foundation areas in the valley bottom. However, for the purposes of their estimate, they blended all of this work and for bid purposes arrived at blended costs for this work. The easier and quicker and more productive work on the abutments and from the impervious borrow pit, subsidized the harder and slower foundation excavation work.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[281] There were large variances in the production rates for various different areas and different haul ranges. This affected the durations on later scheduling because the more difficult foundation excavations - assuming estimated quantities in each area were accurate - are scheduled to take less time (because of the blending) than they actually would if the schedules used the actual expected production for each specific activity and location. The actual placement of fill in these locations would also start later than scheduled. The effect of this on the estimate was an underestimation of durations for all foundation work (assuming accuracy in quantities to be excavated and filled).

[282] Similarly, the plaintiff also blended its placement efforts for all zones. Placement and compaction, again easier in drier, less plastic material, subsidized those areas requiring more work, using wetter or more plastic materials.

[283] These decisions were made by the plaintiff's bid team even though at least Hutton and Cameron were aware that the ease and productivity of excavating, handling, hauling, placing and compacting material depended largely on the strength and moisture contents of that material.

[284] The plaintiff, during its estimate preparation, did not appear to analyze the boreholes from the contract documents for the abutment and foundation excavation areas before determining either the appropriate equipment mix or the expected productivity for such equipment for both the excavation and placement of such materials.

[285] Such an analysis would have revealed many test holes where soft and weak soils well over the optimum moisture content, making a choice of bulk excavation equipment and its productivities clearly inappropriate. (For example CH material up to 18% over optimum; CL materials up to 19% over optimum; silty soils materials up to 18% over optimum).

[286] In addition to blending the dirt items, the plaintiff went a step further during its estimate process in respect of costing the project. They unbalanced their estimate in a number of aspects.

[287] When it came to adding their indirect costs, profit and other adjustments onto their direct costs, they chose to, inter alia, move monies from the impervious borrow item to the mobilization item. This allowed the plaintiff to obtain some extra monies, in accordance with the terms of the contract, earlier on. The possible detriment to such procedure was that since this was a unit price contract, if the actual units of impervious borrow moved on the job became larger than those set out in the estimate of design quantities, the plaintiffs would not recover any mark-up beyond their actual estimated cost (direct) per unit for each extra cubic metre of that material moved. In that event, the plaintiff's income would be artificially reduced because of this unbalancing.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001727

[288] In addition, by treating direct cost items as indirect costs, the costs get distributed to all items rather than the specific ones to which they apply. This artificially reduces the unit prices of those specific items. Any increases in quantities of those specific items will not generate enough revenue to cover the actual cost of those items.

[289] The plaintiff later subcontracted the easier impervious work to Kidco keeping the harder work for itself. From that point the easy work stopped subsidizing the hard work but the plaintiffs were now dependent on their margin on the Kidco subcontract to subsidize this work.

[290] LePage's calculations were done using every second cross section rather than every cross section. He, for some reason, used only one half of the test hole logs to assist him in the calculation of estimated quantities of his type of gravel and his type of overburden.

[291] In order for him to do this, he had to assume continuity not between adjacent test pits down the valley, but between test pits approximately 200m apart irrespective of what the intervening strip logs between the logs he used actually indicated. He clearly was using this test pit information as a very approximate source of quantities both of overburden and granular without regard to practicalities of harvesting of the granular since he used all gravel thicknesses in his calculations.

[292] No adjustments were made in any later calculations to account for any harvesting or mining losses. Nor were adjustments made for the possibility of having to strip and mine additional areas because of these losses.

[293] The information from option 3 in Document 13063, was carried forward and was used by members of the bid team in respect of the plaintiff's calculation of required hours and equipment needed to strip, excavate and haul 900,680m^3 of excavated gravel from the identified pit to the embankment.

[294] The plaintiff expected that by providing for an extra 209,600m^3 (an amount 30% more than that amount shown on the approximate tender quantities for bid comparison purposes), they would have enough granular material to construct the embankment as designed.

[295] In addition to mining losses, there are a variety of other losses that occur during construction operations such as Embankment Stage II where materials are taken from one place moved, processed as necessary, then placed and compacted. These losses are associated with things such as loading, hauling, processing (cleaning, washing, crushing, remove oversize or riprap), shrinkage, compaction, overbuild, other uses, waste (diversion ditches, etc.), contamination, areas not mined (used as haul roads, buffers) and interim stockpiling.

[296] In Document 13061 the plaintiff's bid team established an average payload of 25m^3 (banked) per 773 rock truck and assumed a productivity of 124m^3 (banked) per hour for hauling mined gravel to the dam. They assumed an average haul distance of about 2,200m.

[297] The plaintiffs say they arrived at their average haul distance by calculating along a direct line between the centroid of the dam and the centroid of their upstream pit as it was identified in Scenario Three of Document 13063.

[298] However, the valley is not straight but curves which prevents the haul road from being constructed as assumed. As well, as a haul road approached the dam, it would have to approach the dam for one or the other abutment arriving at the embankment at one side so that at least one half of all material placed would have to travel a minimum distance of one half of the length of the dam. Similarly, in the valley itself about one half of the material mined would have to travel for at least the distance of one half of the valley width. None of these extra distances were dealt with in the plaintiff's estimate of haul length. The effect of this omission was to underestimate the length of the actual hauls which would be required on this part of the Embankment Stage II.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[299] A review of Document 13061 shows, however, that the calculations arriving at an average production of 124m^3 were not based on an average haul distance of 2,192m. 2,192m equates to about 7,200 feet. Looking at Document 13061, the plaintiffs indicate that at a haul distance of 7,000 feet, their average production would be 107m^3/hr so their average haul distance for bid purposes clearly was much less than 7,000 feet. (In fact, a production of 124m^3/hr means an average haul distance of only about 1,780m.) Therefore, the haul distance used for calculations was less than the 2,192m stated. This means the plaintiffs underestimated the amount of hauling equipment they would need for the gravel hauls based on haul road and average productivity.

[300] Document 13055 details LePage's calculations regarding the foundation, abutment and spillway excavations. LePage never considered or analyzed the location, type or nature of the material expected in any of these areas nor did he deal with the questions of swelling, shrinkage or possible use. Except for providing for the removal of estimated quantities of topsoil in the areas of the spillway and the south abutment, he assumed that all excavated material was useable and would be used in the construction of the embankment although he had never looked at any test hole logs in any of the impervious works. I would question the following:

(a) LePage's calculations appear to have been taken from various contract documents and indicate some assessment or calculation of quantities for the north abutment, south abutment, spillway and impervious borrow areas. With respect to the downstream foundation excavation, it appears that no specific calculation was done by him.

(b) LePage broke down his excavation calculations into five areas: the north abutment and its foundation, the south abutment and its foundation (closure section), the downstream foundation including the downstream conduit exit excavation, the spillway excavation and finally the impervious borrow area.

(c) LePage arrived, through some calculations at a quantity of excavation in the north abutment and north abutment foundation of 179,883m^3. He similarly arrived through the same sort of calculations at an amount of excavation required from the south abutment and south abutment foundation or closure areas of 448,117m^3. He arrived at a downstream foundation excavation quantity of 25,000m^3 without any apparent calculation.

(d) LePage did not calculate the downstream foundation excavation but merely looked at the contract document approximate quantities for the same three areas (set out in the tender documents for tender comparison purposes) at 663,000m^3 and, after adding, his 179,883m^3 and 448,117m^3 then subtracted 663,000 from that amount and arrived at 25,000m^3 to be remaining for the downstream foundation excavation area (this appears to be an error of 10,000m^3 however it is noteworthy that otherwise the numbers equate exactly to the 663,000). Cameron's testimony on that point indicated that as best he could recollect, two of the items were calculated, the third was arrived at by deducting the 663,000m^3 from the estimated total calculated amounts.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

(e) None of LePage's calculations appear however to have been carried forward to the plaintiff's other estimating work in respect of Embankment Stage II. Other numbers appear to have been used and no comparison or accuracy check appears to have been done among these various different calculations done by others.

(f) This method of deductive calculation is not recommended by texts in respect of estimating heavy civil construction projects nor does it appear to be standard in the industry where all items of actual work are expected to be reviewed, assessed and calculated and where pricings arrived at are derived from actual work expected rather than from assumed quantities.

[301] Yet, in spite of warnings from LePage, Opron relied upon his work in calculating their bid.

[302] Simmonds determined fuel, oil and grease charges for all equipment which he expected to be used on the project.

[303] He also calculated the hourly equipment rental rates which the plaintiff used to cost out their estimate and which formed the basis of the plaintiff's tender insofar as it related to equipment costs.

[304] The following items were allegedly provided for by way of contingency within the plaintiff's estimate rather than having been specifically costed out: the construction and maintenance of haul roads; construction of diversion ditches and river crossings; double handling of overburden in the pervious areas; double handling of reject 2B material; care of water within the pervious borrow areas; double handling of 2B material to the dam; moving top soil and stock piles in the downstream pervious borrow area; conduit exit excavation; diversion ditches upstream of the dam to the conduit; creation of coffer dams; construction of blanket keys; excavation of the downstream pervious borrow area and movement of overburden to the upstream pervious borrow area or to the embankment for disposal; excavation of interim channels from the conduit to the river downstream of the dam and from the spillway to the river and downtime due to weather. All of these activities occurred during Embankment Stage II. In my view, these items should have been costed out.

Mobilization And Commencement Of Construction (1982)

[305] This was the plaintiff's and, for that matter, Hutton's, Cameron's and Simmonds' first comprehensive dam construction job.

[306] The mix of equipment which arrived initially was more expensive than allowed for in the plaintiff's tender.

[307] The plaintiff's initial operations were to set up the camp, create the required lay down and work areas, construct a main haul road to the upstream pervious borrow area and do all of the miscellaneous operations necessary to get the job site into the condition for the commencement of actual embankment construction activities.

[308] It was now determined that once these setup operations were complete (that was expected to take approximately two weeks), the plaintiff would initially commence work on the north abutment and in the north abutment foundation, placing the excavated material from those areas either in the existing waste area or in the upstream berm extension area, as appropriate.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[309] Once excavation of the north abutment foundation and north abutment were completed, the plaintiff planned to go to the downstream foundation excavation area, excavate portions of that area, in turn preparing those areas for the placement of the required granular and thereafter commencing construction of the extension of the downstream berm above the downstream foundation excavation area.

[310] Work commenced in the north abutment foundation area on about August 9, 1982. Neither, prior to that time, nor during the time the plaintiff was working in the north abutment foundation were any concentrated efforts occasioned at water control to assist the plaintiff's forces in excavation of this hole although it was expected from a review of the contract documents and from a review of the conditions observed by Schindell himself during the site visit that water would accumulate in that hole whether through seepage or by run off from the slopes immediately to the north.

[311] As well, work in the north abutment foundation was slower than planned by the plaintiff because conditions had been found to be wetter than that expected by the estimating team when they prepared the plaintiff's estimate. the area got muddier as the excavation got deeper. Rain soaked into the area during the time it was being worked.

[312] The plaintiffs were surprised at the conditions they encountered in the north abutment foundation area. It was much wetter than Hutton had expected. Others were surprised when they encountered what might be classified as fill or slide material.

[313] Hutton had noted that some of the logs indicated possible wetness. However, the plaintiffs, in their review of these various test hole logs during the estimate process, never ascertained the possibility, let alone the likelihood, of water and soil condition problems in the north abutment.

[314] Similarly, with respect to the north abutment foundation and the lower slopes of the north abutment, test hole logs dug after the slide in the north abutment and its repair indicated that in these areas, fill or non-naturally existing material, together with colluvium which had fallen earlier from the slopes, could be expected to be encountered.

[315] During the plaintiff's excavation of the downstream foundation excavation area, they were plagued by equipment breakdowns, poor weather, a lack of water control, non-completion of haul roads and a lack of space to put excavated materials resulting from not getting gravel to those areas quickly enough for backfilling which necessitated the stock piling of some fill materials until more space was available to receive such fill. McCallion, Patry, Stokotelny and Schindell, all of Opron, indicated that rains also made conditions worse in the downstream foundation area as well.

[316] A difficult portion of the downstream foundation excavation area was an area north of the conduit and north of the old oxbow where no Stage I waste material had been placed. The closest test log for that area indicated soft material with a high water level (much too soft for scrapers). When the plaintiff excavated the area, it was very slow work with a dozer pushing material to a hoe. Other test logs on the valley bottom, had they been closely reviewed, would have indicated to contractors of the likelihood of running into soft and weak materials well over optimum moisture content in the flood plain alluvium.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[317] Because of the presence of material which had to be wasted in those areas, the plaintiff was required to obtain additional suitable fill material from the impervious borrow pit. This additional amount had not been considered or costed out, nor had equipment for this operation been provided for in the estimate. (Time, equipment and money would be required to replace the time, equipment and money which were being used to carry the waste from the excavation. The waste area durations would also be longer.)

[318] During the plaintiff's initial operations (haul roads, camp areas and lay down and work areas), the plaintiff used some granular materials excavated from the upstream pervious borrow area. Use of this material reduced the quantities of granular from the upstream pervious borrow area which was available for use for dam construction purposes and consumed some of the 209,000m^3 of excess materials which the plaintiff had estimated as being available in their borrow area. Periodically, throughout the time the plaintiff worked on the PRD, granular resources continued to be used for purposes other than the construction of the embankment. As well, haul roads were constructed through the upstream pervious borrow area without the granular located beneath them having been first excavated. Further granular was not excavated from areas immediately adjacent to the haul roads or to the diversion ditch (where spoil piles existed). All those factors therefore reduced the quantities of granular from the upstream pervious borrow area which were available for use in the dam.

[319] During the initial construction period of August 9 to December 15, 1982, the moisture in the area was as could have been expected by the plaintiff had historical records been reviewed. The plaintiff suffered from weather delays on 24 different days between August 3 and September 30 which coincidentally is the same number of occasions historically one could expect measurable precipitation over the same period.

[320] The plaintiffs, in their estimate, did not cost out excavation of the downstream pervious borrow area, nor did they cost out or provide for the excavation of channels either as an interim or final operation. Similarly, they did not cost out or provide for men or equipment within the estimate to do other required tasks ancillary to excavation of the downstream pervious borrow area.

[321] The plaintiffs choice of equipment for excavating the downstream channels was a hoe and trucks. This was different from that planned in the plaintiff's estimate for the excavation of areas along the valley bottom in close proximity to the embankment. At that time, the plaintiff's estimate team saw no problem with those areas and envisaged them as a bulk materials handling job at bulk excavation production rates with rubber tired scrappers. (By comparison, the plaintiff's choice of equipment for removing overburden from the valley bottom in the upstream pervious borrow area was a combination of twin-engine, rubbertired scrappers and back hoes at relatively high production rates).

Opron's Approach To Work

[322] The evidence establishes that Opron planned to begin work in the north abutment and the downstream foundation areas virtually concurrently. Progress in the north abutment was dependent on progress in the downstream foundation. The north abutment was critical to the rest of the project. Until the north abutment was completed, no mass filling or work could begin on the main embankment.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[323] The work in the south abutment and the spillway could not begin in earnest until the main embankment was ready to receive the material which was to have been excavated from those two areas.

[324] The impervious zones and pervious zones of the embankment had to be constructed concurrently. This meant that the production rates from the various impervious excavations had to be matched to those from the pervious borrow area. Progress on the impervious excavation and fill was, therefore, dependent on progress in the pervious borrow areas.

[325] The first critical area of impervious work on the project was the north abutment. The contract specifications dictated, as noted above, that the foundation of the north abutment had to be excavated and backfilled before any excavation of a substantial or sustained nature could begin from the impervious borrow pit.

[326] Opron planned to place the balance of the material into the downstream foundation area after it was made available to accept excavated material. Opron planned to start the downstream foundation excavation at the south end and proceed towards the conduit. North of the conduit the area was occupied by another contractor, Stuart Olson. Based on the contract representations, Opron expected that the material from the downstream foundation area would be suitable for Zone 4 and the excavation could be performed with a conventional scraper operation. Opron intended to perform the excavation and placement of the first layer of pervious fill in sections. When the downstream foundation excavation was complete to the conduit, it would then be available to accept the balance of the material excavated from the north abutment.

[327] A combination of the upstream Zone 4 berm extension and the downstream foundation area provided sufficient area for the Zone 4 material coming from both the downstream foundation and the north abutment. Consequently it would not be necessary to temporarily stockpile usable Zone 4 material for later re-excavation and placement.

[328] The evidence at trial was, and I accept, that the timely excavation and backfill of both the north abutment and the downstream foundation areas was critical to the work to be performed in the first year.

[329] Upon completion of the north abutment, large scale excavation and hauling operations from both the pervious and impervious borrow pits could begin. When the construction of the embankment proper had begun and Stuart Olson had completed its contract, Opron planned to divert the river thus allowing access to the south abutment and Spillway sections of the project. These areas would be excavated and the material placed into the embankment. It was only after the main embankment was available to Opron (which in turn required that the north abutment be complete) that the work on the south abutment and spillway could begin. Until the embankment was available for mass fill operations, there was no location for Opron to place the material excavated from the south abutment and the spillway excavations.

[330] Opron planned to complete the embankment to elevation 688 during the first construction season. It can be seen on Drawing 17 of 28 that at this elevation, the design of the embankment changed significantly. The Zone 4 berms stopped at that elevation and a large portion of the impervious zones in the upstream half of the embankment changed to pervious, Zone 2A. The proportion of dirt to gravel changed significantly at this level from more impervious to more pervious proportionately. A significant change in the equipment crews would be required at this level to change the emphasis of the excavation from impervious to pervious.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001733

[331] When Opron began the excavation of the north abutment foundation area, it immediately encountered excessively soft and wet materials, consisting of clays and organic material. Frozen material was encountered as well as logs and similar organic debris. In the foundation portion of the north abutment, this material extended from the level at which Opron began work down to the clay till level at which Opron's excavation was complete. The production rates achieved by Opron's equipment were lower than the productivity rates upon which Opron had based its estimate. This dramatically reduced production caused a significant increase in the amount of time required to excavate the north abutment.

[332] Opron witnesses Cameron, McCallion, Schindell, Hutton, P. Patry and G. Patry all described the conditions in the encountered in the north abutment. The conditions were extremely soft and wet, with organic materials, including topsoil and parts of trees and logs. All of Opron's witnesses recalled some amounts of frozen material present in the north abutment.

[333] Inspectors called for Alberta Environment, particularly Jordan and O'Donnell, also provided evidence of the conditions encountered by Opron in the north abutment. O'Donnell acknowledged that the material in the north abutment was soft and wet and there was organic material present. O'Donnell testified that, because of the nature of the material in the base of the north abutment, Opron's attempts to use its scrapers there proved to be ineffective.

[334] Opron attempted to excavate material from the downstream foundation area on August 13, 1982. Immediately upon commencing operations, a D9 bulldozer sent to work in that area became stuck. The conditions experienced on that day were recorded in Alberta Environment's inspector's diaries, "Started excavating D/S berm extension [downstream foundation area] and hauling to u/s b.e. [upstream berm extension]. Discontinued due to v. wet conditions." Opron was unable to proceed and so temporarily suspended work in that area until a backhoe was brought to site. Opron next worked in the downstream foundation area August 20, 1982. Throughout the downstream foundation area Opron encountered widespread waste material, saturated organic debris, logs and stumps, the nature of which made it impossible for Opron to excavate this area with the scraper equipment it had initially planned.

[335] The conditions were described by Opron's witnesses, Cameron, Schindell, McCallion, Stokotelny, Hutton, G. Patry and P. Patry, as exceedingly poor and unsuitable for the conventional scraper operation that Opron had planned on and priced for during the estimate. The conditions in the downstream foundation area are graphically described, occasionally in the vernacular, in numerous entries in Alberta Environment's inspectors diaries. Alberta Environment's witnesses Ruttan, Andrew, O'Donnell and Jordan all confirmed the nature of the material described by Opron's witnesses.

[336] The nature of the materials encountered and the difficulties experienced in excavating those materials, in both the north abutment and the downstream foundation areas, necessitated Opron bringing to the job site equipment that was different from and in addition to that which had been planned. In response to the conditions encountered, Opron was also required to alter its method of excavation from a conventional scraper operation to a more expensive and slower method using a backhoe to load scrapers and trucks.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[337] As a further consequence of the difficult ground conditions, and the large amounts of waste material excavated from these areas, additional backup equipment was required to support the production equipment.

[338] The nature of the material encountered in the downstream foundation area made the excavation operation slower. It also necessitated the use of an additional piece of equipment, a backhoe, to load the scrapers, rather than the conventional push loading or self loading method. Additional backup support equipment was required to assist the scrapers throughout the operation.

[339] I find that the nature of the material encountered in the downstream foundation area disrupted planned production to such an extent that the work took substantially longer than planned. As a result, the downstream foundation area, which Opron had planned to use as the location for the placement of fill materials excavated from the north abutment, did not become wholly available until September 20, 1982, a delay of approximately four weeks.

[340] The effect on the progress of the work in the north abutment, already slower than planned as a result of the nature of the material, resulting from the conditions in the downstream foundation is apparent and obvious. Excavation from the north abutment was further disrupted and delayed because the downstream foundation area had not become available as a location to place material.

Granular Mining And Losses

[341] When any subsurface deposit is mined, losses are incurred in various stages of the mining process. The magnitude of such losses are dependent on such things as: choice of equipment for mining and hauling; skill of operators; care of operators; use of spotters; nature of material forming the overburden; undulations at the top and the bottom of the seams of the material being sought; nature of the material upon which the material to be mined lay; level of the natural ground water; extent of drainage of natural ground water from the area; extent of excavation under existing water; nature of the interface between the top and bottom edges of the material which is to be mined; whether mining occurs in winter; depth of the deposit; location of the hauls (over the seam or beside the seam); and amount of sloughing occurring from the edges of the pit.

[342] The plaintiff's expert, in his report of December 1983, indicated that assuming a uniform (not variable - one of constant depth) deposit with an average depth of 1.66m he believed that losses of 25% could be expected. (25% of 1.66m is .4m or 16 inches) He stated that in his experience if a variable deposit was encountered, as indicated by the logs in the upstream pervious borrow area, these losses could go higher without extreme care on the part of the excavating contractor.

[343] The plaintiff, in its estimate, provided for a 23% loss from, in their words, "all sources". In their estimate, they expected to excavate and attempt to recover granular from all areas where granular existed with no minimum cut off depth beneath which they would not attempt recovery. (30% mark up of quantities equals a 23% loss factor).

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[344] Mining granular in winter is a difficult operation where one is working in frozen conditions with a high water table. It is slower and more costly. Extra efforts are required in the stripping of overburden because the overburden often has to be ripped before it can be removed. So too extra efforts are required in the granular for the same reason.

[345] During winter mining, losses at the top and bottom of the interface between both the overburden and till on one hand and the gravel on the other are also more extensive because of the various layers freezing to each other. In practice little gravel is usually recovered (for a variety of reasons) from below the natural ground water level in these conditions. As well, wet granular sticks to equipment when it freezes and causes hauling and excavation difficulties requiring additional efforts and smaller loads.

[346] Both Maio and the plaintiffs indicate that they believe they left virtually no unmined granular at the bottom of the seam and lost one or two inches at the top of the seam.

[347] The defendant's various inspectors believed their observations indicated that the plaintiff's losses at the bottom of the seam areas were six or more inches on average.

[348] I find that losses were suffered at both the top and the bottom of the seam, but that the operators, and particularly the Maio crew, did as good a job as could be done. I do not accept that they left six inches of granular at the bottom.

Maio Construction Western Ltd.

[349] Maio's mining plan was to mine strips; first clearing overburden from a strip 150 to 200m long by 80 to 100 feet wide and placing the overburden on each side of the strip. They would strip a number of strips in similar fashion.

[350] The area was then mined and the material previously stripped would be pushed into the mined areas. Now the intervening areas upon which overburden had been placed initially would be stripped, drained and mined and then overburden pushed from where it had been moved, back into the holes thereby levelling the area just mined.

[351] This process would continue up the valley in an alternating strip operation.

[352] Once on the project, Maio found its equipment was constantly breaking down further hindering their construction operations, causing downtime and escalating their costs. In fact, to the end of December, 1982, Maio had incurred, with respect to its gravel operations alone, maintenance, parts and repair (including welding) costs in the amount of about $408,000. They also spent almost $60,000 on equipment rentals. This contrasted with the plaintiff's estimate expectations for the whole of the project for repair and maintenance of $10,000 (exclusive of a mechanic). Also, Maio's haul roads were frequently in bad condition.

[353] By the end of October 1982, Maio had located, stripped, mined and hauled to the embankment sufficient granular to allow the plaintiff to complete its expected and planned for 1982 embankment fill operations (to approximately 688) level for the areas actually constructed by the plaintiff in 1982.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

Maio decided to continue mining, hauling and stockpiling granular for use in the 1983 construction season. Maio believe that winter conditions would assist the company by being easier on its equipment, allowing for better haul roads and requiring less water control efforts.

[354] Despite the large increase in its productive capability, Maio Construction was unable to meet the demand for pervious borrow material imposed by Opron's increased equipment fleet. They couldn't find enough gravel. The design of the dam was such that the proportion of pervious material to impervious material increased as the dam got higher up to elevation 688. This meant that the deficiency in the production of pervious material would be exacerbated as the dam was raised. In recognition of both the problems encountered to date and the fact that those problems would only get worse as the height of the dam approached elevation 688, Opron began to demobilize scrapers after October 16, 1982 and reduced its rate of production to match Maio's.

[355] Maio Construction had approached its operations in the pervious borrow area as it had planned to in the pervious borrow pit development plan which Opron submitted to Alberta Environment. Maio Construction's inability to supply pervious material at a rate matching Opron's impervious production resulted from the fact that the pervious borrow did not exist either in quantity or distribution as represented by the contract documents. This fact was confirmed by Maio. When a comparison is made between Maio Construction's capacity and productivity, this fact is more than borne out. The lack of gravel was also confirmed by Maio Construction's superintendent, Ron Adams and by the foreman and a backhoe operator employed by Maio Construction. I accept the evidence of Maio and his employees in the upstream pervious borrow area. They virtually turned the Paddle River Basin over looking for gravel. They convinced me, and I accept, that the gravel was pocketed, segmented and erratic and was not nearly continuous as described in the contract documents.

The Maio Construction Insolvency

[356] Maio Construction was a financially healthy, successful earthmoving contractor at the time it approached Opron about subcontracting the gravel portion of the Paddle River Stage II project. It planned its operations in reliance upon the representations contained in the contract documents. Over the course of the Paddle River project, Maio Construction suffered enormous financial losses, and was placed into receivership in February of 1983. The losses suffered at Paddle River by Maio were to some extent as a result of the actual conditions encountered, which were at variance with the conditions represented in the contract documents. As a result of the Maio Construction receivership, Opron lost the financial benefits associated with the subcontract of approximately $725,000, became responsible for the pervious borrow work in 1983 and became liable for numerous Public Works claims filed by Maio Construction's creditors.

[357] Maio tendered simply by estimating the hourly capacity of each piece of equipment and multiplying this by an hourly rate. Maio Construction's price was then determined by applying this per cubic metre cost to volume of overburden and gravel anticipated to be excavated. Based on the contract documents, Maio says he estimated on overburden to gravel ratio of approximately .96 to 1.

[358] Exhibit 708 is a comparison of gravel actually excavated to gravel indicated to exist by the contract documents. This indicates that in the area actually excavated by Maio Construction, the quantity of overburden, from an average end area calculation based on the contract documents, was 784,405m^3. The volume of gravel anticipated from the same area was 819,729m^3. In fact only 431,738m^3 of gravel was recovered, meaning that the overburden was 1,172,396. This increased the ratio of overburden to gravel from .96 to 1 to 2.72 to 1. Maio Construction only recovered approximately 50% of the gravel indicated to exist by the contract documents. There are only two possible explanations for the large divergence between what was represented by the contract documents and what was recovered. Either the gravel was not present in the volumes or distribution represented by the contract documents, or it was lost or wasted in the field.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[359] The defendant suggests Maio simply did not remove all the gravel. Having heard the evidence of Maio Construction's personnel and the defendants inspectors, I am satisfied that Maio Construction excavated most of the recoverable gravel.

[360] The magnitude of the difference between the gravel quantity calculated based on the contract documents and the actual quantity encountered is just too great to be explained by hypothetical losses that are not even supported, and certainly are not confirmed, by the evidence of those witnesses who were in the field. The defendant's theory of gravel losses is not borne out by the evidence. I am therefore driven to the conclusion that the gravel did not exist in the area excavated by Maio as indicated by the strip logs contained in the contract documents. This conclusion is supported by Maio's evidence as the hourly capacity of equipment utilized versus the gravel recovered. From the defendant's own records, Maio was able to show that his backhoes worked over 10,000 hours. These backhoes, Maio estimated, had an excavation capacity of approximately 2,000,000m^3. The hourly capacities of these units were confirmed by the expert evidence. In fact only 386,600m^3 of gravel was measured as being excavated by Maio Construction. Even if grossed up to take into account compaction and mining losses, the volume is only 431,738m^3. This indicates that a much higher overburden to gravel ratio was encountered, which I find was because of the erratic gravel distribution, and because there was much less gravel found than indicated by the strip logs. These factors were the cause of the insolvency of Maio Construction.

[361] I was very impressed with Maio and his men. They gave honest evidence. They were there at the scene while things were happening and they saw the problems and they did their very best. I am convinced that Maio Construction has not wasted, lost or left behind any significant amounts of gravel.

[362] Patrick Ma, a geotechnical design engineer in Campbell's Design and Construction Division of Alberta Environment, was instructed at the direction of Thiessen, the project manager, to calculate the quantities of gravel available in the upstream pervious borrow area utilizing the strip logs contained in the contract documents. Ma performed such a calculation using an average end area method and the same criteria which Opron had used in their March claim.

[363] The results of Ma's calculations are recorded in exhibit 340, a memorandum of April 6, 1983 prepared by him. Ma was not called as a witness at trial by the defendants, although he is still in the employ of Alberta Environment. In a discussion portion of his memorandum, Ma cautioned as follows:

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

"The cross sections indicated that a considerable amount of the gravel exists erratically in pockets rather than in uniform, continuous layers. Consequently, it is very difficult to interpret the continuity of the gravel profiles between adjacent test pits and adjoining sections. Therefore, it should be recognized that estimating the volumes using Average End Area calculations on 100 metre interval cross sections is only an approximate approach."

[364] The failure to provide all of the information rendered incomplete and untrue the information that was communicated. The Department told Opron that the Geotechnical Branch estimated 1,142,500m^3 of gravel to exist in a defined area. That figure came from Ma's calculations contained in his memorandum. But Ma did not say that much gravel existed. In fact, he cautioned otherwise because of the erratic nature of the deposit. What was communicated, therefore, was false.

The Pervious Borrow Work

[365] Because gravel was found to be erratic, pocketed and segmented, Opron changed its operation to a hunt and seek method. As a result of insufficient gravel resources in the area, in which Alberta Environment had expressly told Opron there existed 1,142,500m^3 of gravel, Opron was forced to import sand from off site and to excavate gravel from above the 695 contour. In total, Opron recovered approximately 110,000 to 120,000m^3 from the area below 695, approximately 100,000 from the area above 695, and imported 138,000m^3 from off site.

[366] Dee, the plaintiff's project manager in 1983, in a memorandum to Alberta Environment of June 24, 1983, advised that Opron had completed stripping the areas where gravel had been located in the upstream pervious borrow to elevation 695 and estimated having uncovered approximately 100,000m^3 of gravel. Further, Opron had completed a series of 34 test pits in the Borrow Area above elevation 695. The results indicated the area was not a viable pervious borrow area. These test pits had been taken on the northern portion of the upstream pervious borrow above elevation 695. As it turned out, this area had been heavily mined on prior occasions. Despite this information being in the possession of Alberta Environment, Ruttan did not communicate this information to Dee. The fact that Gust had previously indicated to Alberta Environment's consultants that considerable gravel existed south of the river on his lands in an area which was above elevation 695 was also not communicated to Dee. This area was an area that had been pointed out by Gust to Alberta Environment as containing considerable gravel. Subsequently, it turned out that Gust had been correct. As will be reviewed elsewhere, Opron had no way of knowing this from the information provided by the defendant in the contract documents. The strip logs did not indicate that the gravel in this area would be any different than it was represented to be elsewhere in the valley.

The Difference In Performing The Work In A Uniform Deposit As Opposed To An Erratic Deposit

[367] Opron had not bid contemplating this type of gravel deposit. The nature of the operation to which it was forced to resort in 1983 was substantially more costly. The reasons for the increased cost included:

(a) It was virtually impossible to plan an orderly approach to the work not knowing where the next deposit of gravel was going to be found. This contrasted to a planned strip mining operation where the work would have started at the east end of the borrow and proceeded upstream in a westerly direction.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

(b) The search and find operation required additional equipment to test pit ahead.

(c) The overburden was required to be moved a greater distance in order to uncover all the gravel underneath a deposit. In a strip mining operation the gravel was discarded into an excavated strip or beside the area being worked. The backhoe would then proceed to load the gravel.

(d) The search and find method required considerable movement of equipment when a deposit was exhausted rather than the orderly progression of the operation up the valley contemplated in a strip mining operation. Equipment moving from place to place reduced productivity.

(e) Working in a deposit where the amount of gravel could not be determined until it was excavated led to instances where the deposit was exhausted during the night shift, making it virtually impossible to relocate and wasting both time and resources. The lights for night work had to be moved more often and set up and equipment relocated.

(f) In a strip mining operation a haul road can be built as the work progresses with a main spine road built up the middle of the borrow pit under development. In the search and find method the haul road had to be built into each localized deposit and then excavated as the work force retreated. This required the construction of additional haul roads as well as preventing orderly development.

(g) The additional haul road added additional distance and therefore increased the turnaround or cycle time of each truck load.

(h) In a strip mining operation it was contemplated that de-watering would occur through natural drainage primarily through the construction of a diversion channel to the south side of the borrow pit. As the work progressed, the water could be drained naturally into this diversion ditch allowing for excavation to take place in drained material. This limited the amount of de-watering through the use of pumps. In the method necessitated in 1983 by the actual conditions, however, drainage was no longer possible in the natural way since only pockets were being excavated. This required additional pumping and did not allow for the orderly drainage of the material in advance of excavation resulting in a much wetter, hard to handle material being excavated. This increased de-watering costs and decreased productivities. The trafficability problems caused by this development were partially mitigated by use of the drier Davis sand which was impacted to the site commencing in early July, 1983, at the contractor's expense.

[368] As a result of having to abandon the planned strip mining operation and resorting to the search and find method of locating gravel, the contractor's efficiency in the pervious borrow area was decreased, its costs increased and its productivity decreased. Additional and different equipment was required for a longer period of time and additional overheads were incurred.

Tri-Alta

[369] When the plaintiff decided to excavate granular from the Davis Pit (early July), it entered into another arrangement with Tri-Alta respecting this portion of the operation. Under the terms of this arrangement, the plaintiff agreed to pay Tri-Alta $2.20/m^3. This time material was to be measured in situ (in the cut) at the Davis pit.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[370] This situation created problems for the plaintiff and Tri-Alta because now granular was being provided to the embankment from two sources with payment being calculated in two different manners. One in situ; one as compacted on the fill.

[371] The plaintiff had to know how much material placed on the embankment came from each area as the quantity of granular coming from the valley was not being measured. Only the total granular placed on the embankment was calculated and that was on a compacted basis (hence the importance of knowing accurately the amount of granular actually mined from the Davis pit).

[372] The parties also had to know what the losses were in respect of the Davis sand between the in situ quantity loaded on trucks and the quantity of sand measured compacted in place. They could then determine how much granular was hauled from the valley and compacted in the dam.

[373] What the plaintiff did was to quantify the amount of Davis sand which it believed had been mined. It quantified the amount of granular fill placed on the embankment measured, as compacted for the same period and made a straight 100% deduction of the Davis sand quantity from the placed, compacted fill quantity to determine the amount hauled from the valley.

[374] It then paid Tri-Alta using the number generated by this method for valley granular.

[375] Tri-Alta similarly paid, or tried to pay, its truckers on that basis.

[376] Payment for valley granular, by straight deduction, did not account for the losses from the loading and hauling process from Davis to the dam site. It did not account for any losses associated with either stockpiling or reloading and hauling from stockpile to the embankment itself nor for any shrinkage and absorption in the placement and mixing operations (fine grained material filling voids around coarse grained materials).

[377] Tri-Alta felt that such items were required to be considered. The result of these deductions led to severe disruptions on the part of the valley truckers.

[378] Opron hired Tri-Alta under a subcontract in June of 1983 to haul gravel to the dam. Tri-Alta then subcontracted the gravel hauling to numerous independent owner-operator truckers. A dispute arose between Tri-Alta and its truckers which eventually lead to the termination of the Tri-Alta subcontract by Opron on September 11, 1983. There were Public Works Act claims filed by the owner-operator truckers. Many of these claims were solicited by and all were supported by Alberta Environment. The claims were based on demands for payment from the truckers on a basis of $9.45 per load. The truckers' agreements with Tri-Alta were for payment on a cubic metre basis, measured in place in the dam. Tri-Alta's agreement with Opron and Opron's agreement with Alberta Environment were also all based on payment per cubic metre measured in the dam.

[379] Alberta Environment, when it solicited and supported the truckers' claims, knew that total of the truckers' claims would amount to payment for the hauling of approximately 200,000m^3 of gravel during August, 1983. Alberta Environment's own volume calculations for August showed that only approximately 100,000m^3 had been hauled.

[380] Dee testified that during November of

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001741

1983, Opron reached a tentative settlement with the owner-operator truckers based on payment of $6.50 per load. Dee testified that the truckers were subsequently advised by Alberta Environment personnel to reject Opron's offer, and those officials offered to secure for the truckers a higher rate per load. Such interference by officials of Alberta Environment is confirmed by Nicholson's handwritten note, Exhibit 475. That note records a telephone conversation which Nicolson had and states in part:

> "Also said that if in a position to not accept probably wouldn't do any worse if wait & maybe a chance (depending on outcome of meeting and government re-evaluating position) can do better."

[381] Dee recorded in his diary on November 1, 1983 that Nicolson advised him that the truckers should be paid at the rate of $9 per load, regardless of the volumes carried per load. Exhibit 462, also dated November 1, 1983, is a memo to the Minister of the Environment seeking approval for Alberta Environment to pay the owner-operator truckers directly at a rate of $9 per load. Melnychuk, the engineer under the Stage II contract, informed Opron by his letter of November 4, 1983, that Alberta Environment would be paying the truckers directly at a rate which Alberta Environment felt was reasonable.

[382] A meeting was held in the office of the Minister on November 29, 1983. At that meeting Opron was directed to settle with the owner-operator truckers within two days. If Opron failed to do so, Alberta Environment stated that they would pay the truckers directly using Opron's holdback funds. Faced with such an ultimatum, and in view of the experience Opron had with Public Works Claims following the Maio Construction receivership, Opron settled with the truckers. A significant number of those truckers, having been assured by Alberta Environment that their claims would be honoured by Alberta Environment at $9 per load, refused to settle with Opron for less. As a result, Opron was obliged to settle the truckers claims at higher rates than the truckers had agreed with Tri-Alta. One effect of these enforced settlements was that Tri-Alta filed a lawsuit in March of 1984. Throughout 1984 Alberta Environment seized upon that lawsuit as a reason to refuse to release Opron's holdback.

[383] Subsequent to Maio going into receivership, the defendant received notice of third party claims by Maio's creditors. Pursuant to the Public Works Act, the Department paid $466,393.61 into court to satisfy the total amount of claims received. It was left for the court to decide the validity of the claims and direct where payments were to be made. Without backcharges and quantity adjustments, Opron held a sufficient amount of Maio's money to cover the value of the claims and the amounts paid into court.

[384] In due course, the court dealt with and disposed of all of the Maio claims and returned excess monies amounting to about $414,000 to the plaintiff.

Plaintiff's Planning & Construction Operations - 1983

[385] As part of the work the plaintiff did to ready itself for the 1983 construction season, it requested a number of companies to review the contract documents relating to the upstream pervious borrow area and, if interested, provide an estimate for subcontracting the 1983 granular portion of the work. A number subsequently delivered quotations to the plaintiff (after reviewing the contract documents, visiting the site and, if they deemed it necessary, doing their own testing).

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[386] The plaintiff, in light of all information then available to it, determined, on or about the 26th of May, that rather than subcontracting to another, they would excavate the upstream pervious borrow area for the 1983 season with their own forces.

[387] Once this decision was made, P. Spring, a superintendent for the plaintiff, and Dee were directed to design and cost out the plaintiff's 1983 pervious borrow operations. Again, Spring (in the same fashion as he planned the downstream channel excavation in November of 1982), based the plaintiff's intended 1983 operations on his experience and his review of expected conditions working on the Paddle River valley bottom. He chose a different mix of equipment than the plaintiff had originally chosen for the same work. Similarly, he arrived at different expected productions for the equipment because he expected that area to be wet and hard to work in.

[388] The plaintiff in early September formally requested permission to mine granular above the 695 contour and were immediately approved to do so as long as they had a plan in place regarding de-watering and reclaiming the area.

[389] The position of the plaintiff today is that they were of the belief that they could not go beyond the 695 contour until all of the granular had been mined from the area below 695 and further that they had continually been told this by the defendant.

[390] The defendant always insisted that sufficient granular existed within the pervious borrow areas to complete the project. It was viewed that the plaintiff had not excavated the whole of the upstream pervious borrow area below the 695 contour and that many places existed where significant thicknesses of granular remained, for example, underneath spoil piles and at the edges of mined areas. The defendant stated that if the plaintiff wanted, they could go above the 695 contour and provide a plan for their operations there.

[391] About September 30, 1983, although the embankment had not yet reached the design level, movements were detected in the deep foundation of the dam of a nature larger than expected and further construction in elevation was stopped.

[392] At this time, the defendant offered to let the plaintiff out of the contract but the plaintiff wanted to complete it.

[393] Stabilizing activities were then undertaken by the defendant, with the plaintiff's help, through the addition of berms on either side of the structure.

[394] When the plaintiff began placing granular on the embankment in June of 1983, they experienced some difficulties. It was wet and hard to work with. It was difficult to compact and led to trafficability problems which also led to slow operations.

[395] The haul roads that Opron and Maio constructed in the upstream pervious borrow were constructed in areas which had not been mined prior to their construction thereby eliminating all granular located under the roads without first removal of the road itself and the overburden.

[396] While some of the side haul roads may have been removed and granular excavated from beneath them while the plaintiff was involved in Embankment Stage II, the main roads were not mined.

[397] In the summer of 1983, some of the plaintiff's embankment construction operations required the placement of granular in an area around the stilling basin. The placement of material commenced initially in accord with specifications set out in the contract documents. Those construction operations were modified by the plaintiffs. On two occasions slides occurred and the plaintiffs were directed to make repairs by dozing out all material and properly replacing that material. A third slide occurred on July 26, 1983, the repair of which was left for further investigations until the next season. It was finally repaired in August of 1984.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001743

Plaintiff's Bidding Errors

[398] There can be significant differences in the relationship of units of measurement (bank, loose, compacted). The planning of the work that is required to be done on a project as estimated by a contractor, may be based on a different unit of measurement than that used for the payment of the work. As a result, accurate determinations of these relationships is necessary to ensure that the contractor will get paid sufficient monies according to the unit of payment in the contract for all of the actual work activities he is required to perform.

[399] The defendant says the largest singular problem suffered by the plaintiff in respect both to the estimating and construction of Embankment Stage II was the failure to recognize, provide for and give effect to mining losses in their granular operations. This failure affected all aspects of the plaintiff's operations and cost both them and Maio a great deal of money.

[400] Not considering or providing for those mining losses resulted in the following costly errors through the failure to provide sufficient time, men, equipment and monies to allow a variety of necessary extra activities to be done.

(1) Underestimating the amount of stripping to get at the required quantities of gravel. This extra stripping also meant more backfilling was required in the pervious borrow area.

(2) Not providing for additional test pitting ahead of the operation because of the variability of the pit.

(3) Having to mine extra material to account for various mining losses (approximately 300,000m^3 extra of stripping would be required to account for reasonable mining losses in the areas identified by the plaintiff as mineable and correspondingly an additional amount of granular would have to be mined).

(4) The haul roads are now too short. (Even if they were the correct length originally.) Because of longer haul roads alone, production would be slower (again all other things being equal).

(5) Care of Water activities would have to be more extensive and over a much larger area.

[401] These types of losses are significant because as they occurred, the plaintiffs were now required to strip more areas further afield in order to obtain additional gravel to account for the gravel left in mined out areas.

[402] It is important to realize that the defendant is not arguing that excavation losses at the top and bottom of a layer are as a result of poor or careless workmanship, merely that these losses occur, are normal and must be considered when estimating the amount of pervious material that can be recovered from an in situ quantity. They occurred here but were not considered by the plaintiff's estimate or for that matter Maio's estimate.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[403] When the plaintiff prepared its estimate, rather than assess the expected uses and losses of material to ascertain whether mining and hauling 900,000m^3 would allow for completion of the contract, they arbitrarily assumed a 30% mark up on the 691,000m^3 of material they deemed required. This additional amount was originally said to account for processing losses. The plaintiff arrived at this 30% factor because they had experienced a 28% loss on an earlier job in Prentice, Alberta.

[404] Today the plaintiffs argue that they provided for 30% more granular material than they felt they actually needed to account for all losses, contingencies and other uses. Without a minimum mining criteria, it is clear that such provision was not necessarily enough to account for mining losses alone.

[405] The most significant of the other individual losses is the compaction loss, that being the reduction in volume from the gravel in situ in the pervious borrow area to the gravel compacted in the embankment. Neither the plaintiff nor Maio documented what they allowed for a compaction loss at the time they prepared their estimates. Both state they felt 7 to 8% would be an appropriate loss.

Equipment Selection/Productivities

[406] The next significant mistake the plaintiffs made in their estimate is their calculation of productivities in respect of overburden and mining operations being based on bulk excavation rates. That was not appropriate given the need for precision stripping and mining (in order to keep losses down), given the thin layers, given that those layers were expected to be highly variable in depth, and given that one could expect to find a high ground water table. Using the equipment chosen by the plaintiffs also resulted in less than the optimum depth needed for high production purposes. Each backhoe scoop would not be full in one pass.

[407] The plaintiff's next big mistake in estimating the pervious portion of the project was in determining the size of loads expected to be hauled to the structure. The plaintiffs chose a 25m^3 (bank) load of wet gravel, per 773 rock truck. The plaintiff recognized the inaccuracy of such an estimate when they alleged a 20m^3 (bank) load as being appropriate both in their March and December claims. That quantity is of course the same as arrived at by Johnston. He estimated 20m^3 (bank) of wet gravel as being an appropriate and realistic load for a 773 rock truck.

[408] The effect of this mistake meant that the plaintiff required more trucks and more loading equipment which caused lower productivities, longer durations and higher costs none of which were provided for within the plaintiff's estimate.

Care Of Water

[409] The next error made by the plaintiff in respect of their estimate regarding pervious matters was their failure to analyze - although the information was available - and specifically cost out the required de-watering efforts within the pervious borrow area (pumps and hoes as necessary).

[410] Similarly, there was no appreciation of weather and its likely effects upon the expected working conditions within the valley bottom so the plaintiffs failed to properly set the project's expected durations both in respect of granular and impervious materials. This is necessary because a contractor in determining his costs must be able to determine how many actual production hours he can expect from his men and his equipment per day and per month. This is especially important in an area such as Embankment Stage II located on a river valley bottom building a water control structure, working in respect of fine grained materials that lose strength and structure quickly, working with materials that have an affinity for moisture and as a result will cause difficulties with workability long after they have been affected by moisture in the first place.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

Impervious - North Abutment/ Downstream Foundation

[411] A proper analysis of the north abutment, the north and south abutment foundation, and downstream foundation information provided within the contract documents indicated that conventional scraper operation would be slow and costly if it could be done, at times, at all. The test pits also indicated that a significant amount of material would have to be wasted, as some of the material would not be trafficable let alone useable.

[412] With respect to the north abutment, the plaintiff should have concluded from a review of the test holes information that scrapers and push cats while suitable at the top, would cease to work efficiently, at any reasonable production, if at all, as they got lower. Also, this conventional scraper work would be slow and costly. The plaintiff should also have concluded that they would require some hoe work in that area.

[413] They should have also concluded that they could expect seepage, poor drainage and even more problems in inclement weather unless they took specific steps to control water and to dewater the area on a continuing basis.

[414] They should have determined that access was limited. The area was small and confined and, at the best of times, efficiencies and productivities would be low.

[415] With respect to the downstream foundation, they should have concluded from the test hole logs that they needed to excavate at times between 2m and 3m of wet alluvial and colluvial silts, clays or silty sands to get to a clean sand or gravel layer and that based on the low undrained shear strength and consistencies of the materials, more than half would be too soft to handle with scrapers and that a backhoe would be necessary. Again they should have expected that more problems would be created in this work area if it rained or if they did not provide constant water control efforts.

[416] They would not have enough areas available to put the material that they were excavating. They would have to stockpile. These errors would throw off their whole schedule if it was correct in the first place.

[417] The problems of quantities in the north abutment area were compounded even more in that it appears that during the estimate the quantity chosen for use in determining scheduling and duration of excavation operations in the north abutment areas was the quantity of common fill needed to be placed in north abutment area after excavation had taken place. What this meant - again all other things being equal - was that the plaintiff estimated on excavating much less material from the north abutment than actually had to be removed from there. This meant that their scheduling and planning - even if correct in all other respects - would be off in both the north abutment and downstream foundation operations. Neither could be done in the time allotted.

[418] Waste was not considered, quantified,

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

or provided for in any fashion notwithstanding the many notations within the contract documents.

Hard Work/Easy Work

[419] Yet another problem existed in respect of the plaintiff's estimate in this regard. This related to the plaintiff's blending of all dirt work. The easy work was expected to subsidize the hard work. That of course is a contractor's choice and a contractor's risk. He can make great deal of money or he can lose a great deal of money depending upon whether his choice proves to be appropriate.

[420] The main problem with this blending is that the hard work in the foundation excavations of the north abutment, south abutment and the downstream foundation were planned at actually being done at a lower production rate (leaving aside whether these rates were appropriate) but the schedule was based at the higher blended production rate. This meant that the schedule length for this preliminary and critical operation was based on the blended production, not the actual expected production. That of course immediately meant that even with respect to the amounts of excavation expected by the plaintiff, these items would take longer than provided for, throwing out the planned indirect costs since durations were too short. If the amounts of excavation were wrong, this mistake would be compounded and if the chosen productions were also wrong, as they were, the mistake would be compounded even more.

Impervious - Equipment

[421] Schindell indicated with respect to the foundation excavation areas that if he had felt water would be a problem, he would not have chosen scrapers. (Spring, immediately on his arrival, having dealt with other valley bottom work in the downstream channels, recognized the possibility of water problems and the effect that they would have on the materials along the valley bottom. Accordingly, he waited until freeze up in order to get reasonable production. He also used a completely different choice of equipment.) (The experts also indicated that rubber tired scrapers were the wrong choice given the expected conditions in the valley bottom.)

[422] This of course is the next bid error committed by the plaintiff. The plaintiff failed to assess the expected conditions in those areas and to properly choose the appropriate equipment and appropriate productivities given the expected conditions. These conditions included: water seepage, wet silts, clays and sands, weak soils, and possible weather problems in the summer and fall along the river valley bottom. Other significant factors which were not assessed included the presence of fill material in the north abutment slopes and the downstream foundation excavation area; the presence of standing water in the north abutment foundation excavation area (the gap); and the indications of eroded material in the gap having come from the slopes of the north abutment, all followed by the blind assumption that it was good material which other contractors representatives had noted, assumed otherwise and provided for.

Conduit Exit

[423] The next obvious bid error in the plaintiff's excavation operations was their failure to break out and provide for the excavation of the conduit exit. This was work at the lowest elevation on the project, well below the natural ground water level and within clays, silts, wet sands and gravels. The conduit exit was a small area to work in. There was no place on the plaintiff's schedule for that work to be done. No men, equipment, time or costs were set aside for that activity. There was no analysis of the material expected to come out, its possible use, its waste, its hauls, etc. Similarly, there was the wrong choice of equipment in that no hoes were provided.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

Downstream Pervious Borrow - Channels

[424] Another error occurred with respect to the plaintiff's estimate in relation to the downstream channels item.

[425] The contract here is clear. Complete excavation of the downstream pervious borrow area was required. If this was not done before the river was diverted through the conduit, then channels would have to be dug as an interim measure until the area was completely excavated.

[426] The plaintiff in its estimate and in its schedule did not, however, consider or provide time, material, equipment or monies to either excavate the downstream pervious borrow area as a whole or to do any of the required other activities (moving topsoil, stripping overburden, moving existing stockpiles, digging interim channels). Nor did the estimate provide for the use of any material from the downstream pervious borrow area anywhere on the embankment, whether as Zone 4 or Zone 2A or 2B.

[427] Finally, the plaintiff did not provide time, labour, money or equipment to dig permanent channels through the downstream pervious borrow area nor was such activity scheduled in the plaintiff's schedule.

Equipment Estimated Costs

[428] Yet another problem with the plaintiff's estimate transcends both pervious and impervious operations. This relates to the costing out of the plaintiff's equipment and supplies. The plaintiff, through Simmonds, assumed that it could work its machinery 546 productive hours a month (22 hours a day, 6 days a week), priced out its operations accordingly and arrived at its hourly rentals. For every hour the equipment worked under 546 in a month, they were paying rent to the owner but they were not generating the income necessary to pay that rent.

[429] A second problem was that the plaintiff estimated this project on the basis of equipment rentals at one price however actually rented some equipment at a higher price with the result that they were losing money each and every time that piece of equipment worked. For example, a 245 back hoe was rented for $4,000 more per month than originally estimated. The 773 rock trucks cost $2,500 more per month per machine than estimated. The 637's scrapers cost $7,000 more per month per machine than the amount used within the estimate. Each time this equipment worked they also lost money on this basis.

[430] Nor did the plaintiff consider, cost out or provide specifically for haul road construction and maintenance, something everyone accepts as very important on such projects. This, in practice, time and time again caused the plaintiff difficulty, lowering production and slowing or delaying other related activities all, of course, at a cost which was not analyzed and specifically provided for.

[431] Yet another error in the plaintiff's estimate was that it provided $10,000 for small repairs and maintenance. On the job, that amount proved woefully inadequate.

[432] On the question of repairs, the evidence is clear that repairs are routinely necessary whenever equipment is brought to a job and used on the job.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

Indirect Costs

[433] The next significant error with respect to the plaintiff's estimate was in the area of their indirect costs. All of the above deficiencies earlier referred to would significantly lengthen the job. The defendant's evidence is that this job more properly ought to have taken upwards of 37 weeks rather than 25 weeks as planned by the plaintiff. According to the defendant's experts, this would add over $600,000 to the plaintiff's estimate.

[434] The plaintiff estimated the direct cost of pervious fill material to be $3.32/m^3 for zone 2A and $6.82/m^3 for zone 2B. These direct costs were marked up by a factor of 1.314 to cover indirect costs and profit to arrive at the plaintiff's bid price of $4.37/m^3 for zone 2A and $8.97/m^3 for zone 2B. Similarly, they estimated the direct cost of riprap at $36.51/m^3 marked up to cover their direct and indirect costs and profit, to $47.95/m^3. The indirects to be recovered from these items amounted to almost $1.14 million. If this was not recovered from Maio's operation it would have to come from elsewhere.

Scheduling

[435] The schedule which did exist and was created during the bid process was unworkable. Items were scheduled in an order in which they could not be done. Pay or tender items which had to be done were omitted. Nonpay items which also had to be done were not scheduled and would have to be done as part and parcel of a scheduled item. Items estimated at being done at one rate were scheduled at a different rate and so would take either longer or shorter than the time actually provided for.

[436] When other schedules were prepared those schedules were based neither on the original schedule nor on the estimate themselves. Quantities and durations changed as did equipment choice and sequencing of operations in these later schedules.

[437] Without proper planning the north abutment work would take much longer than the plaintiff estimated, at much lower productions with a much higher cost. Especially when one remembers that the downstream foundation excavation area also had to be excavated and backfilled with granular material before much of the common fill could be used, we can see problems such as work stoppages or interim stockpiling are likely to occur in the downstream foundation operations as well. At Paddle River, they did in fact occur.

[438] The plaintiff managed to mitigate some of their losses through on site decisions regarding equipment, work methods, labour hiring practices, and by subcontracting portions of the job, as construction progressed.

[439] During actual construction of the project, there are innumerable references to poor haul roads and poor materials conditions affecting operations. Similarly, throughout the job there are recorded many instances of labour problems, equipment breakdowns, truckers' strikes, operators' wobbles, camp fights, all of which would affect the plaintiff's operations.

[440] Similarly, various reports detail instances of poor borrow pit management, problems during embankment placement and compaction operations, again none of these are considered by the plaintiff as contributing to the difficulties suffered here by them. Finally, many, many reports detail and verify the effect of the weather and the failure to properly manage the job. It is totally unreasonable to place any responsibility on the defendant for such problems. However, costs arising from these things find their way into the plaintiff's claim because they claim for all costs which arose on this project even rental charges for equipment when the equipment was not working.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[441] One could similarly detail the plaintiff's operations for the rest of 1982 and for 1983 to establish that on virtually a daily basis additional costs arose of one sort or another caused by various of the activities of the plaintiff's employees which contributed to the magnitude of their loss. Only one item need be discussed with respect to 1983 in any detail however.

[442] The lack of planning during the estimating and preconstruction portions of the job resulted in such things as equipment arriving on site, and being charged against the job well before it was needed. Similarly, at times required equipment was not on site when it was initially required and other jobs had to be done until that equipment arrived. On other occasions unsuitable equipment was sent to the site and later more appropriate equipment was brought to the site to assist in construction while the less suitable equipment also remained. Finally, on many, many occasions, equipment suffered breakdowns or damage of such a nature to have such equipment out of service or working at much less than full capacity which effectively prevented the plaintiff from - all other things being equal - doing the work planned in the time allotted.

[443] A review of the various contemporary records generated by both the plaintiff and the defendant indicates that virtually every day some equipment was idle for one reason or another. All of this impacted on a job which ignored such a situation. (The plaintiff's use of historicals only dealt with equipment slow downs or breakdowns for small parts of one shift.)

[444] Similarly, the various labour problems suffered by the plaintiff, again on a regular basis, caused a variety of difficulties on the project. There was a high turnover of management staff, supervisory staff and equipment and other operators. Each of these caused disruptions, each of these had some impact on a project and some cost to the project. New workers work slower while learning the job itself, they require more instructions.

[445] Without supervisory staff in appropriate locations, a variety of things can and do occur. Again, there were many instances recorded where equipment was damaged - portions of survey work was done in error requiring work to be redone - material was placed inefficiently and ineffectively. On occasion excavated materials had to be wasted because although excavated it could not be placed because of contamination or wetness, and layering occurred during placement operations, requiring reworking or removal.

[446] Similarly, each management turnover led in part to a different emphasis on what was to be done and how and when. All of these types of things cost this job money. Also, weather conditions adversely affected the job's progress as it related to labour. Employees were occasionally paid show up and travel time on the project but these items had not been provided for in the estimate either.

[447] Perhaps the biggest labour difficulties suffered on this job were the various disruptive union/management actions which occurred. At times these disruptions shut the project down completely; on other occasions merely slowing production and no doubt damaging morale. These problems came to a height in the late fall of 1982 when the plaintiff - presumably at the end of its rope

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

- attempted to dismiss all of its operators and rehire non-union people. Eventually this action was determined to be improper and the plaintiff was directed to rehire its former employees. After about two weeks of activities in these regards, the plaintiff subcontracted out most of the remaining dirt (impervious) work to a third party company. It also led the plaintiff to contract with that third party to pay those employees needed by the plaintiff to do its remaining work in 1982 and 1983.

[448] All of these things severely impacted upon the plaintiff's construction of the project and incurred costs which were not originally planned for.

[449] In 1983, the plaintiff suffered additional labour problems in respect of its granular hauling operations on a number of occasions in the form of both work stoppages, and a shortage of hauling equipment. These things also had a negative impact on the project.

Analysis Of Relevant Information Not Disclosed In The Contract; Alberta Environment's Prior Knowledge Of Geological History And Nature Of Gravel Deposit

[450] What follows is, to some extent, repetitious. However I find the defendant to have been deceitful and to have caused the plaintiff a substantial loss in its operations in the upstream pervious borrow. That finding of deceit is supported here below.

[451] I also find that the defendant was deceitful concerning the buried channel deposits in the downstream foundation excavation area.

[452] I also find that the defendant negligently misrepresented the situation in the north abutment.

[453] Those are very serious findings and I want to make it clear that they are well founded. It will be shown below that despite Alberta Environment's full knowledge of the shortcomings of the Geo-Physi-Con report, TCL relied, with the knowledge of Alberta Environment, exclusively on the Geo-Physi-Con report to confirm an assumption of continuity. That assumption of continuity was the foundation for volume calculations, which in the absence of continuity, were meaningless and wholly unreliable. Those volume calculations permitted the design of the dam to proceed on the erroneous conclusion that there was sufficient gravel material present in the Paddle River valley. TCL's conclusion was based on an erroneous reading of the Geo-Physi-Con report. Alberta Environment knew that TCL had made an error. That erroneous conclusion was incorporated into the representations and warranties contained in the Stage II contract documents. Alberta Environment did nothing to correct that error or mitigate the effects of that error when, during Stage II, Opron suffered the consequences of having relied upon TCL's conclusion.

[454] In exhibit 83, TCL stated categorically that it had assumed continuity in order to make the calculations which resulted in the volumes which it reported. The calculations were said to have been performed by multiplying the average thickness of the material under consideration by the area over which that material extended to arrive at the volume of that material. TCL also stated categorically that the results of the resistivity survey carried out by Geo-Physi-Con confirmed its assumption that the layers of material were continuous between test locations. In exhibit 83, TCL did not refer to, allude to, or imply, anything other than exhibit 68, the Geo-Physi-Con report, as a possible source of confirmation for its assumption of continuity. As noted above, there were no other reports to this time which supported that assumption.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[455] Campbell received and read exhibit 83. Campbell was aware that TCL had stated that their volume calculations were done by multiplying the average thickness of each layer by the area of excavation. Campbell also knew that these calculations relied on an assumption that the layers of material were continuous between the test pits. Campbell agreed that it was basic and fundamental to TCL's assessment of the available gravel that, as stated on page 6 of exhibit 83, the assumption that granular alluvium was not restricted to channel deposits but rather was nearly continuous over the entire valley. Campbell knew that TCL had cited the Geo-Physi-Con resistivity survey as confirmation that the granular alluvium was nearly continuous across the valley. Campbell knew that Geo-Physi-Con could not distinguish between overburden and gravel and also that the resistivity survey was of little assistance with the gravel evaluation.

[456] Ruttan read exhibit 83 prior to the Stage II tenders. He agreed that the coarse alluvium, for which TCL had reported a volume in exhibit 83, was generally the same material defined as pervious borrow (Zone 2A) in the Stage II contract. The volume estimates performed by TCL were communicated to Alberta Environment and subsequently used in the design of the dam. Ruttan knew that to make those volume estimates TCL made an assumption of continuity. TCL used the resistivity survey done by Geo-Physi-Con, exhibit 68, to confirm that assumption. Ruttan testified that he did not think, at the time he read exhibit 83, that the resistivity survey carried out by Geo-Physi-Con could be used to confirm an assumption of continuity used for making gravel calculations.

[457] Thiessen saw exhibit 83, and knew that TCL had calculated the material volumes by multiplying the average depth of the material by the area over which that material extended. Thiessen was also aware that TCL's calculation were done on the assumption that the layers were continuous from test location to test location. Thiessen was aware of the paragraph at the top of page 6 in exhibit 83, where TCL cited the resistivity survey carried out by Geo-Physi-Con, exhibit 68, as confirmation of the assumption of continuity. Thiessen agreed that the Geo-Physi-Con report, exhibit 68, could not be used to confirm an assumption of continuity in the granular alluvium because of the difficulty in distinguishing between overburden and granular.

[458] Nicolson, the defendant's officer, testified that the Geo-Physi-Con report could not be used to confirm an assumption of continuity, because Geo-Physi-Con's survey could not distinguish between the overburden and the granular and consequently told nothing about the nature of the granular deposit. As set out above, Nicolson testified that no sensible consultant would rely on the Geo-Physi-Con report to confirm an assumption of continuity. Nicolson testified in discovery that TCL, in relying on the Geo-Physi-Con survey in exhibit 83, were wrong and made an error. On this point, Nicolson's evidence was in complete agreement with Dr. McRoberts.

[459] One of Alberta Environment's positions, perhaps best explained by the defendant's counsel, is that the geologic conditions which prevailed in the pervious borrow areas of the Stage I contract were different and distinct from those which prevailed in the Stage II areas and therefore the Stage I experience was not applicable to the Stage II contract.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[460] I find no evidence to support the position that the geology in the Stage I pervious borrow areas was so different than that geology which prevailed in the Stage II pervious borrow areas as to render a comparison between the conditions experienced in Stage I to the conditions expected in Stage II meaningless.

[461] Alberta Environment has also suggested that TCL made some sort of error in their volume calculations as set out in the material balance contained in exhibit 119. This error led, according to the defendant, to an artificially high volume of gravel expected.

[462] Even if TCL had made an error in calculating the volumes of gravel expected from the Stage I pervious borrow, which I am not convinced of, the effects of that error would have been offset by the reduction in the gravel volumes. Ruttan agreed that when he prepared his report for the week ending November 12, 1981, (exhibit 139), he still did not believe there was enough gravel in the Stage I pervious borrow area after the gravel volume reductions to satisfy the reduced gravel requirement.

[463] The gravel shortage experienced by Alberta Environment during the Stage I contract was real and did not arise as a result of alleged calculation errors by TCL.

[464] There was some suggestion by Alberta Environment, in particular Ruttan, that the shortfall of gravel experienced during the Stage I contract came about as a result of Ruttan's imposition of some economically based limit on the gravel that the Stage I contractor was instructed to recover. As a consequence of these economic factors imposed by Ruttan, the defendant suggests that the Stage I contractor left behind gravel because the overburden to gravel ratio was too high to be economically viable.

[465] I do not believe that the conditions experienced in the Stage I pervious borrow areas with respect to less gravel and more overburden were related to economic considerations. I find that the conditions reported in the documents, and the conditions admitted to during both discovery and trial by witnesses for Alberta Environment, were the conditions that existed in the Stage I pervious borrow areas. The reported nature of the deposit was not caused by or created by economic considerations. The opposite is true. The economic considerations were caused by the nature of the deposit, which was segmented and not continuous.

Alberta Environment's Determination Of What Information Was To Be Included In The Stage II Tender Documents

[466] Alberta Environment, having investigated the dam site for many years, and having completed the Stage I embankment contract work, provided direction and instruction to TCL in the preparation of the Stage II contract documents. After preparation, the draft documents were forwarded to Alberta Environment for review. There can be no question that the information that was included in the final contract documents, as published for tender, was determined by Alberta Environment.

[467] Alberta Environment chose not to, and did not, include in the Stage II contract documents the information that it had in its possession that concluded that the gravel was erratic, segmented and pocketed, including the TCL report, TCL 81-1, written by Naismith and Harris, the TCL landowner reports, the Mollard reports or the EBA landowner reports. Alberta Environment chose not to, and did not, include in the Stage II contract documents the information that it had in its possession concerning prior mining activities in the pervious borrow area, including the drawing it had prepared outlining some of the specific areas where prior mining had taken place. Alberta Environment chose not to, and did not, disclose information that it had in its possession relating to the work performed by the Stage I contractor in the pervious borrow areas, including the facts that the Stage I contractor had recovered less gravel than anticipated, had encountered a gravel deposit that was erratic and had encountered a higher overburden to gravel ratio than anticipated. The Stage II contract documents did not disclose that the Stage I contract included two payment items for gravel excavation. The Stage II contract documents did not disclose that the design of the dam had been changed to significantly reduce the volume of gravel required, or the reasons for that design change.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[468] Alberta Environment chose not to, and did not, disclose the extent of the work performed by the Stage I contractor in the downstream foundation excavation or in the north abutment. It published the contract documents containing erroneous As Built drawings with respect to these two areas of the work.

[469] I find that the ponded water which was present at the base of the north abutment had the potential to, and did in fact, saturate the loosely placed fill, turning that material into the "sloppy mess" which Opron encountered when they excavated. I find it likely that the water had the same effect on the slide material which was still in place on the slope from the Stage I contract. The presence of organic material, in both the slide and the temporary berm at the toe of the slide, acted as a sponge, soaking up the water and exacerbating an already poor situation. Had the material in that area been native undisturbed material, or had it been properly placed and properly compacted, the effect of the ponded water would have been greatly reduced.

[470] Alberta Environment's decision not to disclose all of the information it had, including information which was inconsistent with the representations made in the contract documents; information with respect to which it made a partial, and misleading, disclosure only; and that which it had a positive duty to disclose; was an active and conscious decision.

[471] During the performance of the contract, Alberta Environment elected to continue to withhold information from Opron. Alberta Environment, despite having been put on notice of the actual conditions in the downstream foundation area, chose to continue its course of nondisclosure with respect to the true and certified As Constructed Stage I drawing, confirming the areas into which waste had been placed. Instead, Alberta Environment closely monitored Opron's operations. Alberta Environment failed to provide Opron with any information concerning the actual conditions in the north abutment and the cause of the same while closely observing and noting Opron's difficulties in that area. Alberta Environment, on being asked specifically for any missing or corrected information in the pervious borrow area, in March of 1983, denied the existence of any information, and withheld the same from Opron throughout the performance of the work.

[472] Despite the wealth of information in the possession of Alberta Environment, there was no mention of any other geotechnical reports, documents or information which related to subsurface conditions contained in that summary.

[473] There was no mention in the "Summary of Sources of Subsurface Information" of either the north abutment or the downstream foundation. Alberta Environment had copious amounts of subsurface information for those two areas. By virtue of its self described role as a summary of sources, this section can only mean there was no additional subsurface information for the north abutment and the downstream foundation area to be disclosed. The only subsurface information in the Alberta Environment's possession for these areas was represented to be that included in the contract documents.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[474] Campbell, at the time he reviewed section 9, the "Summary of Sources of Subsurface Information", considered it would be useful for bidders to know whether the gravel was continuously spread throughout the valley or whether the gravel was segmented, patchy and in pockets. Despite that, Campbell admitted at discovery that he made no suggestion that the Mollard reports, the Tedder report or the EBA report on the Arnold property be disclosed to bidders in the "Summary of Sources of Subsurface Information" provided.

[475] Thiessen, as noted above, also testified that he reviewed the "Summary of Sources of Subsurface Information" contained at page 11 of the Thurber Report. Thiessen agreed that none of the descriptions of sources of subsurface information referred to Mollard's reports, Tedder's report, EBA's reports on the Gust or Arnold properties, the TCL report on Smith or information related to the Stage I contract. Thiessen did not direct anyone at Alberta Environment to include that information in the material issued to the Stage II bidders.

[476] In addition to the reports which Campbell and Thiessen were specifically questioned about during discovery, there were many other reports and documents in the possession of Alberta Environment. These documents, the information they contained and which individuals within Alberta Environment knew of these documents are dealt with in considerable detail above in sections 5.2 to 5.7, inclusive. None of that information was transmitted to the Stage II bidders in the Summary of Sources of Subsurface Information provided.

[477] The Stage II tender documents did not convey to either Johnston or any of the Opron witnesses any understanding that Alberta Environment had in its possession voluminous amounts of subsurface information that would be relevant and important to Stage II bidders. Section 1.13 was not a clear statement that Alberta Environment had additional geotechnical information that would be of interest, or indeed necessary, to the bidding contractors. Sections 8 and 9 from the Thurber Report did, on the other hand, impart to the contractor a clear statement that all of the relevant geotechnical and subsurface information had been provided in the tender documents. The effect of sections 8 and 9 in the Thurber Report on those who prepared bids for this project and gave evidence was to assure them that the information provided in the contract documents was complete and that there was no need for the contractor to look beyond what had been provided.

[478] Alberta Environment decided what to include in the tender documents provided to the Stage II bidders. Had Alberta Environment decided to disclose additional information, a list of the documents they chose to disclose could easily have been inserted into the contract documents to clearly and unambiguously alert the bidding contractors to the existence of the other reports, documents and information which contained subsurface information. I do not accept Alberta Environment's preferred interpretation of section 1.13 with respect to the availability of "other technical reports" to be a disclosure of the existence of sources of subsurface information, additional to those disclosed in section 8 and in the "Summary of Sources of Subsurface Information" included in section 9 of the Thurber Report.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

What Was Not Included And Exhibit 153

[479] Ruttan testified that he prepared exhibit 153 at sometime prior to the site visit of June 9, 1982. Exhibit 153 is a partial listing of some of the reports that were in Alberta Environment's possession. Ruttan testified he discussed the preparation of this list with Nicolson. Ruttan testified that he had not thoroughly read all of the reports listed on exhibit 153, but he agreed he would have looked at them. Ruttan agreed that exhibit 153 was not included in the contract.

[480] Ruttan conducted the site visit and it was Ruttan who prepared exhibit 187, the multi-page information package that was handed out to the contractors who attended the site visit. Ruttan agreed that exhibit 153, his single page list of reports, was neither referred to at the site visit nor included in the information package provided to bidders who attended the site visit. Ruttan agreed that exhibit 153 was not mailed to the contractors in the addendum that was issued June 14, 1982.

[481] If Ruttan had, as he testified, prepared exhibit 153, a question arises about the purpose for which this list was created. Ruttan had ample opportunity to provide exhibit 153 to the bidding contractors. Ruttan gave other suggestions and directions with respect to payment terms and specification changes that were incorporated in the Stage II contract. Ruttan chose not to do this with exhibit 153. Ruttan could have included this single page list into the multi-page information package (exhibit 187) which he himself prepared and provided to the bidders who attended Ruttan's site tour. It must be remembered [they] only had four weeks, extended to five to prepare their bids. They had to rely on the defendants.

[482] The evidence of the Opron employees who attended the site visit is consistent. Cameron testified that none of the reports listed on exhibit 153 were provided to the bidders at the site visit, nor were the bidders told that any of those reports were available. During cross-examination, Cameron stated that he did not recall Ruttan advising the bidding contractors that other reports and information were available for review, although I believe it was mentioned. Hutton testified that neither exhibit 153 nor any of the documents listed in exhibit 153 were handed out at the site. Schindell did not recall anyone from Alberta Environment mentioning that there were other reports or documents available for review.

Further Instances Of Nondisclosure

[483] The tenders closed on June 29, 1982. Opron was the low bidder. On July 14, 1982, prior to the contract being awarded to Opron, Thiessen met with Hutton at Opron's offices. During this meeting, Thiessen did not tell Hutton that Alberta Environment had in its possession reports from Dr. Mollard. Thiessen did not tell Hutton that EBA had reported to Alberta Environment that the gravel was segmented and in isolated pockets. Thiessen did not tell Hutton that Alberta Environment had reports which described the gravel in the Paddle River valley as existing in thin layers and patches. Thiessen did not tell Hutton that there had been a shortage of gravel in the Stage I borrow areas, or that those shortages had caused the Stage I design to be changed to reduce the required volume of gravel.

[484] By the time of this meeting, Thiessen

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

was aware of most, if not all, of the reports and information which Alberta Environment had in its possession related to the pervious borrow, as well as the downstream foundation and the north abutment work that was carried out during Stage I. Thiessen testified that he had reviewed the Summary of Sources of Subsurface Information provided to Opron in the Thurber Report, TCL 82-14. Thiessen knew that summary did not disclose the information in the possession of Alberta Environment and was therefore both incomplete and wrong.

[485] Throughout the course of the work, as is shown in other sections, Alberta Environment maintained the veil of secrecy and did not disclose information which it had to Opron. Two incidents of particular note occurred. The first related to the downstream foundation after Opron had advised Alberta Environment in a memorandum that the conditions encountered in the downstream foundation area were not as had been illustrated by the tender documents. Alberta Environment generally, and Ruttan specifically, did not disclose to Opron the Certified As Constructed drawing which showed the old channels filled with waste. Ruttan did not disclose the survey information he had which showed exactly how much material had been buried, and where.

[486] The second incident of note relates to Opron's claim submitted to Alberta Environment in March of 1983. The covering letter to that claim referred to Special Provision 9, subsection 6 which directed that the contractor could not proceed with the work until missing or omitted information had been provided by Alberta Environment. Alberta Environment's response to the plaintiff's claim, in Ruttan's April 22, 1983 letter, was in part:

> "Therefore there is no corrected or missing information to be provided."

[487] The issue of what documents were made available to Opron during the tender period and what documents were provided to Opron by Alberta Environment was also addressed in a memorandum of September 1, 1983 from Melnychuk to the Honourable Fred Bradley, then Minister of the Environment. Thiessen admitted that he drafted the memorandum for Melnychuk. That memorandum stated:

> "As well, numerous engineering reports on these borrow areas [pervious] were made available for viewing by prospective tenderers during the tender period. A copy of these reports have since been provided to Opron." (note added)

[488] Alberta Environment did not inform the bidders of the existence of those numerous engineering reports. Alberta Environment did not advise prospective bidders that it had numerous engineering reports in its possession which described the conditions in the pervious borrow pit differently than had been described in the Thurber Report provided to contract bidders.

[489] Thiessen, at the time he drafted this memorandum, knew that Alberta Environment had in its possession geotechnical reports that contained information different than that provided to Opron in the tender documents. Thiessen admitted that Mr. Bradley had never been informed of that.

[490] The second sentence of that extract is of some considerable interest. To this time Alberta Environment had provided Opron only with a copy of the Gust and Becker landowner reports, which were provided to Cameron under copy of a letter dated on June 6, 1983. Cameron testified that he had learned of the existence of these reports from the landowners and had requested firstly from Brittain and then Ruttan that copies of the reports for Gust and Becker be provided. Cameron also testified that Alberta Environment did not advise him at that time or ever of the existence of exhibit 153 or the reports that were contained on that exhibit.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001757

[491] Thiessen testified at trial that he did not know what reports had been provided to Opron. Thiessen also testified that he did not know whether the reports that were provided to Opron were the reports which had been available for viewing during the tender period. Thiessen had testified earlier during his examination for discovery that the reports Alberta Environment had provided to Opron were the reports which were available for viewing during the tender period.

The Law

I. Actionable Misrepresentation And Actionable Nondisclosure

A. Misrepresentation Generally

[492] In order to determine whether the defendant is liable in tort or contract, I must first consider the law of actionable misrepresentation and actionable nondisclosure.

[493] Spencer-Bower and Turner, in The Law of Actionable Misrepresentation (3rd Ed. 1974), at p. 3, define a representation:

> "[it] is a statement made by, or on behalf of, one person ... to, or with the intention that it shall come to the notice of, another person ... which relates, by way of affirmation, denial, description, or otherwise, to a matter of fact. A 'matter of fact' means either an existing fact or thing, or a past event."

[494] At p. 5 the authors write that a misrepresentation is a representation which, when made, or in the case of a continuing representation, when acted upon by the representee, was false. Falsity is established where there is a substantial discrepancy between it and any material fact which it expressly or impliedly purports to state. A discrepancy is substantial where it would be deemed material by any normal representee in the circumstances of the individual case.

[495] A true statement may also be considered in law as a false representation, as Spencer-Bower and Turner note at p. 6:

> "Where a representation, by reason of the omission therefrom of all reference to qualifying conditions, subject to which alone it would be true, or by reason of the representor's suppression of facts which in the circumstances of the individual case it was his duty to disclose, is rendered a partial, fragmentary, incomplete, or misleading representation of the entirety of the facts to which it relates, it is deemed false, notwithstanding that the statement, or each of the statements, if more than one, made by the representor may be, when taken by itself, literally accurate."

[496] Where, as here, the alleged representations consist of several connected statements in several connected documents, the question to be determined is whether such representations taken as an entirety, not any one particular statement or document, are false or true.

B. Express Statements In The Tender Documents

(i) Express Statements Of Fact

[497] An express representation is made either in writing or orally, whereas an implied representation is implied either from an express statement or from acts or conduct: Spencer-Bower and Turner, supra, at p. 6.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[498] For an express misstatement to be actionable in deceit, something more is required beyond the mere representation of fact which turned out to be false, and which was relied upon by the representee. For deceit, dishonesty is required. For it to sound in negligence, it must have been made in the context of a special relationship giving rise to a duty of care.

[499] Express representations of fact can be found in plans and drawings, as in Pearson (S.) & Son Ltd. v. Dublin Corp., [1987] A.C. 351 (H.L.), where the engineers retained by a public authority had prepared drawings which showed that a particular critical wall described as "the backbone of the scheme" ran to a certain depth when in fact it did not, and the engineers had no knowledge or reason to believe that it did. Similarly, in Cardinal Construction Ltd. v. Brockville (City) (1984), 4 C.L.R. 149 (Ont. H.C.J.), a misdescription of a utility installation in a drawing included in a tender package was an actionable misrepresentation.

[500] A statement as to the actual contents of a document is a statement of fact. Spencer-Bower and Turner, supra, at pp. 63-64 note that a misdescription, misreading or mistranslation of such contents to the representee is an actionable misstatement of fact.

[501] Similarly, statements as to the general effect, import or object of a document or any portion of clause thereof, are the same as statements purporting to record or report the actual language used. The only difference is that the one assumes to be a transcript, and the other a summary, version or analysis of the contents of the document. In Arkwright v. Newbold (1881), 17 Ch.D. 301 (C.A.), at p. 318 James, L.J., invoked an apposite example:

> "Supposing you state a thing partially, you may make a false statement as much as if you misstated it altogether. Every word may be true, but if you leave out something which qualifies it, you may make a false statement. For instance, if pretending to set out the report of a surveyor, you set out two passages in his report, and leave out a third passage which qualifies them, that is an actual misstatement."

[502] Thus a summary of a document must fairly represent its contents, including any qualifications to the statements chosen. The representee is entitled to rely on the summary without the necessity of auditing the source information to determine the efficacy and completeness of the summary.

(ii) Implied Representations Embedded In Express Representations

[503] The plaintiff relies on certain representations which it maintains were implicit in the express representations in the tender documents.

[504] The Supreme Court of Canada recently ruled in Queen (D.J.) v. Cognos Inc., [1993] 1 S.C.R. 87; 147 N.R. 169; 60 O.A.C. 1, that there is no compelling reason in principle, authority or policy for the proposition that an implied representation cannot under any circumstance give rise to actionable negligence. Iacobucci, J., stated at p. 131:

> "In my opinion, a flexible approach to this issue is preferable. It is arbitrary and premature to declare as a general rule that nothing less than express or direct representations can succeed under the Hedley Byrne doctrine. Undoubtedly, there will be cases ... where the surrounding circumstances are such that it makes little difference, if any, how one characterizes the manner in which the representation is made, and where it would be unjust to deny recovery simply because the representation relied on is said to be implied rather than express. It is unnecessary for me to set out in detail the circumstances in which so-called implied representations can be enough to sustain an action in tort for negligent misrepresentation. I prefer leaving this task to trial judges dealing with specific factual situations."

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[505] The court found that the implied representation was not only reasonable in the circumstances, but was perhaps the only inference which a reasonable person would have drawn from the direct representations. This was not a situation where many different and conflicting interpretations could reasonably be drawn from a series of direct representations and where the representee advanced the implied meaning most favourable to recovery.

[506] It is thus open to me to find actionable implied misrepresentations, if the evidence shows that a reasonable person in the same circumstances would have drawn the same inference as the plaintiff.

(iii) Statements Of Opinion

[507] In Semkuley and Patterson v. Clay, Bell and Doherty Bros. Realty Ltd. (1982), 39 A.R. 526 (Q.B.), at p. 552, I adopted this passage from Anson, Law of Contracts (24th Ed. 1975), at p. 229:

"It should not be imagined ... that a statement of opinion can never constitute a representation of fact. In one sense it always does so, for it asserts that the opinion is actually held. Also the opinion will usually be based on facts; so the person making the representation impliedly states that he knows facts which justify his opinion. This is especially the case where the situation is such that the representor must know the facts much better than the other party. If it is shown that he never was of that opinion, or failed to investigate the facts which gave rise to it, he may be guilty of a misrepresentation."

[508] In the case at bar, interpretations and opinions given in the tender documents as to the expected common thickness of gravel, its distribution and estimates of the quantity expected to be mined are at issue. The threshold question is whether these opinions and estimates can prima facie be actionable as statements of fact.

[509] In Piggott v. Nesbitt, Thompson & Co., [1941] S.C.R. 520, a statement in a share prospectus in which it was "estimated" that the site for a planned power station had a particular capacity was favourably reported by the company's engineers. The engineering reports did not justify that estimate and so amounted to a misrepresentation; the drafter's indifference to the truth of the estimate made the statements fraudulent.

[510] Cana Construction Co. v. R., [1974] S.C.R. 1159, involved a "grossly inaccurate" estimate in a tender package for a contract for the cost of supply and installation of equipment required under a subcontract. The Supreme Court found at p. 1167 that it was of the utmost importance to the bidder to know the proper amount of the subcontract so that in preparing his own bid he could include an amount for overhead, supervision and profit. Spence, J., on p. 1169 disagreed with the characterization of the estimate as a "suggestion" or "guess" which could not be construed as a warranty that the estimate was correct:

"[T]he statement, in my opinion, was more than the mere usual estimate and was intended to be by the person who made it ... a representation and was accepted as such by a person who had to rely on it and on it alone in making his calculations."

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

The Crown was found to have made the representation by including the estimate in the tender documents. In the circumstances, bidders were entitled to rely on the estimate as being accurate within certain normal limits, generally accepted as being some 10% above or below the estimate.

[511] K.R.M. Construction Ltd. v. British Columbia Railway (1982), 18 C.L.R. 277 (B.C.C.A.), shows facts which may be implicit in a statement of estimated quantity. The estimate of approximate quantities and unit prices was extremely inaccurate. The trial judge accepted expert evidence that the words "estimated" and "approximate" in the construction industry were generally understood to indicate a maximum percentage variation between tender and actual quantities of 20%. The Court of Appeal on p. 282 upheld this conclusion, and also actionable representations of fact implicit in the estimate:

> "[The trial judge] concluded that the way in which the invitation to tender was presented was intended to convey to prospective bidders that sufficient and proper engineering procedures had been followed in arriving at the estimated quantities ... He held that in setting forth this information in the invitation to tender the appellant was representing that it had adequate information available and had used such information to arrive at the approximate quantities contained in the schedules."

[512] Thus there is in principle no impediment to an estimate being actionable as a misrepresentation of fact.

C. Misstatements By Omission

[513] Liability can spring from silence in certain circumstances. In Brownlie v. Campbell (1880), 5 App. Cas. 925 (H.L.), Blackburn, L., observed at p. 950:

> "[W]here there is a duty or an obligation to speak, and a man in breach of that duty or obligation holds his tongue and does not speak, and does not say the thing he was bound to say, if that was done with the intention of inducing the other party to act upon the belief that the reason why he did not speak was because he had nothing to say, I should be inclined myself to hold that that was fraud ..."

[514] The question is when that duty or obligation to speak arises. Two distinct factual situations must be examined in the contractual (and so nonfiduciary) context: when an event occurs in the course of the parties' dealings in relation to the contract which creates a duty of disclosure, and where their relationship itself creates a duty of care. Obviously these fact situations may not be severed from one another in reality.

(i) Did Something Occur During The Negotiations Or Performance Of The Contract To Impose On The Defendant A Duty Of Disclosure?

[515] Duties of disclosure may arise in the course of negotiations from special facts in the particular case, irrespective of the kind of contract contemplated: Spencer-Bower, Turner and Sutton, The Law Relating to Actionable Non-Disclosure (2nd Ed. 1990), at pp. 205-206. Two of those instances are relevant here.

[516] First, where a contracting party says or does something, or something happens which, having regard to that party's previous declarations or acts, requires that party to correct or remove a delusion in the mind of the other party for which he or she is responsible for creating. Secondly, where one party is asked a question by the other in respect of any matter, whereupon a duty is incumbent on the first party, if he or she answers the question at all, to answer it truthfully and fully.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001761

[517] A duty of full disclosure may arise in the course of performance of the contract, where there are fresh acts of reliance upon the original nondisclosure or misrepresentation which the defendant has discovered were untrue. Loewen v. Hanford Homes Ltd., Robinson, Sivertson, E.P. Cooke Real Estate Services Ltd. and Kowalchuk (1983), 23 Man.R.(2d) 131 (Q.B.), illustrates that deceit is complete where this occurs. The plaintiff in that case had relied on a representation that a company was in good financial health in making an investment, which the defendant subsequently discovered was untrue at all material times. The defendant did not disclose the new information, but requested the plaintiff to make a further investment. The plaintiff was given judgment in deceit.

[518] In ascertaining whether it is incumbent upon one party to the negotiations or the contract to make full disclosure, the following four questions provide a helpful focus.

(a) Did An Omission Render The Representations Incorrect?

[519] As a general rule, two contracting parties may remain silent; however, upon saying something there may be an obligation on that party to say more. Spencer-Bower and Turner, supra, states at p. 209:

> "After laying down the general principle that silence is not actionable where there is no duty to disclosure, Lord Eldon, L.C., is careful to add: 'but a very little is sufficient to affect the application of that principle. If a word, if a single word, is dropped which tends to mislead ... the principle will not be allowed to operate.' [quoting from Turner v. Harvey (1821) Jac. 169 at 178] ... Lord Selborne, L.C. ... put the proposition thus: 'inasmuch as a purchaser is (generally speaking) under no antecedent obligation to communicate to his vendor facts which may influence his own conduct or judgment when bargaining for his own interest, no deceit can be implied from his mere silence as to such facts, unless he undertakes or proposes to communicate them. This, however, he may be held to do, if he makes some other communication which, without the addition of those facts would be necessarily, or naturally and probably, misleading.' [quoting from Coakes v. Boswell (1886), 11 App. Cas. 232 at 235-6 (H.L.)]. In short, though the party need not say anything at all, if he does say anything, he must say everything, that is, everything material to the topic in question; by breaking silence, he impliedly 'undertakes' a duty which otherwise the law would not have prescribed." (emphasis added)

[520] The same point was made by the Supreme Court of Canada in Banque Nationale du Canada v. Soucisse, Groulx and Robitaille, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 339; 43 N.R. 283. As noted on p. 351, once a party to a contract disclosed some information to the plaintiff, it assumed a duty to do this completely, "because partial information is misleading information". The bank could not "simply disclose what it was to its advantage to disclose and withhold what was in its interests to conceal".

(b) Did Silence Amount To A Positive Assertion That Certain Facts Did Not Exist, Or Create A False Impression?

[521] In Leeson v. Darlow, [1926] 4 D.L.R. 415 (Ont. C.A.), it was noted on p. 432:

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

> "Active concealment of a fact is equivalent to a positive statement that the fact does not exist. By active concealment is meant any act done with intent to prevent a fact from being discovered; for example, to cover over the defects of an article sold with intent that they shall not be discovered by the buyer has the same effect in law as a statement in words that those defects do not exist."

Silence in these circumstances may actually amount to a positive misstatement, rather than a nondisclosure.

[522] The same holds true where the representor omits essential qualifying or modifying facts. Spencer-Bower and Turner, supra, state at p. 94:

> "To state a thing which is true only with qualifications or additions known to, but studiously withheld by, the representor, is to say the thing which is not. Such a statement is a 'lie', and one of the most dangerous and insidious forms of lie."

Thus a representor cannot purport to summarize another document or report without including all of the qualifications placed by the author upon the statements included in the synopsis: Arkwright, supra.

(c) Did The Defendant Fail To Answer Accurately A Direct Inquiry From The Plaintiff?

[523] Where, in the course of negotiation, one party asks a direct question of the other as to some fact or matter which that other had no obligation to answer yet chooses to do so, the law imposes a duty to answer truthfully, honestly and fully. Any violation of this duty results in a misrepresentation, as an active misstatement: Spencer-Bower and Turner, supra, at pp. 215-217.

(d) Did The Defendant Make Statements With An Honest Belief In Their Truth, And Subsequently Discover They Were False?

[524] Fry, J., in Davies v. London and Provincial Marine Insurance Co. (1878), 8 Ch.D. 469, stated that supervening discovery or events can render a statement retroactively fraudulent if the falsifying information is not then disclosed. He noted at p. 475 that the duty of disclosure arises where

> "one of the negotiating parties has made a statement which is false in fact, but which he believes to be true, and which is material to the contract, and during the course of negotiations he discovers the falsity of that statement, he is under an obligation to correct his erroneous statement ..."

Loewen, supra, is a modern example of the application of this principle.

[525] When the falsifying information is discovered, what was innocent becomes fraudulent, and the nondisclosing party becomes liable in deceit. This was made clear by Blackburn, L., in Brownlie, supra, at p. 950:

> "[W]hen a statement or representation has been made in the bona fide belief that it is true, and the party who has made it afterwards comes to find out that it is untrue, and discovers what he should have said, he can no longer honestly keep up that silence on the subject after that has come to his knowledge, thereby allowing the other party to go on, and still more, inducing him to go on ... upon a statement which was honestly made at the time when it was made, but which he has not now retracted when he has become aware that it can no longer be honestly persevered in. That would be fraud ..."

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001763

[526] This principle has been applied in the context of construction law in Cardinal Construction, supra, where it was held that when the owner and its engineer became aware before tenders were submitted that information in the plans was incorrect, they had a duty to convey that information to bidders because the information provided in the tender documents was intended by the owner to induce bidders to act upon it. Their failure to do so resulted in liability for negligent misrepresentation.

(ii) Did The Owner And Its Engineer Have A Duty To Disclose Certain Information To Tenderers, Arising From The Relationship Between The Parties?

[527] Thus far I have considered the circumstances where some event triggers an obligation to disclose. The law may also place upon a party an obligation to speak from the outset, originating in the nature of the relationship between the parties. If that duty of care is breached, the positive misstatement or nondisclosure may be actionable in deceit or negligence.

[528] The obvious example is a fiduciary relationship, but traditionally others have included contracts uberrimae fidei. Hedley Byrne & Co. v. Heller & Partners Ltd., [1963] 2 All E.R. 575 (H.L.), dismantled the closed categories of relationships to which a duty of disclosure applied. A contemporary Canadian synthesis of the Hedley Byrne principles was recently provided by the Supreme Court at p. 110 of Cognos, supra:

> a) there must be a duty of care based on a "special relationship" between the representor and the representee;
>
> b) the representation in question must be untrue, inaccurate or misleading;
>
> c) the representor must have acted negligently in making the misrepresentation;
>
> d) the representee must have relied, in a reasonable manner, on the negligent misrepresentation; and
>
> e) the reliance must have been detrimental to the representee in the sense that damages resulted.

[529] Cognos makes it clear that nondisclosure in the course of precontractual negotiations may be actionable. In that case, the employer failed to disclose in the course of an employment hiring interview that the project for which the plaintiff was being hired had not yet been approved by senior management. Iacobucci, J., held at pp. 116-117 that it was foreseeable that the representee would rely on the information provided in the course of the interview, and it was reasonable for him to so rely; therefore, the relationship was such that the employer was under a duty to exercise reasonable care and diligence in making representations as to what opportunities the employment contract offered. That duty was not one of full disclosure as to the employer's financial commitment to the project, but rather a duty to give highly relevant information about the nature and the existence of the employment opportunity, to enable the plaintiff to evaluate the risk.

[530] Does a special relationship exist between an owner and its engineer or other technical advisors, and prospective bidders, so as to create an obligation on the owner to disclose all relevant - or at least highly relevant - information in the owner's possession which foreseeably could affect the bidders' assessment of the project and the proposed contract?

[531] The Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Banque de Montreal et autre v. Hydro-Québec et autres, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 554; 138 N.R. 185; 48 Q.A.C. 241 (hereinafter Hydro-Québec) discusses the circumstances where a duty of disclosure arises between a tenderer and bidder in a construction contract.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[532] While the decision is based upon the Civil Code of Lower Canada, its reasoning finds common ground in the common law. The Supreme Court has recently emphasized the benefits of a comparative law approach between the two legal systems in Canada. In Canadian National Railway Co. et al. v. Norsk Pacific Steamship Co. and Tug Jervis Crown et al., [1992] 1 S.C.R. 1021; 137 N.R. 241, the court drew on Quebec's civil law principles in analyzing solutions to the common law's conundrum of the recoverability in tort of pure economic loss. Stevenson, J., commented at p. 1174:

> "[T]his court has the benefit of being the final court of appeal in a country that has two legal traditions: the English common law and the French civil law. Our two legal traditions are independent and should not be confused. Concepts and solutions found in one tradition should not be imposed on the other tradition. But this does not mean that there is no place for comparative law on this court."

[533] It was found that Hydro-Québec had acted fraudulently in withholding critical geotechnical information from contractors at both the tender and the contract stage of a construction contract.

[534] The court outlined a general theory of the duty to inform in a contractual context, as a secondary obligation arising from a primary obligation of good faith between contracting parties. Gonthier, J., set out on pp. 586-587 the main elements of the obligation to inform:

> (1) knowledge of the information, whether actual or presumed, by the party which owes the obligation to inform;
>
> (2) the fact that the information in question is of decisive importance; and
>
> (3) the fact that it is impossible for the party to whom the duty to inform is owed to inform itself, the party to whom the obligation is owed is legitimately relying on the party who is obliged to disclose.

[535] He noted at p. 587 that "the obligation to inform and the duty not to give false information may be seen as two sides of the same coin". The same is found in the common law: once a party in a contractual context has embarked upon imparting information to the other, he or she must ensure that the information is not only accurate, but complete.

[536] The Supreme Court placed construction contracts in the category of "contracts of enterprise" in civil law (analogous to commercial contracts), and expanded upon the obligation to inform for this category of contracts. The elements relevant here are: allocations of risk, the relative expertise of the parties and continuous formation of the contract.

[537] Regarding allocation of risk, the Supreme Court noted that it is recognized that part of the risk assumed by a construction contractor is the responsibility for the nature and conditions of the soil, since it is in a position to assess this risk during the tender process. However, that allocation of risk may be altered by the tender process and the actions of the owner, as explained on p. 591:

> "The obligation to inform is an immediate corollary of the allocation of risk. The party assuming the risk has a duty to become informed about it, as this court held in Corpex, supra at pp. 663-664. However, the other party must not, by action or inaction, contribute to distorting the evaluation of the risk by the party who assumes that risk. In [Groupe Desjardins assurances générales v. Société de récuperation, d'exploitation et de dévelopement forestiers du Québec J.E. 911599 (Que. C.A.)], LeBel, J.A., moreover expressly excepted cases where the owner contributed to the contractor's error ... The relationship between the risk assumed by the contractor and the owner's obligation to inform the contractor, particularly when the information in question is contained in the call for tenders documents, is very close indeed." (emphasis added)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[538] A second element of the duty to inform in a construction project is the relative expertise of the parties. The court noted at p. 591 that in larger construction projects, the owner generally has not insignificant expertise in the field, which it uses in preparing the plans and specifications.

[539] The court in Hydro-Québec held at p. 592:

"The owner's obligation to inform increases with its expertise relative to the contractor's, particularly when it provides information to the contractor which falls within its field of expertise, and that information is incorrect. Although the contractor must check the information provided to it by the owner, it need not necessarily redo in detail the work done by the owner's experts." (emphasis added)

[540] Superiority of knowledge of the owner is not eliminated where the owner relies on the expertise of independent consultants. A representor cannot evade liability by asserting that it was merely repeating the representations of another.

[541] A third characteristic of contracts for larger projects that influences the obligation to inform is the process of continuing change during execution of the contract. The court noted at p. 594:

"Clauses in contracts where the owner reserves the right to make changes during the course of the work ... may lie on the borderline between formation and execution of contracts. Since, in any event, the changes to the contract are no longer within the unilateral will of the owner when they transform the object of the contract, the contractor must at least receive sufficient information to gauge the significance of the changes requested. Accordingly, there is always a certain element of the pre-contractual obligation to inform present when change orders are issued ...

"The obligation to inform therefore retains, throughout the term of a contract for a major project with multiple amendments, the characteristics of the pre-contractual obligation to inform. Thus a relatively high degree of disclosure is required."

[542] These factors from Hydro-Québec are not alien to the common law's obligation to disclosure imposed on an owner in the pre-tender process. The common law has long recognized that the allocation of risk in the contract itself may be altered by pre-contractual dealings between the parties which nullify clauses foisting the risk on the contractor: Pearson, supra; K.R.M. Construction Ltd., supra; TWT Enterprises Ltd. et al. v. Westgreen Developments (North) Ltd. et al., [1991] 3 W.W.R. 90 (Alta. Q.B.), affd. (1992), 127 A.R. 353 (C.A.).

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001766

[543] Further, common law courts also focus on the degree of technicality of the data provided to tenderers by the owner, the lack of opportunity or time for the tenderers to acquire that information themselves, and whether the information was indispensable for tenderers to form a judgment. Common law construction authorities recognize that in most tender processes, those preparing the tender package possess much greater knowledge about the circumstances of the project than do the bidders. This differential in the relative knowledge of the parties favours the imposition of a duty of care on those preparing the tender documents to ensure they are accurate.

[544] Thus, in Cardinal Construction, supra, at pp. 187-188, the court found that there is no practice or understanding in the construction trade that a contractor is always obliged to investigate and verify information supplied by the owner - a point also made in Davie Shipbuilding and Hydro-Québec. It was noted at p. 188ff that only if the information required is not specified, or the documents raise some question as to the correct interpretation of the information necessary to the bid, or the engineer clearly warns the bidder that certain information was not verified and that he or she does not vouch for its accuracy, is the contractor required to conduct further investigation; otherwise, the contractor is entitled to rely on the engineers' and owner's duty to ensure that the information in the tender documents is reasonably correct and complete.

[545] The Supreme Court of Canada recently confirmed that the law reflects the economic reality of the tender process in Edgeworth Construction Ltd. v. Lea (N.D.) & Associates Ltd. (1993), 157 N.R. 241; 32 B.C.A.C. 221; 53 W.A.C. 221 (S.C.C.). At issue was whether a construction contractor, after preparing its bid on the basis of engineering information contained in the tender documents, could sue the engineers for negligent misrepresentation where there was no privity of contract between the contractor and the engineering firm. The court ruled that the engineering firm, but not its individual employees, owed a duty of care to bidders which was not negated by an exclusion clause in the contract with the province. Furthermore, McLachlin, J., stated:

> "It is true that the engineers' work was incorporated in the tender package and thereafter in the contract. This establishes that the representations in the design became the representations of the province. But it does not, without more ... establish the further proposition that when the representations became the representations of the province they ceased to be the representations of the engineers."

[546] The court also rejected the argument that policy reasons dictate that no duty of care should arise. McLachlin, J., wrote that economic efficiency dictated that a duty of care exist:

> "If the engineering firm is correct, then contractors bidding on construction contracts will be obliged to do their own engineering. In the typically short period allowed for the filing of tenders ... the contractor would be obliged, at the very least, to conduct a thorough professional review of the accuracy of the engineering design and information work which in this case took over two years. The task would be difficult, if not impossible. Moreover, each tendering contractor would be obliged to hire its own engineers and repeat a process already undertaken by the owner. The result would be that the engineering for the job would be done not just once, by the engineers hired by the owner, but a number of times. This duplication of effort would doubtless be reflected in higher bid price, and ultimately, a greater cost to the public which ultimately bears the cost of road construction. From an economic point of view, it makes more sense for one engineering firm to do the engineering work, which the contractors in turn are entitled to rely on, absent disclaimers or limitations on the part of the firm. In fact, the short tender period suggests that in reality this is the way the process works; contractors who wish to bid have no choice but to rely on the design and documents prepared by the engineering firm. It is on this basis that they submit their bids and on this basis that the successful bidder enters into the contract." (emphasis added)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001767

[547] Thus, the amount of time the plaintiff had to prepare its tender must be taken into account in determining whether the defendant owed a duty of care to bidders to impart accurate information in the tender documents.

[548] The court in Cabott (Walter) Construction Ltd. v. R. (1974), 44 D.L.R.(3d) 82 (F.C.T.D.), ruled that the Federal Crown owed a duty of care to bidders to make disclosure of the timing of the work to be done under other related contracts on the job site, holding at p. 98:

"I have no difficulty in finding that the relationship between the person who invites tenders on a building contract and those who accept that invitation is such a particular relationship as to impose a duty of care upon that person so as to render actionable an innocent but negligent misrepresentation in the information which he conveys to those whom he intends to act upon it. I am further of the view that, where the information is clearly material and obviously very much in the mind of the party withholding it, as in this instance, the failure to disclose it is a breach of the duty owed."

[549] Similarly, in Brown & Huston Ltd. v. York (Borough) (1986), 17 C.L.R. 192 (Ont. C.A.), the engineers appointed by the City of York owed a duty of care to the tenderers to ensure that the information contained therein was accurate, when they knew that tenderers would rely on it. The city was found vicariously liable for the engineers' negligence.

[550] In Hydro-Québec, supra, the Supreme Court agreed that there was "an onerous obligation to inform" the contractors about the existence of soil conditions which were inconsistent with information in the tender package. The trial judge's finding that Hydro-Quebec had committed fraudulent misrepresentation was upheld.

[551] Thus, a duty of care may lie concurrently on the owner and its engineers in respect of representations included in a tender package, absent effectively worded disclaimer clauses.

D. The Misrepresentation Induced The Representee To Enter The Contract Or Otherwise To Alter Its Position

(i) The Requirement Of Actual Reliance

[552] The onus is on the plaintiff to establish that the representations in the tender documents affected its judgment in submitting its tender and entering the contract.

[553] Knowledge of the untruth of a representation is a complete bar to relief, since in such cases the plaintiff cannot assert that he has been misled by the statement. However, relief will not be withheld on this ground except upon clear proof that the plaintiff possessed actual and complete knowledge of the true facts - actual not constructive, complete not fragmentary. The onus is on the defendant to prove that the plaintiff had unequivocal knowledge of the truth: Furmston, Ed., Cheshire and Fifoot's Law of Contract (11th Ed. 1986), at pp. 264-265.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

(ii) Entitlement Of The Representee To Rely On The Representation

[554] In the torts arising from misrepresentation, the plaintiff must show that he or she was induced thereby to alter his or her position. For breach of contractual warranty, the plaintiff must establish injurious reliance, not to establish liability, but to prove damages.

[555] As a general proposition, there is no requirement on the representee to investigate the truth of the representation, even if sources are available from which he or she can be informed. As Jessel, M.R., stated in Redgrave v. Hurd (1880), 20 Ch.D. 1 (C.A.), on p. 13:

> "If a man is induced to enter into a contract by a false representation it is not a sufficient answer to him to say, 'If you had used due diligence you would have found out that the statement was untrue. You had the means afforded you of discovering its falsity, and did not choose to avail yourself of them.'"

[556] Lieberman, J. (as he then was), applied this principle in Northern & Central Gas Corp. v. Hillcrest Collieries Ltd. et al., [1976] 1 W.W.R. 481 (Alta. T.D.). The court found that records were available to the plaintiff's representative which would have disclosed that the mining operations of the defendant company were not meeting the forecast made prior to the contract being formed. The defendant's officers were aware of this, but never revealed it to the plaintiff. In finding liability in fraud, Lieberman, J., stated at p. 530.

[557] The applicable law is admirably stated in 23 Halsbury's Laws of England (2nd Ed.), pp. 85-86:

> "... nor is it of any avail to establish merely that the representee had such means of knowledge and materials within his reach as would have enabled a person of ordinary business habits and normal intelligence to discover the whole truth, though the representor himself may have supplied those means and materials ... The reason is [that no one can] complain that another has confided in a misrepresentation made, even if innocently, much less if fraudulently, for the purpose of inspiring that very confidence, or plead as an excuse that he whom he has misled was wanting in sagacity or intelligence in not testing the statement by inquiry. The representee never owed any duty to the representor to be circumspect, or active in suspicion; or if he ever did, it was the very office and effect of the representation to relieve him of it." (emphasis added)

His Lordship concluded that the availability of the means of knowledge is not in these circumstances a defence to the action.

[558] Cardinal Construction, supra, holds at p. 170 that those preparing tender documents are not entitled to be vague or imprecise, in the expectation that experienced tenderers will discover the accurate state of affairs:

> "... the documents must be prepared for tender having in mind the average bidder, not the bidder who has special knowledge or experience ... Given the general principle that a bidder is entitled and expected to rely on the tender documents as conveying the best information the engineer can give, it is not good enough in my opinion to provide information that is misleading, incomplete, or inaccurate with the intention that the more experienced or knowledgeable bidder will ferret out the problems from 'clues'. The information should be clear and intelligible to all bidders and in this case it was not." (emphasis added)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

This passage was cited with approval in BG Checo International Ltd. v. British Columbia Hydro & Power Authority, [1990] 3 W.W.R. 690 (B.C.C.A.), at p. 703 and A.B.S. Contracting Ltd. v. Richmond (1988), 27 C.L.R. 113 (B.C.S.C.).

[559] Thus, the common law does not place any onus upon the plaintiff to investigate independently the truth of the representations, as prima facie the plaintiff is entitled to rely upon them.

(iii) Other Inducing Causes

[560] Once it is proved as a fact that the alleged misrepresentation was an inducing cause of the plaintiff entering the contract, the co-existence of other inducing causes - even the plaintiff's own mistake - is irrelevant: Edgington v. Fitzmaurice (1885), 29 Ch.D. 459 (C.A.).

[561] In Arnison v. Smith (1887), 41 Ch.D. 348 (C.A.), Halsbury, L., adopted this statement at p. 369:

> "[I]f the court sees on the face of the statement that it is of such a nature as would induce a person to enter into the contract, the inference is, if he entered into the contract, that he acted on the inducement so held out, unless it is shown that he knew the facts, or that he avowedly did not rely on the statement whether he knew the facts or not."

[562] Reliance upon the misrepresentation is therefore inferred from the very fact that it was made and by its nature was material to the representee's consideration of the contract; the onus then shifts to the representor to prove that there was no such reliance.

E. Conclusions As To Whether There Were Actionable Misrepresentations And Nondisclosures By The Defendant

[563] Applying the facts as I have found them above to the law, I am satisfied that the defendant and its agents have committed actionable misrepresentations and nondisclosures in respect of the three main areas of work in this contract: the pervious borrow, the downstream foundation and the north abutment.

[564] Next, I must decide whether the misrepresentations and nondisclosures were fraudulent or negligent, or constituted a breach of contract. If so, the issue of whether the contract has effectively excluded the defendant's liability to the plaintiff must also be examined.

II Liability For Breach Of Contractual Warranty

[565] In this section, I will review the law with respect to breach of contract.

A. Breach Of Express Terms

[566] The plaintiff submits that the contract contains a number of express terms which singularly, and in some cases collectively, amount to contractual warranties.

[567] In determining the meaning to be ascribed to express contractual terms, I must determine the parties' intention regarding the relevant clauses which the plaintiff argues constitute contractual warranties.

[568] In Fischbach & Moore of Canada Ltd. v. Noranda Mines Ltd. (1978), 84 D.L.R.(3d) 465 (Sask. C.A.), the court considered whether a building contract contained an express term obligating the owner to deliver equipment at such times as to permit the contractor to complete its part of the contract by the completion date. Bayda, J.A., asked at p. 475:

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

> "Does the obligation to make delivery 'as work progresses' or 'from time to time as work progresses', as those phrases are used in the contract ... amount to an express obligation respecting the times for making deliveries of the additional drawings leaving for judicial construction the removal of any ambiguity or equivocation inherent in those phrases? Or, is this the case where those phrases are devoid of any sense, defy construction and leave one in a position of having to imply an obligation as to the times of delivery, if there is to be one (to give business efficacy to the contract and to give expression to a term which the parties intended to form part of the contract but failed to express)?"

[569] At p. 478 he reviewed these terms in the context of the whole contract, and found that the parties must have intended "supply" to impose some time limit consonant with what was reasonable in the light of the various undertakings and covenants in the contract. That requirement was held to be part of the express undertaking, since the contract had expressly negated the implication of terms (a clause not found in the present case).

[570] In construing the various clauses, I may have reference to the whole of the contract and the context in which it was created. As Virtue, J., explained in Qualico Developments Ltd. v. Calgary (City) (1987), 81 A.R. 161; 53 Alta. L.R.(2d) 129 (Q.B.), at p. 138:

> "The meaning of a document or of a particular part of it is to be sought from in the document itself. This does not mean that one must discover the meaning of a particular word or phrase from that word or the words of that phrase alone. The document must be read and interpreted as a whole in order to extract the meaning of any particular part or expression ... Further assistance as to what the parties intended by the words they used can be gained from 'the matrix of facts' in which they were set."

[571] In Bank of British Columbia v. Turbo Resources Ltd. (1983), 46 A.R. 22; 27 Alta. L.R.(2d) 17 (C.A.), Laycraft, J.A. (as he then was), considered the commercial setting in which a contract was made to assist him in ascertaining the intention of the parties from their language. He pointed out this consideration was different from parole evidence of the intention of the parties. He quoted with approval from Wilberforce, L., in Reardon Smith Line Ltd. v. Yngvar Hansen-Tangen, [1976] 1 W.L.R. 989, at pp. 995-996:

> "'[T]he surrounding circumstances' ... can be illustrated but hardly defined. In a commercial contract ... the court should know the commercial purpose of the contract and this is turn presupposes knowledge of the genesis of the transaction, the background, the context, the market in which the parties are operating."

[572] More recently, Lieberman, J.A., said in Amerada Minerals Corp. of Canada Ltd. v. Mesa Petroleum (N.A.) Co. et al., [1987] 1 W.W.R. 107; 73 A.R. 172 (C.A.), at p. 113:

> "In considering the evidence of the experts the learned trial judge reviewed the principles governing the interpretation of agreements. At p. 619 he refers to Odger's Interpretation of Deeds and Other Instruments, wherein the learned author writes at p. 36:

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

'The plain ordinary meaning of the words is to be adopted in construing a document. The subject matter may show, however, that the words have a meaning different from their plain, ordinary or popular meaning, if they are used in connection with the usage of a trade or profession and have thus some special, technical meaning. They may even be used in a special or peculiar sense on a particular occasion if this construction would affect the intention of the parties as collected from the documents.'" (emphasis added)

[573] In ascertaining the intention of the parties, therefore, I must have regard to the wording used in the context of the whole contract and the surrounding circumstances, including the purpose for which the particular clause was inserted.

B. Breach Of Implied Terms

[574] The plaintiff seeks to imply the following two terms into the contract:

"18. In the further alternative, it was an implied term of the contract that there were no facts within the knowledge of the defendant or its agents which had not been disclosed to the plaintiff which were inconsistent with or contradicted the contractual warranties and representations of the fact made by the defendant, as described in paragraphs 7 and 9 herein.

"19. It was a further implied term of the contract that, in accordance with the covenant of good faith and fair dealing implied by law, the information provided by the defendant or its agents in the tender documents forming part of the contract had been furnished in good faith, in the honest and reasonable belief that the said information was complete and accurate and that all material information bearing upon performance of the contract within the possession of the defendant had been provided to the plaintiff."

[575] The plaintiff limits the application of paragraph 19 to a failure to disclose to the plaintiff the possession of material information which was inconsistent with or contradicted the information provided in the tender documents.

[576] The implication of terms into a contract entails a two-step analysis:

1. Is the term sought to be implied inconsistent with or in conflict with any express term or disclaimer clause in the contract: Carman Construction Ltd. v. Canadian Pacific Railway Co. and C.P. Rail (1982), 42 N.R. 147; 136 D.L.R.(2d) 193 (S.C.C.).

2. If there is no such conflict, then is the term properly implied into the contract under one of the following, from Canadian Pacific Hotels Ltd. v. Bank of Montreal (1987), 77 N.R. 161 (S.C.C.):

   a. established custom or usage which amounts to implication on the basis of presumed intention;

   b. necessity, to give business efficacy to a contract, or as otherwise meeting the "officious bystander" test as a term which the parties would say, if questioned, that they had obviously assumed; or

   c. necessity, as legal incidents of a particular class and kind of contract, the nature of which have to be largely determined by implication.

I will address each test in turn.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

(i) Is The Term Sought To Be Implied Inconsistent With Or In Conflict With An Express Contractual Term Or Exclusion Clause?

[577] I must first consider whether any clauses in the contract are a barrier to the terms pleaded in paragraphs 18 and 19 of the Amended Amended Statement of Claim. I will examine the wording of the exculpatory clauses in the contract in greater detail later in this judgment, but at this point I must consider whether they prohibit the implication of these terms.

[578] There are no clauses specifying that the written document constitutes the entire contract, or otherwise prohibiting the implication of terms.

[579] In Catre Industries Ltd., supra, the Alberta Court of Appeal had to consider whether terms implied by the trial judge into a construction contract drafted by the Government of Alberta conflicted with certain exclusion clauses in favour of the government. One implied term was stated at p. 327 to be "to provide soils information of reasonable accuracy or at the very least, information which was not erroneous or misleading to prospective tenderers". The court found that the following two clauses, quoted at p. 325, were inconsistent with this implied term:

> "The information pertaining to the data as shown has been compiled for the use of the Department of Highways. No responsibility will be assumed by the department for the correctness or completeness of the data shown and should any such data be found incorrect or incomplete the contractor will have no claim on that account.
>
> "The bidder is required to investigate and satisfy himself of everything and of every condition affecting the works to be performed and the labour and material to be provided, and it is mutually agreed that submission of a tender shall be conclusive evidence that the bidder has made such investigation." (emphasis added)

[580] The court found at p. 331 that the first disclaimer clause "stated in plain language that the correctness of the information was not guaranteed and that the department was not responsible for its accuracy". There is no equivalent "use" clause in the contract in this case. The second clause was also "inconsistent, and indeed in direct conflict" with the implied term.

[581] Section 1.13 and section 6.3.3 of the contract in this case, and the portion of the Thurber Report entitled "Geotechnical Information for Contract Bidders", do not conflict with the two implied terms pleaded by the plaintiff. Unlike in Catre Industries, the implied terms in this case do not rely upon a guarantee of the accuracy of the information imparted, but merely that the representor does not possess any information contradicting the soils information imparted in the tender documentation. Furthermore, the terms sought to be implied in this case do not constitute a guarantee that the technical information in the contract is "reasonably accurate" (the term sought to be implied in Catre Industries).

[582] Further, no exemption clause addresses whether all of the relevant information in the defendant's possession has been disclosed, so the plaintiff can make its own assessment of the value of the information.

[583] The "investigation" clause quoted above, section 1-2.13, is similar to that in Catre Industries. In my view such a clause does not conflict with an obligation on the owner to disclose relevant information in its possession which contradicts its express representations. Thus section 1-2.13 does not prevent an implied term that such inconsistent information is provided to the plaintiff.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[584] I find, in light of the above, that the terms pleaded in paragraphs 18 and 19 are not inconsistent with or in conflict with any express term or disclaimer clause in the contract.

(ii) Are The Terms Properly Implied Into The Contract Under The Test Of Necessity, To Give Business Efficacy To The Contract?

[585] The Supreme Court of Canada recognized, in Hydro-Québec, supra, and Edgeworth, supra, that business efficacy and economic efficiency in the bidding of this type of construction project dictate that bidders be given critical information on the basis of which they can prepare their tenders in the short time usually afforded them. For this reason there is a general legal principle that, in the absence of a clause forbidding reliance, a bidder is entitled and expected to rely on the tender documents as conveying the best information the owner or its engineer can give.

[586] An implied term that the owner does not possess any information contradicting the information provided in the tender documents lies within the boundaries of this principle.

(iii) Are The Terms Properly Implied Into The Contract Due To Necessity, As Legal Incidents Of The Class Of Construction Contracts?

[587] The plaintiff argues that these implied terms are also a necessary legal incident of this class of contract. To permit an owner such as the government to disclose information which it knows is contradicted by other information in its possession, is to subvert the contract itself.

[588] In considering this argument, I note that these implied terms do not place upon the owner a general legal obligation to provide site information to prospective tenderers. Rather, they require an owner who has already embarked upon the exercise of supplying information to disclose all relevant information in its possession.

[589] Section 1.13 of the contract, section 4.2 of the Thurber Report, as well as the title "Summary of Site Soil Conditions Paddle River Dam - Geotechnical Information for Contract Bidders" and section 1, contrast with the clauses in Catre Industries, quoted above, which expressly state that the tender information had been compiled for the use of the Department of Highways, not the use of bidders, and that the department assumes no responsibility for the completeness or accuracy.

[590] Rather, the wording in these clauses in the contract in issue demonstrates that the defendant expected and intended bidders to rely upon the soil information it furnished for the purpose of preparing a tender. They are not inconsistent with the implied term that the owner did not possess any information which would assist the bidder in evaluating the operation.

[591] Looking at the law governing the interpretation of construction contracts and the express terms of the contract, I find that paragraphs 18 and 19 are implied terms of the contract.

C. Breach Of An Implied Covenant Of Good Faith

[592] Paragraph 19 pleads that a covenant of good faith and fair dealing was implied in the contract.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[593] Principles of good faith in contract law continue to emerge in Canadian cases, traced in both the common and the civil law. Recent pronouncements from the Supreme Court of Canada in cases originating in Quebec to an extent nourish the common law principles.

[594] The Supreme Court has sanctioned an implicit covenant of good faith and fair dealing between contracting parties, based on art. 1024 of the Civil Code:

> "1024 The obligation of a contract extends not only to what is expressed in it, but also to all the consequences which, by equity, usage or law, are incident to the contact, according to its nature."

[595] The wording of art. 1024 does not extend any further than the common law rule that implied terms must be required by established custom or usage, business efficacy or necessity as legal incidents of the contract: Canadian Pacific Hotels, supra.

[596] In Soucisse, supra, the court at pp. 356-357 interpreted art. 1024 as being in keeping with the "axiomatic" principle that it is implied in every agreement that one party owes good faith to the other, both in the manner of stating the agreement and in its performance, "with all the consequences which equity may demand". The ruling that good faith is an implicit, necessary obligation in all contractual relationships was confirmed in Houle v. Banque Nationale du Canada, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 122; 114 N.R. 161; 35 Q.A.C. 161.

[597] In Hydro-Québec, supra, the Supreme Court took the analysis one step further, holding that the general obligation on a contracting party to act reasonably and in good faith implied by art. 1024 entails a secondary obligation of disclosure in "contracts of enterprise" such as major construction contracts. Gonthier, J., remarked at p. 587 that a delicate balance must be maintained between the right of a party to protect its own interests in respect of the contract, and the obligation not to withhold critical information which distorts the other party's evaluation of the contract's risks and benefits.

[598] Thus, the law must not be so protective as to allow contracting parties to relinquish responsibility for the risks they undertake; however, this concern is not seen by the Supreme Court as being inherently inimical to a duty of good faith.

[599] Recently there have been steps toward judicial recognition of an independent doctrine of good faith existing in the common law; for example, International Corona Resources Ltd. v. LAC Minerals Ltd. (1989), 101 N.R. 239; 36 O.A.C. 57; 61 D.L.R.(4th) 14 (S.C.C.); LeMesurier v. Andrus (1986), 12 O.A.C. 299; 54 O.R.(2d) 1 (C.A.); Gateway Realty Ltd. v. Arton Holdings Ltd. and LaHave Developments Ltd. (No. 3) (1991), 106 N.S.R.(2d) 180; 288 A.P.R. 180 (T.D.).

[600] In LAC Minerals, the parties were negotiating a joint mining venture. In the course of these negotiations the plaintiff revealed to the defendant confidential information about test drilling results in property over which it owned the mining rights, which indicated that neighbouring properties were likely to be valuable. On the basis of this information, the defendant blocked the plaintiff's efforts to acquire the neighbouring property, acquired that property itself, and developed a mine on it. All five judges found a breach of confidence. Sopinka, Lamer and McIntyre, JJ., denied the existence of a fiduciary duty, while LaForest and Wilson, JJ., held that the defendant had violated this duty. LaForest, J., couched his finding of a fiduciary obligation upon evidence of "accepted business morality in the mining industry" about the exchange of confidential information. He stated at p. 47:

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001775

> "The institution of bargaining in good faith is one that is worthy of legal protection in those circumstances where that protection accords with the expectations of the parties."

[601] Hawkins, in LAC and the Emerging Obligation to Bargain in Good Faith, [1990] Queen's L.J. 65, discussed at p. 88 an implication of LAC Minerals:

> "After LAC, it will be impossible to say that the doctrine of good faith bargaining forms no part of Canadian law ... The Supreme Court's decision in LAC accords with a long series of cases which makes it clear that the content of the legal obligation to bargain in good faith can be appropriately defined by reference to the accepted moral norms of bargaining behaviour in the industry or circumstances in question. LAC confirms that there is a justifiable legal basis for intervening to protect good faith bargaining when negotiations are serious, when one of the negotiators is at fault, where the innocent party needs protection, and where the innocent negotiator has not assumed the risk of the negotiations failing."

[602] Since LAC Minerals, the doctrine of good faith in contractual relations has gained a firmer foothold, while departing from any starting premise of a fiduciary or quasi-fiduciary relationship.

[603] In Gateway Realty , supra, Kelly, J., of the Supreme Court held that the good faith requirement was applicable to the entire contractual process. An anchor store at Gateway shopping mall vacated, to lease space at a competitor mall owned by the defendants. The store assigned the remaining 17 years of the Gateway lease to the defendants. The lease did not require Gateway's consent to the assignment, but the assignee had to use its "best efforts" to sublease the premises. The defendant let the space remain vacant, refusing to negotiate with department stores that would create competition, and making insignificant efforts to lease to others. The defendants were found to have failed to use their "best efforts" to lease the space. The court held, inter alia, that the defendant had a duty to carry out its lease obligations in good faith, and that it breached that duty.

[604] Kelly, J., found on pp. 191-192 that a good faith obligation in performing a contract is embedded in the common law:

> "The law requires that parties to a contract exercise their rights under that agreement honestly, fairly and in good faith. This standard is breached when a party acts in a bad faith manner in the performance of its rights and obligations under the contract. 'Good faith' conduct is the guide to the manner in which the parties should pursue their mutual contractual objectives. Such conduct is breached when a party acts in 'bad faith' - a conduct that is contrary to community standards of honesty, reasonableness or fairness. The insistence on a good faith requirement in discretionary conduct in contractual formation, performance and enforcement is only the fulfilment of the obligation of the courts to do justice in the resolution of disputes between contending parties."

[605] Kelly, J., referred to LeMesurier, supra, where in an action for damages arising from the sale of residential property, Grange, J.A., stated that "[v]endors and purchasers owe a duty to each other to perform a contract honestly", and that this approach "may be merely an example of an independent doctrine of good faith in contract law based in the performance of contracts".

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[606] What constitutes bad faith was discussed at p. 197:

> "What will constitute bad faith or breach of the conduct described above will depend on the terms of contract and the circumstances of each case. In most cases, bad faith can be said to occur when one party, without reasonable justification, acts in relation to the contracts in a manner where the result would be to substantially nullify the bargained objective or benefit contracted for by the other, or to cause significant harm to the other, contrary to the original purpose and expectation of the parties."

[607] Gateway Realty was extensively reviewed and adopted by Shannon, J., of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta in Mesa Operating Ltd. Partnership v. Amoco Canada Resources Ltd. (1992), 129 A.R. 177 (Q.B.). By agreement, Mesa agreed to sell all of its Canadian oil and gas properties to Dome. As part of the consideration for the sale of its nonproducing properties, Mesa reserved a royalty of 12½% of the gross proceeds realized upon the sale of all petroleum from these properties should they produce.

[608] On one of the properties acquired by Dome, the South Half Section (S½), Dome drilled a successful gas well. Dome purported to pool it with an adjoining property, the North Half Section (N½). It thereafter attributed half of the production from the S½ well to the N½ property. Mesa claimed that the reservoir from which the gas was produced was entirely or substantially under the S½ property sold by Mesa. By proceeding as it did, Mesa claimed that Dome effectively reduced the 12½% royalty to a 6¼% royalty.

[609] Mesa claimed that the S½ property was not properly pooled, or alternatively, was not pooled in good faith.

[610] The court first addressed Mesa's contention that Dome had a fiduciary duty to pool the S½ property with Mesa's interest in mind. Shannon, J., ruled that a fiduciary relationship did not arise, relying on LAC Minerals.

[611] Nevertheless, the absence of a fiduciary relationship did not necessarily absolve Dome from liability. The court addressed on pp. 217-218 whether a duty of good faith governs arm's length contracts:

> "Dome had an obligation to act in good faith towards Mesa, particularly because Dome was in the executory position and Mesa, as a gross royalty holder, was in a passive role relying on Dome for fair treatment.
>
> "In Canada, the test for deciding whether or not the parties have fulfilled the terms of the contract in a good faith manner does not include the need for the plaintiff to show that the defendant intentionally acted in bad faith. The Canadian test is laid out by the Nova Scotia Supreme Court in Gateway Realty Ltd. v. Arton Holdings Ltd. et al. (1991), 106 N.S.R.(2d) 180; 288 A.P.R. 180 (T.D.).
>
> "There the court enunciated the principal that there was an obligation on parties to a contract to act in good faith and that duty limits the exercise of discretion conferred on parties by an agreement. In that case it was held that the common law duty to perform in good faith is breached when a party acts in bad faith, that is, when a party acts in a manner that substantially nullifies the contractual objectives or causes significant harm to the other, contrary to the original purposes or expectations of the parties."

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[612] The court concluded on p. 221 that:

"the knowledge that [Dome] possessed at the time of pooling should have alerted them to their good faith obligation to consult with Mesa. Only then would Mesa have had a reasonable opportunity to reach an equitable agreement with Dome, or alternatively, urge that an application be made ... to resolve the matter. The failure to proceed in that manner constituted a breach of the implied term of the contract obliging Dome to act in good faith."

Thus, Dome's liability rested on the good faith doctrine.

[613] These cases suggest that the control mechanism defining the content of the doctrine of good faith in contractual relations appears to be the reasonable expectations of the parties.

[614] It is clear that the obligation of good faith does not spring solely from a fiduciary or quasi-fiduciary relationship. In LAC Minerals, Gateway Realty and Mesa, the defendant could have unilaterally deprived the plaintiff of the benefits of the contract which the parties had contemplated would enure. Taking advantage of such a position without reasonable justification, and in defiance of the normal expectations of the particular commercial sector in such circumstances, constituted bad faith.

[615] I have already noted that in the construction industry, tenderers reasonably expect that the owner will not, having provided some information, withhold information which could materially affect the prospective tenderers' bids. It is not in the ultimate interests of either party for such information to be withheld, for the consequent delays and cost overruns in the completion of contracts where the other party labours in ignorance can be disastrous.

[616] I conclude that in the circumstances of this case there is a covenant implied by law that the parties will deal fairly and in good faith with one another in the exchange of information. It is reasonable, where the owner or its agents impart critical information in the tender documents which form part of the contract, that there is an implied covenant that such information has been furnished in good faith, in the honest and reasonable belief that it is complete and accurate, with all material information provided, in the sense that there is no inconsistent information within the owner's knowledge bearing upon the tender or the performance of the contract.

[617] In this respect, I find that the law does reflect the reasonable expectations of the parties to the tendering process. Thus, I find that Alberta Environment owed an obligation of good faith and fair dealing to the plaintiff to disclose that it possessed material geotechnical information which was inconsistent with or which contradicted the information which had been provided to the plaintiff in the tender documents.

D. Conclusions As To Liability For Breach Of Contract

[618] I need not inquire into the knowledge of truth or falsity of the representations, nor be concerned with the issue of reliance, when deciding whether a breach of contract has occurred.

[619] The liability of the defendant for breach of express terms of the contract must be determined for each of the three main areas of work. These findings are based on my determinations of fact expressed above.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[620] Concerning the downstream foundation, the existence of buried waste constitutes a breach of express contractual terms. Concerning the north abutment, the existence, nature and extent of the slide also constitutes a breach of express contractual terms. Concerning the upstream pervious borrow, the defendant breached the express warranties and representations regarding the distribution of gravel in this area.

[621] The defendant also breached the implied term as set out in paragraph 18 of the Amended Amended Statement of Claim, looking at the circumstances and information surrounding each of the areas of work. This is due to the facts I found to be within the knowledge of the defendant or its agents which were inconsistent with or which contradicted the contractual representations of fact made by the defendant.

[622] Paragraph 19 correctly claims a breach by the defendant, as the failure to disclose the various material information in its possession outlined above breached the obligation of good faith and fair dealing it owed to the plaintiff, with respect to each of the three areas of work.

III. Alternate Or Concurrent Liability In Tort

[623] Having satisfied myself that there have been actionable misrepresentations and nondisclosures by the defendant which were relied on by the plaintiff, I must consider whether these constitute fraud or negligence, or both, as I have defined those concepts legally. As the plaintiff is suing in both tort and contract, a review of the principles of concurrency is appropriate, before liability is determined.

A. The Principles Governing Concurrency

[624] The Supreme Court of Canada, in Central Trust Co. v. Rafuse and Cordon, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 147; 69 N.R. 321; 75 N.S.R.(2d) 109; 186 A.P.R. 109; 37 C.C.L.T. 117; 42 R.P.R. 161; 31 D.L.R.(4th) 481; 34 B.L.R. 187, unanimously recognized concurrency between contract and tort as a general rule, subject to some exceptions. The principles laid down at p. 149 have general applicability to duties of care created by contract or imposed by the common law:

> "What is undertaken by the contract will indicate the nature of the relationship that gives rise to the common law duty of care, but the nature and scope of the duty ... must not depend on specific obligations or duties created by the express terms of the contract ... The distinction, insofar as the terms of the contract are concerned, is, broadly speaking, between what is to be done and how it is to be done. A [tort] claim cannot [depend] for the nature and scope of the asserted duty of care on the manner in which an obligation or duty has been expressly and specifically defined by the contract. Where the common law duty of care is co-extensive with that which arises as an implied term of the contract it obviously does not depend on the terms of the contract, and there is nothing flowing from contractual intention which would preclude reliance on a concurrent or alternative liability in tort. The same is also true of reliance on a common law duty of care that falls short of a specific obligation or duty imposed by the express terms of a contract.
>
> "A concurrent or alternative liability in tort will not be admitted if its effect would be to permit the plaintiff to circumvent or

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001779

escape a contractual exclusion or limitation of liability for the act or omission that would constitute the tort."

[625] In BG Checo International Ltd. v. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 12; 147 N.R. 81; 20 B.C.A.C. 241; 35 W.A.C. 241, the majority held that a plaintiff can sue in tort where the duty relied upon is also made a contractual duty by an express term of the contract. The court provided more detailed guidance for the application of the principle of concurrency.

"In our view, the general rule emerging from this court's decision in Central Trust v. Rafuse ... is that where a given wrong prima facie supports an action in contract and in tort, the party may sue in either or both, except where the contract indicates that the parties intended to limit or negative the right to sue in tort. This limitation on the general rule of concurrency arises because it is always open to parties to limit or waive the duties which the common law would impose on them for negligence ... The mere fact that the parties have dealt with a matter expressly in their contract does not mean that they intended to exclude the right to sue in tort. It all depends on how they have dealt with it ...

"It is only to the extent that [the parties] private ordering contradicts the tort duty that the tort duty is diminished. The rule is not that one cannot sue in contract and tort where the contract limits or contradicts the tort duty. It is rather that the tort duty, a general duty imputed by the law in all the relevant circumstances, must yield to the parties' superior right to arrange their rights and duties in a different way. Insofar as the tort duty is not contradicted by the contract, it remains intact and may be sued upon." (emphasis added)

[626] The majority described three situations at pp. 28-29 where contract and tort are applied to the same wrong. First, where the contract stipulates a more stringent obligation than the general law of tort would impose. Secondly, where the contract stipulates a lower duty than the law of tort would require in similar circumstances; the contract indicates that the usual liability imposed in tort is not intended to apply, through use of an exemption or exclusion clause. The Supreme Court observed at p. 29 that "[g]enerally, the duty imposed by the law of tort can be nullified only by clear terms".

[627] The third situation where contract and tort are applied to the same wrong is where the contract and tort duties are co-extensive, the contract may expressly or impliedly provide for the same duty as that imposed by common law. The court noted at p. 29 that the obligation under that contract is typically defined by implied terms, and went on to say:

"[T]here is no issue of private ordering as opposed to publicly imposed liability. Whether the action is styled in contract or tort, its source is an objective expectation defined by the courts, of the appropriate obligation and the correlative right."

B. The Tort Of Deceit

[628] The tort of deceit is proved when it is shown that:

(1) A false representation has been made;

(2) dishonestly, that is,

(a) knowingly,

(b) without belief in its truth, or

(c) recklessly, careless whether it be true

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

or false;

(3) with the intention that the representee will rely on the representation; and

(4) the representee has in fact been induced to act upon the representation.

[629] In order to sustain an action in deceit, it is not enough to establish a misrepresentation; there must be proof of fraud: Derry v. Peek (1889), 14 App. Cas. 337 (H.L.). The standard of proof for fraud is the civil burden of proof on a balance of probabilities: Scott v. Creswell, [1975] 3 W.W.R. 193 (Alta. C.A.).

[630] Derry, supra, refined the mental element of knowledge required to establish deceit and expanded on the crucial element of dishonesty. Deceit requires the absence of honest belief by the representor at the material time that the statement was true. Herschell, L., noted at p. 374 that recklessness is an instance of lack of belief, "for one who makes a statement under such circumstances can have no real belief in the truth of what he states".

[631] The honesty of the belief in the truth of what is stated must be assessed on the basis of the subjective state of mind of the representor. In Akerheim v. De Mare, [1959] 3 All E.R. 485 (P.C.), the Privy Council held that the relevant question is not whether the defendant honestly believed the representation to be true in the sense assigned to it by the court on an objective consideration of its truth or falsity, but whether he or she honestly believed the representation to be true in the sense in which he or she understood it, albeit erroneously, when it was made. However, if the meaning placed by the defendant is so far removed from how it would be understood by a reasonable person, so as to make it impossible to believe that the defendant honestly understood it to have this meaning and honestly believed it to be true, then dishonesty is established.

(i) The Documents In Possession Doctrine

[632] The documents in possession doctrine holds that documents which are, or have been, in the possession of a party will generally be admissible against him or her as original evidence to show knowledge of their contents, a connection with or complicity in the transactions to which they relate, or a state of mind with reference thereto: Phipson on Evidence (13th Ed. 1982), para. 21-09.

[633] Mere possession creates a presumption that the possessor had knowledge of the contents, no matter how weak or tenuous the connection between the origin of the document and its possessor, such as unanswered letters - this goes to weight, not admissibility: Ewart, Lomer and Casey, Documentary Evidence in Canada (1984), at p. 233. There is no limit on the type of document which can be tendered under this doctrine.

[634] For possession to constitute the knowledge of a corporation, some responsible official, such as an officer or an employee acting in the course of employment, must be aware of the document's presence on the corporate premises: R. v. Ash-Temple Co. (1949), 93 C.C.C. 267 (Ont. C.A.).

[635] I conclude this doctrine is applicable in the circumstances. Those documents that the plaintiff alleges should have been disclosed must be presumed to have been in the possession, and hence within the knowledge, of the defendant.

(ii) Recklessness

[636] Ever since Derry, supra, courts have distinguished between fraudulent recklessness and negligence. As Fawcus, J., said at p. 200 in K.R.M. Construction, supra, "neither bungling, ineptitude nor gross negligence establishes fraud".

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[637] However, being oblivious to the truth equates with fraud. Chitty on Contracts (25th Ed. 1983), vol. 1, at p. 227 states:

> "The requirement of proof of the absence of honest belief does not, however, mean that the plaintiff must prove the defendant's knowledge of the falsity of the statement. It is enough to establish that the latter suspected that his statement might be inaccurate, or that he neglected to inquire into its accuracy, without proving that he actually knew that it was false."

[638] Courts have frequently applied recklessness in deceit actions. In Edgington, supra, for example, Bowen, J., stated that to make a statement recklessly for the purpose of influencing another is dishonest.

[639] In De Vall v. Gorman, Clancey & Grindley Ltd. (1919), 58 S.C.R. 259, the Supreme Court held at p. 272 that the Alberta Appellate Division had misstated the law in holding that a finding of fact by the trial judge that misrepresentations were "at least made with reckless carelessness as to their truth" failed to meet the test of absence of honest belief necessary for fraud.

[640] In Piggott v. Nesbitt, Thompson & Co., [1941] S.C.R. 520, the frame of mind of the representor of "indifference" as to whether his statements were true or false was sufficient for liability, when the facts were proven to be false.

[641] While the absence of reasonable grounds for the defendant's belief is not determinative of the question, it can provide some evidence of recklessness. In Derry, supra, Herschell, L., acknowledged the evidentiary utility of the absence of reasonable grounds, and said at p. 375:

> "The ground upon which an alleged belief is founded is a most important test of its reality ... [A]lthough means of knowledge are, as was pointed out by Lord Blackburn in Brownlie v. Campbell, a very different thing from knowledge, if I thought that a person making a false statement had shut his eyes to the facts, or purposely abstained from inquiring into them, I should hold that honest belief was absent, and that he was just as fraudulent as if he had knowingly stated that which was false." (emphasis added)

[642] Thus where a real estate agent after a visual inspection represented that land was flat and capable of being ploughed, when in fact it was hilly and unsuitable for cultivation, the court reversed the finding of honest intent based on the defendant's own avowal, holding that recklessness was an appropriate inference from the facts and circumstances, including the undoubtedly falsity of the representations, and the perfunctory inspection of the land by the agent. There were no reasonable grounds whatsoever for his assertions, and his means of knowledge were the best: Davis v. Burt (1910), 3 Sask. L.R. 446 (C.A.).

[643] Rous v. Mitchell, [1991] 1 All E.R. 676 (C.A.), is also helpful. The plaintiff served a notice to quit upon a farm tenant in 1988, the grounds being that the tenant had sublet several cottages on the farm without the plaintiff's permission, in breach of the lease agreement. In fact, in 1985 the plaintiff gave written permission to the defendant tenant to sublet those cottages. The plaintiff had recollected this permission as recently as

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

1987, but testified that in preparing the notice to quit, he had forgotten. The plaintiff's indifference as to the accuracy of the grounds for the alleged breach of the lease, and the fact that he never bothered to read the notice prepared by his solicitors with sufficient care to form a view that it was correct, constituted fraud. It sufficed that he "shut his mind to the true situation" and "he never bothered to think; he impulsively went ahead with an intention to achieve his aims": Rous, supra, at pp. 697, 700.

[644] Therefore, the plaintiff need not prove that Alberta Environment's employees and agents who reviewed the tender package had in their minds, at the time the packages were sent out, their knowledge of other information that was inconsistent with that in the package. It is sufficient proof of recklessness that this other information was actively in their minds at some prior time, and that no steps were taken to review the accuracy and completeness of the tender package.

(iii) Requisite Intent For Fraud

[645] Intention to deceive is the inevitable conclusion where the representor knows the statement he or she is making is false, and expects the representee to rely on it. What is the intent where the representor makes the statement without any belief in its truth, or without caring whether it is false or true?

[646] With recklessness, proof of dishonesty is most likely dependent upon inferences from circumstances. If the evidence establishes dishonest belief respecting the truth of the statement, need the plaintiff also establish an active and deliberate intention to deceive? Or will mere proof of an intention to induce reliance by the representee suffice?

[647] There is ample authority that the motive of the representor is irrelevant; there need be no intention to cheat or injure the representee. Indeed, the representor might even honestly believe that the representee would benefit from the contract, but that would not save him or her from being fraudulent: Derry, supra; Bradford Third Equitable Benefit Building Society v. Borders, [1941] 2 All E.R. 205, at 211 (H.L.); United Motor Finance Co. v. Addison & Co., [1937] 1 All E.R. 425 (P.C.).

[648] Spencer-Bower and Turner, supra, summarized the law on p. 118:

> "[A]lthough fraud necessarily involves an intention on the part of the representor that the representee shall act in the way in which he does eventually act, yet there is no necessity to prove any intention further or more remote than this - and certainly the motive of the representor is quite irrelevant. It is immaterial that the plaintiff may or may not be able to show, for instance, that the representation was made with the intention or motive of damaging the representee, or of benefiting himself, or a third person; or even that it is shown that his intention or motive was possibly even to benefit the representee, but that the scheme went awry. A false representation made without honest belief in its truth will be fraudulent if made with intention that the representee act upon it, even if it be made without any demonstrable motive or intention whatsoever." (emphasis added)

[649] The distinction is between the immediate intention to induce reliance and the ultimate purpose or motive of the defendant, as explained at pp. 481-482 by Bowen, L.J., in Edgington, supra:

> "[I]t is also clear that it is wholly immaterial with what object the lie was told ... but it is material that the defendant should intend that it should be relied on by the person to whom he makes it."

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[650] Redican, supra, dealt with whether the plaintiff must prove intention to deceive. The trial judge had instructed the jury that there must be "deliberate intention to defraud" shown, and refused counsel's request to put recklessness to the jury. The Supreme Court unanimously found a misdirection which warranted a new trial. Duff, J., discussed recklessness at p. 147:

> "The learned trial judge overlooked the settled doctrine ... that an affirmation of fact made for the purpose of influencing people in the transaction of business involves an affirmation of belief in the existence of the fact stated. If there is no belief, if the mind of the proponent has never been applied to the question and if he is in truth consciously ignorant upon the subject of his affirmation there is obviously a false statement and, if made with intent that it shall be acted upon in the way of business in a matter involving his own interests, a fraudulent statement." (emphasis added)

[651] Thus, the requisite intention is to induce reliance. Anglin, J., agreed, discussing at pp. 154, 155, 156 the inherent incompatibility of recklessness with an intention to deceive:

> "[A] new trial must be directed because the issue of fraud was not properly presented to the jury.
>
> "Had the jury been properly instructed upon the distinction between innocent and fraudulent misrepresentation their finding that the misrepresentations had been innocent would, no doubt, cover the ground. But how can that be said in view of the explicit instruction given them that 'the word innocent' is used in law to convey 'not knowingly' and that only a deliberate and intentional lie would justify a finding that the misrepresentations had been fraudulent? ...
>
> "The learned judge distinctly stated his view that intention to deceive was essential and impliedly that a false statement made with reckless carelessness as to its truth or falsehood would not be fraudulent.
>
> "The refusal to put to the jury the question whether Wing's statements were made without caring whether they were true or false coupled with the instruction that, although so made, they were innocent and not fraudulent, unless there was an intention to deceive - to tell a deliberate lie - was clearly misdirection and entitles the defendants to a new trial." (emphasis added)

[652] The above authorities show an intent to induce reliance by the representee is required for recklessness to constitute fraud, rather than an intent to deceive the representee. However, recent dicta suggests that the plaintiff must also establish an intention to deceive.

[653] The most significant case in this respect is BG Checo, supra. The trial judge had found the defendant liable for deceit, based on a false statement in the tender documents that the clearing of the right-of-way was done by others. He found that the evidence indicated that the defendant knew at the time of tendering that the clearing was incomplete, and was aware of the impact of this on the successful tenderer, yet deliberately withheld this information. The Court of Appeal reversed this finding on the basis that there was no evidence of an intention to deceive. The Supreme Court stated merely that the Court of Appeal's conclusion could not be seriously contested.

[654] The Alberta Appellate Division considered this issue in Whitney v. MacLean, [1932] 1 W.W.R. 417. In an action for specific performance of an agreement for sale of land, the defendant pleaded that the vendor had represented that the land included 140 acres of irrigated land for which the vendor had water rights, when he knew that only 85 acres were entitled to be irrigated.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[655] The Court of Appeal found that the evidence showed that there was no intention to deceive. Harvey, C.J.A., writing for the majority noted the statement on p. 6 of Spencer-Bower, The Law of Actionable Misrepresentation (2nd Ed.), that "it is immaterial whether the representor in making the representation, had or had not any intention to deceive, defraud or injure the representee ..." and went on:

> "Now, if this means more than that the motive, including the intention involved in it, is immaterial, which it probably does not, it is clearly contrary to authority for the Judicial Committee in Tackey v. McBain, [1912] A.C. 186 ... [where it was] held that:
>
> > 'In an action in deceit the plaintiff must prove that the untrue statement ... was made with a fraudulent intent.'"

[656] The excerpt from Spencer-Bower was noted by Harvey, C.J.A., to relate to motive; other passages from that authority stating that intention to induce reliance rather than intention to deceive is vital are not cited. The court must be taken as meaning by "intention to deceive" that the evidence did not disclose fraudulent intent, in the sense of lack of honest belief in the truth of the statement.

[657] The same can be said of BG Checo, supra, as Iacobucci, J., stated:

> "In my view there was insufficient evidence to support a finding of deceit ... As Hinkson, J.A., noted (at pp. 161-162):
>
> > '... a committee of 12 prepared the specifications. The evidence does not reveal that any members of the committee were dishonest in the preparation of the specifications of this contract. Rather, it is possible to conclude that they mistakenly or negligently believed that the requirement that a tenderer should take a view of the site would remedy any shortcomings in the specifications included in the terms of the contract.'" (emphasis added)

[658] Iacobucci, J., also affirmed that the law as to deceit is set out in Derry, supra, that the person making the statement must either know the statement to be false, or be reckless as to its truth or falsehood. Therefore the Supreme Court cannot be seen to derogate from the concept of recklessness being intrinsically dishonest, as set out in Redican.

[659] Furthermore, recklessness is not compatible with an intention to deceive. For, if the defendant has no honest belief or is careless as to whether his or her statement is true, how can he or she have an ascertainable intention to deceive the representee? Wilful blindness to the truth, as described in Derry, supra, cannot be consistent with an intention to deceive.

[660] Neither B.G. Checo nor Whitney cited Redican, supra, where McGillivray, J., contended in his dissenting judgment that an intention to deceive is not compatible with recklessness. He stated at p. 453:

> "If the effect of the decision in McLeod v. Hughes, supra, is, as the Chief Justice and my brother Clarke appear to think it is, that a person to succeed on a claim of fraudulent misrepresentation must show an active intent to deceive on the part of his opponent, then in my view that decision is not in accord with the decision of the Supreme Court in the Redican case, supra, and must be ignored.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

"It is not only that which is said that may constitute misrepresentation, but also that which is imported into what is said by what is left unsaid ... If the appellant made this representation even though at that moment he did not have in his mind the intent to deceive, which I greatly doubt, he still would be speaking recklessly and without a belief in the truth of his statements, which is fraud according to the Supreme Court's decision [in Bickell & Co. v. Cutten, [1926] S.C.R. 340]."

[661] Both B.G. Checo and Whitney can be reconciled with the Supreme Court's pronouncement in Redican, that fraudulent recklessness does not require proof of intention to deceive. The courts' view must be taken as being restricted to situations where recklessness is not in issue.

[662] I find support for this interpretation of the law in K.R.M. Construction, supra. Fawcus, J., held on p. 204:

"The defendant submits that fraud is not established unless there is an intent to mislead or deceive. However ... the required intent must be looked at according to the nature of the fraud allegation and ... in accordance with the facts. That is to say, where, as here, the representor has made misrepresentations without knowing whether they were true or false and without a genuine or honest belief in their truth, then, on my understanding of the law, the only intent which must be proved by the representee is that the representor intended that he act upon such misrepresentations in the manner in which he did act and thereby induced him to enter into the contract." (emphasis added)

This finding of law was not disturbed by the Court of Appeal, who upheld the finding of fraudulent misrepresentation.

[663] I conclude, therefore, that the law requires the plaintiff to establish that the defendant's employees or agents permitted the misstatements and nondisclosures to be made either knowingly, without entertaining any belief in their truth, or recklessly, without caring whether they were true or false. The statements must have been made and the information withheld with the intention to induce reliance, with the plaintiff actually relying to its detriment.

(iv) Fraud In Construction Cases

[664] I will now set out the principal construction law cases in which fraud is in issue, to assist me in the case at bar.

[665] The Supreme Court considered the issue of the fraudulent conduct of a public body in Hydro-Québec, supra. Although decided on the basis of the Civil Code, the court's consideration of conduct constituting fraud is useful for its illustrative and comparative value.

[666] Hydro-Québec concerned the duty of Hydro-Québec, as owner and principal, to disclose information in its possession concerning soil conditions to a subcontractor. Hydro-Québec called for tenders for the construction and engineering of a substation and access road. The documents available to bidders included a geotechnical report completed in 1974 by LIE, a firm retained by Hydro-Québec, which described the nature and condition of the soil at the site and made recommendations regarding the excavation work. During the tender period, Hydro-Québec requested that LIE conduct explorations of the proposed site of the buildings and the access road.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[667] Shortly after the contract was awarded, on the basis of LIE's investigations of the site, Hydro-Québec altered the plans for the access road. Soon after beginning construction of the access road, the subcontractor informed the contractor of atypical conditions in digging the foundation.

[668] Hydro-Québec received written notice from the contractor about the poor soil conditions and had LIE visit the site to verify these reports. LIE suggested to Hydro-Québec that the level of the substation be raised, noting that even then, the excavations may be difficult. Hydro-Québec did not disclose this letter or its contents to the contractor, but informed it that the level of the substation would be raised, and that "it is possible that poor sub-soil conditions may be encountered; in that case, corrective measures will be taken on the site".

[669] On the basis of their recent investigations, in 1977 LIE sent a geotechnical report to Hydro-Québec. This report was found to indicate much more difficult conditions than were indicated in the 1974 report. The 1977 report also listed ways to better deal with the conditions, which were found to be of the "utmost importance" if the requisite work was to be carried out. Neither the 1977 report nor its contents were disclosed. The contractor set up a meeting to discuss the problems encountered; Hydro-Québec agreed to design changes but refused to incur additional costs for them.

[670] The Bank of Montreal became involved when the subcontractor was put into bankruptcy. The bank commenced an action in contract against the contractor, who joined and impleaded Hydro-Québec as the owner. The bank also sued Hydro-Québec in tort, alleging that the 1977 report indicated Hydro-Québec's awareness of an error in selecting the site, which could have explained the difficulties.

[671] At trial, Martineau, J., inter alia, found Hydro-Québec fraudulent. He held that the tender documents were inadequate to allow the subcontractor to foresee the nature of the difficulties encountered in carrying out the excavation work. Further, continual alteration of the contract throughout its performance indicated that the tender package design was incorrect and not feasible. The judge found that through its discussions with LIE, Hydro-Québec became aware during the tender period that design changes would be required, and that the relevant aspects of the tender documents were incorrect.

[672] Martineau, J., found the 1977 report to be a necessary working document for the contractor to understand the nature and significance of the problems encountered. The suppression of the information in this report induced the contractor and subcontractor to continue their work on the basis of untenable designs. Hydro-Québec had conducted itself "in a secretive manner" and failed to fulfil its duties by not informing the other parties that the design was erroneous.

[673] The Quebec Court of Appeal allowed Hydro-Québec's appeal. However, Gonthier, J., speaking for a unanimous court, held that the trial judge had not committed palpable errors in arriving at his conclusions on the evidence.

[674] The court discussed at p. 602 Hydro-Québec's conduct:

> "By leaving Bail/Sotrim and Laprise completely in the dark about the quality of the information it had provided to them, by constantly shifting the blame onto the subcontractor's shoulders and by arguing urgency and its goodwill in agreeing to the changes to the work. Hydro-Québec was literally able to induce Bail/Sotrim and Laprise to carry out a design for which they had not tendered. The costs of doing the excavation nearly quintupled in relation to Laprise's original tender.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001787

"Hydro-Québec knew that its design was erroneous. Nonetheless, it refused to admit this because the balance of power between the parties would have been radically altered, and it would probably have had to renegotiate the entire contract. It was this attitude on the part of Hydro-Québec, this refusal to yield to the claims of Laprise and Bail/Sotrim, when it knew that they were right and that it had an obligation to inform them, that so struck Martineau, J., and that led him to describe the operation as a 'conspiracy of silence'. While I have no wish to raise the ante on adjectives, I in fact find such an attitude to be shocking, particularly on the part of a major public body such as Hydro-Québec." (emphasis added)

[675] K.R.M. Construction, supra, involved contracts for grading, installation of culverts and some clearing for the extension of a railway line for the defendant Crown corporation. The tender documents included technical and engineering data and a schedule that purported to provide an approximate quantity for each type of material to be moved, which became part of the contract. The instructions to the bidders included a clause indicating that these quantities were estimates on the basis of preliminary surveys and projections of the line's location, and contained the following statement: "The quantities are not in any way guaranteed and are subject to revision."

[676] Using these quantities, the plaintiffs were awarded the contracts. Shortly after work commenced, it became obvious that the quantities to be moved were considerably greater than those estimated in the contract. This greatly increased the time required to complete the work, and the costs of completing the project escalated rapidly. As a result, the plaintiffs ceased their work under the contracts.

[677] In further negotiations, the plaintiffs proposed a means of reducing operating costs, to which the defendants agreed. On the basis of these discussions, an amending agreement, including a release of claims, was executed, under which the plaintiffs recommenced work. The defendants did not indicate that their own geotechnical investigation resulted in their considering major revisions of the proposed railway line. Soon after work commenced, the defendants indicated that the proposed line was to undergo a major revision. The plaintiffs thereafter had difficulty meeting the amending agreement, as the defendants required several changes in alignment and construction standards. When the plaintiffs ceased operations without completing the contracts, the quantities moved were 335 per cent greater than those estimated in the contract with much material yet to be removed. The plaintiffs commenced their action on the basis that the contracts and the amending agreement were induced by fraud.

[678] At trial it was held that fraud was proven with respect to the contracts and the amending agreement. The plaintiffs first pleaded a representation in the tender documents that the approximate quantities were estimated with sufficient and proper engineering procedures. These sufficient and proper engineering procedures were allegedly that the defendant used all relevant information available to it to calculate quantities. Further, unless expressly advised to the contrary, contractors have a right to expect the use of traditional procedures by railways generally in North America, and the tender quantities have been calculated by traditional procedures. Fawcus, J., accepted this, but added that the owner could give implied or inferential notice that traditional, sufficient and proper procedures had not been followed.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[679] Finding this representation, the court considered whether the defendant had used sufficient and proper engineering procedures in purporting to estimate the "approximate" quantities. The court found that notwithstanding that the defendant possessed the information necessary to make reasonably accurate estimates of quantities for the mountainous areas of the route, it estimated them by using the "flat earth" method, which assumed that the earth in the right-of-way was flat.

[680] This was not a sufficient or proper engineering procedure, and consequently this element of the representation of approximate quantities was untrue. The use of sufficient or proper engineering procedures was said to include using all available, relevant and material information.

[681] The second representation alleged was that the words "estimated" or "approximate" as used in the tender documents meant that the quantities to be moved were within plus or minus 20 per cent of the tender quantities. This understanding by the plaintiff contractors was found to be reasonable. As the actual quantities "ran horrendously beyond that limit", that representation was false.

[682] The defendant at p. 201 was said to exhibit a "cavalier attitude" towards the accuracy of the information in the tender package schedules, which sufficed for a finding of recklessness and hence fraud. It was noted that under Derry, supra, motive is irrelevant.

[683] The defendant's argument that terms of the contract limited or excluded liability for reliance on the accuracy of the figures was rejected, and it was noted that the circumstances surrounding a tender situation militate in favour of finding reliance on representations.

[684] The contractor's reliance upon the quantity estimates in the tender documents was found reasonable. Evidence indicated that the defendant expected prospective bidders to rely and act on the tender documents in preparing their bids. Regarding actual reliance by the plaintiffs, expert testimony was accepted that reliance by contractors on such quantity estimates is usual; contractors generally do not recalculate tender quantities.

[685] On the basis of the preceding analysis, Fawcus, J., found that the defendants had fraudulently misrepresented both the "approximate" quantities provided in the tender documents and the nature and scope of the revisions to the railway line contemplated at the time the amending agreement was made. The Court of Appeal, in its per curiam pronouncement, affirmed these findings with respect to both findings of fraud, but allowed in part the appeal as to damages.

(v) Conclusion

[686] Following my review of the law of deceit, I must determine whether the conduct of the defendant was deceitful. I will consider the plaintiff's claim in deceit as it applies to each affected area of work.

[687] I have found that the defendants made misrepresentations and nondisclosures regarding each of the three main areas of work to the plaintiff in the precontractual and contractual stages, outlined above. I am satisfied that the misrepresentations and nondisclosures made with respect to or pertaining to the upstream pervious borrow and the downstream foundation areas were fraudulent and that deceit was established.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001789

[688] The defendant had actual knowledge of the misrepresentations and nondisclosures, or at least a lack of honest belief or recklessness, which is sufficient to establish fraud. The requisite intent, to induce reliance by the plaintiff on the contract documents as being all of the documentation necessary to enable the preparation of a proper estimate, has been proven with respect to these two areas. The evidence establishes actual reliance by the plaintiff on the misrepresentations of the defendant in calculating its bid and carrying out the contract.

[689] The elements of deceit have not been established in respect of the north abutment.

C. Negligent Misrepresentation

[690] As the facts surrounding the north abutment do not establish deceit, I must consider whether negligence is established. I will also see whether negligence is established for a claim surrounding the upstream pervious borrow and the downstream foundation, although this is not required as the defendants have already been found liable.

[691] The special relationship of proximity existing between an owner and tenderer gives rise to a duty of care. This legal duty is to exercise reasonable care in the preparation and presentation of the tender documents, and in the disclosure of information as to the state of work performed by others, the conditions expected to be encountered at the site, the nature of the work required to be performed and the nature and availability of construction materials.

[692] As McLachlin, J., observed in Cognos, supra, it is not enough that the owner believed what he said, he must have been non-negligent in having formed and expressed that belief. The owner must also not have been negligent in deciding what information to withhold, or in not properly inquiring as to the existence and relevance of other information affecting the work.

[693] The extent of the duty owed by an owner to a tenderer is measured by applying the standard of care expected from a reasonable owner. In Cognos it was stated at p. 121:

> "The standard of care required by a person making representations is an objective one. It is a duty to exercise such reasonable care as the circumstances require to ensure that representations made are accurate and not misleading ..."

[694] He adopted the description in Klar, Tort Law (1991), at p. 160, of the standard by which the defendants' conduct should be measured:

> "An advisor does not guarantee the accuracy of the statement made, but is only required to exercise reasonable care with respect to it. As with the issue of standard of care in negligence in general, this is a question of fact which must be determined according to the circumstances of the case. Taking into account the nature of the occasion, the purpose for which the statement was made, the foreseeable use of the statement, the probable damage which will result from an inaccurate statement, the status of the advisor and the level of competence generally observed by others similarly placed, the trier of fact will determine whether the advisor was negligent."

[695] In determining the standard of care to be applied in this case, I observe the following general principles:

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

1. The tender documents must be prepared having in mind the average tenderer, not one who is unusually cautious, conservative or has special knowledge or experience: Cardinal Construction, supra.

2. A bidder is entitled and expected to rely on the tender documents as conveying the best information the owner can give. It is not good enough to provide information that is misleading, incomplete or inaccurate with the intention that the more experienced or knowledgeable bidders will ferret out the problems from clues: Cardinal Construction, supra.

3. Where an owner has special knowledge gained through years of investigation and then invites bids within a relatively short tender period, where it knows that reliance will necessarily be placed on the tender documents and independent verification of information is impractical, the owner must disclose all reasonably material facts which may have a bearing on the tenderers' bid: Cardinal Construction, supra; Edgeworth Construction, supra; BG Checo, supra.

4. If the owner has not verified information in the tender documents, it has a legal duty to inform tenderers in clear terms that they should not rely on this information, putting the tenderers on notice to undertake their own investigations and inquiries: Carman Construction, supra. For this to be practical, adequate time for independent investigations is required. The shorter the bid period, the stronger the inference that greater reliance will be placed on the contract documents, in the absence of a clearly worded "nonreliance" clause: BG Checo, supra.

5. If, after the tender documents are prepared and delivered, the owner learns they are inaccurate, it owes a legal duty to the tenderers to inform them of the true facts: Cardinal Construction, supra.

[696] The plaintiff asserts that necessary information in the possession of the defendant was not communicated, and that the information that was communicated misrepresented the actual conditions.

[697] In considering what standard of care to apply to the defendant I am guided by the referral by Klar, supra, on p. 217 to the decision of Learned Hand in Conway v. O'Brien (1940), 111 F.2d 611 (2nd Cir.), where it is stated at p. 612:

> "The degree of care demanded of a person by an occasion is the resultant of three factors: the likelihood that his conduct will injury others, taken with the seriousness of the injury if it happens, balanced against the interest which he must sacrifice to avoid the risk."

[698] Cognos, supra involved the standard of care required of an employer to make full disclosure to an employee of relevant information about the nature and existence of the employment opportunity for which he had applied, so the plaintiff employee could assess the risk involved in leaving his employment and joining the defendant. The representation at issue concerned the risk of termination with the defendant occurring. The court considered when a person is deciding whether to enter a contract with terms governing termination: an assessment is made by the person as to the risk of such termination occurring, the more stringent terms being a possible deterrence to entering into the contract. A plaintiff must therefore assess the risk of entering a contract in the face of the contractual provisions, and in so doing is entitled to rely on what was represented in the contract.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[699] Iacobucci, J., said at pp. 122-123:

> "In reality, the trial judge did not impose a duty to make full disclosure on the respondent and its representative. He simply imposed a duty of care, the respect of which required, among other things and in the circumstances of this case, that the appellant be given highly relevant information about the nature and existence of the employment opportunity for which he had applied." (emphasis added)

[700] In BG Checo, supra, the defendants called for tenders to erect transmission towers and string transmission lines. The plaintiff's representative inspected the area by helicopter before its tender was submitted, noting that the right-of-way had been partially cleared and that there was evidence of ongoing clearing activity. There was no direct discussion between the plaintiff and defendant with respect to further clearing that would be done before the award of the contract. The plaintiff relied on a representation in the contract documents, which stated that "[c]learing of the right-of-way and foundation installation has been carried out by others and will not form part of this contract". In fact, no further clearing took place between those dates.

[701] The defendant asserted that at the time of tender it did not intend to perform any more clearing of the right-of-way and further, that the tender documents required that the tenderers inspect the site and observe for themselves the extent of the clearing, and bid accordingly. The defendant had contracted the clearing out to another company, and had knowledge that the work was not done adequately. This was not disclosed to the plaintiff, even though the evidence indicated that the defendant was aware it would affect the successful tenderer.

[702] The Supreme Court held that negligent misrepresentations induced the plaintiff to enter into the contract at a price less than if it had known the true facts. The representation in the clause was that by the contract date, the clearing would be completed. Neither the tender nor contract documents disclosed the fact that the defendant did not intend to do any further clearing. This nondisclosure of highly pertinent information was negligent.

[703] In Cardinal Construction, supra, the plaintiff entered into an agreement with the defendant city to reconstruct sewers and watermains. The tender documents on which the plaintiff successfully bid were prepared by a consulting engineer hired by the defendant. The documents showed an "Underground Bell Cable" which the plaintiff understood to be a two-inch plastic-covered cable, and on which their bid was based. The defendant became aware during the tender period that this cable was actually a concrete duct structure, but did not disclose this, resulting in a substantial increase in cost to the contractor. The plaintiff sued, one of the grounds being negligent misrepresentation of the nature of the cable which induced them to enter into the contract.

[704] Henry, J., found the city liable for negligent misrepresentation: the defendant intended the tender documents to induce bidders to become committed to a contract for a price in reliance on this. He said at p. 189:

> "In these circumstances there was a duty imposed upon the city to take care that the information positively presented was accurate, or to warn bidders that it required verification. That duty of care was breached."

The defendant also had a duty to inform the bidders upon learning that representations were not true.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[705] The Supreme Court of Canada in Edgeworth Construction, supra, recently affirmed the liability of an engineer by holding that an engineering firm owed a duty of care to an individual bidder on a construction contract and was liable for negligent misrepresentation. If those who prepare information for a tender package know that this information will be relied on, and negligently misrepresent the state of affairs, they will be liable in tort to the bidders.

[706] The vicarious liability of an owner for the actions of its agents and consulting engineer has been confirmed in Pearson, supra; Davie Shipbuilding, supra; Mueller (Karl) Construction Ltd. v. Northwest Territories Commissioner, [1991] N.W.T.R. 1 (C.A.).

[707] The misrepresentations and nondisclosures that the plaintiff has proven are set out above. I find that a duty of care arose out of the relationship between the parties. Applying the standard of care of the reasonable owner issuing an invitation for tenders, I find that the defendant has failed to meet this standard, constituting negligence.

[708] Thus, I am satisfied that the defendant was deceitful in its actions respecting the upstream pervious borrow and the downstream foundations areas, and negligent with respect to all three areas. Its tortious conduct was an inducing cause of the plaintiff entering this contract.

IV. Does The Contract Limit Or Negative The Liability Of The Defendant?

[709] I must now consider whether, having satisfied myself that the plaintiffs have established a prima facie case of liability for breach of contractual warranties and tortious misrepresentations, such liability is limited or negatived altogether by the express terms of the contract. I have set out in my summary of the facts above the disclaimer or exculpatory clauses which the defendant contends protect it from liability, and will only replicate them here if necessary.

A. General Principles Of Interpretation

[710] The wording of any clause purporting to limit or exclude liability for actionable misrepresentation or breach of contract must be carefully scrutinized. Such clauses, to be effective, must be drafted with complete clarity. As the Supreme Court of Canada stated at p. 428 of Bauer v. Bank of Montreal (1980), 32 N.R. 191; 110 D.L.R.(3d) 424 (S.C.C.), exemption clauses are subject to special rules of construction:

> "In construing such a clause, the court will see that the clause is expressed clearly and that it is limited in its effect to the narrow meaning of the words employed and it must clearly cover the exact circumstances which have arisen in order to afford protection to the party claiming benefit. It is generally construed against the party benefiting from the exemption." (emphasis added)

[711] Exculpatory clauses are thus subject to the contra proferentum canon of construction, being construed against the maker, as that party could have used whatever words he or she wished for protection.

B. Exculpatory Clauses And Fraud

[712] I have found that the defendant made misrepresentations and nondisclosures which are actionable in deceit with respect to the pervious borrow and downstream foundation areas.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[713] It has long been established that exculpatory or limitation clauses cannot excuse fraudulent misrepresentation. The leading authority is Pearson, supra. The court unanimously found that the defendant city could not escape liability for its fraudulent statements by inserting clauses providing that the contractor could not rely on them. Halsbury, L., stated at p. 356:

> "The action is based on the allegation of fraud, and no subtly [sic] of language, no craft or machinery in the form of contract, can estop a person who complains that he has been defrauded from having that question of fact submitted to a jury."

[714] Hereford, L.J., also rejected the defendant's arguments, saying at p. 362 that "fraud vitiates every contract and every clause in it".

[715] These passages were adopted in K.R.M. Construction, supra. The British Columbia Court of Appeal stated at pp. 284-285 that where a claim is based in deceit:

> "An owner who makes fraudulent misrepresentations as to the accuracy of quantities contained in the precontract documents cannot invoke the saving provisions in the contract as a defence to a charge of deceit."

[716] That exclusionary clauses avail a fraudulent representor was affirmed by the Alberta Court of Appeal in TWT Enterprises, supra.

[717] I therefore conclude that the clauses in the contract relied upon by the defendant have no effect upon the defendant's liability for deceit in the pervious borrow and downstream foundation areas.

[718] Had I reached a different conclusion regarding whether the defendants were deceitful, I would have had to consider whether the clauses effectively absolved the defendant's liability for negligent misrepresentation and breach of contract. I must also evaluate the clauses with respect to the north abutment area.

C. The "Inspection And Investigation" Clause: Section 1-2.13

[719] Section 1-2.13 of the Instructions to Tenderers states:

> "The tenderer is required to investigate and satisfy himself of everything and of every condition affecting the works to be performed and the labour and material to be provided, and it is mutually agreed that submission of a tender shall be conclusive evidence that the tenderer has made such investigation."

[720] I will refer to this and similar provisions purporting to shift to the bidder the risk of failing to detect adverse site conditions as "investigation clauses".

[721] The issue is whether contract provisions requiring the contractor to make its own inspections, investigations and conclusions, are sufficient to foist upon it the risk of site conditions being different from those represented in the tender documents.

[722] The tenor of the law from various jurisdictions is that a tenderer will have discharged the obligation to investigate and become satisfied of the conditions of the work if he or she becomes informed by accepting the basic information conveyed in the tender documents, where the clause:

(1) does not specify the sources of information to which the tenderer may have

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

regard, and

(2) does not provide that in making the investigations the tenderer must not rely upon any material supplied by the owner or its engineer.

[723] The decision of the Australian High Court in Morrison-Knudsen v. Commonwealth of Australia (1972), 46 A.L.J.R. 265 (H.C.), is particularly instructive in this regard. The plaintiff contractors sued the Federal Government, alleging breach of a duty to take reasonable care to ensure that information in a tender package relating to the nature and content of soil underlying the proposed site was accurate. The plaintiff alleged this information was false, inaccurate and misleading. The issue was whether certain exculpatory provisions answered the plaintiff's claim.

[724] Several clauses were similar to those in the contract in issue. Clause 3(1) provided that:

"Plans, Specifications, Etc. (i) The Contractor shall be deemed to have examined the Plans, Specifications, Schedules, General and Special Conditions of Contract and all other contract documents carefully and also to have informed himself as to the site and local conditions affecting the carrying out of the Contract." (emphasis added)

Clause 04 provided that:

"Site Conditions: The Contractor acknowledges that he has satisfied himself as to the nature and location of the work, the general and local conditions, including but not restricted to those bearing upon ... Any failure by the Contractor to acquaint himself with the available information will not relieve him from responsibility for estimating properly any difficulty or the cost of successfully performing the work. The Commonwealth assumes no responsibility for any conclusions or interpretations made by the Contractor on the basis of information made available by the Commonwealth." (emphasis added)

[725] The court unanimously held that these clauses do not absolve the defendant of liability. Barwick, C.J., stated at p. 267, with respect to clause 3(1):

"I did not read these words as limiting the 'information' to that which the contractor has discovered by his own independent endeavours. In my opinion, he will have relevantly informed himself by acceptance of the basic information conveyed by the defendant."

[726] With regard to clause 04 respecting the contractor's failure to acquaint himself with the "available information", it was held at p. 267:

"Again, the 'available information', must, in my opinion, include the information communicated by the defendant. That information certainly cannot be excluded by reading the word 'available' as meaning 'available as a result of or by reason of the plaintiffs' own efforts'."

[727] There is also a long line of American jurisprudence holding that investigation clauses in construction contracts do not necessarily preclude contractors from suing upon misrepresentations in the tender documents.

[728] The leading American authority is the United States Supreme Court's decision in Hollerbach v. United States (1914), 233 U.S. 165 (U.S.S.C.). A contract for the repair of a dam represented that the dam had been backed with broken stone, sawdust and sediment, when it was actually backed with a soft slushy sediment, making the work much more expensive. The court found at pp. 177-178 that the contractor was entitled to rely upon the express material representation in the specifications:

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001795

> "[T]he specifications spoke with certainty as to a part of the conditions to be encountered by the claimants ... [T]he specifications assured them of the character of the material, - a matter concerning which the government might be presumed to speak with knowledge and authority. We think this positive statement of the specifications must be taken as true and binding on the government, and that upon it, rather than upon the claimants, must fall the loss resulting from such mistaken representations. We think it would be going quite too far to interpret the general language of the other paragraphs as requiring independent investigation of facts which the specifications furnished by the government as a basis of the contract left in no doubt. If the government wished to leave the matter open to the independent investigation of the claimants, it might easily have omitted the specification as to the character of the filling back of the dam. In its positive assertion of the nature of this much of the work it made a representation upon which the claimants had a right to rely without an investigation to prove its falsity." (emphasis added)

[729] Hollerbach was adopted in Cardinal Construction, supra, to support the conclusion that the contractor in that case was entitled to rely upon negligent misrepresentations in the tender documents notwithstanding an investigation clause.

[730] In Bernard McMenamy Contractors Inc. v. Missouri State Highway Commission (1979), 582 S.W.2d 305 (Miss. A.C.), the contractor sued for breach of warranty. The evidence disclosed that the Highway Commission had prepared a soil survey a year before the contract was put to tender, describing actual subsurface conditions which contradicted the description in the tender documents. This report was not disclosed to prospective bidders.

[731] The defendant argued that terms of the contract negatived any warranty regarding underground conditions, relying on very broad clauses, some of which were set out at p. 310:

> "The contractor further agrees that he is fully informed regarding all of the conditions affecting the work to be done, and labour and materials to be furnished for the completion of this contract, and that his information was secured by personal investigation and research and not from any estimates of the Commission; and that he will make no claim against the State or Commission by reason of any representation of any officer, agent, or employees of the Commission.
>
> "The ... bidder, declares ... that he has carefully examined the location of the proposed work, the plans, Standard Specifications, and special provisions heretofore mentioned ...
>
> "The conditions indicated on the plans and in the proposal represent information available from surveys and studies, but the submission of a bid shall be considered proof that the bidder has made his own examination and is satisfied as to the conditions to be encountered in performing the work and as to the requirements of the plans, specifications, supplemental specifications, special provisions, and contract."

[732] The court found that such clauses did not preclude recovery where there was a positive misrepresentation in the specifications by the owner as to soil conditions, with knowledge of the actual conditions by the owner. The specifications had stated that the plans were based upon "information available from surveys and studies ..." However, the plans did not correctly indicate the character of the rock to be excavated, and the information available to the Commission in that regard was not provided to bidders.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[733] Another decision similar to this case is Public Constructors Inc. v. State of New York (1977), 390 N.Y.2d 481 (S.C.A.D.). The plaintiff contractor sued for breach of a highway construction contract, alleging that the defendant State had furnished inadequate and misleading information regarding site conditions. Further, the defendant did not disclose to bidders a series of studies commissioned from private consultants over the previous decade which presented a considerably different picture of the contract site.

[734] The defendant claimed that it was not liable because the bidder failed to conduct adequate pre-bid on-site investigations, and because a clause in the contract said that bidders could not rely upon the accuracy of the descriptions of subsurface conditions in the bidding documents. The court rejected these contentions, stating at p. 485 that such exculpatory clauses would not insulate the defendant from liability where site conditions are not as represented in the contract, and inspection by the contractor would not have revealed their incorrectness.

[735] In Thomsen-Abott Construction Co. v. Wausau (City), 100 N.W.2d 921 (Wis. A.C.), the Appellate Court of Wisconsin held that if the only way the subsurface conditions can be ascertained by the bidder is to excavate the whole work site, then a contractor bidding on a public work project is entitled to rely on the express representations contained in the plans, even where a contractual clause places the duty of investigation upon the contractor.

[736] As I noted earlier, Canadian courts are sensitive to the realities of the tendering process. I am attracted to the American approach that a site investigation must be both practically feasible within the time allotted, and have been capable of disclosing that the representations were false, before an investigation clause can negative the effect of express representations in the tender documents as to site conditions.

[737] The Supreme Court of Canada analyzed an investigation clause with an express contractual warranty in BG Checo, supra. The majority applied the canon of construction that where there are apparent inconsistencies between different terms of a contract, the court should attempt to find an interpretation which can reasonably give meaning to each of the terms in question. The clauses giving the plaintiff the general obligation for misunderstandings and errors in the tender documents and for satisfying itself as to the site, the work and all contingencies, was construed as not having been intended to negate the specific obligation for clearing which the contract placed on the defendant. Thus the express contractual representation that the clearing work would be done by others was found to be actionable notwithstanding the site investigation clause.

[738] The above cases are premised upon the entitlement of a bidder to rely upon information conveyed by the owner in evaluating the project. However, as noted in BG Checo, an owner may negate the existence of a duty of care through a properly worded "nonreliance" clause, such as in Carman Construction, supra.

[739] A clause expressly forbidding reliance by a tenderer upon information conveyed in the tender package can thus shift full responsibility of detecting adverse site conditions to the contractor.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001797

[740] In this case, the investigation clause is in rather general terms. Section 1-2.13 merely requires the tenderer "to investigate and satisfy himself of everything and of every condition affecting the works to be performed and the labour and material to be provided"; it does not specify what information he may have regard to in conducting this investigation. In particular, neither this clause nor any other forbid the plaintiff from considering and relying on the soils information conveyed in the tender package. Far from forbidding reliance, this clause provides a licence to the bidder to use this information in preparing its tender.

[741] Furthermore, the evidence is clear that a visual site inspection could not have revealed the true subsurface conditions in the Paddle River valley respecting the pervious borrow, nor the buried waste in the downstream foundation, nor the concealed slide in the north abutment. Nor was it possible for the plaintiff to conduct its own intensive soils investigation, duplicating that of the defendant, in the time allotted for the preparation and submission of tenders.

[742] This section is not sufficient to give the plaintiff the entire risk of site conditions being different than those represented in the tender documents. I find that the plaintiff discharged the obligation placed upon it in this section by reviewing and accepting the basic information conveyed to it in the tender documents and by making a site visit.

D. Clauses Disclaiming Responsibility For Interpretations By The Contractor Of Information In The Tender Documents

[743] Several provisions in the contract purport to disclaim responsibility for interpretations made by the contractors from geotechnical information provided in the tender documents.

[744] Section 6.3.3 provides:

> "The boundaries of the pervious borrow area are shown on the drawings and the distribution of pervious borrow in the pervious borrow area is indicated by the strip logs shown on the drawings. The Contractor shall be responsible for any interpretations, deductions and conclusions which he, or others employed by him, make from this information." (emphasis added)

[745] The relevant part of section 1.13 provides:

> "The soil information for the pervious borrow area is shown on the drawings so that the Contractor can evaluate his operation for borrow excavation. Geotechnical cross sections of the impervious borrow area, and the south abutment area, are shown on the drawings. No geological interpretations of these cross sections have been provided and the Contractor is responsible for any interpretation he or others employed by him make from this information." (emphasis added)

[746] Section 8 of the Thurber Report provides:

> "Two cross sections of the south abutment have been prepared, and are included in the drawings, to show representative borehole logs along the dam centreline and along the spillway centreline. These cross sections show information which is available for a more detailed review on the borehole logs in Schedule 'F'. No geological interpretation has been provided on these cross sections.
>
> "Neither Thurber consultants nor the Alberta Government take any responsibility for interpretations made by others from this or any geotechnical information provided to Tenderers. If there is any conflict of information between that contained in this report and that detailed in Schedule 'C' of the Specifications, the Specifications shall take precedence." (emphasis added)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[747] Morrison-Knudsen, supra, contained similar clauses disclaiming responsibility for interpretations made by the contractor from information supplied. A document setting out the results of site investigations carried out on behalf of the Government provided, was set out at p. 269:

"This Document Does Not Form Part Of The Contract Documents. It shall be clearly understood by Tenderers that the Commonwealth will not be responsible for any interpretation or conclusions drawn by the Tenderer in regard to site conditions based on the information contained herein."

[748] In construing this clause as not precluding an action for misrepresentation in the site information, Barwick, C.J., stated:

"This document quite clearly conveyed to the plaintiffs essential basic information as to soil content of significant portions of the site. The defendant sought to protect itself against responsibility for any interpretation or conclusion drawn in regard to site conditions based on the information thus conveyed. To my mind the very form of this reservation suggests a recognition that the basic information is likely if not, indeed, expected to be accepted for what it is, and also as a basis for inferences or conclusions as to site conditions. There are, in my opinion, no words in this quotation from the site information document which would convey to the plaintiffs that no responsibility was accepted for the basic information ... [The Solicitor-General] would have the quotation read as if it expressly provided 'This information is furnished for the convenience of bidders and is not part of the contract. The information is not guaranteed and any bids submitted must be based on the bidders' own investigations and determinations' [citation omitted]. But in my opinion the words purporting to limit responsibility .. are much more limited in their scope; they are confined to such inferences or conclusions as the tenderer might make for itself by reason of or upon them." (emphasis added)

[749] Turning to the case at bar, section 6.3.3 is itself recognition by the owner that this indispensable basic information is expected to be accepted by the contractor for what it is, and as a basis for inferences or conclusions as to site conditions. The clause does not disclaim responsibility by the owner for the information in the contract, but only for the inferences which the contractor draws from that information. Liability is not excluded for reliance on the basic information provided, or its accuracy.

[750] Section 1.13 expressly relates only to the geotechnical cross sections of the south abutment and the impervious borrow areas. There is no exculpatory clause applying to the statement in the first paragraph, that all boreholes and test pits within the area of the dam site are included in the drawings and the logs in schedule F.

[751] Finally, section 8 of the Thurber Report does not exclude liability for interpretations made by others from this or any geotechnical information provided to tenderers. There is no exclusion of liability for interpretations made by Thurber Consultants or Alberta Environment, and that is what is in issue here.

C. Clauses Disclaiming The Accuracy Of The Information Provided In The Tender Documents

[752] The only disclaimer of responsibility

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001799

for the accuracy of any information included in the tender documents is in section 1.13. It is important to construe this clause in the context of the entire section, to ascertain precisely to what it relates. The section is set out below:

> "The Engineer has obtained certain information regarding soil conditions in the area covered by the Contract. The approximate locations of all boreholes and test pits within the area of the dam site are shown on the drawings and the logs of these holes are given in Schedule F.
>
> "The soil information for the pervious borrow area is shown on the drawings so that the Contractor can evaluate his operation for Borrow Excavation. Geotechnical cross sections of the impervious borrow area, and the south abutment area, are shown on the drawings. No geological interpretations of these cross sections have been provided and the Contractor is responsible for any interpretation he or others employed by him make from this information.
>
> "Included in Schedule E is a reported entitled 'Geotechnical Information for Contract Bidders'. Other technical reports, photographs and information may be viewed by Tenderers, by arranging a meeting with Alberta Environment.
>
> "The accuracy of this information is not guaranteed and in no circumstances whatever shall the Engineer be held responsible or liable to the Contractor for any consequences resulting from the strata, groundwater and/or conditions as actually encountered being different from those implied in this information. Additional payments on such grounds will not be made under any circumstances." (emphasis added)

[753] I interpret the portion of section 1.13 which states that "[t]he accuracy of this information is not guaranteed" as meaning only that the engineer is not the insurer or guarantor of the accuracy of the information. It does not displace or negate the representation implicit in this section and in the geotechnical information in schedule E that the technical studies were prepared in accordance with sufficient and proper engineering standards and procedures, nor for that matter that all relevant geotechnical information in the possession of the defendant was disclosed in the tender package.

[754] It was the same representation respecting the standard of engineering used in gathering disclosed information which grounded liability in K.R.M. Construction, supra. In that case, the Instructions to Bidders said: "[The quantities] are not in any way guaranteed and are subject to revision." The Court of Appeal held that the question to be answered was whether the defendant owner made a proper estimate in the first place.

[755] Also, the contract stated: "The information upon which this proposal is based was obtained by the proposer through his own sources of knowledge and was not derived from any officer or agent of the railway company."

[756] The trial judge made the undisturbed finding that if taken literally, that bidder's proposals were not based on the tender packages, then bidders could not obtain from the tender documents such basic information as the identity of the owner, the nature of the contracts and the location of the work.

[757] At p. 206 a further portion of the contract was set out:

> "This contract is made and entered into by the Contractor and the Company on the distinct understanding that ... the execution of this contract by the Contractor is founded and based upon his own examination, knowledge, information and judgment and not upon any statement, representation, or information made or given by, or upon any information derived from any quantities, dimensions, tests, specifications, plans, maps, or profiles made, given or furnished by the Company and that any statement, representation or information if so made, given or furnished, was made, given or furnished merely for the general information of bidders and not in anywise warranted or guaranteed by or on behalf of the Company ..."

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[758] It was held that this clause could not apply to the tender package itself, since that was and indeed had to be provided to bidders, but only to any additional information which might be furnished by the owner.

[759] The Court of Appeal held at pp. 284-285 that the owner could rely upon the saving provisions in the contract documents as to the accuracy of the quantities stated therein when the claim was based on breach of contract, but not where it was based on deceit.

[760] Clause 43 was of the "non-reliance" variety enforced in Carman Construction, supra. The provision clearly stated that the contract was entered into on the distinct understanding that the contractor did not rely upon any information provided by the owner. I noted earlier that section 1.13 does not prohibit any such reliance by the plaintiff, but on the contrary expressly invites it. I distinguish the dictum in K.R.M. Construction on this basis.

[761] I note that the defendant has not protected itself by an exculpatory clause such as that which the same Government employed in Catre Industries, supra, part of which states: "The information pertaining to the data as shown has been compiled for the use of the Department of Highways. No responsibility will be assumed by the Department for the correctness or completeness of the data shown ..."

[762] In my view, section 1.13 merely indicates that the engineer, and not the department itself, does not assume responsibility for the information; the section refers only to the "Engineer", and so is directed solely at the individual persons acting within the scope of their employment under the defendant. No attempt was made in section 1.13 to shield the engineer's employer from liability. The contract in Catre Industries, in contrast, provided that no responsibility shall be assumed by the Department.

[763] The Supreme Court has severed the issue of the liability of the employer from that of its employees, as the two do not necessarily operate in tandem, each issue determined independently by the wording of the exclusion clause and the circumstances of the case: London Drugs Ltd. v. Brassart and Vanwinkel Ltd., [1992] 3 S.C.R. 299; 143 N.R. 1; 18 B.C.A.C. 1; 31 W.A.C. 1, and Edgeworth, supra. Therefore there is no incongruity in my construing section 1.13 as being intended to prevent individual employees of the defendant from being personally sued by bidders for misrepresentations, whilst not affording the same protection to their employer. Thus, to paraphrase Edgeworth, supra, finding the defendant liable will not circumvent any contractual promise, since there was no promise that the defendant is not responsible for negligent misrepresentations in the tender documents.

[764] Also, the wording of section 1.13 must be closely scrutinized to ascertain precisely from what liabilities the engineer is to be absolved. To reiterate, it provides that: the engineer will not be held responsible or liable for any consequences "different from those implied in this information." (emphasis added)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001801

[765] The defendant has not protected itself from liability for negligence in the compilation and disclosure of express information in the tender documents which is incorrect or misleading, merely disclaiming responsibility for conditions implied by that information. In determining the application of such a clause, and what is express or implied, I am guided further by the decision of Bayda, J.A., in Fischback, supra.

[766] This clause does not seek to exclude liability for any implied terms including those requiring full disclosure and good faith, since those terms do not arise implicitly from the "information" referred to in section 1.13, but rather from operation of law out of the circumstances and relationship of the parties.

F. Conclusion

[767] In conclusion, applying the rules of strict construction to the contractual exclusion clauses relied on by the defendant, I find that the liability of the defendant for breach of contract and tortious misrepresentation is not limited or excluded in any way, by the exclusionary clauses referred to above, or, by any other exclusionary clauses set out in the contract documents.

Adverse Inferences

[768] As the trial wound to a close, counsel for the plaintiff on a number of occasions alleged that adverse inferences ought to be drawn from the failure of the defence to call a host of witnesses that the plaintiff, in its wisdom, deemed the defendant ought to have called. Those witnesses ranged from representatives of TCL to various of the defendant's former employees and also included a variety of the defendant's present employees. The doctrine of adverse inference is in fact a very narrow one. It arises when someone has an evidentiary burden to establish an issue and does not call evidence in respect of that issue. It arises most often when a plaintiff fails to call someone intimately involved - and whom only they could call - on a particular point (for example a plaintiff is injured, sees a doctor, fails to call that doctor at trial in respect of those alleged injuries). It can however also arise where a prima facie case has been made out against a defendant which now requires the defendant to provide a response, again, with evidence which was only open to the defendant to raise. If that situation does not arise, or if a technical or legal defence is available to a defendant, the defendant is entitled to require the plaintiff to prove its case with its witnesses. I am not prepared to make any adverse inferences against the defendant for its failure to call witnesses.

[769] I am not prepared to draw adverse inferences arising out of the defendant's decision not to call certain potential witnesses.

Is Opron Construction Ltd. The Proper Plaintiff

[770] The defendant argues that Opron Construction Co. Ltd. is not entitled to recover any damages as it has not suffered a loss. The defendant says that only Opron Inc., the plaintiff's mother company, has suffered a loss since Opron Inc. incurred all costs and gained all revenues relating to the PRD project.

[771] This contention is not logical, nor is it consistent with the common law principles relating to agency law and contract law. It will be recalled that Opron Construction Co. Ltd. is the party to the contract, made under seal, and it is in the name of this party that the action is brought.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[772] The "agreement" between Opron Inc. and Opron Construction Co. Ltd. explicitly creates an agency relationship between the parties. Pursuant to this agreement, Opron Construction Co. Ltd. is to act as the "Prête-Nom" for Opron Inc. in the solicitation and obtaining of contracts in the western provinces of Canada. Article 3.00 of the agreement states:

> "Alberta (Opron Construction Co. Ltd.) shall have the authority and power to present bids and enter into contracts with respect to construction projects located in the western provinces of Canada, in its own name, for and on behalf of and as Prête-Nom for Opron." (emphasis added)

[773] In the statement of claim, as amended, the plaintiff pleads at paragraph 51:

> "The plaintiff brings this action on its own behalf and as agent for and on behalf of Opron Inc., a corporation incorporated under the provisions of the Quebec Companies Act."

[774] Although this reference to Opron Inc. was added in the first amendment to the statement of claim, it will become apparent that according to the principles of agency law and contract law this addition was not even necessary in order for the plaintiff, Opron Construction Co. Ltd., to claim damages for breach of contract or tort.

[775] An agent who signs in his own name is deemed to have contracted personally unless a contrary intention appears from the documents. It is clear in the case at bar that Opron Construction Co. Ltd. has contracted personally with the defendant. (Alberta Alarm Division v. Rescom Development Group Ltd. (1985), 15 C.L.R. 284 (Alta. Master)).

[776] When an agent, having authority to contract on behalf of another, makes a contract in his own name, the fact that he is a mere representative undisclosed brings the doctrine of the undisclosed principal into play. By this doctrine either the agent, or the principal when disclosed, may be sued; and either the agent or the principal may sue the other party to the contract. (Cheshire and Fifoot's Law of Contract (1986) (11th Ed.) pp. 473-476; Fridman's Law of Agency (6th Ed.) pp. 228 to 241; Pople v. Evans, [1968] 2 All E.R. 743, at 746-747 (Ch. D.) and Chitty on Contracts (25th Ed.) vol. 2 (1983) Sweet & Maxwell pp. 53-54).

[777] Fridman states that, just as there are some instances in which the agent may be personally liable on the contract made for his principal, so too there are instances in which the agent may personally sue the third party. At p. 224, Fridman states:

> "Agent personally liable. The most important instance is where the agent is personally liable on the contract, for it is only reasonable and just that an agent from whom a remedy for breach of contract can be sought by the third party should himself be able reciprocally to enforce the contract." Fridman's Law of Agency (6th Ed.), at pp. 207-218

[778] Fridman further discusses the liability of an agent of an undisclosed principal, in his article Recent Developments in Canadian Law: Commercial Law discussing Owl Construction Co. v. McKee & Finnegan's Ltd. (1987), 62 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 162; 190 A.P.R. 162 (Nfld. C.A.).

> "... This is more frequently the case where the agent has acted for an undisclosed principal, as seen in the Owl Construction case. The agent in such situations may sue on or enforce the contract as well as be made liable under it.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

"Clark (W) Land Services Ltd. v. Roxy-Clarion Petroleum Ltd. (1986), 47 Sask.R. 31 (Q.B.); Toners Garage Ltd. v. Brentwood Motors Ltd. (1988), 91 N.B.R.(2d) 239; 232 A.P.R. 239 (Q.B.); Alberta Alarm Division v. Rescom Development Group Ltd. (1985), 15 C.L.R. 284 (Alta. Master)." (emphasis added)

[779] Halsbury also supports the proposition that an agent of an undisclosed principal has the right to enforce the contract and to sue upon it:

"Any person who makes a contract in his own name without disclosing the existence of a principal, or who, though disclosing the fact that he is acting as an agent on behalf of a principal, renders himself personally liable on the contract, is entitled to enforce it against the other contracting party, notwithstanding that the principal has renounced the contract. Allen v. F. O'Hearn and Company, [1937] A.C. 213." Halsbury's Laws of England (4th Ed.), volume 1(2), at para. 179

[780] Further at para. 181 of Halsbury's, the learned author states:

"An agent who has paid money on behalf of his principal to a third person under such circumstances that the principal, if the payment had been made by him, would have been entitled to recover the money, may bring an action in his own name for money had and received against the third person."

[781] In Smith v. Lasko et al., [1986] 5 W.W.R. 716; 41 Man.R.(2d) 86 (Q.B.), at p. 726, De Graves, J., quoted, with approval, the principles stated in Bowstead on Agency (15th Ed. 1985), at p. 432:

"Undisclosed principal. Where the principal is undisclosed at the time of contracting, the contract is made with the agent, and he is personally liable and entitled on it. The principal also may intervene to sue, and may be sued, but the latter only subject to the general rule that nothing must prejudice the right of the third party to sue the agent if he so wishes. This is therefore a case where both agent and principal are liable and entitled." (emphasis added)

[782] As far as the extent of damages and loss that Opron Construction Co. Ltd. has suffered, it is of no accord or relevance to the defendant that there is an agreement between the plaintiff and Opron Inc. which makes Opron Inc. liable to cover the costs and obtain the revenues of the contracts entered into by its agent, Opron Construction Co. Ltd. The Prête-Nom Agreement between Opron Construction Co. Ltd. and Opron Inc. is governed by Quebec law so far as it concerns their rights and obligations inter se. That agreement and the law which governs it cannot, in the ordinary case, affect relationships between Opron Construction Co. Ltd. and the defendant that are governed by Alberta law. (Fridman's Law of Agency (6th Ed.), pp. 346 to 351).

[783] In Bowstead on Agency, the learned author states at p. 431:

"The case of the contract made by the agent of an undisclosed principal acting for his principal, however, requires special treatment in this context, for here the contract is that of the agent and it is clear that the agent must be able to sue on it just as he is liable upon it, even though he may be eventually liable to transfer the proceeds of the action to his principal." (emphasis added)

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[784] Bowstead further states at p. 432 that even if the agent is reimbursed by the principal for his loss, there is case authority that the agent may nevertheless recover in such cases.

"The situation may be likened to that of an injured plaintiff to whose rights the insurer who has payed him is subrogated. Equally, it is submitted that a buyer of goods which prove to be shoddy may recover the difference in value even though he resold them under a contract which effectively excluded his liability, or gave them away as a gift.

"This is not a case where the agent recovers the principal's loss; rather it is one where the agent seems to recover the contemplatable loss arising out of the breach of contract, and it is held no defence to the party in breach to prove that by virtue of the plaintiff's dealings with someone else the incidence of the actual loss may be different. Hence, it does not follow that the proceeds of the action are necessarily held on trust: the agent may be under an obligation to adjust the position on an in personam basis." (emphasis added)

[785] Support for this proposition is also found in Allen v. F. O'Hearn and Co., [1966] All E.R. 828, at p. 830 (P.C.), where the Privy Council said:

"The supposed agent's rights would be to recover the damage suffered by him on the footing that he had been principal ... What happens to the proceeds of a successful claim by such an agent is another matter. By virtue of his fiduciary relation to his principals, he may have to account to them for what he receives; but this is not the concern of the other party."

[786] The defendant does not point to any case law or authorities to support their contention that the plaintiff has no right to recover any damages for breach of contract.

[787] The only authority the defendant mentions is Vancouver Equipment Corp. v. Sun Valley Contracting Ltd. (1979), 16 B.C.L.R. 362, as authority for the proposition that Opron Inc., as principal, cannot be substituted for the plaintiff in this action, Opron Construction Co. Ltd. The plaintiff does not argue that Opron Inc. should be substituted as plaintiff.

[788] The defendant also cannot contend under the law of torts, that Opron Construction Co. Ltd. has not suffered damages. Support for this view is found in Morley v. Moore, [1936] 2 All E.R. 79 (C.A.), which held that an insured is not obliged to refrain from suing a third party for damage caused by the third party's negligence merely because he (the insured) has been paid in full by his own insurers, pursuant to an agreement between them and the insurers of the third party by which each insurance company paid for damage to its own insured (a "knock-for-knock agreement"), and that the insured, if he sued and was successful must account to his insurers for any sum received in respect of a matter in which they have paid him. Essentially, the Court of Appeal decided that a wrongdoer could not escape paying damages to an insured simply because the insured had been paid his loss by his own insurance company.

[789] Basic contract law principles also support the proposition that an agent has a right to sue in its own name and recover damages.

(a) Opron Construction Co. Ltd. is a principal party as concerns the defendant as it signed on its own behalf and under seal and therefore is entitled to exercise the rights and remedies arising from the contract.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

(b) Opron Construction Co. Ltd. is actually pleading for itself as concerns the defendant since it is the owner of the rights in the dispute.

(c) Opron Construction Co. Ltd. is the sole party capable of releasing the defendant.

(d) Opron Construction Co. Ltd. is liable to the defendant for the proper execution of the contract and is also entitled to enforce the execution of the contract in his own name.

(e) Opron Construction Co. Ltd.'s standing as an agent (Prête-Nom) resides in its own apparent title of ownership of the rights vested in it pursuant to the Prête-Nom Agreement.

[790] Applying the principles enunciated in the authorities referred to above to the facts of this case, it is clear that the defendant cannot successfully contend that Opron Construction Co. Ltd. cannot sue, both in contract and tort, in its own name and claim damages incurred for and on behalf of its principal, Opron Inc. The damages recovered by the agent and this adjustment has no relevance to the defendant with respect to the contract made with the agent. Therefore, it is not necessary for Opron Construction Co. Ltd. to assign its cause of action and right to damages to its principal, Opron Inc., nor is Opron Construction Co. Ltd.'s loss limited to the terms of its revenue entitlement stipulated in the agreement with its principal, Opron Inc. As between the defendant and Opron Construction Co. Ltd., revenues and expenses and consequent losses are determined by the construction contract and not by the agreement between the agent and the principal.

Quantum Assessment

Introduction

[791] Since the Crown is liable it is then necessary to quantify Opron's claim. The Crown proposes a "modified total cost approach" which uses total costs and total revenues, with some slight variations, to arrive at a starting point for the damage claim. Elton suggested this approach because the documents and information generated by Opron do not allow a more detailed breakdown of the claim.

[792] Opron has proposed a "claim item v. nonclaim item approach" as outlined in exhibit 651. Opron's approach relies upon the reallocation of costs outlined in the Weekly Cost Reports. This reallocation of costs was done after the fact and done without detailed source documents. A similar reallocation of revenues has not been done by Opron. As a result, Opron's approach does not compare costs with the appropriate revenues, thereby distorting the claim.

[793] Opron's method of damage calculation was summarized by Copeland in exhibit 769. The first objective of the damage calculation method was to determine which items of work were affected by the breaches of the contract and which items of work were not affected. This determination created two broad classes of work, referred to generally as the affected work and the unaffected work. By virtue of the manner of presentation of the damage calculation in Schedule I of Copeland's report, exhibit 651, these classifications were also referred to at trial as items "above the line" (affected items of work for which a claim is made) and items "below the line" (unaffected items of work for which no claim is made). Those two broad classifications were then further subdivided into various work items.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[794] The first step was to determine Opron's total cost for the construction of the Paddle River dam. Opron's costs for the Paddle River project were recorded in its general ledger. The general ledger documents were reviewed by both Cameron and Copeland. The purpose of the review was to confirm that the amounts recorded in the general ledger were in fact spent at Paddle River. Where necessary, adjustments were made to remove from the total cost shown in the general ledger any amounts which did not relate to Paddle River.

[795] The general ledger was created and maintained for accounting purposes. The general ledger did not allocate and record costs on a work item by work item basis for each job, it only recorded total costs for each project, broken down into five accounts. For the purposes of the damage calculation, the general ledger was used only to determine the total cost incurred by Opron on the Paddle River project. The supporting and source documentation underlying the general ledger, such as invoices, was then used to reconcile various areas of the costs recorded.

[796] Opron maintained a set of records at the job site entitled Weekly Cost Reports. The Weekly Cost Reports (exhibits 618A and 618B) were a management tool employed by Opron to provide a record of the costs expended on the project. Those costs were broken down and allocated to individual items of work. The Weekly Cost Reports were set up so that there was generally at least one work item listed on the report for each pay item identified in the contract. The Weekly Cost Report also separated costs in two major categories, direct costs and indirect costs. Direct costs are the costs of the labour, equipment, fuel, material or subcontractors required to complete a given item of work. Indirect costs are costs for the job as a whole, or costs that apply to several work items. Indirect costs include items such as superintendents, surveying, the costs associated with the camp, equipment repairs and equipment servicing.

[797] Opron also tracked the amount of work performed in each of the individual items shown on the Weekly Cost Reports. By comparing the cost to the work performed to the amount of the work completed, Opron was able to use the Weekly Cost Reports to track its financial progress on the project. The Weekly Cost Reports were prepared by Opron's field staff, based upon the daily time sheet estimates of various other costs such as equipment and fuel. The Weekly Cost Reports were not formal accounting documents nor were they a direct part of the accounting system employed by Opron.

[798] The starting point for the allocation of costs into the various work items shown on the Weekly Cost Reports was Opron's time sheets. The time sheets were completed daily. The time sheets recorded the description of the work performed that day and the labour and equipment hours employed on that work. The man-hours and equipment hours for the various types of equipment were cumulated to the described item of work. The costs of the various items of work were determined by multiplying the equipment and labour hours by the estimated hourly costs for labour, equipment and fuel. Other costs such as those arising from subcontracts were allocated on the basis of the amount of work performed multiplied by the full cost to Opron of that work as defined by the various subcontract agreements. Similarly, purchases of various supplies and material made for the project were allocated to the work item to which the purchase applied.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[799] The Weekly Cost Reports were not intended to record the total costs of the PRD project, with the accuracy required for formal accounting purposes. The Weekly Cost Reports were prepared using, in part, estimates of various costs. The actual costs, as recorded on invoices and other records, were generally not available until weeks or even months after the Weekly Cost Reports were prepared. These actual costs were, as stated above, recorded in the general ledger.

[800] However, the Weekly Cost Reports do provide a basis upon which to allocate the actual costs from the general ledger to the various items of work performed. The Weekly Cost Reports were used in the damage calculation as the basis upon which the total cost, from the adjusted general ledger, was allocated between the items of work.

[801] Step 3 of the damage calculation was simply a comparison of the costs recorded by partially reconciled Weekly Cost Reports to the total cost recorded in the general ledger.

[802] Step 4 of the damage calculation was to group the direct costs for the numerous work items as recorded on the Weekly Cost Reports into the 15 items which appear on the Schedule I of the damage calculation, exhibit 651. This step involved a review of the various work items listed in the Weekly Cost Reports to determine into which damage calculation item those Weekly Cost Report items should be placed. The costs recorded on the partially reconciled (following Step 2) Weekly Cost Reports for the various work items were then cumulated so that an interim total cost for each of the various work items was determined.

[803] Step 5 was the allocation of the difference between the partially reconciled Weekly Cost Reports and the actual total cost expended at Paddle River as recorded by the general ledger for the various items of work identified in Step 4. The purpose of this step was to ensure that the total direct cost, from the general ledger for the Paddle River project was included in the work items contained in the damage calculation.

[804] Steps 4 and 5 dealt only with the direct costs as shown on the Weekly Cost Reports and the difference between the partially reconciled Weekly Cost Reports and the general ledger.

[805] Step 6 was the allocation of the indirect costs as recorded in the Weekly Cost Reports to the various damage calculation items.

[806] Step 7 was the allocation of the revenues received by Opron from Alberta Environment into the same damage calculation items as had been identified in Step 4. The total revenue received is recorded in Alberta Environment's Progress Estimate 21, included in exhibit 617. Three of Opron's submitted unit rates, mobilization and demobilization, grubbing and impervious borrow, had been, to a limited extent, unbalanced. The method of the allocation of the revenues removed and eliminated the effects of the slight imbalance in the submitted unit rates. It was important that the revenues allocated to the items match with the costs allocated, so that an appropriate comparison could be made.

[807] Step 8 was the comparison of the costs, plus a margin, to the revenue received to determine the amount of the damages suffered by Opron. Certain of the damage calculation items were calculated on the basis that those items were extra work. In those cases the value of the extra work was determined by reference to the hours worked, multiplied by the appropriate hourly rate as defined by the contract and deducting the amount of the revenue received to determine the amount of the damages suffered by Opron with respect to those items.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[808] The analysis of Opron's approach which follows will consider what assumptions are made by Opron when proposing its approach. Then, there will be a review of these assumptions to determine whether there is a factual basis, as presented in the evidence, to support the assumptions. Some of the assumptions are:

(a) all cost overruns are the responsibility of the defendant;

(b) costs as recorded in the general ledger are accurate;

(c) the cost collection system implemented by Opron is accurate and can be used to allocate costs in the claim format proposed by Opron;

(d) costs and related revenues have been consistently allocated to the various claim and nonclaim items;

(e) the work done by the subcontractors in the pervious and impervious areas can, for the purpose of the claim, be separated from the work done by Opron's forces; and

(f) it is possible, given Opron's records, to accurately allocate costs and revenues.

[809] After one gets past Opron's assumptions and the validity of these assumptions, one is faced with the inherent weaknesses in Opron's approach and the calculation of its claim. In this regard, the following matters will be considered:

(a) impact of Opron's unbalanced bid on the claim as presented by Opron;

(b) impact of the treatment of certain costs as indirect costs during the bid and then treating these same costs as direct costs during the costing of the actual job;

(c) impact of Opron's failure to account for the use of an average unit price for the pervious and impervious aspects of the job when presenting its claim (hard work v. easy work);

(d) impact of Opron treating a portion of its claim as extra work even though the work in question is not extra work as defined by the contract;

(e) impact of the Weekly Cost Reports not being in the same format as Opron's proposed claim; and

(f) impact of Opron's failure to successfully reconcile the costs as recorded in the general ledger with the costs as recorded in the Weekly Cost Reports and the treatment of the resulting "unallocated costs".

[810] In addition to the above, Opron's claim as outlined in exhibit 651 will be considered. Also, Opron's allocation of costs and revenues relating to Mobilization and Demobilization and Care of Water along with Opron's proposal with respect to margin will be considered.

[811] Before proceeding any further it is important to note that whichever approach is used to calculate damages, the calculation quantifies the total cost overrun. This cost overrun is the starting point for the quantification of damages. Cost overruns which have no relationship to the alleged breaches or actions of the defendant such as bid errors, unbalancing the bid, errors in production, errors in supervision, errors in labour and equipment utilization, errors in scheduling, errors in subcontracting and errors relating to the plaintiff's misinterpretation of the weather conditions must be deducted. When these deductions are made, the cost overrun which can be attributed to the claim advanced by Opron is left.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001809

[812] The calculation of damages is a question of fact, using broad principles to guide the assessment. (Penvidic Contracting Co. v. International Nickel Co. of Canada Ltd. (1975), 4 N.R. 1; 53 D.L.R.(3d) 748, at 758 (S.C.C.)). In addition to keeping the broad principles in mind, it is necessary to look at each step of the assessment process to ensure its validity. Then it is necessary to look at the entire picture to ensure the assessment makes sense. As Elton stated in his evidence, it is essential to step back and look at the end result.

[813] In terms of the broad principles, the general rule is that the plaintiff is entitled to be put into the same position, as far as money can do it, as he would have been in had the wrong not been committed. (McGregor on Damages (15th Ed. 1988), at p. 469). This general proposition is further clarified in that the measure of damages for breach of contract and tort is:

> A. Breach of Contract - the plaintiff is to be put in the position it would have been in had the contract been performed as agreed.
>
> B. Tort - the plaintiff is to be put in the position it would have been in had the misrepresentation not been made.

[814] As set out in McGregor on Damages (15th Ed. 1988), at p. 469, para. 727:

> "... In contract, however, the wrong consists not in the making but in the breaking of the contract and therefore the plaintiff is entitled to be put into the position he would have been in if the contract had never been broken, or in other words, if the contract had been performed. The plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for the loss of his bargain. In tort, on the other hand, no question of loss of bargain can arise: the plaintiff is not complaining of failure to implement a promise but of failure to leave him alone. The measure of damages in tort is therefore to be assessed on the basis of restoring as far as possible the status quo ante."

[815] Thus, in contract, the plaintiff is entitled to recover his loss of bargain and in tort the plaintiff is entitled to be restored to the position he would have been had the representation not been made - put the money back into the plaintiff's pocket which the plaintiff spent because of the misrepresentation. Simply put, the tortious measure of damages does not include loss of bargain or profit. Further, the tortious measure of damages is used when calculating damages based on fraudulent misrepresentation or the tort of deceit or fraud. (S.M. Waddams The Law of Damages (2nd Ed. 1992), p. 5-19). Thus, depending on how the action is framed and decided, the plaintiff may or may not be entitled to recover its loss of bargain or profit.

[816] A second general principle is that the plaintiff is only entitled to recover losses which can be tied to the breach or tortious act complained of. Briefly, the plaintiff is calculating its damages by totalling its cost and adding a sizeable component for margin and then deducting revenues. As will be discussed later, this approach is inappropriate because it fails to deal with items which affect the plaintiff's loss but which have no relationship to the alleged breach of contract or the alleged tortious act. The losses or cost overruns which can be attributed to the plaintiff and which are independent of the allegations presently being considered, must be deducted from the claim. This was set out by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in the decision Morrison-Knudsen Co. Inc. et al. v. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority (1978), 85 D.L.R.(3d) 186 (B.C.C.A.), at p. 248:

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

> "If the respondents are given the full contract price, including the price for extra work, the full compensation for any damage flowing from breaches, we do not consider that the result would be unfair or unequitable or unjust. It may be that they will lose money on the job, but there is nothing inherently unjust, inequitable or unfair about that. Their bid may have been low or they might not have worked efficiently."

[817] These broad principles should be kept in mind when considering the calculation of damages which follows.

[818] In order to properly quantify the plaintiff's claim, it is essential that the costs and revenues are properly identified and then set off against the other. The revenues are determined during the bid as set out in the unit prices. Thus, if as the plaintiff suggests the costs and revenues should be subdivided, there must be a rational basis for the proposed claim items and evidence to support the allocation of both costs and revenues to the claim or nonclaim item. One can not do as the plaintiff has done and say that they have identified costs for certain nonclaim items and accordingly the remaining costs must be claim items. There must be proof on a balance of probabilities that the costs in question should be allocated to the claim item in question.

[819] After identifying the costs and completing the proper allocation of the costs to various items, there must be a corresponding allocation of the appropriate revenue to the various items. The plaintiff has not allocated revenues so that revenue follows the appropriate costs and, as a result, certain nonclaim items have inflated profits while certain claim items have greater losses.

Modified Total Cost Approach - Crown's Proposal

[820] The Crown proposes the use of the modified total cost approach as the appropriate method of quantifying the plaintiff's claim. The modified total cost approach starts with total costs, adds margin, if appropriate, and then deducts total revenues, leaving the total cost overrun. It has been agreed by Elton, the defendant's witness, the Extra Work as defined in the contract and identified by the plaintiff as Extra Work in nonclaim Item 15 in Schedule 1 of exhibit 651 can be separated from the remaining items. This separation is possible because of the nature of the "Extra Work", in that it has been paid on a force account basis and the costs and revenues have been recorded separately and it is not interrelated with the other work. This is the only item which is clearly not interrelated with the remaining costs and revenues, and accordingly is the only item which can be separated from the claim calculation.

[821] An outline of the defendant's proposed modified total cost approach is attached as Schedule "A". Using this approach, the total cost overrun or the starting point of the plaintiff's total claim is $2,212,111. This amount includes margin calculated at 9.88%. It should be noted that the defendant's calculation in Schedule "A" has used the total costs as indicated in the Weekly Cost Reports and has not included the unallocated costs of $280,472, being the difference between the general ledger and the Weekly Cost Reports. (The general ledger being $280,472 more than the Weekly Cost Reports.) The rationale for not including the unallocated costs in the total costs is that the plaintiff has not provided any conclusive evidence to indicate where the alleged costs of $280,472 were incurred. Further, evidence has been given that these costs may not even relate to the project.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[822] The defendant's use of the modified total cost approach calculates the total cost overrun for the entire project to be $2,212,111. No attempt has been made at this point to determine if this amount relates to the claim of the plaintiff or relates to actions of the plaintiff totally independent of the claim. As discussed earlier, the $2,212,111 is a starting point from which errors made by the plaintiff with respect to the plaintiff's bid, scheduling, planning, equipment selection and utilization, efficiency, losses due to weather and other inefficiencies related to the plaintiff's operation must be deducted.

[823] It should be noted that the plaintiff's claim relating to the impervious aspect of the work is essentially two claims; one, relating to the alleged scope changes in the foundation work and the other relating to impact costs from the pervious work. On an arbitrary basis, the Crown proposes that one-half of the impervious claim arises out of the alleged scope changes in the foundation and the other half of the impervious claim arises out of the impact claim from the pervious work. This proposed split is based on the amount of time the plaintiff is alleged to have experienced problems in the foundation work versus the amount of time the plaintiff is alleged to have experienced problems because of the pervious work in the 1982 season. Basically, Opron alleges that it encountered problems in the foundation area in August and September, 1982, and that problems were encountered with the supply of pervious material in October and November, 1982.

[824] As Opron has failed to breakdown this claim, the split proposed is a best guess based on the timing of cost overruns.

(A) Total Cost Approach, Pervious Alone

[825] Schedule "B" outlines the total cost overruns in the pervious operation using a modified total cost approach and using the items as identified by the plaintiff as relating to the pervious aspect of the project. The identified items in this calculation are taken from Copeland's report (Schedule 1, exhibit 651). The items from Schedule 1 of exhibit 651 are:

(a) Item 3 - Pervious Borrow Impacts, 1982/83.

(b) Item 5 - Downstream Channels, Extra Work. The costs included are the costs identified in the Weekly Cost Reports. The costs proposed by the plaintiff, being the equipment hour costs as based on Alberta Transportation rates, have not been used. The Alberta Transportation rates are for extra work items and merely inflate the plaintiff's costs from the actual costs recorded in the Weekly Cost Reports. This work is not extra work as defined by the contract.

(c) Item 11 - Gravel Items and Riprap, Sub to Maio - this item has been included as it relates directly to the pervious operation as set out in the bid and estimate. Item 11 is included in the calculation in order to ensure a complete and accurate picture of the total costs and revenues relating to the pervious operation.

(d) Item 13 - Riprap, Subcontracted to Harico and Schafer - this item relates directly to the pervious operation as calculated and quantified in the bid and estimate. The same rationale applies as discussed in Item 11 above and will be discussed in more detail later.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

(e) Item 1 - Maio Public Works Act, if this item is to be included anywhere it should be included in the calculations relating to the pervious aspect of the claim as it relates to Maio's operation.

[826] As discussed above, part of the impervious claim is an impact claim arising out of problems encountered with the supply of pervious material. This impact claim should not be included in the impervious claim as it relates directly to the pervious aspect of the work. Thus, the impact claim which has been deducted from the impervious claim (being 50% of the impervious claim as calculated in Schedule "C") should be added to the pervious claim as calculated in Schedule "B". By doing this, all aspects of the pervious claim will be grouped together.

[827] Again, the cost overruns relating to the pervious work, in the amount of $1,921,050, as outlined in Schedule "B", is a starting point. From this amount any losses or costs resulting from the inefficiencies of the plaintiff or its subcontractors and losses due to bid inefficiencies must be deducted.

(B) Total Cost Approach - Impervious Alone

[828] Schedule "C" outlines the total cost overrun in the impervious operation using a modified total cost approach. As in the pervious calculation, the items used to determine the cost overruns in the impervious operation are the items identified by the plaintiff as relating to the impervious aspect of the project. The identified items in this calculation are taken from Copeland's Report (Schedule 1 of exhibit 651). The items included are:

(a) Item 2 - Impervious Impacts re: Pervious Borrow and Costs Relating to Scope Changes, 1982/83.

(b) Item 4 - Downstream Foundation - Extra Work. As with the pervious claim, Downstream Channels - Extra Work, the costs included are the actual costs as recorded by the plaintiff, not the costs as calculated pursuant to the Alberta Transportation rates as the Alberta Transportation rates have no relation to the plaintiff's costs. Again, the work related to the downstream foundation is not extra work as contemplated by the contract and no attempt was made by the plaintiff during the period of the work to treat these costs as an extra work item.

(c) Item 10 - Dirt Items, Subcontracted to Kidco - These costs have been included in order to present the total picture of costs relating to the impervious aspect of the job. Again, the rationale for the inclusion of these costs has been briefly considered above and will be dealt with in more detail later.

[829] Costs for certain items as outlined in Schedule 1 of exhibit 651 have not been included in either Schedule "B" or Schedule "C" as the attempt was to isolate costs only relating to the pervious and impervious aspects of the job. The items not included are:

(a) Item 6 - Stilling Basin Slope Failure, Extra Work (actual costs $26,495).

(b) Item 8 - Legal and Consulting.

(c) Item 12 - Drain Pipe, Geotextile.

(d) Item 14 - Concrete Work, Subcontract to Triumph.

(e) Item 15 - Extra Work.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

(f) Item 16 - Taxable and other costs included in general ledger.

[830] The modified total cost approach, as outlined in Schedule "A", groups related items in such a fashion that revenues, as determined during the bid and estimate, follow the appropriate costs. This approach avoids the pitfalls inherent in the plaintiff's approach whereby costs, often indirect costs, are applied to claim items while the corresponding revenues are not applied to the same claim items, thereby increasing the claim. The total cost approach ensures that appropriate revenues are set off against the related costs, thus avoiding the situation of revenues being allocated to nonclaim items while the related costs are allocated to claim items thereby eliminating an illusion of profits for certain nonclaim items.

Claim Item v. Nonclaim Item - Critique Of Opron's Proposal

(A) General

[831] The plaintiff's approach, as outlined in Copeland's Report allocates costs and revenues into claim items (above the line) and nonclaim items (below the line). This allocation of costs was done by Opron personnel and not by Copeland. This approach assumes the accurate and proper allocation of both costs and revenues among the various items. Further, this approach assumes that the revenues are allocated to offset the related costs. However, this has not been achieved.

[832] The allocation undertaken by the plaintiff is subjective as it is not based upon nor supported by documents that were prepared at the time the costs were incurred. The process undertaken by the plaintiff was done after the fact and based on memory or intuition as to what allocation was appropriate. The plaintiff's main on-site document, the Weekly Cost Reports, even with all of its pitfalls, is not structured in such a way as to lend credence to the allocation of costs suggested by the plaintiff. Further, Copeland, the plaintiff's witness, must rely on the representations of the plaintiff's employees when assessing the allocation. He neither has the expertise nor the source documents to test the proposed allocation of costs. Thus, although the allocation of costs is part of Copeland's Report, these allocations are done by others with Copeland having very little input.

[833] The format of the plaintiff's claim ignores the plaintiff's estimate. The plaintiff used an average unit price when costing the bulk of the pervious and impervious aspects of the work. Yet, not all of the work was the same degree of difficulty. As a single unit price has been used for aspects of the work, it would be expected that the easier, more productive work done at the average unit price would offset the harder, more costly work done by the average unit price. However, the plaintiff's approach fails to take this into account. The plaintiff's approach does not allow the work done by Kidco, by and large the easier, more productive work paid at the average unit price, to be offset against the harder, less productive work done by the plaintiff's own forces at the average unit price. Opron's approach fails to set off the hard work against the easy work, creating the illusion of a profit in Item 10, Dirt Items, subcontracted to Kidco, a nonclaim item below the line and conversely creating the illusion of a sizeable loss in Item 2, Impervious Impacts re: Pervious Borrow and Costs relating to scope changes, 1982/83, a claim item above the line (reference to exhibit 651 - Schedule 1).

[834] The plaintiff's approach also ignores the composition of the revenues. The revenues or unit prices were determined during the bid stage and are the sum of the direct costs for a particular item, a portion of the indirect costs (or general conditions) and markup. Thus, the revenue for each item, is to recover the related direct costs, a portion of the indirect costs and markup. If, for some reason, costs are treated as indirect costs at the bid or estimate stage and then are treated as direct costs during the actual costing of the project, the result is the revenue will not be set off against the anticipated costs. Again, the result is to create an apparent loss in a particular item and an apparent corresponding profit in another item.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[835] The evidence is that the plaintiff treated some items as indirect costs during the bid stage but treated these costs in the Weekly Cost Reports as direct costs. These costs were allocated to the impervious items. As a result, the costs allocated to the impervious items have been increased without a corresponding increase of the unit price or revenue. This results in an apparent loss when the claim is structured as it is in exhibit 651. Conversely, indirect costs in other items have been reduced yet the revenues remain the same. This creates the impression of a profit in these items. This will be dealt with in greater detail later.

[836] The claim presented by the plaintiff treats Item 4, Downstream Foundation, Extra Work; Item 5, Downstream Channels, Extra Work; and Item 6, Stilling Basin Slope Failure, Extra Work as extra work and calculates the costs using Alberta Transportation rates. The effect of such treatment is to add costs to the items in question, thereby increasing the claim. This work does not fall within the definition or description of extra work as defined in the contract (exhibit 613). Nor has the plaintiff complied with the notice provisions or taken the appropriate steps to determine how the work was to be paid. Clearly, this work should not be treated as extra work for the purpose of quantifying the claim.

[837] Further, the claim as presented by the plaintiff, does not reflect any reduction for bid errors, scheduling and production inefficiencies, supervision inefficiencies, subcontractors' inefficiencies, ineffective utilization of equipment and labour, weather problems and other matters relating to the plaintiff's operation. These losses which arise from errors by the plaintiff, its employees and subcontractors, must be deducted from the total claim by whatever method the claim is calculated.

[838] In conclusion, the format of the plaintiff's claim is artificial and unduly inflates the plaintiff's claim. There are no source documents to substantiate the allocation of costs. The allocation of costs is subjective and result oriented. The claim, as presented by the plaintiff, does not follow the structure or format of the Weekly Cost Reports or general ledger nor does it follow the format of the bid. The claim does not allow revenues to be set off against the appropriate costs, thus creating the illusion of profits in nonclaim items and losses in claim items. Finally, the format ignores the fact that the plaintiff's bid was largely based on an average unit price. Again, by ignoring this there is an illusion of profits in nonclaim items and losses in claim items. These inherent weaknesses artificially increase the plaintiff's claim and accordingly the claim format proposed by the plaintiff should be rejected in favour of the defendant's modified total cost approach.

(B) Plaintiff's Claim Format - Assumptions

[839] The plaintiff has presented a claim format which divides costs and revenues into claim and nonclaim items. This approach requires certain assumptions to be made. Without these assumptions, the format as presented by the plaintiff breaks down. I propose to consider and comment on some of the assumptions made in the claim presented by the plaintiff.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

(a) All cost overruns are the responsibility of the defendant.

[840] The plaintiff has presented a claim which assumes that all cost overruns were caused by the defendant. This assumption ignores the realities of the job. It ignores any errors made by the plaintiff during its bid and estimate through to the implementation and completion of the work. The evidence presented indicates errors from the bid stage to and throughout the work stages and these cost overruns or errors must be deducted from the claim.

[841] Assuming liability on the part of the defendant and regardless of what approach is used to calculate damages, the cost overruns and errors or inefficiencies caused by the plaintiff must be deducted from the claim as calculated.

(b) Costs as recorded in the general ledger are accurate.

[842] As proof for its claim, the plaintiff has attempted a reconciliation of the costs recorded in the general ledger and the costs recorded in the Weekly Cost Reports. The plaintiff has referred to this step as a partial reconciliation. However, it is in fact a failed reconciliation. The plaintiff can not account for the difference between the costs recorded in the general ledger and the costs recorded in the Weekly Cost Reports. The costs recorded in general ledger are $280,472 more than the costs recorded in the Weekly Cost Report. The difference of $280,472 has been referred to as the "unallocated costs".

[843] The first issue is whether these "unallocated costs" should be included in Opron's costs when calculating the claim. Elton gave evidence that the "unallocated costs" can relate to anything, including something other than the Paddle River Dam. Even though these costs are uncertain, the plaintiff has taken these unallocated costs and allocated them to various claim and nonclaim items. As the origin of these costs can not be determined, these unallocated costs should not be included in Opron's claim.

[844] Secondly, even if I find that these unallocated costs should form part of Opron's costs on this job, the plaintiff assumes its allocation of these costs is proper. The plaintiff's allocation of these "unallocated costs" among the various items is set out in Schedule IV of exhibit 651.

[845] The plaintiff has allocated $277,119, or approximately 98.8% of the "unallocated costs" to claim items, thereby increasing the claim. In support of its allocation of the "unallocated costs" the plaintiff points to its attempted reconciliation. However, Elton gave evidence that such reconciliation is not complete nor can it be relied upon. A reconciliation is only effective if it is a complete reconciliation, if all cost centres have been considered and reconciled. The plaintiff is taking its partial reconciliation of third party costs and nonclaim items, and saying these costs do not belong here so they must belong in the claim items. The plaintiff can not attempt to reconcile one area and then use this to justify an allocation of costs to the remaining areas. One can not allocate costs using a process of elimination.

(c) The cost collection system implemented by Opron is accurate and can be used to allocate costs in the claim format proposed by Opron.

[846] Although the format of the Weekly Cost Reports is not structured as the plaintiff's claim is presented, there is an assumption that the costs incurred on site have been properly identified and recorded in the Weekly Cost Reports. Elton's evidence is that the Weekly Cost Reports contained many arithmetic errors. In addition, there are several versions of Weekly Cost Reports for the same period and several times where the Weekly Cost Reports were not prepared in a timely fashion. The Weekly Cost Reports were not providing the timely or accurate information that was expected of them.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[847] Coupled with the above, there were no ongoing successful attempts to reconcile the Weekly Cost Reports to the general ledger. Given these errors and shortcomings, the Weekly Cost Reports do not provide the necessary information to assist in the allocation of costs as has been done by the plaintiff.

[848] In conclusion, the Weekly Cost Reports were not always prepared in a timely fashion and second versions for certain periods were prepared. As Elton stated, the different version of Weekly Cost Reports for the same period shows different cumulative costs for certain bid items. There does not appear to be any explanation except that there was an error. This casts doubt on the validity of the allocation of costs among the various items.

(d) Revenues follow costs - costs and related revenues have been consistently allocated to the various claim and nonclaim items.

[849] Although this will be dealt with in more detail later, it is important to remember that it is not only necessary to properly allocate costs to the various claim and nonclaim items proposed by the plaintiff, but it is also necessary to allocate the corresponding revenues. When allocating costs among the various claim and nonclaim items, the plaintiff has virtually ignored the costs as structured in the bid and estimate. The plaintiff has reworked the costs in order to develop the present format of the claim. However, no similar step has been taken with respect to the allocation of revenues.

[850] The plaintiff has applied the revenues as determined in the estimate. The plaintiff has for example, taken costs relating to impervious items and divided these costs into nonclaim items and claim items but the revenues have not been determined and divided beyond the average unit price as established in the bid.

[851] By failing to break down the revenues in a similar fashion as was done for costs, the plaintiff has not ensured that the revenues relating to a particular cost have followed those costs into the item where the costs were allocated. Thus, the claim as presently structured does not give a true picture of where profits and losses occurred.

(e) The work done by the subcontractors in the pervious and impervious areas can, for the purpose of the claim, be separated from the work done by Opron's forces.

[852] One must recall, when Opron bid this job, they bid the job on the basis that their company would be the contractor for the entire job, not just parts of it. It follows then, when one is determining the plaintiff's profit or loss on the job, the entire job must be considered and not just selected parts.

[853] In the impervious and pervious work, the plaintiff's revenues are determined by average unit prices. During the bid stage, the plaintiff completed a series of assessments and came to an average unit price for the impervious aspect of the job (except for total unit price for impervious borrow excavation). The plaintiff has not increased the unit price for the harder, less productive work nor reduced the unit price for the easier, highly productive work. In order to properly assess the cost of the impervious work, the easier high productive work must be set off against the harder less productive work. Without setting off these aspects of the job, the harder less productive work, done at an average unit price, will result in a loss or smaller profit than the corresponding easier high production work. Thus, in order to properly and completely analyze the profit and loss picture for impervious work, one must look at the entire job and not just one aspect of the work.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[854] The claim format used by Opron does not treat any of the work differently. The revenue for work done by Opron and work done by Kidco, Opron's subcontractor, are calculated using the average unit price as initially calculated in the estimate. In order to use the approach suggested by the plaintiff, there must be an assumption that both Opron and Kidco are doing an equal share of the harder less productive work, otherwise the use of an average unit price distorts the profit or losses. Although the format proposed by Opron requires this assumption, it is clear from the evidence that Opron did the bulk of the foundation work, which was the harder, less productive work, while Kidco did the bulk of the slope work which was the easier, more productive work.

[855] Given the above, the work done by Opron, being the harder, less productive work and paid at the average unit price will tend to result in an apparent loss while the easier, more productive work done by Kidco at the same average unit price will tend to result in an apparent greater profit. Thus, by dividing the impervious work into work done by Kidco (nonclaim item) and work done by Opron (claim item) the profit and loss picture is distorted. For this reason, the claim format presented by the plaintiff is invalid as all the work related to the impervious aspect of the job must be considered together.

[856] A similar situation occurs in the pervious aspect of the job. Again, for revenue purposes we are dealing with an average unit price. However, the work done by Maio was done closer to the embankment resulting in a shorter haul. The work done by Opron's forces was farther from the embankment, resulting in a longer haul which would be more costly. Although Opron's costs would be greater than Maio's corresponding costs, there has been no attempt to adjust the revenues as determined by the average unit price. Thus, again there appears to be a cost overrun incurred by Opron and a corresponding gain by Maio simply because of the use of an average unit price.

(f) It is possible, given Opron's records, to accurately allocate costs and revenues.

[857] The plaintiff's approach uses a basic assumption that it is possible to accurately allocate costs and revenues. This allocation is particularly important given the format of the plaintiff's claim, allocating costs between claim items and nonclaim items. If costs, which are properly costs related to nonclaim items, are applied to claim items, the claim is increased. The same problem applies with respect to revenues, if revenues relating to claim items are applied to nonclaim items, the total claim increases. Thus, given the plaintiff's claim format, it is imperative that costs and revenues are accurately allocated to the various claim and nonclaim items.

[858] The plaintiff's allocation of costs and revenues is very subjective and lacks documentary support. The claim as presented does not have its origin in any earlier documents. Neither the bid documents nor the Weekly Cost Reports isolate work done by subcontractors. However, the plaintiff has used the Weekly Cost Reports, along with time sheets, as a basis for allocating costs in its claim even though the Weekly Cost Reports do not divide the cost of impervious work and pervious work between Opron's forces and Opron's subcontractors.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[859] Because of the lack of cost reporting documents prepared contemporaneously with the work and because there are no documents which are set up in a similar format as the claim presented by Opron, Opron personnel have, after the fact, allocated costs among the claim items and nonclaim items. This allocation is based partially on memory, intuition and what appears proper. Given the necessity of an accurate allocation of costs and revenue among the various claim and nonclaim items and the lack of financial documents to support the allocation, the accuracy of the allocation is very suspect. The evidence presented does not support the assumption that costs and revenues were accurately allocated and accordingly the plaintiff's claim format is invalid.

[860] If the plaintiff's claim format is to be used, the plaintiff must do a detailed analysis of revenues, so as to ensure that the appropriate revenues are following the appropriate costs. The plaintiff must do more than simply calculate and allocate revenues as determined in the bid. The plaintiff must ensure revenues have been allocated on the same basis as the costs have been allocated. No such exercise has been undertaken.

[861] In conclusion, the above assumptions must be made in order to rationalize the approach used by Opron to present its claim. As the facts to support these assumptions are not present then on this basis alone, the approach used by Opron to present its claim is not appropriate.

(C) Review Of Plaintiff's Calculation Of Damages

(a) The impact of Opron's unbalanced bid on the claims as presented by Opron.

[862] There is evidence that the bid prepared by the plaintiff is an unbalanced bid. By itself, there is nothing improper with unbalancing a bid. However, the contractor gambles by moving costs in the bid from a particular item to another item.

[863] In Opron's case, it is apparent that the unit price bid for the impervious borrow excavation has been reduced in relation to the other impervious items. When working through Opron's Cost and Estimate Summary (exhibit 193), it is clear that Item 4 Foundation and Abutment Excavation, Item 5 Conduct Exit Excavation, Item 6 Spillway Excavation and Item 7 Impervious Borrow Excavation have been priced by using the same average total direct costs of $$1.02/m^3$. However, the unbalancing occurs when adding the indirect costs and markup to arrive at the unit price as bid. Item 4, Foundation and Abutment Excavation; Item 5, Conduit Exit Excavation; and Item 6, Spillway Excavation all have the same amount of indirect costs and markup applied to arrive at a common unit price of $$1.34/m^3$. However, the bid price for Item 7, Impervious Borrow Excavation is $$1.13/m^3$. (Exhibit 613, vol. 1, p. 15, item 2-2, Tender Form Schedule "A"), of which $$1.02/m^3$ represents direct costs. Thus, the same extension, regarding indirect costs and markup, was not used when arriving at the unit price for impervious borrow excavation as was used when arriving at the final unit price of the other impervious items (Item 4 Foundation and Abutment Excavation, Item 5 Conduit Exit Excavation and Item 6 Spillway Excavation). Based on this review and keeping in mind that the plaintiff was bidding the impervious work on an average unit price, the unit price for impervious borrow excavation has been reduced in relation to the other impervious items.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[864] There has been evidence that the bid price for the lump sum items, Item 1 Mobilization and Demobilization and Item 2 Clearing and Grubbing, have been increased so as to ensure money up front for the project.

[865] As suggested earlier, there is nothing improper with this approach but a contractor must accept the dangers and outcome of unbalancing the bid. As in the present case, when an item is underbid, as was done by the plaintiff, the contractor is anticipating that there will not be production overruns in the bid item which has a reduced bid price. In the present case the contract quantity for impervious borrow excavation was 1,165,000m^3 yet the actual quantity excavated was 1,277,524m^3 (or 112,524m^3 more than the estimated quantity). Thus, because the plaintiff's bid approach, the plaintiff excavated 112,524m^3 more of impervious borrow excavation at a reduced unit price, a price that would recover the plaintiff's direct costs as bid and only a portion of the indirect costs and/or markup. This gamble by the plaintiff resulted in a loss in terms of this particular item, a loss which is the responsibility of the plaintiff yet which has been claimed from the defendant in the plaintiff's present claim. This loss should be deducted from the plaintiff's claim when calculating the plaintiff's damages.

(b) Impact of the treatment of certain costs as indirect costs during the bid stage and then treating these same costs as direct costs during the costing of the job.

[866] The plaintiff has altered its treatment of some indirect costs from the bid stage to the time these costs were allocated in the Weekly Cost Reports. The bid price, as set out in exhibit 193, Cost and Estimate Summary, or the Tender Form Schedule in the contract documents, is based on a totalling of the appropriate direct costs, a share of the indirect costs and mark up. This calculation results in a unit price, which is the revenue to be earned for each facet of the work. Thus, the unit price, which sets the revenues, determines how the costs for the job are to be recovered. It is the intention when allocating the indirect costs to all bid items that the revenue earned in all these items will offset a portion of the indirect costs. Thus the indirect costs are to be recovered from revenue earned for each and every bid item.

[867] The problem occurs when the costs which are treated as indirect costs during the bid, being the time when the revenues are set, are later treated as direct costs in the Weekly Cost Reports and allocated to specific items. Examples of costs which have been treated in this fashion are foreman ($243,200) and grademan ($46,800). These costs were indirect costs during the preparation of the bid, but then were treated as direct costs when costing the job. Thus, for the purpose of determining the unit price in the bid (revenue), a portion of the costs for foreman and grademan were allocated to all items identified in the bid. However, for costing purposes (in the Weekly Cost Reports and the claim) all the costs relating to foremen and grademen were costed or allocated to the impervious items. Thus, the costing or treatment of the costs is not consistent with how the revenues were determined. As a result, the revenue for some items, which during the bid included a portion of the indirect costs for foreman and grademan, do not now have any of these costs applied against the revenue earned resulting in an apparent profit. Conversely, the revenue for the impervious items, which in the bid was only to recover a portion of the indirect costs for foreman and grademan, is as a result of the costing approach implemented in the Weekly Cost Reports required to recover all costs for foreman and grademan. The result being the appearance of a cost overrun or a loss. The apparent profit in some items and the apparent loss in other items is nothing more than a paper profit or loss resulting from a change in the treatment of the indirect costs (foreman and grademan) between the bid stage and the costing stage in the Weekly Cost Reports.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[868] The problem with direct and indirect costs is further emphasized when one considers the claim format presented by the plaintiff. The format provides for certain nonclaim items and claim items. These nonclaim items, are based on bid prices which are the sum of the appropriate direct costs, a share of indirect costs and markup. As reviewed earlier, included in the indirect costs is $290,000 for foreman and grademen. Thus, the revenue for each nonclaim item is intended to capture a portion of these indirect costs. However, because foreman and grademan have been costed in the impervious items as direct costs in the Weekly Cost Reports, none of these costs were applied to the nonclaim items (except Item 10, Dirt Items Subcontracted to Kidco). Thus, as revenue to offset these costs has been calculated in the unit price and as these costs have not been charged against these nonclaim items, it is clear that an apparent paper profit will be created in the nonclaim items. Conversely, there is an apparent cost overrun in the plaintiff's impervious claim items in that all the costs relating to foremen and grademen have been charged to the impervious items yet only a portion of these costs were attributed to the impervious items when determining the unit price (revenue). Thus, there will be cost overruns in the impervious items as the revenues as bid were never intended to recover all of the costs, as costed.

[869] The impact of changing the treatment of costs from indirect costs at the bid stage to direct costs in the Weekly Cost Reports (costing stage) does not affect the total revenues and costs, or the total profit or loss. However, when dealing with these changes in the claim format as presented by the plaintiff there is an impact from item to item. Some items, generally the nonclaim items will show a paper profit while the impervious claim items will show a paper loss. Thus, the plaintiff's claim format, dividing costs and revenues between nonclaim items and claim items is flawed when costs are treated differently between the bid stage and the costing stage without a corresponding change being made for revenues. As stated earlier, the plaintiff has not taken any steps to recalculate or reallocate revenue among the various items. Therefore, the claim approach adopted by the plaintiff is misleading. To use this approach will result in an overstatement of the claim and will reward the plaintiff for losses which in fact have not occurred.

[870] In addition to the above, the Weekly Cost Reports also indicate that costs were recorded as indirect costs in 1982 but there is no reference to related costs in 1983. A

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001821

breakdown of these costs, as indicated in the year end Weekly Cost Reports are as follows:

	1982	1983
Mechanic and Truck	80,658	N/R*
Serviceman	45,034	N/R
Gen. Site Labour	18,083	N/R
Site Lighting	58,900	N/R
Fuel Tanks & Pumps	14,530	N/R
Fuel Trucks	22,517	N/R
Equipment Repair	134,514	N/R

from Page 2 of 4 of Weekly Cost Reports - Exhibit 651

*No Reference in 1983 Weekly Cost Reports

It should be noted that in the 1983 Weekly Cost Reports the portion dealing with "2A gravel - 1983" including Servicing with total recorded direct costs of $101,463. However, there is no reference to any of the indirect costs, as recorded in 1982, being treated as indirect costs in 1983. Thus again we are dealing with costs which were bid as indirect costs and were to be offset against revenue earned in all items but later being treated as direct costs somewhere in the Weekly Cost Reports.

[871] As with the earlier discussion, the costs have been treated differently from the bid stage to the 1983 construction season but there has been no attempt to make a corresponding reallocation of revenue. The plaintiff's approach has "loaded up" indirect costs in a claim item, without allocating the corresponding revenues and this results in a cost overrun in that item and ultimately an increased claim. The problem associated with this internal allocation of costs can be remedied by looking at the costs and revenues from a global perspective by using the approach suggested by the defendant.

[872] This concern is further illustrated when one considers several nonclaim items, as outlined by the plaintiff in Schedule 1 of exhibit 651, including Item 13 Riprap, Subcontracted to Harico and Schafer and Item 14 Concrete Work, Subcontracted to Triumph. When bid, the unit price for these items was the sum of the appropriate direct costs, a portion of the indirect costs and markup. As with the earlier discussion involving the treatment of foremen and grademen, the revenue for Items 13 and 14 is calculated on the basis of recovering a portion of the indirect costs. The revenue earned in these items is intended to offset a portion of the indirect costs. However, Schedule V of exhibit 651 indicates that no indirect costs have been allocated to nonclaim items 13 and 14. Thus, costs as bid have not been set off against revenues as earned, creating an apparent profit in the nonclaim items 13 and 14 and a corresponding loss in the other items. This concern also applies to the other nonclaim items where, for whatever reason, only a small portion of the indirect costs have been costed to an item compared to the allocation of indirect costs when determining the unit price (revenue) during the bid phase. Thus again there is a change in the treatment of indirect costs from the bid stage to the costing stage. The result is the loading of indirect costs in items, generally claim items, that were never intended to be able to recover these costs.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[873] Because of the format used by the plaintiff to present its claim, the loss is being overstated. The plaintiff may respond by arguing that the change in the indirect costs from nonclaim items to claim items was to reflect where in fact those costs were actually incurred. This argument is fine as long as revenues have been allocated to reflect this "reality". However, if the revenues are allocated on the basis of the bid, without any attempt to change the allocation as was done with the costs, then there still is distortion as the revenues have not been set up to follow the costs. If the plaintiff is to change the allocation of the costs there must be a corresponding change of the allocation of the revenues. The plaintiff must either change the allocation of both revenues and costs or leave the allocation of costs as in the bid. The plaintiff cannot change the allocation of costs without changing the allocation of revenues. By doing this, the cost overruns or profits have been distorted.

[874] The only true indication of loss is the modified total cost approach as this approach is not affected by the change in treatment of indirect costs as the change is within a closed system. No longer are there claim and nonclaim items and a concern that revenues are being applied against the appropriate costs. No longer is there a creation of apparent cost overruns in claim items and apparent profits in nonclaim items. If the modified total cost approach is not used, the plaintiff must take the next step and reallocate revenues, a step which has not been taken but a step which must be taken to accurately reflect the alleged loss incurred on the job.

(c) Impact of Opron's failure to account for the use of an average unit price for the pervious and impervious aspects of the job when presenting its claim (hard work v. easy work).

[875] The plaintiff's claim format assumes that impervious and pervious work can be divided into claim and nonclaim items. The plaintiff divides the work based on work done by subcontractors versus work done by Opron's forces. However, again we return to the issue of "easy work v. hard work" and the average unit price. As reviewed earlier, the impervious work, except for the unbalancing of impervious borrow excavation, was bid on an average unit price for both excavation and compaction. Also, the pervious work is based on a single unit price, even though some excavation involves a longer haul which is more expensive. When preparing its bid Opron assumed that the hard work would be offset against the easy work and hoped that when the job was completed it would realize a profit in both the impervious and pervious aspects of the job.

[876] Using an average unit price is proper as long as there is no attempt to break down the impervious and pervious aspects of the job into claim and nonclaim items. If there is such an attempt, and the nonclaim item involves the easier more productive work at the average unit price there is bound to be a profit and if the claim item involves the more difficult, less productive work at the average unit price there more likely will be a cost overrun because no longer is there an opportunity to set off the hard work against the easy work. Thus, in order for the claim format advanced by the plaintiff to be proper, there must be an analysis of the type of work being done in the claim items versus the nonclaim items and then there must be a change in the unit price (revenue) to reflect whether the work is hard work or easy work. If this is done, one will have a better understanding as to whether there is a profit or cost overrun and its degree. However, this exercise has not been done, nor is it probably possible to complete the analysis. Thus, the plaintiff's claim format leaves an artificial and inaccurate picture of profit and loss, which has the effect of inflating the claim advanced by the plaintiff.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[877] In order to avoid this inaccurate view of the plaintiff's claim it is necessary to group together all the impervious work as a single item and the pervious work as another single item. The modified total cost approach gives an accurate picture of the cost overruns by allowing hard work to be offset against easy work which avoids the pitfalls of not applying the appropriate revenue against the appropriate costs. Again, the plaintiff's approach to the damage calculation distorts the assessment by not treating costs and revenues in a similar fashion and this can only be rectified by using the modified total cost approach.

(d) Impact of Opron treating a portion of its claim as extra work even though the work in question is not extra work as defined by the contract.

[878] The plaintiff's claim format creates three stand alone claims, being Claim Item 4, Downstream Foundation, Extra Work; Claim Item 5, Downstream Channels, Extra Work; and Claim Item 6, Stilling Basin Slope Failure, Extra Work. Again the problem goes back to the earlier discussion with respect to allocation of costs, the costs cannot be allocated from the existing documents available and there is no basis for advancing a separate claim.

[879] With respect to the downstream foundation claim, there is no separate item in the Weekly Cost Reports to identify the costs relating to the claim item. The allocation was done by Opron personnel well after the fact using time sheets, which describe the areas in question differently, along with intuition and what was alleged to appear reasonable. The effect of this allocation has been to identify the equipment and labour hours involved, treat this work as extra work as defined in the contract and then complete the extensions to determine the claim using Alberta Transportation rates. Once one gets past the problems of allocation, one notes that the effect of using this approach is to claim a sizeable profit in terms of total costs. The profit in terms of costs is as follows:

1. Downstream Foundation - 21.55%
2. Downstream Channels - 34.84%
3. Stilling Basin - 28.10%

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

(e) Impact of the Weekly Cost Reports not being in the same format as Opron's proposed claim.

[880] In addition to the problems outlined earlier with respect to the treatment of costs and revenues, if the plaintiff's claim format is to be utilized, the plaintiff must ensure that the costs have been properly allocated among the various items. First, the plaintiff must establish the accuracy of the Weekly Cost Reports, which were the main on-site documents relating to cost allocation. Contrary to the plaintiff's suggestion, the Weekly Cost Reports were not a particularly useful tool. The Weekly Cost Reports contained many arithmetic errors.

[881] Even if the Weekly Cost Reports are accepted as being accurate, they are not in the same format as the claim. The nonclaim and claim items are not, by and large, recorded as such in the Weekly Cost Reports. The Weekly Cost Reports use the job descriptions as found in the bid. However, the claim format used by the plaintiff largely ignores these descriptions by creating new items and then allocating the costs. The allocation from the Weekly Cost Reports to the claim as structured is a subjective allocation which is not precise. This again sheds doubt on the accuracy of the plaintiff's claim format as it is essential to be able to divide costs between nonclaim items and claim items. This allocation is particularly difficult in that costs relating to both impervious and pervious work are allocated to both nonclaim items and claim items, even though there is no such allocation in the Weekly Cost Reports. Again, this illustrates the artificiality of the claim.

(f) Impact of Opron's failure to successfully reconcile the costs as recorded in the general ledger with the costs as recorded in the Weekly Cost Reports and the treatment of the resulting "unallocated costs".

[882] Indicative of the weakness of the Weekly Cost Reports are the costs in the amount of $280,472, which have been referred to as the "unallocated costs". As discussed earlier, these costs arise out of Opron's failure to reconcile the Weekly Cost Reports to the general ledger; the costs recorded in the general ledger being $280,472 more than the costs recorded in the Weekly Cost Reports. The plaintiff suggests that the general ledger total is accurate and thereby acknowledges the inaccuracies of the Weekly Cost Reports.

[883] To further illustrate this weakness, one must only refer to exhibit 881, which indicates a variance between the general ledger and Weekly Cost Reports in excess of $1,500,000 in October, 1982 (where the costs in the Weekly Cost Reports exceeded the costs recorded in the general ledger) to a variance in December, 1983, of over $500,000 (where the costs in the general ledger exceeded the costs in the Weekly Cost Reports). Elton's evidence is that such a variance is not normal and again illustrates the inherent weakness in the Weekly Cost Reports as an accurate tool for allocating costs.

[884] The plaintiff suggests that the $280,472 is not material and should be expected on a job of this nature. However, Elton's evidence is that this amount is material and falls squarely within the materiality guidelines of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants (see exhibit 883). Coupled with the above, the unallocated costs of $280,472 is in excess of 33% of the total profit as bid on this project. In these terms, it is submitted, the unallocated costs of $280,472 is material and a loss of this amount to any contractor would cause the contractor a great deal of concern.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[885] Once one gets past the significance of the $280,472 of unallocated costs, one is faced with the plaintiff's treatment of these costs. As discussed earlier, the plaintiff has allocated these costs, whatever they are, back into the nonclaim and claim items. However, 98.8% of these costs have been allocated to the claim items, which effectively increases the claim by $277,119, plus the profit component which the plaintiff claims.

[886] Elton gave evidence that the unallocated costs of $280,472 can not be identified and may not even relate to this job. Given this uncertainty, Elton's approach of deducting the $280,472 from the total costs as indicated in the general ledger is the preferred approach. Thus, as illustrated in Elton's Restated Claim (exhibit 879), the appropriate starting point for total costs is $12,300,333, being the total costs as recorded in the Weekly Cost Reports minus $122,334 which is the net errors located to date in the Weekly Cost Reports. (See exhibit 822).

[887] The modified total cost approach proposed by the defendant (Schedule "A") is calculated on the basis of Elton's evidence, whereby the starting point for total costs is $12,300,333, which is the plaintiff's suggestion for total costs minus the $280,472 of unallocated undetermined costs.

(D) Plaintiff's Claim Items - As Structured In Exhibit 651

[888] Next, specific comments will be made with respect to the claim as proposed by the plaintiff.

(a) Item 1 - Maio Public Works Act.

[889] If I allow this item, the costs claimed relate to the work done by Maio. The plaintiff's claim format has separated the work subcontracted to Maio as a nonclaim item and using the plaintiff's allocations of costs and revenues the plaintiff is suggesting that revenues exceed costs by $344,191. The weakness of the plaintiff's claim format is again illustrated by the failure to set off costs related to Maio against the "money realized" on the Maio subcontract. If the format proposed by the plaintiff is utilized, then the costs identified as Maio Public Works Act, if recoverable, should be set off against the revenue over cost which apparently was achieved in Item 11, Gravel Items and Riprap, Sub to Maio.

(b) Item 4 - Downstream Foundation, Extra Work;

Item 5 - Downstream Channels, Extra Work;

Item 6 - Stilling Basin Slope Failure, Extra Work.

[890] As discussed earlier, these items are not extra work as defined in the "Contract" nor did the plaintiff comply with the procedural requirements relating to extra work as defined in the contract. Assuming these items are claimable and the approach used to calculate this claim is acceptable, the plaintiff used an improper rate for the 773 rock truck when calculating its costs. Exhibit 665, Schedule for Rental Rates for Construction Equipment 1982 - 1983 (Alberta Transportation Rates) outlines what procedure the claimant should use to determine the hourly rate for equipment not listed in exhibit 665. The plaintiff did not take the appropriate steps to determine the unit cost of the 773 rock trucks (which is not listed in exhibit 665). Instead the plaintiff has compared the 773 rock truck to a 631D scraper and arrived at an hourly rate of $215.12. If one uses the 1982 Alberta Road Builders Association Rental Rates (exhibit 693) and compares the relative rental rates for a 631D, 637D and a 773B rock truck, to the Alberta Transportation rental rates, the hourly rate for a 773B rock truck would be either 103.87 or 113.05. The calculation is as follows:

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

	Alberta Road Builders	Alberta Transportation
631D scraper	$201.00/hour Alberta Transportation rate is 66.5% of Alberta Road Builders rate	$133.70/hour
637D scraper	$259.00/hour Alberta Transportation rate is 61.90% of Alberta Road Builders rate	$158.45/hour
773B rock truck	$170.00/hour	to be determined

[891] The rate for a 773B rock truck based on a comparison of hourly rates for 631D scraper, 637D scraper and 773B rock truck is as follows:

$170/hour x 66.5% = 113.05 (compared to a 631D)

$170/hour x 61.1% = 103.87 (compared to a 637A)

[892] Another approach to determine the hourly rental rate of a 773 rock truck is comparing the capacity and rental rate of a tandem with a 773B rock truck. This comparison is more accurate than comparing a 773 rock truck to a 631D scraper, as the scraper performs more functions than just hauling. Assuming that a tandem has a capacity of $8m^3$/load and a 773B rock truck has a capacity of $24m^3$/load, if one uses a factor of 3 times, with an hourly rate of $35 for a tandem, an hourly rate of $105 for a 773B rock truck is appropriate. Thus, the defendant submits that the appropriate hourly rental rate for a 773B rock truck is at the most $113 per hour which is $102 per hour less than the plaintiff's calculation. The plaintiff's total hour claim for 773 rock trucks is:

Downstream Foundation	60.0 hours
Downstream Channels	433.5 hours
Total	493.5 hours

Thus, if the plaintiff's approach is used for Item 4 Downstream Foundation, Extra Works and Item 5, Downstream Channels, Extra Works, then the contract value of extra work, as indicated in Schedule 1 of exhibit 651, should be reduced as follows:

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001827

Item 4, Downstream Foundation

60 hours x $102 = $6,120

Item 5, Downstream Channels

433.5 hours x $102 = $44,217

(c) Mobilization/Demobilization

[893] The plaintiff has treated the lump sum items, Mobilization and Demobilization and Care of Water as items where the costs and revenues are to be allocated among the various nonclaim and claim items. Although Copeland is not sure how Opron's bid was unbalanced, he stated that the revenues of mobilization/demobilization and care of water should be spread among the nonclaim and claim items to undo the unbalancing of the bid. However, a pro rata distribution of the revenues will not serve that purpose as one must have reference to how the bid was unbalanced. The bulk of the unbalancing of the bid involves money moving from Item 7, Impervious Borrow Excavation, to the lump sum items, and accordingly any redistribution of revenues should reflect this.

[894] Again, the end result of the plaintiff's allocation of costs and revenues from mobilization and demobilization and care of water is to increase the claim, for no apparent reason. By referring to Appendix 7 and 9 of exhibit 651, one is left with the following:

[895] Appendix 7 - of exhibit 651, indicates that costs relating to Mobilization and Demobilization and Care of Water have been allocated as follows:

Total costs	$148,721
Allocation to claim items	138,231
Allocation to nonclaim items	10,490

[896] Appendix 9 of exhibit 651 indicates that revenues related to Mobilization and Demobilization and Care of Water have been allocated as follows:

Total Revenues	$475,351.10
Allocation to claim items	285,619.05
Allocation to nonclaim items	189,732.38

[897] The allocation outlined above results in 92.9% of the costs being allocated to claim items, thereby increasing the claim. Conversely, only 60% of the revenues are applied to claim items. In absolute figures, $10,490 of costs are applied to nonclaim items while $189,732.38 of revenues are applied to nonclaim items. (See exhibit 888) This allocation effectively increases the revenues of nonclaim items and puts the bulk of the costs in the claim items. If one accepts the plaintiff's rationale for the allocation of these costs and revenues as undoing the unbalancing of the bid, the revenues should be weighted towards the impervious borrow excavation which was the main source of unbalancing. Alternatively, those items should be treated as distinct items in the claim format. Again, the modified total cost approach proposed by the defendant deals with the problems of improper allocation of costs and revenues by treating the costs and revenues on a global basis.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

(d) Kidco Pumping Claim.

[898] The Kidco pumping claim is a claim advanced by the plaintiff on behalf of Kidco. There is no clear evidence what this claim is, how the claim has been calculated or the basis of the defendant's obligation to Kidco. As there is no evidence to support the foundation of the claim, no award should be made.

[899] Further, no award should be made as the plaintiff does not have standing to advance the claim on behalf of Kidco. The law is that a bare cause of action in tort is not assignable and to advance such a claim on behalf of another offends the rules against maintenance and champerty. (Fredrickson v. I.C.B.C. (1986), 3 B.C.L.R.(2d) 145, at p. 152 (B.C.C.A.)). Further, because there is no evidence of the arrangement between the plaintiff and Kidco with respect to this claim, there can be no consideration as to whether the exceptions to the above stated general principle apply to this case.

(E) Margin

[900] As discussed earlier, the tortious measure of damages is that the plaintiff is to be put in the position it would have been in had the misrepresentation not been made. Simply put, the plaintiff is to be compensated for money lost, which does not include loss of bargain. This measure of damages is appropriate for all tortious acts including fraudulent misrepresentation and the tort of deceit or fraud. Thus, any award under these headings should not include compensation for loss of bargain or profit. (B.G. Checo International Ltd. v. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, [1993] 1 S.C.R. 12; 147 N.R. 81; 20 B.C.A.C. 241; 35 W.A.C. 241, at p. 26 (S.C.C.)). I allow an award under this heading.

[901] The measure of damages for breach of contract, is that the plaintiff is to be put in the position it would have been in had the contract been performed as agreed. Thus, the plaintiff is entitled to recover for loss of bargain or profit. I find there was a breach of contract and I allow an award under this heading.

[902] The issue that remains is how the profit or markup should be calculated, including the percentage markup to be used and what costs should be marked up for profit.

[903] The plaintiff has proposed a margin of 20% with respect to Items 2 and 3. As discussed earlier, the effective margin in relation to costs of the other claim items are:

Item 4 -	Downstream Foundation	21.55%
Item 5 -	Downstream Channels	34.84%
Item 6 -	Stilling Basing Slope Failure	28.10%

[904] As rationalization for claiming this margin, the plaintiff points to the profit apparently realized on the nonclaim items. However, as discussed earlier, the apparent profit on the nonclaim items is based on the improper allocation of costs and revenues. This apparent profit is artificial and has been enhanced by the allocation of revenues from mobilization and demobilization and care of water to the nonclaim items. In addition, revenues in the nonclaim items have not been required to offset costs which were identified in the bid to be offset by these revenues. Coupled with this, there has been a movement of costs away from the nonclaim items to the claim items which has the effect of enhancing profits for the nonclaim items. As these matters have been discussed in more detail earlier, a passing reference has been made here. The apparent profit of the nonclaim items is fraught with problems and is not an accurate statement of profit potential.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001829

[905] Secondly, to provide support for its claim of a margin of 20%, the plaintiff points to its experience on other jobs during the same time period. However, the issue simply becomes what jobs are included and which ones are not included. The plaintiff has presented two exhibits outlining a calculation based on Opron's experience in other jobs during the same period. Exhibit 758 indicates a margin of 21.5% and exhibit 763 indicates a margin of 16.54%. In exhibit 890, the defendant indicated that, based on other jobs, excluding the Kakwa River Highway job, the margin is 15.47% and if the Kakwa job is included, the margin is 10.51%. The importance of this exercise is to illustrate that one can manipulate the rate of margin by excluding or including different jobs and the issue merely becomes what jobs should be included in the calculation.

[906] Exhibit 890 provides a breakdown of the margin realized on other contracts based on the size of the contract. Opron appears to be very successful with respect to the smaller contracts, contracts of less than $1,000,000. However, Opron only realized a margin of 6.9% on contracts with costs between $1,000,000 and $5,000,000 and 3.6% on contracts with costs over $5,000,000. This is the telling story, Opron is effective when doing small contracts involving site preparation but when Opron deals with larger, more complex work, like the PRD job, Opron's margin drops dramatically. Whatever the explanation is, it indicates that Opron's claim for a margin of 20% or more is not reasonable given Opron's record.

[907] If Opron is entitled to any margin, at most that margin should be 9.88%, Opron's margin as bid. Opron is attempting to ignore its bid by suggesting that "contingencies" form part of the margin and accordingly the margin as bid was greater than 9.88%. However, there is no indication in any of the bid documents that contingencies, akin to margin, were included in the bid. The plaintiff clearly did not bid all aspects of the work and these unbid aspects of the work would have to be covered by whatever positive bid errors the plaintiff included in its bid. Given the plaintiff's lack of treatment of the alleged contingencies in the bid, before any thought of this issue arose, the plaintiff can not now say that all positive bid errors are contingencies and hence profit while all negative bid errors are damages and accordingly form part of the plaintiff's claim.

[908] The best evidence of the plaintiff's intention or mind set is to look at exhibit 193, Cost and Estimate Summary, where the plaintiff bid 9.88% for margin. This was done before litigation was contemplated. It is difficult to accept a plaintiff coming back 10 years after the bid and saying, see here is a contingency, this is really profit, but I can't point to any document to say this.

[909] Further, in exhibit 493, Appendix 11, enclosures with a letter dated April 4, 1983, the plaintiff calculates profit at 10%.

[910] Further, exhibit 493, Appendix 8 makes reference to a profit allowance of 10%. It must be remembered that these documents relate to the claim which Opron was advancing and reflects Opron's view of the matter.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[911] Again, these documents, along with exhibit 193, clearly support at most a margin calculated at 9.88%.

[912] Further, the margin of 9.88% should be applied against the costs as bid. The bargain between the plaintiff and the defendant was a markup of 9.88% of cost as bid, or $831,000. This figure was in contemplation of the parties when the contract was finalized.

[913] If the plaintiff has incurred cost overruns which are the responsibility of the defendant, then the plaintiff should be reimbursed for those overruns. However, there is no mutual intention that the plaintiff should realize margin or profit on the cost overruns. To include a margin or profit on the cost overruns is to put the plaintiff in a better position than the plaintiff would have been in had the breach not occurred, supra, pp. 25-26. This flies in the face of the stated intention of the measure of damages for breach of contract. As the plaintiff bargained for a markup of 9.88% or $831,000, to award more than $831,000 would effectively put the plaintiff in a better position than it would have been had the breach not occurred.

Summary

[914] To this point the flaws of the approach used by Opron to present its damage claim have been considered. One cannot separate the costs and revenues into claim and nonclaim items without doing a complete reallocation of revenues, which has not been done. The plaintiff has subjectively reallocated the costs, without source documents, but the plaintiff has not done the same thing for revenues. The revenues have been applied as bid but the costs have been applied as restructured. In addition to the above, the plaintiff's allocation of costs has directed costs to claim items and thus magnified the claim. The plaintiff's approach also ignores the reality of the contract and the bid. The claim ignores that the impervious and pervious items were bid on an average unit price and that easy work was to be set off against hard work.

[915] The effect of Opron's approach is to move costs and revenues from claim item to nonclaim item and vice versa. The potential effect of each move is to increase the claim.

[916] As discussed earlier, Mr. Elton gave evidence that one can not only consider the validity of each step in the calculation of damages but one must also step back and look at the entire picture to ensure that it makes sense. To this point, the weaknesses of the various steps have been considered. However, it is now necessary to consider the plaintiff's approach and the entire claim and determine whether in fact it makes sense. The absurdity of the plaintiff's format can best be seen by considering the claim for cost overruns and the claim for markup. The following list outlines the markup for profit included in the various items in Schedule 1 of exhibit 651:

Item 2	$652,452
Item 3	$606,295
Item 4	$ 81,865
Item 5	$ 53,525
Item 6	$ 7,447
Item 10	$608,102

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

Item 11	$344,191
Item 12	($11,098) loss
Item 13	$212,649
Item 14	$ 66,879
Item 15	$114,347

Total - including Item 15, Extra Work $2,736,654

Total - excluding Item 15, Extra Work $2,622,307

[917] Thus, if Item 15, Extra Work, is excluded, the plaintiff's claim format has resulted in a recovery for markup or profit of $2,622,307. Against this it must be noted that the plaintiff's margin as bid was $831,800 and the plaintiff's entire claim is $4,527,878. Thus, the plaintiff's margin or profit as claimed coupled with the margin or profit in the nonclaim items, is over three times the amount bid by the plaintiff. This confirms the necessity of standing back and looking at the end result to determine if it is reasonable. As Mr. Elton stated in his evidence, it is not reasonable.

[918] In order to avoid those pitfalls, it is necessary to treat the costs and revenues in a single closed system. In a single closed system, the claim cannot be increased by simply misallocating costs or not allowing revenues to properly follow related costs. In order to prevent this the defendant proposes a modified total cost approach, an approach which proposes as a starting point for the calculation of damages Total Costs - Total Revenues = Starting Point. From this starting point the losses due to bid inefficiencies, unbalancing the bid, errors in production, errors in supervision, errors in labour and equipment utilization, errors in scheduling, and weather errors relating to the plaintiff's misinterpretation of the conditions must be deducted.

[919] The strength of this system is that it is not open to manipulation, whether intentional or not.

[920] Attached as Schedule "A" is the defendant's calculation of the plaintiff's damages, as a starting point, based on the modified total cost approach. Schedule "A" is similar to exhibit 879, except that the costs and revenues relating to extra work allowance have been excluded. Mr. Elton acknowledged that as the extra work allowance is based on an entirely different system for costing and recording revenues and is not tied into the bid or the Weekly Cost Reports, it can be separated from the remaining costs and revenues.

[921] As the plaintiff's claim involves two major components, impervious and pervious, attached as Schedules "B" and "C" are the defendant's proposals for the calculation of damages arising out of the impervious and pervious claim. The intention has been to group relevant items together under either the heading pervious or impervious. Schedules "B" and "C" do not include Items 6, 7, 8, 12, 14 or 15 as outlined in Schedule 1 of exhibit 651. These items have not been included as they do not relate to the impervious or pervious claim. Schedules "B" and "C", because of the exclusion of certain items are, like the plaintiff's format, dependent upon Mr. Cameron's allocation of costs and revenues and are subject to the inherent difficulties. Therefore, when considering Schedules "B" and "C" it is necessary to keep in mind that the calculations are subject to the weaknesses, albeit not as drastic, as were discussed when considering the plaintiff's claim.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

[Table continued on page 405]

Schedule "A" - Modified Total Cost Approach

Total Costs		$12,300,333.00
Less: Maio Public Works Act	$152,473.00
Legal And Consulting	60,298.00
Extra Work	508,078.00
Taxable & Other Costs	249,864.00
		970,713.00
		$11,329,620.00
Margin	831,000.00
		$12,160,620.00
Revenue		$10,570,934.00
Less: Extra Work	622,425.00	622,425.00
		$9,948,509.00
Cost Overrun		$12,160,620.00
		9,948,509.00
		$ 2,212,111.00

Schedule "B" - Pervious

Total Costs
Item 3	$2,893,107.00
Item 5	147,348.00
Item 11	1,618,731.00
Item 13	401,674.00
Item 1	152,473.00
	$5,213,333.00	$5,213,333.00
Margin
(9.88% of $5,213,333.00 - $152,473.00)	500,013.00
		$5,713,346.00

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001833

Total Revenue
Item 3	1,943,686.00
Item 5	6,940.00
Item 11	1,963,957.00
Item 13	614,323.00
Item 1	.00
	4,528,906.00	4,528,906.00
Cost Overrun		$1,184,440.00
Impact Claim Relating To The Impervious Claim		736,610.00
Total		$1,921,050.00

Schedule "C" - Impervious Claim

Total Costs
Item 2	$3,129,768.00
Item 4	379,842.00
Item 10	2,547,658.00
	$6,057,268.00	$6,057,268.00
Margin (9.88% of $6,057,268.00)		598,458.00
		$6,655,726.00
Total Revenue
Item 2	1,918,034.00
Item 4	102,712.00
Item 10	3,155,760.00
	5,176,506.00	5,176,506.00
Total Cost Overrun		$1,479,220.00
Cost Overrun Relating To The Impervious Operation	1,479,220.00/2	$736,610.00

[922] I accept the Crown's modified total cost approach and I reject the approach used by Opron. I find that the total cost overall or the starting point of the plaintiff's total claim is $2,212,111. I accept the margin calculated at 9.88 percent. I accept the Crown's rationale for not including the unallocated costs in the total costs.

[923] Having made that determination I must now determine how much of the loss was Opron's own fault. In this judgment I have severely criticized Opron in the following categories:

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

a) Their estimate

b) Their mobilization

c) Their schedules

d) Their bidding errors

e) And I have found fault with their site visit and the fact that they did not study the additional information that was available although other information was concealed.

[924] Counsel recognized how difficult it would be to fix the final damage or figure; that is evident because they provided little in assistance to the court to arrive at a precise number. Nor are they to be blamed. They obviously recognize that the task was an impossible one.

[925] I am convinced that Opron was the author of the majority of its loss. To put a figure on each of these causes of loss is impossible. Any attempt to calculate the plaintiff's claimable loss is so fraught with pitfalls that I would be foolish to attempt it. Small things and minor decisions become major elements. There are so many contingencies that no matter how often I attack the problem, the final figures vary. I cannot put an exact figure on how much the plaintiff harmed itself with bid errors, unbalancing the bid, errors in production, errors in supervision, errors in labour and equipment utilization, errors in scheduling, errors in subcontracting, and errors relating to the plaintiff's misinterpretation of the weather conditions, as well as many other actions or lack thereof which caused the plaintiff to lose money. I know that Opron's claimable loss is under one million dollars ($1,000,000). I know that it is somewhere above $750,000. I know that I will have to use round figures and approximates. I set Opron's claimable loss at $875,000.

[926] Opron, at paragraph 47 of its Statement of Claim specifically alleged that the defendant improperly withheld certain sums of money from Opron after the time when those sums became due and owing. Alberta Environment did withhold from Opron, both in the final payment for work Opron performed under the contract and a large portion of the 15 percent holdback. I reject this claim. The defendant was faced with lawsuits from subcontractors to Opron and they had no idea what the final outcome would be. Furthermore, the contract made it clear that many things had to be done before final payment could be made. Not all things were done to the satisfaction of the owner and as a result they had the right to hold back final payments as they did.

[927] The plaintiff will have judgment in the amount of $875,000 plus interest from October 1, 1983, as set out in the Judgment Interest Act.

[928] The parties may approach me concerning costs.

Judgment for plaintiff.

1994 CanLII 18362 (AB KB)

BOA COMPEER001835

In the Court of Appeal of Alberta

Citation: Color Your World, Inc. v. Robert F. Avery Holdings Ltd., 1987 ABCA 216

Date: 19871104
Docket: 8703 0317AC
Registry: Edmonton

1987 ABCA 216 (CanLII)

Between:

Color Your World, Inc.

Appellant
(Plaintiff)
(Defendant by Counterclaim)

- and -

Robert F. Avery Holdings Ltd. and Robert F. Avery

Respondents
(Defendants)
(Plaintiffs by Counterclaim)

The Court:

The Honourable Mr. Justice Harradence
The Honourable Mr. Justice Stevenson
The Honourable Mr. Justice Foisy

Memorandum of Judgment
Delivered from the Bench

COUNSEL:

J.G. Friesen, Esq., for the Appellant (Plaintiff) (Defendant by Counterclaim)

T.M. Engel, Esq., for the Respondents (Defendants) (Plaintiffs by Counterclaim)

MEMORANDUM OF JUDGMENT
DELIVERED FROM THE BENCH

FOISY, J.A. (for the Court):

[1] After six weeks of trial stretched over a number of months (restricted to the question of liability), after each side had closed its case, and after written argument had been filed by the plaintiff, the defence applied for and was granted some thirteen amendments to the pleadings.

[2] It should be noted that as a result of a pre-trial conference counsel had agreed to all issues that were to be considered alive for the purposes of the trial. The defence sought and obtained further amendments before the trial and sought and obtained further amendments during the trial.

[3] After the additional amendments had been granted to the defence, defence counsel, when challenged on some questions that would serve to enlarge the issues, gave assurances both to the court and to counsel for the plaintiff that the questioning was not for the purpose of enlarging the issues but for some other purpose.

[4] It is clear that this line of questioning was and is relied on at least in part to obtain results which counsel for the defendant assured was not his intention. This may not have been by design but the assurances had the obvious effect of influencing the whole conduct of the trial. It should be added in reference to some of the amendments that counsel for the defendant knew for some weeks and months of the existence of evidence that might give rise to his tardy application to amend.

[5] Some of the amendments allowed by the trial judge give rise to new and different causes of action. That much is admitted by counsel for the defendant in his factum. The order granting the amendments provides for and may well involve re-opening examinations for discovery, calling new witnesses or recalling witnesses for cross-examination. Costs relating to the amendments were to be paid by the respondent.

[6] We agree with the statement in McDonald and McDonald v. Fellows et al that amendments such as these granted after the evidence has been heard will virtually inevitably result in prejudice. The trial judge acknowledged this by stating that much inconvenience, expense and delay would be the inevitable result of allowing the amendments. He obviously concluded that costs would be adequate compensation. With respect we are of the view that he was in error.

[7] Costs may compensate some or perhaps all of the expenses but it will not compensate for the delay, the inconvenience and indeed the complexity involved in now trying to sort out what might in effect be a whole new trial interwoven with a previous six week trial. To allow the amendments would be prejudicial and unfair to the plaintiff. The defendant has indicated that he is prepared to submit argument without calling any additional evidence. The plaintiff is not in the same position as the defendant. The plaintiff conducted the trial on the basis of agreed issues as amended before trial and as amended during the trial.

1987 ABCA 216 (CanLII)

[8] One of the thirteen amendments relates to increasing the claim for quantum. Since that part of the trial is still to be heard we would leave that amendment intact subject to the plaintiff's right to further discoveries.

[9] Subject to the above we would allow the appeal, strike out the amendments ordered by the learned trial judge after the trial on the issue of liability was concluded and remit the matter back to the trial judge to allow him to complete the matter.

[10] The appellant will have costs of the appeal as well as costs of the related applications launched by the respondent.

1987 ABCA 216 (CanLII)

Klewchuk v. Switzer, 2001 ABQB 316

Date: 20010419
Action No. 9601-17433

IN THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH OF ALBERTA JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF CALGARY

BETWEEN:

ROBERT KLEWCHUK, ARKAY FINANCIAL HOLDINGS LTD. and ARKAY CASINO MANAGEMENT and EQUIPMENT (1985) LTD.

Plaintiffs/Defendants by Counterclaim

- and -

KATHY KLEWCHUK

Plaintiff

- and -

SAMUEL SWITZER

Defendant/Plaintiff by Counterclaim

- and -

SWITZER'S INVESTMENTS LTD.

Defendant

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT
of the
HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE J. S. MOORE

APPEARANCES:

Mr. K. E. Staroszik for the Plaintiffs

Mr. B. C. Yorke-Slader for the Defendants

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

INTRODUCTION

[1] For fourteen years, Robert Klewchuk (“Klewchuk”) and Samuel Switzer (“Switzer”) owned and operated an underground shaft gold mine. Each year the gold was distributed to Klewchuk and Switzer - not always distributed equally, but almost equally.

[2] In October of 1996, Switzer got the mine and Klewchuk got the shaft.

[3] In October 1996, Switzer suddenly and swiftly swooped. Within minutes, he scooped all of the assets of the “gold mine”. He then owned and controlled all; Klewchuk was left with nothing.

[4] The “gold mine” that Klewchuk and Switzer owned and operated was a gambling casino in Calgary - the Elbow River Inn and Casino (“the Elbow Casino”). Its predecessor was the casino at the Summit Hotel. Each year, the Elbow Casino produced large revenues.

FACTS

Background to Relationship

[5] At times, I often refer to Switzer and his corporations as “Switzer”. I often refer to Robert Klewchuk, Kathy Klewchuk and their corporations (including Arkay Casino Management and Equipment (1985) Ltd. (“Arkay”)) as “Klewchuk”.

[6] The Alberta casino industry began in the 1970s, and Klewchuk was there at the very beginning. Casinos were first permitted at agricultural fairs, like the Calgary Stampede. Klewchuk got a part-time job as a card dealer at the Calgary Stampede. After several years as a dealer, Klewchuk received promotions to become a pit supervisor.

[7] In the early 1970s, the Federal Government lifted the restrictions (criminal law) on casino gambling, provided that the profits from gambling were used for a charitable or religious purpose.

[8] Klewchuk predicted that he could begin a successful business by providing the charities with the professional management and the professional staff the charities needed to operate their own casinos. The first charity casino organized by Klewchuk was for the Chinook Lions Club during Grey Cup Week in 1976. From such a humble start an industry was born.

[9] The industry started slowly. Casinos were held in community centres and in the basements of church halls. They used portable gaming equipment and temporary cash cages.

[10] Switzer was active in Calgary real estate. He was the owner of apartment buildings and commercial strip malls. Since 1964, Switzer owned a hotel on the east side of downtown

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

Calgary, the Summit. The Summit had a banquet room in the basement. Switzer rented this banquet room for charity casino events.

[11] In 1978 Klewchuk was one of the first operators to use the Summit for a casino. Switzer also rented out the banquet room to other operators. The operators used portable equipment which they moved in and out for each casino event.

[12] In 1979 and 1980, Klewchuk was a regular user of the Summit banquet room for charity casinos. In 1982, Klewchuk contacted Switzer about setting up a permanent casino at the Summit. Switzer agreed.

[13] Klewchuk and Switzer operated out of the Summit for seven years — from 1982 to 1989. During those seven years, there were a limited number of charity casino licenses available. Therefore, the competition among operators to attract casinos was fierce. By the end of that seven year period, Klewchuk and Switzer had become the most successful casino operators in Calgary. They had garnered more operating casino days than any of their competitors.

[14] The relationship between Klewchuk and Switzer was unique. Each had separate areas of responsibility, and each had separate contracts with the charities. Klewchuk provided the professional management, professional staff, gaming tables and other equipment. Switzer provided the big room, money delivery, hold-up insurance and advertising.

[15] Klewchuk and Switzer operated on a high level of trust. They had no written agreement for the first seven years they operated. They became the best of friends.

[16] Switzer sold the Summit in 1984, but he leased back the entire hotel until 1989. In about 1987, Switzer and Klewchuk started looking for other locations in Calgary to continue their operation. Eventually, Switzer suggested that they set up at the Elbow River Inn, a hotel across from the Stampede grounds. Switzer had bought the hotel in 1984.

[17] Switzer agreed to build a separate facility for the casino operation adjacent to the hotel. Switzer bought enough land for the new building and for customer parking. The land and the new building cost over $3 million in the late 1980s. Switzer invested over $3 million in this new venture based only on a handshake with Klewchuk.

[18] After operating the Elbow Casino for six months, Switzer and Klewchuk made a written contract (dated November 1st, 1989), which covered some of the elements of their relationship. Essentially, they carried on at the Elbow Casino the same way they had at the Summit.

Critical Events

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[19] For each two-day casino, Switzer sent his invoice to the charity for the services he provided and Klewchuk sent his invoice to the charity for the services he provided. On July 1st 1996, the Government of Alberta Gaming Commission ("Gaming") changed some rules for the operation of casinos in Alberta. The new rules had been discussed for a long time before July 1st 1996, so the Alberta casino operators were not taken by surprise. The new rules affected the way Switzer and Klewchuk could operate the Elbow Casino.

[20] After July 1st 1996, the new rules indicated that only one invoice would be sent to the charity for all of the things specified in clause 2.1.6. That clause states:

> 2.1.6 Casino facility licensees shall provide:
>
> a) Casino facility as per standards set out in Section 4.
>
> b) All required casino gaming equipment.
>
> c) Operating floats to be used by the charity licensee.
>
> d) Chip inventory appropriate to the casino gaming volume. Chips shall be clearly labelled as to denomination and shall be unique for each facility.
>
> e) Registered gaming workers as required in Section 6.
>
> f) Playing cards as set out in Section 9.7.
>
> g) Surveillance equipment as detailed in Section 5.
>
> h) A cash counting machine for both the cash cage and count room.
>
> i) Armoured car service.
>
> j) Insurance
>
> k) Advertising and promotions
>
> l) Administration services.
>
> m) All other equipment or services deemed necessary by the Licensing Division.
>
> (see Exhibit One, Tab 19)

[21] By October 25th 1996, Gaming had not taken any steps to enforce the new rules against Klewchuk and Switzer at the Elbow Casino.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[22] Between July 1st and October 25th 1996, Switzer and Klewchuk could have mediated or arbitrated a new method of operation between themselves. Switzer and Klewchuk also could have come to Court to resolve their legal problems. If Switzer feared that he would suffer any financial loss, he could have come to Court seeking protection, but Switzer stayed away from Court.

[23] Instead, Switzer planned a stealthy attack. On the pretext that Klewchuk was Switzer's tenant, Switzer prepared a Landlord's Distress for Rent on September 4th 1996. However, before he could execute the Distress for Rent, Switzer discovered that he did not have a licence from Gaming. He immediately applied to Gaming for his licence, and waited. Switzer wanted far more than a simple seizure of chattels. He wanted to "expropriate" a total business, and give no compensation to the owner of the business.

[24] Switzer used his September 4th 1996 Landlord's Distress Warrant on October 11th 1996. Switzer swooped down and seized all of Klewchuk's gaming equipment and supplies. He hired a civil enforcement agency (Shortridge) to make the seizure.

[25] On October 25th 1996, Switzer evicted Klewchuk from the Elbow Casino. Switzer threatened Klewchuk that he would have him arrested as a trespasser if he ever stepped inside the Elbow Casino. Switzer took all the cash in Klewchuk's office and from the slot machines in the Elbow Casino. The cash in Klewchuk's office was $23,422.00, and Klewchuk's share of the cash in the slot machines was $14,195.91. The total cash was $37,617.91, [26] On October 25th 1996, Gaming gave Switzer a temporary licence to conduct casino operations. Switzer had a meeting with Klewchuk's staff. He told them that Klewchuk was "out" and that he was their new boss. Switzer told the staff that he would pay them, and he did pay them. He used the cash from Klewchuk to pay the staff. He paid the staff $17,407.82.

[27] On October 25th 1996, the Elbow Casino did business as usual, except for a two-hour delay in start-up. Switzer had everything, and Klewchuk was left with nothing.

Other Facts

No-Loss Warranty

[28] The no-loss warranty was simply a marketing tool developed by Klewchuk and Switzer. It was not required by Gaming.

[29] In late 1988, there was considerable competition among the three Calgary casino operators to secure contracts with the charities to operate casinos. The operators had more event days available than there were charity casino licenses.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[30] To convince the charities to hold their casinos with them, Klewchuk and Switzer decided to provide each charity with a warranty that the charity would not lose money at the two-day event. This no-loss warranty helped each charity to obtain from its bank a $100,000 cash float to operate the two-day casino. With the no-loss warranty, the directors of the charity did not have to sign personal guarantees at the bank.

[31] Along with good marketing and promotion with the charities and good performance at the casinos, the no-loss warranty was another tool to help to keep the Klewchuk/Switzer operation fully booked.

[32] Switzer provided the no-loss warranty. He was the first one in Calgary to do so. Initially, Switzer charged each charity a $500.00 fee (per two-day casino) for the no-loss warranty. He increased the fee to $800.00 per casino when he and Klewchuk set up at the Elbow Casino. The no-loss warranty is addressed in Article 8 of the November 1st 1989 contract.

[33] Switzer had made a profit of $136,000.00 on the no-loss warranties. However, in the summer of 1993, Switzer predicted that the no-loss warranties would no longer be a money maker. This arose from a number of factors including the higher betting limits permitted by Gaming on table games (particularly blackjack), and the growing sophistication of players. “Sophistication” includes method playing, card counting, and cheating.

[34] By 1993, the no-loss warranty was copied and adopted by the other two casino operators in Calgary. In August 1993, Switzer stormed into Klewchuk’s office and demanded that the no-loss fee be moved up from $800 per event to $1,500 per event, an increase of almost 90%.

[35] Klewchuk felt that a 90% increase of fee would spoil the business’ competitive advantage. Therefore, in September 1993 Klewchuk took over the no-loss warranty contracts with the charities, and Switzer was released from that responsibility. Klewchuk increased the fee from $800 to $1,000 per two-day event. The Calgary competitors made the same increase of fee.

[36] Klewchuk started suffering significant losses on his no-loss warranties. In April 1995, he raised his fee from $1,000 to $1,500 per two-day event. The no-loss warranty became a casino industry problem in Alberta, not just a problem that hurt Klewchuk. Under the new regulations, Gaming ended the no-loss warranty procedure in Alberta on July 1st 1996.

[37] Klewchuk’s major losses were during the last six months of the no-loss warranty procedure, the period from January 1st 1996 to July 1st 1996. By July 1st 1996, Klewchuk had accumulated a net cash shortfall from his operation of the no-loss warranty of $280,504.

[38] Klewchuk was saddled with a burden of $280,504, and Switzer obtained a benefit. The first part of the benefit was that Switzer did not have to pay out of his pocket any part of the

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

$280,504. The second part of the benefit was that the charities were given $280,504 of Klewchuk's cash so that the charities could pay Switzer his invoices for the rent, money delivery, hold-up insurance, and the advertising.

[39] In August and September of 1993 (and later), the no-loss warranty matter could have been mediated. It could have been arbitrated.

[40] Klewchuk claims $280,504 damages from Switzer regarding the no-loss warranty. Switzer had the original responsibility for the no-loss warranty contracts, and Klewchuk did not have to assume that responsibility. Klewchuk has not proven that there was a wrong committed. I therefore do not award damages with respect to the no-loss warranty.

Negotiations

[41] Another matter that consumed trial time was evidence of negotiations which Switzer claims are significant with respect to the outcome of this trial. I heard evidence of negotiations conducted in August and September 1996 between Switzer and Klewchuk and with third parties. No contract was concluded. A written contract requires all parties to the contract to sign the same contract, and all of the conditions precedent must then be satisfied. A contract is binding upon the parties to the contract. Contract negotiations are not binding upon anyone.

[42] Even less useful than searching for tangible meaning in the negotiations, is selectively relying on portions of those negotiations. Switzer suggested that the total value of Klewchuk's casino business was disclosed in a suggested negotiation of sale price. That completely ignores other factors, such as the suggested employment contract for Klewchuk of an unknown dollar amount and a suggested $300,000 bonus to Klewchuk if the Elbow Casino lands sold within one year.

[43] Negotiations are not binding upon anyone, so they should be ignored. These negotiations are not relevant for the assessment of general damages.

Summer Doldrums

[44] Klewchuk frankly admitted that he had a cashflow problem in the summer of 1996. Klewchuk was wounded by the $280,504 hit from the no-loss warranties. Cash was required for running the casino business. Robert Klewchuk and Kathy Klewchuk had to give up their lavish lifestyle (big house, expensive cars, etc.). They sold chattels and they mortgaged property to obtain ready cash; and they injected the cash into the business.

[45] July and August are always slow months for the casino industry in Calgary — except for the Frontier Casino at the Stampede grounds. Except for Frontier, Gaming forced the other casinos to close down for the ten days of Stampede in July. Gamblers have other things to enjoy during summer, so the gambling business is always slack in July and August. Business picks up in September, and business gets back to normal in October.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[46] After July 1st 1996, Klewchuk no longer had to worry about the huge cash drain of payouts to charities on no-loss warranties; but the first six months of 1996 had financially weakened Klewchuk. It would take a number of months to regain calm financial stability.

[47] Not all of the new Gaming regulations came into force on the same day. On July 1st 1996, the 50/50 split of revenue between the charity and the casino operation came into force. That immediately reduced the revenue to the casino operators in the short term. But in the near future, the casino operators knew that Gaming would bring into force the remaining regulations which would increase the revenue to the casino operator.

[48] Meanwhile, Klewchuk got behind in payments to, for example, Worker's Compensation and Revenue Canada. One of Klewchuk's payments on a Switzer/Klewchuk bank loan went N.S.F. Klewchuk got behind in salary payments to his staff, but by October 25th 1996 he was "current" with salary payments. The staff came into work each day. The staff all came to work for Klewchuk on the morning of October 25th 1996 — the morning that Switzer expropriated Klewchuk's business.

[49] Everyone knew that the remaining Gaming regulations (soon to be put into effect) would give a boost to the casino industry in Alberta. It happened. The number of slot machines per casino were increased. The operator's profit margin per slot machine was increased. The number of casino events per year was increased. The hours that each casino could be open were extended. Good times were just around the corner.

[50] Klewchuk borrowed $20,000 from Switzer on September 11th 1996, and he gave Switzer a promissory note of $20,000 and a general security agreement. For Switzer, the sum of $20,000 is inconsequential. For Switzer, $20,000 is like "walking around money". Switzer forgot to even make a demand on the promissory note until February 9th 1997, a long time after he expropriated Klewchuk's business on October 25th 1996.

[51] The summer of 1996 was not good for Klewchuk, but by October 25th 1996, his financial position was improving. Klewchuk was not insolvent, and Switzer should not pretend that he was immediately facing financial ruin unless he expropriated Klewchuk's business.

ISSUES

[52]
1. What is the nature of the relationship between Switzer and Klewchuk?
2. Should Klewchuk be compensated?
3. If Klewchuk should be compensated, what are the damages?

ANALYSIS

1. Nature of the Relationship

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

a) Landlord - Tenant

[53] Switzer is a big landlord in Calgary. In his lifetime, he has owned and leased thousands of residential units in numerous apartment buildings. He has also owned and leased hundreds of commercial spaces in strip malls, in his hotels and in his commercial buildings.

[54] In the world of leasing, Switzer is a professional. Switzer knows when he has a lease and when he does not have a lease. Switzer knows that he first must be a landlord before he can legally commence a landlord's distress for rent.

[55] Switzer has the onus to prove that he had the right to effect a landlord's distress for rent to seize all of Klewchuk's chattels located in the Elbow Casino. I find that Switzer did not prove that he made a legal seizure, primarily because he did not prove a landlord-tenant relationship.

[56] As stated previously, Gaming amended the rules for casinos on July 1st 1996. On July 2nd 1996 Switzer delivered the following letter to Klewchuk:

> Switzer's Investments Ltd.
> Offices at 220, 1212 1st Street S.E. and 118, 328 Centre Street S.E.
> Calgary, Alberta
>
> July 2, 1996
>
> Arkay Casino Management and Equipment (1985) Ltd.
> Box 984, Station "M",
> Calgary, Alberta T2P 2K4
>
> Attention: Mr. R. Klewchuk
>
> Dear Bob, HAND DELIVERED
>
> Re: Casino Premises at Elbow River Inn & Casino, 1919 Macleod Trail S.E.
>
> In the absence of a Lease, the existing agreement dated November 1, 1989 remains in effect and Elbow River Inn is due payment at the current rate of $4,528.35 (G.S.T. being $303.35 of that amount) for each two day casino.
>
> At the close of each casino, please submit a cheque to the Front Desk at the Elbow River Inn until such time as negotiations may result in an executed Agreement to Lease. As per the established policy, we anticipate payment for the July 1 / 2, 1996 casino sponsored by

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

> Huntington's Society at the close of the casino today, no later than Wednesday July 3, 1996.
>
> Yours truly,
> SWITZER'S INVESTMENTS LTD.
>
> SAM SWITZER
> President

[57] In that letter, Switzer stated there was no lease as at July 2nd 1996. Therefore, he must prove there was some form of landlord-tenant relationship prior to July 2nd 1996 or subsequent to July 2nd 1996. He has not done so.

[58] Regarding an alleged lease prior to July 2nd 1996, Switzer wrote " . . . the existing agreement dated November 1, 1989 remains in effect . . . ". That agreement is Exhibit One, Tab 1. There is no landlord - tenant contract between Switzer and Klewchuk in the November 1st 1989 written agreement. There was no landlord-tenant contract between Switzer and Klewchuk during the previous seven years that they operated a casino at the Summit Hotel between 1982 and 1989.

[59] On December 15th 1995, Switzer's lawyer wrote to Klewchuk's lawyer:

> Under the Agreement, Arkay and its staff have no more than a non-exclusive licence to use the casino facility in order to manage and administer casinos for charitable organizations. Neither Klewchuk nor Arkay have any proprietary interest in the casino facility and certainly do not have any right to make alterations to the casino facility.
>
> (See Exhibit One, Tab 6)

[60] On December 15th 1995, Klewchuk was not a tenant, but had only a non-exclusive licence. Klewchuk was merely a licencee under the Agreement. The above letter from Switzer's lawyer confirms that Switzer realized this.

[61] Regarding an alleged lease subsequent to July 2nd 1996, no written lease was ever signed. There is no evidence that Switzer ever delivered to Klewchuk a draft of a proposed lease for discussion. There is evidence that Klewchuk tried to have business meetings with Switzer during July and early August of 1996, but Switzer was "not available".

[62] On August 26th 1996, Switzer sent to Klewchuk his first invoice. Switzer revised that invoice on August 29th. Also on August 29th, Switzer sent a letter to Gaming, saying that Switzer's Investment Ltd. ("SIL") was not prepared to lease the casino to anyone. The letter says: "SIL would operate the facility under its own name. We understand that SIL is a licenced facility operator". That letter is Exhibit One, Tab 27. That letter and other dealings Switzer had with Gaming were not disclosed to Klewchuk. Those dealings were part of Switzer's secret plan.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[63] On August 30th 1996, Gaming advised SIL that it was not a licenced facility operator (Exhibit One, Tab 29). Switzer's September 4th 1996 Distress for Rent had to be postponed. Switzer quickly applied to Gaming for a Casino Facility Licence, but Gaming refused to issue a license to Switzer. On September 19th 1996, Gaming wrote to Switzer: "Further to our conversation of today's date, your application will not be processed. I am enclosing the original of your application package and your cheque for $5,000.00" (Exhibit 48).

[64] Prior to August 29th 1996, Switzer contacted the Calgary Stampede, owners of the Frontier Casino, to obtain gaming chips. On August 29th, the Calgary Stampede wrote to Gaming: "It is our understanding that Mr. Sam Switzer will be taking over the operation of the Elbow River Casino in Calgary, Alberta, with Gaming permission" (Exhibit 41). Switzer's dealings with the Calgary Stampede were not disclosed to Klewchuk, because those dealings were part of Switzer's secret plan.

[65] To run a casino business, Switzer needed a licenced casino operation. In the Summer of 1996, Gaming permitted only four charity casino licences in Calgary; all four licences were allocated. Switzer had only a huge room, but to qualify for a Gaming licence, he needed trained personnel, gaming equipment and operating systems. He could not realistically obtain these from scratch.

[66] Switzer needed to acquire an ongoing casino business. Klewchuk had an ongoing casino business. Klewchuk had trained staff and gaming equipment. Switzer had to either negotiate for the purchase of Klewchuk's operation, or to grab it; he chose to grab it.

[67] Switzer charged for holdup insurance, money delivery, and advertising. These were not rent. The only way such things could even be defined as "rent" is in a written lease. There was no written lease between Switzer and Klewchuk, but Switzer pretended that these items were "rent" in his invoices to Klewchuk listing $4,528.35 for each two-day casino. He also pretended that these items were rent arrears in his Landlord's Distress for Rent.

[68] Switzer did not make himself available to meet with Klewchuk in July 1996. Klewchuk began paying Switzer $2,140.00 for each two-day casino (rather than $4,528.35). As intended, this got Switzer's attention. Switzer came to Klewchuk's office to chat. Klewchuk told Switzer that the most he would pay him was $2,000.00 (plus GST of $140.00). Switzer asked Klewchuk if he could bring the payment up to $2,500.00 plus GST (for each two-day casino).

[69] Klewchuk said that he would pay $2,500.00 plus GST (for each two-day casino) starting in early August. It was agreed that amount would be paid while Switzer and Klewchuk were negotiating some sort of a new arrangement.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[70] In cross-examination, Switzer was asked whether the meeting occurred in which Switzer agreed to let Klewchuk pay $2,500.00 plus GST (for each two-day casino) while they negotiated. Switzer answered: “I don’t recall.” (Transcripts, page 1154, lines 3-8).

[71] On this important point in particular, I find that Klewchuk is telling the truth and that Switzer is suffering from massive memory failure. On significant points generally, I accept Klewchuk’s credibility and do not accept Switzer’s credibility.

[72] Did Switzer create a new lease with Klewchuk subsequent to July 2nd 1996? Or did Klewchuk still merely have a licence of occupation?

[73] The fundamental difference between a lease and a licence is that under a lease an interest in land passes to the tenant. Tenancy is generally characterized as a grant of exclusive possession for a term certain in consideration for the payment of a certain rent: Street* v. Mountford, [1985] 2 All E.R. 289 (H.L.) at 294. A licence, on the other hand, does not confer a grant of exclusive possession: Southern Music Ltd. v. Warsigmaga (1980), 31 A.R. 441 (Q.B.). In Baker and Baker v. *Gee, [1945] 3 W.W.R. 555 (Alta. S.C.A.D.), at 556, MacDonald, J.A. stated:

> A licence does not create any estate or interest in the property to which it relates. It merely conveys a privilege in the use of the property and makes an act lawful which without it would be unlawful.

[74] In Street* v. *Mountford, supra, Templeman, L.J. observed at 297 that exclusive possession is not the only hallmark of tenancy. The document as a whole must be considered and the intention of the parties must be examined.

[75] In Booker* v. *Palmer, [1942] 2 All E.R. 674 (C.A.) at 677 Lord Greene M.R. says:

> To suggest there is an intention there to create a relationship of landlord and tenant appears to me to be quite impossible. There is one golden rule which is of very general application, namely, that the law does not impute intention to enter into legal relationships where the circumstances and the conduct of the parties negative any intention of the kind. It seems to me that this is a clear example of the application of that rule.

[76] In Errington* v. *Errington, [1952] 1 All E.R. 149 (C.A.) at 155 Lord Denning says:

> The result of all these cases is that, although a person who is let into exclusive possession is, prima facie, to be considered to be a tenant, nevertheless he will not be held to be so if the circumstances negative any intention to create a tenancy. Words alone may not suffice. Parties cannot turn a tenancy into a licence merely by calling it one. But if the circumstances and the conduct of the parties show that all that was > intended was that the occupier should be granted a personal privilege with no interest in the land, he will be held only to be a licensee.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

>
> [emphasis added]

[77] The reverse of the highlighted passage is also true. Switzer cannot turn a licence into a tenancy merely by calling it a tenancy. In Switzer's October 11th 1996 instruction letter to Shortridge to execute the so-called Distress for Rent, Switzer alleged that Klewchuk was Switzer's tenant, stating "The arrears with respect to the verbal tenancy at will agreement are . . . ". (See Exhibit One, Tab 36).

[78] Switzer again alleged that Klewchuk was his tenant on October 16th 1996. This was five days after Switzer seized all of Klewchuk's casino assets. Switzer's lawyer wrote to Klewchuk's lawyer:

> Further to our instructions, we are hereby advising you that Arkay is, at best, using the Elbow River Inn Casino as a tenant-at-will and that he has no lease of the premises.
>
> (See Exhibit One, Tab 40)

[79] In Traders Finance Corporation Ltd.* v. *Primerano, [1955] O.W.N. 553 (H.C.), the court found that the company against which the distress was levied was in possession of the premises without a lease, without a subsisting landlord-tenant relationship and without any reservation of rents. It therefore had an obligation to pay for use and occupation as a licencee, and not as a tenant. Without the requisite tenancy, the landlord had no right of distress.

[80] Of course, any money owing under the licence as at October 11th 1996 was not the amount of $61,447.20 specified in Exhibit One, Tab 36. Switzer's arithmetic does not embrace the oral agreement Switzer made with Klewchuk that Klewchuk was entitled to pay $2,500.00 plus GST for each two-day casino until Klewchuk and Switzer negotiated a new deal. It is uncertain what money, if any money, was owing on October 11th 1996 by Klewchuk to Switzer under the licence.

[81] On October 25th 1996, Switzer expropriated Klewchuk's business. Switzer terminated whatever there was to terminate, regardless of whether it could be characterized as a lease, a tenancy-at-will or a licence. Switzer first executed a Landlord's Distress for Rent and then terminated the relationship, however that relationship is characterized.

[82] However, a landlord cannot both distrain for rent and terminate the tenancy. In Able Oil & Gas Installations Ltd.* v. *Ethnicorp. Foods International Inc. (1989), 96 A.R. 152 (Q.B. Master) at 154, Master Funduk stated:

> Where a tenant defaults in paying rent when due the landlord cannot levy distress of the unpaid rent and also terminate the lease for that unpaid rent.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

> The right to distrain for unpaid rent exists only so long as the landlord-tenant relationship exists. By distraining the landlord has elected not to terminate for that breach and so cannot then, after distraining, purport to terminate for nonpayment of the rent distrained for: Hallbauer* v. *Shipowick, 38 Alta L.R. (2d) 351 (Master).
>
> Because the applicant distrained for the rent due January 1st it cannot then turn around and use that default as a ground for termination.
>
> [emphasis in the original]

[83] Switzer did not have any right to distrain for rent. But he did distrain. After distraining for rent, Switzer certainly did not have any right to terminate. Assuming for the sake of argument that a tenancy existed, a landlord can elect either to distrain under a lease or, alternatively, to terminate the lease and commence an action for arrears. The remedies are mutually exclusive: Bennett, "Creditors' and Debtors' Rights, 1987-1988" in The Law Society of Upper Canada Bar Admission Course Materials (Calgary: Carswell, 1988) at 60.

[84] Further, even assuming a tenancy was created, a landlord may only levy a distress for unpaid rent where the rent payable is certain: Traders Finance Corporation Ltd.* v. *Primerano, supra. As the foregoing indicates, Switzer was maintaining that Klewchuk owed substantially more than the interim amount of $2,500 that had been agreed to. This does not indicate a sum certain.

[85] If rent is not payable or is not in arrears, the distress is illegal, the distrainer is a trespasser ab initio and a suit for conversion will lie against the person in possession of the goods: Williams and Rhodes, Canadian Law of Landlord and Tenant 6th ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1988) at 8-85; also see Seibel* v. *Dwyer Elevator Company Ltd., [1923] 2 W.W.R. 1051 (Sask.C.A.); aff'd [1924] S.C.R. 530.

[86] I find that there was no landlord-tenant relationship between Switzer and Klewchuk at any time. The distress effected by Switzer was therefore illegal and Klewchuk's business was converted by Switzer.

b) Joint Venturers and Partnership

[87] I find that this relationship was a joint venture.

[88] While Klewchuk and Switzer did not share profits, each was dependent on the other to have a successful business. It was truly a joint venture. There is no document saying that this was a joint venture — but it was a joint venture.

[89] Of the two, it was Klewchuk who was indispensable for success. Klewchuk had the expertise to operate the casinos and to attract the charities to hold their events with him. Switzer had the big room, but this was not critical. At that time, any big room would do.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

Klewchuk's important role in the joint venture was acknowledged by Switzer in their written contract dated November 1st 1989.

[90] From Switzer's profit perspective, important elements such as Switzer's sole right to provide the additional services of holdup insurance, money delivery and advertising were not even written in the November 1st 1989 contract. These joint venture elements were established by a course of conduct. Switzer made large profits (from the charities) on his charges for holdup insurance, money delivery, and advertising.

[91] The joint venture of Switzer and Klewchuk may also have been a partnership. The Alberta Partnership Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. P-2 in section 1(d) defines partnership:

> (d) "partnership" means the relationship that subsists between persons carrying on a business in common with a view to profit;

However, it is not necessary for me to determine whether or not the joint venture was a partnership. I do note, however, that if something walks like a duck and it quacks like a duck — then it is a duck; or a bird that closely resembles a duck.

[92] Regardless of how I characterize the relationship, Switzer and Klewchuk owed a fiduciary duty to each other. Justice Moldaver of the Ontario Court of Justice General Division held in Hemlo Gold Mines Inc.* v. *Royal Oak Mines Inc. (1993), 52 C.P.R. (3d) 458 at 469 that parties engaged as partners in a joint venture mineral exploration agreement owed fiduciary or quasi-fiduciary obligations to each other. Accordingly, each party was obliged to act toward the other in utmost good faith.

[93] Switzer breached his fiduciary duty to Klewchuk. This is a separate head of damages, and I could discuss breach of fiduciary duty at length. However, all the various heads of damage (conversion, breach of fiduciary duty, breach of duty to contract in good faith, etc.), come together in one event — Switzer took Klewchuk's assets. The damages, under the various heads of damage, combine in one amount.

c) Duty of Good Faith

[94] I have ruled on what Switzer is not entitled to do — he is not entitled to grab. For the purpose of this judgment, it is therefore necessary to discuss good faith and fair dealing only briefly.

[95] In Alberta, one contracting party owes a duty of good faith to another in accordance with reasonable expectations of each party under the contract. Feehan, J. reviewed the development of the doctrine in Opron Construction Co.* v. *Alberta (1994), 14 C.L.R. (2d) 97 (Q.B.) at 221-26.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[96] I also note Canada Deposit Insurance Corp.* v. *Canadian Commercial Bank (Liquidation) (1998), 236 A.R. 14 (Q.B.), where one party attempted to circumvent an agreement by relying on statutory obligations. Specifically, the Bank held preferred shares in Western Securities entitling it to dividends and redemptions. Western refused to redeem the preferred shares or pay dividends to the Bank's liquidator, claiming that the same would breach the solvency tests under the Business Corporations Act. Wachowich, A.C.J. (as he then was) held that Western breached its duty of good faith to ensure that best efforts would be made to fulfill the terms of the agreement in accordance with the reasonable expectations of the parties.

[97] In Mesa Operating Ltd. Partnership* v. *Amoco Canada Resources Ltd. (1994), 19 Alta. L.R. (3d) 38 (C.A.) at 45, Kerans, J.A. adopted the following statement of the trial judge:

> . . . [A] party cannot exercise a power granted in a contract in a way that 'substantially nullifies the contractual objectives or causes significant harm to the other contrary to the original purposes or expectations of the parties.'

Justice Kerans again agreed with the words of the trial judge at 43:

> In Canada the test . . . does not include the need for the plaintiff to show that the defendant intentionally acted in bad faith . . .
>
> . . . the common law duty to perform in good faith is breached when a party acts in bad faith, that is, when a party acts in a manner that substantially nullifies the contractual objectives or causes significant harm to the other, contrary to the original purposes or expectations of the parties.

[98] The July 1st 1996 gaming regulations may have required a new arrangement between Switzer and Klewchuk (for example a new corporation or a new partnership to allocate revenue between them). There was no bona fide reason for Switzer to pretend that the 14 year old existing relationship was frustrated. Switzer owed a duty of good faith to Klewchuk, and he breached that duty of good faith.

d) Conclusion on Nature of Relationship

[99] This relationship is difficult to pigeonhole. However, the precise nature is not important. What is important is that Switzer violated the relationship.

2. Should Klewchuk be compensated?

[100] In light of Switzer's actions, Klewchuk should be compensated.

3. Damages

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[101] Klewchuk is seeking damages for breach of fiduciary duty, breach of duty of good faith and for conversion of his business. Klewchuk concedes that his damage claims significantly overlap and that to compensate him for a breach of fiduciary duty and conversion would be double compensation. In addition, Klewchuk also seeks punitive damages for what he says was the high-handed manner in which Switzer conducted himself. Klewchuk says that Switzer needed his business, including his gaming equipment, trained staff and goodwill to obtain a facility licence and to carry on the casino business himself. Rather than purchase Klewchuk's business, Klewchuk states that Switzer made a deliberate choice to take it wrongfully and illegally.

[102] I have found both a wrongful seizure and conversion of the Plaintiffs' business, and a breach of fiduciary duty based on the joint venture between the parties. However, the essence of the wrong committed here is the expropriation of Klewchuk's business by Switzer. I am therefore assessing damages on the basis of conversion.

[103] In calculating damages, Klewchuk's business must be viewed as more than the sum of its parts. While Klewchuk provided the gaming tables and other equipment, his business was also comprised of his expertise in the gaming industry and his reputation. As I have stated previously, what Switzer contributed to the business was a room. Klewchuk was the essential element in the success of the joint venture.

a) Legal Principles

[104] The wrongful seizure of Klewchuk's equipment and the expropriation of his business gives rise to damages in conversion (Bank of Nova Scotia* v. Dunphy Leasing Enterprises Ltd. (1991), 120 A.R. 241 (C.A.); Royal Bank of Canada v. *W. Got & Associates Electric Ltd., (1994), 150 A.R. 93 (Q.B.); aff'd, (1997), 196 A.R. 241 (C.A.); [1999] 3 S.C.R. 408). According to Klar, et. al. in Remedies in Tort, vol. 1 (Toronto: Carswell, 2001) at p. 4-30:

> In an action for conversion, the normal measure of damages is the value of the chattel at the date of conversion, together with any consequential damage flowing from the conversion, provided that it is not too remote to be recovered in law.

Damages for conversion can also include damages for loss of profit: Blue Cove Packing Co. Ltd.* v. *Theodore Landry et al. (1981), 35 N.B.R. (2d) 527 (Q.B.), aff'd (1982) 42 N.B.R. (2d) 337 (C.A.).

[105] A recent and comprehensive treatment of the issue of damages for conversion can be found in a judgment of this Court in Royal Bank* v. *Got, supra. In that case, the trial judge found that the bank intentionally failed to give notice and make a demand for payment on a debenture. At the same time, the bank brought a motion in Master's Chambers to appoint a receiver. The trial judge found that the bank intentionally filed a misleading affidavit in the Chamber's motion to procure the receiver. As a result, the Court found that the bank was liable to Got for trespass and conversion for the premature seizure and sale of Got's assets.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[106] Justice McDonald held at p. 111 that damages for conversion represent "the full value of the property converted . . . as well as any additional damage which it may have suffered by reason of the conversion which is not too remote". Justice McDonald found that the business at issue would have continued as a going concern. He awarded damages for, inter alia, the goodwill of the business as well as for loss of profits. The Court rejected the argument that recovery for value of the business plus damages for loss of profit would be double recovery, stating at p. 129:

> In the context of the remedies for conversion, it is clear that damages for loss of profits consequential upon the wrongful taking are recoverable in addition to the value of the property will be allowed, and will not be regarded as double recovery.

[107] A majority of the Alberta Court of Appeal affirmed McDonald, J.'s conclusions on this issue. The Supreme Court of Canada also endorsed McDonald, J.'s assessment of damages.

[108] Damages for conversion are of course subject to mitigation, and, as discussed in greater detail infra, the case law is clear that the onus is on the defendant to show that the plaintiff has failed to mitigate his or her losses. Simply put, damages in conversion equal the value of the chattels plus any special damages subject to mitigation.

b) Application of Legal Principles

[109] With respect to the value of the seized chattels, Switzer grabbed everything, so I will allow him to keep everything. I order that Switzer does not have to return any chattel (or other thing) to Klewchuk. Switzer can now be the owner of everything. There was only one major event — the Switzer grab. This portion of the claim for damages can be amalgamated into Klewchuk's general claim for damages.

[110] There is no magic formula to easily assess damages in conversion. I will try to use some known guideposts to make a reasonable assessment.

[111] For assessment of damages for lost profits, should I use five years of future income? Should I use three years of future income? The November 1st 1989 contract states that the joint venture terminates on November 1st 1999. The parties could extend the term of the contract, but for a conservative assessment of damages I will use only three years of future income.

[112] The task of assessing damages for lost profits is often difficult, comparable to gazing into the proverbial crystal ball. The result is often imprecise, but is based on some evidence to use as a guideline. The only guidelines this Court has to reference is Exhibit 107 prepared by Switzer and the evidence from Gaming on the escalation of gaming profits after the Gaming regulation changes.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[113] In this trial, Switzer made damage assessment evidence most difficult for Klewchuk. Switzer refused to disclose relevant information until I ordered that some information be disclosed. Some information was then disclosed by Switzer on the last day of trial. Obviously, the Gaming information is more credible than the Switzer information.

[114] Switzer's contention is that by October 25th 1996, Klewchuk had virtually lost everything and had nothing left to lose. While the evidence shows that Klewchuk was undergoing financial pressure, I have found that his situation was beginning to improve. It would be too speculative to conclude that he would not have been able to keep his head above water long enough to begin reaping the benefits of the regulation changes. Moreover, such a conclusion is not supported on the evidence. Klewchuk did not end up in an insolvency situation despite Switzer's actions.

[115] The evidence is that Klewchuk's financial situation was improving. By September 24, 1996, Klewchuk had, with the assistance of the $20,000 loan, paid up wage arrears of $125,000, and he moved to paying his staff every four days, instead of every two days. He was out of the summer doldrums and the financial performance of the casino events was improving. Moreover, the seizure occurred on the eve of Gaming opening up the casino industry by extending hours and radically increasing the number of slot machines.

[116] Klewchuk's average remuneration from the casino business (in the years just prior to the conversion) was $400,000 per annum and Switzer's average remuneration from the casino business was also $400,000. The historic combined joint venture remuneration was $800,000 per annum.

[117] Rather than disclose evidence of remuneration, Switzer tried to suppress evidence of remuneration. However, the evidence from Gaming is that after October 25th 1996, the total revenue to the four Calgary casinos boomed. Exhibit 32 shows the average revenue for each two-day casino; and it is Schedule "Y" attached to this judgment.

[118] The 1998/1999 average total revenue to the operator (per casino event) is significantly greater than the 1996/1997 average total revenue, that is $38,474.13 compared to $22,520.25. The number of casino events increased from 558 to 902. The Elbow Casino has always performed better than competitors, so the Elbow Casino enjoyed a huge increase in revenue.

[119] Casino operating expenses do not increase in lock-step with increased casino revenue. The profit margin just gets better.

[120] During the trial, I ordered that some financial disclosure be made, and on the last day of the trial Switzer filed Exhibit 107. Switzer suppressed evidence. Switzer did not disclose personal income tax returns or corporate income tax returns for 1996, 1997, 1998, or 1999.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[121] I granted a motion that Exhibit 107 shall be placed in a sealed envelope, and the envelope may only be opened by any judge. Therefore, I will not discuss Exhibit 107 in great detail.

[122] Exhibit 107 shows that in 1999, the Elbow Casino revenue increased from 1998 revenue by a further $1 million, from $6.3 million to $7.3 million. After October 25th 1996, times were good.

[123] Exhibit 107 also shows that Switzer is paying money from himself to himself (from him to one or more related corporations). There is nothing legally wrong with this type of "operating expense" — but at first glance it makes the profit look smaller. If you add back in that type of "expense" the profit is big.

[124] According to Klewchuk, and based on the figures in Exhibits 79, which is an Income Statement for the Elbow Casino for the years 1996 and 1997, and 107, during the three years after Switzer expropriated Klewchuk's casino business, Switzer's total profit was $5,345,000. If Klewchuk is entitled to one-half of that profit, the sum is $2,672,000.

[125] Because of the lack of concrete evidence and Switzer's failure to disclose the pertinent financial records until the last day of trial, I am left with a most unfortunate evidentiary record from which I must try to draw conclusions with respect to the profit generated by the Elbow Casino. For this reason, I am prepared to accept Klewchuk's figure as an approximate amount of the profit generated by Switzer in the period from 1997 to 1999. This figure is also consistent with the evidence of Gaming that the profits from Casino gambling in Calgary increased significantly following the Regulation changes in 1996.

[126] However, because the evidence was so unsatisfactory, I will be conservative and I will reduce the total profit for the three years by $945,000, from $5,345,000 to $4,400,000. One-half of $4,400,000 is $2,200,000, and that is the award of general damages. This is an amount that reflects the value of the entirety of Klewchuk's casino business as a going concern

c) Mitigation

[127] Switzer also alleges that Klewchuk should have mitigated his loss, and that Klewchuk has failed to adduce any evidence with respect to mitigation. The only evidence, according to Switzer, is that Kathy Klewchuk opened a restaurant. No evidence was adduced as to the revenues of this new business. It is well established that the burden of proof of damages lies with the plaintiff but that the onus shifts once it is alleged that the loss should have been mitigated: see Red Deer College* v. Michaels, [1976] 2 S.C.R. 324 at 330-331; Asamera Oil Corp. v. Sea Oil and General Corp., [1979] 1 S.C.R. 633; Janiak v. Ippolito, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 146; and Costello v. *Calgary (City) (1995), 53 Alta. L.R. (3d) 15 (C.A.) leave to appeal refused (1998), 212 A.R. 398n. (S.C.C.). Thus it is the defendant who carries the burden of proving mitigation.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[128] The defendant also urges this Court to draw an adverse inference from the plaintiff's failure to call Kathy Klewchuk to give evidence as to the revenues of the new business venture. The defendant cites Sopinka & Lederman and Vector Energy Inc.* v. *Pacific Gas and Electric Co., [2000] A.J. No. 326 (Q.B. per Hart J.) as authority for the principle that an adverse inference should be drawn against the plaintiff who does not call a material witness over whom he or she has exclusive control and does not explain why. They state that such failure amounts to an implied admission that the evidence of the absent witness would be contrary to the party's case, or at least would not support it.

[129] While the adverse inference principle remains true relating to material issues of a trial in proving liability, Kathy Klewchuk's evidence was not necessary to prove that Switzer wrongfully seized the casino business. Counsel for the defendant has not provided any support for the proposition that an adverse inference can be made in circumstances where the defendant carries the burden of proof. Moreover, to draw an adverse inference in relation to Klewchuk's damages would in effect reverse the widely accepted principle that it is the defendant who carries the burden of proving mitigation. Counsel for the defendant did not explain why the defendant was not entitled to conduct examinations for discovery of Kathy Klewchuk or to call Kathy Klewchuk as a witness.

[130] It is open for a trial judge to make findings in regard to mitigation from the facts presented. In Red Deer College* v. *Michaels, supra, Laskin C.J. stated at 331:

> If it is the defendant's position that the plaintiff could reasonably have avoided some part of the loss claimed, it is for the defendant to carry the burden of that issue, subject to the defendant being content to allow the matter to be disposed of on the trial judge's assessment of the plaintiff's evidence on avoidable consequences.

[131] I am not satisfied that Kathy Klewchuk's restaurant business is relevant to the issue of mitigation in this case as there is no evidence that it involves the assets or goodwill of the casino business that was converted. I note that it would have been difficult for Klewchuk to have tried his hand at the casino business again after Switzer's conversion. There are a limited number of casino licenses granted in Calgary.

[132] Even if I were persuaded that the evidence with respect to the restaurant business was relevant, the evidence adduced is not sufficient for me to draw any conclusions with respect to mitigation. Further, I am satisfied that the three year period for which I have chosen to compensate Klewchuk for the conversion of his business, adequately takes into account any duty to mitigate.

d) Counterclaim/Setoff

[133] Two of the three items on Switzer's counterclaim were: the $20,000 promissory note and the wage payments to casino staff of $17,407.82. Switzer has already paid himself these two amounts from the Klewchuk cash that Switzer grabbed in the casino. The cash was "washed" through Gaming, and then given back to Switzer.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[134] I have permitted Switzer to keep all of the Klewchuk casino assets, including the cash. The two Klewchuk liabilities of the promissory note and the wage payments are set off against Switzer's expropriation of the Klewchuk cash. Those two counterclaim items are not granted.

[135] The third item on Switzer's counterclaim was for payment of Switzer's invoices to Klewchuk. By agreement, Klewchuk paid Switzer $2,500. plus GST for each two-day casino. This payment was current, except perhaps for the two-day casino prior to October 25th. But Switzer created that non-payment (by expropriation). The other items on Switzer's invoices have not been proven as valid claims.

[136] Switzer not only grabbed Robert Klewchuk's computer and Kathy Klewchuk's computer. He seized and kept all the accounting records, business records, business plans, and information regarding the charities - i.e., all of the goodwill and all of Klewchuk's business. When Switzer seized the total business, he got both the assets and the liabilities (including any liabilities owed to himself). No counterclaim is granted.

e) Punitive Damages

[137] The Plaintiff seeks punitive damages for the wrongful seizure and conversion of his business. "Punitive damages may be awarded in conversion where the conversion is carried out in a high-handed and arrogant manner or where the court seeks to deter others from similar acts": (Klar et al., Remedies in Tort, supra, at p. 4-32.2). In making my assessment with respect to punitive damages, I am mindful of the decisions of the Alberta Court of Appeal in Sylvan Lake Golf & Tennis Club Ltd. v. Performance Industries Ltd. (2000), 185 D.L.R. (4th) 269 (Alta. C.A.); leave to appeal granted, [2000] S.C.C.A. No. 260 (Q.L.) and Colborne Capital Corp. v. 542775 Alberta Ltd. (1999), 69 Alta. L.R. (3d) 265 (C.A.); leave to appeal granted; notice of discontinuance of appeal filed May 17, 2000, [1999] S.C.C.A. No. 128 (Q.L.). As stated by the Court in Sylvan Lake, supra, at 277:

> We agree with the trial judge that the misconduct of the defendants was so outrageous that punishment and deterrence was required. However, as was held by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Walker v. CFTO Ltd. and by this Court in Colborne Capital Corp. v. 542775 Alberta Ltd.: punitive damages, over and above full compensation, should be awarded only if they achieve some rational purpose. In light of a full compensatory award, the court must determine whether any further need remains. If the compensatory damages themselves adequately satisfy the goals of punishment and deterrence, there is no valid reason for punitive damages. [citations omitted.]

[138] In this case I have found that Switzer carried out a secret plot to expropriate Klewchuk's business and to reap the profits for himself. Switzer attempted to deal with Gaming unilaterally and stated in his August 29th 1996 letter that Switzer's Investment Ltd. would operate the facility under its own name. However, Switzer learned from Gaming that SIL was not a licenced facility operator and that he still required Klewchuk. If Switzer wanted to run the facility on his own, he had to purchase Klewchuk's operation or expropriate it. He chose the latter.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[139] In these circumstances, punitive damages are appropriate. Regarding the amount of punitive damages, I am bound by the findings of the Alberta Court of Appeal in Colborne Capital Corp., supra. In that case, the trial judge awarded $1,000,000 in punitive damages. On appeal, the Court stated at 336:

> Equally, the exemplary or punitive damages in the amount chosen by the trial judge cannot stand. A $1,000,000 award of punitive damages is, so far as we can determine, unprecedented in Canadian law. Such an award calls up the concerns arise from some recent American runaway jury awards in cases against insured corporate entities such as BMW of North America Inc.* v. *Gore and others. [citations omitted.]

[140] In Royal Bank* v. *Got, supra, the trial judge awarded Got punitive damages in the amount of $100,000. He characterized this as a "substantial award" which was designed to underscore the Court's disapprobation of the failure to give reasonable notice on the debenture prior to seizing the debtor's assets, and the Court's refusal to condone its abuse for commercial advantage. This award was ultimately upheld, albeit with some reservations, by the Supreme Court of Canada.

[141] I award Klewchuk $100,000 in punitive damages. Switzer was motivated by greed: rather than purchasing Klewchuk's business, he chose to take it wrongfully through an illegal seizure and conversion. This is the type of reprehensible behaviour that warrants punitive damages. Switzer gained significantly from his wrongdoing. For example, Switzer has profited to such an extent by expropriating Klewchuk's casino business that Switzer is now willing to bulldoze the Elbow Casino and build a new casino. The amount that I awarded in general damages may not sufficiently deter Switzer's reprehensible conduct or similar reprehensible conduct of other people.

[142] The damages awarded to Klewchuk represent what Klewchuk would have been entitled to if there were no wrongdoing by Switzer. As a result, Switzer is in approximately the same position he would have been in if he had not taken such drastic action. Absent punitive damages, these actions were worth the gamble: Switzer could double his money or keep his half. Switzer took little or no risk. One need not be a professional gambler to know this is a hand clearly worth playing.

INTEREST AND COSTS

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

[143] In addition to Switzer's egregious expropriation on October 25th 1996, in this action Switzer refused to make proper disclosure. The action grew more difficult and more expensive for Klewchuk. This should be reflected in the award of interest and costs.

[144] Klewchuk is entitled to pre-judgment interest on the general damages under the Judgment Interest Act, S.A. 1984, c. J-0.5. Pursuant to s. 2(3), I have a discretion to vary the amount of interest provided for in the Act. That section states:

> 2(3) If it considers it just to do so having regard to changes in market interest rates, the circumstances of the case or the conduct of the action, the court may
> (b) award interest under this Part at a rate higher or lower than the rate set out in this Part.

[145] The circumstances of this case warrant the award of pre-judgment interest at a higher rate than that set out in the Judgment Interest Regulations, Alta. Reg. 364/84, (as amended). Switzer simply took what he wanted from Klewchuk. If he had acted in accordance with accepted commercial practice, he would have had to purchase Klewchuk's business. Had Switzer gone to a financial institution to borrow the money, he would have had to pay a higher interest rate than that set out in the Regulations.

[146] There is no pre-judgment interest on exemplary or punitive damages. On the damages for conversion, I award pre-judgment interest computed from October 25th 1996 at the interest rate (from time to time) set out in the Regulations, plus 4% per annum.

[147] Regarding costs, I do not know if either party has used Part 12 of the Alberta Rules of Court. Any portion of the costs to which Part 12 does not apply, I award such costs to Klewchuk based on column 5 of Schedule C, times 1.5.

[148] All of the awards in this judgment are payable by all of the Defendants (jointly and severally) to all of the Plaintiffs (jointly and severally). If a party wishes to propose a different payment procedure, that party must make an application to me within 30 days.

[149] If the pleadings require any amendments to reflect the award of general damages and the award of interest, I now make the necessary amendments.

[150] Some cases and authorities are referred to in this Judgment. Other relevant cases and authorities presented to me by both counsel are on Schedule "X" attached.

HEARD on the 14th day of September, 2000.

DATED at Calgary, Alberta this 19th day of April, 2001.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

J.C.Q.B.A.

This Is Schedule "X" to The Reasons For Judgment of The Honourable Mr. Justice J.S. Moore in Action No. 9601-17433, dated the 19th day of April, 2001.

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

1. G.H. Fridman, The Law of Contract (4d)(Toronto: Carswell, 1999), p. 690-692.
2. Peter Kiewit and Sons' Co. v. Eakins Construction Ltd., [1960] S.C.R. 361.
3. Davis Contractors Ltd. v. Fareham Urban District Council, [1956] A.C. 696 (H.L.).
4. Petrogas Processing Ltd. v. Westcoast Transmission Co. (1988), 59 Alta. L.R. (2d)118(Q.B.).
5. Petrogas Processing Ltd. v. Westcoast Transmission Co. [1989] 4 W.W.R. 272 (CA).
6. Capital Quality Homes Ltd. v. Colwyn Construction Ltd. (1975), 61 D.L.R. (3d) 385 (Ont. CA).
7. 111 Niakwa Road Ltd. v. Duraps Corp. (1985), 37 Man. R. (2d) 250 (Q.B.).
8. Mr. Convenience Ltd. v. 040502 N.B. Ltd. (1993), 137 N.B.R. (2d) 305 (CA).
9. R.G.O. Office Products Ltd. v. Knoll North America Corp. (1996), 37 Alta. L.R. (3d) 113 (Q.B.).
10. Central Mortgage and Housing Corp. v. Omega Investments Ltd. (1981), 34 N.B.R. (2d) 291 (CA).
11. Ramrakha v. Zinner (1994), 24 Alta.L.R. (3d) 240 (Alta.CA).
12. Wonsch Construction Co. v. National Bank of Canada (1990), 75 D.L.R. (4th) 732 (Ont. CA).
13. Luscar Ltd. v. Pembina Resources Ltd., [1995] 2W.W.R. 153 (Alta. CA).
14. Poulos v. Caravelle Homes Ltd. (1995), 32 Alta. L.R. (3d) 76 (Q.B.).
15. Poulos v. Caravelle Homes Ltd. (1997), 49 Alta. L.R. (3d) 385 (CA).
16. Partnership Act, R.S.A. 1980, c.P-2.
17. Ellis, Fiduciary Duties in Canada (June 1999 Rel.) at 12(1-3).
18. Cameron v. Willis (1908), 9 W.L.R. 224.
19. Civil Enforcement Act, R.S.A. 1986, c.10-5, s 1(1), 9(1), 9(3), 104 and 45(5).
20. Bennett, "Creditors' and Debtors' Rights, 1987-1988" in The Law Society of Upper Canada Bar Admission Course Materials (Calgary:Carswell, 1988) c.5, p59-61.
21. Clarkson Co. Ltd. v. Consortium Group Ltd. (1983), 40 O.R. (2d) 771 (H.C.).
22. Fawell v. Andrew, [1917] 2 W.W.R. 400 (Sask.CA).
23. Hoyes v. Creery, [1918] 1 W.W.R. 873 (B.C.C.A).
24. Williams and Rhodes, Canadian Law of Landlord and Tenant (6th) (Calgary: Carswell 1988 Volume 1) p8-85, 8-91, 8-92.
25. Financial Collection Agencies Ltd. v. Elgarably, (1996) 38 Alta.L.R. (3d) 276.
26. Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Delta Masonry & Concrete Ltd. and Pfaff, (1985) 41 Alta L.R. (2d) 48.
27. Personal Property Security Act, S.A. 1988 c. P-4.05, s58.

28. Creditor-Debtor Law in Canada, Dunlop, C.R.B., (Carswell, 1995) (2d) p.286-288.
29. Stewart v. Industrial Acceptance Corporation Limited [1949], 1 W.W.R. 1154 (B.C.S.C.).
30. McGregor on Damages, 14th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd., 1980) c.11, p.226-242.
31. Phillips v. 707739 Alberta Ltd. [2000], 6 W.W.R. 280.
32. Broom's Legal Maxims, 10th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell Ltd., 1939) p.637-640.
33. W.A. Stevenson and J.E. Cote, Civil Procedure Guide (Edmonton: Juriliber Ltd. 1996) p.1152.
34. Halsbury's Laws of England, Evidence: Special Modes of Proof (Vol 17) 4th ed. para 119, 120 and 121 .
35. The Digest: Annotated British, Commonwealth and European Cases, Evidence (Vol.22(1))(London:Butterworth & Co. Ltd., 1988) p. 267-269.
36. Gilham v. Ulm [1923], 3 W.W.R. 853.
37. Saint John River Steamship Co. v. Star Line Steamship Co. (1911) 40 NBR 405 (CA).
38. Spasic Estate v. Imperial Tobacco Ltd. [2000], O.J. No. 2690 (QL)(CA).
39. Donison v. Donison and Uncle Bill Foundation Inc. (1984), 35 Sask.R. 183 (CA).
40. Wewayakum Indian Band v. Canada and Wawayakai Indian Bank (1995), 99 FTR 1.
41. Bank of Nova Scotia v. Lockhart, [1986] AJ No. 1363 (QL).
42. Heriteau v. W.D. Morris Realty Ltd. (Capital Storage Co.),[1943] OR 724 (Ont. HC).
43. Woodfall Landlord & Tenant (London: Sweet & Maxwell, Release 29), para. 9.135 to 9.142, and 9.169.
44. A Practical Treatise on the Law of Distress for Rent and of Things Damage-feasant (London: Butterworth & Co., 1899) p. 180, 181, 219 and 220.
45. Volume 18, The Digest: Annotated British Commonwealth and European Cases, 2nd Reissue (London: Butterworth & Co. 1989) p.481 and 482.
46. Dunlop, Creditor-Debtor Law in Canada (Toronto: Carswell, 1981), p. 24-26. Cross v. Albertson (1923), 25 OWN 421 (HC); aff'd (1924), 26 OWN 3 (CA).
47. Cumming and Wood, Alberta Personal Property Security Act Handbook, 4th ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1998) p. 169 and 173.
48. Grenn v. Brampton Poultry Co. Ltd. (1958) 13 D.L.R. (2d) 279 (Ont. H.C.).
49. Whiten v. Pilot Insurance Co. (1999) 42 O.R. (3d) 641 (CA).
50. Capital Quality Homes Ltd. v. Colwyn Construction Ltd. (1975) 61 D.L.R. (3d) 385 (Ont. CA).
51. Chitty On Contracts, (28th ed) (1999) v.1, p. 1205.
52. Buckley v. Russell (1884) Trinity Term, XLVII Victoria 205.
53. Pegg et ux v. Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters (1901) O.L.R. 97.
54. C.W. Financial Corp. v. Westworld Computers Ltd. (1986) A.J. No. 1648 (Q.B.).
55. Waisman v. Crown Trust Co. (1970) 9 D.L.R. (3d) 733 (S.C.C.).

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

56. Civil Enforcement Act, R.S.A. 1986 c.10.5, s104, 14, 1(1)(g) and 2(a).
57. Purschke v. CRD Industries Inc. [1993] A.J. No. 151 (Q.B.).
58. Khoury Real Estate Services Ltd. v. Maritimes & Northeast Pipeline Management Ltd. (1999) 218 N.B.R. (2d) 58.
59. Richmond Spadina Investments Inc. v. Incorporated Sixth Video (1996) 6 R.P.R. (3d) 236.
60. Personal Property Security Act, R.S.A. c.P-4.05, s.58(7).

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)

This Is Schedule "Y" to The Reasons For Judgment of The Honourable Mr. Justice J.S. Moore in Action No. 9601-17433, dated the 19th day of April, 2001.

Calgary Casino Results[1]

Fiscal Year[2]	# of licences	Drop	Win	Hold[3]	Average	50% to Operator	Slot Revenue to Operator[4]	Total Revenue to Operator
96/97	558	138,655,000	115,664,000	22,991,000	41,202.51	20,601.25	1,919	22,520.25
97/98	817	226,399,000	188,215,000	38,184,000	46,736.84	23,368.42	7,371	30,739.42
98/99	902	262,834,000	220,784,000	42,050,000	46,618.63	23,309.31	15,165	38,474.31

[1] Prepared from "Charitable Gaming in Alberta, 1998-99 in Review", Alberta Gaming

[2] April 1 to March 31

[3] Drop minus Win

[4] 1.5 times Slot Revenues to Charities

2001 ABQB 316 (CanLII)